DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

In Congress, July 4, 1776. THE UNANIMOUS DECLARATION OF THE THIRTEEN UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: - that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world:

He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation, till his assent should be obtained; and when so suspended he has utterly neglected to attend to them. He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature - a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into a compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly, for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused, for a long time after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise, the state remaining, in the meantime, exposed to all the dangers of invasions from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of land.

He has obstructed the administration of justice by refusing his assent to laws establishing judiciary powers.

He has made judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers, to harass our people and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation.

For quartering large bodies of armed troops amongst us;

For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states;

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world;

For imposing taxes on us without our consent;

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury;

For transporting us beyond the seas to be tried for pretended offenses;

For abolishing the free system of English laws, in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries, so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies;

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering, fundamentally, the forms of our government;

For suspending our own legislature, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever;

He has abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his protection, and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy, scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow-citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and bretheren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

He has excited domestic insurrection amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind - enemies in war; in peace, friends.

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general congress assembled, appealing to the supreme judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name, and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

Editor's note: (1) This version of the Constitution of the United States of America is a continuation of a format for printing the Constitution that was initiated in 1908 by a commissioner appointed by the supreme court of the state of Colorado. This version contains a table of contents, changes in spelling and capitalization, caption headings, editor's notes, and an index. Additionally, the brackets in article I, section 2, clause (3) on page 11 indicate that the language contained therein was superseded or modified by amendments (see section 2 of the fourteenth amendment on page 21 and the sixteenth amendment on page 21); the brackets in article I, section 3, clauses (1) and (2) on page 11 indicate that the language contained therein is superseded or modified by the seventeenth amendment on page 22; and the brackets in article II, section 1, clause (3) on page 14 indicate that the language contained therein is superseded by the twelfth amendment on page 20. The reader should also note that provisions in article I, section 4, clause (2) on page 12 are superseded or modified by the twentieth amendment on page 22.

(2) The twenty-seven articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America, including the Bill of Rights, are numbered and titled in this publication as "articles", rather than individual "amendments" to the Constitution. This practice is based on the language used in the original proposals to amend the Constitution by the addition of articles of amendment, as well as on the official revised version of the Constitution of the United States which the 108th Congress of the United States ordered printed in 2003. That version of the Constitution provides that the "articles [are] in addition to, and amendment of, the constitution of the United States of America, proposed by Congress, and ratified by the legislatures of the several states, pursuant to the fifth article of the original Constitution." [See United States House of Representatives Document 108-95.] The practice of calling the articles of amendment "articles" is also consistent with, and even predates, the version of the Constitution commissioned by the Colorado Supreme Court in 1908, and dates as far back as the 1861 publication of the state's laws. However, recent trends in the publication of the articles of amendment to the Constitution may use the common term "amendments" rather than "articles".

Preamble

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States of America.

ARTICLE I

The Legislative Department

§ 1. Vestment of legislative power. All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a congress of the United States, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives.

§ 2. House of representatives - qualifications of electors. (1) The house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year, by the people of the several states; and the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature.

(2) Qualifications of representative. No person shall be a representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state in which he shall be chosen.

(3) Apportionment of representatives and taxes. [Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states which may be included within this union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.] The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each state shall have at least one representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the state of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three; Massachusetts, eight; Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, one; Connecticut, five; New York, six; New Jersey, four; Pennsylvania, eight; Delaware, one; Maryland, six; Virginia, ten; North Carolina, five; South Carolina, five; and Georgia, three.

(4) Vacancies in representation - how filled. When vacancies happen in the representation from any state, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

(5) Speaker - officers - impeachment. The house of representatives shall choose their speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

§ 3. Two senators from each state - how chosen. (1) [The senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years, and each senator shall have one vote.]

(2) Classification of senators - vacancies. Immediately after they shall be assembled, in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided, as equally as may be, into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class, at the expiration of the fourth year; and of the third class, at the expiration of the sixth year; so that one-third may be chosen every second year; [and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any state, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.]

(3) Qualification of senators. No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state for which he shall be chosen.

(4) President of senate. The vice-president of the United States shall be president of the senate; but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

(5) Officers of senate, how chosen. The senate shall choose their other officers, and also a president pro tempore, in the absence of the vice-president, or when he shall exercise the office of president of the United States.

(6) Senate to try impeachments. The senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the president of the United States is tried, the chief justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

(7) Extent of judgment in impeachment. Judgment, in cases of impeachment, shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

§ 4. Election of senators and representatives. (1) The times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state, by the legislature thereof, but the congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing senators.

(2) Congress shall assemble annually. The congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

§ 5. Membership - quorum. (1) Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may provide.

(2) Rules - punishment - expulsion. Each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with a concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

(3) Keep journal - yeas and nays. Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

(4) Adjournment. Neither house, during the session of congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting.

§ 6. Compensation - privileges. (1) The senators and representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the treasury of the United States. They shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same, and for any speech or debate in either house they shall not be questioned in any other place.

(2) Members precluded from holding office. No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either house during his continuance in office.

§ 7. Revenue bills. (1) All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives; but the senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.

(2) Bills presented to president - veto - return. Every bill which shall have passed the house of representatives and the senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the president of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections, at large, on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and, if approved by two-thirds of that house, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays; and the names of persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the president within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the congress, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall not be a law.

(3) Orders - resolutions - presented to president. Every order, resolution or vote, to which the concurrence of the senate and house of representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the president of the United States; and, before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him shall be repassed by two-thirds of the senate and house of representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

§ 8. Powers of congress. The congress shall have power:

(1) To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

(2) To borrow money on the credit of the United States.

(3) To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes.

(4) To establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

(5) To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

(6) To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.

(7) To establish post offices and post roads.

(8) To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

(9) To constitute tribunals, inferior to the supreme court.

(10) To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations.

(11) To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.

(12) To raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

(13) To provide and maintain a navy.

(14) To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

(15) To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

(16) To provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by congress.

(17) To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular states, and the acceptance of congress, become the seat of the government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards and other needful buildings; and:

(18) To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

§ 9. Slave trade. (1) The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person.

(2) Habeas corpus. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

(3) Attainder - ex post facto laws. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

(4) Capitation tax. No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

(5) Export duties - preference to ports. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one state be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

(6) Appropriations - statement and account. No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

(7) Nobility - presents from foreign powers. No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of congress, accept any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state.

§ 10. Powers denied individual states. (1) No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation; grant letters of marque or reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

(2) Powers denied individual states except by consent of congress. No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any state on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the congress. No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II
The Executive Department

§ 1. President and vice-president. (1) The executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the vice-president, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

(2) Electors. Each state shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the state may be entitled in the congress; but no senator or representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

(3) Vote of electors. [The electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the president of the senate. The president of the senate shall, in the presence of the senate and house of representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the president, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the house of representatives shall immediately choose, by ballot, one of them for president, and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said house shall, in like manner, choose the president. But in choosing the president, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. In every case after the choice of the president the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the vice-president. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the senate shall choose from them, by ballot, the vice-president.]

(4) Election day. The congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

(5) Qualification of president. No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall be eligible to the office of president; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.

(6) Vacancy in office of president - succession. In case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice-president, and the congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the president and vice-president, declaring what officer shall then act as president, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected.

(7) Compensation of president. The president shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive, within that period, any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

(8) Oath of president. Before he enter on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation:

(9) Form of oath. "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of president of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the United States."

§ 2. Powers of president. (1) The president shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states, when called into the actual service of the United States. He may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices; and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

(2) Treaties - appointments. He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law: But the congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper, in the president alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

(3) President to fill vacancies. The president shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session.

§ 3. Duties of president. He shall, from time to time, give to the congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper. He shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

§ 4. Impeachment. The president and vice-president, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III

The Judicial Department

§ 1. Judiciary - tenure - compensation. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish.

The judges, both of the supreme court and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

§ 2. Jurisdiction. (1) The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more states; between a state and citizens of another state; between citizens of different states; between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states; and between a state or the citizens thereof and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.

(2) Jurisdiction of supreme court. In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases before mentioned the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the congress shall make.

(3) Trial by jury - venue. The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by a jury; and such trial shall be held in the state where the said crime shall have been committed; but when not committed within any state, the trial shall be at such place or places as the congress may by law have directed.

§ 3. Treason. (1) Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies; giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

(2) Punishment for treason. The congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.

ARTICLE IV
States and Territories

§ 1. Public acts, records and proceedings of states. Full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. And the congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

§ 2. Equality of privileges. (1) The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.

(2) Fugitives from justice. A person charged in any state with treason, felony or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime.

(3) Fugitives from service. No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

§ 3. Admission of new states. (1) New states may be admitted by the congress into this Union; but no new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state, nor any state be formed by the junction of two or more states, or parts of states, without the consent of the legislatures of the states concerned, as well as of the congress.

(2) Power of congress over territories. The congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular state.

§ 4. Republican form of government - protection of states. The United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

ARTICLE V
Amendments to Constitution

Amendments to constitution. The congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the congress: Provided, That no amendment, which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses of the ninth section of the first article; and that no state, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the senate.

ARTICLE VI
Miscellaneous Provisions

(1) Debts prior to constitution. All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States, under this constitution, as under the confederation.

(2) Supremacy of constitution, treaties and laws. This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby; anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.

(3) Oath to support constitution. The senators and representatives beforementioned, and the members of the several legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several states, shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII
Ratification

Ratification. The ratification of the conventions of nine states shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution between states so ratifying the same.

Done in Convention, By the unanimous consent of the states present, the seventeenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, and of the independence of the United States of America the twelfth.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

ARTICLE I

Freedom of religion, speech and press - right of petition. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

ARTICLE II

Right of arms. A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

ARTICLE III

Quartering of troops. No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

ARTICLE IV

Searches and seizures regulated. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE V

Grand jury - indictment - jeopardy - process of law - taking property for public use. No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Rights of accused. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

ARTICLE VII

Jury trial in civil actions. In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

ARTICLE VIII

Excessive bail, fines or punishments. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

ARTICLE IX

Reserved rights. The enumeration in the constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

ARTICLE X

Reserved powers. The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people.

ARTICLE XI

States may not be sued by individual. The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.

ARTICLE XII

Mode of electing president and vice-president. The electors shall meet in their respective states and vote by ballot for president and vice-president, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same state as themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as president; and in distinct ballots the person voted for as vice-president; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as president, and of all persons voted for as vice-president, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of government of the United States, directed to the president of the senate; the president of the senate shall, in the presence of the senate and house of representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for president shall be the president, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as president, the house of representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the president. But in choosing the president, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the house of representatives shall not choose a president whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the vice-president shall act as president, as in the case of death or other constitutional disability of the president. The person having the greatest number of votes as vice-president shall be vice-president, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the senate shall choose the vice-president; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of president, shall be eligible to that of vice-president of the United States.

ARTICLE XIII

§ 1. Slavery prohibited. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

§ 2. Enforcement of article. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XIV

§ 1. Citizenship defined - privileges of citizens. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

§ 2. Apportionment of representatives among states. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several states according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each state, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for president and vice-president of the United States, representatives in congress, the executive and judicial officers of a state, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such state, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such state.

§ 3. Disability to hold office in certain cases. No person shall be a senator or representative in Congress, or elector of president or vice-president, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any state, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any state legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any state, to support the constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each house, remove such disability.

§ 4. Validity of public debt. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any state shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave, but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

§ 5. Enforcement of article. The congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

ARTICLE XV

§ 1. Right of suffrage. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.

§ 2. Enforcement of article. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XVI

Income tax. The congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several states, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

ARTICLE XVII

(1) Election of senators by people. The senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each senator shall have one vote. The electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislatures.

(2) Filling of vacancies. When vacancies happen in the representation of any state in the senate, the executive authority of such state shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: provided, that the legislature of any state may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

(3) Existing terms not affected. This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the constitution.

ARTICLE XVIII

§ 1. Prohibition of intoxicating liquors. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

§ 2. Enforcement of article. The congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

§ 3. Ratification. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by the legislatures of the several states, as provided in the constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the states by the congress. (Repealed: See Article XXI.)

ARTICLE XIX

§ 1. Extending right of suffrage to women. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

§ 2. Enforcement of article. Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XX

§ 1. Beginning of terms of president, vice-president, senators and representatives. The terms of the president and vice-president shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of senators and representatives at noon on the third day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

§ 2. Assembly of congress. The congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the third day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

§ 3. Death of president. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the president, the president elect shall have died, the vice-president elect shall become president. If a president shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the president elect shall have failed to qualify, then the vice-president elect shall act as president until a president shall have qualified; and the congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a president elect nor a vice-president elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as president, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a president or vice-president shall have qualified.

§ 4. Death of persons from whom successor chosen. The congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the house of representatives may choose a president whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the senate may choose a vice-president whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

§ 5. Effective date. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the fifteenth day of October following the ratification of this article.

§ 6. Ratification. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states within seven years from the date of its submission.

ARTICLE XXI

§ 1. Repeal of eighteenth amendment. The eighteenth article of amendment to the constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

§ 2. Transportation in violation of state laws prohibited. The transportation or importation into any state, territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

§ 3. Ratification. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by conventions in the several states, as provided in the constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the states by the congress.

ARTICLE XXII

§ 1. Limitation upon terms of president. No person shall be elected to the office of the president more than twice, and no person who has held the office of president, or acted as president, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected shall be elected to the office of the president more than once. But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of president when this article was proposed by the congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of president, or acting as president, during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of president or acting as president during the remainder of such term.

§ 2. Ratification. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several states within seven years from the date of its submission to the states by the congress.

ARTICLE XXIII

§ 1. The District constituting the seat of Government of the United States shall appoint in such manner as the Congress may direct:

A number of electors of president and vice-president equal to the whole number of senators and representatives in Congress to which the District would be entitled if it were a State, but in no event more than the least populous State; they shall be in addition to those appointed by the States, but they shall be considered, for the purposes of the election of President and Vice-President, to be electors appointed by a State; and they shall meet in the District and perform such duties as provided by the twelfth article of amendment.

§ 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Editor's note: Passed by Congress, June 16, 1960; certificate of validity filed April 3, 1961.

ARTICLE XXIV
Qualifications of Electors; Poll Tax

§ 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice President, for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.

§ 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Editor's note: Passed by Congress, August 27, 1962; certificate of validity filed February 5, 1964.

ARTICLE XXV
Succession to Presidency and Vice Presidency; Disability of President

§ 1. In case of the removal of the President from office or of his death or resignation, the Vice President shall become President.

§ 2. Whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice President, the President shall nominate a Vice President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress.

§ 3. Whenever the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that he is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, and until he transmits to them a written declaration to the contrary, such powers and duties shall be discharged by the Vice President as Acting President.

§ 4. Whenever the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive departments or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall immediately assume the powers and duties of the office as Acting President.

Thereafter, when the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that no inability exists, he shall resume the powers and duties of his office unless the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive department or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit within four days to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office. Thereupon Congress shall decide the issue, assembling within forty-eight hours for that purpose if not in session. If the Congress, within twenty-one days after receipt of the latter written declaration, or, if Congress is not in session, within twenty-one days after Congress is required to assemble, determines by two-thirds vote of both Houses that the President in unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall continue to discharge the same as Acting President; otherwise, the President shall resume the powers and duties of his office.

Editor's note: This article was ratified by Colorado on February 3, 1966, and by three-fourths of the state on February 23, 1967.

ARTICLE XXVI
Right to Vote; Citizens Eighteen Years of Age or Older

§ 1. The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age.

§ 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Editor's note: This article was ratified by the thirty-eighth state on June 30, 1971.

ARTICLE XXVII
Effective Date for Variance in the Compensation of Senators and Representatives

No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Editor's note: This article was ratified by the Fifty-fourth General Assembly of the state of Colorado at its Second Regular Session in 1984 (see L. 84, pp. 1151-52) and by the thirty-eighth state, Michigan, on May 7, 1992.

ENABLING ACT

Editor's note: The following act of March 3, 1875, is found at 18 Stat. 474.

AN ACT TO ENABLE THE PEOPLE OF COLORADO TO FORM A CONSTITUTION AND STATE GOVERNMENT, AND FOR THE ADMISSION OF THE SAID STATE INTO THE UNION ON AN EQUAL FOOTING WITH THE ORIGINAL STATES.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled:

§ 1. Authority to form state. That the inhabitants of the territory of Colorado included in the boundaries hereinafter designated, be, and they are hereby authorized to form for themselves, out of said territory, a state government, with the name of the state of Colorado; which state, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatsoever, as hereinafter provided.

ANNOTATION

Applied in State, Dept. of Natural Res. v. Southwestern Colo. Water Conservation Dist., 671 P.2d 1294 (Colo. 1983).

§ 2. Boundaries. That the said state of Colorado shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to-wit: commencing on the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude where the twenty-fifth meridian of longitude west from Washington crosses the same; thence north, on same meridian, to the forty-first parallel of north latitude; thence along said parallel west to the thirty-second meridian of longitude west from Washington; thence south on said meridian, to the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude; thence along said thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude to the place of beginning.

§ 3. Convention - election - apportionment - proclamation. That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the general assembly of said territory, at the date of the passage of this act, shall be qualified to be elected, and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention, under such rules and regulations as the governor of said territory, the chief justice, and the United States attorney thereof may prescribe; and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitution as may be formed by said convention, under such rules and regulations as said convention may prescribe; and the aforesaid representatives to form the aforesaid convention shall be apportioned among the several counties in said territory in proportion to the vote polled in each of said counties at the last general election as near as may be; and said apportionment shall be made for said territory by the governor, United States district attorney, and chief justice thereof, or any two of them; and the governor of said territory shall, by proclamation, order an election of the representatives aforesaid, to be held throughout the territory at such time as shall be fixed by the governor, chief justice and United States attorney, or any two of them; which proclamation shall be issued within ninety days next after the first day of September, eighteen hundred and seventy-five, and at least thirty days prior to the time of said election; and such election shall be conducted in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said territory regulating elections therein, for members of the house of representatives; and the number of members to said convention shall be the same as now constitutes both branches of the legislature of the aforesaid territory.

§ 4. Constitutional convention - requirements of constitution. That the members of the convention thus elected shall meet at the capital of said territory, on a day to be fixed by said governor, chief justice, and United States attorney, not more than sixty days subsequent to the day of election, which time of meeting shall be contained in the aforesaid proclamation mentioned in the third section of this act, and after organization, shall declare, on behalf of the people of said territory, that they adopt the constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be and is hereby authorized to form a constitution and state government for said territory; provided, that the constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the constitution of the United States and the principles of the declaration of independence; and, provided further, that said convention shall provide by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said state; first, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said state shall ever be molested in person or property, on account of his or her mode of religious worship; secondly, that the people inhabiting said territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without said state shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by the state on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States.

This act insured a republican form of government. Colorado's enabling act, approved by the federal government when Colorado acquired statehood, insured that the state would have a republican form of government. City & County of Denver v. Sweet, 138 Colo. 41, 329 P.2d 441 (1958).

Constitutional amendment held not obnoxious to section. A constitutional amendment consolidating a city and county government into one and providing that the people of the city and county shall adopt a charter which shall provide for the election or appointment of all officers of the city and county and shall designate the officers who shall perform the acts and duties required by the constitution and general laws to be done by county officers, and provides that the citizens of the city and county shall have exclusive power to adopt or to amend their charter or to adopt any measure as provided in the amendment, does not exempt a portion of the state from the provisions of the constitution and general laws of the state, and is not obnoxious to this section which requires the constitution to be republican in form and not repugnant to the constitution of the United States. People ex rel. Elder v. Sours, 31 Colo. 369, 74 P. 167 (1903); People ex rel. Miller v. Johnson, 34 Colo. 143, 86 P. 233 (1905).

State authority to adopt own water use system. Federal statutes, as interpreted by the United States supreme court, recognize Colorado's authority to adopt its own system for the use of all waters within the state in accordance with the needs of its citizens, subject to the prohibitions against interference with federal reserved rights, with interstate commerce, and with the navigability of any navigable waters. State, Dept. of Natural Res. v. Southwestern Colo. Water Conservation Dist., 671 P.2d 1294 (Colo. 1983).

§ 5. Adoption of constitution - president to proclaim. That in case the constitution and state government shall be formed for the people of said territory of Colorado, in compliance with the provisions of this act, said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said state for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at such time, in the month of July, eighteen hundred and seventy-six, and at such places and under such regulations as may be prescribed by said convention, at which election the lawful voters of said new state shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution; and the returns of said election shall be made to the acting governor of the territory, who, with the chief justice and United States attorney of said territory, or any two of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed state, the said acting governor shall certify the same to the president of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances, whereupon it shall be the duty of the president of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the state admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original states, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

ANNOTATION

Applied in State, Dept. of Natural Res. v. Southwestern Colo. Water Conservation Dist., 671 P.2d 1294 (Colo. 1983).

§ 6. One representative - officers - election. That until the next general census said state shall be entitled to one representative in the house of representatives of the United States, which representative, together with the governor and state and other officers provided for in said constitution, shall be elected on a day subsequent to the adoption of the constitution, and to be fixed by said constitutional convention; and until said state officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution, the territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices.

§ 7. School lands. The sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in every township, and where such sections have been sold or otherwise disposed of by any act of congress, other lands equivalent thereto in legal sub-divisions of not more than one quarter-section, and as contiguous as may be, are hereby granted to said state for the support of common schools.

Colorado has an obligation enforceable under the supremacy clause to act as trustee for the school lands granted under the Colorado Enabling Act for the benefit of the public schools. Branson Sch. Dist. RE-82 v. Romer, 958 F. Supp. 1501 (D. Colo. 1997), aff'd, 161 F.3d 619 (10th Cir. 1998).

This section creates a trust, the beneficiaries of which are the public schools, not the public at large. Brotman v. East Lake Creek Ranch L.L.P., 31 P.3d 886 (Colo. 2001).

Lands not subject to assessment by special improvement district. Land placed in perpetual public trust pursuant to this section, and subject to the restrictions imposed under §§ 3 and 5 of art. IX, Colo. Const., is not subject to assessment by a special improvement district created in a municipality. People ex rel. Dunbar v. City of Littleton, 183 Colo. 195, 515 P.2d 1121 (1973).

Since assessment constitutes diversion of school funds. Lands granted by the federal government to states for school purposes are exempt from special assessments upon one of three overlapping reasons, the essence of which is that enforcement of the assessments against either the land or its proceeds would be a diversion of school funds in violation of either: (1) the act of congress granting the land to the state for school purposes; (2) state constitutional provisions making such land part of the state school fund and declaring that the principal must remain inviolate; and (3) the fact that the state holds such lands in trust for the purpose of the grant. People ex rel. Dunbar v. City of Littleton, 183 Colo. 195, 515 P.2d 1121 (1973).

Act authorizing acceptance of certificates of indebtedness in payment for state lands. Where an act provides for the payment for lands purchased from the state by certificates issued for the construction of a ditch, the act would necessarily result in diverting these lands and the proceeds thereof from the use and benefit of the respective objects for which the grants were made, such as schools, public buildings, etc., and the act is unconstitutional and void insofar as it authorizes the state to accept the certificates issued, in payment for state lands. In re Canal Certificates, 19 Colo. 63, 34 P. 274 (1893).

§ 8. Land for public buildings. That, provided the state of Colorado shall be admitted into the Union in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act, fifty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said state, to be selected and located by direction of the legislature thereof, and with the approval of the president, on or before the first day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-eight, shall be and are hereby granted, in legal sub-divisions of not less than one quarter-section, to said state for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said state, for legislative and judicial purposes, in such manner as the legislature shall prescribe.

§ 9. Land for penitentiary. That fifty other entire sections of land as aforesaid, to be selected and located and with the approval as aforesaid, in legal sub-divisions as aforesaid, shall be, and they are hereby granted, to said state for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary or state prison in the manner aforesaid.

be to each, shall be granted to said state for its use, the said land to be selected by the governor of said state within two years after the admission of the state, and when so selected to be used and disposed of on such terms, conditions and regulations as the legislature shall direct; provided, that no salt springs or lands, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which hereafter shall be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this act be granted to said state.

§ 12. Sale of agricultural lands. That five per centum of the proceeds of the sales of agricultural public lands lying within said state, which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said state into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said state for the purpose of making such internal improvements within said state as the legislature thereof may direct; provided, that this section shall not apply to any lands disposed of under the homestead laws of the United States, or to any lands now or hereafter reserved for public or other uses.

ANNOTATION

Law reviews. For article, "The 'New' Colorado State Land Board", see 78 Den. U. L. Rev. 347 (2001).

This section places no limit upon the power of the general assembly over the fund for internal improvements, except that it shall be used for the purpose of internal improvement within the state. In re Senate Resolution, 12 Colo. 287, 21 P. 484 (1888).

Meaning of "internal improvements". Internal improvements, within the meaning of this section, must be improvements located within the state; they must be improvements of a fixed and permanent nature, as improvements of real property; and, furthermore, they must be such improvements as are designed and intended for the benefit of the public. In re Internal Imps., 18 Colo. 317, 32 P. 611 (1893).

Public reservoirs are "internal improvements". Public reservoirs for the storage of water for irrigation and domestic uses are internal improvements, and the general assembly may lawfully make appropriations from such fund for such purposes. In re Senate Resolution, 12 Colo. 287, 21 P. 484 (1889).

Activities not deemed "internal improvements". Appropriations from the fund for transient objects, such as personalty, as well as appropriations to promote private or individual enterprises, would be contrary to the intention of the general government as donor of the fund; and no part of such fund can be lawfully appropriated to defray the current expenses of carrying on state institutions. In re Internal Imps., 18 Colo. 317, 32 P. 611 (1893).

The phrase "internal improvement", as used in this section, does not include public buildings, such as asylums, state houses, universities, or any other public buildings of like character. The fund created by the proceeds derived under this section cannot be applied to the construction of such buildings. In re Internal Imp. Fund, 24 Colo. 247, 48 P. 807 (1897).

§ 13. Unexpended balance of appropriations. That any balance of the appropriations for the legislative expenses of said territory of Colorado remaining unexpended, shall be applied to and used for defraying the expenses of said convention, and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the territorial legislature.

§ 14. School lands - how sold. That the two sections of land in each township herein granted for the support of common schools shall be disposed of only at public sale and at a price not less than two dollars and fifty cents per acre, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which to be expended in the support of common schools.

Cross references: For grants of land by the United States to the states in aid of common or public schools; extension to those mineral in character; and effect of leases, see 43 U.S.C. sec. 870.

ANNOTATION

This section creates an enforceable trust. Branson Sch. Dist. RE-82 v. Romer, 958 F. Supp. 1501 (D. Colo. 1997), aff'd, 161 F.3d 619 (10th Cir. 1998).

The specific language in this section gives enough import to the general language in § 7 to create a trust. Branson Sch. Dist. RE-82 v. Romer, 958 F. Supp. 1501 (D. Colo. 1997), aff'd, 161 F.3d 619 (10th Cir. 1998).

Preamble

We, the people of Colorado, with profound reverence for the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, in order to form a more independent and perfect government; establish justice; insure tranquillity; provide for the common defense; promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the "State of Colorado".

ANNOTATION

Law reviews. For article, "A New or Revised Constitution of Colorado", see 11 Dicta 303 (1934). For article, "State Constitutions and Individual Rights: The Case for Judicial Restraint", see 63 Den. U. L. Rev. 85 (1986).

Constitution does not forbid creation or abolition of rights. The constitution does not forbid the creation of new rights, or the abolition of old ones recognized by the common law, to attain a permissible legislative object. Vogts v. Guerrette, 142 Colo. 527, 351 P.2d 851 (1960).

Construction of statute to avoid constitutional conflict. Where an act of the general assembly is susceptible of different constructions, one of which would offend against the constitution, it is the duty of the courts to adopt that construction which will avoid constitutional conflict. Lowen v. Hilton, 142 Colo. 200, 351 P.2d 881 (1960); Colorado Ass'n of Pub. Employees v. Lamm, 677 P.2d 1350 (Colo. 1984).

Boundary line established between Colorado and New Mexico. New Mexico v. Colorado, 267 U.S. 30, 45 S. Ct. 202, 69 L. Ed. 499 (1925).

ARTICLE I
Boundaries

The boundaries of the state of Colorado shall be as follows: Commencing on the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude, where the twenty-fifth meridian of longitude west from Washington crosses the same; thence north, on said meridian, to the forty-first parallel of north latitude; thence along said parallel, west, to the thirty-second meridian of longitude west from Washington; thence south, on said meridian, to the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude; thence along said thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude to the place of beginning.

Source: Entire article added, effective August 1, 1876, see L. 1877, p. 28.

Editor's note: As a result of a survey that was performed in the 1800's, the actual boundaries of the state of Colorado differ from the legal description of the boundaries in Article I of the state constitution. However, the United States Supreme Court held in New Mexico v. Colorado, 267 U.S. 30, 45 S. Ct. 202, 69 L.Ed. 499 (1925) that the boundary line marked by a surveyor in the 1800's will not be disturbed on the theory that it does not coincide with the 37th parallel of north latitude described as the common boundary under Acts of Congress and the state's constitutions.

Bill of Rights

Editor's note: In Medina v. People, 154 Colo. 4, 387 P.2d 733 (1963), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 848, 85 S. Ct. 88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1964), the Colorado supreme court held that the bill of rights is self-executing; the rights therein recognized or established by the constitution do not depend upon legislative action in order to become operative.

In order to assert our rights, acknowledge our duties, and proclaim the principles upon which our government is founded, we declare:

Section 1. Vestment of political power. All political power is vested in and derived from the people; all government, of right, originates from the people, is founded upon their will only, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole.

ANNOTATION

Law reviews. For article, "Civil Rights in Colorado", see 46 Den. L.J. 181 (1969).

All governmental departments must answer to the people. It is well that all departments give pause, that they may not offend. All must answer to the people, in and from whom, as specifically set forth in this section, all political power is invested and derived. Hudson v. Annear, 101 Colo. 551, 75 P.2d 587 (1938).

People's right to legislate reserved. By § 1 of art. V, Colo. Const., the people have reserved for themselves the right to legislate. McKee v. City of Louisville, 200 Colo. 525, 616 P.2d 969 (1980).

Initiative deemed aspect of people's political power. Under the Colorado constitution, all political power is vested in the people and derives from them, and an aspect of that power is the initiative, which is the power reserved by the people to themselves to propose laws by petition and to enact or reject them at the polls independent of the general assembly. Colo. Project-Common Cause v. Anderson, 178 Colo. 1, 495 P.2d 220 (1972).

Power of initiative is fundamental right. McKee v. City of Louisville, 200 Colo. 525, 616 P.2d 969 (1980).

Courts may not interfere with exercise of right of initiative by declaring unconstitutional or invalid a proposed measure before the process has run its course and the measure is actually adopted. McKee v. City of Louisville, 200 Colo. 525, 616 P.2d 969 (1980).

And governmental officials have no power to prohibit exercise of initiative by prematurely passing upon the substantive merits of an initiated measure. McKee v. City of Louisville, 200 Colo. 525, 616 P.2d 969 (1980).

Right of initiative pertains to any measure, whether constitutional or legislative, and, in the case of municipalities, it encompasses legislation of every character. McKee v. City of Louisville, 200 Colo. 525, 616 P.2d 969 (1980).

But the people have no power to adopt an initiated reapportionment bill. Armstrong v. Mitten, 95 Colo. 425, 37 P.2d 757 (1934).

For court's refusal to construe this section more broadly than similar provisions in U.S. Constitution, see MacGuire v. Houston, 717 P.2d 948 (Colo. 1986).

Section 2. People may alter or abolish form of government - proviso. The people of this state have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves, as a free, sovereign and independent state; and to alter and abolish their constitution and form of government whenever they may deem it necessary to their safety and happiness, provided, such change be not repugnant to the constitution of the United States.

ANNOTATION

Equal protection clause not designed to protect state instrumentalities from people's right under section. The equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment was not designed to protect state instrumentalities such as municipalities and counties against state action, much less against the constitutional right of the people to alter and abolish their constitution and form of government whenever they may deem it necessary to their safety and happiness. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. City & County of Denver, 150 Colo. 198, 372 P.2d 152 (1962), appeal dismissed, 372 U.S. 226, 83 S. Ct. 679, 9 L. Ed. 2d 714 (1963).

Section 3. Inalienable rights. All persons have certain natural, essential and inalienable rights, among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; of acquiring, possessing and protecting property; and of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness.

Constitutionally protected rights in property are subject to regulation by a proper exercise of the police power of the state. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

A vested interest on the ground of conditions once obtained cannot be asserted against the proper exercise of the police power. Colby v. Bd. of Adjustment, 81 Colo. 344, 255 P. 443 (1927).

An individual's right to use the public highways of this state is an adjunct of the constitutional right to acquire, possess, and protect property, yet such a right may be limited by a proper exercise of the police power of the state based upon a reasonable relationship to the public health, safety, and welfare. People v. Brown, 174 Colo. 513, 485 P.2d 500 (1971), appeal dismissed, 404 U.S. 1007, 92 S. Ct. 671, 30 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1972).

An individual's right to use of the public highways of the state is an adjunct of the constitutional right to acquire, possess, and protect property; and, therefore, the general assembly, in the exercise of the police power of the state, may limit this right of a citizen to operate a motor vehicle on the public highways. Cave v. Colo. Dept. of Rev., 31 Colo. App. 185, 501 P.2d 479 (1972).

There is no constitutionally guaranteed illimitable right to drive upon highways as the right to drive may be regulated by the lawful exercise of the police power in the interest of the public health, safety, and welfare. Campbell v. State, 176 Colo. 202, 491 P.2d 1385 (1971).

But such limitations must be necessary for public welfare. One of the essential elements of property is the right to its unrestricted use and enjoyment, and that use cannot be interfered with beyond what is necessary to provide for the welfare and general security of the public. Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

Exercise of police power extends to so dealing with conditions when they arise as to promote the general welfare of the people. Colby v. Bd. of Adjustment, 81 Colo. 344, 255 P. 443 (1927).

And reasonable. There are certain "essential attributes of property" which cannot be unreasonably infringed upon by legislative action. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

The regulation and control of traffic upon the public highways is a matter which has a definite relationship to the public safety, and the general assembly has authority to establish reasonable standards of fitness and competence to drive a motor vehicle which a citizen must possess before he drives a car upon the public highway. People v. Nothaus, 147 Colo. 210, 363 P.2d 180 (1961).

Municipal zoning ordinances are constitutional in principle as a valid exercise of the police power when reasonably related to public health, safety, morals, or general welfare. Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

Limitation may be judicial. It is the solemn responsibility of the judiciary to fashion a remedy for the violation of a right which is truly "inalienable" in the event that no remedy has been provided by legislative enactment. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

Absent legislative action, judicial control may be imposed to protect a citizen from what might develop upon its facts to be an unconstitutional invasion of his right of privacy. Davidson v. Dill, 180 Colo. 123, 503 P.2d 157 (1972).

Term "property" includes right to make full use of property. The term "property", within the meaning of the due process clause, includes the right to make full use of the property which one has the inalienable right to acquire. People v. Nothaus, 147 Colo. 210, 363 P.2d 180 (1961).

Motor vehicle is property and a person cannot be deprived of property without due process of law. People v. Nothaus, 147 Colo. 210, 363 P.2d 180 (1961).

Right to return of fingerprints and photographs upon acquittal. The right of an individual, absent a compelling showing of necessity by the government, to the return of his fingerprints and photographs, upon an acquittal, is a fundamental right implicit in the concept of ordered liberty. Davidson v. Dill, 180 Colo. 123, 503 P.2d 157 (1972).

Right to practice learned profession is "valuable right". Prouty v. Heron, 127 Colo. 168, 255 P.2d 755 (1953).

And cannot be denied without notice and hearing. Where the state confers a license upon an individual to practice a profession, trade, or occupation, such license becomes a valuable personal right which cannot be denied or abridged in any manner except after due notice and a fair and impartial hearing before an unbiased tribunal. Prouty v. Heron, 127 Colo. 168, 255 P.2d 755 (1953).

Pursuit of any legitimate trade or business is protected right. The right to pursue any legitimate trade, occupation, or business is a natural, essential, and inalienable right, and is protected by our constitution. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

But not right to conduct business inimical to public morals. This section does not confer upon the citizen a constitutional right to conduct a business which may be inimical to the public morals, such as the use of pinball machines as gambling devices. Bunzel v. City of Golden, 150 Colo. 276, 372 P.2d 161 (1962).

Ample evidence of defendants' mistreatment and neglect of cattle supported trial court's decision to permanently enjoin defendants from owning, managing, controlling, or otherwise possessing livestock. The permanent injunction was not overly broad in light of the undisputed facts. Nor did the injunction violate defendants' due process rights under the state's constitution and the United States constitution because the injunction served the legitimate public interest of protecting livestock from mistreatment and neglect. Stulp v. Schuman, 2012 COA 144, __ P.3d __.

Commercial door-to-door solicitation. A ban on commercial door-to-door solicitation does not unconstitutionally prohibit legitimate business interests. May v. People, 636 P.2d 672 (Colo. 1981).

Right to use roads and highways. Every citizen has an inalienable right to make use of the public highways of the state; every citizen has full freedom to travel from place to place in the enjoyment of life and liberty. People v. Nothaus, 147 Colo. 210, 363 P.2d 180 (1961).

Every citizen has the right to go freely on the streets at any hour of the day or night, provided he is there for a legitimate purpose, such as any legitimate business or pleasure. Dominguez v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 233, 363 P.2d 661 (1961).

Not unlimited. There is no constitutionally guaranteed illimitable right to drive upon highways. People v. Brown, 174 Colo. 513, 485 P.2d 500 (1971), appeal dismissed, 404 U.S. 1007, 92 S. Ct. 671, 30 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1972) (upholding constitutionality of implied consent law).

Although no revocation of right to drive without notice or opportunity to be heard. When a citizen meets reasonable standards of fitness and competence to drive a motor vehicle, he has a right to continue in the full enjoyment of that right until by due process of law it is established that by reason of abuse or other just cause it is reasonably necessary in the interest of the public safety to deprive him of the right; such action cannot be taken without notice to the party affected and without an opportunity for him to be heard on the question of whether sufficient grounds exist to warrant a revocation of his right to drive a motor vehicle upon the highways of the state. People v. Nothaus, 147 Colo. 210, 363 P.2d 180 (1961).

It is not an invasion of privacy to remind one of his obligations be they legal or moral. Tollefson v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 142 Colo. 442, 351 P.2d 274 (1960).

Unless accompanied by harassment, etc. The right to privacy is not invaded when debtor or debtor's employer is reminded of debtor's obligation, unless accompanied by a campaign of continuous harassment or an attempt to vilify or expose employee to public ridicule or lose his employment. Tollefson v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 142 Colo. 442, 351 P.2d

Right to acquire a home unfettered by discrimination. As an unenumerated inalienable right, a man has the right to acquire one of the necessities of life, a home for himself and those dependent upon him, unfettered by discrimination against him on account of his race, creed, or color. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

Natural parent's rights not violated in stepparent adoption. Requiring only a showing that the natural parent has failed without cause to provide reasonable support for a child for one year or more when termination of a natural parent's rights is sought in a stepparent adoption does not violate the natural parent's constitutional rights. Buder v. Reynolds, 175 Colo. 28, 486 P.2d 432 (1971).

Right to choose family relationship is liberty interest protected by the constitution. In re Hartley, 886 P.2d 665 (Colo. 1994).

Child's liberty interest in family relationships adequately protected through guardian ad litem. In re Hartley, 886 P.2d 665 (Colo. 1994).

Freedom of movement of juvenile not fundamental right. Juvenile's liberty interest in freedom of movement is not a fundamental right and ordinance prohibiting loitering by juveniles does not unconstitutionally infringe upon liberty interest where ordinance was narrowly drawn and state interests justified juvenile curfew. People in Interest of J.M., 768 P.2d 219 (Colo. 1989).

There was no violation of the right guaranteed by this section due to the murder of a woman by her husband in a county justice center. Duong v. Arapahoe County Comm'rs, 837 P.2d 226 (Colo. App. 1992).

Section concerns only rights existing under substantive law. This section and sections 6 and 25 of this article relating to inalienable rights and the guarantee of judicial process for the protection thereof concern only rights existing under the substantive law. Faber v. State, 143 Colo. 240, 353 P.2d 609 (1960), criticized, Evans v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 174 Colo. 97, 482 P.2d 968 (1971).

And not violated by rule of governmental immunity. This section and sections 6 and 25 of this article are not violated by application of the rule that the state and its instrumentalities are not liable in tort actions. Faber v. State, 143 Colo. 240, 353 P.2d 609(1960), criticized, Evans v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 174 Colo. 97, 482 P.2d 968 (1971).

Section 4. Religious freedom. The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination, shall forever hereafter be guaranteed; and no person shall be denied any civil or political right, privilege or capacity, on account of his opinions concerning religion; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be construed to dispense with oaths or affirmations, excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the good order, peace or safety of the state. No person shall be required to attend or support any ministry or place of worship, religious sect or denomination against his consent. Nor shall any preference be given by law to any religious denomination or mode of worship.

Purpose of provision. One of the main evils that the federal and state constitutional religion clauses seek to prevent is the oppression that a sectarian majority may visit upon citizens with unpopular beliefs. Conrad v. City & County of Denver, 656 P.2d 662 (Colo. 1982).

Construction in light of conditions prevailing when section framed. The language in this section must be construed in light of conditions prevailing at the time it was framed and in the practice, usage and understanding of that time. People ex rel. Vollmar v. Stanley, 81 Colo. 276, 255 P. 610 (1927); Americans United for Separation of Church & State Fund, Inc. v. State, 648 P.2d 1072 (Colo. 1982).

With each clause construed separately. Each clause of this section and §§ 7 and 8 of art. IX, Colo. Const. must be construed separately. People ex rel. Vollmar v. Stanley, 81 Colo. 276, 255 P. 610 (1927).

Restriction under this section should not be greater than under federal constitution. Since it is the duty of the state courts to uphold and support the constitution of the United States, as construed by the highest judicial tribunal of the country, the state supreme court should not construe the state constitutional guarantee of religious freedom as permitting a restriction on the free exercise of religion that would be contrary to the federal constitution as so interpreted, unless required by the plain language thereof so to do. Zavilla v. Masse, 112 Colo. 183, 147 P.2d 823 (1944).

Similarity to federal constitution. Although the provisions of this section are considerably more specific than the establishment clause of the first amendment, they embody the same values of free exercise and governmental noninvolvement secured by the religious clauses of the first amendment. Americans United for Separation of Church & State Fund, Inc. v. State, 648 P.2d 1072 (Colo. 1982); Conrad v. City & County of Denver, 656 P.2d 662 (Colo. 1982).

However, determination of the first amendment challenge will not necessarily be dispositive of the state constitutional question. Conrad v. City & County of Denver, 656 P.2d 662 (Colo. 1982).

State must justify infringements on free exercise. When regulating religious conduct the state may be challenged to justify its infringement of the totally free exercise of religion. Pillar of Fire v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 181 Colo. 411, 509 P.2d 1250 (1973).

State burden on free exercise of religion. Should the state burden the free exercise of religion, it must do so in the least restrictive available way to achieve a compelling state interest. The tension between economic considerations and the United States Constitution first amendment rights must be resolved in favor of the latter. Engraff v. Indus. Comm'n, 678 P.2d 564 (Colo. App. 1983).

The application of § 8-73-108 of the Colorado Employment Security Act unduly restricted claimant's free exercise of religion. Engraff v. Indus. Comm'n, 678 P.2d 564 (Colo. App. 1983).

To merit protection of free exercise clause, religious belief must be sincerely held and must be rooted in religious beliefs and not in purely secular philosophical concerns. In re Hoyt, 742 P.2d 963 (Colo. App. 1987).

Trier of fact may determine whether belief is sincerely held as a religious belief without violating the first amendment and trial court properly found that child support obligor's refusal to disclose social security number to potential employers was not sincerely held as a religious belief. In re Hoyt, 742 P.2d 963 (Colo. App. 1987).

Free exercise clause of the first amendment did not provide defense to church counselor in tort action by minor for inappropriate touching during counseling session nor did it prohibit the admission of certain testimony where minister failed to assert a sincere religious belief for his use of therapeutic massage with counselees. Bear Valley Church of Christ v. DeBose, 928 P.2d 1315 (Colo. 1996).

First amendment's free exercise clause is not violated when liability is imposed on church counselor based on sufficient evidence that counselor touched minor counselee inappropriately for personal purposes, as opposed to religious purposes. DeBose v. Bear Valley Church of Christ, 890 P.2d 214 (Colo. App. 1994), rev'd on other grounds, 928 P.2d 1315 (Colo. 1996).

For standing to enforce rights under this provision, see Conrad v. City & County of Denver, 656 P.2d 662 (Colo. 1982).

Plaintiffs in this state benefit from a relatively broad definition of standing, unlike the narrower federal test. To have either taxpayer or general standing in this state, the plaintiff must show that he or she has suffered (1) an injury-in-fact to (2) a legally protected interest. To assess the injury-in-fact, the courts accept a plaintiff's allegations set forth in the complaint as true. The injury may be tangible or intangible. The second prong -- a legally protected interest -- is an exercise in judicial restraint, intended to promote judicial efficiency and economy. Taxpayers may bring a claim that proclamations of a day of prayer issued by governors from 2004 to 2009 violate the preference clause. Freedom from Religion Found., Inc. v. Hickenlooper, 2012 COA 81, __ P.3d __.

Preference clause prohibits any preferential treatment. While a preference may survive a federal establishment clause challenge if justified by, and closely tailored to the furtherance of, a compelling governmental interest, the preference clause in this provision flatly prohibits any preferential treatment cognizable under the Colorado Constitution. Conrad v. City & County of Denver, 656 P.2d 662 (Colo. 1982).

The establishment clause of the federal constitution, as interpreted by the supreme court and applied to the state through the fourteenth amendment, prohibits a government from aiding or preferring all religions, not just from preferring one religion or sect over another. Freedom from Religion Found. v. State, 872 P.2d 1256 (Colo. App. 1993), rev'd on other grounds, 898 P.2d 1013 (Colo. 1995).

Three-pronged test for determining whether government action towards religion is within the permitted boundaries of the establishment clause neutrality: (1) The statute must have a secular legislative purpose; (2) its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion; and (3) the statute must not foster an excessive government entanglement with religion. Young Life v. Division of Emp. & Training, 650 P.2d 515 (Colo. 1982); Freedom from Religion Found. v. State, 872 P.2d 1256 (Colo. App. 1993), rev'd on other grounds, 898 P.2d 1013 (Colo. 1995); Catholic Health Initiatives Colo. v. City of Pueblo, 207 P.3d 812 (Colo. 2009).

The first two parts of the three-pronged test have undergone some clarification as a result of the supreme court's decision in Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 104 S. Ct. 1355, 79 L. Ed. 2d 604 (1984). This involves further analysis of whether a government's actions can be interpreted as endorsement or disapproval of religion, considering two factors: (1) What message did the government intend to convey; and (2) what message do the government's actions actually convey to a reasonable person. Both the intended and actual message must be secular to pass constitutional muster. Freedom from Religion Found. v. State, 872 P.2d 1256 (Colo. App. 1993), rev'd on other grounds, 898 P.2d 1013 (Colo. 1995).

Proclamations of a day of prayer issued by governors from 2004 to 2009 violate the preference clause because the predominant purpose of these proclamations is to advance religion and they thus constitute preferential treatment to religion in general. Looking through the eyes of a reasonable observer, the proclamations have the primary effect of promoting religion because they send the unequivocal message that the governor endorses the religious expressions embodied therein and thus promotes religion over nonreligion. Freedom from Religion Found., Inc. v. Hickenlooper, 2012 COA 81, __ P.3d __.

Tax incentives that inure only to the benefit of religious organizations solely by virtue of their religious nature violate the establishment clause. Catholic Health Initiatives Colo. v. City of Pueblo, 207 P.3d 812 (Colo. 2009).

The first amendment of the federal constitution requires Colorado courts to resolve church property disputes by applying "neutral principles of law", independent of ecclesiastical doctrine, while respecting the free exercise rights of members of a religious association. Wolf v. Rose Hill Cemetery Ass'n, 832 P.2d 1007 (Colo. App. 1991).

Church property is private property which can be taken by eminent domain for paramount public use. Pillar of Fire v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 181 Colo. 411, 509 P.2d 1250 (1973).

Balancing of governmental and church rights. In condemnation proceedings the right of a church to retain its property must be balanced against the governmental authority inherent in urban renewal planning. Pillar of Fire v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 181 Colo. 411, 509 P.2d 1250 (1973); Order of Friars Minor of Province of Most Holy Name v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 186 Colo. 367, 527 P.2d 804 (1974).

And condemnation only if substantial public interest. Only after a hearing and upon finding that there is a substantial public interest involved which cannot be accomplished through any other reasonable means can the court proceed with condemnation of church property. Order of Friars Minor of Province of Most Holy Name v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 186 Colo. 367, 527 P.2d 804 (1974).

Urban renewal is substantial state interest that can justify taking property dedicated to religious uses. Pillar of Fire v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 181 Colo. 411, 509 P.2d 1250 (1973).

Use of public funds to support religion. This provision prohibits the use of public funds for the support or preference of one religion to the exclusion of all others. Conrad v. City & County of Denver, 656 P.2d 662 (Colo. 1982).

City and county officials entitled to qualified immunity in 42 U.S.C. § 1983 suit alleging that their holding of catholic services at a state park and using state funds for papal visit constituted the promotion of religion. Freedom from Religion Found. v. Romer, 921 P.2d 84 (Colo. App. 1996).

Police, sanitation, and related public services to support participants' rights to free speech or the free exercise of religion are legitimate functions of government. Freedom from Religion Found. v. Romer, 921 P.2d 84 (Colo. App. 1996).

Zoning regulations precluding construction of church building in agricultural zone did not deny due process to the church or regulate religious beliefs of the church. Messiah Baptist Church v. County of Jefferson, Colo., 697 F. Supp. 396 (D. Colo. 1987), aff'd, 859 F.2d 820 (10th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 490 U.S. 1005, 109 S. Ct. 1638, 104 L. Ed. 2d 154 (1989).

"Place of worship", as used in this section, means a place set apart for such use. People ex rel. Vollmar v. Stanley, 81 Colo. 276, 255 P. 610 (1927).

School house is not "place of worship". People ex rel. Vollmar v. Stanley, 81 Colo. 276, 255 P. 610

"Preference". That clause in this section reading, "nor shall any preference be given by law to any religious denomination or mode of worship", refers only to legislation for the benefit of a denomination or mode of worship. People ex rel. Vollmar v. Stanley, 81 Colo. 276, 255 P. 610 (1927); overruled to the extent that it is inconsistent with the establishment clause standards set forth in Abington Sch. Dist. v. Schempp (374 U.S. 203, 83 S. Ct. 1560, 10 L. Ed. 2d 844 (1963)), Conrad v. City & County of Denver, 656 P.2d 662 (Colo. 1982).

Nativity scene on city and county building did not violate preference clause of this section where purpose was secular, the primary effect of display was not to advance religion, and there was no evidence of extensive government entanglement with religion. Conrad v. Denver, 724 P.2d 1309 (Colo. 1986).

If an admittedly religious symbol is maintained on public property, such maintenance will be considered an endorsement of the religious theme of the symbol unless it is displayed in association with other, secular symbols or figures from which an overall secular message can be discerned by the reasonable observer. Allegheny County v. Greater Pittsburgh ACLU, 492 U.S. 573, 109 S. Ct. 3086, 106 L. Ed. 2d 472 (1989).

Content and setting of ten commandments monument neutralize its religious character so that it neither endorses nor disapproves of religion. State v. Freedom from Religion Found., 898 P.2d 1013 (Colo. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1111, 116 S. Ct. 909, 133 L. Ed. 2d 841 (1996).

It would be inappropriate to credit religious involvement by the state in every message of historical or solemn significance in which religious precepts may be attributed to words and symbols. State v. Freedom from Religion Found., 898 P.2d 1013 (Colo. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1111, 116 S. Ct. 909, 133 L. Ed. 2d 841 (1996).

Reading of Bible in public schools does not constitute preference to a religious denomination contrary to this section. People ex rel. Vollmar v. Stanley, 81 Colo. 276, 255 P. 610 (1927), overruled to the extent that it is inconsistent with the establishment clause standards set forth in Abington Sch. Dist. v. Schempp, (374 U.S. 203, 83 S. Ct. 1560, 10 L. Ed. 2d 844 (1963)), Conrad v. City & County of Denver, 656 P.2d 662 (Colo. 1982).

Educational grant program not compulsory support for sectarian institution. An educational grant program, available to students at both public and private institutions, does not amount to a form of compulsory support for sectarian institutions. Americans United for Separation of Church & State Fund, Inc. v. State, 648 P.2d 1072 (Colo. 1982).

Public improvements may be required of church. The requirement that a church construct, pay for, and dedicate public improvements, necessitated by its expansion, is not a violation of freedom of religion guaranteed by the constitution. Bethlehem Evangelical Lutheran Church v. City of Lakewood, 626 P.2d 668 (Colo. 1981).

Employment. No person may constitutionally be put in the dilemma of choosing between employment and religion. Pinsker v. Joint Dist. No. 28J, 554 F. Supp. 1049 (D. Colo. 1983).

Decisions by church judicatory and its officials concerning the essential qualifications of clergy, although affecting civil rights, must be accepted as conclusive. Van Osdol v. Vogt, 892 P.2d 402 (Colo. App. 1994), aff'd, 908 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1996).

Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over minister's claim against church for compensation not paid where resolution of the claim would require the court to determine whether the minister adequately performed his ecclesiastical duties. Jones v. Crestview S. Baptist Church, 192 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2008).

First amendment interests in protecting the sanctity of church decisions with regard to one of its ministers prohibits review by secular court in intentional tort action. Van Osdol v. Vogt, 892 P.2d 402 (Colo. App. 1994), aff'd, 908 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1996).

Medical treatment of minor not prohibited. An interpretation of § 19-1-114 to allow conventional medical treatment of a minor does not violate the free exercise of religion clauses of the first amendment of the United States Constitution or of this section. People in Interest of D.L.E., 645 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1982).

The right to practice religion freely does not include the right or liberty to expose the community or a child to ill health or death. People in Interest of D.L.E., 645 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1982).

Valid and neutral law of general applicability which prohibits unlicensed legal representation does not impermissibly impinge upon right to free exercise of religion. People v. LaPorte Church of Christ, 830 P.2d 1150 (Colo. App. 1992).

Application of neutral principles analysis to resolve ownership dispute of local church's property did not preclude court from considering documents that intertwined religious concepts with matters otherwise relevant to dispute as long as court deferred to church's authoritative resolution of any doctrinal issue necessarily involved in interpreting or applying provisions of such documents. Bishop and Diocese of Colo. v. Mote, 716 P.2d 85 (Colo. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 826, 107 S. Ct. 102, 93 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1986).

The first amendment's establishment clause does not prohibit liability of a church counselor and the counselor's church based on conduct occurring during counseling sessions. DeBose v. Bear Valley Church of Christ, 890 P.2d 214 (Colo. App. 1994), rev'd on other grounds, 928 P.2d 1315 (Colo. 1996).

Although civil courts of this country have accepted jurisdiction to resolve, by applying equitable principles, burial and reinterment disputes which have traditionally been resolved by ecclesiastical courts, their authority is limited by the establishment clause of the first amendment. Wolf v. Rose Hill Cemetery Ass'n, 832 P.2d 1007 (Colo. App. 1991).

Consistent with the first and fourteenth amendments, civil courts have properly resolved church property disputes by applying "neutral principles of law", independent of ecclesiastical doctrine, while respecting the free exercise rights of members of a religious association. Accordingly, where trial court's holdings were erroneously based on the resolution of conflicting theological principles inconsistent with the establishment clause, the judgment entered could not stand. Wolf v. Rose Hill Cemetery Ass'n, 832 P.2d 1007 (Colo. App. 1991).

Upon determining trust was not imposed on disputed church property for benefit of national or state church organizations, court must inquire further regarding decision-making procedures concerning use of church property by local church as long as such inquiry does not require resolutions of disputed issues of religious doctrine. Bishop and Diocese of Colo. v. Mote, 716 P.2d 85 (Colo. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 826, 107 S. Ct. 102, 93 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1986).

First amendment to U.S.

Constitution does not grant religious organizations absolute immunity from tort liability. Liability can attach for breach of fiduciary duty, negligent hiring, and supervision. Application of a secular standard to secular conduct that is tortious is not prohibited by the Constitution. If facts do not require interpreting or weighing church doctrine and neutral principles of law can be applied, first amendment is not a defense. Moses v. Diocese of Colo., 863 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1137, 114 S. Ct. 2153, 128 L. Ed. 2d 880 (1994).

For considerations when court is called upon to balance religious beliefs and the best interests of the child in custody disputes, see In re Short, 698 P.2d 1310 (Colo. 1985).

Order of district court expressly allowing noncustodial grandparent to take children to church, contrary to wishes of custodial parent, is unconstitutional. Absent evidence of risk to child's physical or mental health, right of custodial parent to determine child's religious training may not be infringed, even if parent chooses to provide no religious instruction at all. In re Oswald, 847 P.2d 251 (Colo. App. 1993).

Permanent orders restriction on religious upbringing of minor child in dissolution of marriage unconstitutional. Permanent orders in a dissolution of marriage action that adopted the special advocate's recommendation to place a restriction on the mother's right to influence her child's upbringing, absent a finding of substantial harm to the child, violate the mother's constitutional right to free exercise of religion. In re McSoud, 131 P.3d 1208 (Colo. App. 2006).

Absent a clear showing of substantial harm to the child, a parent who does not have decision-making authority with respect to religion nevertheless retains a constitutional right to educate the child in that parent's religion. However, harm to the child will be found if one parent disparages the other parent's religion, thus justifying a limitation on that parent's right to religious education of the child. In re McSoud, 131 P.3d 1208 (Colo. App. 2006).

In the absence of a demonstrated harm to the child, the best interests of the child standard is insufficient to serve as a compelling state interest that overrules the parents' fundamental rights to freedom of religion. In re McSoud, 131 P.3d 1208 (Colo. App. 2006).

"Joint selection of schools" provisions in separation agreement is unenforceable because it forces the court to determine the abstract propriety of sending child to a school of a particular religion, a determination which would be repugnant to the free exercise clauses of both the United States and Colorado constitutions. Griffin v. Griffin, 699 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1985).

Applied in Smith v. People, 51 Colo. 270, 117 P. 612 (1911); City of Delta v. Charlesworth, 64 Colo. 216, 170 P. 965 (1918); People in Interest of D.L.E., 200 Colo. 244, 614 P.2d 873 (1980).

Section 5. Freedom of elections. All elections shall be free and open; and no power, civil or military, shall at any time interfere to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage.

ANNOTATION

This section means that every qualified elector shall have an equal right to cast a ballot for the person of his own selection, and that no act shall be done by any power, civil or military, to prevent it. Such is the mandate and spirit of the constitution, and it thereby vests in the elector a constitutional right of which he cannot lawfully be deprived by any governmental power. Littlejohn v. People, 52 Colo. 217, 121 P. 159 (1912).

Right to vote deemed fundamental right. The right to vote is at the core of our constitutional system and is a fundamental right of every citizen. Jarmel v. Putnam, 179 Colo. 215, 499 P.2d 603 (1972).

