

World Lab Day comes to Cambridge (pt 2)

Second part of World Lab Day story, with more pictures.

This section includes pictures from the picket of British Heart Foundation shop on Burleigh Street, near the Grafton Centre.

The picket effectively besieged the shop for the best part of an hour, with a grand finale of a cacophany of loudhailer sirens followed by a collective single finger salute (see picture) to this charity that have done so much to promote the cause of animal liberation.

Showing what they think of BHF's support for vivisection.

On the way back to Parkers Piece up Burleigh Street the group briefly stopped off at the Cancer Research UK shop as well, other known supporters of vivisection.

A few more high spirited individuals even opportunistically harangued a local Quiksilver branch, which although not linked to animal right issues certainly do encourage strife of another kind.

The whole protest was peaceable (if not peaceful, with lots of chanting and sirens) and nobody got hurt, which is more than can be said for the millions of animals still trapped in laboratories up and down the country.

Clearly quite F.I.T. to climb up there...

Nuff sed!

Besieging the BHF (on Burleigh Street)!

Finishing the main march, back on Parkers Piece.

Stopping off Outside the Downing Site, where animal testing labs are.

Marching for Animal Rights up Kings Parade.

One of several anti BHF messages, Kings College Chapel in the background.

A post grad ceremony was also taking place on Senate House lawn!

Second stop, in front of Gonville & Caius College and Senate House, Trinity St.
