VISITING RESEARCH CHAIR IN THEORY AND PRACTICE OF CONSTITUTIONALISM AND FEDERALISM

The chair will pursue research in constitutionalism broadly construed; and interest in federalism in particular is especially desirable but not necessary. The ability to engage with scholars and students across methodologies – normative, empirical, intellectual-historical, jurisprudential, and formal for example – is more important than particular areas of emphasis. Sample areas of interest include: the constitutional status of federalist arrangements, including their judicial enforceability, their founding status, and their effects on other constitutional structures; empirical comparative studies of federalism; analytic or formal modeling of federal systems; normative models of government; the intellectual foundations of federalism, including the history of federalist thought; multiethnic federalism; the relationship between constitutionalism and democracy or between constitutionalism and liberalism; the stability of constitutional systems; constitutional political economy; constitutional entrenchment and judicial review; the history of constitutional thought.