Right to vote is a fundamental right of the first order guaranteed by the federal constitution and this section of the Colorado Constitution. Meyer v. Lamm, 846 P.2d 862 (Colo. 1993).

And there must be no discrimination between citizens with respect to that right, even as to a recent arrival, except for a compelling state interest which cannot be reasonably protected in any other way. Jarmel v. Putnam, 179 Colo. 215, 499 P.2d 603 (1972).

A state's regulatory interests will generally justify reasonable, nondiscriminatory restrictions on the rights of voters. Bruce v. City of Colo. Springs, 971 P.2d 679 (Colo. App. 1998).

General assembly may reasonably restrict, but cannot deny, right to vote. While it cannot be questioned that the general assembly has the power to prescribe reasonable restrictions under which the right to vote may be exercised, nevertheless, such restrictions must be in the nature of regulations and cannot extend to the denial of the franchise itself. Littlejohn v. People, 52 Colo. 217, 121 P. 159 (1912).

Nor unnecessarily impede free exercise. The general assembly has no constitutional power to restrain or abridge the right, or unnecessarily to impede its free exercise. Under the pretense of regulation the right of suffrage must be left untrammeled by any provisions or even rules of evidence that may injuriously or necessarily impair it, and so the citizen cannot forfeit the right except by his own neglect or by such peculiar accidents as are not attributable to the law itself. Littlejohn v. People, 52 Colo. 217, 121 P. 159 (1912).

Test for inclusion of legislation within inhibition of section. The test is whether the effect of the legislation is to deny the franchise, or render its exercise so difficult and inconvenient as to amount to a denial. If the elector is deterred from the exercise of his free will by means of any influence whatever, although there be neither violence nor physical coercion, it is not "the free exercise of the right of suffrage", and comes clearly within the inhibition of this section. Littlejohn v. People, 52 Colo. 217, 121 P. 159 (1912).

The Mail Ballot Election Act is constitutional because there is a compelling state interest in encouraging increased voter participation and mail ballot elections serve to meet that interest. Bruce v. City of Colo. Springs, 971 P.2d 679 (Colo. App. 1998).

In determining the constitutionality of ballot access restrictions, the court will balance the injury to the individual as a result of such restrictions against the precise interests of the state in imposing such restrictions. Colo. Libertarian Party v. Sec'y of State, 817 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1991), cert. denied, 503 U.S. 985, 112 S. Ct. 1670, 118 L. Ed. 2d 390 (1992);

Brown v. Davidson, 192 P.3d 415 (Colo. App. 2006).

If a restriction of rights is severe, it may be upheld only if it is narrowly tailored to advance a compelling state interest. If a restriction is reasonable and nondiscriminatory, however, the state's important regulatory interests are generally sufficient to justify the restriction. Brown v. Davidson, 192 P.3d 415 (Colo. App. 2006).

Threats, force, etc. not essential for intimidation of voter. Neither threats, force nor actual bodily hurt or restraint is essential to make out a case of intimidation of the voter. The constitutional provision and the spirit of our institutions demand that the mind of the electors shall be free to exercise the elective franchise as the individual voters may see fit. Neelley v. Farr, 61 Colo. 485, 158 P. 458 (1916).

Intimidation by private or public interests. There can be no free and open election in precincts where the legitimate activity of a political organization is interfered with and its members excluded either by private interests or public agencies, or by the cooperation of both. Neelley v. Farr, 61 Colo. 485, 158 P. 458 (1916).

Municipal charter amendment held prohibited by section. Where a purported amendment of a municipal charter makes no provision for the exercise of the right of a qualified elector to cast a ballot for a person of his own selection guaranteed by the state constitution and in fact strips the electorate of it, its submission constitutes an attempt to exercise a power not conferred by art. XX, Colo. Const., but expressly prohibited by § 1 of art. VII, Colo. Const., and this section. People ex rel. Walker v. Stapleton, 79 Colo. 629, 247 P. 1062 (1926).

But not restraint on county clerk from certifying fraudulent registration lists. The granting of an injunction to restrain a county clerk from certifying fraudulent and fictitious registration lists to the election judges does not violate this section. Aichele v. People ex rel. Lowry, 40 Colo. 482, 90 P. 1122 (1907).

The one-year unaffiliation requirement of § 1-4-801 does not unconstitutionally restrict access to the ballot because it is necessary to preserve the integrity of Colorado's balloting process and it does not unnecessarily or unfairly impinge on a prospective candidate's right of access to the ballot. Colo. Libertarian Party v. Sec'y of State, 817 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1991), cert. denied, 503 U.S. 985, 112 S. Ct. 1670, 118 L. Ed. 2d 390 (1992).

For discussion of standard of review to be applied to restrictions on the freedom of association, see MacGuire v. Houston, 717 P.2d 948 (Colo. 1986).

For court's refusal to construe this section more broadly than similar provisions in U.S. Constitution, see MacGuire v. Houston, 717 P.2d 948 (Colo. 1986).

Applied in People ex rel. Miller v. Tool, 35 Colo. 225, 86 P. 224, (1905); Spelts v. Klausing, 649 P.2d 303 (Colo. 1982); Lujan v. Colo. State Bd. of Educ., 649 P.2d 1005 (Colo. 1982).

Section 6. Equality of justice. Courts of justice shall be open to every person, and a speedy remedy afforded for every injury to person, property or character; and right and justice should be administered without sale, denial or delay.

The constitutional right to access to the courts does not create a substantive right, rather it provides a procedural right to a judicial remedy whenever the general assembly creates a substantive right under Colorado law. Simon v. State Compensation Ins. Auth., 903 P.2d 1139 (Colo. App. 1994), rev'd on other grounds, 946 P.2d 1298 (Colo. 1997); Sealock v. Colo., 218 F.3d 1205 (10th Cir. 2000); Alexander v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 42 P.3d 46 (Colo. App. 2001).

Application of section. This section applies only to injuries which result from a breach of a legal duty or an invasion or infringement upon a legal right. Goldberg v. Musim, 162 Colo. 461, 427 P.2d 698 (1967).

There can be no legal claim for damages to the person or property of anyone except as it follows from the breach of a legal duty. Vogts v. Guerrette, 142 Colo. 527, 351 P.2d 851 (1960); Goldberg v. Musim, 162 Colo. 461, 427 P.2d 698 (1967).

For any act of another which constitutes an injurious invasion of any right of the individual which is recognized by or founded upon any applicable principle of law, statutory or common, the courts shall be open to him and he shall have remedy, by due course of law. Goldberg v. Musim, 162 Colo. 461, 427 P.2d 698 (1967).

The administration of justice cannot be equated with affluence. Williams v. District Court, 160 Colo. 348, 417 P.2d 496 (1966); Almarez v. Carpenter, 173 Colo. 284, 477 P.2d 792 (1970).

The role of advocacy demands that counsel devote his sole attention and energies to asserting his client's cause, leaving to his adversary the corresponding obligation, inherent in the Anglo-American adversary system of jurisprudence, of asserting the cause of the opposition. "Screening" procedures, whereby counsel is appointed to determine whether reversible error occurred at trial, have been subjected to scrutiny by the United States supreme court, and have been found to be incompatible with the constitutional requirement that the criminal defendant asserting his appellate rights be accorded the equal protection of the law despite his financial condition. Cruz v. Patterson, 253 F. Supp. 805 (D. Colo.), aff'd, 363 F.2d 879 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 975, 87 S. Ct. 501, 17 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1966).

But absolute equality between parties cannot be obtained. Neither the courts nor the legislatures can devise rules to bring the parties to an absolute status of equality before the trial starts. Almarez v. Carpenter, 173 Colo. 284, 477 P.2d 792 (1970).

Discriminatory composition of jury denies equal protection. The systematic exclusion from a jury panel of persons with Spanish sounding names, despite the appearance of qualified persons of such descent on the tax rolls of a county, amounts to denial of equal protection of the law and a conviction in such circumstances cannot stand. Montoya v. People, 141 Colo. 9, 345 P.2d 1062 (1959).

Question of whether a party has established a prima facie case of racial discrimination during the jury selection process is a matter of law to which an appellate court should apply a de novo standard of review. Valdez v. People, 966 P.2d 587 (Colo. 1998).

But not discretionary imposition of sentence. The imposition of a criminal sentence in each individual case requires the exercise of judicial judgment, and it includes consideration of mitigating and aggravating circumstances and includes the power to impose an indeterminate sentence, the right to suspend sentence, or the discretion to grant probation in appropriate cases. The exercise of this discretionary power does not deny an accused equal protection of the law. People v. Mieyr, 176 Colo. 90, 489 P.2d 327 (1971); People v. Jenkins, 180 Colo. 35, 501 P.2d 742 (1972).

Challenges for cause in civil actions. Parties to civil and criminal lawsuits are not similarly situated and therefore civil defendant could not maintain an equal protection challenge to jury selection because Colorado criminal procedure statutes permit a challenge for cause based on the fact that a prospective juror was a lawyer while civil procedure statutes do not. Faucett v. Hamill, 815 P.2d 989 (Colo. App. 1991).

Where the Colorado mandatory arbitration act provides for de novo review of the decision by the district court, the right of access to courts is not denied. Firelock Inc. v. District Court, 776 P.2d 1090 (Colo. 1989).

Mandatory, binding arbitration under the "no fault" motor vehicle insurance law does not violate right of access to the judicial process. State Farm v. Broadnax, 827 P.2d 531 (Colo. 1992) (decided under law in effect prior to 1991 amendment to § 10-4-708 (1.5)).

Where the prevailing party is required to improve his position by ten percent to cover the cost of arbitration, the court held that the requirement does not place an unreasonable burden on the right of access to the courts. Firelock Inc. v. District Court, 776 P.2d 1090 (Colo. 1989).

Where clause of an uninsured motorist policy permits either party to demand trial on merits after the completion of arbitration if amount awarded exceeds specified amount, clause violates public policy favoring fair, adequate, and timely resolution of uninsured motorist claims. Huizar v. Allstate Ins. Co., 952 P.2d 342 (Colo. 1998).

Discretion of attorney general as to initiating court action. So long as the attorney general does not unreasonably abuse his discretion, his right to decide between accepting an assurance of discontinuance or initiating a court action will not be overturned on equal protection grounds. People ex rel. Dunbar v. Gym of Am., Inc., 177 Colo. 97, 493 P.2d 660 (1972).

The fact that an accused who possessed and also used a narcotic could be prosecuted for either offense or both does not alone affect the constitutional validity of the statute since a single transaction may violate more than one statutory provision, and perpetrate separate offenses. The decision to proceed under either is traditionally the state's and the fact that a prosecutor has the discretion to prosecute under one or both of two distinct offenses, which arise from a single transaction, does not constitute a denial of equal protection of the laws. People v. McKenzie, 169 Colo. 521, 458 P.2d 232 (1969).

Limitation on power to exclude resident plaintiffs from court system. A provision such as this section limits very stringently the power to exclude resident plaintiffs from our court system where jurisdiction has otherwise been properly established. McDonnell-Douglas Corp. v. Lohn, 192 Colo. 200, 557 P.2d 373 (1976).

Except in the most unusual circumstances, the choice of a Colorado forum by a resident plaintiff will not be disturbed and the factors of inconvenience and expense considered by the trial court do not constitute "unusual circumstances" sufficient to deprive a resident plaintiff of his chosen forum. Casey v. Truss, 720 P.2d 985 (Colo. App. 1986).

Insurance company is entitled to same fair trial as individual. Nat'l Sur. Co. v. Morlan, 91 Colo. 164, 13 P.2d 260 (1932).

Incorporated Indian tribe rendered amenable to state courts. By adopting incorporation under federal law and consenting to sue and be sued in courts of competent jurisdiction within the United States, an Indian tribe rendered itself amenable to the courts of the state of Colorado in any action of which the state courts may take cognizance. It has recourse to the state courts for the protection of its own rights and is answerable in said courts to those who assert claims against it. Martinez v. S. Ute Tribe, 150 Colo. 504, 374 P.2d 691 (1962).

Change of venue. While the power of a Colorado court to dismiss an action on the basis of forum non conveniens is severely limited, a Colorado court is not powerless to grant a motion to change venue to another judicial district within the state merely because the action has been commenced by a Colorado resident in a Colorado court. Rather, motions to change venue are to be resolved within the framework of C.R.C.P. 98. State Dept. of Hwys. v. District Court, 635 P.2d 889 (Colo. 1981).

Wife may sue husband or third person for personal injuries inflicted upon her. In this state a wife is a person independent of the husband, and this section guarantees her a remedy for every personal injury without making any exception as to the person inflicting the injury, who may be her husband or a third person. Rains v. Rains, 97 Colo. 19, 46 P.2d 740 (1935).

There was no violation of the right guaranteed by this section due to the murder of a woman by her husband in a county justice center. Duong v. Arapahoe County Comm'rs, 837 P.2d 226 (Colo. App. 1992).

Mental patient who voluntarily works in state hospital and is not paid for services is not unconstitutionally denied equal protection of the laws. In re Estate of Buzzelle v. Colo. State Hosp., 176 Colo. 554, 491 P.2d 1369 (1971).

Person maliciously prosecuted as insane cannot be deprived of judicial remedy. A person maliciously wronged by others who conspire to prosecute him as an insane person without probable cause cannot be deprived of a judicial remedy for the wrong. Lowen v. Hilton, 142 Colo. 200, 351 P.2d 881 (1960).

The word "injury" implies the doing of some act which constitutes an invasion of a legal right. Goldberg v. Musim, 162 Colo. 461, 427 P.2d 698 (1967).

Benefit of claim cannot be denied because of absence of remedy. When a duty has been breached producing a legal claim for damages, such claimant cannot be denied the benefit of his claim for the absence of a remedy. Vogts v. Guerrette, 142 Colo. 527, 351 P.2d 851 (1960); Goldberg v. Musim, 162 Colo. 461, 427 P.2d 698 (1967).

Section does not undertake to preserve existing duties against legislative change before a breach of such duty occurs. Vogts v. Guerrette, 142 Colo. 527, 351 P.2d 851 (1960).

Nor existing rights. This section does not prevent the general assembly from changing a law which creates a right. O'Quinn v. Walt Disney Prods., Inc., 177 Colo. 190, 493 P.2d 344 (1972); Norsby v. Jensen, 916 P.2d 555 (Colo. App. 1995); Sealock v. Colo., 218 F.3d 1205 (10th Cir. 2000).

This section contains no provision preserving the common-law right of action for injury to person or property. Vogts v. Guerrette, 142 Colo. 527, 351 P.2d 851 (1960).

Nor existing remedies. This section does not preserve preexisting common-law remedies from legislative change. Shoemaker v. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co., 38 Colo. App. 321, 559 P.2d 721 (1976); Norsby v. Jensen, 916 P.2d 555 (Colo. App. 1995); Sealock v. Colo., 218 F.3d 1205 (10th Cir. 2000).

Rather, section provides that if right accrues, courts will be available to effectuate it. This section simply provides that if a right does accrue under the law, the courts will be available to effectuate such right. O'Quinn v. Walt Disney Prods., Inc., 177 Colo. 190, 493 P.2d 344 (1972); Williams v. White Mountain Const. Co., 749 P.2d 423 (Colo. 1988); Norsby v. Jensen, 916 P.2d 555 (Colo. App. 1995).

Section concerns only rights existing under substantive law. This section and sections 3 and 25 of this article, relating to inalienable rights and the guarantee of judicial process for the protection thereof, concern only rights existing under the substantive law. Faber v. State, 143 Colo. 240, 353 P.2d 609 (1960), criticized, Evans v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 174 Colo. 97, 482 P.2d 968 (1971).

Right to access to courts created by this section is a procedural right to a judicial remedy. Access is guaranteed when a person has a substantive right under Colorado law. This section does not create a substantive right to access. In re Hartley, 886 P.2d 665 (Colo. 1994).

This and similar constitutional provisions are mandates to judiciary rather than to legislatures. Goldberg v. Musim, 162 Colo. 461, 427 P.2d 698 (1967).

Free access to courts subject to efficient administration of justice. In a proper case the right of free access to the courts must yield to the rights of others and the efficient administration of justice. People v. Spencer, 185 Colo. 377, 524 P.2d 1084 (1974).

But does not include right to impede normal functioning of judicial processes, nor does it include the right to abuse judicial processes in order to harass others. People v. Spencer, 185 Colo. 377, 524 P.2d 1084 (1974); Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Barday, 197 Colo. 519, 594 P.2d 1057 (1979).

Right of access to courts not to be abused. Every person has an undisputed right of access to the Colorado courts of justice but this right may not be abused. People v. Dunlap, 623 P.2d 408 (Colo. 1981); Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Howard, 640 P.2d 1128 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 456 U.S. 968, 102 S. Ct. 2228, 72 L. Ed. 2d 841 (1982); Protect Our Mountain v. District Court, 677 P.2d 1361 (Colo. 1984).

Denial of access does not violate the right of access to courts under this section if the party's claims are not based on a substantive right or cause of action under Colorado law. Luebke v. Luebke, 143 P.3d 1088 (Colo. App. 2006).

Right of access to courts not abridged by limitation on right of recovery. Where one statute creates liability on part of state for negligence of highway worker who dislodged boulder which rolled down a hill and into a tour bus and injured and killed passengers and another statute limits recovery to a certain dollar amount, claimant has access to courts and this section is not violated. State v. DeFoor, 824 P.2d 783 (Colo. 1992).

Instituting 162 separate legal proceedings, most of which were dismissed for lack of legal merit, was abuse of the judicial system and the court was warranted in enjoining respondents from continuing to appear pro se in any state court. Bd. of County Comm'rs of Morgan County v. Winslow, 862 P.2d 921 (Colo. 1993).

Indigent person may not be enjoined from proceeding pro se because doing so would have the effect of depriving him of the right of access to the courts of this state. Accordingly, person who continually abused the judicial process was permitted to proceed pro se in pending or future litigation, but only if he first obtains the permission of the court in which he intends to file the action. Karr v. Williams, 50 P.3d 910 (Colo. 2002).

This section does not purport to control the scope or substance of remedies afforded to Colorado litigants. State v. DeFoor, 824 P.2d 783 (Colo. 1992).

This constitutional provision does not prohibit the application of the doctrine of forum non conveniens when none of the parties involved are residents of the state and the cause of action arose beyond the borders of the state. PMI Mortg. Ins. v. Deseret Fed. Sav. & L., 757 P.2d 1156 (Colo. App. 1988).

Section 13-16-103 aids in administering justice "without sale". Section 13-16-103, authorizing courts to waive payment of costs by poor persons, aids in administering justice "without sale". Almarez v. Carpenter, 173 Colo. 284, 477 P.2d 792 (1970).

It is duty of prosecutor and trial judge to secure and protect the defendant's right to a speedy trial. People v. Chavez, 779 P.2d 375 (Colo. 1989).

Right to speedy trial attaches with filing of a formal charge. People v. Chavez, 779 P.2d 375 (Colo. 1989).

Burden is upon defendant to establish denial of speedy trial in violation of the statute or rule or that denial of his constitutional right to a speedy trial requires dismissal. Saiz v. District Court, 189 Colo. 555, 542 P.2d 1293 (1975); People v. Chavez, 779 P.2d 375 (Colo. 1989).

Ad hoc balancing test used to determine whether right to speedy trial has been denied. People v. Spencer, 512 P.2d 260 (Colo. 1973); People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo. 1981); People v. Chavez, 779 P.2d 375 (Colo. 1989).

The test includes four factors: The length of the delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion or demand for a speedy trial, and the prejudice to the defendant. People v. Spencer, 512 P.2d 260 (Colo. 1973); People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo. 1981); People v. Chavez, 779 P.2d 375 (Colo. 1989).

When defendant not denied right to speedy trial. Where a defendant is informed against immediately following his arrest, the amount of his bail is fixed, and he is tried, convicted, and sentenced in the same term of the district court, the contention that he was denied his right to a speedy trial is without merit. Day v. People, 152 Colo. 152, 381 P.2d 10, cert. denied, 375 U.S. 864, 84 S. Ct. 134, 11 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1963).

Where the trial court found that defendant insisted on new counsel and the change of counsel caused the delay, the continuance was properly charged to defendant, the speedy trial deadline was properly extended, and defendant's speedy trial rights were not violated. People v. Yascavage, 80 P.3d 899 (Colo. App. 2003), aff'd on other grounds, 101 P.3d 1090 (Colo. 2004).

Effect of delay on court. This section does not divest the trial court of jurisdiction to render a decision or affect the validity of the judgment rendered solely because of a lengthy delay between trial and judgment. Uptime Corp. v. Colo. Research Corp., 161 Colo. 87, 420 P.2d 232 (1966).

Denying an indigent plaintiff access to obtain legislatively provided appellate review could undermine the right of access to judicial processes established in furtherance of this section. Bell v. Simpson, 918 P.2d 1123 (Colo. 1996).

There is no constitutional right under the Colorado constitution to a jury trial in civil actions. Faucett v. Hamill, 815 P.2d 989 (Colo. App. 1991).

The statutory employer provisions of the Workers' Compensation Act do not violate the constitutional right of access to the courts, where at the time of plaintiff's injury, the statutory provision was in existence, and plaintiff accrued no rights to sue. Curtiss v. GSX Corp. of Colo., 774 P.2d 873 (Colo. 1989).

Judicial review need not be a de novo review, and an appellate court may give deference to the findings of an administrative agency and still be in compliance with the constitutional open access guarantees. Sears v. Romer, 928 P.2d 745 (Colo. App. 1996).

Limiting review of workers' compensation case denied by industrial claim appeals office to certiorari is unconstitutional denial of access to the courts. Allison v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 884 P.2d 1113 (Colo. 1994).

Outfitters and Guides Act satisfies the access to the courts requirements by entitling parties to judicial review of the merits of an administrative agency's decision that affects their substantive statutory rights. Sears v. Romer, 928 P.2d 745 (Colo. App. 1996).

As commissioner's order was subject to review, applicants were not denied access to the courts guaranteed by the state constitution. D & B Enters., Inc. v. Comm'r of Ins., 919 P.2d 935 (Colo. App. 1996).

Standard for consideration of motion to dismiss claim for abuse of process based on first amendment right to petition. Trial court should consider whether the petitioning activities on the part of the party being sued for abuse of process were not immunized from liability by the first amendment because: (1) Those activities are devoid of factual support or, if supportable in fact, have no cognizable basis in law; (2) the primary purpose of the petitioning activities is to harass the other party or to effectuate some other improper objective; and (3) those petitioning activities have the capacity to have an adverse effect on a legal interest of the other party. Protect Our Mountain v. District Court, 677 P.2d 1361 (Colo. 1984); Scott v. Hern, 216 F.3d 897 (10th Cir. 2000).

Standard extended to case under C.R.C.P. 106 (a)(2) in Concerned Members v. District Court, 713 P.2d 923 (Colo. 1986); Ware v. McCutchen, 784 P.2d 846 (Colo. App. 1989).

Standard for consideration of motion to dismiss claim of libel based on first amendment right to petition. C.R.C.P. 106 complaint, along with any other related material released to the media, must be shown to have been a defamatory publication made with actual malice, i.e., knowledge that the allegations in the complaint were false or were made with reckless disregard of whether they were false. Concerned Members v. District Court, 713 P.2d 923 (Colo. 1986).

And abuse may be enjoined. Where necessary to stop abuse of the judicial process, the supreme court has the power to enjoin a person from proceeding pro se in any litigation in state courts and administrative agencies. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Howard, 640 P.2d 1128 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 456 U.S. 968, 102 S. Ct. 2228, 72 L. Ed. 2d 841 (1982).

Lack of equal opportunity to recover attorneys' fees does not deny initial access to the courts. Torres v. Portillo, 638 P.2d 274 (Colo. 1981).

Imperfect classifications and the attorneys' fees cap under § 13-17-203 do not violate the equal protection guarantee or equal access to the courts. Buckley Powder Co. v. Colo., 70 P.3d 547 (Colo. App. 2002).

Exemption from an award of costs for governmental entities in C.R.C.P. 54(d) does not violate a fundamental right of access to the courts for non-governmental entities. County of Broomfield v. Farmers Reservoir, 239 P.3d 1270 (Colo. 2010).

Three-year statute of limitations in § 33-44-111 of the Ski Safety Act based on reasonable grounds and therefore does not violate this section. Schafer v. Aspen Skiing Corp., 742 F.2d 580 (10th Cir. 1984).

Two-year limitation in § 13-80-102 does not deny right of access to courts. Rather, it requires vested right to be pursued in a timely manner. Dove v. Delgado, 808 P.2d 1270 (Colo. 1991).

Constitutionality of damage limitations. The provisions of § 13-21-102.5 (3) limiting the amount recoverable for noneconomic damages does not violate equal protection or due process under either the state or federal constitutions or access to the courts under this constitutional provision. Scharrel v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 949 P.2d 89 (Colo. App. 1997).

Dram shop liability statute does not limit access to courts in violation of this section. Sigman v. Seafood Ltd. P'ship I, 817 P.2d 527 (Colo. 1991); Estate of Stevenson v. Hollywood Bar, 832 P.2d 718 (Colo. 1992).

Speeding classification reasonably related to legitimate governmental purpose. Decision to treat higher rates of speeding as more serious making them criminal acts is within legislature's discretion and does not create a suspect class or infringe on a fundamental right. Drawing a distinction based on speed is rationally related to legislative purpose of safety and fuel conservation. People v. Lewis, 745 P.2d 668 (Colo. 1987).

Even though differences between first and second degree assault vary only in degree, the classification does not violate the equal protection clause. People v. Johnson, 923 P.2d 342 (Colo. App. 1996).

Consenting adults, solely by virtue of their adulthood and consent, do not have a protected privacy or associational right to engage in any type of sexual behavior of their choice under any circumstances. Ferguson v. People, 824 P.2d 803 (Colo. 1992).

Section 18-3-405.5 making sexual contact between patient and psychotherapist illegal even if patient consents does not violate this section. Ferguson v. People, 824 P.2d 803

Defendant's argument that he was denied access to the courts because county jail authorities refused to provide postage for his legal correspondence was unfounded where defendant was unable to show he was precluded from presenting any particular argument and where sheriff had agreed to supply postage whenever defendant was unable to purchase his own, defendant had money in his account, and defendant had an outside funding source. Moody v. Corsentino, 843 P.2d 1355 (Colo. 1993).

When an inmate has sufficient funds in his account to pay for filing fees in a civil action and the court denies a filing fee waiver pursuant to § 13-17.5-103, it is not an unconstitutional denial of the inmate's right of access to the courts. Collins v. Jaquez, 15 P.3d 299 (Colo. App. 2000).

Although there may have been some inadequacies in the jail library facilities, the court protected defendant's right to meaningful court access by allowing defendant use of the courthouse library, by providing copies of procedural rules, and by granting him extensions of time to research and prepare arguments. Moody v. Corsentino, 843 P.2d 1355 (Colo. 1993).

Restriction on photocopying privileges of inmate who is otherwise able to write by hand does not violate the right of access to courts. Negron v. Golder, 111 P.3d 538 (Colo. App. 2004).

Father who was restricted from filing a prospective motion to modify parenting time pending completion of sex offender treatment was not denied access to the courts because compliance with the treatment was within father's control. People ex rel. A.R.D., 43 P.3d 632 (Colo. App. 2001).

Evidence held insufficient to show denial of equal protection. Harrison v. City and County of Denver, 175 Colo. 249, 487 P.2d 373 (1971).

Section 7. Security of person and property - searches - seizures - warrants. The people shall be secure in their persons, papers, homes and effects, from unreasonable searches and seizures; and no warrant to search any place or seize any person or things shall issue without describing the place to be searched, or the person or thing to be seized, as near as may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing.

Annotator's note. For further annotations concerning warrantless arrests, see § 16-3-102. For further annotations concerning search and seizure, see part 3 of article 3 of title 16 and Crim. P. 41.

This section is even more restrictive than fourth amendment to the United States Constitution as it provides that probable cause must be supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963); People v. Baird, 172 Colo. 112, 470 P.2d 20 (1970); People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971); People ex rel. Orcutt v. Instantwhip Denver, Inc., 176 Colo. 396, 490 P.2d 940 (1971).

The Colorado proscription against unreasonable searches and seizures protects a greater range of privacy interests than does its federal counterpart. People v. Oates, 698 P.2d 811 (Colo. 1985).

In some instances this section may protect against invasions that the federal constitution would not protect. Derdeyn v. Univ. of Colo., 832 P.2d 1031 (Colo. App. 1991).

With respect to fourth amendment issues, the Colorado and United States Constitutions are co-extensive and Colorado courts will follow federal precedent as well as Colorado precedent. People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997); Eddie's Leaf Spring v. PUC, 218 P.3d 326 (Colo. 2009).

Issue may not be raised for first time on appeal. A contention that this section affords broader protection than does its federal counterpart will not be addressed for the first time on appeal. People v. Oynes, 920 P.2d 880 (Colo. App. 1996).

In the absence of a clear statement by the trial court that a suppression ruling is grounded on the Colorado Constitution, as opposed to the United States Constitution, the presumption is that a trial court relied on federal constitutional law in reaching its decision. Where trial court did not so specify, sole issue on appeal was whether the fourth amendment required suppression of evidence. People v. Olivas, 859 P.2d 211 (Colo. 1993).

Two-step inquiry required when an individual challenges as a search a governmental investigative activity that involves an intrusion into that person's privacy: (1) Was the intrusion a search and (2) if so, was it a reasonable search? People v. Santistevan, 715 P.2d 792 (Colo. 1986); People v. Wieser, 796 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1990).

This section protects individuals in the security of their homes. People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971).

The fourth amendment protects individuals from unreasonable governmental intrusion provided that they have a reasonable expectation of privacy. Casados v. City and County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 U.S. 908, cert. denied, 511 P.2d 1005 (Colo. 1993), 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1994).

The touchstone of fourth amendment analysis is whether a person has a "constitutionally protected reasonable expectation of privacy" in the area or item searched or seized. That determination requires the court to ascertain whether an individual has exhibited a subjective expectation of privacy in the particular place or object in question and whether that subjective expectation is one society recognizes as reasonable. The existence of a legitimate expectation of privacy must be determined after examining all the facts and circumstances in each particular case. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989); People v. Wimer, 799 P.2d 436 (Colo. App. 1990), cert. denied, 809 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1991).

Protection of reasonable expectation of privacy. The constitutional prohibitions against unreasonable searches and seizures protect those who have a reasonable expectation of privacy. People v. Gallegos, 179 Colo. 211, 499 P.2d 315 (1972); People v. Harfmann, 38 Colo. App. 19, 555 P.2d 187 (1976); People v. Lee, 93 P.3d 544 (Colo. App. 2003).

Where the area of a search was a place where the owner had a reasonable expectation of privacy, then it was a constitutionally protected area where warrantless intrusions are forbidden under the federal and state constitutions. People v. Weisenberger, 183 Colo. 353, 516 P.2d 1128 (1973).

Any governmental action intruding upon an activity or area in which one holds a legitimate expectation of privacy is a "search" that calls into play the protections of the Colorado Constitution. People v. Oates, 698 P.2d 811 (Colo. 1985); People v. Wieser, 796 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1990).

The protections of this section are limited by reasonable expectations of privacy; that is, expectations which the law is prepared to recognize as legitimate. People v. Velasquez, 641 P.2d 943 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 459 U.S. 805, 103 S. Ct. 28, 74 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1982), reh'g denied, 459 U.S. 1138, 103 S. Ct. 774, 74 L. Ed. 2d 986 (1983).

Whether an expectation of privacy is "legitimate" is determined by a two-part inquiry: Whether one actually expects that the area or activity subjected to governmental intrusion would remain free of such intrusion, and whether that expectation is one that society is prepared to recognize as reasonable. People v. Oates, 698 P.2d 811 (Colo. 1985); People v. Shorty, 731 P.2d 679 (Colo. 1987); People v. Wimer, 799 P.2d 436 (Colo. App. 1990), cert. denied, 809 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1991); People v. Hillman, 821 P.2d 884 (Colo. App. 1991).

Legitimate expectation of privacy is one that society considers reasonable and whether such legitimate expectation exists is determined after all facts and circumstances of a particular case are examined. People v. Wieser, 796 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1990); People v. Dunkin, 888 P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1994).

Where, as a result of government surveillance practice, amount of privacy and freedom remaining to citizens would be diminished to a compass inconsistent with aims of a free and open society, court may require regulations of the government practice by means of a warrant. People v. Oates, 698 P.2d 811 (Colo. 1985).

Whether an expectation of privacy is legitimate depends on objective factors, not the subjective intent of the individual. People v. Rowe, 837 P.2d 260 (Colo. App. 1992).

Determination of expectation of privacy. Whether an expectation of privacy exists is to be resolved by consideration of the totality of the circumstances with respect to the relationship between the person challenging the search and the area searched. People v. Savage, 630 P.2d 1070 (Colo. 1981).

In determining the measure of constitutional protection under this section, the proper inquiry is not whether an individual defendant subjectively expected his ostensible accomplice in crime to preserve the confidentiality of their encounter and conversation; rather, the proper inquiry is whether the defendant's expectation of confidentiality was constitutionally justified. People v. Velasquez, 641 P.2d 943 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 459 U.S. 805, 103 S. Ct. 28, 74 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1982), reh'g denied, 459 U.S. 1138, 103 S. Ct. 774, 74 L. Ed. 2d 986 (1983).

When reviewing trial court's suppression ruling, appellate court may only properly consider evidence presented at the suppression hearing and not the evidence and testimony subsequently presented at trial. Moody v. People, 159 P.3d 611 (Colo. 2007).

No objective expectation of privacy in statements not spoken in English. Defendant undertook the risk that he would be understood when he exposed his Spanish language conversation to police officer in interrogation room. Defendant had no reasonable expectation of privacy in those statements even though the statements were recorded without his knowledge. People v. Zamora, 220 P.3d 996 (Colo. App. 2009).

Owner of sealed knapsack. Where owner clearly had an expectation of privacy with regard to his sealed knapsack it was sufficient to invoke constitutional protection against unreasonable police intrusion. People v. Counterman, 192 Colo. 152, 556 P.2d 481 (1976).

And tenants in condominium. When tenants in a condominium are entitled to and do believe that their rental has not been exhausted, they possess a sufficient proprietary interest to afford them a reasonable expectation of privacy against a warrantless police intrusion. People v. Bement, 193 Colo. 435, 567 P.2d 382 (1977).

The renter of a hotel or motel room has a legitimate expectation of privacy for the room and its contents during the period of the rental. Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483, 84 S. Ct. 889, 11 L. Ed. 2d 856 (1964); People v. Montoya, 914 P.2d 491 (Colo. App. 1995); People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999).

Defendant had no reasonable expectation of privacy in, and therefore no standing to challenge entry to, a motel room where the entry was pursuant to the motel's established and posted policy pertaining to check-out time at the end of the rental period, there was no established policy of allowing any grace period giving defendant a reasonable expectation that he would be allowed to remain beyond the check-out time, and the rental period had expired because no one had requested permission for an overtime stay and none had been authorized. People v. Montoya, 914 P.2d 491 (Colo. App. 1995).

Defendant has a reasonable expectation of privacy in a tent used for habitation when camping on unimproved and unused land that is not fenced or posted against trespassing. People v. Schafer, 946 P.2d 938 (Colo. 1997).

Pockets of person's clothing are areas to which a justifiable expectation of privacy attaches. People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977).

Car parked in carport behind house. Where defendants had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the car parked under the carport behind the house, the car was a constitutionally protected area where warrantless intrusions are forbidden under the federal and state constitutions. People v. Apodaca, 38 Colo. App. 395, 561 P.2d 351 (1976), aff'd, 194 Colo. 324, 571 P.2d 1109 (1977).

The legitimacy of the defendants' expectation of privacy in their utility records depended on whether defendants exhibited a subjective expectation of privacy in the records and whether that subjective expectation is one society recognizes as reasonable. People v. Dunkin, 888

P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1994).

Relevant factors in determining whether a certain area is protected as curtilage include: (1) The proximity between the area claimed to be curtilage and the home; (2) the nature of the uses to which the area is put; (3) the steps taken to protect the area from observation; and (4) whether the area is included within an enclosure surrounding the house. Hoffmann v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989); People v. Wimer, 799 P.2d 436 (Colo. App. 1990), cert. denied, 809 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1991).

Section does not protect individual where he has no reasonable expectation of privacy. Zamora v. People, 175 Colo. 340, 487 P.2d 1116 (1971).

What person knowingly exposes to public, even in home or office, is not protected by this section. People v. Gallegos, 179 Colo. 211, 499 P.2d 315 (1972); People v. McGahey, 179 Colo. 401, 500 P.2d 977 (1972).

Since defendant's arrest for possession of a marijuana-filled water pipe took place in a public garage where anybody could walk in at any time, he was not entitled to a reasonable expectation of privacy and therefore could be arrested without a valid warrant. Zamora v. People, 175 Colo. 340, 487 P.2d 1116 (1971).

Where defendants fled the scene of the crime leaving a car behind, they manifested an intent to abandon the car and whatever expectation of privacy they may have had regarding it. Kurtz v. People, 177 Colo. 306, 494 P.2d 97 (1972).

Defendant minor had no legitimate expectation of privacy with respect to a purse and its contents in the possession of his companion nor with respect to a tire iron voluntarily abandoned before an investigatory stop. People in Interest of D.E.J., 686 P.2d 794 (Colo. 1984).

Although police had neither probable cause nor warrant to search area underneath carpet serving as doormat in front of basement apartment, defendant had no legitimate expectation of privacy in area beneath carpet. People v. Shorty, 731 P.2d 679 (Colo. 1987).

In conducting criminal investigation, police officer may enter those residential areas that are expressly or impliedly held open to casual visitors. People v. Shorty, 731 P.2d 679 (Colo. 1987).

It was reasonable for police to enter the curtilage of a home at 1:30 a.m. without a warrant and to knock on the sliding glass door of a porch to seek permission to enter to conduct a search of the residence. People v. White, 64 P.3d 864 (Colo. App. 2002).

There is no invasion of privacy in the observation of that which is plainly visible to the public. What a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home or office, is not a subject of fourth amendment protection. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989).

There is no invasion of privacy in the observation of that which is plainly visible to the naked eye from an area which is routinely accessible to the public. People v. Wimer, 799 P.2d 436 (Colo. App. 1990), cert. denied, 809 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1991).

No "search" where officer observes property from navigable airspace above. People v. Henderson, 847 P.2d 239 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 879 P.2d 383 (Colo. 1994).

Business premises are protected by this section but a business, by its special nature and voluntary existence, may open itself to intrusions that would not be permissible in a purely private context. People v. Rowe, 837 P.2d 260 (Colo. App. 1992).

Defendant maintained a reasonable expectation of privacy from government intrusion in the back room of a liquor store, an area without public access, where he was the night manager, regardless of the fact that defendant's activities were being recorded via a surveillance system. People v. Galvadon, 103 P.3d 923 (Colo. 2005).

No expectation of privacy exists in shipping records obtained from a private shipping company which revealed only defendant's name and address, the supply company's name, and the number and weights of packages shipped, but did not reveal the contents of the shipments. People v. Beckstrom, 843 P.2d 34 (Colo. App. 1992).

Expectation of privacy in safe. One has a high expectation of privacy in a safe and its contents. People v. Press, 633 P.2d 489 (Colo. App. 1981).

Expectation of privacy in trunk of another. An expectation of privacy in an apartment shared with another person does not extend to a locked suitcase owned by the other person. People v. Whisler, 724 P.2d 648 (Colo. 1986).

Expectation of privacy in garbage placed adjacent to sidewalk for trash collection. An individual has no expectation of privacy in garbage placed adjacent to sidewalk for trash collection since such garbage is readily accessible to the public. People v. Hillman, 834 P.2d 1271 (Colo. 1992); People v. Laurent, 194 P.3d 1053 (Colo. App. 2008).

Expectation of privacy in a tax return and supporting documentation in the custody of a tax preparer. To overcome a taxpayer's reasonable expectation of privacy, a search warrant must show probable cause to believe that the tax records contain evidence of criminal wrongdoing by that taxpayer or the tax preparer. People v. Gutierrez, 222 P.3d 925 (Colo. 2009).

Partial obstruction of view does not create reasonable expectation of privacy. Where defendant had placed plastic over a portion of a shed containing marijuana plants, but contents were clearly visible from public airspace above, officer's observation of shed from a helicopter not shown to have been flying illegally was not a "search". People v. Henderson, 847 P.2d 239 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 879 P.2d 383 (Colo. 1994).

Expectation of privacy in records held by bank. An individual has an expectation of privacy in records of his financial transactions held by a bank in Colorado. Charnes v. DiGiacomo, 200 Colo. 94, 612 P.2d 1117 (1980); People v. Lamb, 732 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1987).

The government does not have to notify a bank customer of service of a grand jury subpoena of his records. In re East Nat'l Bank, 517 F. Supp. 1061 (D. Colo. 1981).

During the course of a criminal prosecution, the prosecution may compel production of telephone and bank records through the use of a subpoena duces tecum, so long as the defendant has the opportunity to challenge the subpoena for lack of probable cause. Use of a subpoena duces tecum for such records is not an unreasonable search and seizure provided that it is supported by probable cause and is properly defined and executed. People v. Mason, 989 P.2d 757 (Colo. 1999).

University's random, suspicionless, urinalysis drug-testings are unconstitutional searches. Testing of athletes is a significant intrusion and is not reasonable absent significant public safety or national security interests or without voluntary consent. Univ. of Colo. v. Derdeyn, 863 P.2d 929 (Colo. 1993).

To protect a bank customer's expectation of privacy in bank records, the customer must be given notice of judicial or administrative subpoenas prior to their execution. People v. Lamb, 732 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1987).

Availability of a hearing subsequent to the production and disclosure of bank records pursuant to judicial or administrative subpoenas is inadequate to protect a customer's privacy right in the records since once the right has been violated there is no effective way to restore it. People v. Lamb, 732 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1987).

Bank may notify customer of subpoenaed records. A bank may, if it chooses, notify a customer that the customer's bank records have been subpoenaed. If a bank so notifies a customer, no sustainable prosecution for obstructing justice can follow; if a bank does not notify the customer, it risks the chance of a lawsuit in state court for omitting the notice. In re East Nat'l Bank, 517 F. Supp. 1061 (D. Colo. 1981).

Standing to question government's access to bank records. Once a court allows intervention in a § 39-21-112 proceeding, which deals with the filing of annual returns to the department of revenue, it follows that a taxpayer with an expectation of privacy in his bank records has standing to raise the legitimacy of governmental access to the records in a motion to quash a subpoena for the records. Charnes v. DiGiacomo, 200 Colo. 94, 612 P.2d 1117 (1980).

Individual defendant has standing to challenge failure of the commissioner of securities to give defendant notice of the issuance of administrative subpoenas for corporate bank account records during investigation into securities law violations by the commissioner which was directed at both the defendant and the corporation. People v. Lamb, 732 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1987).

For in camera examination of subpoenaed bank records, see Pignatiello v. District Court, 659 P.2d 683 (Colo. 1983).

Telephone numbers dialed on home telephone. A telephone subscriber has a legitimate expectation that information relating to telephone numbers dialed on his home telephone will remain private; and, in the absence of exigent circumstances, law enforcement officers must obtain a search warrant prior to the installation of a pen register. People v. Sporleder, 666 P.2d 135 (Colo. 1983).

The requirement of obtaining a search warrant prior to the installation of a pen register is applied retroactively in People v. Timmons, 690 P.2d 213 (Colo. 1984).

During the course of a criminal prosecution, the prosecution may compel production of telephone and bank records through the use of a subpoena duces tecum, so long as the defendant has the opportunity to challenge the subpoena for lack of probable cause. Use of a subpoena duces tecum for such records is not an unreasonable search and seizure provided that it is supported by probable cause and is properly defined and executed. People v. Mason, 989 P.2d 757 (Colo. 1999).

Electronic beeper. The government's installation of an electronic beeper inside a commercially-purchased sealed drum of chemicals violates the legitimate expectation of privacy of an individual who has a proprietary or possessory interest in the drum, and, in the absence of a warrant, such installation is an illegal search. People v. Oates, 698 P.2d 811 (Colo. 1985).

Bullets fired into front lawn. Where defendant openly, in daylight, and before witnesses, fires bullets into a front lawn, the defendant can assert no reasonable expectation of privacy with respect to the bullets. People v. Morgan, 681 P.2d 970 (Colo. App.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 881, 105 S. Ct. 248, 83 L. Ed. 2d 185 (1984).

Defendant had an interest in his wife's motel room, even during his absence. As a result, the defendant had a proprietary interest in the room and had standing to object to a search of such room. People v. Fox, 862 P.2d 1000 (Colo. App. 1993).

Expectation of privacy in toll records. A telephone subscriber has a legitimate expectation that toll records that reflect individually billed calls will remain private, and law enforcement officers generally must obtain a search warrant prior to the searches of toll records. People v. Corr, 682 P.2d 20 (Colo.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 855, 105 S. Ct. 181, 83 L. Ed. 2d 115 (1984).

Utility records are not protected from disclosure by this section since society does not view the expectation of privacy in utility records as a reasonable one and, unlike telephone and bank records, utility records can be obtained by other members of the public. People v. Dunkin, 888 P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1994).

Expectation of privacy in records of stockbroker's account. An individual has an expectation of privacy in the records of his stockbroker's account that is protected by the Colorado Constitution. People v. Fleming, 804 P.2d 231 (Colo. App. 1990).

Expectation of privacy in garbage placed on the curb. An individual has an expectation of privacy which society would regard as reasonable in trash left for collection at the curbside. People v. Hillman, 821 P.2d 884 (Colo. App. 1991).

Ultraviolet light examination of hands. A person has a reasonable expectation that police officers will not subject his hands to an ultraviolet lamp examination to discover incriminating evidence not otherwise observable. People v. Santistevan, 715 P.2d 792 (Colo. 1986).

A trespass is not the equivalent of a search. The presence or absence of a physical trespass by police has little or no relevance to the question of whether society would recognize an asserted privacy interest as reasonable. People v. Wimer, 799 P.2d 436 (Colo. App. 1990), cert. denied, 809 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1991).

Prisoners have little, if any, reasonable expectation of privacy while incarcerated. People v. Salaz, 953 P.2d 1275 (Colo. 1998); People v. Lee, 93 P.3d 544 (Colo. App. 2003).

A pretrial detainee's right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures is not violated when the detainee's outgoing correspondence is seized and copied by correctional officials pursuant to an established practice that is reasonable and is no more intrusive than necessary to protect a legitimate governmental interest in institutional security. People v. Whalin, 885 P.2d 293 (Colo. App. 1994).

Section is intended as restraint upon activities of sovereign authority. People v. Benson, 176 Colo. 421, 490 P.2d 1287 (1971).

This section gives protection against unlawful searches and seizures by governmental agencies. People v. Benson, 176 Colo. 421, 490 P.2d 1287 (1971).

The guarantees against unreasonable searches and seizures have been applied to both administrative and criminal searches. Condon v. People, 176 Colo. 212, 489 P.2d 1297 (1971).

The exclusionary rule applies to forfeiture actions. People v. Lot 23, 707 P.2d 1001 (Colo. App. 1985), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 735 P.2d 184 (Colo. 1987).

And section not intended to be limitation upon other than governmental agencies, for the purpose of this section is to secure the citizen in the right to unmolested occupation of his dwelling and the possession of his property, subject to the right of seizure by process duly issued. People v. Benson, 176 Colo. 421, 490 P.2d 1287 (1971).

Constitutional prohibitions on searches and seizures do not in general require exclusion of evidence seized by private parties. People v. Benson, 176 Colo. 421, 490 P.2d 1287 (1971); People v. Henderson, 38 Colo. App. 308, 559 P.2d 1108 (1976).

Test where search or seizure by private person. The test as to whether a "search" or "seizure" which falls within the scope of constitutional protection has occurred is whether the private person who is doing the searching, in light of all the circumstances of the case, must be regarded as having acted as an "instrument" or agent of the state. People v. Henderson, 38 Colo. App. 308, 559 P.2d 1108 (1976).

Officers' presence in vicinity does not necessarily constitute participation in the search and seizure by the private person. People v. Henderson, 38 Colo. App. 308, 559 P.2d 1108 (1976).

The fact that the person conducting a search might have intended to assist law enforcement does not transform him or her into a law enforcement agent so long as he or she had a legitimate independent motivation for engaging in the challenged conduct. The mere presence of officers, absent some form of participation in the search, did not establish an agency relationship. People v. Holmberg, 992 P.2d 705 (Colo. App. 1999).

Whether an individual conducting a search or seizure is an agent of the government is determined by the totality of the circumstances. In order to establish agency, one must show that the government encouraged, initiated, and instigated a search or seizure or that the person conducting the search acted only to assist law enforcement efforts. People v. Pilkington, 156 P.3d 477 (Colo. 2007).

A private actor's independent motive to investigate creates a strong presumption that he or she is not an agent of the government, and therefore the fourth amendment does not apply to the search. People v. Pilkington, 156 P.3d 477 (Colo. 2007).

Where hotel employee not acting as agent of police. Where police do not suggest or instigate an inspection by a hotel employee, nor accompany her when she enters a room, her actions are her own idea and not those of the state for she is not acting as an agent or an alter ego of the police. People v. Benson, 176 Colo. 421, 490 P.2d 1287 (1971).

Standard for determining whether search warrant complies with constitutional requirements is one of practical accuracy rather than technical nicety. People v. Ragulsky, 184 Colo. 86, 518 P.2d 286 (1974).

One asserting right to privacy must establish he was victim of invasion. Concomitant with the assertion of the right to privacy is the requirement that the one who asserts the right must establish that he was the victim of an invasion of his privacy. Kurtz v. People, 177 Colo. 306, 494 P.2d 97 (1972).

Before a defendant is entitled to an order of suppression, he first must establish that the challenged search violated a privacy interest which the fourth amendment is designed to protect. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981); People v. Settles, 685 P.2d 183 (Colo. 1984).

Prosecutor bears no burden at suppression hearing to prove that defendant was the victim of the claimed illegal police conduct because, when a defendant files a motion to suppress claiming his or her fourth amendment rights were violated, this initial allegation suffices to establish that he or she was the victim or aggrieved party of the alleged invasion of privacy. People v. Jorlantin, 196 P.3d 258 (Colo. 2008).

Person suspected of being insane has rights under section. Every person, including those suspected of being insane, has certain fundamental constitutional rights. Not the least of these is the one mentioned in this section. Barber v. People, 127 Colo. 90, 254 P.2d 431 (1953).

Standing to question legality of seizure. Where defendants were legitimately on the premises and the evidence seized is proposed to be used against them, they have standing to question the legality of the seizure, and thus, the legitimacy of the presence of the police in the house. People v. Godinas, 176 Colo. 391, 490 P.2d 945 (1971).

A person may challenge the constitutional validity of a search only if he has a legitimate expectation of privacy in the invaded place. People v. Savage, 630 P.2d 1070 (Colo. 1981).

Property law concepts are not necessarily determinative of standing to challenge police activity under the Fourth Amendment as the inquiry extends beyond ownership or possession of the property seized to considerations of whether the defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the area searched. People v. Holder, 632 P.2d 607 (Colo. App. 1981).

Passenger or hitchhiker has no property or possessory interest in an automobile and no legitimate expectation of privacy, but a passenger who has permission of the owner to use the car does have a legitimate expectation of privacy. People v. Naranjo, 686 P.2d 1343 (Colo. 1984).

No standing. Where the defendant was found unconscious inside an automobile which upon a search was found to contain the deceased's body and it was not an instance where the basis for defendant's prosecution was possession of the vehicle, the defendant did not have automatic standing to challenge the vehicle's search and seizure. People v. Trusty, 183 Colo. 291, 516 P.2d 423 (1973).

Nor standing to object to admission of evidence. A person who is only aggrieved by the admission of evidence illegally seized from a third person lacks standing to object. People v. Knapp, 180 Colo. 280, 505 P.2d 7 (1973).

One not legitimately on premises has no standing to move to suppress the fruits of a search and seizure of those premises. People v. Trusty, 183 Colo. 291, 516 P.2d 423 (1973).

Fourth amendment rights are personal and the suppression of the products of an unconstitutional search can be urged only by one whose rights were violated, not by those who are aggrieved solely by the admission of the damaging evidence, even if they be codefendants. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

Questions of standing and reasonableness of search merge into one: Whether the government officials violated any legitimate expectation of privacy held by the defendant. People v. Spies, 200 Colo. 434, 615 P.2d 710 (1980).

In order for a defendant to have standing to challenge the constitutionality of a governmental search, he or she must demonstrate a legitimate expectation of privacy in the areas searched or the items seized. Defendant bears the burden to establish standing, and the issue must be resolved in view of the totality of the circumstances. People v. Montoya, 914 P.2d 491 (Colo. App. 1995); People v. Flockhart, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2009).

Appellate courts may address issues of standing sua sponte, regardless of whether the prosecution may be deemed to have waived its right to address the question. Appellate court, however, may not do so when the factual record was undeveloped and could not be supplemented with reliable testimony on remand given the passage of time. Moody v. People, 159 P.3d 611 (Colo. 2007).

Lawfulness of warrantless arrest determined by state law. The lawfulness of an arrest without a warrant by state officers for a state offense must be determined by state law. People v. Navran, 174 Colo. 222, 483 P.2d 228 (1971).

Lawfulness of search and seizure determined by trial judge. There is no constitutional requirement that the question of the lawfulness of the search and seizure be submitted to a jury. It remains a question of law which must be determined by the trial judge and, in this state, by the trial judge only. Jones v. People, 167 Colo. 153, 445 P.2d 889 (1968).

As courts to guard personal security. Courts still retain their traditional responsibility to guard against police conduct which trenches upon personal security without the objective evidentiary justification which the constitution requires. People v. Nelson, 172 Colo. 456, 474 P.2d 158 (1970).

Mere possibility of prejudice is insufficient to warrant reaching merits of constitutionality of an inventory search. People v. Thomas, 189 Colo. 490, 542 P.2d 387 (1975).

And acquittal moots question. Where defendant challenged the constitutionality of the inventory search of his car and the use of evidence obtained as a result of the search at his trial, the issue of constitutionality of the search was moot because the fruits of the search were used primarily to prove that the defendant was guilty of burglary on which charges he was acquitted. People v. Thomas, 189 Colo. 490, 542 P.2d 387 (1975).

Unlawful conduct of arresting officers does not destroy court's criminal jurisdiction. Unlawful conduct of arresting officers, or other persons holding public office, may have certain effects upon admissibility of evidence, but it does not destroy jurisdiction of the court to try a criminal charge lodged against a person brought before it. DeBaca v. Trujillo, 167 Colo. 311, 447 P.2d 533 (1968).

And illegal arrest of one charged with crime is no bar to his prosecution if all other elements necessary to give a court jurisdiction to try accused are present, a conviction in such a case being unaffected by such unlawful arrest. DeBaca v. Trujillo, 167 Colo. 311, 447 P.2d 533 (1968).

Preliminary examination not prerequisite to prosecution by information. There is no constitutional requirement making a preliminary examination a prerequisite to a prosecution by information. Holt v. People, 23 Colo. 1, 45 P. 374 (1896).

Nor is sworn complaint jurisdictional prerequisite to prosecution. There is no constitutional requirement that a sworn complaint is a jurisdictional prerequisite to prosecution of a misdemeanor charge. Stubert v. County Court, 163 Colo. 535, 433 P.2d 97 (1967).

And nothing requires that "summons and complaint" be verified where the summons and complaint is simply the method by which criminal proceedings are instituted against a person already validly arrested, and a warrant for arrest does not issue. Stubert v. County Court, 163 Colo. 535, 433 P.2d 97 (1967).

Insofar as the fourth amendment to the constitution of the United States is concerned, a criminal information need not be verified. Stubert v. County Court, 163 Colo. 535, 433 P.2d 97 (1967).

Unless it is to serve as basis for issuance of arrest warrant. Stubert v. County Court, 163 Colo. 535, 433 P.2d 97 (1967).

The oath or affirmation required by this section is an essential prerequisite to an arrest, whether a preliminary examination is to be had or the warrant is to issue on an information. Holt v. People, 23 Colo. 1, 45 P. 374 (1896).

Affidavit is made essential in case preliminary examination has not been had, in order to comply with the requirements of this section. Noble v. People, 23 Colo. 9, 45 P. 376 (1896).

Technical requirements and elaborate specificity are not required in drafting of affidavits for search warrants. People v. Padilla, 182 Colo. 101, 511 P.2d 480 (1973).

Although warrant issues only on charge under oath in writing. To justify a warrant there must be a charge under oath, reduced to writing. Lustig v. People, 18 Colo. 217, 32 P. 275 (1893).

For other cases dealing with affidavits in the filing of informations, see Ausmus v. People, 47 Colo. 167, 107 P. 204 (1910); Curl v. People, 53 Colo. 578, 127 P. 951 (1912); Solt v. People, 130 Colo. 1, 272 P.2d 638 (1954).

Section has no application to ordinary cases of production of documents under a subpoena duces tecum. Eykelboom v. People, 71 Colo. 318, 206 P. 388 (1922).

Contemporaneous objection rule applies to search and seizure issues, and the failure to raise the objection of an illegal search and seizure by proper objection at the trial level is tantamount to a waiver. Brown v. People, 162 Colo. 406, 426 P.2d 764 (1967).

Absent egregious police misconduct, exclusionary rule is inapplicable to probation revocation proceedings. People v. Ressin, 620 P.2d 717 (Colo. 1980).

Application of exclusionary rule in a dependency and neglect case requires the court to balance the deterrent benefits of applying the rule against the societal cost of excluding relevant evidence. People ex rel. A.E.L., 181 P.3d 1186 (Colo. App. 2008).

Here, applying the rule would have a high societal cost in terms of protecting child welfare interests. Therefore, the court did not err in denying mother's motion to suppress evidence. People ex rel. A.E.L., 181 P.3d 1186 (Colo. App. 2008).

Oral statement prima facie inadmissible where reason for detention was an attempt to obtain an inculpatory statement from defendant. People v. Stark, 682 P.2d 1240 (Colo. App. 1984).

Later statement admissible if obtained by a means sufficiently distinct from the illegality. Relevant factors are: Intervening Miranda warnings and valid waiver; temporal proximity of illegal arrest and statement; intervening circumstances; and purpose and flagrancy of any official misconduct. People v. Stark, 682 P.2d 1240 (Colo. App. 1984).

Applied in Ratcliff v. People, 22 Colo. 75, 43 P. 553 (1896); Laffey v. People, 55 Colo. 575, 136 P. 1031 (1913); Potter v. Armstrong, 110 Colo. 198, 132 P.2d 788 (1942); Lucas v. District Court, 140 Colo. 510, 345 P.2d 1064 (1959); Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963); Wilson v. People, 156 Colo. 243, 398 P.2d 35 (1965); Garcia v. People, 160 Colo. 220, 416 P.2d 373 (1966); People v. Aguilar, 173 Colo. 260, 477 P.2d 462 (1970); People v. Leahy, 173 Colo. 339, 484 P.2d 778 (1970); People v. Muniz, 198 Colo. 194, 597 P.2d 580 (1979).

II. PROBABLE CAUSE.

A. In General.

Constitutionality of an arrest is measured by probable cause. People v. Magoon, 645 P.2d 286 (Colo. 1982).

The constitutional requirement that arrests be based upon probable cause serves two purposes: To protect citizens from rash and unreasonable interferences with privacy and to give fair leeway for enforcing the law in the community's protection. People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989); People v. Higbee, 802 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1990).

It is only upon showing of probable cause that legal doors are opened to allow the police to gain official entry into an individual's domain of privacy for the purpose of conducting a search or for making an official seizure under the constitution. People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971).

To support issuance of arrest warrant, complaint must comply with probable cause requirements of this section, the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution, and Crim. P. 3 and 4 (a). Scott v. People, 166 Colo. 432, 444 P.2d 388 (1968); People v. Nelson, 172 Colo. 456, 474 P.2d 158 (1970); People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971); People v. Moreno, 176 Colo. 488, 491 P.2d 575 (1971).

No search warrant may issue without showing of probable cause affirmed in writing. Under both this section and the fourth amendment of the United States Constitution, no search warrants may issue without a showing of probable cause, which, under the Colorado Constitution, must be affirmed in writing before a search warrant may issue. Flesher v. People, 174 Colo. 355, 484 P.2d 113 (1971).

Warrant issued without showing of probable cause violates constitutional standards. A search warrant which is routinely issued at the request of the accusing officer, without the slightest showing of probable cause, is issued in violation of long-established fundamental constitutional standards, and any evidence seized under its authority should be excluded from evidence in the trial court unless there is other legal basis for its admission. Brown v. Patterson, 275 F. Supp. 629 (D. Colo. 1967), aff'd, 393 F.2d 733 (10th Cir. 1968).

Substance of all definitions of probable cause is a reasonable ground for belief of guilt. People v. Feltch, 174 Colo. 383, 483 P.2d 1335 (1971).

Courts have uniformly required an objective standard for determining probable cause. People v. Davis, 903 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1995).

The probable cause standard is a practical, nontechnical conception and is measured by reasonableness, not mathematical probability. People v. Rayford, 725 P.2d 1142 (Colo. 1986).

Because the standard of probable cause is substantially less than the quantum of evidence needed to support a conviction, only reasonable grounds, not a mathematical probability, to believe that the defendant participated in the crime in question must be demonstrated. Banks v. People, 696 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1985); People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

As the term suggests, probable cause deals with probabilities, not certainties. People v. Washington, 865 P.2d 145 (Colo. 1994).

"Probable cause" not measured by certainty. It is not necessary that facts establishing probable cause for arrest rise to a level of certainty. People v. Hearty, 644 P.2d 302 (Colo. 1982); People v. Wirtz, 661 P.2d 300 (Colo. App. 1982); People v. Villiard, 679 P.2d 593 (Colo. 1984).

Probable cause for a search, as with probable cause to arrest, depends upon probabilities, not certainties, and involves a level of knowledge grounded in the practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent persons act. People v. Rayford, 725 P.2d 1142 (Colo. 1986); People v. Lubben, 739 P.2d 833 (Colo. 1987).

Suspicion alone does not amount to probable cause. People v. Quintero, 657 P.2d 948 (Colo.), cert. granted, 463 U.S. 1206, 104 S. Ct. 62, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1386, cert. dismissed, 464 U.S. 1014, 104 S. Ct. 543, 78 L. Ed. 2d 719 (1983).

Probable cause exists when an affidavit for a search warrant alleges sufficient facts to warrant a person of reasonable caution to believe that contraband or evidence of criminal activity is located at the place to be searched. Bartley v. People, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991); People v. Delgado, 832 P.2d 971 (Colo. App. 1991); People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994); Henderson v. People, 879 P.2d 383 (Colo. 1994); People v. Fortune, 930 P.2d 1341 (Colo. 1997); People v. Pacheco, 175 P.3d 91 (Colo. 2006).

During a controlled drug transaction, probable cause exists to search the location to which the seller went before selling the drugs to the police. People v. Eirish, 165 P.3d 848 (Colo. App. 2007).

Probable cause for issuance of a subpoena duces tecum for obtaining telephone and bank records exists if there is a reasonable likelihood that the evidence sought exists and that it would link the defendant to the crime charged. People v. Mason, 989 P.2d 757 (Colo. 1999).

The Colorado Constitution presumes that an arrest for a criminal violation when predicated upon probable cause is permissible for any crime, not just a serious crime. People v. Triantos, 55 P.3d 131 (Colo. 2002).

Probable cause to arrest exists when, under the totality of the circumstances at the time of arrest, objective facts and circumstances available to a person of reasonable caution justify the belief that a crime has been or is being committed by the person who has been or is being arrested. People v. King, 16 P.3d 807 (Colo. 2001); People v. Brown, 217 P.3d 1252 (Colo. 2009).

Probable cause for an arrest does not exist if the police have no information that a crime has, in fact, been committed. People v. Quintero, 657 P.2d 948 (Colo. 1983); People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994); People v. King, 16 P.3d 807 (Colo. 2001).

Probable cause for a warrantless arrest does not require specific information that a particular crime has been committed. People v. McCoy, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

To support issuance of search warrant probable cause and oath or affirmation particularly describing the place and the objects to be seized are required. People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994); Henderson v. People, 879 P.2d 383 (Colo. 1994).

A search may be reasonable despite the absence of individualized probable cause in limited circumstances if the privacy interests involved are minimal and if the compelling governmental interest would be placed in jeopardy by a requirement of individualized probable cause. Derdeyn v. Univ. of Colo., 832 P.2d 1031 (Colo. App. 1991).

A university's interest in securing a drug-free athletic program does not constitute a compelling state interest. There are no public safety or law enforcement interests that are served by such sports program and the urine testing program at issue is unconstitutional. Derdeyn v. Univ. of Colo., 832 P.2d 1031 (Colo. App. 1991).

Existence of outstanding arrest warrant provides prima facie showing of probable cause, although the person arrested may challenge the validity of the arrest warrant at a post-arrest probable cause hearing. People v. Gouker, 665 P.2d 113 (Colo. 1983).

An outstanding arrest warrant from another jurisdiction may provide the probable cause needed to make an arrest. People v. Gouker, 665 P.2d 113 (Colo. 1983).

Outstanding arrest warrant from another jurisdiction constituted probable cause for defendant's arrest even though warrant contain "no extradition" provision. People v. Thompson, 793 P.2d 1173 (Colo. 1990).

Same constitutional probable cause standards for search or arrest. The same constitutional standards for determining probable cause apply whether a search or an arrest is being effected by police officers, and these standards are applicable whether or not the officers have obtained a judicially authorized warrant to arrest or search. People v. Vaughns, 182 Colo. 328, 513 P.2d 196 (1973).

The same constitutional standards for determining probable cause apply whether a search or an arrest is being made by the police. People v. Burns, 200 Colo. 387, 615 P.2d 686 (1980).

And standards applicable whether or not warrant obtained. Probable cause standards for searches or arrests are applicable whether or not the police have obtained a warrant. People v. Burns, 200 Colo. 387, 615 P.2d 686 (1980).

Probable cause must be present for each warrant or place to be searched. While more than one search warrant may be issued on the basis of a single affidavit, the affidavit must support a finding of probable cause as to each separate warrant or each separate place to be searched. People v. Arnold, 181 Colo. 432, 509 P.2d 1248 (1973).

Probable cause permits officers to obtain a warrant to search premises and to seize property. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989); People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79 (Colo. App. 1992).

Probable cause must exist in order for warrantless arrest to be valid. People v. Thompson, 793 P.2d 1173 (Colo. 1990).

The showing of probable cause necessary to secure a warrant may vary with the object and intrusiveness of the search, but the necessity for a warrant persists. People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79 (Colo. App. 1992).

Probable cause required for warrantless searches in exigent circumstances. In order for a warrantless search to be excused under exigent circumstances, probable cause must exist at the moment the arrest or the search is made. People v. Thompson, 185 Colo. 208, 523 P.2d 128 (1974).

Although the constitutional warrant requirement may be excused under exigent circumstances, the probable cause requirements are at least as strict in warrantless searches as in those pursuant to a warrant. People v. Thompson, 185 Colo. 208, 523 P.2d 128 (1974); People v. Gonzales, 186 Colo. 48, 525 P.2d 1139 (1974).

Violation of traffic ordinance does not establish probable cause for warrantless search for evidence of an unrelated criminal offense. People v. Goessl, 186 Colo. 208, 526 P.2d 664 (1974).

Not all drug arrests give rise to exigent circumstances thereby permitting warrantless, "security" searches. People v. Barndt, 199 Colo. 51, 604 P.2d 1173 (1980).

State must prove probable cause for warrantless arrest or search. The burden of proving probable cause in justification of a warrantless arrest and search is upon the state. People v. Nanes, 174 Colo. 294, 483 P.2d 958 (1971); People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

The burden is upon the state at the suppression hearing to establish that probable cause existed which would justify the warrantless search of the defendant's person. People v. Ware, 174 Colo. 419, 484 P.2d 103 (1971).

The burden of proving the existence of probable cause for an arrest without a warrant is on the prosecution. People v. Feltch, 174 Colo. 383, 483 P.2d 1335 (1971); Stork v. People, 175 Colo. 324, 488 P.2d 76 (1971); People v. Vaughns, 175 Colo. 369, 489 P.2d 591 (1971); DeLaCruz v. People, 177 Colo. 46, 492 P.2d 627 (1972); Mora v. People, 178 Colo. 279, 496 P.2d 1045 (1972); People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982); People v. Roybal, 655 P.2d 410 (Colo. 1982); People v. Foster, 788 P.2d 825 (Colo. 1990); People v. Diaz, 793 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1990); People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992).

Probable cause for valid arrest is a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious man to believe that an offense has been or is being committed by the person arrested. Scott v. People, 166 Colo. 432, 444 P.2d 388 (1968); People v. Nelson, 172 Colo. 456, 474 P.2d 158 (1970).

Probable cause exists where the facts and circumstances within the officers' knowledge, and of which they had reasonable trustworthy information, are sufficient in themselves to warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief that an offense has been or is being committed. People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971); People v. Weinert, 174 Colo. 71, 482 P.2d 103 (1971); People v. Nanes, 174 Colo. 294, 483 P.2d 958 (1971); People v. Feltch, 174 Colo. 383, 483 P.2d 1335 (1971); Finley v. People, 176 Colo. 1, 488 P.2d 883 (1971); People v. Thompson, 185 Colo. 208, 523 P.2d 128 (1974); People v. Chavez, 632 P.2d 574 (Colo. 1981); People v. Bustam, 641 P.2d 968 (Colo. 1982); People v. Rueda, 649 P.2d 1106 (Colo. 1982); People v. Quintero, 657 P.2d 948 (Colo.), cert. granted, 463 U.S. 1206, 104 S. Ct. 62, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1386, cert. dismissed, 464 U.S. 1014, 104 S. Ct. 543, 78 L. Ed. 2d 719 (1983); People v. Nygren, 696 P.2d 270 (Colo. 1985); People v. Diaz, 793 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1990); People v. McCoy, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

A court must determine whether the facts available to a reasonably cautious officer at the moment of arrest would warrant his belief that an offense has been or is being committed. People v. Navran, 174 Colo. 222, 483 P.2d 228 (1971); People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982); People v. Villiard, 679 P.2d 593 (Colo. 1984); People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989); People v. Drake, 735 P.2d 1257 (Colo. 1990).

The fact that a jury later acquitted defendant of crime does not require a conclusion that the police lacked probable cause to arrest defendant on that charge. People v. Couillard, 131 P.3d 1146 (Colo. App. 2005).

The information relied upon to justify a warrantless arrest and search must be more than rumor or suspicion; however, it need not be of that quality and quantity necessary to satisfy beyond a reasonable doubt. It is sufficient if it warrants a reasonably cautious and prudent police officer in believing, in light of his training and experience, that an offense has been committed and that the person arrested probably committed it. People v. Nanes, 174 Colo. 294, 483 P.2d 958 (1971).

Probable cause for an arrest without a warrant exists where the facts available to a reasonably cautious officer at the moment of the arrest warrant his belief that an offense had been or is being committed. People v. Vincent, 628 P.2d 107 (Colo. 1981); People v. Quintana, 701 P.2d 1264 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Tufts, 717

P.2d 485 (Colo. 1986); People v. Foster, 788 P.2d 825 (Colo. 1990).

In the case of multiple suspects, for each of whom there are reasonable grounds to believe they participated in a particular criminal offense, probable cause to search means no more than a showing of reasonable grounds to believe incriminating evidence is present on the premises to be searched. People v. Hearty, 644 P.2d 302 (Colo. 1982).

The probable cause threshold for a warrantless arrest is met when there are facts and circumstances sufficient to cause a person of reasonable caution to believe that at the time of the arrest an offense has been or is being committed by the person to be arrested. People v. Rayford, 725 P.2d 1142 (Colo. 1986); People v. Thompson, 793 P.2d 1173 (Colo. 1990).

Probable cause to arrest exists when, under the totality of the circumstances, the objective facts and circumstances warrant the belief by a reasonable and prudent person, in light of that person's training and experience, that an offense has been committed and that the defendant committed it. People v. McCoy, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994); People v. McKay, 10 P.3d 704 (Colo. App. 2000).

Based on the totality of the facts and circumstances, officer reasonably concluded defendant was the driver of the car. The facts were the license plate on the car matched the report of the vehicle that caused the accident, defendant's breath smelled of alcohol, and the driver's seat was pulled too far forward for a six-foot tall person to be driving the car as defendant claimed. The circumstances were that defendant was the only one linked to the car when the officer arrived on the scene and the other person at the scene had not seen anyone else around the car except for the defendant. Those facts and circumstances are more than enough to establish probable cause for the arrest, so the evidence seized as a result of the arrest is admissible at trial. People v. Castaneda, 249 P.3d 1119 (Colo. 2011).

The absence of the arresting officer's testimony at a suppression hearing does not necessarily preclude a finding that the officer had probable cause to arrest. People v. Holmberg, 992 P.2d 705 (Colo. App. 1999).

While it is not necessary that the arresting officer possess knowledge of facts sufficient to establish guilt, more than mere suspicion is required to provide probable cause for arrest. Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 83 S. Ct. 407, 9 L. Ed. 2d 441 (1963); People v. Saars, 196 Colo. 294, 584 P.2d 622 (1978); People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

While an officer's "training and experience" may be considered in determining probable cause, such training and experience cannot substitute for an evidentiary nexus, prior to the search, between the place to be searched and any criminal activity. People v. Eirish, 165 P.3d 848 (Colo. App. 2007).

The determination of when facts cross the line from reasonable suspicion to probable cause is difficult. That line necessarily must be drawn by an act of judgment formed in the light of the particular situation and with account taken of all the circumstances. People v. McCoy, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

Whenever detention by police officer is more than brief, there is an arrest which must be supported by probable cause. People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982).

Where purpose and character of investigatory stop exceeds what is reasonable in light of the circumstances, there is an arrest which requires probable cause. People v. Stark, 682 P.2d 1240 (Colo. App.

Investigatory stop may be effected with guns drawn if it is reasonable under the circumstances. People v. Cooper, 731 P.2d 781 (Colo. App. 1986).

Where police officers wanted to question a parole violator in connection with a sexual assault involving use of a shotgun and handgun, officers could effectuate an investigatory stop with their weapons drawn to determine if one of the two men detained was the violator. People v. Cooper, 731 P.2d 781 (Colo. App. 1986).

Mere association with guilty persons does not amount to probable cause to arrest. People v. Henderson, 175 Colo. 400, 487 P.2d 1108 (1971).

Physical presence in an automobile, in and of itself, does not provide probable cause to arrest, for guilt by association has never been an acceptable rationale and it does not constitute probable cause to arrest. Mora v. People, 178 Colo. 279, 496 P.2d 1045 (1972).

Mere arrival of person at residence where shipment of marijuana is to be delivered is insufficient to provide probable cause to believe that the person has committed a crime or that a search of his car will reveal the presence of narcotic drugs. People v. Henderson, 175 Colo. 400, 487 P.2d 1108 (1971).

Mere presence of passenger in truck transporting motorcycle which officer believed to be stolen did not constitute probable cause for passenger to be arrested for stealing motorcycle. People v. Foster, 788 P.2d 825 (Colo. 1990).

Mere fact that individual may have been at the same convenience store on the previous day selling drugs is not sufficient evidence to establish probable cause for loitering. People v. Davis, 903 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1995).

Relationship with person alleged to have participated in forgery is not sufficient to establish probable cause to arrest. People v. Stark, 682 P.2d 1240 (Colo. App. 1984).

Defendant's arrest was not supported by probable cause and was unlawful since information that an individual is attempting to sell jewelry at a price substantially below market value can give rise to a reasonable suspicion that a crime has been committed but does not, without other information from which it may reasonably be inferred that the jewelry is illegally in the seller's possession, constitute probable cause for arrest. People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

Investigation and surveillance may be carried out without probable cause. So long as investigation and surveillance activity does not constitute an invasion of privacy constituting an infringement upon constitutional rights, then no probable cause requirement need be met to initiate and carry out the investigation and surveillance activities. People v. Snelling, 174 Colo. 397, 484 P.2d 784 (1971); People v. McGahey, 179 Colo. 401, 500 P.2d 977 (1972).

A police officer may in appropriate circumstances and in an appropriate manner approach a person for purposes of investigating possibly criminal behavior even though there is no probable cause to make an arrest. People v. Martineau, 185 Colo. 194, 523 P.2d 126 (1974).

"Fellow officer" rule provides that an arresting officer who does not personally possess sufficient information to constitute probable cause may nevertheless make a warrantless arrest if (1) he acts upon the direction or as a result of a communication from a fellow officer, and (2) the police, as a whole, possess sufficient information to constitute probable cause. People v. Thompson, 793 P.2d 1173 (Colo. 1990); People v. Washington, 865 P.2d 145 (Colo. 1994); People v. Fears, 962 P.2d 272 (Colo. App. 1997).

Trial court correctly found the information contained in the affidavit, when analyzed under the totality of the circumstances test, established probable cause to search the premises. The corroborating circumstances of the same license plate and presence of persons accompanying the defendant in the car at the time of the arrest and a high volume of short term visitors at the trailer shortly before defendant's arrest for selling cocaine to an undercover officer, established a reasonable probability that contraband or evidence of a crime would be found at the trailer. People v. Delgado, 832 P.2d 971 (Colo. App. 1991).

The totality of the circumstances supported a finding of probable cause for the search warrant. There was sufficient corroboration of the information in the affidavit to overcome the fact the affiant was a first-time informant. People v. Warner, 251 P.3d 567 (Colo. App. 2010).

The fact that the police failed to corroborate evidence directly related to illegal conduct is not necessarily fatal to a finding of probable cause. The verification of the noncriminal facts provided by the informant, considered together with the indicia of reliability and self-verifying details of the informant's information, allows the probable cause determination to be upheld. People v. Turcotte-Schaeffer, 843 P.2d 658 (Colo. 1993).

Following an illegal stop or attempted stop, probable cause for arrest existed when the defendant responded with new, distinct crimes by driving away at speeds up to 45 miles per hour in a residential neighborhood, twice swerving the car towards the police officer's car to hit it, and rolling out of the car while it was moving, leaving the car to crash into and damage a garage. Defendant's responses were new crimes that broke the chain of causation and dissipated any taint from the first arguably unlawful attempted stop. People v. Smith, 870 P.2d 617 (Colo. App. 1994).

Police officers had articulable and reasonable basis for suspecting criminal activity and initiating a valid investigatory detention, and had a reasonable basis for expanding the scope of the detention for the limited purpose of determining whether the defendant was reaching for a weapon. Facts presented to police that defendant paid for four one-way airline tickets to "source city" for illicit drugs with currency in small denominations and hesitated in providing surnames of passengers were consistent with a drug courier profile. Such profile was confirmed by the police upon observing the defendant and his companions arrive at the airport with only carry-on baggage. Upon the officers' request for identification the defendant's conduct caused the police to be concerned that the defendant was reaching for a weapon. In addition, the officers believed defendant was the subject of an outstanding warrant. People v. Perez, 852 P.2d 1297 (Colo. App. 1992).

Reasonable basis to stop suspect. A law enforcement officer is legally justified to approach a vehicle that is in violation of state statute, irrespective of the officer's subjective intent for contacting the vehicle. People v. Cherry, 119 P.3d 1081 (Colo. 2005).

Probable cause for warrantless arrest of defendant existed when officer shined flashlight into parked vehicle and observed defendant holding cash and a small plastic bag containing a white powdery substance. People v. Dickinson, 928

P.2d 1309 (Colo. 1996).

Trial court properly denied defendant's motion to suppress. On the facts, police had probable cause to associate the key in defendant's pocket with criminal activity. Detective testified that he asked defendant for permission to search defendant's person and defendant consented. Police retrieved items, including a key from defendant, and at that time knew that the stolen truck was a Ford, and that the truck had license plates on it that did not belong to it, and that the defendant had given them a false identity. Furthermore officer testified that he had owned Ford vehicles in the past and recognized the key as a Ford truck key. People v. Manier, 197 P.3d 254 (Colo. App. 2008).

B. Judicial Review.

Test for probable cause to issue warrant. Probable cause is an elusive term and is incapable of any precise definition, which would permit a mechanical application under all circumstances once certain factors are presented. The United States supreme court in attempting to define this area with certainty and to provide guidelines for proper investigation has provided a two-prong test. First, the affidavit upon which the warrant is based must set forth the underlying circumstances necessary to enable an independent judicial determination to be made, and, second, the information upon which the conclusion is based must come from a reliable or credible source. Flesher v. People, 174 Colo. 355, 484 P.2d 113 (1971).

An affidavit based on information provided in large part by an unidentified informant must, in order to establish probable cause for issuance of a search warrant: (1) allege facts from which the issuing magistrate could independently determine whether there were reasonable grounds to believe that illegal activity was being carried on in the place to be searched; and (2) set forth sufficient facts to allow the magistrate to determine independently if the informer is credible or the information reliable. People v. Harris, 182 Colo. 75, 510 P.2d 1374 (1973); People v. Baird, 182 Colo. 284, 512 P.2d 629 (1973); People v. Masson, 185 Colo. 65, 521 P.2d 1246 (1974); People v. Arnold, 186 Colo. 372, 527 P.2d 806 (1974); People v. McGill, 187 Colo. 65, 528 P.2d 386 (1974).

No technical measurement of probable cause. In dealing with probable cause, one deals with probabilities. These are not technical; they are the factual and practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act. Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969); People v. Baird, 172 Colo. 112, 470 P.2d 20 (1970); People v. Wilson, 173 Colo. 536, 482 P.2d 355 (1971); People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971); People v. Weinert, 174 Colo. 71, 482 P.2d 103 (1971); People v. Feltch, 174 Colo. 383, 483 P.2d 1335 (1971); Finley v. People, 176 Colo. 1, 488 P.2d 883 (1971); People v. Conwell, 649 P.2d 1099 (Colo. 1982); People v. Rueda, 649 P.2d 1106 (Colo. 1982); People v. Thompson, 793 P.2d 1173 (Colo. 1990).

A magistrate may draw reasonable inferences and may utilize his common sense in making a determination of probable cause. People v. Williams, 200 Colo. 187, 613 P.2d 879 (1980).

Task of magistrate is to make practical, common-sense decision as to whether, given all circumstances stated in affidavit, there is fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place. People v. Pannebaker, 714 P.2d 904 (Colo. 1986); People v. Atley, 727 P.2d 376 (Colo. 1986); People v. Lubben, 739 P.2d 833 (Colo. 1987).

When a magistrate has found probable cause, the courts should not invalidate the warrant by interpreting the affidavit in a hypertechnical rather than a common sense manner. People v. Maes, 176 Colo. 430, 491 P.2d 59 (1971).

In interpreting an affidavit for a search warrant and the execution of the warrant, a common sense interpretation must be applied. People v. Del Alamo, 624 P.2d 1304 (Colo. 1981).

Where an officer believes he has probable cause to search and states his reasons, the Colorado supreme court will not examine such reasons grudgingly, but will measure them by standards appropriate for a reasonable, cautious, and prudent police officer trained in the type of investigation which he is making. People v. Singleton, 174 Colo. 138, 482 P.2d 978 (1971).

Probable cause is to be measured by a common-sense, nontechnical standard of reasonable cause to believe with due consideration given to police officer's experience and training in determining the significance of his observations. People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989); People v. McCoy, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

"Probable cause supported by oath or affirmation" is oath or affirmation of parties who depose to facts upon which the prosecution is founded. Lustig v. People, 18 Colo. 217, 32 P. 275 (1893).

Eyewitness not essential. It is not essential that the probable cause contemplated by this section be shown by the oath of an eyewitness. Holt v. People, 23 Colo. 1, 45 P. 374 (1896).

Two-pronged test for determining whether information received from informer is sufficient to establish probable cause. First, the police must know of some of the underlying circumstances which establish a basis for the informant's conclusion that a crime has been or is being perpetrated by an accused. Second, there must be some basis for believing that the information supplied by the informant was credible or the informant was reliable. People v. Glaubman, 175 Colo. 41, 485 P.2d 711 (1971); DeLaCruz v. People, 177 Colo. 46, 492 P.2d 627 (1972); People v. Stoppel, 637 P.2d 384 (Colo. 1981); People v. Dailey, 639 P.2d 1068 (Colo. 1982).

Totality of circumstances test. Since the two-pronged test has been abandoned by the United States supreme court in Illinois v. Gates (462 U.S. 213, 103 S. Ct. 2317, 76 L. Ed. 2d 527 (1983)) in favor of the totality of the circumstances test, such test was used by the court to make the probable cause determination. People v. Gallegos, 680 P.2d 1294 (Colo. App. 1983); People v. Sullivan, 680 P.2d 851 (Colo. App. 1983).

A trial court must consider the totality of the circumstances in the evidentiary record in determining whether an investigatory detention violates the fourth amendment. Failure to do so is error. People v. D.F., 933 P.2d 9 (Colo. 1997); People v. Saint-Veltri, 945 P.2d 1339 (Colo. 1997).

Corroboration of an anonymous tip with facts learned by an investigating officer making an investigatory stop, while possibly not satisfying the two-pronged test, is sufficient to establish probable cause under the totality of circumstances test. People v. Contreras, 780 P.2d 552 (Colo. 1989).

Totality of circumstances test places particular value on corroboration of details of informant's tip by independent police work. People v. Diaz, 793 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1990).

The totality of the facts considered can constitute probable cause even though no one fact, if viewed alone, would be sufficient.

People v. Eichelberger, 620 P.2d 1067 (Colo. 1980); People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

An anonymous tip need not include a highly detailed description of the suspect or alleged criminal activity because a court will consider other factors when determining the reliability of such information. People v. Pate, 878 P.2d 685 (Colo. 1994).

The totality of the circumstances test does not lower the standard for probable cause determinations; it simply gives reviewing courts more flexibility to determine the overall reliability of information from a confidential informant. People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994).

Test applied in People v. Smith, 685 P.2d 786 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Peltz, 697 P.2d 766 (Colo. App. 1984), aff'd, 728 P.2d 1271 (Colo. 1986); People v. Salazar, 715 P.2d 1265 (Colo. App. 1985), cert. denied, 744 P.2d 80 (Colo. 1987); People v. Lubben, 739 P.2d 833 (Colo. 1987); People v. Grady, 755 P.2d 1211 (Colo. 1988); People v. Varrieur, 771 P.2d 895 (Colo. 1989); People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989); People v. Abeyta, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990); People v. Turcotte-Schaeffer, 843 P.2d 658 (Colo. 1993); People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994); People v. Pate, 878 P.2d 685 (Colo. 1994); People v. Davis, 903 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1995); People v. Meraz, 961 P.2d 481 (Colo. 1998); People v. Crippen, 223 P.3d 114 (Colo. 2010).

The appropriate question for the reviewing court considering a search authorized by warrant is whether the issuing magistrate had a substantial basis for issuing the search warrant, as distinguished from simply whether the reviewing court would have found probable cause in the first instance. People v. Crippen, 223 P.3d 114 (Colo. 2010).

Probable cause determination must include consideration of the totality of the circumstances. The totality of the circumstances includes the content of the information asserted in the affidavit and an assessment of the reliability of the information, including both the credibility of any sources and the way those sources acquired that information and their basis of knowledge. A deficiency in one element in the assessment of the reliability of the information may be compensated for by a strong showing in the other, or even by some other indicia of the information's reliability altogether. People v. Crippen, 223 P.3d 114 (Colo. 2010).

Magistrate had a substantial basis for issuing warrant even though affidavit did not include the identity of the person or agency conducting the audit that referenced the documents sought by the warrant or provide any corroboration of the information contained in the audit. Under the unique circumstances of the case, the reliability of the information could be assessed by the totality of the circumstances, including the nature and detail of the information provided and the fact that the information was obviously obtained through first-hand observation of the documents, in the normal course of business, for purposes other than a criminal investigation. People v. Crippen, 223 P.3d 114 (Colo. 2010).

Role of police officer in search warrant practice is limited solely to providing the judge with facts and trustworthy information upon which he, as a neutral and detached judicial officer, may make a proper determination. People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971).

Determination of probable cause is judicial function. The determination of whether probable cause exists is a judicial function to be performed by the issuing magistrate, and is not a matter to be left to the discretion of a police officer. Before the issuing magistrate can properly perform his official function he must be apprised of the underlying facts and circumstances which show that there is probable cause to believe that proper grounds for issuance of the warrant exist. Brown v. Patterson, 275 F. Supp. 629 (D. Colo. 1967), aff'd, 393 F.2d 733 (10th Cir. 1968); People v. Moreno, 176 Colo. 488, 491 P.2d 575 (1971); People v. Goggin, 177 Colo. 19, 492 P.2d 618 (1972).

The determination of whether probable cause exists is a judicial function to be performed by the issuing magistrate, which in Colorado may be any judge of the supreme, district, county, superior or justice of the peace court under Crim. P. 41 and is not a matter to be left to the discretion of a police officer. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963); People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971).

Thus, issuing magistrate must be apprised of underlying facts. Before the issuing magistrate can properly perform his official function he must be apprised of the underlying facts and circumstances which show that there is probable cause to believe that proper grounds for the issuance of the warrant exist. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963); People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971).

In order to support the issuance of a search warrant the issuing magistrate must be apprised of sufficient underlying facts and circumstances, reduced to writing, under oath, from which he may reasonably conclude that probable cause exists for the issuance of the warrant. People v. Padilla, 182 Colo. 101, 511 P.2d 480 (1973); People v. Clavey, 187 Colo. 305, 530 P.2d 491 (1975); People v. Bauer, 191 Colo. 331, 552 P.2d 512 (1976).

And may not rely on affiant's unexplained belief or assumption. An issuing magistrate may not rely on an affiant's unexplained belief that an urgency exists or on any assumption of immediacy. People v. Bauer, 191 Colo. 331, 552 P.2d 512 (1976).

Mere affirmance of the belief or suspicion on the officer's part is not enough. To hold otherwise would attach controlling significance to the officer's belief rather than to the magistrate's judicial determination. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963); People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971).

Nor complainant's mere conclusion. In determining whether or not probable cause exists, a judge should not accept without question the complainant's mere conclusion that the person whose arrest is sought has committed a crime. People v. Moreno, 176 Colo. 488, 491 P.2d 575 (1971).

Affidavits containing only the conclusion of the police officer that he believed that certain property was on the premises or person and that such property was designed or intended or was or had been used as a means of committing a criminal offense or the possession of which was illegal, without setting forth facts and circumstances from which the judicial officer could determine whether probable cause existed, are fatally defective. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963).

Nor mere suspicion. An arrest with or without a warrant must stand on firmer ground than mere suspicion. People v. Weinert, 174 Colo. 71, 482 P.2d 103 (1971).

An arrest with or without a warrant must stand on firmer ground than mere suspicion, though the arresting officer need not have in hand evidence which would suffice to convict. People v. Gonzales, 186 Colo.

Vague suspicion does not rise to the dignity of probable cause. People v. Nelson, 172 Colo. 456, 474 P.2d 158 (1970); People v. Thompson, 185 Colo. 208, 523 P.2d 128 (1974); People v. Goessl, 186 Colo. 208, 526 P.2d 664 (1974); People v. Dauphinee, 192 Colo. 16, 554 P.2d 1103 (1976).

Mere conclusory belief or suspicion by an affiant officer is not enough upon which to base the issuance of a search warrant. People v. Clavey, 187 Colo. 305, 530 P.2d 491 (1975).

While it is not necessary that the arresting officer possess knowledge of facts sufficient to establish guilt, more than mere suspicion is required to provide probable cause for arrest. People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994); People v. Davis, 903 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1995).

The duty of a reviewing court under Illinois v. Gates (462 U.S. 213, 103 S. Ct. 2317, 76 L. Ed. 2d 527 (1983)) is simply to ensure that the issuing judge had a substantial basis for concluding that there was probable cause to believe that contraband or other incriminating evidence will be found at the premises to be searched. People v. Arellano, 791 P.2d 1138 (Colo. 1990); People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994).

Magistrate's probable cause determination is given great deference and is not reviewed de novo. In reviewing determination of probable cause, court must be satisfied that the magistrate had a substantial basis for ruling that probable cause existed. Henderson v. People, 879 P.2d 383 (Colo. 1994).

Doubts must be resolved in favor of a magistrate's determination of probable cause in order to avoid creating a climate in which police resort to warrantless searches rather than obtaining a warrant before conducting a search. People v. Fortune, 930 P.2d 1341 (Colo. 1997).

Suppression order reversed when redacted affidavit demonstrates the existence of probable cause. The court found that there were sufficient facts remaining in the affidavit, after redaction of suppressed evidence, to warrant a person of reasonable caution to believe that contraband or evidence of criminal activity was located at the address to be searched. People v. Hebert, 46 P.3d 473 (Colo. 2002).

Affidavit based on information supplied by unnamed informant is sufficient to support issuance of a search warrant. Bean v. People, 164 Colo. 593, 436 P.2d 678 (1968).

But such affidavit must be corroborated. An affidavit based on information supplied by an unnamed informant must be corroborated by other matters within the officer's knowledge. The "other matters" may include other sources of information and the fact that the defendant was known by police to be a user of narcotics. An affidavit so corroborated is not the mere affirmance of the belief or suspicion on the officer's part, nor is it a bare statement that officers had "reliable information from a credible person". Bean v. People, 164 Colo. 593, 436 P.2d 678 (1968).

Images of child pornography do not need to be attached to the affidavit in support of probable cause, nor does the affidavit need to include a description of the images. An affidavit from an investigating officer with extensive experience related to internet child pornography crimes that states the investigator believed the images involved sexually explicit material was sufficient, although an affidavit with a description of the images would be preferable. People v. Rabes, 258 P.3d 937 (Colo. App. 2010).

When, following a veracity hearing, the probability of an error in an affidavit for a search warrant has been found, the election of remedies or sanctions is left to the discretion of the district court. People v. Nunez, 658 P.2d 879 (Colo. 1983).

Under some circumstances, an anonymous informant's tip alone will not satisfy the probable cause requirement; however, a tip from an anonymous informant that has additional indicia of reliability or that is corroborated may provide a substantial basis for a determination of probable cause. Henderson v. People, 879 P.2d 383 (Colo. 1994).

Uncorroborated accusation by unidentified informant does not provide probable cause. People v. Feltch, 174 Colo. 383, 483 P.2d 1335 (1971).

Under totality of circumstances, probable cause for issuance of search warrant existed where affidavit relied on four independent anonymous informant's tips that described in detail petitioner's activities and property located at petitioner's residence and where affidavit further relied on police information obtained from airborne observations. Henderson v. People, 879 P.2d 383 (Colo. 1994).

Probable cause may be based in whole or in part upon hearsay. People v. Snelling, 174 Colo. 397, 484 P.2d 784 (1971).

The constitutional requirement of probable cause may be established by hearsay information. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

If the material in the affidavit is stated to be or appears to be hearsay information obtained from an informant or other person, and the information turns out to be incorrect, the supreme court will not use hindsight as a test to determine whether the search warrant should or should not have been issued. The law is clear that a search warrant may be based on hearsay, as long as a substantial basis for crediting the hearsay exists. People v. Woods, 175 Colo. 34, 485 P.2d 491 (1971).

The reasonably trustworthy information relied on by officers may be based upon hearsay and need not be evidence sufficiently competent for admission at the guilt-finding process. People v. Nanes, 174 Colo. 294, 483 P.2d 958 (1971).

But such hearsay must be determined to be reliable. People v. Snelling, 174 Colo. 397, 484 P.2d 784 (1971).

An affidavit which relies upon hearsay information from an undisclosed informant rather than upon the affiant's personal observations must contain sufficient information to permit the judge who issues the warrant to make an independent determination that the informant was credible or that his information was reliable. People v. Press, 633 P.2d 489 (Colo. App. 1981).

In order to establish that a police officer has probable cause to arrest, based on information received from an informer, there must be evidence that the officer was apprised of some of the underlying circumstances from which the informant concluded that a crime had been or was being committed, and there must be some basis from which the officer could conclude that the informer was reliable or his information credible. Stork v. People, 175 Colo. 324, 488 P.2d 76 (1971).

Probable cause for defendant's arrest cannot be predicated on an informant's tip when the information received by the police officers does not concern defendant and would not indicate that defendant is involved in any criminal activity. Mora v. People, 178 Colo. 279, 496 P.2d 1045 (1972).

Defendant may not rely upon an affidavit at a suppression hearing without attempting to call the affiant. The affidavit is hearsay evidence and thus may not properly be admitted at a suppression hearing. The affidavit is sufficient to determine whether a hearing is necessary, but not to actually determine the matter itself. People v. Warner, 251 P.3d 567 (Colo. App. 2010).

Important fact is means of testing reliability of information given, and unless the affidavit provides such information, then no warrant should issue. Flesher v. People, 174 Colo. 355, 484 P.2d 113 (1971).

And affidavit must contain sufficient information to determine informant's credibility. If the officer seeking the warrant is relying upon a tip by another person, then the information contained in the affidavit upon which the informant based his conclusion must be of sufficient detail as to permit the making of an independent determination by the court of the credibility of the informant and his information. Flesher v. People, 174 Colo. 355, 484 P.2d 113 (1971).

Where probable cause is predicated on information from an undisclosed informant, the affidavit must allege sufficient facts from which the issuing judge may determine independently: (1) The adequacy of the informant's basis for his allegations that evidence of crime will be found at the place to be searched, and (2) the credibility of the informant or the reliability of his information. People v. Conwell, 649 P.2d 1099 (Colo. 1982).

Inability of detective to establish an anonymous informant's reliability and veracity does not end the inquiry concerning an affidavit establishing probable cause because a deficiency regarding reliability and veracity can be overcome by a strong showing as to the informant's basis of knowledge or some other indicia of reliability. People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994).

Determination of reliability of informant's information. There are at least three ways in which an affidavit might allow a magistrate to determine the reliability of an informant's information so as to issue a search warrant: (1) By stating that the informant had previously given reliable information; (2) by presenting the information in detail which clearly manifests its reliability; and (3) by presenting facts which corroborate the informant's information. People v. Masson, 185 Colo. 65, 521 P.2d 1246 (1974).

The credibility of the informant or the reliability of his information may be supported by details supplied by the informant, set forth in the affidavit, indicating that the only way the informant could have obtained the information was through a reliable method. A second method of satisfying the credibility or reliability requirement is the presence of independent, collateral corroboration in the affidavit. People v. Conwell, 649 P.2d 1099 (Colo. 1982).

Where an unknown informant's tip constitutes the principal basis for believing that criminal activity is occurring in a certain place, the affidavit must state facts concerning where, how, and when the informant received the information so that the magistrate can independently determine whether reasonable grounds exist to believe that illegal activity is currently being conducted in the place to be searched or that contraband is currently located therein. People v. Bauer, 191 Colo. 331, 552 P.2d 512 (1976).

Where the information relied upon to establish probable cause for arrest originates from an anonymous informer, the informer's tip must allege sufficient facts to establish the basis for his knowledge of criminal activity and also must allege adequate circumstances to justify the officer's belief in the informer's credibility or the reliability of his information. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

Where an affidavit is based upon an informer's tip, the totality of the circumstances inquiry looks to all indicia of reliability, including the informer's veracity, the basis of his knowledge, the amount of detail provided by the informer, and whether the information provided was current. People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994); People v. Randolph, 4 P.3d 477 (Colo. 2000); People v. Pacheco, 175 P.3d 91 (Colo. 2006).

Informant's reliability, veracity, and basis of knowledge are important factors in determining existence of probable cause. People v. Diaz, 793 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1990).

A bare assertion of knowledge is not sufficient to establish an informer's basis of knowledge; there must be sufficient facts to allow a magistrate to determine how the informant obtained the information on which the affiant relies. People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994); People v. Pacheco, 175 P.3d 91 (Colo. 2006).

Declarations against the penal interests of informants may establish informant credibility in an affidavit for a search warrant. People v. Stoppel, 637 P.2d 384 (Colo. 1981); People v. Stark, 691 P.2d 334 (Colo. 1984); People v. Lubben, 739 P.2d 833 (Colo. 1987).

Reliability of a first-time informant may be determined from independent corroborative facts, such as the recitation of specific details which suggest strongly the informant's personal familiarity with the matter in question, or the receipt of identical information from another source. People v. Press, 633 P.2d 489 (Colo. App. 1981).

Where a common sense reading of the affidavit was that informant was a "citizen informant", an explanation of such informant's connection with the case or his basis of knowledge was not necessary to establish reliability and credibility. People v. Salazar, 715 P.2d 1265 (Colo. App. 1985), cert. denied, 744 P.2d 80 (Colo. 1987).

Probable cause for warrantless arrest did not exist when informants' reliability was not demonstrated and the reported information was not independently corroborated by police. People v. Diaz, 793 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1990).

Informant's statements did not provide a substantial basis for issuing a warrant where the affidavit failed to establish informant's basis for knowledge. Although informant provided some details about defendant's alleged activities, the details that police corroborated did not relate to or describe criminal activities. These details were insufficient to allow a judge to reasonably conclude that the informant had access to reliable information about the illegal activities reported to the police. People v. Hoffman, 293 P.3d 1 (Colo. App. 2010), rev'd on other grounds, 2012 CO 66, 289 P.3d 24.

Facts that are easily obtained or predictions that are easily made add little to the decision of whether probable cause for a search exists. The focus of a court in reviewing an affidavit that relies on corroboration of non-criminal activity is the degree of suspicion that attaches to particular types of corroborated non-criminal acts, whether the informant provides details which are not easily obtained, and whether such statements allow an inference that the informant's allegations of criminal activity are reliable. People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994); People v. Pacheco, 175 P.3d 91 (Colo. 2006).

Reliability of hearsay may be adduced by police investigation, police surveillance, or other investigative techniques. People v. Snelling, 174 Colo. 397, 484 P.2d 784 (1971).

Showing necessary to establish trustworthiness varies with source. The type of showing necessary to establish the trustworthiness of information supporting an arrest will vary with the source of the information. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

Information furnished by a citizen-witness should not be subjected to the same tests for reliability applicable to the anonymous police informer. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

When the source of the information is a citizen-informer who witnessed a crime and is identified, the citizen's information is presumed to be reliable and the prosecution is not required to establish either credibility of the citizen or the reliability of the citizen's information. People v. Fortune, 930 P.2d 1341 (Colo. 1997).

Mere statement that informant known to be reliable insufficient. An affidavit does not establish the credibility of an informant by merely stating that the informant is known to be reliable. Nor does an affidavit establish the credibility of an informant by merely stating that the informant is known to be reliable based on past information supplied by the informer which has proved to be accurate. Although the words "past information" might conjure up in the mind of the officer some knowledge of the underlying circumstances from which the officer might conclude that the informant was reliable, the judge has not been apprised of such facts, and consequently, he cannot make a disinterested determination based upon such facts. People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971).

As a basis for issuing a search warrant, the mere assertion of reliability is not sufficient to establish an informant's credibility, but there must be a more comprehensive statement of underlying facts upon which the magistrate can make an independent determination that the informant is credible or his information reliable. People v. Aragon, 187 Colo. 206, 529 P.2d 644 (1974).

An affidavit for a search warrant seeking to show an informant's credibility is not satisfactory by merely stating that the informant is reliable, or that he has supplied information in the past which proved to be accurate. Nor are irrelevant, albeit correct, details sufficient. People v. Montoya, 189 Colo. 106, 538 P.2d 1332 (1975); People v. Bowen, 189 Colo. 126, 538 P.2d 1336 (1975).

But statement that informant's previous information resulted in seizure of narcotics held sufficient. A basis for concluding that the affiant detective's informant was "credible" and the information supplied was "reliable" was found in affiant's statement that the informant's previously furnished information resulted in seizure of narcotics and arrests of suspects. People v. Schmidt, 172 Colo. 285, 473 P.2d 698 (1970).

Where the affidavit related that the informant had, within the past 14 months, supplied information which led to the arrest and conviction of an individual for possession of a narcotic drug, and that the informant had, within the past 24 hours, supplied information which resulted in arrests and the seizure of a quantity of marijuana, this information was sufficient to permit the issuing magistrate to find that the informant was reliable. People v. Harris, 182 Colo. 75, 510 P.2d 1374 (1973).

Where informant had furnished information which "has been the cause of approximately 20 narcotic and dangerous drug arrests in the past year", the magistrate could independently conclude that the police would not repeatedly accept information from one who has not proven by experience to be reliable, and hence, the magistrate could determine that the informant was credible. People v. Baird, 182 Colo. 284, 512 P.2d 629 (1973).

Where search warrant affidavit indicated that previous information supplied by the informant had led to narcotics arrests and seizures, such statement was sufficient to establish the reliability of the informant. People v. Ward, 181 Colo. 246, 508 P.2d 1257 (1973).

Reliability of informant is established if previous information resulted in arrests. The issue involved is the reliability of the informant; this reliability is satisfactorily established if the previous information led to arrests. To impose the more stringent requirement that the information led to convictions would impose an undue restriction on law enforcement officers. People v. Arnold, 186 Colo. 372, 527 P.2d 806 (1974).

Or furnished solid material information of specified criminal activity. Requirement that the affiant-police officer support his request for a search warrant with information showing that the informant was credible, or that his information was reliable, may be satisfied by an assertion that the informant has previously furnished solid material information of specified criminal activity. People v. Montoya, 189 Colo. 106, 538 P.2d 1332 (1975).

Under the totality of the circumstances, probable cause existed to support defendant's arrest and the subsequent seizure of evidence that was used at trial. The fact the informant got into a car with police officers to take them to the location where the drug deal was going to occur supports the reliability of the informant's information. People v. Robinson, 226 P.3d 1145 (Colo. App. 2009).

Informant's means of obtaining information need not be recited in the affidavit if there is stated such detail given by the informant as would corroborate his assertions of criminal activity. Flesher v. People, 174 Colo. 355, 484 P.2d 113 (1971).

Informant's personal observations sufficient. Personal observation by an informant of the objects of the search within the place to be searched satisfies requirement of establishing probable cause. People v. Harris, 182 Colo. 75, 510 P.2d 1374 (1973).

Requirement that the affidavit for a search warrant set forth underlying circumstances so as to enable a magistrate to independently judge the validity of the informant's conclusion that criminal activity exists can be satisfied by the assertion of personal knowledge of the informant. People v. Montoya, 189 Colo. 106, 538 P.2d 1332 (1975).

Where informant personally observed that apartment was used solely to grow mushrooms and observations were consistent with cultivation of psilocybin mushrooms, the totality of the affidavit established probable cause and supported the issuance of a search warrant. People v. Atley, 727 P.2d 376 (Colo. 1986).

Informant may sufficiently detail criminal activity. In the absence of a statement detailing the circumstances underlying an informant's conclusion, an informant's tip may only support a finding of probable cause if it describes the criminal activity of the accused in sufficient detail to allow the trial court to reasonably infer that the informant obtained his facts in a reliable manner. DeLaCruz v. People, 177 Colo. 46, 492 P.2d 627 (1972); People v. Sullivan, 680 P.2d 851 (Colo. App. 1984).

Disclosure of informer's identity not constitutional right. At a preliminary hearing to determine whether there was probable cause to support an arrest, the disclosure of the identity of an informer is not a constitutional right, and the informant's identity need not be made known. DeLaCruz v. People, 177 Colo. 46, 492 P.2d 627 (1972).

Disclosure is not automatic upon request. A defendant seeking disclosure must make an initial showing that the informant will provide information essential to the merits of his suppression ruling. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

But evidentiary matter within discretion of trial judge. The disclosure of the identity of an informer is an evidentiary matter within the sound indiscretion of the trial judge. If the trial judge is convinced that the police officers relied in good faith upon credible information supplied by a reliable informant, the informant's identity need not be disclosed at the suppression hearing. DeLaCruz v. People, 177 Colo. 46, 492 P.2d 627 (1972).

Whether the identity of a confidential informant should be disclosed is committed to the sound discretion of the trial court. People v. Dailey, 639 P.2d 1068 (Colo. 1982).

Informer privilege recognizes general obligation of citizens to communicate their knowledge of crimes to law enforcement officials and, at the same time, encourages that obligation by protecting their anonymity under appropriate circumstances. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

Informer privilege is in reality the government's qualified privilege to withhold from disclosure the identity of persons who furnish information of crimes to law enforcement officers. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

Informer privilege is not absolute and must be administered in consideration of other significant and competing interests. Thus, where the disclosure of an informer's identity, or of the contents of his communication, would be relevant and helpful to the defense of an accused, or would be essential to a fair determination of a cause, the privilege generally should yield. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

Test for disclosure of informer's identity. In determining whether to disclose an informer's identity, the trial court must balance the public interest in protecting the flow of information to the police against the accused's right to prepare his defense. People v. Dailey, 639 P.2d 1068 (Colo. 1982); People v. Cook, 722 P.2d 432 (Colo. App. 1986).

Disclosure in connection with motion to suppress. The first situation involving disclosure arises in connection with a defendant's motion to suppress evidence. If the disclosure of an informant's identity is essential to a fair determination of a suppression motion, then the trial court in its discretion may order disclosure. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

When burden met for requiring disclosure. A defendant will meet this initial burden when he establishes a reasonable basis in fact to believe that an informer does not exist or, if he does, he did not relate to the police the information upon which the police purportedly relied as probable cause for an arrest or search. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

The necessary foundation for the court's exercise of discretion in ordering disclosure is a showing of a reasonable basis in fact to question the accuracy of the informant's recitals. People v. Nunez, 658 P.2d 879 (Colo. 1983).

Disclosure in connection with claim that informer is witness. The second situation involving the disclosure of an informant's identity arises in connection with a defendant's claim that the informer is an essential witness on the issue of guilt or innocence. Here again, the right to disclosure is not automatic. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

Evidence suppressed following failure to disclose. When the prosecution refuses to disclose the identity of an informant, the district court may properly suppress the evidence seized during the search of the defendant's house. People v. Nunez, 658 P.2d 879 (Colo. 1983).

Dismissal of charges upheld, following failure to produce confidential witness. People v. Martinez, 658 P.2d 260 (Colo. 1983).

Informant must be likely source of relevant evidence. The necessary foundation for the court's exercise of discretion in ordering disclosure should be a showing of a reasonable basis in fact to believe the informant is a likely source of relevant and helpful evidence to the accused. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

Generally, a showing by the accused that the informant witnessed or participated in the crime will meet this threshold foundation and will provide an adequate basis for a discretionary order of disclosure. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982).

Victim as source of probable cause. A victim's detailed description of the offense and of its perpetration inside a vehicle is the source of both the probable cause to arrest the defendant and the probable cause to search the vehicle. People v. Meyer, 628 P.2d 103 (Colo. 1981).

Officer may rely upon information given by victim. Details of the underlying facts and circumstances of the crime, given to the investigating officers by the victim of the crime, can be relied upon by the officers and furnish the basis for their conclusion that a crime had been committed and that certain described persons probably committed it. People v. Nanes, 174 Colo. 294, 483 P.2d 958 (1971).

"Citizen-informer" rule. Colorado will follow the citizen-informer rule and will recognize that a citizen who is identified by name and address and was a witness to criminal activity cannot be considered on the same basis as the ordinary informant. People v. Glaubman, 175 Colo. 41, 485 P.2d 711 (1971).

Where the citizen-informant rule applies to information contained in an affidavit for issuance of a search warrant, it is not necessary that the affidavit contain a statement of facts showing the reliability of the citizen-informant, as is the case when the informant is confidential and unidentified. People v. Schamber, 182 Colo. 355, 513 P.2d 205 (1973).

The "citizen-informer" rule applies equally to a citizen-victim. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

A citizen informant is an eyewitness who, with no motive but public service, and without expectation of payment, identifies himself and volunteers information to the police. People v. Press, 633 P.2d 489 (Colo. App. 1981).

It is essential however that the citizen be an eyewitness to, or have some other firsthand knowledge of, the incident he reports to police officers. People v. Donnelly, 691 P. 2d 747 (Colo. 1984).

Information provided by citizen-informants is not subject to the same credibility standards as information provided by confidential police informants. People v. Rueda, 649 P.2d 1106 (Colo. 1982).

Reliability of citizen-informer presumed. When the source of information is a citizen-informer who witnessed a crime and is identified, the citizen's information is presumed to be reliable, and the prosecution is not required to establish either the credibility of the citizen or the reliability of his information. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981); People v. Rueda, 649 P.2d 1106 (Colo. 1982).

Information from a citizen informant is considered inherently trustworthy. People v. Press, 633 P.2d 489 (Colo. App. 1981).

Police officer's experience considered. In assessing the existence of probable cause to arrest, a court must consider the police officer's knowledge, expertise, and experience in a particular law enforcement field. People v. Rueda, 649 P.2d 1106 (Colo. 1982); Bartley v. People, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991); People v. McCoy, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

Even if not false, statements of officer-affiants may be so misleading that a finding of probable cause may be deemed erroneous. People v. Winden, 689 P.2d 578 (Colo. 1984).

Reliability of police officer's observations. Information gained by the observations of a police officer may be presumed to be credible and reliable. People v. Cook, 665 P.2d 640 (Colo. App. 1983).

"Fellow-officer" rule. Affidavit in support of search warrant was not insufficient because it was predicated upon double hearsay, where the information is conveyed by one police officer to another police officer. People v. Quintana, 183 Colo. 81, 514 P.2d 1325 (1973).

A police officer has the right to rely upon the information relayed to him by his fellow law enforcement officers. People v. Nanes, 174 Colo. 294, 483 P.2d 958 (1971); People v. Reed, 56 P.3d 96 (Colo. 2002).

It is not necessary for the arresting officer to know of the reliability of the informer or to be himself in possession of information sufficient to constitute probable cause, provided that he acts upon the direction or as a result of communication with a brother officer or that of another police department and provided that the police, as a whole, are in possession of information sufficient to constitute probable cause to make the arrest. People v. Nanes, 174 Colo. 294, 483 P.2d 958 (1971).

Probable cause can be based on a combination of facts personally observed by the arresting officer and information relayed to him by other officers. People v. Handy, 657 P.2d 963 (Colo. App. 1982).

The fellow-officer rule permits a police officer to rely upon and accept information provided by another officer in determining whether there is probable cause for warrantless arrest. People v. Vaughns, 175 Colo. 369, 489 P.2d 591 (1971).

The "fellow officer" rule provides that an arresting officer need not have personal information amounting to probable cause but may rely on a dispatch or communication from another officer in effecting an arrest. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

An officer who does not personally possess sufficient information to constitute probable cause may nevertheless make a valid arrest if he acts upon the direction or as a result of a communication from a fellow officer, and the police, as a whole, possess sufficient information to constitute probable cause. People v. Freeman, 668 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1983); People v. Thompson, 793 P.2d 1173 (Colo. 1990).

The right of one officer to rely on information relayed to him by a fellow officer is predicated upon the latter's assumed possession of trustworthy information of facts and circumstances which would themselves support a conclusion of probable cause. Where no such showing was made, justification for a warrantless search may not be placed on the so-called "fellow officer" rule. People v. Ware, 174 Colo. 419, 484 P.2d 103 (1971).

Overbreadth of search warrant cured by affidavit that more particularly described the items to be seized where affidavit was attached to warrant so that they appeared as one document. People v. Slusher, 844 P.2d 1222 (Colo. App. 1992).

Good faith basis required to challenge warrant affidavits. As conditions to a veracity hearing testing the truth of averments contained in a warrant affidavit, a motion to suppress must be supported by one or more affidavits reflecting a good faith basis for the challenge and contain a specification of the precise statements challenged. People v. Dailey, 639 P.2d 1068 (Colo. 1982).

In considering whether a hearing should be held on veracity challenge to affidavit supporting a search warrant, trial court erred in applying standard akin to federal standard rather than the less demanding Colorado standard. People v. Cook, 722 P.2d 432 (Colo. App. 1986).

The government's qualified privilege of nondisclosure of confidential informants and a criminal defendant's veracity challenge should be balanced on considerations of fundamental fairness. People v. Flores, 766 P.2d 114 (Colo. 1988).

In camera interview in a veracity hearing must be preceded by defendant fairly placing into issue the existence of the informant, the informant's prior reliability, or the veracity of the officer-affiant. People v. Flores, 766 P.2d 114 (Colo. 1988).

Veracity challenger's attack must be more than conclusory or mere assertions of denial. If the only evidence produced at the suppression hearing is a defendant's bald assertion (e.g., that the informant does not exist or that the affiant misrepresented information conveyed by informant), then the defendant has failed to meet his threshold burden. People v. Flores, 766 P.2d 114 (Colo. 1988).

Suppression order reversed where affidavit alleged facts sufficient to support a finding of probable cause, including the fact of a one-day, round-trip to Denver by defendant and previous statements by defendant to an informer that he obtained heroin in Denver and that he was almost out of heroin. Information from second informant, held insufficient by district court to provide basis for informant's belief that defendant was going to Denver, deemed reliable due to corroboration by affiant and by confirmation of information from second informant on four previous occasions. People v. Varrieur, 771 P.2d 895 (Colo. 1989).

Suppression order reversed where affidavit stated that fellow officer observed defendant and another previous drug offender smoking outside hotel room, hotel staff connected defendant with another room in which methamphetamine precursors had been discovered, store employees identified defendant as having purchased large amounts of precursors, and defendant was observed driving his truck to hotel room. Search of room and truck held proper notwithstanding that some facts stated in affidavit may have been false, where trial court made no finding as to whether falsehoods were intentional or material. People v. Reed, 56 P.3d 96 (Colo. 2002).

Constitutional protection of the fourth amendment and this section applicable to civil forfeiture proceedings. People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79 (Colo. App. 1992).

District attorney's investigator is officer within rule. An authorized investigator of a district attorney is a peace officer and therefore comes within the fellow officer rule for purposes of making a lawful arrest. People v. Herrera, 633 P.2d 1091 (Colo. App. 1981).

Probable cause found. People v. Bengston, 174 Colo. 131, 482 P.2d 989 (1971); People v. Ramey, 174 Colo. 250, 483 P.2d 374 (1971); People v. Barnes, 174 Colo. 531, 484 P.2d 1233 (1971); People v. Olson, 175 Colo. 140, 485 P.2d 891 (1971); People v. Henderson, 175 Colo. 400, 487 P.2d 1108 (1971); People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 421, 489 P.2d 593 (1971); People v. DeBaca, 181 Colo. 111, 508 P.2d 393 (1973); People v. Johnson, 192 Colo. 483, 560 P.2d 465 (1977); People v. Ball, 639 P.2d 1078 (Colo. 1982); People v. Villiard, 679 P.2d 593 (Colo.

1983); People v. Hill, 690 P.2d 856 (Colo. 1984); Banks v. People, 696 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1985); People v. Smith, 709 P.2d 4 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Atley, 727 P.2d 376 (Colo. App. 1986).

The best indication that a magistrate is not detached and neutral is the lack of probable cause in the affidavit. A review of the court's probable cause determination is the first step to determine if the warrant was issued by a neutral and detached magistrate. The affidavit clearly established probable cause. People v. Gallegos, 251 P.3d 1056 (Colo. 2011).

The next inquiry is whether the magistrate has an actual conflict so significant that he or she cannot be neutral and detached. An actual conflict would arise when the court would receive some benefit in issuing the warrant. In this case, the fact that the judge's son worked for the district attorney's office is just a mere appearance of impropriety, and, since the son was not involved in the case at all, there is no evidence of an actual conflict. People v. Gallegos, 251 P.3d 1056 (Colo. 2011).

C. Written Oath or Affirmation.

Law reviews. For article, "The 'Bare Bones' Affidavit Under Colorado's Good Faith Exception to the Exclusionary Rule", see 40 Colo. Law. 27 (May 2011).

When search warrant is challenged for lack of probable cause, supporting affidavit is an essential element to be introduced in evidence. People v. Espinoza, 195 Colo. 127, 575 P.2d 851 (1978).

Search warrrants must be supported by evidentiary affidavits containing sufficient facts to allow "probable cause" to be determined by a detached magistrate instead of the accusing police officer. To dispense with this requirement would render the search warrant itself meaningless. It would allow a police officer to subjectively determine probable cause. Brown v. Patterson, 275 F. Supp. 629 (D. Colo. 1967), aff'd, 393 F.2d 733 (10th Cir. 1968).

And affidavit must comply with United States supreme court's standards. If a search warrant is to be sustained, the Colorado supreme court must find that the affidavit complied with the standards set forth in Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 84 S. Ct. 1509, 12 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1966), and in Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410, 89 S. Ct. 584, 21 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1969). People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971).

Affidavit may include items observed in plain view. Items observed in plain view pursuant to a valid entry may be included in an affidavit for a search warrant. People v. Bustam, 641 P.2d 968 (Colo. 1982).

Verbal communication of facts, as contrasted with written communication, will not suffice to establish probable cause, nor will the affiant's conclusory declaration that he has probable cause add strength to the showing made. People v. Padilla, 182 Colo. 101, 511 P.2d 480 (1973).

Sufficient facts must appear on face of affidavit. The express constitutional requirement of a written oath or affirmation makes it clear beyond a doubt that sufficient facts to support a magistrate's determination of probable cause must appear on the face of the written affidavit. People v. Baird, 172 Colo. 112, 470 P.2d 20 (1970).

In determining whether the affidavit is sufficient, the judge must look within the four corners of the affidavit to determine whether there are grounds for the issuance of a search warrant. It is, of course, elementary and of no consequence that the police might have had additional information which could have provided a basis for the issuance of the warrant. People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971); People v. Woods, 175 Colo. 34, 485 P.2d 491 (1971); People v. Padilla, 182 Colo. 101, 511 P.2d 480 (1973); People v. Bauer, 191 Colo. 331, 552 P.2d 512 (1976).

An affidavit may be used to charge a crime for the purpose of obtaining an arrest warrant; however, when used it must set forth facts sufficient to justify a finding of the existence of probable cause. People v. McFall, 175 Colo. 151, 486 P.2d 6 (1971).

Facts set forth in an affidavit must support the belief of a reasonably prudent person that the property to be seized is located at the place to be searched or, in the case of an arrest warrant, that an offense has been committed by the person named in the warrant. People v. White, 632 P.2d 609 (Colo. App. 1981); People v. Hamer, 689 P.2d 1147 (Colo. App. 1984).

But documents attached to and incorporated in an affidavit by reference need not be sworn to separately and may thus fall within the four corners of the affidavit. People v. Campbell, 678 P.2d 1035 (Colo. App. 1983).

Where same magistrate reviewed and signed two warrants within hours of each other, facts within affidavits for both warrants may be considered for determining probable cause for the second warrant. People v. Scott, 227 P.3d 894 (Colo. 2010).

However, an affidavit containing wholly conclusory statements devoid of facts from which a magistrate can independently determine probable cause is a "bare bones" affidavit and thus deficient. People v. Randolph, 4 P.3d 477 (Colo. 2000); People v. Bachofer, 85 P.3d 615 (Colo. App. 2003); People v. Pacheco, 175 P.3d 91 (Colo. 2006).

The fact that a companion arrived at defendant's detached garage and gave some of his or her methamphetamine to defendant insufficient to establish probable cause that defendant possessed methamphetamine in his or her residence or that he or she was dealing drugs from his or her residence. People v. Bachofer, 85 P.3d 615 (Colo. App. 2003).

Although judge may require testimony to supplement insufficient affidavit. Should the judge to whom application has been made for the issuance of a search warrant determine that the affidavit is insufficient, he can require that sworn testimony be offered to supplement the warrant or can demand that the affidavit be amended to disclose additional facts, if a search warrant is to be issued. People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971); People v. Moreno, 176 Colo. 488, 491 P.2d 575 (1971) (arrest warrant).

But not if affidavit basically deficient. Verbal communications to the magistrate of additional supporting information cannot correct an affidavit which is basically deficient in its statement of the underlying facts and the circumstances relied upon. People v. Padilla, 182 Colo. 101, 511 P.2d 480 (1973).

Supplemental testimony must be reduced to writing and signed. Under the Colorado Constitution, the warrant can only be issued upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation which is reduced to writing. Moreover, Crim. P. 41 requires an affidavit to support a search warrant, which establishes the grounds for the issuance of the warrant, and demands that the affidavit be sworn to before the judge. Accordingly, the testimony taken would have to be reduced to writing and signed by the witness or witnesses that offered testimony, under oath, to supplement the affidavit. People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971); People v. Moreno, 176 Colo. 488, 491 P.2d 575 (1971).

An affidavit can be used to satisfy the fourth amendment's particularity requirement if (1) a deficient warrant incorporates a curative affidavit by reference, (2) both documents are presented to the issuing magistrate or judge, and (3) the curative affidavit accompanies the warrant when it is executed. People v. Staton, 924 P.2d 127 (Colo. 1996).

The execution of the search warrant under the supervision and control of the officer who is the affiant obviates the necessity for the affidavit to accompany the warrant when it is executed. People v. Staton, 924 P.2d 127 (Colo. 1996).

Court to strike false information supportive of search warrant. Where the information supplied by the affiant which supports the issuance of the search warrant is false, the trial court has no alternative but to strike the admittedly erroneous information which the affiant supplied. People v. Hampton, 196 Colo. 466, 587 P.2d 275 (1978).

Statements in an affidavit which are untrue or which were known to the affiant to be false must be stricken and cannot be considered in determining whether probable cause exists to support the issuance of a warrant. People v. White, 632 P.2d 609 (Colo. App. 1981).

A police officer's factual statements in an affidavit that are erroneous and false must be stricken and may not be considered in determining whether the affidavit will support the issuance of a search warrant. People v. Malone, 175 Colo. 31, 485 P.2d 499 (1971).

But warrant will not be stricken if affidavit still contains sufficient material facts. Where the affidavit still contains material facts sufficient as a matter of law to support the issuance of a warrant after deletion of the erroneous statements, the supreme court will not strike down the warrant because the affidavit is not completely accurate. People v. Malone, 175 Colo. 31, 485 P.2d 499 (1971).

Although warrants issued on fatally defective affidavits are nullities, and any search conducted under them is unlawful. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963); People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971).

A search warrant is fatally defective where it is based upon an affidavit which was wholly insufficient to support a finding of probable cause. Smaldone v. People, 173 Colo. 385, 479 P.2d 973 (1971).

Test for determining whether omission in affidavit invalidates search warrant is whether the omitted facts rendered the affidavit substantially misleading to the judge who issued the warrant. People v. Winden, 689 P.2d 578 (Colo. 1984); People v. Sundermeyer, 769 P.2d 499 (Colo. 1989).

The omission of material facts known to the affiant at the time the affidavit was executed may cause statements within the affidavit to be so misleading that a finding of probable cause may be deemed erroneous. An omitted fact is material for purposes of vitiating an entire affidavit only if its omission rendered the affidavit substantially misleading to the judge who issued the warrant. People v. Fortune, 930 P.2d 1341 (Colo. 1997).

Omission of fact in affidavit that reserve police officer had viewed marijuana plants in defendant's home prior to observations made by officers through window did not make affidavit misleading as omitted fact did not cast doubt on existence of probable cause. People v. Sundermeyer, 769 P.2d 499 (Colo. 1989).

Omission of fact in affidavit that would have indicated the affiant's source of information related to specific address to be searched arguably failed to provide a substantial basis for issuing a warrant, however, even a bare bones affidavit should not lead to an exclusionary sanction unless it is so lacking in indicia of probable cause that official belief in its existence was unreasonable. People v. Gall, 30 P.3d 145 (Colo. 2001).

So long as the omission of certain facts in the affidavit does not cause it to be misleading, a search warrant based on such affidavit is still valid. People v. Grady, 755 P.2d 1211 (Colo. 1988).

Regardless of whether facts were omitted with a reckless disregard for the truth in the affidavit submitted in support of a search warrant, the information was not material such that its omission rendered the affidavit substantially misleading as to the existence of probable cause. People v. Kerst, 181 P.3d 1167 (Colo. 2008).

An affiant's impression that later proved to be incorrect, but was not negligently made, did not have to be excised from the search warrant affidavit when determining whether probable cause existed so long as the impression was reasonable. People v. Young, 785 P.2d 1306 (Colo. 1990).

There is no requirement that all steps taken, all information obtained, and all statements made by witnesses during the course of an investigation be described fully and in chronological order in an affidavit. People v. Fortune, 930 P.2d 1341 (Colo. 1997).

When the information indicates a continuing series of illegal activities, the need for precise times of surveillance is lessened. While specific dates are preferable and should be given if at all possible, the fact that they are absent is not fatal to the sufficiency of the affidavit. People v. Lubben, 739 P.2d 833 (Colo. 1987).

Erroneous description of location not necessarily fatal. Fact that the affidavit identified the wrong street, which was less than one block away from the actual location of the truck that was to be searched, was not dispositive of the affidavit's efficacy. People v. Del Alamo, 624 P.2d 1304 (Colo. 1981).

Fact that affidavit failed to include apartment number and made a specific request to search a different residence was not necessarily fatal when affidavit and warrant were both prepared by the same officer and presented to the judge at the same time, affidavit included an annotation with a correct address and apartment number at the bottom of each page, and the documents taken together left no doubt as to the correct address and apartment number to search. People v. Gall, 30 P.3d 145 (Colo. 2001).

Thus, failure to specifically state in affidavit that sex crime had occurred in vehicle to be searched was not fatally defective where it had been established that vehicle was present at location of alleged crimes, and it was reasonable to believe evidence of the sex crime might be inside the vehicle. People v. Martinez, 32 P.3d 520 (Colo. App. 2001).

But a "bare bones" affidavit which fails to connect the property to be searched with the alleged criminal activity and which otherwise lacks particularity is insufficient. People v. Randolph, 4 P.3d 477 (Colo. 2000).

Admission of evidence seized from a defendant's residence pursuant to a defective warrant did not constitute reversible error, even though warrant was issued based on an affidavit inadvertently failing to allege facts linking defendant to the residence to be searched. People v. Deitchman, 695 P.2d 1146 (Colo. 1985).

Not every instance of insufficient attention to detail by police officers, any more than by attorneys or judges, is unreasonable and in absence of any evidence of a deliberately false affidavit, abandonment by the judge of his duty, or a facially deficient warrant, the exclusion of evidence discovered in reliance on the search warrant was improper. People v. Gall, 30 P.3d 145

Good faith exception to exclusionary rule held to apply to seizure of telephone toll records where affidavit underlying search warrant was insufficient. People v. Taylor, 804 P.2d 196 (Colo. App. 1990).

Good faith exception to exclusionary rule does not apply where a detective's reliance on a warrant is not objectively reasonable. Where an affidavit contains no facts that would allow a reasonable officer to conclude that probable cause for a search exists, the illegally obtained evidence is not admissible under the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule. People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994); People v. Pacheco, 175 P.3d 91 (Colo. 2006); People v. Gutierrez, 222 P.3d 925 (Colo. 2009).

Nor does good faith exception apply when the police submit a defective affidavit to the county judge, and continue to rely on that defective affidavit. The failure of the police to corroborate the details in the affidavit and to narrow the search with particularity was not in accord with the duty of the police to assure compliance with the probable cause requirement at each step of the process. People v. Randolph, 4 P.3d 477 (Colo. 2000).

The fact that same officer filed bare bones affidavit for warrant and executed warrant bolsters trial court's conclusion that the officer's reliance on the defective affidavit was not objectively reasonable, and, consequently, the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply to shield the evidence obtained in the search. People v. Pacheco, 175 P.3d 91 (Colo. 2006).

The fact that the affidavit details activities that are lawful does not cause it to be a bare bones affidavit; a combination of otherwise lawful circumstances may well lead to a legitimate inference of criminal activity. People v. Altman, 960 P.2d 1164 (Colo. 1998).

The determination by an appellant court that a warrant is invalid does not mean a police officer's reliance upon that warrant was objectively unreasonable. People v. Altman, 960 P.2d 1164 (Colo. 1998).

A warrant that has failed appellate scrutiny can nonetheless form the basis for good faith execution by a reasonable police officer. People v. Altman, 960 P.2d 1164 (Colo. 1998).

Probable cause to issue a search warrant for a residence was sufficiently established by affidavit that was based primarily on information provided by confidential police informant and only thinly corroborated by independent police investigation. The "totality of circumstances" test for determining whether probable cause existed for issuing warrant was met. People v. Paquin, 811 P.2d 394 (Colo. 1991).

Effect of sufficient affidavit. If the supporting affidavit was sufficient to provide probable cause for issuance of a warrant, then the searching officers were rightfully in the defendant's apartment and were entitled to seize items in plain view which they recognized as stolen. People v. Espinoza, 195 Colo. 127, 575 P.2d 851 (1978).

Affidavit held sufficient. People v. Campbell, 678 P.2d 1035 (Colo. App. 1983); People v. Grady, 755 P.2d 1211 (Colo. 1988); People v. Quintana, 785 P.2d 934 (Colo. 1990).

Affidavit held insufficient. People v. Schmidt, 172 Colo. 285, 473 P.2d 698 (1970); People v. Brethauer, 174 Colo. 29, 482 P.2d 369 (1971); Flesher v. People, 174 Colo. 355, 484 P.2d 113 (1971); People v. Myers, 175 Colo. 109, 485 P.2d 877 (1971); People v. Padilla, 182 Colo. 101, 511 P.2d 480 (1973); People v. Bauer, 191 Colo. 331, 552 P.2d 512 (1976).

III. SEARCHES AND SEIZURES.

A. In General.

This section protects only against unreasonable searches and seizures. The prohibitions of this section are intended to protect only against unreasonable searches and seizures. Dickerson v. People, 179 Colo. 146, 499 P.2d 1196 (1972); Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989); People v. Hakel, 870 P.2d 1224 (Colo. 1994); People v. Upshur, 923 P.2d 284 (Colo. App. 1996).

The security of persons is guaranteed only against unreasonable searches. Larkin v. People, 177 Colo. 156, 493 P.2d 1 (1972).

The fourth and fourteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution and this section guarantee the right of the people to be secure in their persons against unreasonable seizures. To effectuate these guarantees, police must have probable cause to arrest before they can subject a person to those deprivations of liberty that result from being arrested. People v. McCoy, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994); People v. Davis, 903 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1995).

Federal fourth amendment search and seizure protections are insufficient when law enforcement attempts to use a search warrant to obtain an innocent, third-party bookstore's customer purchase records. The Colorado Constitution provides greater protection in this arena than the federal constitution. A more substantial justification from the government is required when the government action is likely to chill people's willingness to read and be exposed to diverse ideas. Tattered Cover, Inc. v. City of Thornton, 44 P.3d 1044 (Colo. 2002).

An innocent, third-party bookstore must be afforded an opportunity for a hearing prior to the execution of any search warrant that seeks to obtain its customers' book-purchasing records. Tattered Cover, Inc. v. City of Thornton, 44 P.3d 1044 (Colo. 2002).

A police officer's request for identification, without more, does not convert a consensual encounter into a seizure that requires fourth amendment protection. People v. Paynter, 955 P.2d 68 (Colo. 1998).

Even after Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249 (2007), police officer may ask automobile passenger for identification. Although passenger was technically seized at time she provided a false name, officer could lawfully ask for her identification during the traffic stop without reasonable suspicion of criminal activity on her part. People v. Bowles, 226 P.3d 1134 (Colo. App. 2009).

Neither a request for consent to search nor a request for a person to move a short distance transforms a consensual encounter into a seizure, so long as the officer does not convey a message that compliance is required. People v. Marujo, 190 P.3d 1003 (Colo. 2008).

Investigatory stops and arrests are seizures and therefore implicate the guarantees contained in the fourth amendment to the United States constitution and this section. People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997).

Reasonableness of search determined by balancing public need against invasion. In determining reasonableness, it is necessary to balance the public need to search against the invasion of the defendant's person or property which the search entails. Roybal v. People, 166 Colo. 541, 444 P.2d 875 (1968).

Reasonableness determined by balancing need for search against invasion of personal rights involved while giving consideration to scope of intrusion, manner and place conducted, and justification for. People v. Martin, Reasonableness standard of the fourth amendment should be applied to claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other seizure of a free citizen. Martinez v. Harper, 802 P.2d 1185 (Colo. App. 1990).

806 P.2d 393 (Colo. App. 1990).

"Special needs" exception exists to the warrant and probable cause requirements for the needs of law enforcement. City and County of Denver v. Casados, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1994).

And reasonableness inquiry requires balancing the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's fourth amendment interest against the countervailing interests at stake. Martinez v. Harper, 802 P.2d 1185 (Colo. App. 1990).

And reasonableness inquiry must be made objectively, that is, judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene. Martinez v. Harper, 802 P.2d 1185 (Colo. App. 1990); People v. Weston, 869 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

It is constitutionally reasonable to prevent escape by using deadly force where an officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others. Thus, if a suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that the suspect has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if, where feasible, some warning has been given. Martinez v. Harper, 802 P.2d 1185 (Colo. App. 1990).

A limited intrusion may be upheld on the basis of its objective reasonableness even though the officer may have harbored a subjective intent to engage in a more extensive intrusion than was warranted under the circumstances. People v. Weston, 869 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Every search and seizure issue must be considered on the basis of the totality of the circumstances. DeLaCruz v. People, 177 Colo. 46, 492 P.2d 627 (1972).

Whether a search and seizure is unreasonable within the meaning of this section depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case. Early v. People, 178 Colo. 167, 496 P.2d 1021 (1972).

Each search and seizure case must be tested on its own particular facts, and the test is always whether the search was reasonable under the circumstances. People v. Burley, 185 Colo. 224, 523 P.2d 981 (1974).

In determining whether a particular encounter between the police and a citizen violates the fourth amendment, it is helpful to classify the incident as one of three types of police-citizen contact: Consensual encounters; arrests or full-scale searches; or intermediate forms of intrusion such as investigatory stops or limited searches. Consensual encounters do not trigger the fourth amendment as long as a reasonable person would feel free to disregard the police and go about his or her business. Arrests and full-scale searches are subject to the fourth amendment reasonableness requirement which requires that searches are based upon warrants issued upon probable cause or on an established exception to the warrant requirement. Finally, intermediate forms of intrusion may be used under specific circumstances based upon less than probable cause. People v. Archuleta, 980 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1999).

The degree of restraint incident to a traffic stop did not rise to the level associated with a formal arrest where the police officer stood next to the car and did not remove the defendant from the car or handcuff the defendant. After issuing the citation, when the police officer continued to question the defendant, the extent of restraint did not rise to the level of a formal arrest, even if the police officer retained the defendant's driver's license and registration. People v. Cervantes-Arredondo, 17 P.3d 141 (Colo. 2001).

Once the purpose of an investigatory stop is accomplished and there is no further reasonable suspicion to support further investigation, the officer generally may not further detain the driver. However, further questioning is permissible if the initial detention becomes a consensual encounter. To determine the nature and phases of an extended contact, the court must consider the duration and conditions of the contact in the context of the entire stop. But, the tenth circuit has applied a bright line rule: An officer must return a driver's documentation before a detention can end and a consensual encounter can begin. People v. Cervantes-Arredondo, 17 P.3d 141 (Colo. 2001).

The presence of a scent-masking agent, combined with other indicia of criminal activity may create a reasonable suspicion to support further investigation and a reasonably brief inquiry. People v. Cervantes-Arredondo, 17 P.3d 141 (Colo. 2001).

A consensual interview can escalate into an investigatory stop if, upon consideration of the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person, innocent of any crimes, would feel that he or she was not free to leave the officer's presence or disregard the officer's request for information. The record supports the trial court's finding that the encounter was consensual. People v. Valencia, 169 P.3d 212 (Colo. App. 2007).

"Search". There was clearly a "search" when an officer went to the address given by the defendant in order to obtain evidence or information about the defendant and the evidence was produced by the owner at the specific request of the officer. Spencer v. People, 163 Colo. 182, 429 P.2d 266 (1967).

Courts have interpreted the phrase "searches and seizures" in constitutional provisions to regulate the type of conduct designed to elicit a benefit for the government in an investigatory or, more broadly, an administrative capacity. People v. Loggins, 981 P.2d 630 (Colo. App. 1998).

A visual observation which infringes upon a person's reasonable expectation of privacy constitutes a search. People v. Harfmann, 38 Colo. App. 19, 555 P.2d 187 (1976).

A search involves some exploratory investigation, or an invasion and quest, a looking for or seeking out, and implies a prying into hidden places for that which is concealed. People v. Gomez, 632 P.2d 586 (Colo. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 943, 102 S. Ct. 1439, 71 L. Ed. 2d 655 (1982).

Requiring a person to submit to an ultraviolet lamp examination constitutes a search. People v. Santistevan, 715 P.2d 792 (Colo. 1986).

Actions of officer did not constitute search where the officer knocked on an improperly latched door of residence, causing it to open and allowing the officer to observe a bong. People v. Holmes, 981 P.2d 168 (Colo. 1999).

Collection and testing of urine performed as part of university's drug testing program is a "search" within the meaning of this section. Derdeyn v. Univ. of Colo., 832 P.2d 1031 (Colo. App. 1991).

The collection and testing of urine performed as part of the university of Colorado's drug testing program for intercollegiate athletics is a "search" within the meaning of §7 of art. II, Colo. Const. Derdeyn v. Univ. of Colo., 832 P.2d 1031 (Colo. App. 1991).

General searches forbidden. A basic consideration to control and guide the magistrate in issuing a search warrant is that general or blanket searches are forbidden, such being the very evil sought to be protected against by the adoption of the constitutional provisions against unreasonable searches and seizures. People v. Avery, 173 Colo. 315, 478 P.2d 310 (1970).

It is not how many items may be seized that determines validity of a search, for the rule against general exploratory searches is not aimed against quantity, nor even designed to protect property quantitatively, but, instead, is designed to prevent indiscriminate searches and seizures that invade privacy. People v. Tucci, 179 Colo. 373, 500 P.2d 815 (1972).

Whether search of defendant's room was reasonable because search warrant authorized search of entire house depends on facts known to officers. Officers knew that defendant's father, the person whose unlawful activities formed the basis of the search warrant, had ready access to defendant's bedroom. The search of defendant's bedroom for the contraband identified in the search warrant was constitutionally reasonable irrespective of whether the officers were aware that defendant was paying rent to his parents. People v. Martinez, 165 P.3d 907 (Colo. App. 2007).

Executive order held not to be facially invalid under the fourth amendment. The order stated that employees must submit to screening when there is "reasonable suspicion" of illicit drug or alcohol use. The court ruled that the order did not contemplate the testing of those who did not hold safety or security-sensitive positions based only on a suspicion of off-duty use or impairment. City and County of Denver v. Casados, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1994).

Searches have been described as intrusive governmental investigations or explorations into non-public places for that which is concealed. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989).

There was no "search" where emergency room personnel, in the course of treating the defendant for a serious injury under standard hospital procedures and not motivated by an investigatory or administrative purpose, discovered contraband hidden on his person. People v. Loggins, 981 P.2d 630 (Colo. App. 1998).

Search held unconstitutional as general exploratory search. In re People in Interest of B.M.C., 32 Colo. App. 79, 506 P.2d 409 (1973).

Officer may seize contraband discovered during valid search for other articles. If an officer is conducting a search, either under a valid search warrant or incident to a valid arrest where the search is such as is reasonably designed to uncover the articles for which he is looking, and in the course of such search discovers contraband or articles the possession of which is a crime, other than those for which he was originally searching, he is not required to shut his eyes and refrain from seizing that material under the penalty that if he does seize it it cannot be admitted in evidence. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963).

An officer conducting a reasonable search, either under a valid search warrant or incident to a valid arrest, who uncovers contraband or articles the possession of which is a crime, may seize these articles even though they may not relate to the crime for which the arrest was made. Baca v. People, 160 Colo. 477, 418 P.2d 182

An officer conducting a reasonable search, incident to a valid arrest, may seize contraband or articles, the possession of which gives the police officer reason to believe a crime has been committed, even though such articles do not relate to the crime for which the defendant was initially arrested. People v. Ortega, 181 Colo. 223, 508 P.2d 784 (1973).

And that articles discovered do not relate to crime for which defendant arrested does not render search exploratory and general. Baca v. People, 160 Colo. 477, 418 P.2d 182 (1966).

Seizure of "mere evidence". When intrusions upon privacy are allowed, there is no viable reason to distinguish intrusions to secure "mere evidence" from intrusions to secure fruits, instrumentalities, or contraband. Marquez v. People, 168 Colo. 219, 450 P.2d 349 (1969).

"Mere evidence" is articles which are not fruits, instrumentalities, or contraband, and which are not per se associated with criminal activity, but which the officer executing the warrant has probable cause to believe are associated with criminal activity. People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971).

People must show connection between such articles and criminal activity. When a defendant demonstrates that an article is not specifically described in the search warrant, and when it is not per se connected with criminal activity, the burden of showing that it is so connected falls upon the people. People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971); People v. Wilson, 173 Colo. 536, 482 P.2d 355 (1971); People v. Lujan, 174 Colo. 554, 484 P.2d 1238 (1971); People v. Bustam, 641 P.2d 968 (Colo. 1982).

"Mere evidence" which is seized within the scope of the search authorized by the warrant must be shown to have a nexus with the case in which the motion to suppress is filed and with at least one of the defendants in the case. People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971); People v. Piwtorak, 174 Colo. 525, 484 P.2d 1227 (1971).

If people sustain burden, articles should not be suppressed. People v. Wilson, 173 Colo. 536, 482 P.2d 355 (1971).

When a civilian acts as an agent of the state, evidence obtained from an unlawful search must be suppressed. People v. Aguilar, 897 P.2d 84 (Colo. 1995).

Whether an individual becomes an "agent" of the police is determined by the totality of the circumstances. People v. Aguilar, 897 P.2d 84 (Colo. 1995).

Connection shown. Where objection was made to the seizure of the particular personal effects which served to identify the person or persons residing at and in control of the premises searched and the record indicated that these personal effects were intermingled with the suspected narcotics and dangerous drugs found on the premises, it was held that these personal effects, which bore the names of the defendants, were validly seized, since these items might well serve to establish elements of the crimes for which defendants were charged and for the investigation of which crimes the search warrant was issued and executed. People v. Piwtorak, 174 Colo. 525, 484 P.2d 1227 (1971).

Motion to suppress granted where district attorney fails to make showing. At hearings on suppression motions in the future, when the district attorney fails to make the requisite showing, the trial court should sustain the motion as it relates to nonspecified articles not per se connected with criminal activity. People v. Wilson, 173 Colo. 536, 482 P.2d 355 (1971).

Suppression issues become moot upon entry of a guilty plea. People v. Waits, 695 P.2d 1176 (Colo. App. 1984), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 724 P.2d 1329 (Colo. 1986).

Return of seized property. Seized property against which the government has no claim must be returned to its lawful owner. People v. Buggs, 631 P.2d 1200 (Colo. App. 1981).

Burden in motion for return of property. In a motion for return of seized property, a defendant has the burden of making a prima facie showing that goods were seized from him at the time of his arrest and are being held by law enforcement authorities. People v. Buggs, 631 P.2d 1200 (Colo. App. 1981).

Evidence obtained by means of undercover work. So long as the agent's conduct falls short of actual instigation of a crime, which raises the defense of entrapment, the United States supreme court has refused to set aside convictions because evidence was obtained by means of undercover work by law enforcement agents. Patterson v. People, 168 Colo. 417, 451 P.2d 445 (1969).

Absent exigent circumstances, it is necessary to obtain arrest warrant in order to justify entry into a private home to make an arrest. People v. Williams, 200 Colo. 187, 613 P.2d 879 (1980).

The warrantless entry into a home in order to make an arrest, in the absence of consent or exigent circumstances, is unconstitutional. People v. Hogan, 649 P.2d 326 (Colo. 1982).

In the absence of exigent circumstances, police officers may not enter a private residence for the purpose of making a warrantless arrest without first obtaining a search warrant, even though the officers have probable cause to believe a suspect residing therein has committed a crime. People v. Magoon, 645 P.2d 286 (Colo. App. 1982).

Since police officers arrested defendant in his home without a warrant, the arrest could be justified only on the basis of consent to enter the home or on there being exigent circumstances present. People v. Santisteven, 693 P.2d 1008 (Colo. App. 1984).

Police officers may enter a residence without a search warrant to execute an arrest warrant when there is reason to believe the suspect is within. People v. Aarness, 116 P.3d 1233 (Colo. App. 2005), rev'd on other grounds, 150 P.3d 1271 (Colo. 2006).

Officers must have a reasonable belief the arrestee (1) lives at the residence and (2) is within the residence at the time of entry. People v. Aarness, 116 P.3d 1233 (Colo. App. 2005), rev'd on other grounds, 150 P.3d 1271 (Colo. 2006).

The officers had no reason to believe that the defendant lived at the address, but there were exigent circumstances that justified the police entry into the home to arrest the defendant. The circumstances were sufficient to conclude there was a substantial safety risk to both police and others to justify entry to arrest the defendant. People v. Aarness, 150 P.3d 1271 (Colo. 2006).

One's house cannot lawfully be searched without search warrant, except as incident to lawful arrest at the house. A belief, however well founded, that an article sought is concealed in a dwelling house furnishes no justification for a search of that place without a warrant. Such searches are constitutionally unlawful notwithstanding facts unquestionably showing probable cause. Wilson v. People, 156 Colo. 243, 398 P.2d 35 (1965); People v. Baird, 172 Colo. 112, 470 P.2d 20 (1970).

But inviting officer into home to transact business waives right of privacy. When one opens his home to the transaction of business and invites another to come in and trade with him, he waives his right to privacy in the home or premises, with relation to the person who accepts that invitation to trade. When the customer turns out to be a government agent, the seller cannot then complain that his privacy has been invaded so long as the agent does no more than buy his wares. Patterson v. People, 168 Colo. 417, 451 P.2d 445 (1969).

When one opens his home to the transaction of business and invites another to come and trade with him, he breaks the seal of sanctity and waives his right to privacy. People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971).

There is no unreasonable search when an undercover agent, posing as a willing participant in an unlawful transaction, gains entry by invitation and observes or is handed contraband. People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971); People v. Nisser, 189 Colo. 471, 542 P.2d 84 (1975).

But once police officers are illegally on premises, they may not make use of anything observed or seized therein to form the basis for a determination of probable cause to arrest the occupants. People v. Baird, 172 Colo. 112, 470 P.2d 20 (1970).

Police officer did not make a request to search defendant's residence merely by knocking on the door and identifying himself as a police officer. People v. Turner, 730 P.2d 333 (Colo. App. 1986).

No invasion of privacy where officers knocked on the door of defendant's house to investigate possible traffic offense. People v. Baker, 813 P.2d 331 (Colo. 1991).

Police officer's testimony was properly allowed when the officer testified that the defendant slammed the door in the officer's face after the officer identified himself as a police officer because there was no evidence that the officer requested to search the premises before the door was slammed. People v. Turner, 730 P.2d 333 (Colo. App. 1986).

Arrest during perpetration of crime. There is no constitutional requirement for an arrest warrant when the arrest is effected in the motel room of another during the perpetration of a crime. People v. Velasquez, 641 P.2d 943 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 459 U.S. 805, 103 S. Ct. 28, 74 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1982), reh'g denied, 459 U.S. 1138, 103 S. Ct. 774, 74 L. Ed. 2d 986 (1983).

Answering defendant's telephone following arrest not unconstitutional. Where for over an hour following the defendant's arrest the officers continued to answer the telephone which rang repeatedly, and the court permitted these officers to testify as to conversations that they had over the phone with unidentified persons on the other end of the line relating to inquiries as to odds and placing of bets and the defendant contended that "seizure" of the contents of these telephone calls was unconstitutional, there were no perceived violations of the United States or Colorado constitution. McNulty v. People, 174 Colo. 494, 483 P.2d 946 (1971).

And arrest not invalidated by misapprehension as to officer's identity. An arrest made by reason of observed violation of law is not invalid because of the fact that the arresting officer was invited into a home under a misapprehension of his identity by the home's occupant, which misapprehension was known to the arresting officer. People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971).

Arrest can only be justified by information available to officer immediately prior to arrest. The discovery of contraband on the person of one who is unlawfully arrested does not validate an arrest. People v. Nelson, 172 Colo. 456, 474 P.2d 158 (1970); People v. Feltch, 174 Colo. 383, 483 P.2d 1335 (1971).

And prior record of arrest, in and of itself, cannot justify repeated intrusions on person's constitutional rights. Cowdin v. People, 176 Colo. 466, 491 P.2d 569 (1971).

Full search of person in custody, including trace metal test, is reasonable, and evidence of and comment on refusal of defendant to comply with lawful request for nontestimonial evidence is proper where probative value of evidence outweighs prejudicial effect. People v. Larson, 782 P.2d 840 (Colo. App. 1989).

Police are permitted to search a lawfully arrested person and the area within the arrestee's immediate control. People v. Aguilar, 897 P.2d 84 (Colo. 1995).

Acts of one member do not give probable cause to arrest whole group. The furtive acts of one of a hippy group, which was apparently together for an utterly innocent reason, do not give an officer cause to arrest the whole group. People v. Feltch, 174 Colo. 383, 483 P.2d 1335 (1971).

Police to identify selves before forced entry. Even with a valid warrant, before police officers attempt a forced entry into a house, they must first identify themselves and make their purpose known. People v. Godinas, 176 Colo. 391, 490 P.2d 945 (1971).

Forceful, warrantless entry into an apartment by police officers for purposes of securing the apartment until a search warrant arrived was in violation of defendants' constitutional rights. People v. Hannah, 183 Colo. 9, 514 P.2d 320 (1973).

Exceptions. When police officers attempt a forced entry, they must first identify themselves and make their purpose known, unless (1) the warrant expressly authorizes forced entry without such a prior announcement, or (2) the circumstances known to such officer or person at the time of forced entry, but, in the case of the execution of a warrant, unknown to the applicant when applying for such warrant, give him probable cause to believe that (a) such notice is likely to result in the evidence subject to seizure being easily and quickly destroyed or disposed of, which is true in every case involving a search for narcotics, (b) such notice is likely to endanger the life or safety of the officer or other person, (c) such notice is likely to enable the party to be arrested to escape, or (d) such notice would be a useless gesture. People v. Lujan, 174 Colo. 554, 484 P.2d 1238 (1971).

And officers must show circumstances justifying forced entry. Where the notice and purpose requirement is to be dispensed with, the officers must sustain the burden of showing the exigent circumstances under which they assumed the power to enter forcibly. People v. Lujan, 174 Colo. 554, 484 P.2d 1238 (1971).

Forceful entries need not involve the actual breaking of doors and windows. People v. Godinas, 176 Colo. 391, 490 P.2d 945 (1971).

But forced entries may include any entries made without permission. People v. Godinas, 176 Colo. 391, 490 P.2d 945 (1971).

Circumstances need not always be determined by magistrate prior to forced entry. Police discretion should not always be limited by requiring that the exigent circumstances authorizing forced entry without prior announcement be determined by the magistrate, since in many instances, the facts requiring immediate entry by force will not be known to the officer when he obtains the warrant. People v. Lujan, 174 Colo. 554, 484 P.2d 1238 (1971).

Forced entry found where officers, acting without a "no-knock" search warrant, identified themselves to unidentified persons sitting on front porch of house who were not apparently owners or occupiers of the house, opened a closed but unlocked door, and, once inside the house, identified themselves to wife of defendant and indicated to her that a search warrant had been issued. People v. Gifford, 782 P.2d 795 (Colo. 1989).

Prosecution must demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that an occupant freely gave the police consent to enter the premises. In the course of making an inquiry, a police officer is not entitled to walk past the person opening the door to a house without obtaining permission to enter the house. People v. O'Hearn, 931 P.2d 1168 (Colo. 1997).

One area traditionally recognized as deserving of special protection from unwarranted government intrusion is the area immediately surrounding a private residence, or the curtilage. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989).

Fact that search occurs within curtilage is not dispositive, if area's public accessibility dispels any reasonable expectation of privacy. People v. Shorty, 731 P.2d 679 (Colo. 1987).

Gate entrance held open to the public that led to basement, along with basement lights being on and defendant's evasive responses to questions about co-inhabitants of premises, supported trial court's conclusion that officers had a reasonable basis to walk onto the premises through open gate and knock on basement door. People v. Cruse, 58 P.3d 1114 (Colo. App. 2002).

In general, a curtilage is not protected from observations that are lawfully made from outside its perimeter not involving physical intrusion. The U.S. supreme court has identified four factors to consider in defining the extent of a home's curtilage: The proximity of the area claimed to be curtilage to the home; whether the area is included within an enclosure surrounding the home; the nature of the uses to which the area is put; and the steps taken by the resident to protect the area from observation by people passing by. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989); People v. Bartley, 791 P.2d 1222 (Colo. App. 1990), aff'd, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991).

Police entry into curtilage of premises held reasonable. Blincoe v. People, 178 Colo. 34, 494 P.2d 1285 (1972).

Flying over a person's back yard in a helicopter to determine whether such person is cultivating marijuana constitutes a search for the purposes of the fourth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and if done without a warrant, it is an illegal search. People v. Pollock, 796 P.2d 63 (Colo. App. 1990).

Television news helicopter flyover of private residence did not constitute a search where helicopter flew within permissible FAA altitude range, posed limited degree of intrusiveness, and where marijuana plants growing in shed were in plain view to anyone legally observing the shed from helicopter. Henderson v. People, 879 P. 2d 383 (Colo. 1994).

Motion to suppress was properly denied where information obtained by an airplane flight was not necessary to the validity of the affidavit for search warrant since information obtained independently of that aerial survey supplied probable cause for issuance of a warrant to search the defendant's property for stolen wheat and vehicles that transported it. Bartley v. People, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991).

Where constitutionally admissible evidence establishing the defendant's guilt was overwhelming, the admission of evidence gained by flying over the defendant's property, including photographs taken during that flight, even if impermissibly received, was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Bartley v. People, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991).

Where defendant did not object at trial, review was for plain error and to determine whether testimony by police that defendant refused a search of his home so affected the fundamental fairness of the trial as to cast serious doubt on the reliability of the judgment of conviction, but, because evidence of defendant's guilt was so overwhelming, any error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Perry, 68 P.3d 472 (Colo. App. 2002).

This section did not require suppression of the information obtained from an airplane flight, even if it was assumed that the objects photographed were within the curtilage on defendant's property, where there is no contention that the flight path or altitude of the airplane violated any applicable law or regulation or that the information obtained was not visible to the naked eye. People v. Bartley, 791 P.2d 1222 (Colo. App. 1990), aff'd, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991).

For history of rule of prior notice by police officers, see People v. Lujan, 174 Colo. 554, 484 P.2d 1238 (1971).

Searches conducted by prison officials, whose charge is to operate the prisons in a safe and orderly manner, are not unreasonable so long as they are not conducted for the purpose of harassing or humiliating an inmate, or in a cruel and unusual manner. Larkin v. People, 177 Colo. 156, 493 P.2d 1 (1972); People v. Valenzuela, 41 Colo. App. 375, 589 P.2d 71 (1978).

Where defendant, knowing the jailer's presence was imminent, voluntarily stated that he was one who shot victim, jailer's overhearing of statement was not violation of defendant's right to privacy under this section. People v. Gallegos, 179 Colo. 211, 499 P.2d 315 (1972).

Body cavity searches of inmates of penal institutions are permissible unless it can be demonstrated that such searches bear no reasonable relationship to the requirements of maintaining security. People v. Valenzuela, 41 Colo. App. 375, 589 P.2d 71 (1978).

Warrantless searches of penitentiary visitors rejected. Suggestion of the attorney general that warrantless searches of penitentiary visitors and their automobiles should be permitted under a relaxed standard of probable cause and that perhaps reasonable suspicion would be sufficient to support such searches was rejected. People v. Thompson, 185 Colo. 208, 523 P.2d 128 (1974).

But could require consent to search as condition of visiting penitentiary. The court did recognize that circumstances involving penitentiary visitation and the bringing of contraband into a penitentiary could be a basis for the adoption of strict rules to be properly posted which would include consent to search as a condition of exercising the privilege of entering the penal institution to visit a prisoner. People v. Thompson, 185 Colo. 208, 523 P.2d 128 (1974).

Searches by public school officials. The prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures applies to searches conducted by public school officials. To determine the reasonableness of a search and seizure involving a student, the student's expectation of privacy shall be balanced against the "substantial interest of teachers and administrators in maintaining discipline in the classroom and school grounds" and the school's "legitimate need to maintain an environment in which learning can take place". The test under New Jersey v. T.L.O. (469 U.S. 325, 105 S. Ct. 733, 83 L. Ed. 2d 720 (1985)) to determine the legality of school searches involves a twofold inquiry: First, whether the action was justified at its inception; and second, whether the search as actually conducted was reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the initial interference. People in Interest of P.E.A., 754 P.2d 382 (Colo. 1988); Martinez v. Sch. Dist. No. 60, 852 P.2d 1275 (Colo. App. 1992).

The first prong of the test, that a search is justified at its inception, is satisfied if there are specific and articulable facts known to the officer which, with rational inferences, creates a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. This standard has been met where search of a student's vehicle by principal and security officer was based on a police officer's information that two other minors had brought marijuana to school, search of these two minors and their lockers failed to reveal the marijuana, and the principal had further information that one of the searched minors had been driven to school by the student. In view of the substantial state interests triggered by the contemplated sale of marijuana to other students, the measures taken by school officials in search of the student, his locker, and his car, which provided the means for transporting the marijuana to the school and for concealing the contraband, were reasonably related to the objectives of the search. As such, the second prong of the test, that the scope of the search be reasonable, was satisfied. People in Interest of P.E.A., 754 P.2d 382 (Colo. 1988); People in Interest of F.M., 754 P.2d 390 (Colo. 1988).

The two-prong test was met where a monitor for a school dance required two students attending the dance to submit to a "breath test" to determine whether the students were under the influence of alcohol. Martinez v. Sch. Dist. No. 60, 852 P.2d 1275 (Colo. App. 1992).

Detention for questioning. In order lawfully to detain an individual for questioning, (1) the officer must have a reasonable suspicion that the individual has committed, or is about to commit, a crime; (2) the purpose of the detention must be reasonable; and (3) the character of the detention must be reasonable when considered in light of the purpose. Stone v. People, 174 Colo. 504, 485 P.2d 495 (1971); People v. Lidgren, 739 P.2d 895 (Colo. App. 1987).

Detention for fingerprints may constitute a much less serious intrusion upon personal security than other types of police searches and detentions: Fingerprinting involves none of the probing into an individual's private life and thoughts that marks an interrogation or search; detention cannot be employed repeatedly to harass any individual, since the police need only one set of each person's prints; fingerprinting is an inherently more reliable and effective crime-solving tool than eyewitness identifications or confessions and is not subject to such abuses as the improper line-up and the "third degree"; and, because there is no danger of destruction of fingerprints, the limited detention need not come unexpectedly or at an inconvenient time. Early v. People, 178 Colo. 167, 496 P.2d 1021 (1972).

An intrusion pursuant to a court order for non-testimonial identification, under Crim. P. 41.1, clearly is within the scope of this section and the search and seizure clause of the fourth amendment. People v. Madson, 638 P.2d 18 (Colo. 1981); People v. Harris, 729 P.2d 1000 (Colo. App. 1986), aff'd, 762 P.2d 651 (Colo. 1988), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 985, 109 S. Ct. 541, 103 L. Ed. 2d 804 (1988).

Arrest of defendant for palmprinting may be reasonable. Early v. People, 178 Colo. 167, 496 P.2d 1021 (1972).

And evidence obtained thereby is properly received in evidence. Early v. People, 178 Colo. 167, 496 P.2d 1021 (1972).

Stopping motorist at a sobriety checkpoint is not an unreasonable seizure in violation of the constitution. People v. Rister, 803 P.2d 483 (Colo. 1990); Orr v. People, 803 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1990).

Warrantless administrative searches of commercial property do not necessarily violate the fourth amendment, but inspections of commercial property may be unreasonable if they are not authorized by law, are unnecessary for the furtherance of governmental interests, or are so random, infrequent, or unpredictable that the owner has no real expectation that his property will be inspected from time to time by governmental officials. People v. Escano, 843 P.2d 111 (Colo. App. 1992).

Warrantless search of storage locker held proper where officer reasonably believed that the lessor had authority to consent to the entry into the locker. The test is whether the police officer's belief that a third party had authority to consent is objectively reasonable. People v. Upshur, 923 P.2d 284 (Colo. App. 1996).

Contact between police and citizen constitutes seizure when police restrain citizen's liberty by physical force or show of authority. People v. Carillo-Montes, 796 P.2d 970 (Colo. 1990).

Determination of "seizure" resolved by objective standard. The determination of the issue whether a person has been seized must be resolved by an objective standard -- that is, whether in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave. People v. Bookman, 646 P.2d 924 (Colo. 1982); People v. Pancoast, 659 P.2d 1348 (Colo. 1982); People v. Tottenhoff, 691 P.2d 340 (Colo. 1984); People v. Carillo-Montes, 796 P.2d 970 (Colo. 1990).

Not every personal confrontation between a police officer and a citizen, which results in some form of interrogation directed to the citizen, necessarily involves a "seizure" of the person. People v. Pancoast, 659 P.2d 1348 (Colo. 1982); People v. T.H., 892 P.2d 301 (Colo. 1995).

Even if the totality of police officers' conduct rose to the level of a show of authority to constitute a seizure, evidence abandoned prior to the seizure cannot be suppressed. People v. McClain, 149 P.3d 787 (Colo. 2007).

An unconscious person cannot perceive that there has been a show of authority directed against him, therefore, defendant could not have been seized within the meaning of the fourth amendment. By the time defendant awoke, the officer had reasonable suspicion justifying the investigatory stop. Tate v. People, 2012 CO 75, 290 P.3d 1268.

A police officer's chase of a suspect does not trigger the protections of the fourth amendment because the chase does not constitute a seizure. People v. Archuleta, 980 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1999).

Whenever detention by police officer is more than brief, there is an arrest which must be supported by probable cause. People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982).

However, when determining when detention is too long in duration, it is appropriate to examine whether police were diligent in pursuing means of investigation likely to resolve their suspicions quickly, and it is also relevant to consider circumstances during stop which give rise to deeper suspicion or justify longer detention. People v. Lidgren, 739 P.2d 895 (Colo. App. 1987).

Police officers' initial contact with the defendant was not a seizure or an investigatory stop, but rather was a consensual interview. Because the officers approached the house in a non-threatening manner, did not detain the defendant, and asked rather than demanded the defendant's name, the totality of the circumstances showed that the encounter was not so intimidating as to make the defendant feel he was not free to leave or to refuse to answer the officers' questions. It was irrelevant that the officers went to the defendant's house intending to question him and obtain a search waiver. People v. Melton, 910 P.2d 672 (Colo. 1996).

Not all seizures are arrests. Not all forms of police intrusion which lead a person to reasonably believe that he is not free to leave constitute, on that basis alone, arrests which must be supported by probable cause. People v. Lewis, 659 P.2d 676 (Colo. 1983).

When a police officer accosts an individual and restrains his freedom to walk away, he has "seized" that person in a constitutional sense; but it does not follow that the seizure necessarily amounts to an arrest which must be supported by probable cause. People v. Lewis, 659 P.2d 676 (Colo. 1983).

Seizures refer to some meaningful interference with an individual's possessory interest in personal property such as the physical taking and removing of such property. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989).

A seizure must involve a meaningful interference with the possessory interest. The removal of a luggage claim tag does not constitute a seizure. However, when an officer moves the luggage to a new location, uses a ruse to identify the owner of the luggage, and maintains a prolonged detention of the luggage, a seizure occurs. People v. Ortega, 34 P.3d 986 (Colo. 2001).

Standing. Trial court is not required to decide issues of standing prior to hearing evidence as to legality of contested searches. People v. Tufts, 717 P.2d 485 (Colo. 1986).

Person in possession of keys to automobile has a reasonable expectation of privacy in contents of car and has standing to challenge search of car. People v. Tufts, 717 P.2d 485 (Colo. 1986).

To establish standing, the defendant must demonstrate a sufficient connection to the areas searched to support a legitimate expectation of privacy in those areas. Determination of a sufficient connection is based on the totality of the circumstances. The lack of a proprietary or possessory interest is not necessarily determinative. People v. Curtis, 959 P.2d 434 (Colo. 1998).

To challenge a search and seizure, the complaining party must establish that he had a reasonable expectation that the location searched and the items seized would be free from nonconsensual, unreasonable police intrusion. People v. Mickens, 734 P.2d 646 (Colo. App. 1986).

Facts provided by anonymous caller and corroborated by officers provided reasonable basis to support stopping of car. People v. Melanson, 937 P.2d 826 (Colo. App. 1996).

Observation through motel window not search. Where a police officer, while walking on a sidewalk used as a common entrance way to a motel unit, observes through a window the actions of a defendant occurring inside a motel unit, the observations of the officer do not constitute a search in the constitutional sense of that term. People v. Gomez, 632 P.2d 586 (Colo. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 943, 102 S. Ct. 1439, 71 L. Ed. 2d 655 (1982); People v. Donald, 637 P.2d 392 (Colo. 1981).

The observations of a police officer which are made through a car window and which are illuminated by a flashlight do not constitute a search. People v. Romero, 767 P.2d 1225 (Colo. 1989); People v. Dickinson, 928 P.2d 1309 (Colo. 1996).

No requirement of "close proximity" standard for forfeiture of contents of building declared a public nuisance. Since forfeiture statute is a civil statute, once the people make a prima facie case that contents of a house were used in criminal activity, burden shifts to the owner of the property to show why it should not be seized. People v. Lot 23, 735 P.2d 184 (Colo. 1987).

Ordering nontestimonial identification under rule Crim. P. 41.1 does not deprive a person of procedural safeguards even though the offenses involved were committed in another jurisdiction. Ginn v. County Court, 677 P.2d 1387 (Colo. App. 1984).

Rule Crim. P. 41.1 is limited to non-testimonial identification evidence only and does not authorize the acquisition of testimonial communications protected by the privilege against self-incrimination. People v. Harris, 729 P.2d 1000 (Colo. App. 1986).

Defendant's consent to search was voluntary and not the result of coercion. Defendant's parents provided guidance and advice before, during, and after the interrogation. The parents' position that they approved of DNA testing was consistent throughout. There is no requirement that the defendant's parents be present during the sample collection. People v. Lehmkuhl, 117 P.3d 98 (Colo. App. 2004).

Evidence offered for impeachment purposes of defendant's refusal to consent to a search does not impermissibly burden the fourth amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. If defendant testifies at trial, evidence of the refusal to consent may be admitted to impeach defendant's testimony, and the prosecution may comment on the refusal in closing argument. People v. Chavez, 190 P.3d 760 (Colo. App. 2007).

B. With Warrant.

Officers must obtain search warrant whenever reasonably practicable. Officers who plan to enter premises to conduct a search must obtain a search warrant for a legitimate entry whenever reasonably practicable even if the officers have probable cause for the search. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 421, 489 P.2d 593 (1971).

Only judicial officer may issue search warrant. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963).

And only judicial officer may alter warrant. The right to alter, modify, or correct a search warrant is necessarily vested only in a judicial officer. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963).

Alteration by police office improper. Alteration of a search warrant by a police officer is usurpation of the judicial function and, therefore, improper. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963).

Failure to comply with ministerial requirements does not invalidate warrant. Failure to comply with the requirements of a rule relating to the making of the return and inventory, which requirements are ministerial in nature, does not render the search warrant or the seizure of the property pursuant thereto invalid. People v. Schmidt, 172 Colo. 285, 473 P.2d 698 (1970).

Copy of affidavit need not be attached. There is nothing which requires that a person given a warrant must receive a copy of the underlying affidavit or that a copy thereof must be attached to the copy of the warrant which is served at the time of the search. People v. Papez, 652 P.2d 619 (Colo. App. 1982).

Omission of affiant's name on the face of a search warrant was an immaterial variance which did not invalidate warrant where proper affidavit had been executed by an officer and reviewed by a judge prior to issuance. People v. McKinstry, 843 P.2d 18 (Colo. 1993).

Search warrant should not be broader than justifying basis of facts. People v. Clavey, 187 Colo. 305, 530 P.2d 491 (1975).

The information upon which the warrant was based justified a general search of the premises. People v. Lot 23, 707 P.2d 1001 (Colo. App. 1985), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 735 P.2d 184 (Colo. 1987).

Having probable cause to search for drugs and paraphernalia, the officers were authorized to search in places where such items might reasonably be expected to be secreted. Therefore, the search of closed containers was reasonable. People v. Lot 23, 707 P.2d 1001 (Colo. App. 1985), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 735 P.2d 184 (Colo. 1987).

Particularity requirement serves multiple purposes. It prevents a general search, it curtails the issuance of search warrants on loose and vaguely stated bases in fact, and it prevents the seizure of one thing under a warrant describing another. People v. Hearty, 644 P.2d 302 (Colo. 1982); People v. Hart, 718 P.2d 538 (Colo. 1986).

Probable cause requires that the affidavit allege sufficient facts to warrant a person of reasonable caution to believe that contraband or evidence of criminal activity is located on the premises to be searched. People v. Ball, 639 P.2d 1078 (Colo. 1982); People v. Hearty, 644 P.2d 302 (Colo. 1982); People v. Campbell, 678 P.2d 1035 (Colo. App. 1983); People v. Arellano, 791 P.2d 1135 (Colo. 1990); People v. Abeyta, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990); People v. Hakel, 870 P.2d 1224 (Colo. 1994).

There was reasonable probability that evidence would be located at a particular location where affidavit established that all three residences were under defendant's control and were contiguous pieces of property. People v. Salazar, 715 P.2d 1265 (Colo. App. 1985), cert. denied, 744 P.2d 80 (Colo. 1987).

In a trial against a defendant for possession of a controlled substance, evidence obtained pursuant to a search warrant was inadmissible where the affidavit supporting the request for a search warrant, after excluding information obtained pursuant to an illegal warrantless search of the defendant's home, contained insufficient information to establish probable cause that evidence of a crime would be found in the defendant's house. People v. Sprowl, 790 P.2d 848 (Colo. App. 1989).

An affidavit must be interpreted in a common sense and realistic fashion in determining whether the constitutional standard of probable cause has been satisfied. People v. Arellano, 791 P.2d 1138 (Colo. 1990); Bartley v. People, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991); People v. Hakel, 870 P.2d 1224 (Colo. 1994).

In assessing the validity of a warrant, it is to be tested in a common sense and realistic fashion. People v. McKinstry, 843 P.2d 18 (Colo. 1993).

Standard for determining whether a search warrant complies with constitutional requirements is one of practical accuracy rather than technical nicety. Accordingly, highly technical attacks on warrants and affidavits are not well received. People v. McKinstry, 843 P.2d 18 (Colo. 1993); People v. Martinez, 898 P.2d 28 (Colo. 1995); People v. Schrader, 898 P.2d 33 (Colo. 1995).

Probable cause exists when an affidavit for a search warrant alleges sufficient facts to warrant a person of reasonable caution to believe that contraband or evidence of criminal activity is located at the place to be searched. People v. Abeyta, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990); Bartley v. People, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991); People v. Hakel, 870 P.2d 1224 (Colo. 1994);

During a controlled drug transaction, probable cause exists to search the location to which the seller went before selling the drugs to the police. People v. Eirish, 165 P.3d 848 (Colo. App. 2007).

The issuing magistrate has to make a practical, common sense decision whether, given all of the circumstances set forth in the affidavit before him, including the "veracity" and "basis of knowledge" of persons supplying hearsay information, there is fair probability that contraband of a crime will be found in a particular place. People v. Abeyta, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990).

The duty of the reviewing court is to determine whether the magistrate had a substantial basis for concluding that probable cause existed; that determination of probable cause is entitled to great deference and any doubts must be resolved in favor of that determination because of the constitutional preference for investigating officers to obtain warrants in lieu of pursuing some basis for warrantless searches. People v. Dunkin, 888 P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1994); People v. Page, 907 P.2d 624 (Colo. App. 1995).

Whether facts in an affidavit provided by a confidential informant establish probable cause for a search warrant depends not on a rigid set of legal rules but on a practical, nontechnical totality of the circumstances approach that considers an informant's veracity, reliability, and basis of knowledge. Under the totality-of-the-circumstances test, an informant's account of criminal activities need not establish the informant's basis of knowledge, so long as the informant's statement is sufficiently detailed to allow a judge to reasonably conclude that the informant had access to reliable information about the illegal activities reported to the police. People v. Abeyta, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990); People v. Dunkin, 888 P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1994).

Due consideration should also be given to a law enforcement officer's experience and training in determining the significance of the officer's observations relevant to probable cause set forth in the affidavit. Bartley v. People, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991); People v. Dunkin, 888 P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1994).

Probability, not certainty, is the touchstone of probable cause, and deference should be given to the initial judicial determination regarding probable cause; however, in recognition of the significance of a person's right to privacy in his or her residence, law enforcement officials should in all but the most compelling of circumstances obtain warrants prior to performing any search of a residence. People v. Hakel, 870 P.2d 1224 (Colo. 1994).

Even if an affidavit does not establish the informant's basis of knowledge for the reported criminal activity or the veracity of the reported information, police corroboration of the information that obviously relates to and describes criminal activities may properly be considered in a probable cause determination. People v. Abeyta, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990).

A strip search is outside the scope of a warrant for search "upon person". A strip search must be specifically authorized by a warrant that includes an articulable basis for the more invasive search or by officers having particularized reasonable suspicion that the defendant has hidden contraband on his or her body. People v. King, 292 P.3d 959 (Colo. App. 2011).

Warrant must particularly describe place to be searched. The fourth amendment and this section require that a warrant particularly describe the place to be searched.

It is required that the house or home to be searched must be particularly described or described as near as may be. People v. Avery, 173 Colo. 315, 478 P.2d 310 (1970).

Sufficiency of description in warrant of place to be searched. The test for determining whether the sufficiency of a description in a search warrant is adequate is if the officer executing the warrant can with reasonable effort ascertain and identify the place intended to be searched. People v. Ragulsky, 184 Colo. 86, 518 P.2d 286 (1974).

Where warrant stated that defendant owned several properties and ownership was independently verified, and where police independently established that informant knew how to reach defendant's property, the affidavit demonstrated reasonable grounds to believe the stolen goods would be found on defendant's property. People v. Salazar, 715 P.2d 1265 (Colo. App. 1985), cert. denied, 744 P.2d 80 (Colo. 1987).

Warrant which gives a generic description of the items to be searched is sufficient when the facts necessitate a broad search. People v. Hart, 718 P.2d 538 (Colo. 1986).

Particular apartment within apartment building must be described. When authority is desired to search a particular apartment or apartments within an apartment building, or a particular room or rooms within a multiple-occupancy structure, the warrant must sufficiently describe the apartment or subunit to be searched, either by number or other designation, or by the name of the tenant or occupant. People v. Avery, 173 Colo. 315, 478 P.2d 310 (1970); People v. Alarid, 174 Colo. 289, 483 P.2d 1331 (1971).

Where the warrant merely describes the entire multiple-occupancy structure by street address only, without reference to the particular dwelling unit or units sought to be searched, it is constitutionally insufficient and the evidence seized pursuant to such warrant will be suppressed upon proper motion. People v. Avery, 173 Colo. 315, 478 P.2d 310 (1970); People v. Alarid, 174 Colo. 289, 483 P.2d 1331 (1971).

A search of a subunit under a general warrant authorizing search of the entire structure but not the particular subunit is unlawful and evidence seized as a result of such search will be suppressed. People v. Avery, 173 Colo. 315, 478 P.2d 310 (1970).

Where a structure is divided into several occupancy units, or is a multi-unit dwelling, and there is no common occupancy of the entire structure by all of the tenants, a search warrant which merely describes or identifies the larger multiple-occupancy structure and not the particular sub-units to be searched is insufficient to meet the constitutional requirements of particularity of description. People v. Myrick, 638 P.2d 34 (Colo. 1981).

As apartment dwellers or roomers are entitled to same constitutional protections against unlawful searches and seizures as persons living in single-family residences. People v. Arnold, 181 Colo. 432, 509 P.2d 1248 (1973).

Exception where officers do not know that multi-family dwelling involved. The general rule of law when dealing with searches made in rooming houses or apartment houses is subject to an exception, among others, where the officers did not know nor did they have reason to know that they were dealing with a multi-family dwelling when obtaining the warrant, and providing that they confined the search to the area which was occupied by the person or persons named in the affidavit. People v. Lucero, 174 Colo. 278, 483 P.2d 968 (1971); People v. Maes, 176 Colo. 430, 491 P.2d 59

Search warrant failing to designate subunits of multiple-occupancy structure to be searched met the requirement that place to be searched be described with particularity where it was reasonable for the police to conclude that the structure was not divided into subunits. People v. McGill, 187 Colo. 65, 528 P.2d 386 (1974).

When the police executed the warrant and discovered that the building was not a single-family residence, as the warrant described, but was instead divided into subunits, they did not have to abandon their search and obtain a new warrant, for had they elected to delay their search to obtain an amended warrant, they would have jeopardized the search and the loss of evidence. People v. McGill, 187 Colo. 65, 528 P.2d 386 (1974).

But when officers knew or should have known that house was not one-family residence, and the fact that the officers had notice of the separate dwelling facilities located in the basement of the residence was evident from the affidavit of an officer containing the facts provided by the confidential, reliable informant, which indicated that the downstairs rooms had been used as separate living quarters by nonfamily members on a possible rental basis and the record also indicated that there was a separate outside entrance leading to the basement apartment and that the tenant utilized the separate entrance in going to and from the apartment, the general rule as to multiple-occupancy structures was applicable, and a warrant describing the entire house by street address only was constitutionally insufficient since no facts were presented which could show that there was probable cause to believe that criminal activity was occurring in both dwelling places. People v. Alarid, 174 Colo. 289, 483 P.2d 1331 (1971).

Warrant describing house as within Denver when in fact the house lay one-half block outside Denver was not for that reason invalid. People v. Martinez, 898 P.2d 28 (Colo. 1995).

Where warrant specified a street address adjacent to defendant's residence and owned by the same owner, and defendant's residence was not itself searched, both the warrant and the search were valid. People v. Schrader, 898 P.2d 33 (Colo. 1995).

The fourth amendment generally requires officers to knock before executing a search warrant except when the warrant specifically authorizes a "no-knock" or the particular facts and circumstances known to the officer at the time the warrant is executed adequately justify dispensing with the requirement to knock. In this case the officers had reasonable suspicion that knocking would result in destruction of the drugs subject to seizure. People v. King, 292 P.3d 959 (Colo. App. 2011).

Search must be one in which officers look for specific articles. A search, whether under a valid warrant or as incident to a lawful arrest, must be one in which the officers are looking for specific articles and must be conducted in a manner reasonably calculated to uncover such article; any more extensive search constitutes a general exploratory search and is contrary to the constitutional guarantee against unreasonable search and seizure. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963); People v. Drumright, 172 Colo. 577, 475 P.2d 329 (1970).

To countenance seizure of evidence not specified in the warrant and unrelated to the criminal matters under investigation would open wide the doors to general searches and seizures based upon mere suspicion but not upon probable cause as constitutionally required. People v. LaRocco, 178 Colo. 196, 496 P.2d 314

An entire search would only seem to become invalid if its general tenor was that of an exploratory search for evidence not specifically related to the search warrant. People v. Tucci, 179 Colo. 373, 500 P.2d 815 (1972); People v. Lewis, 710 P.2d 1110 (Colo. App. 1985).

Personal property of guest on premises is not subject to search under search warrant. People v. Lujan, 174 Colo. 554, 484 P.2d 1238 (1971).

Where probable cause exists for arrest, search of personal property of guests of a house subject to a search warrant is a lawful search. People v. Tufts, 717 P.2d 485 (Colo. 1986).

Description in warrant of articles to be seized. Description of items in a search warrant to be seized must be specific. People v. Clavey, 187 Colo. 305, 530 P.2d 491 (1975); People v. Donahue, 750 P.2d 921 (Colo. 1988).

Technical requirements of elaborate specificity of articles to be seized by warrant once enacted under common-law pleadings have no proper place in this area. People v. Schmidt, 172 Colo. 285, 473 P.2d 698 (1970).

The rationale concerning the degree of particularity of description for a search warrant is stated to be one of necessity. If the purpose of the search is to find a specific item of property, it should be so particularly described in the warrant as to preclude the possibility of the officer seizing the wrong property; whereas, on the other hand, if the purpose is to seize not a specific property, but any property of a specified character, which by reason of its character is illicit or contraband, a specific particular description of the property is unnecessary and it may be described generally as to its nature or character. People v. Schmidt, 172 Colo. 285, 473 P.2d 698 (1970).

If the purpose of search is to seize, not a specific property, but any property of a specified character, which by reason of its character is illicit or contraband, a specific particular description of the property is unnecessary and it may be described generally as to its nature or character. People v. Benson, 176 Colo. 421, 490 P.2d 1287 (1971).

Where the search warrant correctly described a $20 bill with the exception of the last character of the serial number which was illegible, the likelihood of defendant's possession of another bill with nine identical characters, all in the same sequential order, and having a different tenth character from the bill described in the search warrant was highly improbable, and hence, there was probable cause to seize the $20 bill. There was reasonable certainty of description. People v. Piwtorak, 174 Colo. 525, 484 P.2d 1227 (1971).

The term "narcotic paraphernalia" is not so vague as to make a search warrant a general warrant. People v. Henry, 173 Colo. 523, 482 P.2d 357 (1971).

Where the affidavit contains information which justifies the magistrate in believing that upon a search of the particular premises not only marijuana but other narcotics might be found, a warrant describing "a quantity of narcotic drugs" is in order. People v. Benson, 176 Colo. 421, 490 P.2d 1287 (1971).

Command portion of search warrant which read: "you are therefore commanded to search forthwith the _____ above described property for the property described" did not render the warrant insufficient on its face where the property to be searched had been specifically described "above" two times and where the property to be seized likewise had been described above as "amphetamines, barbiturates, opium, opium derivatives, and other synthetic narcotics and implements used in the traffic and in the use of narcotic drugs". People v. Ragulsky, 184 Colo. 86, 518 P.2d 286 (1974).

Computers reasonably likely to serve as "containers" for writings or the functional equivalent of "written and printed material", thus seizure and removal of computers for a subsequent search pursuant to a second, more detailed warrant, was authorized by warrant allowing seizure of written or printed material. People v. Gall, 30 P.3d 145 (Colo. 2001).

Warrant authorized search and seizure of all computer and non-computer equipment and written materials in plaintiff's house, without any mention of any particular crime to which they might be related, essentially authorizing a general exploratory rummaging through plaintiff's belongings for any unspecified criminal offense, and was therefore invalid under the particularity clause of the fourth amendment. Mink v. Knox, 613 F.3d 995 (10th Cir. 2010).

If items not described with sufficient particularity, they should be suppressed. All times seized under a search warrant that failed to describe the things to be seized with sufficient particularity should be suppressed. People ex rel. McKevitt v. Harvey, 176 Colo. 447, 491 P.2d 563 (1971).

Insufficient description. Where, in the space provided in the warrant for the description of the property to be seized, there appeared a description of the location of the home of the defendant, and this incorrect language doubtless was inserted by mistake, and the person who completed the warrant intended to insert the required description of the property to be seized, this was, however, not the type of mere "technical omission" that was excused in previous cases. It goes rather to the very essence of the constitutional requirement that a warrant describes the person or thing to be seized, as near as may be. People v. Drumright, 172 Colo. 577, 475 P.2d 329 (1970).

Proper procedure where officer holds defective search warrant. Where an officer holds a defective search warrant, the procedure of returning the warrant to the judicial officer who issued it while other officers remain on the premises conforms to the constitutional requirements that govern search and seizure. Mayorga v. People, 178 Colo. 106, 496 P.2d 304 (1972).

Unsuccessful attempt to force entry without express authority does not render subsequent warranted search invalid. Where police attempted an unauthorized "no knock" entry but actual entry was carried out as authorized by warrant, subsequent search and seizure was not rendered invalid by mere attempt to force entry. People v. Fox, 691 P.2d 349 (Colo. App. 1984).

Entire business record system searched. When the alleged crime involves the entire business operation of the place searched, all files of the business may be searched. People v. Lewis, 710 P.2d 1110 (Colo. App. 1985).

Warrant not required for searching lawfully seized property. A second search warrant is not required to open a safe seized during a lawful search. People v. Press, 633 P.2d 489 (Colo. App. 1981).

Subpoena limiting scope of records in tax investigation meets constitutional standards. Where the department of revenue was investigating personal and business tax liability and the subpoena limited the scope of the records by subject and date, the documents sought were relevant and identified specifically enough to meet constitutional standards. Charnes v. DiGiacomo, 200 Colo. 94, 612 P.2d 1117 (1980).

Search of law office must be limited. Any search of a law office for client files and materials must be precisely limited and restricted to prevent an exploratory search. Law

Offices of Bernard D. Morley, P.C. v. MacFarlane, 647 P.2d 1215 (Colo. 1982).

Rigid adherence to the particularity requirement is appropriate where a lawyer's office is searched for designated documents. Anything less than a strict limitation of the search and seizure to those documents particularly described in the warrant could result in a wholesale incursion into privileged communications of a highly sensitive nature. People v. Hearty, 644 P.2d 302 (Colo. 1982).

Privacy interests relating to law office searches. There is an enhanced privacy interest underlying the attorney-client relationship which warrants a heightened degree of judicial protection and supervision when law offices are the subject of a search for client files or documents. Law Offices of Bernard D. Morley, P.C. v. MacFarlane, 647 P.2d 1215 (Colo. 1982).

The unmonitored search of a lawyer's office endangers the privacy interest not only of those clients against whom the search is directed but also the privacy interest of other clients not under investigation who have made confidential disclosures to the attorney. Law Offices of Bernard D. Morley, P.C. v. MacFarlane, 647 P.2d 1215 (Colo. 1982) (concurring opinion).

In considering the staleness of a search, in addition to the length of time between the commission of a crime and a search warrant application, the court must also consider the elapsed time between the date the police had probable cause to secure a warrant and the date the warrant was issued. People v. Thrower, 670 P.2d 1251 (Colo. App. 1983); People v. Tafoya, 703 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1985).

Expiration of previous warrant's 90-day period for completing a forensic analysis of seized items did not bar law enforcement from initiating another investigation and subsequently obtaining a new warrant two years later to search the same, previously searched items. People v. Strauss, 180 P.3d 1027 (Colo. 2008).

Information contained in affidavit not stale. When only one day had elapsed between the acquisition of probable cause and execution of the warrant, and less than three weeks between the alleged crime and the execution, the information contained in the affidavit was not stale. People v. Salazar, 715 P.2d 1265 (Colo. App. 1985), cert. denied, 744 P.2d 80 (Colo. 1987).

The lack of specific times and dates within the affidavit was not fatal to the probable cause determination and the allegations of three anonymous informants were not stale where the detective spoke with the informants within a two week period prior to the application for the warrant, where there was a fair inference that the informants were referring to contemporary incidents that were ongoing, and where the informants' information was corroborated by the detective. People v. Abeyta, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990).

Warrant not stale simply through passage of time where the nature of the criminal activity at issue and the type of records being sought in the warrant support the belief that the items would still be found in the place to be searched at the time the search was conducted. Defendant would have kept the records sought in the normal course of business and there was no reason to believe that the defendant had been aware of the audit's findings or would have otherwise had cause to destroy the records. People v. Crippen, 223 P.3d 114 (Colo. 2010); People v. Krueger, 2012 COA 80, __ P.3d __.

The link between suspected criminal activity and a specific location to be searched may be established by circumstantial evidence and proper inferences drawn therefrom. People v. Hakel, 870 P.2d 1224 (Colo.

Informant's personal knowledge of defendant's prior conduct, together with the observations of other officials of defendant's conduct in connection with two cocaine sales, established the nexus between the items to be seized and the place to be searched necessary to support the county court judge's finding of probable cause to issue search warrant for the defendant's residence. People v. Hakel, 870 P.2d 1224 (Colo. 1994).

Defendant's treatment of stolen watch as his own and the likelihood of keeping the watch at his residence with other possessions, coupled with fact that the watch theft had occurred only one day before the issuance of the search warrant, raised a reasonable inference that the stolen watch was still under defendant's control and easily concealed at residence. People v. Green, 70 P.3d 1213 (Colo. 2003).

Evidence suppressed where seizure of items pursuant to search warrant followed an invalid entry. People v. Gifford, 782 P.2d 795 (Colo. 1989).

Suppression order reversed. Even though initial entry into a house was illegal, evidence seized from the house after a valid warrant was obtained was admissible, so long as the warrant was based upon legally obtained evidence. The undisputed facts support the independent source doctrine as an exception to the exclusionary rule. People v. Morley, 4 P.3d 1078 (Colo. 2000).

Where an affidavit includes illegally obtained evidence as well as evidence derived from independent and lawful sources, a valid search warrant may issue if the lawfully obtained evidence, considered by itself, establishes probable cause to issue the warrant. Bartley v. People, 817 P.2d 1029 (Colo. 1991).

If a law enforcement officer includes a false statement in an affidavit intentionally or with reckless disregard for the truth, the statement must be stricken and the remaining allegations must be reviewed to determine whether probable cause exists; however, if the erroneous statement is the result of the good faith mistake or negligence of an officer-affiant, appropriate sanctions need only be imposed at the discretion of the trial court. People v. Flores, 766 P.2d 114 (Colo. 1988); People v. Dunkin, 888 P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1994).

A court may sever deficient portions of a search warrant without invalidating the entire warrant. When a warrant lists several locations to be searched, a court may suppress evidence recovered at a location for which police lacked probable cause but admit evidence recovered at locations for which probable cause was established. Under this severability doctrine, items that are illegally seized during the execution of a valid search warrant do not affect admissibility of evidence legally obtained while executing the warrant. People v. Eirish, 165 P.3d 848 (Colo. App. 2007).

Trial court improperly suppressed evidence obtained by search warrant after dog sniff of public storage locker on grounds that dog sniff did not constitute search or that dog sniff constituted valid warrantless search based upon reasonable suspicion. People v. Wieser, 796 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1990).

Probable cause to issue a search warrant for a residence was sufficiently established by affidavit that was based primarily on information provided by confidential police informant and only thinly corroborated by independent police investigation. The "totality of circumstances" test for determining whether probable cause existed for issuing warrant was met. People v. Paquin, 811 P.2d 394 (Colo. 1991).

Affidavit that indicated excessive use of electricity for the residence and investigator's discussion of that information with DEA representative indicating a drug lab was probable, when read in a practical, common sense fashion, was sufficient evidence to establish probable cause to search defendant's residence. People v. Dunkin, 888 P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1994).

Whether the purpose of the intrusion was objectively reasonable in light of the circumstances confronting the officer at the time of the search is dispositive of the validity of a search and not an officer's subjective intent. People v. Daverin, 967 P.2d 629 (Colo. 1998).

Once defendant was within the geographical area covered by the arrest warrant the officer had probable cause to stop his vehicle. People v. Daverin, 967 P.2d 629 (Colo. 1998).

Where there is evidence that everyone in a place described in a search warrant may be involved in a criminal activity, there is probable cause to search the defendant's person. People v. Johnson, 805 P.2d 1156 (Colo. App. 1990).

Order for seizure of premises which may constitute a nuisance under forfeiture statutes does not amount to an order authorizing warrantless entry and search of premises. People v. Taube, 864 P.2d 123 (Colo. 1993).

Court's finding of probable cause to believe that a house constituted a public nuisance was not equivalent to a finding that probable cause existed to enter and search the contents of the house. People v. Taube, 864 P.2d 123 (Colo. 1993).

Probable cause for issuance of search warrant found in People v. Jones, 767 P.2d 236 (Colo. 1989).

Investigator's observations of defendant's hands, perception of distinct drug smell from defendant's clothing, defendant's verification of residential address, defendant's past involvement with drug manufacture, and distinct drug odor emanating from the residence established probable cause for issuance of a warrant to search the residence. People v. Cruse, 58 P.3d 1114 (Colo. App. 2002).

Alleged conduct of bringing the media into plaintiff's home to film and record his arrest exceeded the scope of the arrest warrant and amounted to an unreasonable execution of a warrant, thus violating plaintiff's fourth amendment rights. Robinson v. City and County of Denver, 39 F. Supp. 2d 1257 (D. Colo. 1999).

Court concluded that reasonable officers would have realized that bringing the media into a private home grossly exceeded the authorization provided by an arrest warrant, even though, as of the March 30, 1993, date law enforcement defendants went to defendant's home to execute the warrant, no reported court decisions expressly forbade law enforcement officials from doing so. Robinson v. City and County of Denver, 39 F. Supp. 2d 1257 (D. Colo. 1999).

A violation of the knock-and-announce rule does not permit suppression of any illegally obtained evidence found in the search; the only available remedy is a civil action. People v. Butler, 251 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2010).

At the time the law enforcement defendants brought the media into plaintiff's home, it was clearly established that the alleged actions exceeded the warrant's scope; undermined the particularity requirement; and, in so doing, violated plaintiff's rights under the fourth amendment. Accordingly, defendants sued in their individual capacities are not entitled to qualified immunity from plaintiff's fourth amendment claim. Robinson v. City and County of Denver, 39 F. Supp. 2d 1257 (D. Colo. 1999).

District attorney caused the issuance of a search warrant that lacked probable cause and particularity, thereby setting in motion a series of events that she knew or reasonably should have known would cause others to deprive plaintiff of his fourth amendment rights. Mink v. Knox, 613 F.3d 995 (10th Cir. 2010).

Because a reasonable person would not take statements in an editorial column as statements of facts by or about a university professor, no reasonable prosecutor could believe it was probable that publishing such statements constituted a crime warranting search and seizure of plaintiff's property. Mink v. Knox, 613 F.3d 995 (10th Cir. 2010).

C. Legal Search Without Warrant.

Law reviews. For article, "Logical Fallacies and the Supreme Court", see 59 U. Colo. L. Rev. 741 (1988). For article, "The Use of Drug-Sniffing Dogs in Criminal Prosecutions", see 19 Colo. Law. 2429 (1990). For aticle, "The Exigent Circumstances Exception to the Warrant Requirement", see 20 Colo. Law. 1167 (1991). For article, "Using Anonymous Informants to Establish Reasonable Suspicion for a Stop", see 32 Colo. Law. 61 (June 2003).

Exceptions to warrant requirement. Among the exceptions to the warrant requirement are "plain view", consent, search incident to arrest, and exigent circumstances such as hot pursuit of a fleeing felon, and seizure of goods in the process of destruction or removal. People v. Alexander, 193 Colo. 27, 561 P.2d 1263 (1977).

Not every search without a warrant is unreasonable or illegal. Larkin v. People, 177 Colo. 156, 493 P.2d 1 (1972); Dickerson v. People, 179 Colo. 146, 499 P.2d 1196 (1972).

Administrative demand for records of a closely regulated industry is not an unconstitutional warrantless search. Since non-consensual towing of motor vehicles is a closely regulated industry, a towing carrier had little expectation of privacy in its documentation of tows, the keeping of which was required by an agency rule under the authority of a state statute. The public utilities commission therefore could assess a civil penalty for the carrier's refusal to produce the records. Eddie's Leaf Spring v. PUC, 218 P.3d 326 (Colo. 2009).

However, warrantless searches and seizures per se unreasonable. The basic constitutional rule regarding warrantless searches and seizures is that they are per se unreasonable, subject to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions, such as, where the arresting officers were confronted with exigent circumstances which required immediate action. People v. Vaughns, 182 Colo. 328, 513 P.2d 196 (1973); People v. Gurule, 196 Colo. 562, 593 P.2d 319 (1978).

A search conducted without a warrant is prima facie invalid, unless it falls within the limits of one of several well-recognized "exceptions" to the warrant requirement. People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977).

A search without a warrant is presumed to violate the constitutional provisions forbidding unreasonable searches. People v. Williams, 200 Colo. 187, 613 P.2d 879 (1980).

A search conducted without a warrant issued upon probable cause is unconstitutional, subject to only a few well delineated exceptions. People v. Savage, 630 P.2d 1070 (Colo. 1981); People v. Wright, 804 P.2d 866 (Colo. 1991); People v. McMillan, 870 P.2d 493 (Colo. App. 1993); People v. Savedra, 907 P.2d 596 (Colo. 1995).

A warrantless intrusion into a home is presumptively unreasonable. People v. Bustam, 641 P.2d 968 (Colo. 1982); People v. Jansen, 713 P.2d 907

Warrantless searches are presumed to be unreasonable unless they satisfy an exception to the warrant requirement. People v. Carper, 876 P.2d 582 (Colo. 1994).

Warrantless searches and seizures are per se unreasonable unless they fall within a specific, clearly articulated exception to the warrant requirement such as an arrest based on probable cause or an investigatory stop justified based on reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997); People v. Ingram, 984 P.2d 597 (Colo. 1999).

A warrantless search and seizure is unreasonable unless justified by an established exception to the warrant clause of the fourth amendment. People v. Salazar, 964 P.2d 502 (Colo. 1998).

Warrantless searches and seizures are presumptively invalid under the fourth amendment to the United States Constitution and this section, subject only to a few specifically delineated exceptions. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989); People v. Martinez, 801 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1990); People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79 (Colo. App. 1992); People v. Taube, 864 P.2d 123 (Colo. 1993).

Warrantless search is invalid unless supported by probable cause and justified under one of the narrowly defined exceptions to the warrant requirement. People v. Higbee, 802 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1990).

Reasonableness requirement applicable to exceptions. Even within the scope of a given exception to the warrant requirement, the search must still meet the ultimate requirement of "reasonableness". People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977).

Warrantless search must satisfy reasonableness requirement even though search is within scope of established exception. People v. Boff, 766 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1988); People v. Martin, 806 P.2d 393 (Col. App. 1990); People v. McMillan, 870 P.2d 493 (Colo. App. 1993); People v. Patnode, 126 P.3d 249 (Colo. App. 2005).

Burden of proof in warrantless search and seizure. The burden of proof is upon the people to establish facts and circumstances which bring a warrantless search and seizure within one of the exceptions to the warrant requirements. People v. Boorem, 184 Colo. 233, 519 P.2d 939 (1974).

A warrantless search is presumptively illegal and the burden is upon the prosecution to establish a recognized exemption from the warrant requirements of the United States constitution and of the constitution of Colorado. People v. Neyra, 189 Colo. 367, 540 P.2d 1077 (1975); People v. Alexander, 193 Colo. 27, 561 P.2d 1263 (1977); People v. Amato, 193 Colo. 57, 562 P.2d 422 (1977).

The burden of proof is upon the prosecution to establish the existence of facts which render the warrantless entry truly imperative. People v. Hogan, 649 P.2d 326 (Colo. 1982).

The prosecution has the burden of proving that a warrantless search falls within a recognized exception to the warrant requirements. People v. Williams, 200 Colo. 187, 613 P.2d 879 (1980); People v. Jansen, 713 P.2d 907 (Colo. 1986); People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79 (Colo. App. 1992); Outlaw v. People, 17 P.3d 150 (Colo. 2001).

An arrest without a warrant is presumed to have been unconstitutional, and the prosecution has the burden of rebutting that presumption by showing both that the arrest was supported by probable cause and that it fell within a recognized exception to the warrant requirement. People v. Burns, 200 Colo. 387, 615 P.2d 686 (1980).

Where defendant is arrested without a warrant and moves to suppress evidence seized in course of his arrest, burden of proof is upon prosecution to prove constitutional validity of arrest and search. People v. Crow, 789 P.2d 1104 (Colo. 1990).

Burden of proof is on the prosecution to establish the existence of probable cause to arrest without a warrant. Unless the facts and circumstances known to an arresting officer at the time of the arrest amount to probable cause, seizure of a citizen effecting an arrest is unreasonable and violates constitutional rights. People v. Davis, 903 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1995).

The validity of a search must be determined by an objective analysis of the validity of the arrest warrant and the circumstances of its execution and not by an analysis of the officer's motives for executing the warrant. People v. Miller, 94 P.3d 1197 (Colo. App. 2004).

Whether warrantless police eavesdropping violates the fourth amendment depends on whether the defendant had a justified expectation of privacy at the time and place of the communication. People v. Palmer, 888 P.2d 348 (Colo. App. 1994).

Tape recording of defendant's conversation with accomplice made without his knowledge in the back of police car could properly be considered since, irrespective of defendant's subjective belief that his conversation while in the police vehicle was private, such belief was unreasonable and unjustified. People v. Palmer, 888 P.2d 348 (Colo. App. 1994).

Two bases furnishing justification for warrantless arrest in home. The only bases that conceivably could furnish a constitutional justification for a warrantless arrest in a home are exigent circumstances or consent. McCall v. People, 623 P.2d 397 (Colo. 1981).

In applying "emergency doctrine" to warrantless searches each case must be tested on its own particular facts. The test is reasonableness under the circumstances. Condon v. People, 176 Colo. 212, 489 P.2d 1297 (1971).

Obtaining evidence or seizing contraband under emergency doctrine must involve an immediate crisis and the probability that assistance will be helpful. People v. Amato, 193 Colo. 57, 562 P.2d 422 (1977).

Emergency doctrine has been treated as a variant of the exigent circumstances exception to the warrant requirement. People v. Amato, 193 Colo. 57, 562 P.2d 422 (1977).

But officers' generalized speculation that chemicals or waste products could be present, and that those chemicals might be improperly dumped and mixed, which, in turn, might result in an explosion, is insufficient to constitute a showing of the "immediate crisis" required under the emergency exception. People v. Winpigler, 8 P.3d 439 (Colo. 1999).

Lack of credible evidence of an immediate crisis or emergency preclude warrantless entry and search. By the time the officers entered the home there had been significant lag time since the report of the incident indicating there was not an immediate crisis. Moreover, the officers failed to question the witness about whether anyone else was injured or whether there was an emergency that would have provided a basis to believe an emergency existed. People v. Pate, 71 P.3d 1005 (Colo. 2003).

Emergency exception does not apply if officers enter a residence with an investigatory intent and then find a medical emergency. In order for the emergency exception to apply, the officers must enter the home with the intent to provide emergency assistance. Entering the home, without knocking, guns drawn, searching the apartment prior to asking the defendant whether he was injured or required medical attention demonstrates the officers entered the home to investigate. People v. Pate, 71 P.3d 1005 (Colo. 2003).

Factors relevant to the consideration of exigent circumstances include (1) urgency; (2) time needed to get a warrant; (3) reasonable belief contraband would be removed or destroyed; and (4) possibility of danger to police guarding contraband while the warrant would be obtained. People v. Amato, 193 Colo. 57, 562 P.2d 422 (1977).

Factors relevant to a determination of exigency include (1) the degree of urgency and the time required to obtain a warrant, (2) reasonable belief that evidence or contraband would be removed or destroyed, (3) information that those in possession of the evidence or contraband are aware that the police are closing in, and (4) the ease of destroying the evidence or contraband and the awareness that narcotics dealers often try to dispose of narcotics and escape under the circumstances. People v. Bustam, 641 P.2d 968 (Colo. 1982).

If an officer's initial observations through the window of an apartment were constitutionally permissible, the prosecution bears the burden of establishing that the warrantless entry was necessary to prevent the immediate destruction of evidence or otherwise was justified under the exigent circumstances doctrine. People v. Donald, 637 P.2d 392 (Colo. 1981); People v. Jansen, 713 P.2d 907 (Colo. 1986).

The threat of immediate destruction or removal of evidence constitutes an exigent circumstance if the prosecution can demonstrate that the police had an articuable basis to justify a reasonable belief that evidence was about to be removed or destroyed. People v. Turner, 660 P.2d 1284 (Colo. 1983); People v. Garcia, 752 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1988).

In determining whether the emergency exception has been satisfied, a court must examine the totality of circumstances, including the delay likely to be occasioned by obtaining a warrant, the character of the investigation, and the potential risk posed to other persons from any unnecessary delay. People v. Higbee, 802 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1990); People v. Winpigler, 8 P.3d 439 (Colo. 1999).

Destruction of evidence. To justify a warrantless entry and seizure on the basis of destruction of evidence, the perceived danger must be real and immediate: there must be a real or substantial likelihood that the contraband or known evidence on the premises might be removed or destroyed before a warrant could be obtained. People v. Turner, 660 P.2d 1284 (Colo. 1983); People v. Henson, 705 P.2d 996 (Colo. App. 1985).

In order for exigent circumstances to be fully examined when the claim is premised upon destruction of drugs, there must first be a finding that the police knew drugs were located in the home, which could be tantamount to a finding of probable cause. People v. Mendoza-Balderama, 981 P.2d 168 (Colo. 1999).

In order to satisfy this exception, a showing is required that the police have an articulable basis upon which to justify a reasonable belief that evidence is about to be destroyed. But the mere fact that evidence is of a type that can be easily destroyed does not, in and of itself, constitute an exigent circumstance. People v. Winpigler, 8 P.3d 439 (Colo. 1999).

Exigent circumstances exception to warrant requirement. The presence of exigent circumstances, such as the risk of immediate removal or destruction of evidence, permits quick police action and militates against strict adherence to the warrant requirement to gain entry into a residence. People v. Magoon, 645 P.2d 286 (Colo. App. 1982).

Exigent circumstances doctrine encompasses compelling need for immediate police action. The doctrine of exigent circumstances encompasses those situations where, due to an emergency, the compelling need for immediate police action militates against the strict adherence to the warrant requirement. McCall v. People, 623 P.2d 397 (Colo. 1981); People v. Gomez, 632 P.2d 586 (Colo. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 943, 102 S. Ct. 1439, 71 L. Ed. 2d 655 (1982); People v. Lucero, 677 P.2d 370 (Colo. App. 1983), cert. dismissed, 706 P.2d 1283 (Colo. 1985); People v. Jansen, 713 P.2d 907 (Colo. 1986); People v. Garcia, 752 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1988); People v. Barry, 888 P.2d 327 (Colo. App. 1994).

Exigent circumstances generally have been limited to those bona fide situations which legitimately require swift police action, such as the hot pursuit of a fleeing suspect, the risk of the immediate destruction of evidence, or a colorable claim of an emergency threatening the life or safety of another. People v. Hogan, 649 P.2d 326 (Colo. 1982); People v. Reger, 731 P.2d 752 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Garcia, 752 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1988).

Exigent circumstances that necessitate immediate and warrantless police action: (1) "Hot pursuit" of a fleeing suspect; (2) a risk of immediate destruction of evidence; and (3) a colorable claim of an emergency threatening the life or safety of another. People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999); People v. Aarness, 150 P.3d 1271 (Colo. 2006); People v. Nelson, 2012 COA 37M, __ P.3d __.

Exigent circumstances exist only when there is a pressing need that cannot brook the delay incident to obtaining a warrant. People v. Lindsey, 805 P.2d 1134 (Colo. App. 1990).

An additional exigent circumstance that allows warrantless police action is the belief that police officers' own lives or the lives of others are at risk. People v. Nelson, 2012 COA 37M, __ P.3d __.

Exigent circumstances exception has been limited to those situations involving a bona fide pursuit of a fleeing suspect, the risk of immediate destruction of evidence, or a colorable claim of emergency threatening life or safety of another. People v. Higbee, 802 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1990).

Driving under the influence is a sufficiently grave offense to support a warrantless entry into a person's home by police, even though it is a misdemeanor offense in this state, because a person convicted of DUI as a first-time offender may be jailed. People v. Wehmas, 246 P.3d 642 (Colo. 2010).

Dissipation of defendant's blood alcohol content is not a sufficiently exigent circumstance justifying warrantless home entry by police based on the immediate risk of destruction of evidence. People v. Wehmas, 246 P.3d 642 (Colo. 2010).

Exigent circumstances allow immediate, warrantless searches and seizures when it reasonably appears that evidence may be removed or destroyed by a third person before it can be secured by the police. People v. Barndt, 604 P.2d 1173 (Colo. 1980); People v. Barry, 888 P.2d 327 (Colo. App. 1994).

Scope of the emergency exception must be strictly circumscribed by the exigencies which justify its initiation, because the exigent circumstances doctrine runs counter to fourth amendment guarantees. Thus, the state must show that an immediate crisis existed inside the place to be searched and that police assistance probably would be helpful in alleviating the crisis. People v. Higbee, 802 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1990).

Emergency variant of exigent circumstances exception to warrant requirement satisfied where officer entered apartment with reasonable belief that an immediate crisis existed with respect to the safety of an infant inside. People v. Malczewski, 744 P.2d 62 (Colo. 1987).

Exception supported only by showing of immediate crisis inside private premises and that police assistance probably will help alleviate crises. People v. Martin, 806 P.2d 393 (Colo. App. 1990).

Exigent circumstances found to have continued to exist when police discovered bomb making material. Police were not required to stop lawful search of house for injured persons once they discovered bomb making material in plain sight. People v. Kluhsman, 980 P.2d 529 (Colo. 1999).

Medical emergency variant of exigent circumstances doctrine applied where emergency room personnel discovered cocaine unexpectedly, in the course of treating the defendant for a serious injury, and discovery was entirely incidental to the medical purpose for the treatment. People v. Loggins, 981 P.2d 630 (Colo. App. 1998).

Under exigent circumstances, a police officer may enter private property without a warrant when he reasonably believes the premises have been or are being burglarized. People v. Berow, 688 P.2d 1123 (Colo. 1984).

Police officers' knowledge that apartment tenant was not home but had given directions to arrest trespassers, along with the fact that people were in the apartment but not answering the door, were circumstances sufficient to support a reasonable belief by the officers that the people in the apartment were trespassers who should be arrested. People v. Trusty, 53 P.3d 668 (Colo. App. 2001).

But police officers who respond to a report of a possible burglary in progress, yet find no objective signs of any burglary in progress at the scene, have no probable cause to believe a burglary is in progress and conduct a warrantless entry, search, and seizure. People v. Grazier, 992 P.2d 1149 (Colo. 2000).

Finding broken glass is insufficient to support probable cause that a burglary was in progress when responding to a call that a burglary is in progress. People v. Pate, 71 P.3d 1005 (Colo. 2003).

It is unreasonable for officers to enter a home believing a burglary may be in progress after failing to ask the witness at the scene any questions critical to a burglary investigation. People v. Pate, 71 P.3d 1005 (Colo. 2003).

Police officers reasonably entered defendant's home under exigent circumstances. Daughter's 911 report of a physical altercation involving her mother and defendant established probable cause that a domestic violence crime had occurred or was occurring in the home. When the officers arrived, the home was dark, and no one answered repeated knocks on the front door even though the daughter had reported a physical altercation occurring inside just minutes earlier. It was reasonable, therefore, for the officers to proceed to the back door of the darkened home when their repeated knocks on the front door went unanswered. When they saw the door slightly ajar, it was reasonable for them to enter and announce themselves. People v. Chavez, 240 P.3d 448 (Colo. App. 2010).

Exigent circumstances justifying warrantless arrest existed where police had detailed information from informant, circumstances at the scene matched that information, and person holding suspected contraband was leaving in automobile. People v. Garcia, 752 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1988).

Burden of proof of exigent circumstances. In order to support the warrantless entry and arrest of a defendant in his residence, the prosecution must establish the existence of both probable cause and exigent circumstances. People v. Bustam, 641 P.2d 968 (Colo. 1982); People v. Henson, 705 P.2d 996 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Higbee, 802 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1990).

Because both probable cause and exigent circumstances must be present in order to justify a warrantless search into a defendant's home and trial court found only that police entered defendant's home in the absence of exigent circumstances without first making a probable cause determination, case was remanded to trial court to determine first whether defendant informed detective that drugs were in his home, giving detective probable cause, and then to determine whether exigent circumstances justified warrantless entry into the defendant's home. People v. Mendoza-Balderama, 981 P.2d 168 (Colo. 1999).

Police had reasonable grounds to believe that person might destroy possible evidence inside the house or harm the officers outside where, during arrest of suspect outside of house, defendant was seen trying to conceal himself by closing curtains to the house. People v. Barry, 888 P.2d 327 (Colo. App. 1994).

Warrantless entry was justified where police had reason to believe that evidence could be destroyed: razor blades and victim's underwear could have been flushed down a toilet or thrown away; bedsheets could have been washed. People v. Crawford, 891 P.2d 255 (Colo. 1995).

Officer's probable cause to believe that a car in the driveway of a home had been stolen and that the responsible party was in the home did not create exigent circumstances that would allow an officer to enter the fenced backyard while other officers knocked on the front door. There was nothing to indicate that the circumstances were moving so quickly that officers could not have secured the area without entering the backyard and waited for a warrant. People v. Brunsting, 224 P.3d 259 (Colo. App. 2009).

Warrantless search on the basis of reasonable suspicion. A police officer may briefly stop a suspicious person and make reasonable inquiries to confirm or dispel his suspicions including a pat-down search of the individual to determine whether the person is carrying a weapon, as long as the officer is justified in believing that the person may be armed and presently dangerous. People v. Corpany, 859 P.2d 865 (Colo. 1993).

The purpose of the limited search is not to discover evidence of a crime but to allow an officer to pursue an investigation without fear of violence. People v. Corpany, 859 P.2d 865 (Colo. 1993).

In drug transactions the possibility of violence involving armed drug dealers exists and a protective sweep and search for weapons provides an additional justification for the warrantless search. People v. Barry, 888 P.2d 327 (Colo. App. 1994).

The presence of a burning building clearly created an exigent circumstance that justified a warrantless entry by fire officials to extinguish the blaze and warranted seizure of evidence in plain view. People v. Harper, 902 P.2d 842 (Colo. 1995).

The proper test for determining whether police intrusion is reasonable is an objective one based on the totality of facts and circumstances known to the police at the time. The appropriate inquiry is to balance the intrusion on the individual's fourth amendment interests against the promotion of legitimate governmental interests. People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79

(Colo. App. 1992).

And a court must evaluate the circumstances as they would have appeared to a prudent and trained police officer at the time of the challenged entry. People v. Higbee, 802 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1990).

Exigent circumstances found justifying search and seizure. People v. Smith, 709 P.2d 4 (Colo. App. 1985), holding reaffirmed, Mendez v. People, 986 P.2d 275 (Colo. 1999).

Exigent circumstances justified officers' forcible entry where the officers smelled burned marijuana when defendant opened the door. People v. Baker, 813 P.2d 331 (Colo. 1991).

Exigent circumstances justified officers' entry into home to protect the safety of the officers and other occupants where it was reasonable for officers to believe, based on defendant's conduct, that defendant was reaching for a weapon. People v. Aarness, 150 P.3d 1271 (Colo. 2006).

Exigent circumstances requiring warrantless search absent. People v. Guerin, 769 P.2d 1068 (Colo. 1989).

Where extreme cold and not threats of destruction or removal of evidence motivated warrantless entry into house, evidence discovered and seized should have been suppressed. People v. Schoondermark, 717 P.2d 504 (Colo. App. 1985), rev'd on other grounds, 759 P.2d 715 (Colo. 1988).

Courts have uniformly required an objective standard for determining probable cause. People v. Davis, 903 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1995).

Courts use an objective standard for determining reasonable suspicion. In reviewing an officer's conduct in making an investigative stop, a court must apply an objective test. An officer's improper motives will not remove the legal justification for an otherwise valid investigatory stop based on reasonable suspicion. People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997).

Inherent right to enter and investigate in emergencies. The reasonable exercise of the broad duties of police officers clearly includes the inherent right to enter and investigate in emergencies without an intent to either search or arrest. People v. Boileau, 36 Colo. App. 157, 538 P.2d 484 (1975).

Emergency and consent are necessary conditions for administrative search without warrant. An administrative search without a warrant is not proper except under certain circumstances and conditions, two of these conditions being (1) that an emergency existed sufficient to justify a warrantless search and (2) that consent was given to search the premises. Condon v. People, 176 Colo. 212, 489 P.2d 1297 (1971).

A search justified under the emergency doctrine is limited by the nature of the emergency; an emergency cannot be used to support a general exploratory search. People v. Unruh, 713 P.2d 370 (Colo. 1986), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1171, 106 S. Ct. 2894, 90 L. Ed. 2d 981 (1986).

Sufficient emergency. Where both the resuscitation unit of the fire department and the police officers had a legal right to be present in the defendant's apartment in response to a general emergency call, the emergency doctrine fully justified warrantless entry. People v. Amato, 193 Colo. 57, 562 P.2d 422 (1977).

Otherwise lawful search was not vitiated by the entry into apartment without prior identification and announcement of purpose, because exigent circumstances would justify entry without prior identification and announcement, and exigent circumstances are always present in searches for narcotics. The ease with which narcotics can be expended or destroyed is the justification for this practical rule. People v. Arnold, 186 Colo. 372, 527 P.2d 806 (1974).

Where time was of the essence and the police officers had the choice of either acting upon the information which they had obtained or of allowing the narcotics violation to escape detection, the exigent circumstances permitted an arrest without resort to the time-consuming process incident to the obtaining of a warrant. DeLaCruz v. People, 177 Colo. 46, 492 P.2d 627 (1972).

Police officers can, when in hot pursuit and when confronted with exigent circumstances, act to protect themselves and to prevent the destruction of evidence or injury to another. People v. Vaughns, 175 Colo. 369, 489 P.2d 591 (1971).

Even though an arrest warrant is invalid, the arrest of a defendant may be upheld if the arresting officer had probable cause to believe that an offense had been committed by the defendant apart from the complaint, and the officer was confronted with exigent circumstances. People v. Moreno, 176 Colo. 488, 491 P.2d 575 (1971).

Investigation of premises without warrant upheld where unpleasant odor from trailer was so unpleasant to cause complaints from neighbors and was adequate to constitute an emergency sufficient to allow park owners to enter trailer and investigate. People v. Rivers, 727 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1986).

Facts known to police, including victim's unexplained failure to appear at work and unusual circumstances, were sufficient to support invocation of emergency doctrine to justify warrantless entry into trailer. People v. Reger, 731 P.2d 752 (Colo. App. 1986).

Emergency situation existed where the circumstances suggested a low risk of explosion but a grave danger to any persons in the vicinity if an explosion of dynamite should occur and where an experienced bomb squad officer concluded that the defendant's apartment should be searched. People v. Higbee, 802 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1990).

For a warrantless entry to be justified as hot pursuit, the police must have been provided with some sort of direction, whether it be the result of a chase or the result of a tip from a witness, which leads them to a particular premises. People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999).

Warrantless search of a person's purse or wallet may be conducted in a medical emergency but only if such person is unconscious or semiconscious and the search is conducted to obtain the person's identity or medical information and the person is unable to provide such information themselves. People v. Wright, 804 P.2d 866 (Colo. 1991).

Not sufficient emergency. Detection of an odor which might be that of a decomposing body does not create, in and of itself, an emergency sufficient to justify a warrantless search. Condon v. People, 176 Colo. 212, 489 P.2d 1297 (1971).

No exception for search at homicide scene. There is no special exception which permits the police to conduct a warrantless search at the scene of a possible homicide. People v. Roark, 643 P.2d 756 (Colo. 1982).

Even if police officers' initial entry into defendant's home was not supported by exigent circumstances, defendant's consent to the search of his home was voluntary and attenuated from any illegality; therefore, admission of evidence was not error. People v. Benson, 124 P.3d 851 (Colo. App. 2005).

Parole officer investigating a parole violation who has reasonable grounds to believe that a parole violation has occurred does not need a search warrant to search parolee's house if police officer is not a part of the search. People v. Slusher, 844 P.2d 1222 (Colo. App. 1992).

Special-needs exception to the warrant and probable-cause requirements applies when special needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement, make the warrant and probable-cause requirement impracticable. Parole officer must authorize the search and would normally be present during the search, and the search must be related to the rehabilitation and supervision of the parolee. United States v. Warren, 566 F.3d 1211 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 569, 175 L. Ed. 2d 393 (2009).

Search of parolee's residence was a special-needs parole search because participating police officer acted under the direction of a parole officer. United States v. Warren, 566 F.3d 1211 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 569, 175 L. Ed. 2d 393 (2009).

Evidence seized within the scope of a reasonable search by a parole officer is admissible in the prosecution of parolee for another crime, even if unrelated to the parole violation. People v. Slusher, 844 P.2d 1222 (Colo. App. 1992).

A warrantless parole search may be constitutional, even in the absence of "reasonable grounds", if the search meets the following requirements: (1) It is conducted pursuant to any applicable statute; (2) it is conducted in furtherance of the purposes of parole, i.e., related to the rehabilitation and supervision of the parolee; and (3) it is not arbitrary, capricious, or harassing. People v. McCullough, 6 P.3d 774 (Colo. 2000).

The absence of an authorizing law or condition of probation does not necessarily render unconstitutional a warrantless search of a probationer's residence if based on a reasonable suspicion. The totality of all other relevant circumstances may render such a search reasonable. The defendant's status as a probationer on intensive supervised probation greatly reduced his reasonable expectation of privacy in his residence and, combined with the other circumstances of the situation, justified the search by his probation officer. People v. Samuels, 228 P.3d 229 (Colo. App. 2009).

Warrantless search of a passenger compartment of an automobile must satisfy four conditions: (1) There must be an articulable and specific basis in fact for suspecting that criminal activity has occurred, is taking place, or is about to occur; (2) the purpose of the intrusion must be reasonable; (3) the scope and character of the intrusion must be reasonably related to its purpose; and (4) there must be a reasonable belief based on specific and articulable facts which reasonably cause the officer to believe that the suspect is armed and dangerous and may gain immediate control of weapons. People v. Corpany, 859 P.2d 865 (Colo. 1993).

Automobile may be searched without warrant provided that there is probable cause to believe that the automobile contains articles that officers are entitled to seize. People v. Weinert, 174 Colo. 71, 482 P.2d 103 (1971); People v. Chavez, 175 Colo. 25, 485 P.2d 708 (1971); Kurtz v. People, 177 Colo. 306, 494 P.2d 97 (1972).

Automobiles, because of their mobility, may be searched without a warrant upon facts not justifying a warrantless search of a residence or office, but the officers conducting the search must have "reasonable or probable cause" to believe that they will find the instrumentality of a crime or evidence pertaining to a crime before they begin their warrantless search. Cowdin v. People, 176 Colo. 466, 491 P.2d 569 (1971); People v. Padilla, 182 Colo. 101, 511 P.2d 480 (1973); People v. Fratus, 187 Colo. 52, 528 P.2d 392 (1974).

Where circumstances require police officers to either seize a vehicle and hold it until a search warrant could be obtained or search it without a warrant, and where there is probable cause to search, a warrantless search is permissible. People v. Henderson, 175 Colo. 400, 487 P.2d 1108 (1971); People v. Neyra, 189 Colo. 367, 540 P.2d 1077 (1975).

The police may conduct a warrantless search of a motor vehicle if: (1) There is probable cause to believe that it contains evidence of a crime; and (2) the circumstances create a practical risk of the vehicle's unavailability if the search is postponed until a warrant is obtained. People v. Meyer, 628 P.2d 103 (Colo. 1981).

Test applied in People v. Thiret, 685 P.2d 193 (Colo. 1984); People v. Edwards, 836 P.2d 468 (Colo. 1992).

The lawfulness of a car stop must finally rest upon a determination that the officer had a reasonable suspicion, based on objective facts, that the driver of the car was involved in criminal activity. People v. Smith, 620 P.2d 232 (Colo. 1980).

Warrantless search of an automobile held valid even though exigent circumstances absent and defendant-owner of vehicle had been released, because police had reasonable belief that automobile was itself the instrumentality of a crime. People v. Zamora, 695 P.2d 292 (Colo. 1985).

Warrantless search of automobile trunk, where trunk was locked and automobile's driver and passengers had been detained, held justified where officer had probable cause to believe trunk contained a weapon used in a burglary. People v. Edwards, 836 P.2d 468 (Colo. 1992).

Police had reasonable suspicion to believe criminal activity occurred where the driver of a rental vehicle in Colorado produced two unsigned rental agreements for the vehicle, one of which was for the wrong vehicle, where the rental agreement prohibited driving outside of Arizona or Nevada, and where the driver offered conflicting reasons for being in the state. People v. Litchfield, 918 P.2d 1099 (Colo. 1996).

Automobile exception to warrant requirement applies to police officers' observation of a television set in the vehicle subsequent to the time the vehicle was initially stopped for traffic violation. People v. Naranjo, 686 P.2d 1343 (Colo. 1984).

Based on the totality of the circumstances, the officer had reasonable suspicion to detain truck and conduct a dog sniff. People v. Garcia, 251 P.3d 1152 (Colo. App. 2010).

Observing an air freshener hanging from rearview mirror not an automatic basis for a traffic stop. Officer needs to reasonably believe the air freshener actually obstructs the driver's vision through the windshield. People v. Arias, 159 P.3d 134 (Colo. 2007).

Existence of probable cause justifies warrantless search of car. Where there is probable cause to obtain a warrant to search a car, a search of the car without a warrant is justified. People v. Smith, 620 P.2d 232 (Colo. 1980).

Where probable cause to search a car exists, no exigent circumstances are required. People v. Romero, 767 P.2d 1225 (Colo. 1989).

In such case, the vehicle may be searched immediately without a warrant or seized without a warrant for a later search after a warrant is obtained. People v. Martinez, 32 P.3d 520 (Colo. App. 2001).

A drug checkpoint in which vehicles are stopped without reasonable suspicion that the occupants have engaged in criminal activity constitutes illegal police conduct in violation of the fourth amendment. People v. Roth, 85 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2003) (citing Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 121 S. Ct. 447, 148 L. Ed. 2d 333 (2000)).

It was not unconstitutional, however, for the police to have created a ruse checkpoint that caused defendant's passengers to abandon an item of property, the discovery of which provided reasonable suspicion to stop the defendant's vehicle. People v. Roth, 85 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2003) (following United States v. Flynn, 309 F.3d 736 (10th Cir. 2002)).

Where the police have legitimately stopped an automobile and have probable cause to search it, they may also search containers that may contain the object of their search. Because the officer was validly searching the car for drug evidence, the officer was justified in searching a wallet found on the back seat. People v. Moore, 900 P.2d 66 (Colo. 1995).

Under the automobile exception police are allowed to conduct a warrantless search of a car if there is probable cause to believe the car contains contraband. People v. Naranjo, 686 P.2d 1343 (Colo. 1984); People v. McMillan, 870 P.2d 493 (Colo. App. 1993).

The automobile exception to warrant requirement is rooted in the inherent mobility of motor vehicles and the diminished expectation of privacy in an object designed exclusively as a means of transportation. People v. Thiret, 685 P.2d 193 (Colo. 1984); People v. McMillan, 870 P.2d 493 (Colo. App. 1993).

But not without cause to believe that car contains contraband. Where the police officer stated unequivocally in the record that he had no cause to believe that the car contained any contraband, under this state of the record the search was exploratory only and cannot be sustained. People v. Singleton, 174 Colo. 138, 482 P.2d 978 (1971).

The need for immediate police action is recognized when an automobile is being utilized to transport contraband. People v. Fratus, 187 Colo. 52, 528 P.2d 392 (1974).

No exploratory searches of automobiles are authorized, and in order to be reasonable, the search must be one designed to afford evidence in connection with the particular crime for which the person was arrested. Stewart v. People, 162 Colo. 117, 426 P.2d 545 (1967).

Following Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332, 129 S. Ct. 1710, 173 L. Ed. 2d 485 (2009), the search-incident-to-arrest exception does not apply in this case, and the search of the passenger compartment of defendant's car was unconstitutional. Because statements defendant made following the discovery of drugs were the fruit of the unlawful search, the evidentiary use of the statements must also be suppressed. Perez v. People, 231 P.3d 957 (Colo. 2010).

Search of auto incident to arrest. The search of a vehicle, which was made substantially contemporaneously with the arrest, was permissible as an incident to such arrest. People v. Olson, 175 Colo. 140, 485 P.2d 891 (1971); People v. Lucero, 182 Colo. 39, 511 P.2d 468 (1973); People v. Coulson, 192 Colo. 53, 555 P.2d 516 (1976); People v. Patnode, 126 P.3d 249 (Colo. App. 2005).

Arrest of defendant and search of defendant's motorcycle were not so separated by time or intervening events that the search was not incident to the arrest. People v. Malloy, 178 P.3d 1283 (Colo. App. 2008).

Search of automobile held not incident to arrest. Where the defendant was in custody, so there was no danger of his destroying any evidence in his car, and the car was without the area authorized to be searched by the warrant, the search was not incident to the arrest. People v. Singleton, 174 Colo. 138, 482 P.2d 978 (1971); People v. Neyra, 189 Colo. 367, 540 P.2d 1077 (1975).

Where defendant's automobile is immobilized, and defendant is in custody, and there is no danger that evidence will be removed, the essential ingredient -- exigent circumstance that would allow a warrantless search -- is not present. People v. Railey, 178 Colo. 297, 496 P.2d 1047 (1972); People v. Simmons, 973 P.2d 627 (Colo. App. 1998).

Automobile may be searched by police at time and place remote from arrest, provided that the police have valid custody of the automobile at the time, and provided that the arrest is valid, and provided that the search is made for the fruits of the crime, the instruments of the crime, or evidence relating to the crime for which the accused was validly arrested. Stewart v. People, 162 Colo. 117, 426 P.2d 545 (1967).

Not for mere traffic violation. A mere traffic violation does not authorize a suspicion of an unrelated criminal activity so as to justify a warrantless search. People v. Vialpando, 183 Colo. 19, 514 P.2d 622 (1973).

Traffic offenses cannot justify general, exploratory searches of motor vehicles. Cowdin v. People, 176 Colo. 466, 491 P.2d 569 (1971).

Bases for searching unoccupied vehicle. Where a vehicle is unoccupied, the right to search hinges on a reasonable belief that it contains seizable objects -- contraband, the fruits or instrumentalities of a crime, or evidence of a crime. People v. Meyer, 628 P.2d 103 (Colo. 1981).

Right to enter private driveway to investigate. Even if an officer, having a reasonable suspicion that criminal activity is occurring in "plain view", may enter a private driveway to investigate, that right vanishes absent such reasonable suspicion. People v. Apodaca, 38 Colo. App. 395, 561 P.2d 351 (1976), aff'd, 194 Colo. 324, 571 P.2d 1109 (1977).

Car parked under carport behind house. People v. Apodaca, 38 Colo. App. 395, 561 P.2d 351 (1976), aff'd, 194 Colo. 324, 571 P.2d 1109 (1977).

Validity of inventory searches upheld. The validity of inventory searches, when constrained within the limits of "reasonableness", has consistently been upheld. People v. Counterman, 192 Colo. 152, 556 P.2d 481 (1976).

Inventory search is justified as incident of lawful incarceration. People v. Overlee, 174 Colo. 202, 483 P.2d 222 (1971); People v. Valdez, 182 Colo. 80, 511 P.2d 472 (1973).

The legitimate purposes for inventory searches provide one measure of the limits of reasonable police intrusion. These purposes include (1) protection of the owner's or occupant's property, (2) protection of the police officers from liability based upon subsequent claims of missing or damaged property, and (3) protection of the police officers and the public from dangerous instrumentalities inside the car. People v. Counterman, 192 Colo. 152, 556 P.2d 481 (1976); People v. Eakins, 196 Colo. 517, 587 P.2d 790 (1978).

An inventory search is valid when it follows a lawful arrest, is prior to impoundment of the vehicle, and is conducted in accordance with existing agency policies that are consistently applied. People v. Patnode, 126 P.3d 249 (Colo. App. 2005).

Limiting factor as to reasonableness of inventory search is whether the "caretaking" or protective functions of the search are tainted as pretexts for "concealing an investigatory police motive". People v. Counterman, 192 Colo. 152, 556 P.2d 481 (1976); People v. Eakins, 196 Colo. 517, 587 P.2d 790 (1978).

Inventory of property found in impounded vehicle is not unreasonable search, since such a search is supported by the legitimate police concern of protecting property in their custody, or retrieving suspected weapons which may present a danger to the community. People v. Trusty, 183 Colo. 291, 516 P.2d 423 (1973); People v. Grana, 185 Colo. 126, 527 P.2d 543 (1974).

The inventory search of a vehicle is constitutional if the decision to impound the vehicle is made pursuant to the standard criteria in department's regulations. The police followed their impound guidelines in this case so the inventory search of the vehicle was constitutional. People v. Grenier, 200 P.3d 1062 (Colo. App. 2008).

Inventory search held unreasonable. The present case clearly fell outside of guidelines as to reasonableness of an inventory search where a knapsack was itself in plain view, but its contents were securely sealed and completely unknown to the officer, the knapsack did not give any indication that its contents were dangerous or particularly valuable and in need of a special inventory, and the legitimate purpose of the inventory search could have been fully accomplished by merely noting the item as a sealed knapsack. People v. Counterman, 192 Colo. 152, 556 P.2d 481 (1976).

Inventory search exception to warrant requirement inapplicable to warrantless entry into defendant's home to conduct inventory after it had been seized pursuant to a temporary restraining order issued in a civil forfeiture action in the absence of probable cause to believe the home was related to the nuisance activity. People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79 (Colo. App. 1992).

Warrantless entry into defendant's home to conduct an inventory without probable cause was an unreasonable intrusion and violated the defendant's constitutional rights. People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79 (Colo. App. 1992).

Articulable facts requiring seizure required. This section requires that specific, articulable, and objective facts indicate that society's legitimate interests demand the seizure of a particular individual. People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982).

A police officer must have a reasonable suspicion that the individual has committed, or is about to commit, a crime; the test is whether the facts, viewed as a whole, justify the officer's belief that the individual is engaged in wrongdoing. People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982); People v. Bell, 698 P.2d 269 (Colo. 1985); People v. Guffie, 749 P.2d 976 (Colo. App. 1987); People v. Sutherland, 886 P.2d 681 (Colo. 1994).

In determining whether police had reasonable suspicion to justify investigatory stop, totality of the circumstances must be considered. People v. Carillo-Montes, 796 P.2d 970 (Colo. 1990).

Articulable suspicion of criminal activity needed to support investigatory stop. People v. Trujillo, 773 P.2d 1086 (Colo. 1989).

Seizure of contraband in inventory procedure lawful. Contraband discovered in defendant's car during inventory procedure was lawfully seized. People v. Roddy, 188 Colo. 55, 532 P.2d 958 (1975).

Right to "stop and frisk" is not an open invitation to conduct an unlimited search incident to arrest or a means to effect a search to provide grounds for an arrest. Rather, it is a right to conduct a limited search for weapons. People v. Navran, 174 Colo. 222, 483 P.2d 228 (1971).

It is well established that an officer may conduct a limited search for weapons (a so-called "pat-down" or "stop and frisk") for his own safety when he is justified in believing that he is dealing with a potentially armed and dangerous individual. Finley v. People, 176 Colo. 1, 488 P.2d 883 (1971); People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563

P.2d 926 (1977); People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989); People v. Mack, 33 P.3d 1211 (Colo. App. 2001).

In light of the fact that police officers must always make arrests under a shadow of uncertainty as to the risk which they are taking, police officers stopping a speeding car are justified in making a "pat-down" search for weapons and to forestall assault or escape. Cowdin v. People, 176 Colo. 466, 491 P.2d 569 (1971).

The rule allowing contemporaneous searches incident to lawful arrests is justified by the need to seize weapons and other things which might be used to assault an officer or effect an escape, as well as by the need to prevent the destruction of evidence of the crime. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 421, 489 P.2d 593 (1971).

When a person is lawfully arrested, the police have the right, without a search warrant, to make a contemporaneous search of the person of the accused for weapons or for the fruits of or implements used to commit the crime. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 421, 489 P.2d 593 (1971).

But free license has not been granted to law enforcement officers to stop an individual to obtain identification or address. Stone v. People, 174 Colo. 504, 485 P.2d 495 (1971).

Temporary detention on less than probable cause authorized. A police officer may subject a person to a temporary detention, short of the traditional arrest, on less than the probable cause standard. People v. Tate, 657 P.2d 955 (Colo. 1983).

The limited intrusion of an investigatory stop may be carried out with less than probable cause without violating the fourth amendment of the U.S. Constitution and this section. People v. Lagrutta, 775 P.2d 576 (Colo. 1989); People v. Rahming, 795 P.2d 1338 (Colo. 1990); People v. Lingo, 806 P.2d 949 (Colo. 1991); People v. Sutherland, 886 P.2d 681 (Colo. 1994).

A police officer may have sufficient information for a temporary detention based on a reasonable suspicion that an individual may have committed a crime but such detention must be limited to determining the individual's identity or obtaining an explanation of his behavior. People v. Davis, 903 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1995).

Subjective intentions of officer are irrelevant to a determination that officer has reasonable suspicion to conduct an investigatory stop. People v. Grenier, 200 P.3d 1062 (Colo. App. 2008).

Investigatory stop of defendant valid and seizure of defendant not illegal. Record supports the reasonable conclusion that defendant may have been committing a traffic offense when officer undertook the investigatory stop. People v. McDaniel, 160 P.3d 247 (Colo. 2007).

Investigatory stop was legal. Police had reasonable suspicion to believe that a crime was occurring where defendant stood on private property in a high-crime area late at night where no businesses were open and no other people were nearby, and officers heard a loud crash shortly thereafter. People v. Funez-Paiagua, 2012 CO 37, 276 P.3d 576.

An investigatory stop must be brief in duration, limited in scope, and narrow in purpose. People v. Tottenhoff, 691 P.2d 340 (Colo. 1984); People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997); Outlaw v. People, 17 P.3d 150 (Colo. 2001).

But a detective's request for defendant's identification information was reasonably related in scope and character to the investigative detention. People v. McCoy, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994); People v. McKay, 10 P.3d 704 (Colo. App. 2000).

Law enforcement interests can support a seizure based on less than probable cause in the case of a minimally intrusive detention. People

v. Ortega, 34 P.3d 986 (Colo. 2001); People v. Tallent, 174 P.3d 310 (Colo. 2008).

Performing drug interdiction stops serves an important public interest; therefore, if law enforcement can conduct a search and seizure in a reasonably short period of time without delaying the common carrier schedule, the conduct is an investigative detention, requiring only reasonable suspicion. People v. Ortega, 34 P.3d 986 (Colo. 2001).

Investigatory stop of suspect limited. Any temporary police detention made for the purpose of questioning a suspect who might otherwise escape is limited to determining an individual's identity or obtaining an explanation of his behavior. People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982); People v. Villiard, 679 P.2d 593 (Colo. 1984); People v. Lingo, 806 P.2d 949 (Colo. 1991); People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997).

Else it becomes arrest. Although an investigatory stop itself does not constitute an arrest, whenever detention and questioning by a police officer are more than brief and cursory, there is an arrest which must be supported by probable cause. People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982); People v. Roybal, 655 P.2d 410 (Colo. 1982); People v. Hazelhurst, 662 P.2d 1081 (Colo. 1983); People v. Villiard, 679 P.2d 593 (Colo. 1984); People v. Trujillo, 710 P.2d 1169 (Colo. App. 1985).

Use of force and physical restraint for officer's safety is not per se an arrest. If an officer's use of force and physical restraint for safety is reasonable, it does not transform the investigatory stop into an arrest. People v. Smith, 13 P.3d 300 (Colo. 2000); People v. Smith, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2010).

Where a police officer conducts an investigatory stop, an accompanying search upon less than probable cause is permissible only for the purpose of discovering weapons, and the officer must entertain such purpose at the time the search is conducted. People v. Cagle, 688 P.2d 718 (Colo. 1984), appeal dismissed for want of a substantial federal question, 486 U.S. 1028, 108 S. Ct. 2009, 100 L. Ed. 2d 597 (1988); People v. Lingo, 806 P.2d 949 (Colo. 1991).

During a valid investigatory stop, an officer may search those areas of a vehicle's passenger compartment where a weapon may be placed or hidden if, prior to the search, the officer possesses a reasonable belief, based on specific and articulable facts, that the suspect is dangerous and may gain immediate control of a weapon. The fact that suspect ducked down in the vehicle out of sight of the officer for a period of time justified the officer's belief that the suspect may have been reaching for a weapon. People v. McDaniel, 160 P.3d 247 (Colo. 2007).

Unlike a search incident to a lawful arrest, the only justification for a search during an investigatory stop is to neutralize the potential risk of physical harm confronting the investigating officer and others during the stop. People v. Tate, 657 P.2d 955 (Colo. 1983); People v. Melgosa, 753 P.2d 221 (Colo. 1988); People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989); People v. Lingo, 806 P.2d 949 (Colo. 1991).

An investigatory stop must be supported by an articulable suspicion of criminal activity, and an arrest by probable cause to believe criminal activity has occurred or is occurring. People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997); People v. Smith, 13 P.3d 300 (Colo. 2000).

An investigatory stop occurs when an officer requests and retains an automobile passenger's identification and instructs the passenger to remain in the car while the officer runs the identification for warrants. A mere traffic stop and request for identification from a passenger does not constitute a seizure, however retention of the identification and instructing the passenger to remain in the car creates a seizure. Under the totality of the circumstances, no reasonable person could expect to be free to leave or terminate the encounter once his or her identification is retained and he or she is instructed to remain in the car. Since the officer had no reasonable suspicion to conduct the check, all evidence obtained as a result of the arrest is inadmissible. People v. Jackson, 39 P.3d 1174 (Colo. 2002).

A consensual interview does not need to be justified by either probable cause or reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997).

A consensual encounter does not mature into a stop merely as a result of passage of time. People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997).

Merely asking questions about criminal conduct does not transform a consensual interview into an investigatory stop. However, such questions coupled with a tone of voice indicating that compliance with a request for information might be compelled may indicate a seizure. People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997).

The test for determining whether an encounter is consensual is whether a reasonable person under the circumstances would believe he or she was free to leave or to disregard the official's request for information. People v. Padgett, 932 P.2d 810 (Colo. 1997); People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997).

Consensual interview not investigatory stop. Under normal circumstances, a consensual interview between the police and a suspect or witness is not considered an investigatory stop. People v. Gouker, 665 P.2d 113 (Colo. 1983).

Consensual interviews are encounters in which no restraint of the liberty of the citizen is implicated and the voluntary cooperation of the citizen is elicited through noncoercive questioning. People v. Padgett, 932 P.2d 810 (Colo. 1997).

A consensual encounter is negated if the police conduct would have communicated to a reasonable person that he or she was not at liberty to ignore the police presence and go about his or her business. People v. Padgett, 932 P.2d 810 (Colo. 1997).

A seizure occurred at the moment police summoned defendant to the patrol car. A seizure has occurred where officers required a defendant to alter his direction of travel, walk back to where the officers were, and remain while police investigated him. Outlaw v. People, 17 P.3d 150 (Colo. 2001).

Remand proper to determine whether trial court applied proper test in determining whether interview at which defendant made inculpatory statements to drug enforcement agency was a consensual interview. People v. Beckstrom, 843 P.2d 34 (Colo. App. 1992).

Precautionary measures do not transform stop into arrest. Although the precautionary measures taken in a particular case may lead a detainee to believe that he is not free to leave, this does not necessarily transform a stop into an arrest. People v. Weeams, 665 P.2d 619 (Colo. 1983).

And handcuffs may be justified in investigatory stop. Under the narrow circumstances surrounding an apprehension of criminal suspects reasonably believed to be armed, the use of handcuffs in an investigatory stop may be a reasonably justified intrusion. People v. Weeams, 665 P.2d 619 (Colo. 1983).

And a drawn gun may be justified in an investigatory stop. Under specific circumstances of preparing to confront a criminal suspect, drawing a weapon was a justifiable measure of precaution for ensuring protection. People v. Archuleta, 980 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1999).

In order to make a valid investigatory stop: (1) The officer must have a reasonable suspicion that the individual has committed, or is about to commit, a crime; (2) the purpose of the detention must be reasonable; and (3) the character of the detention must be reasonable when considered in light of the purpose. Stone v. People, 174 Colo. 504, 485 P.2d 495 (1971); People v. McCombs, 629 P.2d 1088 (Colo. App. 1981); People v. Martinez, 801 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1990); People v. Rodriguez, 924 P.2d 1100 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997); People v. Padgett, 932 P.2d 810 (Colo. 1997); People v. Dowhan, 951 P.2d 905 (Colo. 1998); People v. Mack, 33 P.3d 1211 (Colo. App. 2001).

Test applied in People v. Trujillo, 710 P.2d 1169 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Cooper, 731 P.2d 781 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989); People v. Garcia, 789 P.2d 190 (Colo. 1990); People v. Martinez, 801 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1990); People v. Rodriguez, 924 P.2d 1100 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997); People v. Archuleta, 980 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1999); People v. Barnard, 12 P.3d 290 (Colo. App. 2000); Outlaw v. People, 17 P.3d 150 (Colo. 2001).

In determining whether the temporary detention was reasonable, the court must determine whether the defendant was detained only for the amount of time necessary to complete the purpose of the stop. People v. Cobb, 690 P.2d 848 (Colo. 1984).

When investigating officer suspected that vehicle's occupants might be involved in a burglary or vandalism, the continued detention of defendant while officer examined exterior of nearby building did not exceed the scope of the investigatory stop. People v. Pacheco, 182 P.3d 1180 (Colo. 2008).

Requirement that officer making investigatory stop have reasonable suspicion that individual has committed, or is about to commit, a crime is met if there are specific and articulable facts known to the officer, coupled with rational inferences from those facts, which create reasonable suspicion of criminal activity sufficient to justify the intrusion; only facts known prior to the intrusion may be used to evaluate reasonableness of officer's suspicion. People v. Cooper, 731 P.2d 781 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Wilson, 784 P.2d 325 (Colo. 1989).

Facts uncovered after a chase begins do not enter into the constitutional equation for reasonable suspicion. People v. Rahming, 795 P.2d 1338 (Colo. 1990).

The basis for the reasonable suspicion that an individual has committed or is about to commit a crime is not restricted to the officer's personal observations; an informant's tip may also serve as such basis. People v. Lagrutta, 775 P.2d 576 (Colo. 1989).

Police officers who had warrant to arrest parole violator and had been waiting for search warrant prior to entering violator's residence had reasonable cause to make investigatory stop of man resembling violator who left residence. People v. Cooper, 731 P.2d 781 (Colo. App. 1986).

State trooper's investigatory stop of driver was justified where trooper believed that the driver was intoxicated upon observing that the driver was weaving. People v. Rodriguez, 924 P.2d 1100 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997).

Trooper could ask driver for identification after ascertaining that driver was not intoxicated and deciding not to ticket driver for weaving because trooper still had reasonable suspicion that driver had committed traffic offense of weaving. People v.

Officer had reasonable suspicion that a violation of § 42-4-1107 occurred, thus justifying officer to stop vehicle, where vehicle moved three to four feet into another lane of traffic, essentially straddling the lane divider for several seconds. United States v. Valenzuela, 494 F.3d 886 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1032, 128 S. Ct. 636, 169 L. Ed. 2d 411 (2007).

Traffic stops outside municipal boundaries did not violate clearly established fourth amendment law at the time of the violations. Tenth circuit law did not clearly establish a fourth amendment violation at the time of the conduct. Even assuming a constitutional violation, a reasonable police officer would not have known in 2006 that extra-jurisdictional, but within the same state, traffic stops constituted a violation of clearly established fourth amendment law, when no dispute existed that the officer observed traffic violations before effectuating the stops. Swanson v. Town of Mtn. View, 577 F.3d 1196 (10th Cir. 2009).

Officer's act of merely approaching a person suspected of criminal activity does not constitute a stop; however, when defendant, in an area known for criminal activity where officers had previously taken weapons from others in the area, put his hand behind his back as officer approached and hesitated when asked to show his hand, officer had reason to be concerned about whether defendant was reaching for a weapon, and the totality of the facts and circumstances justified an investigatory stop. People v. Mack, 33 P.3d 1211 (Colo. App. 2001).

Authority to continue with investigatory stop is not changed by the officer's subjective intent not to issue a traffic citation. Officer's request to search vehicle even after he informed the defendant that he had decided not to issue a ticket for weaving could still be considered reasonable. People v. Ramos, 13 P.3d 295 (Colo. 2000).

Investigatory stop or limited search authorized. Three conditions must exist before a person may be subjected to some form of intermediate intrusion, such as an investigatory stop or a limited search of his person: (1) There must be an articulable and specific basis in fact for suspecting that criminal activity has or is about to take place; (2) the purpose of the intrusion must be reasonable; and (3) the scope and character of the intrusion must be reasonably related to its purpose. People v. Tate, 657 P.2d 955 (Colo. 1983); People v. Thomas, 660 P.2d 1272 (Colo. 1983); People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989); People v. Wilson, 784 P.2d 325 (Colo. 1989); People v. Sosbe, 789 P.2d 1113 (Colo. 1990); People v. Carillo-Montes, 796 P.2d 970 (Colo. 1990); People v. Weston, 869 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994); People v. Sutherland, 886 P.2d 681 (Colo. 1994); People v. Litchfield, 918 P.2d 1099 (Colo. 1996); People v. Dowhan, 951 P.2d 905 (Colo. 1998); People v. Archuleta, 980 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1999); People v. Garcia, 11 P.3d 449 (Colo. 2000); People v. Hardrick, 60 P.3d 264 (Colo. 2002).

Condition that purpose of the intrusion be reasonable is met if the scope and character of the intrusion do not exceed its legitimate purpose; an officer's subjective intent to effect an intrusion more extensive than legally justified is not a factor in determining the reasonabless of an intrusion. People v. Lagrutta, 775 P.2d 576 (Colo. 1989).

Whether conditions existed is applied in People v. Villiard, 679 P.2d 593 (Colo. 1984); People v. White, 680 P.2d 1318 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Cagle, 688 P.2d 718 (Colo. 1984); People v. Perez, 690 P.2d 853 (Colo. 1984); People v. Johnson, 691 P.2d 751 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Savage, 698 P.2d 1330 (Colo. 1985); People v. Koolbeck, 703 P.2d 673 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Wilson, 709 P.2d 29 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Trujillo, 710 P.2d 1169 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Cagle, 751 P.2d 614 (Colo. 1988), appeal dismissed for want of a substantial federal question, 486 U.S. 1028, 108 S. Ct. 2009, 100 L. Ed. 2d 597 (1988); People v. Melgosa, 753 P.2d 221 (Colo. 1988); People v. Hughes, 767 P.2d 1201 (Colo. 1989); People v. Sosbe, 789 P.2d 1113 (Colo. 1990); People v. Rahming, 795 P.2d 1338 (Colo. 1990); People v. Smith, 926 P.2d 186 (Colo. App. 1996); People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997); People v. Ingram, 984 P.2d 597 (Colo. 1999).

Facts about criminal activity known to police officers at the time of a stop, even though suspect's conduct is wholly lawful, might justify the suspicion that criminal activity is afoot. People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997).

Defendant's acts of placing his hand behind his back as officer approached and then hesitating when asked to show his hand supported a determination of reasonable suspicion. People v. Mack, 33 P.3d 1211 (Colo. App. 2001).

Four factors used to determine when an investigatory stop becomes an arrest that must be supported by probable cause are: (1) The length of the detention; (2) whether the police diligently investigated their suspicions of criminal activity during the detention; (3) whether the suspect was forced to move to another location; and (4) whether the police unreasonably failed to use the least intrusive means available to resolve their suspicions. People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997).

Test applied in People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997).

But a lengthy detention did not become an arrest when defendant provided a false name that could not be verified. People v. Barnard, 12 P.3d 290 (Colo. App. 2000).

An officer who conducts an investigative detention must do so on the basis of more than an inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or hunch. People v. Rahming, 795 P.2d 1338 (Colo. 1990); People v. Padgett, 932 P.2d 810 (Colo. 1997).

Investigatory stop of vehicle. Law enforcement officers may make an investigatory stop when objective facts and circumstantial evidence suggest that a particular vehicle was or might be involved in criminal activity. People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982); People v. Guffie, 749 P.2d 976 (Colo. App. 1987).

Observations of peace officer and the information known to him immediately prior to investigatory stop of defendant provided officer with reasonable suspicion that defendant had engaged, or was about to engage, in a criminal act where officer had received an anonymous tip that there was suspected drug activity at a site known for prior drug transactions and where such tip was corroborated by the officer's own observations. People v. Canton, 951 P.2d 907 (Colo. 1998).

Requests for information during an investigatory stop of vehicle. A police officer may request a driver's license, vehicle registration, and proof of insurance during a valid traffic stop. People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997).

Officer's action did not amount to investigatory stop where officer merely approached parked vehicle in which defendant was sitting and identified himself as a police officer. People v. Dickinson, 928 P.2d 1309 (Colo. 1996).

Retention of driver's license for a brief period without issuance of traffic citation. The authority of a police officer to issue a traffic citation to the driver of a vehicle who is impeding traffic does not cause all other actions by the officer to be constitutional violations. The court of appeals incorrectly assumed that the constitution requires that once a police officer stops an individual, the officer must either issue a traffic citation and allow the individual to proceed on his way or not take any action. Moody v. Ungerer, 885 P.2d 200 (Colo. 1994).

Although some cases have held that retention of a driver's license is a factor in determining whether a seizure has occurred, no court has held that when an officer retains a license the seizure is per se unreasonable and the traffic stop becomes a violation of the driver's constitutional rights. Moody v. Ungerer, 885 P.2d 200 (Colo. 1994).

Reasonable suspicion is based on the totality of circumstances known to the government at the time of detention. In the case of a drug interdiction, new, expensive, unusually heavy luggage with an unusually large lock, a chemical odor, and no tags identifying the owner destined to a drug source city, constitutes reasonable suspicion. People v. Ortega, 34 P.3d 986 (Colo. 2001).

During the course of an investigatory stop, a police officer may search those areas of the passenger compartment of an automobile in which a weapon may be placed or hidden. However, the officer must possess a reasonable belief based upon specific and articulable facts that the suspect is dangerous and may gain immediate control of weapons. People v. Weston, 869 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994); People v. Litchfield, 918 P.2d 1099 (Colo. 1996).

During the course of an investigatory stop, a protective search for weapons is permitted if the officer has a reasonable basis to suspect that the person might be armed and dangerous, and defendant's action of putting his hand behind his back as officers approached, the officers' awareness that the area was known for criminal activity, and the officers' previous experience of taking weapons from others in the area made it reasonable for the officers to be concerned about whether defendant was reaching for a weapon, thus there was no error in the officer's act of frisking defendant. People v. Mack, 33 P.3d 1211 (Colo. App. 2001).

Defendant's passenger's furtive gesture of bending over to reach or hide something and defendant's giving false name warranted a reasonable belief by police officer who made investigatory stop that defendant was dangerous and could gain immediate control of weapon as required to make weapons search of automobile passenger compartment. People v. Cagle, 751 P.2d 614 (Colo. 1988), appeal dismissed for want of a substantial federal question, 486 U.S. 628, 108 S. Ct. 2009, 100 L. Ed. 2d 597 (1988).

Pat-down search conducted almost fifteen minutes after initial stop of car was reasonable when officer became concerned for his safety. Defendant's retrieval of coat from backseat of car and placement in his lap after police intervention justified search by police. People v. Jackson, 948 P.2d 506 (Colo. 1997).

Action taken to avoid police contact sufficient. Action which does not amount to illegal conduct, but is taken simply to avoid police contact, is sufficient to support an investigatory stop. People v. Thomas, 660 P.2d 1272 (Colo. 1983).

The defendant's physical action in attempting to forcibly open the trailer door and his obvious effort to leave the scene constitute a sufficiently particularized basis in fact for stopping the defendant in order to briefly investigate the circumstances of his conduct. People v. Wells, 676 P.2d 698 (Colo. 1984).

An individual's attempt to avoid coming in contact with a police officer does not, without more, justify an investigative detention of the individual. People v. Rahming, 795 P.2d 1338 (Colo. 1990); People v. Padgett, 932 P.2d 810 (Colo. 1997).

Court properly determined the officer made a proper investigatory stop. The officer was entitled to make an investigatory stop when he observed the defendant at 3:30 a.m. in a dark area not usually frequented by the public and where he had never observed anyone before. In addition, there had been burglaries in the area in the last two weeks and the defendant moved away toward a car when the officer approached. These facts in their totality led to a minimum level of subjective suspicion that the defendant, was, had, or would commit a crime. People v. Rushdoony, 97 P.3d 338 (Colo. App. 2004).

Suspect's attempt to flee from an officer, standing alone, fails to amount to a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity to justify an investigatory stop of the suspect. People v. Archuleta, 980 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1999).

An investigatory stop cannot be justified solely on the reputation of past criminal activity in a locality. A history of past criminal activity in a locality does not justify suspension of the constitutional rights of everyone who may subsequently be in that locality. People v. Padgett, 932 P.2d 810 (Colo. 1997); People v. Archuleta, 980 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1999); Outlaw v. People, 17 P.3d 150 (Colo. 2001).

In order to characterize a forceful encounter as an investigatory stop, there must be the existence of specific facts or circumstances to show that the degree of force used was a reasonable precaution for the safety and protection of the investigating officers. People v. King, 16 P.3d 807 (Colo. 2001).

Passenger's furtive gesture of bending down in his automobile seat after police officer signaled the automobile to stop warranted a reasonable belief that passenger had a weapon in the automobile. Therefore, the scope and character of the automobile search was within the proper scope of stop and search, although further finding was needed as to whether purpose of search was reasonable. People v. Cagle, 688 P.2d 718 (Colo. 1984).

Authority to make search without probable cause is limited in the following manner: There must be (a) some reason for the officer to confront the citizen in the first place, (b) something in the circumstances, including the citizen's reaction to the confrontation, must give officer reason to suspect that the citizen may be armed and, thus, dangerous to the officer or others, and (c) the search must be limited to a frisk directed at discovery and appropriation of weapons and not at evidence in general. People v. Navran, 174 Colo. 222, 483 P.2d 228 (1971); People v. Martineau, 185 Colo. 194, 523 P.2d 126 (1974); People v. Shackelford, 37 Colo. App. 317, 546 P.2d 964 (1976); People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977); People v. Sherman, 197 Colo. 442, 593 P.2d 971 (1979).

There is an area of proper police procedure in which an officer having less than probable cause to arrest nevertheless may detain an individual temporarily for certain purposes and not violate the unreasonable search and seizure limitation. This area the Colorado supreme court has called the "stone area". Stone v. People, 174 Colo. 504, 485 P.2d 495 (1971); People v. Marquez, 183 Colo. 231, 516 P.2d 1134 (1973); People v. Schreyer, 640 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1982).

In the adoption of Crim. P. 41.1, the supreme court recognized that there can be a seizure for some purposes when there is less than probable cause involved. By that rule a judge may enter an order allowing the fingerprints of an individual to be obtained when it is shown by an affidavit (1) that a known criminal offense has been committed, (2) that there is reason to suspect that the individual is connected with the perpetration of a crime, and (3) that the individual's fingerprints are not in the files of the applying agency. Stone v. People, 174 Colo. 504, 485 P.2d 495 (1971).

Trial court properly suppressed evidence seized during search of defendant when fact that defendant ran in opposite direction from companions did not satisfy constitutional requirement of reasonable suspicion for an investigatory stop and scope of resulting search exceeded a pat down for weapons. People v. Wilson, 784 P.2d 325 (Colo. 1989).

There was nothing unusual in an individual slipping on an icy sidewalk and the facts did not rise to the level of an articulable and specific basis in fact that the two men were committing, had committed, or were about to commit a crime. Under the totality of the circumstances, the facts known to the officers at the time of the intrusion did not satisfy the threshold constitutional test for reasonable suspicion. People v. Padgett, 932 P.2d 810 (Colo. 1997).

Reasonableness of protective search. In determining the reasonableness of a search in the situation where the search is not full blown but is rather just a protective search for weapons, the inquiry is a dual one: (1) Was the officer's action justified at its inception, and (2) was the search reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place? People v. Burley, 185 Colo. 224, 523 P.2d 981 (1974).

Where the danger to the police officers was still present at the time the search was initiated, the immediate search for weapons was reasonable. People v. Burley, 185 Colo. 224, 523 P.2d 981 (1974).

The permissible scope of the weapons search is limited by its purpose. People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977).

In order to uphold the stop and frisk as reasonable, both the initial confrontation and the subsequent search must have been prompted by the officers' reliance on particular facts, rather than on inarticulable hunches, and the scope of the frisk must be limited to that necessary for the discovery of weapons. People v. Shackelford, 37 Colo. App. 317, 546 P.2d 964 (1976).

When an officer is justified in believing that the individual whose suspicious behavior he is investigating at close range is armed and presently dangerous to the officer or to others, he may conduct a limited protective search for concealed weapons. People v. Vincent, 628 P.2d 107 (Colo. 1981).

Where police officers have reasonable suspicion to stop and temporarily detain the driver of an automobile and are cautioned beforehand that he might be armed, a contemporaneous, cursory examination for a weapon in the area of the driver's seat is reasonably related in scope and character to ensuring the officers' safety during the period of detention. People v. Lewis, 659 P.2d 676 (Colo. 1983).

Where passenger placed an indeterminate object under automobile seat in response to police encounter and where suspects were observed near the site of possible criminal activity soon after such activity, protective search of automobile was justified. People v. Melgosa, 753 P.2d 221 (Colo. 1988).

An officer's examination of the map pocket located in the driver's side door of an automobile and the contents of the baggies contained therein did not exceed the constitutionally permissible limits of a protective search for a weapon. People v. Weston, 869 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Protective search for weapons satisfies constitutional requirements as long as the intrusion is reasonably related to neutralizing the risk of physical harm confronting the officer during the investigatory stop. People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989).

Where police officer and detective testified that they did not consider individuals at residence to be a threat and that the situation was not one in which they were in danger or in which unknown individuals were throughout the residence, officers' actions were inconsistent with a protective search. People v. Walter, 890 P.2d 240 (Colo. App. 1994).

Protective search of defendant's car was not reasonable since it was not necessary to protect his own safety since he was in handcuffs and no longer had access to the car or its contents nor was it established that the search was necessary to protect the safety of the police officers. People v. Simmons, 973 P.2d 627 (Colo. App. 1998).

Root function of "articulable suspicion" requirement as a condition to the reasonableness of a frisk or pat-down has not been to hamstring officers facing dangerous street situations, but rather, it has been to establish a basis for post hoc judicial review to insure that the weapons frisk is not used as a substitute for a search incident to arrest or as a means of evading the normal warrant and probable cause requirements of the state and federal constitutions. People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977).

When officers may go beyond exterior frisk. Only when some reasonable basis for believing that a weapon may be contained in the clothing, or that an exterior frisk will not be availing in detecting some specific weapon, is the further intrusion of reaching into the pockets or other areas of clothing permitted. People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977).

It is reasonable for a police officer conducting a legal search of premises for narcotics to "frisk" or "pat down" the occupants of the house as well as those coming into the house for weapons in order to protect himself and his fellow officers from the use of such weapons. In connection with such a search, the officer could ask the defendant to remove his hand from his pocket, and if, when the defendant took his hand from his pocket, he held syringes in his hand, the seizure would be justified under the "plain view" doctrine and the subsequent search of the defendant would be valid as incident to his arrest. People v. Noreen, 181 Colo. 327, 509 P.2d 313 (1973).

But where search beyond scope of permissibility. If a police officer reached into the defendant's back pocket to find out what was there, and discovered syringes and drug, the search and seizure would be invalid as beyond the scope of a permissible frisk, for such a search is limited in scope to a pat down or frisk of the clothing for assaultive weapons and not for evidence in general. People v. Noreen, 181 Colo. 327, 509 P.2d 313 (1973).

During protective frisk, closed container recovered from suspect could not be opened by officer unless specific and articulable facts support a reasonable suspicion that the closed container posed a danger to officer and to others. People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989).

Trooper's pat-down search of defendant, conducted under trooper's own "officer safety practice" was not a constitutionally reasonable search. People v. Berdahl, 2012 COA 179, __ P.3d __.

A protective search of an automobile is justified only by the need to protect those present and is therefore limited to those areas in which a weapon may be placed or hidden. People v. Weston, 869 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Officer conducting protective frisk is permitted to make a cursory, plain view examination of any object seized in order to determine whether it indeed is a weapon or other dangerous instrument. People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989).

Officers conducting a protective search of an auto are entitled to make a cursory examination of any objects discovered during the search of the passenger compartment in order to assure themselves that the objects are not dangerous. People v. Weston, 869 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Police protective search of passenger compartment of vehicle justified. People v. Brant, 252 P.3d 459 (Colo. 2011).

Applying the "plain feel" doctrine, police properly seized evidence discovered in cloth glove. People v. Brant, 252 P.3d 459 (Colo. 2011).

Search of trunk did not constitute valid protective or inventory search where police only temporarily detained the rental vehicle and where the driver was to retain control over the vehicle and drive the vehicle to the police station for the purpose of confirming that the driver had lawful possession of the vehicle. People v. Litchfield, 918 P.2d 1099 (Colo. 1996).

Where the detention and search of the defendant exceeded the constitutional limits of an investigatory stop, the strip search of the defendant must be justified either as a search incident to a lawful arrest or as a search within the scope of the defendant's voluntary consent. People v. Lingo, 806 P.2d 949 (Colo. 1991).

Ordering driver to get out of vehicle during traffic stop. It is not an unlawful search or seizure during a lawful traffic stop for a police officer who reasonably suspects a motorist of violating traffic laws to order the motorist to get out of the vehicle and walk to the rear or to some other nearby place to ensure the officer's safety while he investigates suspected traffic violation. People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984).

Stopping a defendant's vehicle to arrest a passenger was constitutionally permissible. Therefore, drugs possessed by the defendant that the police officers found in the vehicle were the fruit of a lawful search incident to the arrest of the defendant's passenger, and not the fruit of an unlawful seizure. People v. Taylor, 41 P.3d 681 (Colo. 2002).

Police officers had reasonable and articulable basis for suspecting criminal activity and initiating a valid investigatory detention, and had a reasonable basis for expanding the scope of the detention for the limited purpose of determining whether the defendant was reaching for a weapon. Facts presented to police that defendant paid for four one-way airline tickets to "source city" for illicit drugs with currency in small denominations and hesitated in providing surnames of passengers were consistent with a drug courier profile. Such profile was confirmed by the police upon observing the defendant and his companions arrive at the airport with only carry-on baggage. Upon the officers' request for identification the defendant's conduct caused the police to be concerned that the defendant was reaching for a weapon. In addition, the officers believed defendant was the subject of an outstanding warrant. People v. Perez, 852 P.2d 1297 (Colo. App. 1992).

Limited seizure aimed solely at neutralizing any threat to officer or citizen is justified and conduct raises reasonable suspicion where officer is engaged in a valid search or arrest and a third party walks into the scene, refuses to show his hands upon request, and makes a furtive gesture. People v. Hardrick, 60 P.3d 264 (Colo. 2002).

Circumstances, taken as a whole, justify officer's stop of defendant: Drugs were found at the scene, thus increasing the risk of violence; occupants of the residence were not cooperative; and defendant did not comply with officer's attempts to ensure defendant was not a safety threat. People v. Hardrick, 60 P.3d 264 (Colo. 2002).

Search and seizure incident to lawful arrest is lawful. People v. Hively, 173 Colo. 485, 480 P.2d 558 (1971); People v. Weinert, 174 Colo. 71, 482 P.2d 103 (1971); People v. Boileau, 36 Colo. App. 157, 538 P.2d 484 (1975).

A reasonable search may be made in the place where a lawful arrest occurs in order to find and seize articles connected with a crime as the fruits thereof, or as the means by which it was committed. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963).

Where the arrest is legal, a search is not violative of the state and federal constitutions regarding unreasonable search and seizure where circumstances justifying the arrest were also those furnishing probable cause for the search. People v. Clark, 173 Colo. 129, 476 P.2d 564 (1970); People v. Noreen, 181 Colo. 327, 509 P.2d 313 (1973).

Where there was probable cause to make the warrantless arrests, the contemporary warrantless searches of the defendants and a U-Haul van were lawful. People v. Nanes, 174 Colo. 294, 483 P.2d 958 (1971).

Opening of "tin-foil" package found in narcotics suspect's pocket held valid as search incident to lawful arrest. People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977).

A search incident to an arrest, for which police officers had no statutory authority but which was constitutionally correct, as the officers had probable cause, is not an unlawful seizure. People v. Wolf, 635 P.2d 213 (Colo. 1981).

Arresting officers are entitled to conduct a thorough search of a defendant's person at the time of his custodial arrest and to seize any contraband they discover, even though it is not related to the crime for which defendant was initially arrested. People v. Harfmann, 633 P.2d 500 (Colo. App. 1981).

Such a search requires no independent justification, such as a reasonable suspicion or belief that the defendant might be armed or in possession of contraband. People v. Tottenhoff, 691 P.2d 340 (Colo. 1984); People v. Bischofberger, 724 P.2d 660 (Colo. 1986); People v. Ratcliff, 778 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1989).

A search incident to the arrest of a minor was valid where the sheriff's deputy had probable cause to make the arrest. People in Interest of S.J.F., 736 P.2d 29 (Colo. 1987).

Search incident to lawful arrest for driving without a license is constitutional. People v. Meredith, 763 P.2d 562 (Colo. 1988).

A search of the passenger compartment of a motor vehicle is valid if (1) there has been a lawful custodial arrested and (2) the person arrested was an occupant or a recent occupant of the vehicle. People v. Savedra, 907 P.2d 596 (Colo. 1995).

Open bed of pickup truck is subject to an incidental search. People v. Barrientos, 956 P.2d 634 (Colo. App. 1997).

A vehicle passenger compartment search incident to arrest is valid even if the defendant is transported from the scene prior to the conclusion of the search. People v. Graham, 53 P.3d 658 (Colo. App. 2001).

Search of a backpack at police station was justified by lawful arrest and prompt conveyance of defendant to police station. People v. Boff, 766 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1988).

Search of defendant's backpack was lawful since it was a search of a container near the defendant incident to arrest. The U.S. supreme court's decision in Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332 (2009), applies only to vehicle searches not a search of a person. People v. Marshall, 2012 CO 72, 289 P.3d 27.

Distinction between an inventory search and a broad evidentiary search is a question of fact under the circumstances of the particular case. People v. Taube, 864 P.2d 123 (Colo. 1993).

Where there are dual purposes for an arrest and search, the trial court must determine whether the purpose of the arrest is a mere pretext intended to validate an otherwise invalid search. Where the officer had information that drugs were located in the defendant's trunk and the officer found the drugs after arresting the defendant on a traffic stop and conducting an inventory search of the car, the trial court was required to determine whether the arrest and resulting inventory search were a pretext for conducting an investigatory search. People v. Hauseman, 900 P.2d 74 (Colo. 1995) (interpreting the fourth amendment to the U.S. Constitution).

When an officer reasonably applies written policy and unwritten routine procedures in deciding to conduct an inventory search, the search is not pretextual. People v. Gee, 33 P.3d 1252 (Colo. App. 2001).

The decision to impound defendant's car was in accordance with standardized police procedure, thus the impoundment and inventory did not violate defendant's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure. People v. Milligan, 77 P.3d 771 (Colo. App. 2002).

The cocaine in defendant's fanny pack inevitably would have been discovered during an inventory of his vehicle, accordingly, the trial court did not err in denying defendant's motion to suppress this evidence. People v. Milligan, 77 P.3d 771 (Colo. App. 2002).

But search incident to unlawful incarceration invalid. Where, under the circumstances of the case, the incarceration was illegal and unjustified, since the accused had funds to post the only bond that the officer could require, the search incident to the incarceration was also invalid. People v. Overlee, 174 Colo. 202, 483 P.2d 222 (1971).

Search may include area under accused's immediate control. The right to search and seize without a search warrant incident to a lawful arrest extends to things under the accused's immediate control, and, to an extent depending on the circumstances of the case, to the place where he is arrested. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 421, 489 P.2d 593 (1971).

An arresting officer has an incidental right to make a contemporaneous search of the person arrested and of things under his control, for weapons by which his escape might be effected or the officer's safety or life endangered. Roybal v. People, 166 Colo. 541, 444 P.2d 875 (1968).

There is ample justification for a search of the arrestee's person and the area "within his immediate control" -- construing that phrase to mean the area from within which he might gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 421, 489 P.2d 593 (1971).

The lawful arrest of a person justifies a contemporaneous warrantless search of the person and the immediately surrounding area. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981); People v. Clouse, 859 P.2d 228 (Colo. App. 1992).

Prosecution can show the search was contemperaneous to the arrest and limited to an area immediately around the arrestee. This search was lawful because the court found there was a continuing and ongoing search of the nightstand that was within the area immediate to the arrestee after the arrest. People v. Gothard, 185 P.3d 180 (Colo. 2008).

Scope of warrantless evidentiary search incident to arrest is limited to evidence related to offense for which arrest is made. In re People in Interest of B.M.C., 32 Colo. App. 79, 506 P.2d 409 (1973).

In a search conducted incident to warrantless arrest, the arresting officers have authority to search for instrumentalities or evidence of the specific crime for which they had probable cause to arrest. People v. Valdez, 182 Colo. 80, 511 P.2d 472 (1973).

Search not unreasonable where officer reasonably believed offense committed. A search and seizure involved was not unreasonable when the officer conducting it had a probable and reasonable belief that an offense had been committed. Hopper v. People, 152 Colo. 405, 382 P.2d 540 (1963).

Search of passenger's purse lawful when search of vehicle incident to lawful arrest of driver. People v. McMillon, 892 P.2d 879 (Colo. 1995); People v. Kirk, 103 P.3d 918 (Colo. 2005).

Searching the call history of a cell phone found on arrestee's person is a lawful search incident to arrest. The officer searched the phone's call history for evidence of the crime, in this case, to confirm that defendant had called the co-conspirator. People v. Taylor, 2012 COA 91, __ P.3d __.

The question of whether the search of the car was incident to arrest was not properly before the court, and the court declined to address it since it was not raised at the trial court level. People v. Thomas, 853 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1993).

People need not show that handcuffed arrestee was physically able to reach exact place searched at exact second searched. People v. Hufnagel, 745 P.2d 242 (Colo. 1987).

Where warrantless entry and arrest are based on probable cause and search warrant is issued subsequent to the entry and arrest, the evidence seized is not inadmissible because of the warrantless entry and arrest. People v. Vaughns, 175 Colo. 369, 489 P.2d 591 (1971).

Scope of search incident to arrests for minor offenses. When persons are arrested for minor traffic violations or minor municipal offenses, the instrumentalities or evidence of such crimes are minimal or nonexistent, and thus the scope of a search incident to such a warrantless arrest would be quite limited. People v. Valdez, 182 Colo. 80, 511 P.2d 472 (1973).

However, even though a person may not be subject to a custodial arrest for possessing one ounce or less of marihuana in violation of § 18-18-406, the non-custodial arrest of such a person may permit not only a search for weapons, but also an extensive search for the instrumentalities of the crime. People v. Bland, 884 P.2d 312 (Colo. 1994).

Scope of inventory search conducted pursuant to protective custody is limited by the privacy interest of the detainee and any closed containers must be set aside and a warrant obtained before they may be opened. However, in an inventory search pursuant to an arrest, the searching officer may completely search all of the arrestee's belongings, including closed containers. People v. Carper, 876 P.2d 582 (Colo. 1994).

Police station, immediately following arrest, is not too remote from the place of arrest in a search and seizure case. Baca v. People, 160 Colo. 477, 418 P.2d 182 (1966); Glass v. People, 177 Colo. 267, 493 P.2d 1347 (1972).

Modern police practice calls for a thorough search at the station house of any person who is taken into custody as well as the "frisking" which takes place at the moment of arrest. Such searches are not unreasonable; they are an integral part of efficient police procedure. Baca v. People, 160 Colo. 477, 418 P.2d 182 (1966); Roybal v. People, 166 Colo. 541, 444 P.2d 875 (1968).

Where, after her arrest, the defendant was transported immediately to police headquarters so that a female matron might conduct the search according to police regulations, the substantially contemporaneous search was made incident to a lawful arrest. People v. Vaughns, 182 Colo. 328, 513 P.2d 196 (1973).

Search preceding arrest cannot be justified as incident to arrest. When the search and seizure preceded the arrest, and the officers intended by the entry and search to secure evidence upon which to predicate the subsequent arrest, such a search is not incident to the arrest, but rather the arrest is in truth incident to the search. The search cannot be justified by what it turned up and is illegal. Wilson v. People, 156 Colo. 243, 398 P.2d 35 (1965).

Where officers who used invalid search warrant to obtain entry to living quarters had no probable cause for arrest of occupant until they unlawfully entered his quarters, search of premised could not be justified as incident to arrest of occupant, whom officers allegedly observed, upon entering quarters, in act of committing crime of illegally possessing narcotics. Brown v. Patterson, 275 F. Supp. 629 (D. Colo. 1967), aff'd, 393 F.2d 733 (10th Cir. 1968).

Unless search and arrest are nearly simultaneous. The arrest need not precede the search where the two acts (search and arrest) are nearly simultaneous and constitute for all practical purposes one transaction. People v. Drumright, 172 Colo. 577, 475 P.2d 329 (1970).

Right to search motor vehicle independent of right to arrest driver. The right to search a motor vehicle may exist independently of the right to arrest a driver or occupant. People v. Meyer, 628 P.2d 103 (Colo. 1981).

Officers not required to ignore evidence in plain view. Police officers standing in a place where they have every right to be are not required to close their eyes to evidence in plain view; and the sight of such evidence can properly form the basis for a determination of probable cause to make an arrest. People v. Baird, 172 Colo. 112, 470 P.2d 20 (1970); People v. Boileau, 36 Colo. App. 157, 538 P.2d 484 (1975).

If an officer sees the fruits of crime--or what he has good reason to believe to be fruits of crime--lying freely exposed on a suspect's property, he is not required to look the other way or disregard the evidence his senses bring him. Marquez v. People, 168 Colo. 219, 450 P.2d 349 (1969).

Where the evidence was voluntarily put on the table in front of the sheriff passing as a buyer, there was no search involved which could be said to be unreasonable. Patterson v. People, 168 Colo. 417, 451 P.2d 445 (1969).

Being legitimately on the property, police officers are entitled to seize any stolen items which are in plain view. Blincoe v. People, 178 Colo. 34, 494 P.2d 1285 (1972); People v. Billington, 191 Colo. 323, 552 P.2d 500 (1976).

Under the plain view rule, where the officer would have been entitled to seize the check stubs and sheets of paper at the time of the search, the officer did not act unconstitutionally in making the seizure at a later time, away from the premises, when examining the papers which were properly recovered pursuant to authorization from the defendant. People v. Billington, 191 Colo. 323, 552 P.2d 500 (1976).

If a police officer observes illegal activity inside a defendant's apartment by looking through the living room window from a common entrance or similar passageway, those observations do not constitute a search. People v. Donald, 637 P.2d 392 (Colo. 1981).

A warrantless seizure does not offend the fourth amendment as long as the incriminating character of an item is immediately apparent and the officer seizing it is lawfully located in a place from which the officer can both plainly see and lawfully access it. People v. Koehn, 178 P.3d 536 (Colo. 2008).

Although items seized were not within the scope of a valid search warrant, the pants pocket and kitchen cabinet were places that could contain guns or bullets for which a search was validly authorized. People v. Koehn, 178 P.3d 536 (Colo. 2008).

Plain view doctrine provides that no warrant is needed to seize evidence in plain view which police or similar public officials see while conducting a legitimate investigation of criminal activity. People v. Gurule, 196 Colo. 562, 593 P.2d 319 (1978).

A well-defined exception to the rule (that warrantless searches and seizures are presumptively invalid) is the plain view doctrine, which holds that a warrant is not required to seize items discovered in plain view while conducting a legitimate investigation of criminal activity. People v. Harding, 620 P.2d 245 (Colo. 1980).

Warrantless search permissible under plain view doctrine where officer entered under exigent circumstances and with the permission of apartment manager who had appearance of authority to consent to search and the contraband was inadvertently discovered. People v. Berow, 688 P.2d 1123 (Colo. 1984).

Evidence seized under plain view exception can be photographed and measured. There is no reason for requiring the police to obtain a search warrant to photograph and measure, as part of an ongoing investigation, evidence which they lawfully seize under the plain view exception. People v. Reynolds, 672 P.2d 529 (Colo. 1983); People v. Reger, 731 P.2d 752 (Colo. App. 1986).

Warrantless search valid under plain view exception when police officer entered under exigent circumstances and had knowledge of facts establishing reasonable nexus between drug bindle and criminal activity. People v. Martin, 806 P.2d 393 (Colo. App. 1990).

The plain view doctrine permits a law enforcement officer to seize evidence that is plainly visible if: (1) Initial intrusion into the premise was legitimate; (2) officer had a reasonable belief that the evidence was incriminating; and (3) officer had a lawful right to access the object. In this case, exigent circumstances justified the officer's presence in the hotel room satisfying the first criteria. Also, the officer observed the clear baggie that appeared to contain methamphetamine, so the incriminating nature of the evidence was apparent, giving the officer the right to seize it. People v. Gothard, 185 P.3d 180 (Colo. 2008).

Consent to entry of a residence for the purpose of inquiry constitutes a valid intrusion for the purposes of the plain view doctrine. Police officers may constitutionally knock at the entrance to a residence and seek permission to enter for the purpose of inquiry and, if the occupant validly consents, the officers may enter. People v. Milton, 826 P.2d 1282 (Colo. 1992).

Consent given to police officers to enter a residence for the purposes of inquiry does not justify otherwise impermissible searches or seizures, but such consent may support seizure of evidence falling within the plain view doctrine. People v. Milton, 826 P.2d 1282 (Colo. 1992).

The mere observation by government officials of that which is plainly visible to anyone does not constitute a search for constitutional purposes. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989).

Plain view doctrine did not apply where marihuana pipe was not visible to officer until after he was standing in the living room without invitation. People v. O'Hearn, 931 P.2d 1168 (Colo. 1997).

The plain feel doctrine is an exception to the warrant requirement that is met when an officer lawfully pats down a suspect's clothing and feels an object whose contour or mass makes its identity immediately apparent. If the object is contraband, the warrantless seizure is justified in the same manner as in a plain view context. When the officer immediately recognized a pipe during a pat-down search, he was entitled to remove the item and seize it upon determining it was contraband. People v. Rushdoony, 97 P.3d 338 (Colo. App. 2004).

Officer's warrantless entry into trailer under emergency doctrine was proper and warranted admission of evidence in plain view in subsequent drug and homicide prosecutions. People v. Reger, 731 P.2d 752 (Colo. App. 1986).

The presence of a burning building clearly created an exigent circumstance that justified a warrantless entry by fire officials to extinguish the blaze and warranted seizure of evidence in plain view. People v. Harper, 902 P.2d 842 (Colo. 1995).

Plain view seizure is permissible where: (1) There is a prior valid intrusion; (2) discovery of the evidence is inadvertent; and (3) the object in plain view possesses a readily apparent incriminating nature. People v. Harper, 902 P.2d 842 (Colo. 1995).

Factors applied in People v. Dumas, 955 P.2d 60 (Colo. 1998).

Police may seize evidence in plain view if: (1) The initial police intrusion onto the premises was legitimate; (2) the police had a reasonable belief that the evidence seized was incriminating; and (3) the police had a lawful right of access to the object. People v. White, 64 P.3d 864 (Colo. App. 2002).

The plain view exception applies to items in open drawers so long as the officer did not pick up or move the object before he or she noticed its incriminating character or open or move the dresser drawer and he or she had lawful access to the object. People v. Bostic, 148 P.3d 250 (Colo. App. 2006).

Rationale behind the plain view exception to the warrant requirement is that, where the police inadvertently come upon evidence during the course of an otherwise lawful search, it would be a needless inconvenience and possibly dangerous to require a warrant for the seizure of such evidence. People v. Stoppel, 637 P.2d 384 (Colo. 1981).

Inadvertence requirement. So long as the police do not have probable cause to believe the evidence in plain view would be present, and the evidence is observed in the course of an otherwise justified search, the inadvertence requirement for a valid warrantless search under the plain view doctrine is met. People v. Stoppel, 637 P.2d 384 (Colo. 1981); People v. Clements, 661 P.2d 267 (Colo. 1983).

When the terms of a search warrant allowed officers to enter a bedroom to measure its dimensions, the discovery of a jar of bullets on the dresser was inadvertent because there was no probable cause to believe a jar of bullets would be found. People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985).

Where police search for bloodstained rags in the garage was valid under the terms of the search warrant, the discovery of a rifle meets the inadvertence requirement when the rifle was found in a place which might have contained the bloodstained rags. People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985).

Reasonable suspicion short of probable cause will justify the superficial scrutiny of an object seen in plain view during the course of a valid search of a defendant's premises. People v. Torand, 633 P.2d 1061 (Colo. 1981).

Evidence in plain view seized during protective search. Seizure of items which are in plain view during a legitimate protective search is constitutional where suspects were stopped in area of criminal activity, where crime tools and possibly stolen items were found in automobile, and where suspect attempted to conceal something under automobile seat, thus providing officer with probable cause to believe that he had come upon incriminating evidence. People v. Melgosa, 753 P.2d 221 (Colo. 1988); People v. Smith, 13 P.3d 300 (Colo. 2000).

Threshold question in determining whether a person has been subjected to unreasonable governmental conduct is whether the person had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the area or item searched or seized. This involves weighing whether (1) the person exhibited a subjective expectation of privacy in the area or item and, if so (2) whether society recognizes such an expectation as reasonable. People v. Carper, 876 P.2d 582 (Colo. 1994).

No legitimate expectation of privacy where defendant was sitting in apartment facing open door which led to hallway of complex which allowed officers to view defendant without entering apartment. People v. Harris, 797 P.2d 816 (Colo. App. 1990).

Escaped probationer had no reasonable expectation of privacy when authorities searched the residence of his parolee brother and found illegal drugs and a deadly weapon belonging to defendant, even when defendant only stayed in brother's residence occasionally. People v. Brown, 250 P.3d 718 (Colo. App. 2010).

No reasonable expectation of privacy exists in a conversation that can be heard without the aid of a listening device by persons lawfully present. People v. Hart, 787 P. 2d 186 (Colo. App. 1989).

There is no expectation of privacy of objects in plain view. People v. Stoppel, 637 P.2d 384 (Colo. 1981).

No expectation of privacy in physical traits. A driver of a motor vehicle has no legitimate expectation of privacy in his physical traits and demeanor that are in the plain sight of an officer during a valid traffic stop. People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984).

Where detainee voluntarily discloses the contents of his pocket to officer conducting an inventory search, detainee has not manifested a subjective expectation of privacy in the contents of his pocket, therefore, conduct of officer in removing a bindle from the detainee's pocket and opening it did not constitute a search or seizure for the purposes of fourth amendment analysis. People v. Carper, 876 P.2d 582 (Colo. 1994).

Unique nature of drug bindle infers contraband contents without any reasonable expectation of privacy so that opening of bindle lawfully seized under plain view exception was permissible. People v. Martin, 806 P.2d 393 (Colo. App. 1990).

Officer may look into automobile. To look into an automobile is not a violation of law, and an officer has the right to shine a flashlight into a car. People v. Ramey, 174 Colo. 250, 483 P.2d 374 (1971).

Where police officer approached parked van in which defendant was seated, acting suspiciously, he had a right to flash his light inside, and marijuana which he saw in the van and seized was admissible against defendant. People v. Shriver, 186 Colo. 405, 528 P.2d 242 (1974).

When an officer legitimately makes an investigatory stop of a vehicle, he may look through a car window and use a flashlight in observing objects lying inside the vehicle. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

It is not against the law for a police officer to look inside a car, nor to use a flashlight to do so. People v. McCombs, 629 P.2d 1088 (Colo. App. 1981).

And may use flashlight in darkened room. Fact that police officer used his flashlight to observe the items in a darkened room does not in and of itself alter the application of the plain view doctrine. People v. Boileau, 36 Colo. App. 157, 538 P.2d 484 (1975).

Articles in plain view inside automobile can be seized. Where articles similar to those reported taken in a burglary are in plain view when an officer shines his flashlight into a car, they can be seized. People v. Ramey, 174 Colo. 250, 483 P.2d 374 (1971).

And officers may thoroughly search such automobile. Once the officers have seen the suspect articles which are in plain view, they have the right thoroughly to search the car. People v. Ramey, 174 Colo. 250, 483 P.2d 374 (1971).

Plain view exception applies to contraband in defendant's home observed by officers using a flashlight to view inside defendant's residence. Officers who were lawfully on defendant's porch when defendant left front door open could use flashlights to peer into the home. The fact that the officers used their flashlights to see inside defendant's home did not transform their plain view observations into an illegal search because, had it been daylight, the contraband on the table inside the home would have been plainly visible to the officers. People v. Glick, 250 P.3d 578 (Colo. 2011).

But mere fact that package is in plain view does not automatically warrant intrusion into its contents. People v. Casias, 193 Colo. 66, 563 P.2d 926 (1977).

Seizure of a plastic bag and its contents falls within the plain view exception of the warrant requirement. Officer's view of the drugs was not obscured by the container because the drugs were clearly visible through the plastic bag, and it was "immediately apparent" to the officer that the bag contained a controlled substance. People v. Hammas, 141 P.3d 966 (Colo. App. 2006).

Auto map pocket is not a closed container. An officer may therefore lawfully examine the contents of the map pocket in the course of a protective search. When a container is not closed or is transparent, the container supports no reasonable expectation of privacy and its contents can be said to be in plain view. People v. Weston, 869 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Evidence discovered during inventory search of defendant's van was admissible in the absence of showing that police acted in bad faith or for sole purpose of investigation. Colo. v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367, 107 S. Ct. 738, 93 L. Ed. 2d 739 (1987).

Evidence discovered in vehicle admissible when found pursuant to a valid inventory search. Pineda v. People, 230 P.3d 1181 (Colo. 2010).

Certain restrictions have been placed upon plain view doctrine in order to protect private citizens from general warrantless seizures being carried out under the guise of a plain view discovery: first, the police must be in a place where they are legitimately entitled to be; second, police cannot use the plain view doctrine as a pretext for a warrantless seizure of evidence they expect to uncover in their search; third, the officer seizing the evidence must have good reason to believe that the exposed item is incriminating evidence, although it need not be illegal per se. People v. Gurule, 196 Colo. 562, 593 P.2d 319 (1978); People v. Harding, 620 P.2d 245 (Colo. 1980); People v. Stoppel, 637 P.2d 384 (Colo. 1981).

A plain view seizure is permissible under the following circumstances: There must be a prior valid intrusion; the discovery of the evidence must be inadvertent; and the officer must have reasonable cause to believe that the exposed item is incriminating. People v. Hearty, 644 P.2d 302 (Colo. 1982); People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985); People v. Lillie, 707 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1985).

While it is required that for a plain view seizure to be permissible the officer must have present knowledge of facts that establish a nexus between the article to be seized and criminal behavior, the criminal behavior need not relate to the criminal activity that brought the officers onto the premises. People v. Lillie, 707 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1985).

Property was properly seized under the plain view doctrine even though it was not contraband, given the disarray of the residence, the character and variety of the property, and the fact that a rifle was found containing an address label that did not match the name and address of any of the persons known to occupy the residence. People v. Lillie, 707 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1985).

Factors establishing a "nexus" between the evidence seized and criminal behavior. In order to seize evidence discovered in "plain view", but not described in the warrant, there must be a "nexus" between the evidence and criminal behavior. Factors relevant to this determination are: (1) Whether the items seized are similar to items described in the warrant; (2) whether the quantity and placement of the property renders it unlikely that the property is on the premises for ordinary use; and (3) whether persons on the scene can offer information concerning the property. People v. Franklin, 640 P.2d 226 (Colo. 1982); People v. Salazar, 715 P.2d 1265 (Colo. App. 1985), cert. denied, 744 P.2d 80 (Colo. 1987).

Police were justified in seizing 13 guns, a large quantity of suspected drugs, and other items during search of defendant's premises where the search warrant police officers were executing described similar items, where some of the items were known to be stolen, and where the amount and location of the items were suspicious. People v. Salazar, 715 P.2d 1265 (Colo. App. 1985), cert. denied, 744 P.2d 80 (Colo. 1987).

Plain view alone is never enough to justify warrantless seizure of evidence. People v. Harding, 620 P.2d 245 (Colo. 1980).

A "plain view" observation requires a prior valid intrusion at the outset. People v. Hogan, 649 P.2d 326 (Colo. 1982).

Plain view doctrine inapplicable. The "plain view" doctrine is not applicable, where the hashish was not in plain view and the officer admitted he did not know what was contained in the aluminum foil package and that it could have contained most anything. People v. Ware, 174 Colo. 419, 484 P.2d 103 (1971).

Plain view doctrine has no valid application where the view of the marijuana on the table, seen through the opening in the doorway after the door had been unlocked and partially opened, was the product of an unlawful entry. People v. Boorem, 184 Colo. 233, 519 P.2d 939 (1974).

Plain view exception did not apply where officers conducted detailed search of defendant's home following issuance of court order for seizure of home under civil forfeiture statutes, but without obtaining a search warrant. People v. Taube, 864 P.2d 123 (Colo. 1993).

Plain view exception did not apply where police officers did not have search warrant to enter apartment to execute arrest warrant even though they could see defendant within the apartment. People v. Aarness, 116 P.3d 1233 (Colo. App. 2005).

If a police officer sees stereo equipment during the search of a residence pursuant to an unrelated warrant which the officer suspects, but has no probable cause to believe is stolen, the officer may not move the equipment to record its serial numbers without violating the constitutional prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure. The "plain view" exception may be invoked only if the serial numbers can be recorded without moving the equipment. People v. Alexis, 794 P.2d 1029 (Colo. App. 1989), rev'd on other grounds, 806 P.2d 929 (Colo. 1991).

"Inventory" exception did not apply where officers searched defendant's home following issuance of court order for seizure of home under civil forfeiture statutes, but without obtaining a search warrant, and no inventory was actually made nor was search limited by standardized criteria. People v. Taube, 864 P.2d 123 (Colo. 1993).

Jailers are not required to obtain a warrant to conduct a second search of an inmate's clothing which has been inventoried and continues to be held in the jail's custody for safekeeping. People v. Salaz, 953 P.2d 1275 (Colo. 1998).

Consent search is outside ambit of traditional fourth amendment warrant requirements. People v. Hancock, 186 Colo. 30, 525 P.2d 435 (1974).

Ordinarily, the fourth amendment bars searches conducted without a warrant issued upon probable cause. However, an exception to this rule has long been recognized for searches conducted with the consent of the person exercising effective control over the place searched or the article seized. People v. Helm, 633 P.2d 1071 (Colo. 1981).

Consent to warrantless search not invalid under the fourth amendment merely because of a reasonable, good-faith mistake of fact by the officers concerning the authority of the party consenting to the search. People v. McKinstrey, 852 P.2d 467 (Colo. 1993); People v. Hopkins, 870 P.2d 478 (Colo. 1994).

As consent to search waives constitutional protection. When an accused consents to a search of his premises, he waives the constitutional protection which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures. Capps v. People, 162 Colo. 323, 426 P.2d 189 (1967).

No warrant need be obtained in order for police to make a search where consent thereto, in light of the totality of the circumstances, has been freely and voluntarily given. People v. Billington, 191 Colo. 323, 552 P.2d 500 (1976); People v. Drake, 785 P.2d 1257 (Colo. 1990).

A search loses its illegal effect when a defendant, complaining thereof, gave permission for such a search of the premises. This consent removes the applicability of the constitutional guaranty. Williams v. People, 136 Colo. 164, 315 P.2d 189 (1957); Hopper v. People, 152 Colo. 405, 382 P.2d 540 (1963); Phillips v. People, 170 Colo. 520, 462 P.2d 594 (1969).

Evidence allegedly obtained by unreasonable search and seizure is not inadmissible where defendant consented to a search of his premises. Williams v. People, 136 Colo. 164, 315 P.2d 189 (1957).

The court need not concern itself with the investigatory procedures of Crim. P. 41.1 where the defendants voluntarily submitted to fingerprinting, thereby waiving their constitutional protections. People v. Hannaman, 181 Colo. 82, 507 P.2d 466 (1973).

A voluntary consent by an occupant of premises authorizing entry by the police for the purpose of effecting an arrest inside the home may constitute, under appropriate circumstances, a valid waiver of the warrant requirement. McCall v. People, 623 P.2d 397 (Colo. 1981); People v. Lingo, 806 P.2d 949 (Colo. 1991).

Police may conduct warrantless search for incriminating evidence when person to be searched voluntarily consents. People v. Diaz, 793 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1990).

Even if police officers' initial entry into defendant's home was not supported by exigent circumstances, defendant's consent to the search of his home was voluntary and attenuated from any illegality; therefore, admission of evidence was not error. People v. Benson, 124 P.3d 851 (Colo. App. 2005).

A warrantless search is valid if an officer reasonably relies on the apparent authority of the person giving consent to the search regardless of the actual authority of the consenting party. People v. Hopkins, 870 P.2d 478 (Colo. 1994).

Defendant's express refusal to consent to a search did not invalidate the search based on voluntary consent of a co-occupant of the premises who had joint access and control. People v. Miller, 94 P.3d 1197 (Colo. App. 2004).

Wife's consent to entry of co-owned home permitted seizure of items in plain view even though the items were in a room that husband warned his wife not to enter. Once the officers were invited in, they had no duty to determine whether the absent co-owner would also consent to the entry. People v. Shover, 217 P.3d 901 (Colo. App. 2009).

A co-owner may consent to a search of their home after the other co-owner is no longer physically present at the residence as long as the police did not remove the other co-owner in order to avoid an objection to the search. Although defendant barricaded himself in the house and forbid the police to enter, after he surrendered and was taken into custody the police could conduct a warrantless search of the home for weapons upon request of the defendant's wife. People v. Strimple, 2012 CO 1, 267 P.3d 1219.

Family friend had actual authority to consent to the police officer's entry into house and it was reasonable for the police officer to believe that he had authority to enter the house based on the apparent authority of the family friend. People v. White, 64 P.3d 864 (Colo. App. 2002).

Warrantless search of property by police who had the voluntary consent of the "caretaker" to search is invalid where the caretaker did not have common authority over the property. Petersen v. People, 939 P.2d 824 (Colo. 1997).

But consent given by both the property manager and apartment tenant provided police with objectively reasonable basis for believing that they were authorized to enter the apartment without a warrant. People v. Trusty, 53 P.3d 668 (Colo. App. 2001).

A search justified by the apparent authority doctrine is not authorized by consent from one with authority to give it. Rather, such a search, without valid consent, does not violate this section because it is not unreasonable. Petersen v. People, 939

However, police belief that a caretaker having no ownership interest in the property could consent to a search was unreasonable because it was a mistake of law and not a mistake of fact. Petersen v. People, 939 P.2d 824 (Colo. 1997).

The question of whether reliance on apparent authority to consent to search is reasonable is a question of law subject to de novo review. People v. Hopkins, 870 P.2d 478 (Colo. 1994).

Although defendant may limit the scope of his consent, and when this occurs the police must likewise limit the scope of their search unless they properly procure a warrant authorizing a broader search. People v. Billington, 191 Colo. 323, 552 P.2d 500 (1976).

Consent to search may be exceeded and must be limited to scope of the consent. Consent to officers' "looking around" house did not authorize extensive 45-minute search. People v. Thiret, 685 P.2d 193 (Colo. 1984).

Scope of consent, where defendant consented to "complete search of my vehicle and contents" and made no attempt to further limit the search, extended to vehicle's trunk, spare tire compartment, and spaces behind loose door panels where contraband might be hidden. People v. Olivas, 859 P.2d 211 (Colo. 1993).

The scope of a general consent search extends to any area that an objective officer could reasonably assume might hold the object of the search, including the trunk of a vehicle and unlocked containers therein. People v. Minor, 222 P.3d 952 (Colo. 2010).

Search of checkbook within scope of defendant's consent to search for drugs, contraband, or weapons because it was objectively reasonable to believe that checkbook could contain drugs. People v. Dumas, 955 P.2d 60 (Colo. 1998).

Warning to defendant that he can refuse to give permission to search without warrant sufficiently advises him of his rights, and it is not necessary to advise him of the right to silence and counsel. Massey v. People, 178 Colo. 141, 498 P.2d 953 (1972).

When consent is given after an interrogation in violation of Miranda, the consent is likely to be constitutionally infirm. People v. Cleburn, 782 P.2d 784 (Colo. 1989).

Evidence obtained when consent to search follows improper police conduct is admissible only if the consent was voluntary and not an exploitation of the prior illegal conduct. People v. Rodriguez, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997).

State troopers' warrantless search failed all three prongs of the test enumerated in Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 95 S. Ct. 2254, 45 L. Ed. 2d 416 (1975), in determining whether a preceding illegal stop renders inadmissible a subsequently obtained inculpatory statement given after Miranda warnings where: (1) The temporal proximity of the illegal detention and the consent to search was immediate; (2) there was no, or no significant, intervening circumstances between the illegal detention and the consent to search; and (3) the illegal detention of defendant for an extended period of time after trooper was satisfied as to the grounds for the initial contact was flagrant. People v. Rodriguez, 924 P.2d 1100 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 945 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1997).

Custody alone does not render consent involuntary. People v. Helm, 633 P.2d 1071 (Colo. 1981); People v. Mack, 33 P.3d 1211 (Colo. App. 2001).

No affirmative duty to warn of right to refuse consent. It is not necessary to impose on police officers an affirmative duty to warn persons of their right to refuse consent because other evidence is often adequate to demonstrate that a search was agreed to voluntarily. People v. Helm, 633 P.2d 1071 (Colo. 1981); People v. Olivas, 859 P.2d 211 (Colo. 1993).

Knowledge of right to refuse consent is not prerequisite to valid consent, but is one of many factors to be considered by the trial court. People v. Helm, 633 P.2d 1071 (Colo. 1981); People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984); People v. Olivas, 859 P.2d 211 (Colo. 1993).

Knowledge of the purpose of a search is not prerequisite to valid consent, but is one of the many factors to be considered by a trial court in determining whether a search was justified on the ground of consent. People v. Santistevan, 715 P.2d 792 (Colo. 1986).

After consent has been granted to conduct search, consent cannot be withdrawn. People v. Kennard, 175 Colo. 479, 488 P.2d 563 (1971).

So courts indulge every reasonable presumption against waiver of fundamental constitutional rights, and this is especially true where the defendant is under arrest. People v. Reyes, 174 Colo. 377, 483 P.2d 1342 (1971).

And the people must prove that consent to search was given; that there was no duress or coercion, expressed or implied; and that the consent was unequivocal and specific and freely and intelligently given. Capps v. People, 162 Colo. 323, 426 P.2d 189 (1967); People v. Reyes, 174 Colo. 377, 483 P.2d 1342 (1971); People v. Billington, 191 Colo. 323, 552 P.2d 500 (1976).

The burden of proof in the determination of whether a consent to a warrantless search is intelligently and freely given rests firmly on the people. People v. Neyra, 189 Colo. 367, 540 P.2d 1077 (1975); People v. Wieckert, 191 Colo. 511, 554 P.2d 688 (1976), overruled on other grounds in Villafranca v. People, 194 Colo. 472, 573 P.2d 540 (1978); People v. Savage, 630 P.2d 1070 (Colo. 1981); People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984); Derdeyn v. Univ. of Colo., 832 P.2d 1031 (Colo. App. 1991).

Prosecution carries the burden to establish by clear and convincing evidence that the consent was voluntary and the trial court's resolution of this issue must be upheld on appeal unless the decision was clearly erroneous. People v. Genrich, 928 P.2d 799 (Colo. App. 1996).

Only requirement of intelligent consent to a search is that the person giving the consent know that he may properly refuse to give his permission to a search conducted without a warrant. Phillips v. People, 170 Colo. 520, 462 P.2d 594 (1969).

Consent must be voluntarily given. A warrantless search is constitutionally justified by a consent to search only if that consent is voluntarily given. People v. Savage, 630 P.2d 1070 (Colo. 1981).

Voluntary consent defined. A voluntary consent to search is one intelligently and freely given. People v. Helm, 633 P.2d 1071 (Colo. 1981); People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984); People v. Santistevan, 715 P.2d 792 (Colo. 1986); People v. Cleburn, 782 P.2d 784 (Colo. 1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 923, 110 S. Ct. 1959, 109 L. Ed. 2d 321 (1990).

While the defendant's knowledge of his right to withhold consent is a factor to be considered, an advisement of this right is not a condition to a finding of voluntary consent. People v. Bowman, 669 P.2d 1369 (Colo. 1983).

Consent is voluntary when it is the result of free and unconstrained choice and not the result of force, threat, or promise. People v. Diaz, 793 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1990).

Voluntary consent to search is the product of an essentially free and unconstrained choice by its maker and not the result of circumstances where the subject's will has been overborne and the capacity for self-determination critically impaired. People v. Reddersen, 992 P.2d 1176 (Colo. 2000).

A search based upon voluntary consent may be undertaken by government actors without a warrant or probable cause, and any evidence discovered during the search may be seized and admitted at trial. People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997).

However, consent is only valid where it is given freely and voluntarily. People v. Morales, 935 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1997).

Test of voluntariness in context of consent searches is whether the consent is the product of an essentially free and unconstrained choice by its maker. People v. Elkhatib, 632 P.2d 275 (Colo. 1981).

If an officer's entry into an apartment was lawful, the occupant's consent to search still must satisfy constitutional standards of voluntariness, that is, it must be the product of an essentially free and unconstrained choice by its maker. People v. Donald, 637 P.2d 392 (Colo. 1981).

The contact between the officers and defendant was a consensual contact and did not amount to a seizure. The evidence supports the conclusion that defendant voluntarily cooperated with the police, in both allowing the police to enter the room and search the room. People v. Tweedy, 126 P.3d 303 (Colo. App. 2005).

Search of defendant's vehicle was consensual. After returning defendant's driver's license and registration, informing defendant he was not issuing him a ticket, and saying good-bye, the officer asked defendant if he had drugs or guns in the vehicle and if he could search the vehicle. Defendant's consent to the search occurred after the initial detention, which was based on a justified traffic stop, so the search was valid. People v. Montalvo-Lopez, 215 P.3d 1139 (Colo. App. 2008).

Driver with control over the vehicle possesses the authority to consent to a search even when owner is present as a passenger. People v. Minor, 222 P.3d 952 (Colo. 2010).

Intoxication does not subvert consent if the individual is capable of giving an explanation of his actions. People v. Helm, 633 P.2d 1071 (Colo. 1981).

The fact that a person was tired, "chemically messed up", and only 18 years old did not support a finding that the person's consent to conduct a search was involuntary. People v. Licea, 918 P.2d 1109 (Colo. 1996).

Unlawful arrest does not render a subsequent consent involuntary, although the consent might well be invalid under the derivative evidence doctrine. People v. Henry, 631 P.2d 1122 (Colo. 1981).

Consent is not rendered involuntary by the fact that the person is in custody and has not been advised of their constitutional rights. People v. Licea, 918 P.2d 1109 (Colo. 1996).

Therefore, a failure to give a Miranda advisement in a non-custodial situation, such as a routine traffic stop, also does not render the consent to search involuntary. People v. Reddersen, 992 P.2d 1176 (Colo. 2000).

Officers do not need to give Miranda warnings prior to asking for consent to perform a search even if the suspect is in custody. The consent need only be voluntary. People v. Garcia, 11 P.3d 449 (Colo. 2000).

Coerced consent involuntary. If there is coercion or duress in the obtaining of the consent, or if the facts and circumstances surrounding the giving of the consent are such as to indicate the unlikelihood of voluntary consent, such consent will be held to be involuntary and therefore unlawful. Capps v. People, 162 Colo. 323, 426 P.2d 189 (1967).

To secure a consent search, the officers may not use any methods which coerce the occupant into waiving fourth amendment rights. People v. Hancock, 186 Colo. 30, 525 P.2d 435 (1974).

Psychologically coerced consent. Police officers from an independent investigation had enough evidence to consider defendant as a prime suspect and had probable cause to believe she had committed several burglaries in the apartment building where she lived, but they did not obtain a search warrant for a search of defendant's apartment. Rather, the officers testified defendant had been the victim of a break-in and sexual assault and one of their officers had interviewed defendant concerning that attack. Thus, the officers said they gained admittance on the pretext that they desired to consult defendant further about the unsolved crime against her person. Under the totality of the circumstances the defendant's actions in consenting to a search of her apartment and admissions of criminality made by her were induced by psychological coercion and a promise made to her by the police that she would not be taken to jail. Thus, consent to the search was not freely and voluntarily given nor was the statement made voluntarily. People v. Coghlan, 189 Colo. 99, 537 P.2d 745 (1975).

Consent obtained by deception constitutionally lacking. Where entry into the home is gained by a preconceived deception as to purpose, consent in the constitutional sense is lacking. McCall v. People, 623 P.2d 397 (Colo. 1981).

Voluntariness determined from totality of circumstances. The determination of the voluntariness of a consent to search is measured by the totality of the circumstances surrounding the purported waiver. This is true regardless of the basis for the challenge. People v. Reyes, 174 Colo. 377, 483 P.2d 1342 (1971); Capps v. People, 162 Colo. 323, 426 P.2d 189 (1967); Phillips v. People, 170 Colo. 520, 462 P.2d 594 (1969); Dickerson v. People, 179 Colo. 146, 499 P.2d 1196 (1972); People v. Wieckert, 191 Colo. 511, 554 P.2d 688 (1976); People v. Savage, 630 P.2d 1070 (Colo. 1981); People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984); People v. Genrich, 928 P.2d 799 (Colo. App. 1996).

Whether or not the consent which is given in a particular case is voluntary is a question to be determined by the court in light of the totality of the circumstances surrounding that consent, and the overriding inquiry is whether the consent is intelligently and freely given. People v. Hancock, 186 Colo. 30, 525 P.2d 435 (1974); People v. Drake, 785 P.2d 1257 (Colo. 1990).

All the evidence, including the various circumstances of the giving of the consent, must be objectively viewed with diligent care by the trial court, and, if the court finds no evidence showing coercion or duress, it is proper to hold that the consent was voluntary and was a knowledgeable waiver of the defendant's constitutional right. Capps v. People, 162 Colo. 323, 426 P.2d 189 (1967).

Under the totality of circumstances test, it is appropriate to take into account both the characteristics of the consenting person, such as youth, education and intelligence, and the circumstances of the search, such as duration and location. People v. Helm, 633 P.2d 1071 (Colo. 1981); People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984); People v. Cleburn, 782 P.2d 784 (Colo. 1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 923, 110 S. Ct. 1959, 109 L. Ed. 2d 321 (1990); People v. Licea, 918 P.2d 1109 (Colo. 1996).

Factors involved in determination of whether the consent was voluntary include the defendant's age, education, intelligence, state of mind, the duration and location of the search, the gravity of any official misconduct, and any other relevant circumstances. People v. Genrich, 928 P.2d 799 (Colo. App. 1996).

Consent to a warrantless search may be implied from the totality of the circumstances. Consent is implied based on the person's conduct in engaging in a certain activity. In this case, there was no conduct by either party in the hotel room that implied consent to enter. Defendant's request to deputy to help get his money back is not sufficient to imply an invitation to enter particularly since the request was made after the deputy entered the room without permission. Since the initial officer's entry was unlawful, the second officer's entry may not be predicated on the first unlawful entry. People v. Prescott, 205 P.3d 416 (Colo. App. 2008).

Relationship between police conduct and a person in defendant's circumstances, and with the defendant's particular characteristics, is necessary for determining whether a consent to search is voluntary. People v. Magallanes-Aragon, 948 P.2d 528 (Colo. 1997); People v. Berdahl, 2012 COA 179, __ P.3d __.

Court applied erroneous subjective standard when it relied exclusively on the defendant's state of mind to determine the voluntariness of a consent to search. The court failed to determine whether the police conduct was objectively coercive in relation to the defendant's subjective state. People v. Magallanes-Aragon, 948 P.2d 528 (Colo. 1997).

The circumstances surrounding a consent to search must be examined for evidence of intrusive, overbearing, or coercive police conduct and whether the impact of such conduct rendered the consent involuntary. People v. Magallanes-Aragon, 948 P.2d 528 (Colo. 1997); People v. Reddersen, 992 P.2d 1176 (Colo. 2000).

If the consent to search the residence was voluntary, the search may be permissible even though the entry was illegal. People v. Genrich, 928 P.2d 799 (Colo. App. 1996).

Prosecution must demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that an occupant freely gave the police consent to enter the premises. In the course of making an inquiry, a police officer is not entitled to walk past the person opening the door to a house without obtaining permission to enter the house. People v. O'Hearn, 931 P.2d 1168 (Colo. 1997).

Trial court's finding of "passive consent" to police officer's entry into a home without a warrant amounted to a finding of no consent in that the finding showed only a failure to object and as such there was an insufficient basis to conclude that the ensuing entry was achieved as a result of the homeowner's consent. People v. Santisteven, 693 P.2d 1008 (Colo. App. 1984).

Evidence held sufficient to establish consent to search. People v. Drake, 785 P.2d 1257 (Colo. 1990).

Trial judge in best position to make determination. The trial judge, having the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses and being able to evaluate their credibility, is in the best position to weigh the significance of the pertinent facts involved and determine whether, under the totality of all the facts and circumstances, the defendant voluntarily consented to this search. Capps v. People, 162 Colo. 323, 426 P.2d 189 (1967); People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984).

Consent waives subsequent objections to search. Where the defendants gave permission to game and fish officer at check station to search the trunk of the automobile, and to look inside the trash bag contained in the trunk of the automobile, this consent waives any objections against the search and seizure. People v. Benner, 187 Colo. 309, 530 P.2d 964 (1975).

Where after the police advised the defendant of his rights, he voluntarily consented to a search for, and examination of, certain clothing which he admittedly wore on the night that the crime was committed, the defendant's consent caused any subsequent attack on the validity of the search to be without merit. People v. Sanchez, 184 Colo. 25, 518 P.2d 818 (1974).

The university of Colorado failed to demonstrate that intercollegiate athletes voluntarily without coercion signed consent forms, where, because of economic or other commitments the athletes had made to the university, they were not faced with an unfettered choice in regard to signing the consent. Derdeyn v. Univ. of Colo., 832 P.2d 1031 (Colo. App. 1991).

Consent is involuntary as a matter of law where evidence was uncovered in an illegal search and defendant was confronted with incriminating evidence when police had firm control over his home and family. People v. Walter, 890 P.2d 240 (Colo. App. 1994).

Apparent owner who has equal access to premises may authorize search. The apparent owner of the property who has equal rights to the use of the premises and has equal access to the premises may legally authorize a search of those premises. Spencer v. People, 163 Colo. 182, 429 P.2d 266 (1967).

Third-party consent. A voluntary consent to a warrantless search may be given by a third party who possesses common authority over, or other sufficient relationship to, the premises. People v. Mickens, 734 P.2d 646 (Colo. App. 1986).

Another person possessing common authority over the premises may consent to a search of those premises. People v. Wieckert, 191 Colo. 511, 554 P.2d 688 (1976).

The authority which justifies third-party consent does not rest upon the law of property but rests rather on mutual use of the property by persons generally having joint access or control for most purposes, so that it is reasonable to recognize that any of the co-inhabitants has the right to permit the inspection in his own right and that the others have assumed the risk that one of their number might permit the common area to be searched. People v. Savage, 630 P.2d 1070 (Colo. 1981).

When two or more persons have equal right of ownership, occupancy, or other possessory interest in the premises searched or the property seized, any one of such persons may authorize a search and seizure thereof thereby binding the others and waiving their rights to object. Lanford v. People, 176 Colo. 109, 489 P.2d 210 (1971).

Defendant's mother could grant consent to a search since she was owner of the house and controlled the possessory interest of those occupying the house; only she made rules concerning what areas of house would be used by whom; and defendant was tenant at sufferance. People v. Lucero, 720 P.2d 604 (Colo. App. 1985).

Consent to a search of a dwelling need not be obtained from the owner, if it is obtained from a third party who possesses "common authority over the property" or some other "sufficient relationship" with it. People v. Rivers, 727 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Kellum, 907 P.2d 712 (Colo. App. 1995); People v. White, 64 P.3d 864 (Colo. App. 2002).

Consent from third party possessing common authority over the premises may be explicit, or it may be inferred from the totality of the circumstances. People v. Rivers, 727 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1986).

The valid consent of a person with common authority justifies a warrantless search of a residence despite the physical absence of the consenting co-occupant and the physical presence of a nonconsenting co-occupant. People v. Sanders, 904 P.2d 1311 (Colo. 1995).

When one co-occupant has victimized the other, the emergency nature and exigent circumstances provided an additional reason for validating a co-occupant's consent to a warrantless search when the nonconsenting co-occupant was present. People v. Sanders, 904 P.2d 1311 (Colo. 1995).

Where alleged accomplice voluntarily consented to the search of his motel room, to which the defendant admittedly had access the day after a burglary, voluntary consent provides an independent and constitutional basis for the search as well as a justification for the use of the items seized as evidence of defendant's guilt in prosecution for burglary in the second degree. People v. Hutto, 181 Colo. 279, 509 P.2d 298 (1973).

A warrantless electronic transmission and monitoring of conversations taking place between a suspect and a police informant in the informant's motel room, when the informant has previously consented to the electronic surveillance, does not violate this section. People v. Velasquez, 641 P.2d 943 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 459 U.S. 805, 103 S. Ct. 28, 74 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1982), reh'g denied, 459 U.S. 1138, 103 S. Ct. 774, 74 L. Ed. 2d 986 (1983).

Babysitter and her mother could not grant consent to search of homeowner's bedroom where there was no evidence that homeowner or his wife delegated authority to babysitter with regard to residence beyond that necessary to care for children or that police officer reasonably believed babysitter or her mother had the authority to consent to a search of homeowner's bedroom. People v. Walter, 890 P.2d 240 (Colo. App. 1994).

So may resident of apartment. A resident of an apartment has the ability to consent to a search of the premises, and a search based on such consent is not illegal. Lanford v. People, 176 Colo. 109, 489 P.2d 210 (1971).

Mere property interest not common authority. Common authority over property to consent to a warrantless search is not to be implied from the mere property interest a third party has in the property. People v. Savage, 630 P.2d 1070 (Colo. 1981).

Valid consent inferred where individual giving consent had been entrusted with a key by individual seeking to suppress the evidence discovered. People v. Rivers, 727 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1986).

Consent by wife. That defendant's wife was told a warrant would be sought if her consent to search their home was not obtained does not negate the evidence which strongly supports the trial court's finding of consent. People v. Hancock, 186 Colo. 30, 525 P.2d 435 (1974).

The evidence supported the court's finding that defendant's wife freely and voluntarily consented to the search of her premises where she was informed by the police that they would not conduct the search if she did not want them to, and she responded that she wanted all of the guns out of her house, and where she assisted the police officers in their efforts to locate a revolver in the garage and offered them coffee while they searched her house. People v. Wieckert, 191 Colo. 511, 554 P.2d 688 (1976).

But landlord is not proper person to give consent to search of his tenant's residence. Condon v. People, 176 Colo. 212, 489 P.2d 1297 (1971).

Absent a showing of authority from the tenant to the apartment manager, the manager cannot authorize or permit an entry into a tenant's apartment in the absence of exigent circumstances. People v. Boorem, 184 Colo. 233, 519 P.2d 939 (1974).

Reliance on consent of landlord is a mistake of law and not a mistake of fact. Therefore, search does not fall within the good faith exception of § 16-3-308. People v. Brewer, 690 P.2d 860 (Colo. 1984) (decided prior to 1985 amendment to § 16-3-308).

Apartment manager had necessary appearance of authority to consent to warrantless search of tenant's apartment when he had been asked by tenant to watch the apartment and to arrest intruders and when he had a substantial interest in protecting hotel as the security and maintenance manager. People v. Berow, 688 P.2d 1123 (Colo. 1984).

Juvenile as consenting party. The same test is applicable to the validity of the search whether the consenting party is an adult or a juvenile with the one exception noted in the children's code, section 19-2-102(3)(c). That is, a parent, guardian, or legal custodian of the child must be present, and freely and intelligently give his consent. People v. Reyes, 174 Colo. 377, 483 P.2d 1342 (1971).

The fact that one is a minor does not necessarily preclude effective consent to a search, especially where the person consenting has a greater right in the premises searched than the person who is contesting the legality of the search. Blincoe v. People, 178 Colo. 34, 494 P.2d 1285 (1972).

Since § 19-2-210 (1) does not apply to consent to search by juvenile in a noncustodial setting, the proper test to measure the validity of the consent is set forth in §§ 19-2-208 and 19-2-209 (4). People in Interest of S.J., 778 P.2d 1384 (Colo. 1989).

Consent held valid. Where a police officer advised a juvenile defendant and his father that a search warrant could be obtained if the defendant's father did not sign the consent form, and it was contended that the representation constituted coercion, it was held that consent was "freely and intelligently" given. People v. Reyes, 174 Colo. 377, 483 P.2d 1342 (1971).

Where the defendant on two separate occasions gave his consent to search his motel room to two different officers, although at the times of consent he was under arrest, handcuffed, and claiming innocence, nevertheless the totality of all the facts and circumstances did not create a situation where it must be said as a matter of law that the defendant's consent was involuntary. Capps v. People, 162 Colo. 323, 426 P.2d 189 (1967).

Where a defendant is informed of his right not to allow officers to search his vehicle without their first obtaining a warrant, and he not only consents to the search but unlocks the trunk himself, he is under no duress or coercion and he knowingly and intelligently waives his constitutional rights by consenting to the search. Dickerson v. People, 179 Colo. 146, 499 P.2d 1196 (1972).

Where the defendant attempted to direct the police officers to enter his car and remove the articles which were in it clearly compelling the officers to inventory the contents of the car for the protection both of the defendant and themselves, as a matter of law, this was a consent of the defendant for them to enter the car. Upon entry the articles in question were then in plain view. People v. Bordeaux, 175 Colo. 441, 488 P.2d 57 (1971).

The defendant's contention that the officers lacked authority to search the trunk of his sister's car does not have merit where his sister consented to the procedures which were followed and cooperated with the F.B.I. in making the arrest possible.

Sergent v. People, 177 Colo. 354, 497 P.2d 983 (1972).

Whether or not a search was incident to the defendant's arrest need not be decided, where it is clear that the defendant consented to the search after he had been given his Miranda warnings and had indicated that he understood his rights. Sergent v. People, 177 Colo. 354, 497 P.2d 983 (1972).

Evidence held sufficient to establish consent to search. Lanford v. People, 176 Colo. 109, 489 P.2d 210 (1971).

Circumstances supported the trial court's conclusion that defendant did not consent to a search of his car since, unlike the pat-down search which was accomplished immediately and accompanied by repeated expressions of consent, thereby resolving any ambiguity, the search of the car was conducted after the defendant was taken into custody, back-up was radioed and had arrived, and defendant received his Miranda warnings. People v. Thomas, 853 P.2d 1147 (Colo. 1993).

Where trial court evaluated conflicting testimony and evidence relevant to the issue of consent to search home without a warrant and determined that defendant did not consent to a search of his home, absent lack of evidence in the record to support the trial court's factual findings, reviewing court is bound to uphold the trial court's conclusion of lack of consent and unlawful search. People v. Mendoza-Balderama, 981 P.2d 168 (Colo. 1999).

A search made pursuant to consent must be limited to the scope of the consent actually given, and the consent is measured by "objective reasonableness". A suspect who consents only to a limited search for certain materials does not automatically insulate him or herself from the lawful seizure of other objects not delineated in the officer's request; seizure is lawful if justified by another exception to the warrant requirement. People v. Najjar, 984 P.2d 592 (Colo. 1999); People v. Mack, 33 P.3d 1211 (Colo. App. 2001).

The act of taking blood for a blood test and the process of collecting and testing urine samples constitute an invasion of an employee's privacy interest and therefore constitute a "search" under the fourth amendment. Casados v. City and County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1994).

Collection of blood sample does not constitute unreasonable search and seizure. People v. Duemig, 620 P.2d 240 (Colo. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 971, 101 S. Ct. 2048, 68 L. Ed. 2d 350 (1981).

Standard for admissibility of blood sample. The standard for determining the admissibility of a blood sample is that the trial court must determine that the police were justified in requiring the defendant to submit to the blood test, and that the means and procedures used were reasonable. People v. Rodriquez, 645 P.2d 857 (Colo. App. 1982).

Blood sample taken prior to defendant's arrest and without his permission is not violation of defendant's constitutional rights so long as the facts establish probable cause to make such arrest at the time the sample is taken. People v. Sutherland, 683 P.2d 1192 (Colo. 1984); People v. Milhollin, 751 P.2d 43 (Colo. 1988); People v. MacCallum, 925 P.2d 758 (Colo. 1996).

The test set forth in Schmerber v. California (384 U.S. 757, 86 S. Ct. 1826, 16 L. Ed. 2d 908 (1966)) shall be the test which governs extraction of an involuntary blood sample from a putative defendant who is suspected of an alcohol-related driving offense. The four requirements of the test are: (1) Probable cause for arrest of the defendant for an alcohol-related driving offense; (2) a clear indication that the blood sample will provide evidence of the defendant's level of intoxication; (3) exigent circumstances which make it impractical to obtain a search warrant; and (4) reasonableness including conducting of the test in a reasonable manner. People v. Sutherland, 683 P.2d 1192 (Colo. 1984); People v. Milhollin, 751 P.2d 43 (Colo. 1988); People v. Shepherd, 906 P.2d 607 (Colo. 1995); People v. MacCallum, 925 P.2d 758 (Colo. 1996).

Where there were consistent statements from witnesses that the defendant was operating a motorcycle at an excessive speed and in a dangerous manner, where the investigating trooper noted that the defendant had the odor of an alcoholic beverage on his breath and had bloodshot eyes, where it has been established that the percentage of alcohol in the blood begins to diminish shortly after drinking stops, and where blood has been extracted in a hospital environment according to accepted medical practices, the test requirements which govern the extraction of an involuntary blood sample have been met. People v. Milhollin, 751 P.2d 43 (Colo. 1988).

Probable cause existed to arrest driver where three eyewitnesses observed the driver's conduct of reckless and dangerous driving for a sustained period of time over the course of 15 miles, where the pattern of driving observed was highly unusual and erratic, and where the driver ultimately caused an accident that killed another motorist. People v. MacCallum, 925 P.2d 758 (Colo. 1996).

Standard for forced production of bodily fluids. In determining whether forced production of bodily fluids is permissible, the appropriate standard is clear indication that evidence of intoxication or drug abuse will be found. Moreover, there must be some indication that evidence of drugs or alcohol, if found, will be relevant to a crime for which the defendant may be charged. In the typical alcohol or drug case, this clear indication requirement is easily satisfied by observations of the defendant's speech, gait, breath, appearance, and conduct. People v. Williams, 192 Colo. 249, 557 P.2d 399 (1976); People v. Milhollin, 751 P.2d 43 (Colo. 1988).

Taking blood under implied consent law not unconstitutional. The implied consent law is constitutional; and although it has been determined that the taking of blood is an intrusion of the person and a search within the meaning of the state and federal constitutions, such is not an unreasonable search and seizure violative of the fourth amendment or this section. Compton v. People, 166 Colo. 419, 444 P. 2d 263 (1968); People v. Brown, 174 Colo. 513, 485 P.2d 500 (1971), appeal dismissed, 404 U.S. 1007, 92 S. Ct. 671, 30 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1972).

Where the defendant was charged with causing injury while driving under the influence of intoxicating liquor, the trial court correctly denied the motion to suppress the blood sample where the defendant was in a semiconscious condition and was unable to consent or to refuse to give his consent. People v. Fidler, 175 Colo. 90, 485 P.2d 725 (1971).

Even if taken in nonmedical environment. Notwithstanding the fact that the blood extraction for the purpose of administering blood-alcohol test took place in a nonmedical environment without a doctor or nurse present, where the record reveals that a highly qualified and experienced medical technologist took the blood sample in conformity with the department of health regulations and with no infringement upon the personal dignity of the defendant, the taking was well within the ambit of a reasonable search. People v. Mari, 187 Colo. 85, 528 P.2d 917 (1974).

Standard for admissibility of roadside sobriety test. To satisfy constitutional guarantees against unlawful searches and seizures, a roadside sobriety test can be administered only when there is probable cause to arrest the driver for driving under the influence of, or while his ability is impaired by, intoxicating liquor or other chemical substance, or when the driver voluntarily consents to perform the test. People v. Carlson, 677 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1984).

Urine sample taken prior to defendant's arrest and without his permission is not violation of defendant's constitutional rights so long as the facts establish probable cause to make such arrest at the time the sample is taken. People v. Kokesh, 175 Colo. 206, 486 P.2d 429 (1971).

Blood and urine test evidence properly suppressed. Where there were no signs of defendant's being drunk observed either in her home or, later, at the hospital, the searches which obtained blood and urine samples against her will were conducted without any clear indication that these fluids would produce evidence of intoxication or drug use, thus violating her rights under the fourth amendment and this section, and the blood and urine test evidence was properly suppressed. People v. Williams, 192 Colo. 249, 557 P.2d 399 (1976).

Requiring blood samples from a person convicted of a crime for DNA identification purposes satisfies the "special needs" exception to the fourth amendment. A DNA database serves a number of special needs beyond normal law enforcement, namely bringing closure to victims of past crimes and sheltering society from future victimization. These interests weigh heavily compared to the minimal intrusion into the greatly reduced expectation of privacy of the person convicted of a crime. People v. Shreck, 107 P.3d 1048 (Colo. App. 2004); People v. Ramirez, 140 P.3d 169 (Colo. App. 2005).

Applied to probationer in People v. Rossman, 140 P.3d 172 (Colo. App. 2006).

Privacy interests of a person on probation do not outweigh governmental interests in obtaining samples for DNA database. Defendant, who was on probation, could be ordered to submit biological samples for DNA testing without violating the state and federal constitutional prohibition against warrantless searches and seizures conducted without probable cause. A probationer has a diminished right to privacy that does not outweigh the government interests served by DNA databases, which are "undeniably compelling" and "monumental" in weight. People v. Rossman, 140 P.3d 172 (Colo. App. 2006).

Defendant's consent to DNA identification is not involuntary merely because defendant is not informed that the identification will be used in other investigations. People v. Collins, 250 P.3d 668 (Colo. App. 2010).

A reasonable person would understand that DNA sample taken and data obtained from analysis of the sample would remain in possession of law enforcement and be available for future law enforcement uses. Therefore, when a defendant consents to DNA testing without limitation, there is no constitutional violation if the sample is used to solve another crime. People v. Collins, 250 P.3d 668 (Colo. App. 2010).

Seizure of business records did not violate defendant's privilege against self-incrimination because defendant was not "compelled" to produce the papers; the papers were not communicative in nature, but were business records of which others must have had knowledge, rather than personal and private writings; and the papers were instrumentalities of the crime with which defendant was charged. People v. Tucci, 179 Colo. 373, 500 P.2d 815 (1972).

Discovery of contraband which is result of private inspections is constitutionally permissible. People v. Hively, 173 Colo. 485, 480 P.2d 558 (1971).

When evidence comes into the possession of government without violation of petitioner's rights by governmental authority, there is no reason why the fact that individuals, unconnected with the government, may have wrongfully taken them, should prevent them from being held for use in prosecuting an offense where the documents are of an incriminatory character. People v. Benson, 176 Colo. 421, 490 P.2d 1287 (1971).

Airline has right to make own independent investigation of packages in its own interests--to protect lives and property from possible destruction from bombing--without the instigation or participation of law enforcement officials. People v. Hively, 173 Colo. 485, 480 P.2d 558 (1971).

Airline freight personnel have the right and authority to make a reasonable inspection of packages accepted for shipment. People v. Hively, 173 Colo. 485, 480 P.2d 558 (1971).

And airline, upon discovery of contraband, has duty to notify authorities. People v. Hively, 173 Colo. 485, 480 P.2d 558 (1971).

Information obtained by officers after such notification is not tainted. Where an airline freight agent in San Francisco made a search on his own initiative of a package accepted for shipment, this was a lawful private inspection; and information obtained by officers after they had been notified by agent that the package contained dangerous drugs was not "tainted" and could serve as foundation for probable cause to make arrest and seizure at destination in Denver to which package was addressed. People v. Hively, 173 Colo. 485, 480 P.2d 558 (1971).

Warrantless search lawful after defendant went through airport security checkpoint and need not be justified by any showing of probable cause or reasonable suspicion. Due to concern about air piracy or other acts of terrorism, after a potential passenger voluntarily consents to a search by submitting himself to the screening process, airport security is justified in conducting further physical search of carry-on item. Although continued search must be limited to determination of whether potential passenger is carrying an object that is potentially dangerous to air commerce, drugs discovered during the process are admissible. People v. Heimel, 812 P.2d 1177 (Colo. 1991).

Once defendant consented to security screening by walking though the magnetometer, he had no right to withdraw that consent prior to completion of a reasonable search of his bag. To allow withdrawal of consent prior to completion of the screening process would encourage airline terrorism by providing a secure exit where detection was threatened. People v. Heimel, 812 P.2d 1177 (Colo. 1991).

Potential passenger has the right to refuse an airport security search by leaving the area at any time prior to the actual commencement of the screening process and such refusal, without more, would not furnish any objective justification for any further detention or search. People v. Heimel, 812 P.2d 1177 (Colo. 1991).

Where individual relinquishes his claim to privacy in contraband and therefore is not the victim of an illegal search and seizure, the evidence seized is admissible against him. Dickerson v. People, 179 Colo. 146, 499 P.2d 1196 (1972).

Abandoned property. When all dominion and control over an article is surrendered by the act of the defendant, his capacity to object to search and seizure without a warrant is at an end. Smith v. People, 167 Colo. 19, 445 P.2d 67 (1968); Kurtz v. People, 177 Colo. 306, 494 P.2d 97 (1972).

When defendants abandon their vehicle and its contents, they have no standing to object to a subsequent search of the vehicle and seizure of evidence. People v. Hampton, 196 Colo. 466, 603 P.2d 133 (1979).

Where the defendants, or one of them, left a watch in a police car, it was abandoned, and the finding of it was not a search. People v. Ramey, 174 Colo. 250, 483 P.2d 374 (1971).

When the defendant expelled the incriminating evidence from his person, and from the vehicle, in which he was riding as a passenger, and it lit on a vacant lot, his dominion over and control of the evidence ended. Therefore, the act of the police officer in picking it up from the ground did not come within the realm of a search and seizure, and the incriminating evidence as far as the defendant was concerned was abandoned contraband in plain view. Martinez v. People, 169 Colo. 366, 456 P.2d 275 (1969).

Exploratory canine sniff of defendant's safe was a constitutional warrantless search where police had requisite reasonable suspicion that safe contained drugs. People v. Unruh, 713 P.2d 370 (Colo. 1986), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1171, 106 S. Ct. 2894, 90 L. Ed. 2d 981 (1986).

A dog sniff search need not be justified by probable cause sufficient to obtain a search warrant, but instead by reasonable suspicion, similar to that required to stop and frisk a person suspected of involvement in imminent criminal activity. People v. Wieser, 796 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1990); People v. Unruh, 713 P.2d 370 (Colo. 1986); People v. Boylan, 854 P.2d 807 (Colo. 1993).

The dog sniff of defendants' package sent by a private overnight courier was a search, but it was supported by reasonable suspicion and therefore legal. People v. Boylan, 854 P.2d 807 (Colo. 1993).

A dog sniff search of a person's automobile in connection with a traffic stop that is prolonged beyond its purpose to conduct a drug investigation intrudes upon a reasonable expectation of privacy and constitutes a search and seizure requiring reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. People v. Haley, 41 P.3d 666 (Colo. 2001).

The totality of the circumstances demonstrated that the postal inspector had reasonable suspicion that the package contained narcotics before the dog-sniff search. People v. May, 886 P.2d 280 (Colo. 1994).

A dog sniff search of a lawfully stopped automobile does not violate the state constitution search and seizure provisions and does not require reasonable suspicion. There is no legitimate interest in possessing contraband, and the action of the dog is not a search since it only communicates the dog's belief that illegal drugs are present. People v. Esparza, 2012 CO 22, 272 P.3d 367.

Search of public alley. Defendant's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure does not require the police officer to obtain a search warrant before searching a public alley. Martinez v. People, 162 Colo. 195, 425 P.2d 299 (1967).

D. Unreasonable Search and Seizure.

Law reviews. For article, "Logical Fallacies and the Supreme Court", see 59 U. Colo. L. Rev. 741 (1988). For comment, "An Exclusionary Rule Colorado Can Call Its Own", see 63 U. Colo. Law. 207 (1992).

A warrantless search of a shared dwelling for evidence over the express refusal of consent by a physically present defendant cannot be justified as reasonable on the basis of consent given to the police by another resident. People v. Miller, 143 P.3d 1195 (Colo. App. 2006); People v. Nelson, 2012 COA 37M, __ P.3d __.

Because the cell phone in question could not be fairly characterized as abandoned, lost, or mislaid under the circumstances of the case, the warrantless examination of its contents amounted to an unconstitutional search. People v. Schutter, 249 P.3d 1123 (Colo. 2011).

The policy underlying the exclusionary rule is deterrence of police misconduct. People v. Press, 633 P.2d 489 (Colo. App. 1981).

The primary purpose of the exclusionary rule is to deter unlawful police conduct by the exclusion of evidence which is the fruit of that unlawful conduct. People v. Banks, 655 P.2d 1384 (Colo. App. 1982).

Exclusionary rule is designed primarily to deter unlawful searches and seizures by police. People v. Fournier, 793 P.2d 1176 (Colo. 1990); People v. McKinstry, 843 P.2d 18 (Colo. 1993).

The exclusionary rule is intended to deter improper police conduct and should not be applied in cases where the deterrence purpose is not served, or where the benefits associated with the rule are minimal in comparison to the costs associated with the exclusion of the probative evidence. People v. Altman, 960 P.2d 1164 (Colo. 1998).

Defendant may not respond to an unreasonable search or seizure by a threat of violence against the officer and then rely on the exclusionary rule to suppress evidence pertaining to the criminal act of obstructing a peace officer and resisting arrest. People v. Brown, 217 P.3d 1252 (Colo. 2009).

Application of exclusionary rule in a dependency and neglect case requires the court to balance the deterrent benefits of applying the rule against the societal cost of excluding relevant evidence. People ex rel. A.E.L., 181 P.3d 1186 (Colo. App. 2008).

Here, applying the rule would have a high societal cost in terms of protecting child welfare interests. Therefore, the court did not err in denying mother's motion to suppress evidence. People ex rel. A.E.L., 181 P.3d 1186 (Colo. App. 2008).

The inevitable discovery exception to the exclusionary rule applies to both primary evidence and to secondary evidence. People v. Burola, 848 P.2d 958 (Colo. 1993); People v. Welsh, 58 P.3d 1065 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd on other grounds, 80 P.3d 296 (Colo. 2003).

Where there was neither a search warrant, consent nor a valid arrest, the search was improper. Gale v. People, 174 Colo. 491, 484 P.2d 1210 (1971).

Test of admissibility of evidence obtained in, or as a result of, an illegal search is whether the challenged evidence was obtained by exploitation of the initial illegality or, instead, whether it was obtained by a means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of primary taint. People v. Hogan, 703 P.2d 634 (Colo. App. 1985).

In determining whether the taint of an illegality has been dissipated, consideration is given to the temporal proximity of the illegality and defendant's statements, the presence of intervening circumstances, and the purpose and flagrancy of any official misconduct. People v. Harris, 729 P.2d 1000 (Colo. App. 1986).

The "fruit of the poison tree" doctrine which requires that evidence obtained as a result of an unconstitutional arrest be suppressed, is an exclusionary rule created primarily to deter unlawful police actions, and is applicable both to the illegally obtained evidence itself, as well as to any derivative evidence. People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

Exclusionary rule inapplicable where police conduct not improper. When there is no improper police conduct, the exclusionary rule is not applicable since its use would serve no purpose but to deprive the prosecution of reliable and probative evidence. People v. Banks, 655 P.2d 1384 (Colo. App. 1982).

Police conduct exercised in "good faith". A major consideration in determining the admissibility of statements obtained pursuant to alleged illegal police conduct is whether the law enforcement officer's conduct was exercised in "good faith", rather than as being purposeful or flagrant misconduct. People v. Banks, 655 P.2d 1384 (Colo. App. 1982).

Where defendant police officers removed property without legal authority, their search for and seizure of fixtures was per se unreasonable and subjects defendant officers to civil liability for any resulting damages. Walker v. City of Denver, 720 P.2d 619 (Colo. App. 1986).

Governmental conduct must constitute search. In order for the exclusionary rule to apply, there first must be a determination that the challenged governmental conduct constitutes a search. People v. Gomez, 632 P.2d 586 (Colo. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 943, 102 S. Ct. 1439, 71 L. Ed. 2d 655 (1982).

Police-citizen encounter did not amount to a "seizure" within the meaning of this section. Two-minute conversation between police officers and defendant at the airport, where the police officer asked the defendant six basic questions in non-intimidating manner and without blocking the defendant's movement, was not a seizure. People v. Johnson, 865 P.2d 836 (Colo. 1994).

No seizure occurs during a consensual interview where a police officer merely seeks voluntary cooperation of a citizen by asking noncoercive questions. People v. Coleman, 55 P.3d 817 (Colo. App. 2002).

Prosecutor not required to object at every instance to a trial court's mischaracterization of the prosecution's argument that a police-citizen encounter did not amount to a seizure requiring reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. Remand to the district court was unnecessary to address the issue of the stop. People v. Johnson, 865 P.2d 836 (Colo. 1994).

Suppression of evidence obtained during extraterritorial arrest. Future violations of the statutes governing peace officers' authority to arrest may trigger application of the exclusionary rule and require suppression of evidence obtained in the course of an extraterritorial arrest. People v. Wolf, 635 P.2d 213 (Colo. 1981).

Officer making unconstitutional search violates law. Every officer making an unconstitutional search, and every officer advising or conniving at such conduct is a law violator. Massantonio v. People, 77 Colo. 392, 236 P. 1019 (1925).

Defendant's allegedly criminal acts were sufficiently attenuated from any illegal conduct of sheriff's deputies so that exclusion of evidence was not appropriate. Evidence of a new crime committed in response to an unlawful trespass is admissible. People v. Doke, 171 P.3d 237 (Colo. 2007).

Fruits of unlawful search are inadmissible in evidence. The fruits of an unlawful search are, by Mapp v. Ohio (367 U.S. 643, 81 S. Ct.

1684, 6 L. Ed. 2d 1081 (1961)) and by Crim. P. 41 inadmissible in evidence. Hernandez v. People, 153 Colo. 316, 385 P.2d 996 (1963).

Laudable ends no longer justify illegal means to obtain those ends and illegal searches can no longer furnish a foundation for the admission of evidence found and taken under illegal search. Wilson v. People, 156 Colo. 243, 398 P.2d 35 (1965).

In granting motion to suppress, where court finds that probable cause for arrest without a warrant is not shown, the subsequent search and seizures are invalid. People v. Trujillo, 179 Colo. 428, 500 P.2d 1176 (1972).

Fruits of search predicated on unlawful arrest cannot be used as evidence against defendants. Gale v. People, 174 Colo. 491, 484 P.2d 1210 (1971).

Where articles are seized incident to an arrest which is made without probable cause, the defendants' motion to suppress will be sustained. People v. Navran, 174 Colo. 222, 483 P.2d 228 (1971).

Where the arrest of the defendant was "unreasonable" when tested by balancing the need to arrest under the exigencies of the situation against the invasion of the privacy which the arrest entailed, any evidence obtained is not admissible. People v. Nelson, 172 Colo. 456, 474 P.2d 158 (1970).

Where police officers' initial entry into apartment to execute arrest warrant was unlawful, all physical evidence seized from defendant's person and from other occupants of apartment should have been suppressed. People v. Aarness, 116 P.3d 1233 (Colo. App. 2005).

Where the sole basis of a probable cause for the search of the defendant's home presented in the affidavit was his confession, and that confession was illegally obtained under the "fruit of the poison tree" doctrine, the articles obtained must be suppressed. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 373, 489 P.2d 588 (1971).

Having arrested defendant illegally, the prosecution cannot claim that evidence obtained as a result of this arrest need not be suppressed because it was abandoned by defendant. Mora v. People, 178 Colo. 279, 496 P.2d 1045 (1972).

Unless recognized exception to the exclusionary rule applies, evidence obtained by police as result of an unlawful search and seizure is not admissible against the defendant. People v. Fournier, 793 P.2d 1176 (Colo. 1990); People v. McKinstry, 843 P.2d 18 (Colo. 1993).

Fruit must be obtained as direct result of violation of defendant's constitutional rights. To apply the "fruit of the poison tree" doctrine, which is applicable in Colorado, the fruit of the search must have been obtained as the direct result of a violation of the defendant's constitutional rights--such a violation is said to taint the tree and, in turn, the fruit. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 373, 489 P.2d 588 (1971).

The basic test utilized in determining if evidence is the "fruit" of an unlawful arrest is whether, granting establishment of the primary illegality, the evidence to which the instant objection is made has been come at by exploitation of that illegality or instead by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of the primary taint. Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 83 S. Ct. 407, 9 L. Ed. 2d 441 (1963); People v. McCoy, 832 P.2d 1043 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 870 P.2d 1231 (Colo. 1994).

Even if seizure of person is unconstitutional, evidence abandoned prior to that seizure is not the fruit of the seizure and should not be suppressed. Defendant who dropped bag of cocaine prior to arrest could not have the cocaine suppressed at trial using the argument of unconstitutional seizure. People v. McClain, 149 P.3d 787 (Colo. 2007).

When "fruit of the poison tree" doctrine inapplicable. Where there is no illegality involved in the first seizure, there is no "poisonous fruit" requiring the application of the derivative evidence rule. People v. Meyer, 628 P.2d 103 (Colo. 1981).

Suppression of evidence seized in general exploratory search without probable cause. Where evidence seized was not discovered in plain view, by a "frisk" of the defendant for assaultive weapons, by a search of the defendant for instrumentalities or evidence of the offense for which he was arrested, by an inventory search, or by a search for evidence or instrumentalities of an offense for which there existed probable cause but, rather, was seized during a general exploratory search for which no probable cause existed, defendant's motion to suppress the evidence will be granted. People v. Valdez, 182 Colo. 80, 511 P.2d 472 (1973).

Exclusionary prohibition extends as well to the indirect as the direct products of unlawful invasions. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 373, 489 P.2d 588 (1971).

The exclusionary rule has traditionally barred from trial physical, tangible materials obtained either during or as the direct result of an unlawful invasion. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 373, 489 P.2d 588 (1971).

The exclusionary rule not only bars the admission of evidence illegally acquired, but also prohibits the government from utilizing evidence which is the direct fruit or product of the initial illegality. People v. Hogan, 649 P.2d 326 (Colo. 1982); People v. Breland, 728 P.2d 763 (Colo. App. 1986).

But to suppress statements made by individuals subsequent to their illegal arrest with the defendant, defendant must establish that the incriminating statements arose from and were directly dependent upon defendant's own illegal arrest. People v. Zamora, 695 P.2d 292 (Colo. 1985).

Use of exclusionary rule not warranted where it would not result in appreciable deterrence. Exclusionary rule is the judicially created remedy, and not a personal constitutional right, that is designed to safeguard fourth amendment rights through its deterrent effect. Where DNA sample was provided as a condition of probation for a later-determined illegal sentence, case does not implicate exclusionary rule: (1) Constitutional error did not involve the police; and (2) conduct failed the "assessment of flagrancy" test in that the conduct was not sufficiently deliberate that exclusion could meaningfully deter it. People v. Glasser, 293 P.3d 68 (Colo. App. 2011).

Where evidence from search merely cumulative, constitutionality of search not determined. Where the evidence which was discovered in a warrant search and thereafter introduced at trial was merely cumulative of other overwhelming and competent evidence of the defendant's guilt, the constitutionality of the search need not be determined. People v. Wieckert, 191 Colo. 511, 554 P.2d 688 (1976), overruled on other grounds, Villafranca v. People, 194 Colo. 472, 573 P.2d 540 (1978).

Test of admissibility of evidence seized in lawful search following unlawful search is whether, granting establishment of the primary illegality, the evidence to which objection is made has been come at by exploitation of that illegality or instead by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of the primary taint. People v. Hannah, 183 Colo. 9, 514 P.2d 320 (1973).

When "fruit of the poison tree" doctrine inapplicable. The "fruit of the poison tree" doctrine is inapplicable where the allegedly tainted information was in fact obtained by officers from independent, lawful sources apart from the defendant's statements. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 373, 489 P.2d 588 (1971).

Cocaine seized by police as a result of an unlawful entry into an apartment in which the defendant was arrested does not fall within the inevitable discovery exception to the exclusionary rule since prosecutors could not establish that the evidence ultimately or inevitably would have been discovered by lawful means. People v. Burola, 848 P.2d 958 (Colo. 1993).

Evidence discovered after a nonconsensual, warrantless entry into the defendant's residence was properly suppressed. Because the officers were conducting a narcotics investigation, their nonconsensual entry was not justified by the existence of outstanding municipal warrants for the defendant based on dog license violations. People v. O'Hearn, 931 P.2d 1168 (Colo. 1997).

Under "independent source" exception to the exclusionary rule. Unconstitutionally obtained evidence may be admitted if the prosecution can establish that it was also discovered by means independent of the illegality. People v. Schoondermark, 759 P.2d 715 (Colo. 1988) (disapproving People v. Barndt, 199 Colo. 51, 604 P.2d 1173 (1980); People v. Turner, 660 P.2d 1284 (Colo. 1983); and People v. Griffith, 727 P.2d 55 (Colo. 1986)).

The independent source exception allows the admission of evidence obtained as the fruit of an illegal warrantless search or seizure where the government learned of the evidence "from an independent source". People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999).

Under this exception, however, if search warrant is based partly on information unlawfully obtained, trial court must determine whether the lawful seizure was genuinely independent of the tainted seizure. In the absence of such determination on appeal, remand is proper so that the trial court can make the determination. People v. Cruse, 58 P.3d 1114 (Colo. App. 2002).

The attenuation exception to the poisonous tree doctrine applies when the connection between the lawless conduct of police and their discovery of the challenged evidence is so attenuated to dissipate the taint. There was no time delay from when the deputy unlawfully entered the hotel room and defendant's request for help, so the doctrine of attenuation does not apply. People v. Prescott, 205 P.3d 416 (Colo. App. 2008).

Illegally seized evidence admissible for impeachment purposes. Evidence that is a product of an unlawful search is admissible for the limited purpose of impeachment of a defendant's testimony. LeMasters v. People, 678 P.2d 538 (Colo. 1984).

Where illegally seized evidence is admitted for impeachment purposes, the nexus between defendant's statements and the contradictory evidence introduced on cross-examination must be apparent. LeMasters v. People, 678 P.2d 538 (Colo. 1984).

Suppressed evidence which tended to establish defendant's presence at scene of crime was not admissible on cross-examination to impeach defendant's direct testimony, where defendant in direct testimony did not refer to suppressed items. And where defendant made no statement on cross-examination that was properly impeachable by the suppressed items. LeMasters v. People, 678 P.2d 538 (Colo. 1984).

Suppressed evidence was not admissible for impeachment purposes where it was not "reasonably suggested" by defendant's direct testimony. People v. Eickman, 728 P.2d 369 (Colo. App. 1986).

Prosecution's burden of proof. The prosecution bears the burden of establishing that the evidence obtained from a witness was not obtained through exploitation of the defendant's illegally obtained statements. People v. Briggs, 668 P.2d 961 (Colo. App. 1983).

Evidence seized by arresting officers acting outside territorial limit of authority. Though police officers not in fresh pursuit exceeded their authority in arresting a defendant outside the territorial limit of their authority, suppression of evidence seized from the defendant incident to the arrest was not required where the warrant itself established probable cause. People v. Hamilton, 666 P.2d 152 (Colo. 1983).

Evidence seized in violation of a statutory provision may be suppressed only if the unauthorized search and seizure violated constitutional restraints on unreasonable searches and seizures. People v. Hamer, 689 P.2d 1147 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Vigil, 729 P.2d 360 (Colo. 1986); People v. Fournier, 793 P.2d 1176 (Colo. 1990).

Failure for good cause to comply with Crim. P. 41(c)(1), which requires affidavits for search warrants to be sworn to or affirmed before the issuing judge, does not constitute a constitutional violation that automatically triggers the exclusionary rule. People v. Fournier, 793 P.2d 1176 (Colo. 1990).

Independent source exception sufficient to legitimize seizure, under validly issued warrant, of evidence first encountered upon illegal entry. Where warrant issued after illegal entry was based upon facts known prior to and independently of illegal search, independent source would support legality of search. People v. Schoondermark, 759 P.2d 715 (Colo. 1988).

Independent source exception sufficient to legitimize seizure where affidavit in support of search warrant contained illegally obtained information but, after redacting the portions of the affidavit that were based on the illegal search, the remaining, lawfully obtained information established probable cause. People v. Pahl, 169 P.3d 169 (Colo. App. 2006).

Exclusionary rule inapplicable in attorney disciplinary proceeding. Disciplinary proceedings, which are sui generis, need not be afforded the same constitutional safeguards which are provided to an accused in a criminal case. The exclusionary rule should not be extended to provide a shield to a lawyer charged in a disciplinary complaint. People v. Harfmann, 638 P.2d 745 (Colo. 1981).

In civil proceedings, the suppression of illegally seized evidence is not always required. The determination of the applicability of the exclusionary rule beyond the context of a criminal prosecution is made by weighing the likely social benefits of excluding evidence against the likely costs of exclusion. Ahart v. Dept. of Corr., 943 P.2d 7 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 964 P.2d 517 (Colo. 1998).

In cases in which an employee has a security- or safety-sensitive job, suppression of relevant evidence in a civil proceeding may not be the appropriate remedy for alleged constitutional violations. Ahart v. Dept. of Corr., 943 P.2d 7 (Colo. App. 1996).

Where outstanding arrest warrant was void from its inception, the arrest of the defendant violated fourth amendment to the United States Constitution and this section, and because neither the "good faith mistake" nor "technical violation" exceptions to the exclusionary rule, as defined in § 16-3-308, are applicable to the facts, evidence seized from defendant was properly suppressed. People v. Mitchell, 678 P.2d 990 (Colo. 1984).

If government agents act in violation of fourth amendment guarantee against unreasonable search and seizure, such violation gives rise to a cause of action for damages resulting from such conduct. Walker v. City of Denver, 720 P.2d 619 (Colo. App. 1986).

Warrantless entry into a home is proscribed and evidence derived from the illegal entry must be suppressed in the absence of probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and exigent circumstances necessitating immediate police action. People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999).

The difference between a permissible consensual encounter at a person's doorway and an impermissible constructive entry depends on whether there was coercive conduct or a display of force by police officers. People v. Nelson, 2012 COA 37M, __ P.3d __.

Admission of the circumstances of the arrest in error did not violate defendant's fourth amendment right because the police never entered the defendant's home and defendant did not assert his right to have the police obtain an arrest warrant. Defendant voluntarily left his home so that the police could arrest him. People v. Summitt, 132 P.3d 320 (Colo. 2006).

Alleged conduct of bringing the media into plaintiff's home to film and record his arrest exceeded the scope of the arrest warrant and amounted to an unreasonable execution of a warrant, thus violating plaintiff's fourth amendment rights. Robinson v. City & County of Denver, 39 F. Supp. 2d 1257 (D. Colo. 1999).

Warrantless entry into private residence to inventory contents violated defendant's fourth amendment rights where home was seized pursuant to a temporary restraining order issued in a civil forfeiture case without probable cause to believe that the contents of the home were related to the nuisance activity. People v. Taube, 843 P.2d 79 (Colo. App. 1992).

Evidence discovered during inventory search of defendant's van was admissible in the absence of showing that police acted in bad faith or for the sole purpose of investigation. Colo. v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367, 107 S. Ct. 738, 93 L. Ed. 2d 739 (1987).

The arrest of a person, together with the routine booking procedure incidental to such arrest, provides an adequate constitutional basis for a complete inventory search, including all articles and containers found in a purse. People v. Inman, 765 P.2d 577 (Colo. 1988).

Detention of safe after recovery from burglars who had stolen it from defendant until the safe was opened was not an unconstitutional seizure of safe. People v. Unruh, 713 P.2d 370 (Colo. 1986).

Statements made by a defendant subsequent to a warrantless arrest which could not be justified upon a basis of consent or exigent circumstances should have been suppressed notwithstanding that the defendant was given his Miranda rights where the record unequivocally established a straight, short, and unbroken line from the defendant's arrest to his confession. People v. Santisteven, 693 P.2d 1008 (Colo. App. 1984).

Other factors in determining whether a confession is obtained by exploitation of an illegal arrest: The temporal proximity of the arrest and the confession, the presence of intervening circumstances, and, particularly, the purpose and flagrancy of the official misconduct. People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999).

Statements made by a prisoner who is accompanied to a telephone by jailhouse personnel should not be suppressed because such a prisoner does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in his telephone communications. People v. Smith, 716 P.2d 1115 (Colo. 1986).

Contents of package seized from detainee's coat pocket, which was discovered during initial pat-down search of defendant after decision was made to take him into civil protective custody due to his intoxication, was not admissible against him where after package was confiscated and identified as probable weapon, limited objectives of warrantless search had fully been accomplished and police were not justified in additional intrusion into defendant's privacy interest to support warrantless search of seized package. People v. Dandrea, 736 P.2d 1211 (Colo. 1987).

Exclusionary rule applies to the warrantless search of a passenger compartment of an automobile if the search goes beyond what is necessary to determine whether a suspect is armed. People v. Corpany, 859 P.2d 865 (Colo. 1993).

Defendant forfeited any expectation of privacy by delivery of unprocessed film to processor and government's delivery of the prints to the defendant and their recovery under a valid search warrant does not constitute an unreasonable search. People v. Atencio, 780 P.2d 46 (Colo. App. 1989), cert. denied, 790 P.2d 796 (Colo. 1990).

Evidence must be suppressed where officers elected to enter the backyard, walk to a garden and seize marijuana plants, all without first obtaining a warrant judicially authorizing such conduct, and where the defendant was not present on the property and aware police officers were also present. Hoffman v. People, 780 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1989).

Police officer's entry into fenced backyard constituted a warrantless search. Officer's probable cause to believe that a car in the driveway of a home had been stolen and that the responsible party was in the home did not create exigent circumstances that would allow an officer to enter the fenced backyard while other officers knocked on the front door. There was nothing to indicate that circumstances were moving so quickly that the officers could not have secured the area without entering the backyard and waited for a warrant. People v. Brunsting, 224 P.3d 259 (Colo. App. 2009).

Officer's unlawful entry into backyard tainted all further evidence requiring that all evidence obtained after entry into the backyard be suppressed. People v. Brunsting, 224 P.3d 259 (Colo. App. 2009).

Evidence of methamphetamine production seized from defendants' residence required to be suppressed where officer who executed search of residence relied on search warrant based upon affidavit containing his own false and recklessly made statements and other valid information in the affidavit was insufficient to support the finding of probable cause necessary for the issuance of a valid search warrant. People v. Kazmierski, 25 P.3d 1207 (Colo. 2001).

Evidence must be suppressed where there was probable cause but no exigent circumstances to justify a warrantless search. People v. Baker, 813 P.2d 331 (Colo. 1991), distinguished in that police did not inform anyone they detected the smell of iodine and there was no attempt to prevent officers from entering residence. People v. Winpigler, 8 P.3d 439 (Colo. 1999).

Emergency aid exception is an exception to both the warrant requirement and the usual probable cause requirement. To justify a warrantless search under the emergency aid exception, though police do not have to have probable cause to believe that contraband or other evidence of criminal activity is located at a particular place, police must have a reasonable basis, approximating probable cause, to associate the emergency with the area or place to be searched. Police officer's conclusion that it was "within the realm of possibility" that someone was injured or hurt inside the home was insufficient as police must have more than a theoretical validation for their actions. People v. Hebert, 46 P.3d 473 (Colo. 2002).

Under the emergency aid exception, the prosecution must prove both that an immediate crisis existed and the probability that assistance would be helpful. It does not require probable cause, but the police must have a reasonable basis approximating probable cause that associates the emergency with the area to be searched. People v. Allison, 86 P.3d 421 (Colo. 2004).

Emergency aid exception justifies warrantless search when officers' main purpose is to render aid to victim, not search for evidence. Exception applies where prudent and trained police officers determine that an immediate crisis exists and that there is a probability their emergency assistance will prove helpful. People v. Souva, 141 P.3d 845 (Colo. App. 2005).

Trial court's suppression of evidence proper where warrantless entry by police into defendant's home was not justified under the medical emergency exception. There was no immediate crisis, objectively examined by a prudent and trained police officer, when defendant passed out for a few seconds at his door but immediately regained consciousness. People v. Smith, 40 P.3d 1287 (Colo. 2002).

Investigatory stop of defendant, who was passenger in car outside of drug suspect's house, was not based on reasonable suspicion of police officers and, therefore, subsequent arrest of defendant and search incident to arrest was illegal and all evidence obtained as result of arrest and search constitutes fruit of the poisonous tree. People v. Carillo-Montes, 796 P.2d 970 (Colo. 1990).

Arresting officers lacked probable cause to support a warrantless search of defendant's vehicle or justification for a search incident to his arrest, as that doctrine was subsequently clarified in Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332, 129 S. Ct. 1710, 173 L. Ed. 2d 485 (2009). Being stopped for a traffic infraction immediately after leaving a suspect import store and being in possession of a recently purchased and still unwrapped and unused "pot pipe", although sufficient to justify an arrest for possession of drug paraphernalia, is nevertheless insufficient to provide reasonable, articulable suspicion that additional evidence of that offense might be found in the arrestee's vehicle. People v. McCarty, 229 P.3d 1041 (Colo. 2010).

Police lacked probable cause to search trunk of vehicle incident to arrest of driver. The nervousness of an underage driver coupled with the driver's unlawful possession of a single prescription pill is not enough to elevate suspicion to a fair probability that more contraband would be found in the vehicle. People v. Coates, 266 P.3d 397 (Colo. 2011).

Although police officer was justified in making investigatory stop, evidence seized was properly suppressed as search exceeded limits of permissible protective search for weapons. People v. Martinez, 801 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1990).

In order for an investigatory stop to be constitutionally valid, three prerequisites must be met: (1) There must be an articulable and specific basis in fact for suspecting that criminal activity has taken place, is in progress, or is about to occur; (2) the purpose of the intrusion must be reasonable; and (3) the scope and character of the intrusion must be reasonably related to its purpose. People v. Rodriguez, 849 P.2d 799 (Colo. App. 1992); People v. Dowhan, 951 P.2d 905 (Colo. 1998); People v. Salazar, 964 P.2d 502 (Colo. 1998); People v. Dixon, 21 P.3d 440 (Colo. App. 2000).

And the existence of the three prerequisites to a valid investigatory stop must be judged against an objective standard that takes into consideration the facts and circumstances known to the officer at the time of the intrusion and evaluates the scope of the intrusion in light of those facts. People v. Dixon, 21 P.3d 440 (Colo. App. 2000).

Observations of peace officer and the information known to him immediately prior to investigatory stop of defendant provided officer with reasonable suspicion that defendant had engaged, or was about to engage, in a criminal act where officer had received an anonymous tip that there was suspected drug activity at a site known for prior drug transactions and where such tip was corroborated by the officer's own observations. People v. Canton, 951 P.2d 907 (Colo. 1998).

An objective standard is used in determining whether there was reasonable suspicion necessary for the investigatory stop. In determining whether reasonable suspicion exists, we must look to the totality of the circumstances. The facts known to the officers immediately prior to the intrusion are of critical importance. People v. Rodriguez, 849 P.2d 799 (Colo. App. 1992).

When the purpose for which an investigatory stop was instituted has been accomplished and no other reasonable suspicion exists to support further investigation, there is no justification for continued detention and interrogation of citizens. People v. Redinger, 906 P.2d 81 (Colo. 1995).

Where there are dual purposes for an arrest and search, the trial court must determine whether the purpose of the arrest is a mere pretext intended to validate an otherwise invalid search. Where the officer had information that drugs were located in the defendant's trunk and the officer found the drugs after arresting the defendant on a traffic stop and conducting an inventory search of the car, the trial court was required to determine whether the arrest and resulting inventory search were a pretext for conducting an investigatory search. People v. Hauseman, 900 P.2d 74 (Colo. 1995) (interpreting the fourth amendment to the U.S. Constitution).

There is no consensual encounter where a reasonable person under the circumstances would not have believed he or she was free to leave or to disregard the officer's requests. A seizure occurred without facts justifying reasonable suspicion of a person having committed a crime. People v. Heilman, 52 P.3d 224 (Colo. 2002).

Defendant's "furtive gesture" was too ambiguous to constitute the basis for an investigatory stop and prosecution did not carry the burden that the evidence was not the fruit of the prior illegality. People v. Heilman, 52 P.3d 224 (Colo. 2002).

There was no articulable and specific basis in fact to support a reasonable suspicion of criminal conduct where an anonymous tip consisted of a physical description of a person and his clothing and a claim that the person stored cocaine in his shoe and the police officer corroborated only that a person matching the description given by the informant was present where the informant said he would be. People v. Salazar, 964 P.2d 502 (Colo. 1998).

Police officer may not lawfully detain a passenger who has exited from a vehicle that has stopped at its destination, when the driver of the vehicle has been contacted for minor traffic violations, and when the officer lacks reasonable suspicion to believe that the passenger is involved in criminal activity. People v. Dixon, 21 P.3d 440 (Colo. App. 2000).

Section 8. Prosecutions - indictment or information. Until otherwise provided by law, no person shall, for a felony, be proceeded against criminally otherwise than by indictment, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger. In all other cases, offenses shall be prosecuted criminally by indictment or information.

This section directs that felony proceedings must be initiated by indictment and authorizes the general assembly to provide alternative methods of proceeding. Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969).

This section recognizes but two methods whereby person may be proceeded against criminally in the courts: the one method is by indictment; the other, by information. People v. Gibson, 53 Colo. 231, 125 P. 531 (1912).

Information is written accusation of crime preferred by prosecuting officer without the intervention of a grand jury. It is used in the constitution in the common-law sense of the term, that is, an accusation preferred, as at common law, by the public prosecutor. People v. Gibson, 53 Colo. 231, 125 P. 531 (1912).

There is no constitutional guarantee of grand jury indictment. Losavio v. Robb, 195 Colo. 533, 579 P.2d 1152 (1978).

No constitutional provision forbids indictments and informations as concurrent remedies when surrounded by proper regulations and safeguards. Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969).

General assembly may provide for prosecuting misdemeanors before justices of the peace, upon sworn complaint or other information. In re Constitutionality of House Bill No. 158, 9 Colo. 625, 21 P. 472 (1886).

Expedience may not override section. While summary procedure in police court cases has been countenanced from the standpoint of expediency, expedience may not override the constitution and dethrone rights guaranteed thereunder. City of Canon City v. Merris, 137 Colo. 169, 323 P.2d 614 (1958).

State constitution leaves status of contempts as to pending causes as it was at common law, therefore unimpaired as to procedure, or as to what constitutes contempt, or as to the defense to contempts by the constitutional provisions, as to freedom of speech, section 10 of this article; prosecution of offenses by indictment or information, this section; due process of law, section 25 of this article; warrants of arrest, section 7 of this article. People ex rel. Attorney Gen. v. News-Times Publishing Co., 35 Colo. 253, 84 P. 912 (1906), dismissed, 205 U.S. 454, 27 S. Ct. 556, 51 L. Ed. 879 (1907).

The power to punish contempts is inherent in courts, and summary proceedings for contempts without indictment or trial by jury have always been recognized. The constitution was not intended to change the practice in this respect. Such summary proceedings are therefore not inconsistent with the constitutional guarantees relating to criminal prosecutions. Wyatt v. People, 17 Colo. 252, 28 P. 961 (1892).

Section 9. Treason - estates of suicides. Treason against the state can consist only in levying war against it or in adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort; no person can be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on his confession in open court; no person can be attainted of treason or felony by the general assembly; no conviction can work corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate; the estates of such persons as may destroy their own lives shall descend or vest as in cases of natural death.

The first amendment guarantee of freedom of expression includes freedom of association and guarantees the right to associate or refuse to associate with whomever one chooses. Brandon v. Springspree, Inc., 888 P.2d 357 (Colo. App. 1994).

Guarantees against exercise of arbitrary power by any department of government, or agency thereof, are found in this section and section 25 of this article. People v. Harris, 104 Colo. 386, 91 P.2d 989 (1939).

This section provides broader protection for freedom of speech than does the first amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and, therefore, obscenity statutes must be drafted so they are compatible with both constitutions. People v. Seven Thirty-five E. Colfax, Inc., 697 P.2d 348 (Colo. 1985); People v. Ford, 773 P.2d 1059 (Colo. 1989); Bock v. Westminster Mall Co., 819 P.2d 55 (Colo. 1991).

This section secures to the people a full and free discussion of public affairs. Pierce v. St. Vrain Valley Sch. Dist., 944 P.2d 646 (Colo. App. 1997), rev'd on other grounds, 981 P.2d 600 (Colo. 1999).

This section provides greater protection for freedom of speech than does the first amendment. Holliday v. Reg'l Transp. Dist., 43 P.3d 676 (Colo. App. 2001).

But test established by federal first amendment jurisprudence applies where restriction of speech on public property is at issue. Holliday v. Reg'l Transp. Dist., 43 P.3d 676 (Colo. App. 2001).

Three-step test for determining whether a government policy impermissibly excludes speech from a particular forum is whether: (1) The speech at issue is protected and whether the government is involved in its abridgement; (2) the forum is public or nonpublic; and (3) the justification for excluding the speech satisfies the requisite standard. Holliday v. Reg'l Transp. Dist., 43 P.3d 676 (Colo. App. 2001).

Summary judgment for defendant improper: (1) Where plaintiffs' letters that included allegations of conflicts of interest, waste, mismanagement, and cronyism in the operation of the regional transportation district (RTD) addressed matters of public concern and were therefore protected speech; (2) where administrative resources at RTD headquarters were not a public forum; but (3) evidence raised issues of material fact as to whether policy prohibiting the use of RTD administrative resources for purposes not clearly tied to carrying out the RTD's statutory and RTD board-imposed responsibilities was applied in a manner that was retaliatory or tantamount to prohibited viewpoint discrimination. While the government need not subsidize the exercise of free speech, it may not discriminate between speakers on the basis of their viewpoints. Holliday v. Reg'l Transp. Dist., 43 P.3d 676 (Colo. App. 2001).

While this section provides broader protection for freedom of speech in the context of political speech and obscenity than does the first amendment to the U.S. Constitution, it does not provide greater protection in the context of zoning regulations. Z.J. Gifts D-2, L.L.C. v. City of Aurora, 93 P.3d 633 (Colo. App. 2004).

Constitutional guarantees are not always absolute and full exercise thereof is not always possible. Stapleton v. District Court, 179 Colo. 187, 499 P.2d 310 (1972).

Regulation of conduct touching first amendment rights requires careful balancing. The regulation of conduct which touches first amendment rights requires that an appellate court carefully balance the right of a city's exercise of its police power against an ordinance's infringement on protected speech. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981).

Freedom of speech includes the individual right to purchase and read whatever books he or she wishes anonymously. This freedom advances the free will of thinking, discovery, and the spread of political truth. Tattered Cover, Inc. v. City of Thornton, 44 P.3d 1044 (Colo. 2002).

When the government seeks to use a search warrant to discover customer book purchase records from an innocent, third-party bookstore, it must demonstrate a compelling need for the information sought. In determining whether government officials have met this standard, the court may consider whether there are reasonable alternative means of satisfying the asserted need, whether the warrant is overly broad, and whether the records are sought for reasons related to the content of the books. If there is a compelling need, then the court must balance law enforcement's need for the records against the harm caused to constitutional interests by execution of the warrant. Tattered Cover, Inc. v. City of Thornton, 44 P.3d 1044 (Colo. 2002).

An innocent, third-party bookstore must be afforded an opportunity for a hearing prior to the execution of any search warrant that seeks to obtain its customers' book-purchasing records. At the hearing, the court will apply the balancing test described above. Tattered Cover, Inc. v. City of Thornton, 44 P.3d 1044 (Colo. 2002).

The department of corrections' regulation that precludes verbal abuse does not violate the first amendment when applied to the inmate's grievance process. The regulation has more than a formalistic logical connection between itself and the department's legitimate penological interest. Alward v. Golder, 148 P.3d 424 (Colo. App. 2006).

Limitation of section's operation. In harmonizing this section with other provisions of the constitution, courts have necessarily limited the operation of this section. Further limitation should not be imposed except in cases of clear necessity. Fort v. People ex rel. Coop. Farmers' Exch., Inc., 81 Colo. 420, 256 P. 325 (1927).

Municipalities may have significant governmental interest in imposing reasonable limitations on the time, place, and manner of presentation of some forms of live, nude entertainment. Marco Lounge, Inc. v. City of Fed. Heights, 625 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1981); City of Colo. Springs v. 2354 Inc., 896 P.2d 272 (Colo. 1995).

Government has substantial interest in preserving the character and quality of residential neighborhoods by insulating these areas from the deleterious secondary effects associated with commercially operated nude entertainment establishments. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

Government regulations establishing a system of prior restraint are presumed invalid and must be measured by strict scrutiny. City of Colo. Springs v. 2354 Inc., 896 P.2d 272 (Colo. 1995).

"Prior restraint" describes an administrative or judicial order that forbids certain communications prior to the communication occurring. Prior restraint of publication is an extraordinary remedy carrying a heavy presumption of unconstitutionality. To justify prior restraint, the state must have an interest of the highest order to protect. The district court's order prohibiting the media from possessing and revealing the content of in camera transcripts that were sent to the media in error is prior restraint. People v. Bryant, 94 P.3d 624 (Colo. 2004).

To determine if the prior restraint is necessary, the measure must protect against an evil that is great and certain that cannot be mitigated by less intrusive measures. There would be a great and certain harm in allowing publication of transcripts of in camera proceedings involving rape shield evidence. First, reporting the information would give a stamp of authenticity as opposed to rumor and speculation because the information was gleaned under oath in court. Second, there is a great interest in upholding the state rape shield law and protecting future sexual assault victims. The state has a very strong interest in protecting the victim through the rape shield law in this case because the victim's sexual conduct is a very private matter. Third, the information is still private. Therefore, there is a minimal burden on the press because the information was not public, so there was no risk in not publishing something others would publish or failing to report public information. In total, these factors indicate the harm would be great and certain if the transcripts were published. The court's order therefore was not an unconstitutional prior restraint, but it was necessary for the supreme court to narrow the order. People v. Bryant, 94 P.3d 624 (Colo. 2004).

Under first amendment, the proper test for permissibility of government-imposed content-neutral restrictions in a public forum is whether they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant state interest and allow for ample alternative channels of communication. Lewis v. Colo. Rockies Baseball Club, 941 P.2d 266 (Colo. 1997).

Any system of prior restraint is subject to heavy presumption against its constitutional validity. People ex rel. McKevitt v. Harvey, 176 Colo. 447, 491 P.2d 563 (1971).

Interest of accused, whose life and liberty are in jeopardy, to fair trial by impartial jury is paramount, and may require, depending on circumstances of case, limitations upon exercise of right of free speech and of press. Stapleton v. District Court, 179 Colo. 187, 499 P.2d 310 (1972).

Abridgement of liberty of discussion can be justified only where clear danger of substantive evils arises under circumstances affording no opportunity to test the merits of ideas by competition for acceptance in the market of public opinion. Pueblo Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council v. Harper Constr. Co., 134 Colo. 469, 307 P.2d 468 (1957).

Duty to prevent encroachment upon constitutional guarantees of liberty and free speech rests not only upon the general assembly but upon the judicial branch of the government. Pueblo Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council v. Harper Constr. Co., 134 Colo. 469, 307 P.2d 468 (1957).

Conditions for upholding such restraint. To be upheld, any restraint which is imposed in advance of a final judicial determination on the merits must be limited to the shortest fixed time period compatible with sound judicial resolution, and the procedure must also assure a prompt, final judicial decision. People ex rel. McKevitt v. Harvey, 176 Colo. 447, 491 P.2d 563 (1971).

that prohibit future dissemination of constitutionally protected speech constitute prior restraints. City of Lakewood v. Colfax Unlimited Ass'n, 634 P.2d 52 (Colo. 1981); City of Colo. Springs v. 2354 Inc., 896 P.2d 272 (Colo. 1995).

In determining whether an ordinance constitutes prior restraint, the court must first decide whether the ordinance contains adequate procedural safeguards to ensure a licensing determination within a defined time period and that prompt judicial review of the determination is available. City of Colo. Springs v. 2354 Inc., 896 P.2d 272 (Colo. 1995).

If procedural safeguards are adequate then the court must determine whether there is a compelling government interest and whether the criteria for issuing licenses is sufficiently narrow, objective, and definite to prohibit the licensing officer from exercising unfettered discretion. City of Colo. Springs v. 2354 Inc., 896 P.2d 272 (Colo. 1995).

Standing to challenge obscenity statutes. The rules of standing are broadened in first amendment cases to permit a party to assert the facial overbreadth of statutes which may chill the constitutionally protected expression of third parties, regardless of whether the statute could be constitutionally applied to the conduct of the party before the court. People v. Seven Thirty-five East Colfax, Inc., 697 P.2d 348 (Colo. 1985); 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

Construction of injunctive order in doubtful cases. In doubtful cases an injunctive order should not be so construed as to forbid the discussion of matters of public interest, in view of this section. Fort v. People ex rel. Coop. Farmers' Exch., Inc., 81 Colo. 420, 256 P. 325 (1927).

Obscenity statute that defines material that is patently offensive in terms of community standards of tolerance satisfies Colorado and U.S. Constitutions and is not overbroad. People v. Ford, 773 P.2d 1059 (Colo. 1989).

Child pornography is not material which is protected by the first amendment to the U.S. Constitution or by this section. People v. Enea, 665 P.2d 1026 (Colo. 1983).

Child pornography is not protected speech. People v. Batchelor, 800 P.2d 599 (Colo. 1990).

Statutes designed to restrict children's access to sexually explicit material found unconstitutional because overly broad. Tattered Cover, Inc. v. Tooley, 696 P.2d 780 (Colo. 1985).

But excessive sweep of zoning regulation may give state-liquor-licensee standing. Excessive sweep of city's zoning regulation forbidding live, nude entertainment, which applies to more than just state-liquor-licensed establishments, if not supportable as a reasonable time, place and manner restriction, is both real and substantial and a state-liquor-licensee has standing to challenge the zoning ordinance as overbroad. Marco Lounge, Inc. v. City of Fed. Heights, 625 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1981); Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981).

Section 18-6-403 prohibiting the making of materials depicting a child being used for explicit sexual conduct is not overbroad or vague. The prohibition is definitively limited to material made for the purpose of overt sexual gratification or stimulation of the persons involved and does not reach constitutionally protected materials depicting nude children for family, educational, medical, artistic, or other legitimate purposes. The constitutionally required element of scienter is satisfied by the degree of culpability: "knowingly". People v. Batchelor, 800 P.2d 599 (Colo. 1990).

establishments holding liquor licenses. A state agency regulation proscribing nude entertainment in establishments holding liquor licenses is neither unreasonable nor irrational, and is not unconstitutional under this section. Citizens for Free Enter. v. Dept. of Rev., 649 P.2d 1054 (Colo. 1982).

Nude entertainment ordinance is constitutional. Ordinance placing restrictions on the age of the patrons and the employees of nude entertainment establishments, the physical location of such establishments, and the days and hours of operation of such establishments meets four-part test for constitutionality under the United States and Colorado Constitutions. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

Section fixes liability for abuse of liberty of speech. While liberty of speech and of the press is guaranteed by our constitution, by a subsequent clause of the same sentence in which this is declared the responsibility for its abuse is fixed. Cooper v. People ex rel. Wyatt, 13 Colo. 337, 22 P. 790 (1889).

Engaging in news-gathering activities does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of special access to information not generally available to the public. Nor may the press engage in activities that are otherwise illegal for the purpose of reporting the news. People v. Bergen, 883 P.2d 532 (Colo. App. 1994).

Accused's right to fair trial. To strike the proper balance between an accused's right to a fair trial and the freedom of the press, the trial judge may: (1) cause extensive voir dire examination of prospective jurors; (2) change the trial venue to a place less exposed to intense publicity; (3) postpone the trial to allow public attention to subside; (4) empanel veniremen from an area that has not been exposed to intense pretrial publicity; (5) enlarge the size of the jury panel and increase the number of peremptory challenges; or (6) use emphatic and clear instructions on the sworn duty of each juror to decide the issues only on the evidence presented in open court. People v. Botham, 629 P.2d 589 (Colo. 1981).

Where a defendant has not demonstrated the existence of massive, pervasive, and prejudicial publicity, which would create a presumption that he was denied a fair trial, he must establish the denial of a fair trial based upon a nexus between extensive pretrial publicity and the jury panel. People v. Heller, 698 P.2d 1357 (Colo. App. 1984), rev'd on other grounds, 712 P.2d 1023 (Colo. 1986).

Combination of "speech" and "nonspeech" elements in the same course of conduct is a form of expression entitled to some degree of constitutional protection. City of Colo. Springs v. 2354 Inc., 896 P.2d 272 (Colo. 1995).

Four-part test for regulation of conduct with "speech" and "nonspeech" elements. A government regulation is sufficiently justified if: (1) It is within the constitutional power of the government; (2) it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; (3) the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and (4) the incidental restriction on alleged first amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

Nature of the property affected by government regulation restricting speech is the first question in a constitutional analysis of the regulation. Denver Publ'g Co. v. City of Aurora, 896 P.2d 306 (Colo. 1995); Lewis v. Colo. Rockies Baseball Club, 941 P.2d 266 (Colo. 1997).

Regulation must be written with particular care when property affected is traditionally recognized as a forum associated with the dissemination of ideas. Denver Publ'g Co. v. City of Aurora, 896 P.2d 306 (Colo. 1995).

A courtroom is a not a public forum for purposes of the first amendment, and, therefore, a court may restrict speech during court proceedings so long as the restriction is reasonable and viewpoint neutral. Accordingly, an order that a litigant remove a political T-shirt during court proceedings was permissible when the record showed that the court's order was reasonably based on its duty to preserve the courtroom for the presentation of evidence and not to restrict the particular viewpoint espoused by the litigant. People v. Aleem, 149 P.3d 765 (Colo. 2007).

Streets and parks have been traditionally recognized as held in trust for the purpose of assembly and the communication of ideas. Denver Publ'g Co. v. City of Aurora, 896 P.2d 306 (Colo. 1995).

Content-neutral regulations of time, place, and manner of speech may be enforced if they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest and leave ample alternative channels of communication. Denver Publ'g Co. v. City of Aurora, 896 P.2d 306 (Colo. 1995).

Narrow tailoring does not mean the regulation must be the least restrictive alternative. Denver Publ'g Co. v. City of Aurora, 896 P.2d 306 (Colo. 1995).

A regulation is content-neutral if it is justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech. Denver Publ'g Co. v. City of Aurora, 896 P.2d 306 (Colo. 1995).

Presumption of constitutionality of regulation of content-neutral speech modified. Presumption attached to content-neutral ordinance challenged on free speech grounds requires the introduction of competent evidence that the regulation burdens speech. Denver Publ'g Co. v. City of Aurora, 896 P.2d 306 (Colo. 1995).

Government has burden of proving constitutionality of content-neutral ordinance challenged on free speech grounds is constitutional. Denver Publ'g Co. v. City of Aurora, 896 P.2d 306 (Colo. 1995).

The Colorado Clean Indoor Air Act does not violate theaters' rights under the first amendment to the U.S. constitution or this section of the Colorado constitution. Curious Theatre Co. v. Dept. of Pub. Health & Env't, 216 P.3d 71 (Colo. App. 2008), aff'd, 220 P.3d 544 (Colo. 2009).

Smoking on stage during the course of a play is expressive conduct for purposes of the first amendment, and the act does place an incidental burden on this conduct by prohibiting it in indoor theaters. Curious Theatre Co. v. Dept. of Pub. Health & Env't, 216 P.3d 71 (Colo. App. 2008), aff'd on other grounds, 220 P.3d 544 (Colo. 2009).

The act is content neutral, however, because it focuses on the adverse health effects of tobacco smoke, not on expression. Curious Theatre Co. v. Dept. of Pub. Health & Env't, 216 P.3d 71 (Colo. App. 2008), aff'd, 220 P.3d 544 (Colo. 2009).

Because the act is content neutral, it is subject to an intermediate level of scrutiny as set forth in United States v. O'Brien. The four factors of O'Brien are satisfied in this case. First, the statute is within the constitutional power of the government because the legislature has the authority to enact statutes designed to promote the public health. Second, the statute furthers an important or substantial governmental interest by protecting the health of its citizens. Third, the government's interest in establishing the statute is unrelated to the suppression of free expression because it is content neutral and justified by health concerns unrelated to expression. Finally, the incidental restriction is no greater than necessary to further the interest because it is narrowly tailored by focusing on the one form of conduct, smoking, upon which the state's announced interest in protecting the public's health depends. The statute allows alternative channels of expression, such as outdoor theaters and fake and prop cigarettes. The theaters did not demonstrate that the use of the alternatives is so inadequate as to outweigh the state's overriding interest in protecting the health of its citizens. Curious Theatre Co. v. Dept. of Pub. Health & Env't, 216 P.3d 71 (Colo. App. 2008), aff'd, 220 P.3d 544 (Colo. 2009).

Permit systems are the embodiment of time, place, and manner restrictions on freedom of expression that have long enjoyed the approval of the supreme court. Brandon v. Springspree, Inc., 888 P.2d 357 (Colo. App. 1994).

Private association that held permit from the city had the right to present its festival in accordance with its policy of prohibiting any political, religious, ideological, or social causes and could prevent person from engaging in conduct within its permit area that interfered with association's stated purposes. Brandon v. Springspree, Inc., 888 P.2d 357 (Colo. App. 1994).

The owner of a shopping center may limit free speech conduct to certain locations within the mall. The shopping center's regulation designating the food court for free speech activity meets constitutional muster because it provides an adequate forum in which to convey plaintiffs' ideas to their intended audience while allowing the shopping center to carry on its legitimate business. Robertson v. Westminster Mall Co., 43 P.3d 622 (Colo. App. 2001).

A 48-hour waiting period requirement between an application for, and action approving, the soliciting of shopping center patrons for constitutionally protected purposes that also requires reapplication for each individual solicitation activity is unjustified and unreasonable under the constitution. Robertson v. Westminster Mall Co., 43 P.3d 622 (Colo. App. 2001).

However, a 24-hour waiting period rule that requires only one application every six months and a check-in procedure prior to each individual solicitation activity is reasonable and necessary to protect the legitimate concerns of the mall owner and is therefore justified and reasonable under the constitution and does not violate plaintiff's right of free speech. Robertson v. Westminster Mall Co., 43 P.3d 622 (Colo. App. 2001).

Although signs are, by nature, means of expression and communications within the meaning of the first amendment. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981).

Public has concomitant right to be free from intrusive signs and billboards. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981).

Ceramic painted and prepared for display in a public school (tile project) constitute school-sponsored speech and are governed by Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kihlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 108 S. Ct. 562, 98 L. Ed. 2d 592 (1988). Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

School-sponsored speech means activities that might reasonably be perceived to bear the imprimatur of the school and that involve pedagogical concerns. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct.

If the speech at issue bears the imprimatur of the school and involves pedagogical interests, then it is school-sponsored speech, and the school may impose restrictions on it so long as those restrictions are reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kihlmeier allows educators to make viewpoint-based decisions about school-sponsored speech. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kihlmeier does not require educators' restrictions on school-sponsored speech to be viewpoint neutral. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

Tile project was a nonpublic forum. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

Because the school permanently integrated the tiles into the school environment, and was significantly involved in the creation, funding, supervision, and screening process of the tile project, the tiles bore the imprimatur of the school. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

The goal of the tile project, allowing participants to take part in the reconstruction of the school, involved the type of pedagogical interests with which Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kihlmeier was concerned. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

Prohibition on including the date of the school shooting in tile project was reasonably related to a pedagogical interest. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

Restriction on religious symbols in tile project was reasonably related to a pedagogical interest. Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

School district did not violate valedictorian's first amendment free speech rights by requiring review of valedictory speech prior to presentation. Corder v. Lewis Palmer Sch. Dist. No. 38, 566 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 742, 175 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2009).

School district's unwritten policy of reviewing valedictory speeches prior to graduation ceremony was reasonably related to pedagogical concerns. Corder v. Lewis Palmer Sch. Dist. No. 38, 566 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 742, 175 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2009).

School district did not violate valedictorian's first amendment free speech rights by compelling her to email an apology prior to receipt of her high school diploma. Corder v. Lewis Palmer Sch. Dist. No. 38, 566 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 742, 175 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2009).

Forced apology was reasonably related to pedagogical concerns. Corder v. Lewis Palmer Sch. Dist. No. 38, 566 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 742, 175 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2009).

School district did not violate valedictorian's first amendment free exercise of religion rights by disciplining her for presenting a different valedictory speech than the one she gave to principal for prior review. Corder v. Lewis Palmer Sch. Dist. No. 38, 566 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 742, 175 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2009).

Freedom of speech does not bar enforcement of government regulations directed at unlawful conduct that manifests no element of protected expression. City of Colo. Springs v. 2354 Inc., 896 P.2d 272 (Colo. 1995).

First amendment protection does not create immunity from criminal prosecution. City of Colo. Springs v. 2354 Inc., 896 P.2d 272 (Colo. 1995).

Truth of published matter is complete defense in libel action. In an action for libel, if the truth of the published matter can be established by evidence, it is a complete justification and defense. Republican Publ'g Co. v. Mosman, 15 Colo. 399, 24 P. 1051 (1890); Rocky Mt. News Printing Co. v. Fridborn, 46 Colo. 440, 104 P. 956 (1909).

Truth is an absolute defense in a libel action, whether civil or criminal. Gomba v. McLaughlin, 180 Colo. 232, 504 P.2d 337 (1972).

Whether allegedly defamatory language is constitutionally privileged is a question of law and a reviewing court must review the record de novo to insure that the trial court's judgment does not constitute a forbidden intrusion on the field of free expression. NBC Subsidiary v. Living Will Center, 879 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1994); McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

Trial court's findings that the statements at issue were false constitute findings of fact. An issue of "constitutional fact" is one that affects whether a statement is subject to constitutional protection. Since the statements at issue were false, they were not entitled to first amendment protection. McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

Appellate court will set aside trial court's findings of fact only if they are clearly erroneous and not supported by the record. Trial court's findings that the statements were false are supported by evidence in the record and were therefore not clearly erroneous. McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

Special defense of truth not required. In an action for damages for alleged libel where the pleadings presented the issue of the truth of the published articles, a special defense of truth was not required. Hadden v. Gateway W. Publ'g Co., 130 Colo. 73, 273 P.2d 733 (1954).

This may be substantial, rather than absolute, truth. The trend of the law is toward the recognition of substantial rather than absolute truth as a defense to allegedly libelous statements. Gomba v. McLaughlin, 180 Colo. 232, 504 P.2d 337 (1972).

A defendant asserting truth as a defense in libel action is not required to justify every word of the alleged defamatory matter; it is sufficient if the substance, the gist, the sting, of the matter is true. Gomba v. McLaughlin, 180 Colo. 232, 504 P.2d 337 (1972).

And burden is on defendant to prove that publication was substantially true. Gomba v. McLaughlin, 180 Colo. 232, 504 P.2d 337 (1972).

Evidence of truth must be relevant and admissible. While in suits and prosecutions for libel, the truth thereof may be given in evidence under the Colorado constitution and laws, the evidence offered for such purpose must by relevant and admissible. Bearman v. People, 91 Colo. 486, 16 P.2d 425 (1932).

While this section and § 18-13-105 provide that in a libel suit the truth of the alleged libel is a defense, the defendant may not establish it by incompetent evidence. Towles v. Meador, 84 Colo. 547, 272 P. 625 (1928).

But evidence is admissible even where libel is per se or publication admittedly false. Evidence of the truth of any allegedly libelous statement is admissible, even where the libel is per se, or where the publication is admittedly false. Gomba v. McLaughlin, 180 Colo. 232, 504 P.2d 337 (1972).

Statements held to constitute slander per se as a matter of law. Pittman v. Larson Distrib. Co., 724 P.2d 1379 (Colo. App. 1986); Keohane v. Wilkerson, 859 P.2d 291 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 882 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Statement that a political candidate physically threatened people who disagreed with him was defamatory per se, but was constitutionally privileged because it was printed on a political postcard and could not reasonably be interpreted as stating actual facts about the candidate. Arrington v. Palmer, 971 P.2d 669 (Colo. App. 1998).

As circumstances may be shown to mitigate damages even though publication false. A defendant in a libel action is entitled to give in evidence any circumstances properly in mitigation of said publication, for the purpose of reducing the amount of damages, even if the publication is, in fact, false. Republican Publ'g Co. v. Mosman, 15 Colo. 399, 24 P. 1051 (1890); Rocky Mt. News Printing Co. v. Fridborn, 46 Colo. 440, 104 P. 956 (1909).

Taking § 13-25-125 and the constitutional language of this section together, it is clear that the law requires that the defendant in a libel action be allowed to put in any evidence which is material to proof of justification or which tends to mitigate the damages. Gomba v. McLaughlin, 180 Colo. 232, 504 P.2d 337 (1972).

Question involved where defendant asserts truth as defense. Where the defendant asserts truth as a defense in a libel suit the question, a factual one, is whether there is a substantial difference between the allegedly libelous statement and the truth; or stated differently whether the statement produces a different effect upon the reader than that which would be produced by the literal truth of the matter. Gomba v. McLaughlin, 180 Colo. 232, 504 P.2d 337 (1972).

A defamatory opinion is constitutionally protected if truthful facts supporting the opinion are set forth. Seible v. Denver Post Corp., 782 P.2d 805 (Colo. App. 1989).

Test articulated for evaluating when speech is protected opinion: (1) The statement complained of should be examined to determine if it is cautiously phrased in terms of apparency, e.g., "in my opinion"; (2) the entire published statement must be examined in context, not just the objectionable word or phrase; and (3) all the circumstances surrounding the statement, including the medium of dissemination and the audience to whom it is directed, should be considered. Burns v. McGraw Hill Broad. Co., 659 P.2d 1351 (Colo. 1983).

Burns v. McGraw-Hill dichotomy between "fact" and "opinion" is no longer relevant in determining whether speech is constitutionally privileged. However, the factors identified in the Burns case (phrasing, context, and circumstances) are relevant and must be considered in determining whether a statement can reasonably be understood as declaring or implying a provable assertion of fact. Keohane v. Wilkerson, 859 P.2d 291 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 882 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Whether a statement is actionable depends not on its characterization as fact or opinion, but on whether it (1) contains or implies a verifiable fact about the plaintiff, and (2) is reasonably susceptible to being understood as an actual assertion of fact. Keohane v. Wilkerson, 859 P.2d 291 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 882 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Characterization of a statement as a "question" or as "hypothetical" is irrelevant if it reasonably implies a defamatory factual assertion. Keohane v. Wilkerson, 859 P.2d 291 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 882 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Defendant's question to reporter about whether judge had been bribed with money or with drugs clearly implied that judge had been bribed; the only question was how. Keohane v. Wilkerson, 859 P.2d 291 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 882 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

A speculative or conjectural statement, based on truthful, nondefamatory facts which are disclosed or otherwise generally known to the audience, cannot reasonably be understood as an assertion of fact. Keohane v. Wilkerson, 859 P.2d 291 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 882 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Defendant's letter to the editor speculating on the existence of a "conspiracy" among leading members of the community but not implying the writer's firsthand knowledge of undisclosed facts supporting such a claim was constitutionally protected speech. Keohane v. Wilkerson, 859 P.2d 291 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 882 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

Statements made on television talk show that professional athlete had quit and backed out on team during playoffs constituted protected opinion under test. Brooks v. Paige, 773 P.2d 1098 (Colo. App. 1988).

A public figure may not maintain a claim for outrageous conduct when the conduct complained of is expressive behavior directed at his "public persona". Brooks v. Paige, 773 P.2d 1098 (Colo. App. 1988).

Statements made in television news broadcast characterizing sale of living will packets as "scam" and referring to customers of company that sold packets as being "taken" were constitutionally privileged and were not actionable as defamation since broadcasts did not contain or imply verifiable facts nor could they be reasonably understood as assertions of actual fact. NBC Subsidiary v. Living Will Center, 879 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1994).

"Clear and convincing" standard applied to finding of reckless disregard. In a libel action, the "clear and convincing" standard of proof is to be applied to the finding of reckless disregard. Diversified Mgmt., Inc. v. Denver Post, Inc., 653 P.2d 1103 (Colo. 1982).

If plaintiff in a defamation action is a public figure, or an allegedly defamatory statement involved a matter of public concern, plaintiff must prove by clear and convincing evidence that defendant published defamatory statement with actual malice, i.e., with knowledge of falsity or in reckless disregard of the truth. Lewis v. McGraw-Hill Broad., 832 P.2d 1118 (Colo. App. 1992).

As to matters of public concern, which are afforded the comprehensive protection of the first amendment, a heightened burden applies, and a plaintiff is required to prove the statement's falsity by clear and convincing evidence, rather than by a mere preponderance. Williams v. Continental Airlines, Inc., 943 P.2d 10 (Colo. App. 1996).

Where statements do not involve a matter of public concern and plaintiff is not a public figure, plaintiff is required to prove that the statements are false only by a preponderance of the evidence. McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

First amendment values would be better honored by adopting the same definition of "reckless disregard" used in cases involving public officials and public figures for matters of public or general concern. Diversified Mgmt., Inc. v. Denver Post, Inc., 653 P.2d 1103 (Colo. 1982).

Trial court's finding that defendant abused qualified privilege is supported by evidence and is therefore not clearly erroneous. Defendant willfully chose not to learn the truth, which is sufficient to establish reckless disregard. McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

Publications are constitutionally protected if they concern either a public figure or a matter of public concern, and a showing of actual malice is necessary to defeat the protection and make the defamatory publication actionable. To establish malice, plaintiff must show, with clear and convincing evidence, that the defamation was published with actual knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard for its truth or falsity. Seible v. Denver Post Corp., 782 P.2d 805 (Colo. App. 1989).

Trial court correctly determined that plaintiff was a limited purpose public figure. A limited purpose public figure is one who voluntarily injects himself or herself into a particular controversy and thereby becomes a public figure for a limited range of issues such that the person has achieved special prominence in the resolution of public questions. Limited purpose public figure status focuses on two questions: The threshold question of whether the defamatory statement involves a matter of public concern and, more importantly, whether the level of plaintiff's participation in the controversy invites scrutiny. Lewis v. McGraw-Hill Broad., 832 P.2d 1118 (Colo. App. 1992) (citing Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. 418 U.S. 323, 94 S. Ct. 2997, 41 L. Ed. 2d 789 (1974)); McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

Statement in television newscast which erroneously implied that plaintiff had been arrested for obstructing justice, indecent exposure, and prostitution prior to shoplifting arrest involved a matter of sufficient public concern to implicate first amendment protection under the United States Constitution where such newscast emerged in the context of a persistent public controversy over department store's policies toward minorities and was partly brought on by plaintiff's attorney who sought to inform the media that his client had never been arrested prior to shoplifting incident. Lewis v. McGraw-Hill Broad., 832 P.2d 1118 (Colo. App. 1992).

When media has an objective basis to rely on the accuracy of an official report relating to a matter of public concern or involving a public figure, then publication need not be delayed in order to investigate its accuracy or to obtain corroboration from all possible sources. Lewis v. McGraw-Hill Broad., 832 P.2d 1118 (Colo. App. 1992).

Purely private libels are in no way impacted by the New York Times v. Sullivan rule that in civil or criminal libel actions brought by public officials, truth is an absolute defense and only false statements made with "actual malice" are subject to sanctions. People v. Ryan, 806 P.2d 935 (Colo. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 860, 112 S. Ct. 177, 116 L. Ed. 2d 140 (1991).

It is inappropriate to require that defamatory false statements must be made with "actual malice", where one private person disseminates defamatory statements about another private individual in the victim's community. Rather, in a purely private context, a less restrictive culpability standard may be used to meet the state's legitimate interest in controlling constitutionally unprotected conduct injurious to its citizens. People v. Ryan, 806 P.2d 935 (Colo. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 860, 112 S. Ct. 177, 116 L. Ed. 2d 140 (1991).

A statement of opinion relating to matters of public concern is fully protected under the constitution when it does not contain provably false factual connotation and cannot be interpreted as stating actual fact about an individual. NBC Subsidiary v. Living Will Center, 879 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1994); Bailey v. Huggins Diagnostic & Rehab., 952 P.2d 768 (Colo. App. 1997).

No legal duty of due care is owed by an author or interviewee on a public television program to those members of the public who may read the book or view the program. Bailey v. Huggins Diagnostic & Rehab., 952 P.2d 768 (Colo. App. 1997).

The question whether a subject is of public concern is a question of law. Williams v. Continental Airlines, Inc., 943 P.2d 10 (Colo. App. 1996); McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

The boundaries of public concern cannot be readily defined, but must be determined on a case-by-case basis. Generally, a matter is of public concern whenever it embraces an issue about which information is needed or is appropriate or when the public may reasonably be expected to have a legitimate interest in what is being published. Williams v. Continental Airlines, Inc., 943 P.2d 10 (Colo. App. 1996); McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

However, the balance should be struck in favor of a private plaintiff if his or her reputation has been injured by a non-media defendant in a purely private context. Williams v. Continental Airlines, Inc., 943 P.2d 10 (Colo. App. 1996); McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

Selecting a bookkeeper for a small homeowners association is not a matter of public concern for purposes of a defamation action. McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

Public official can recover in a defamation suit only if he proves by "clear and convincing evidence" that a false and defamatory statement of fact was published about him by a defendant who, at the time of publication, knew that the statement was false or made it "with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not". Manuel v. Fort Collins Newspapers, Inc., 661 P.2d 289 (Colo. App. 1982); Willis v. Perry, 677 P.2d 961 (Colo. App. 1983).

Police officers are public officials. Willis v. Perry, 677 P.2d 961 (Colo. App. 1983).

Colorado does not recognize the tort of false light invasion of privacy. The tort is highly duplicative of defamation both in interests protected and conduct averted and its subjective component raises the spectre of a chilling effect on first amendment freedoms. Denver Publ'g Co. v. Bueno, 54 P.3d 893 (Colo. 2002).

Tort of invasion of privacy by appropriation of another's name or likeness is cognizable under Colorado law. The elements of the tort are: (1) The defendant used the plaintiff's name or likeness; (2) the use of the plaintiff's name or likeness was for the defendant's own purposes or benefit; (3) the plaintiff suffered damages; and (4) the defendant caused the damages incurred. Such a claim will not succeed, however, if the defendant's use of the plaintiff's name and likeness is constitutionally privileged. Joe Dickerson & Assocs. v. Dittmar, 34 P.3d 995 (Colo. 2001).

Defendant's publication of the details of plaintiff's crime and felony conviction in defendant's newsletter was privileged because the facts of the crime and felony conviction were a matter of public concern. Joe Dickerson & Assocs. v. Dittmar, 34 P.3d 995 (Colo. 2001).

Statements in a letter to the editor are constitutionally protected where the statements were found to be expressions of opinion and where the statements were not based on undisclosed facts. Sall v. Barber, 782 P.2d 1216 (Colo. App. 1989); Keohane v. Wilkerson, 859 P.2d 291 (Colo. App. 1993), aff'd, 882 P.2d 1293 (Colo. 1994).

De novo review is appropriate when determining the first amendment status of government property. Lewis v. Colo. Rockies Baseball Club, 941 P.2d 266 (Colo. 1997).

The district court's findings of constitutional fact are reviewed de novo, as are its ultimate conclusions of constitutional law. In cases involving activity that may be protected under the free speech clause of the first amendment, an appellate court has an obligation to make an independent examination of the whole record in order to make sure that the judgment does not constitute a forbidden intrusion on the field of free expression. Lytle v. City of Haysville, 138 F.3d 857 (10th Cir. 1998); Fleming v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 298 F.3d 918 (10th Cir. 2002), cert. denied, 537 U.S. 1110, 123 S. Ct. 893, 154 L. Ed. 2d 783 (2003).

De novo standard of review not applied to trial court's factual findings bearing on freedom of speech rights of students who worked on community college newspaper in action in which main issue was the motivation of the student government, the counsel, and the administration in eliminating funding of newspaper which was an factual inquiry. Olson v. State Bd. for Cmty. Colls. and Occupational Educ., 759 P.2d 829 (Colo. App. 1988).

Issues are made up as in other cases and rules of evidence observed. Notwithstanding the provision of this section that the jury in actions for libel shall determine the law and the facts, the issues must by made up as in other cases, and the rules of evidence observed. A verdict based upon evidence which the law declares incompetent will not be allowed to stand. Meeker v. Post Printing & Publ'g Co., 55 Colo. 355, 135 P. 457 (1913).

Error not to award defendant expenses of marshalling evidence. Where the evidence, the marshalling of which created the expenses, was admissible, the trial court erred in not awarding to defendant the reasonable expenses and attorney's fees incurred in disproving the plaintiff's denial of a fact asserted in the allegedly libelous statement. Gomba v. McLaughlin, 180 Colo. 232, 504 P.2d 337 (1972).

Courts have inherent power to punish for contempt as to causes pending. The courts have inherent power and the duty to punish for contempt those who publish newspaper accounts concerning causes pending, the inherent tendency of which is to influence, intimidate, impede, embarrass or obstruct the court in the administration of justice. In re Jameson, 139 Colo. 171, 340 P.2d 423 (1959).

To constitute contempt of court, the publication by a newspaper of an offensive editorial, the inherent tendency of which is to obstruct justice, must amount to a clear and present danger that the evil intended may be accomplished; hence editorial comment on pending cases, even if grossly unfair and false, is not to be adjudged contemptuous unless it constitutes an imminent peril to the administration of justice. In re Jameson, 139 Colo. 171, 340 P.2d 423 (1959).

This section is no defense in proceedings for constructive contempt in newspaper publications; this section of the constitution, and every other section of the constitution, leaves unimpaired the law of contempts as to pending causes as it existed at common law. People ex rel. Attorney Gen. v. News-Times Publ'g Co., 35 Colo. 253, 84 P. 912 (1906), appeal dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, 205 U.S. 454, 27 S. Ct. 556, 51 L. Ed. 879 (1907).

Power to punish for contempt must be invoked with restraint. The power to punish for contempt shall be invoked only where the adjudicatory process may be hampered or hindered in its calm, detached, and fearless discharge of its duty on the basis of what has been submitted in court. In re Jameson, 139 Colo. 171, 340 P.2d 423 (1959).

Since purpose of power to protect public, not private individuals. The purpose of the power to punish for contempt is to protect immediate litigants and the public from the mischievous danger of an unfree or coerced tribunal. In re Jameson, 139 Colo. 171, 340 P.2d 423 (1959).

The power to punish for constructive criminal contempt finds its genesis in the theory that the acts complained of constitute a public injury or offense, as distinguished from a private injury or offense. In re Jameson, 139 Colo. 171, 340 P.2d 423 (1959).

When case is finished, courts and judges are subject to same criticisms as other people and no comment published in connection with a completed case, however libelous or unjust, is punishable as a contempt of court. In re Jameson, 139 Colo. 171, 340 P.2d 423 (1959).

Subject to the condition that no person can be critical of a judge if the purpose of the criticism is to influence the result of pending litigation, a citizen can praise or condemn conduct of a court, or a judge, being responsible for all abuse of that liberty, to the same extent and through the same procedures applicable to all citizens. In re Petition of Colo. Bar Ass'n, 137 Colo. 357, 325 P.2d 932 (1958).

The remedies of a judge who suffers abuse at the hands of the press when a case is completed are the same as those available to persons outside the judiciary. In re Jameson, 139 Colo. 171, 340 P.2d 423 (1959).

When considering discipline of attorneys who criticize judges, the New York Times standard should be applied because of the interests in protecting attorney speech critical of judges. Under the New York Times standard (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)), a two-part inquiry applies in determining whether an attorney may be disciplined for statements criticizing a judge: (1) Whether the disciplinary authority has proven that the statement was a false statement of fact (or a statement of opinion that necessarily implies an undisclosed false assertion of fact); and (2) assuming the statement is false, whether the attorney uttered the statement with actual malice -- that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard as to its truth. In re Green, 11 P.3d 1078 (Colo. 2000).

Peaceful picketing for lawful objective constitutes exercise of constitutionally protected right of free speech, hence denial thereof is repugnant to this section and the first and fourteenth amendments of the constitution of the United States. Pueblo Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council v. Harper Constr. Co., 134 Colo. 469, 307 P.2d 468 (1957).

However state has power to regulate picketing. Recognition of peaceful picketing as an exercise of free speech does not imply that the states must be without power to confine the sphere of communication to that directly related to the dispute. Pueblo Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council v. Harper Constr. Co., 134 Colo. 469, 307 P.2d 468 (1957).

Although cannot prohibit peaceful picketing. The constitutional guarantee of freedom of discussion is infringed by the policy of a state forbidding resort to peaceful picketing because there is no immediate employer-employee dispute. Pueblo Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council v. Harper Constr. Co., 134 Colo. 469, 307 P.2d 468 (1957).

News reporter not privileged to refuse to respond to subpoena. Where a news reporter, who is a first-hand observer of criminal conduct, is subpoenaed to testify and to produce relevant documents "in the course of a valid grand jury investigation or criminal trial", there is no privilege under the Colorado constitution to refuse to respond to a subpoena. Pankratz v. District Court, 199 Colo. 411, 609 P.2d 1101 (1980).

A tax ordinance that treats newspapers as all other goods is not unconstitutional under this section. Catholic Archdiocese v. City of Denver, 741 P.2d 333 (Colo. 1987).

The right to speak and publish does not create an unfettered and unlimited right to gather information made available solely for discovery purposes. Bowlen v. District Court, 733 P.2d 1179 (Colo. 1987).

Fair report doctrine protects a fair and accurate media report of a defamatory statement made in a public proceeding, because a reporter must be allowed to convey statements that a member of the public would have heard had he or she attended the public proceeding. Wilson v. Meyer, 126 P.3d 276 (Colo. App. 2005).

To be liable for defamation, a defendant must have "published or caused to be published" a defamatory statement, and a defendant's silence in the presence of a defamatory statement made by another does not constitute publication. Wilson v. Meyer, 126 P.3d 276 (Colo. App. 2005).

Restrictions on commercial speech are within ambit of this section and the first amendment of the United States Constitution. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981).

Advertising, as commercial speech, protected by first amendment, but not immune to taxation. Advertising may instead be subject to general taxes or economic regulations without necessarily violating the Constitution. Walgreen Co. v. Charnes, 859 P.2d 235 (Colo. App. 1992).

Test for facial overbreadth. A statute is not unconstitutional unless the overbreadth is judged to be substantial in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep. The prohibited conduct must be adequately defined, as written or authoritatively construed, and the category of conduct proscribed must be suitably limited and described to avoid criminalizing an intolerable range of constitutionally protected conduct. People v. Batchelor, 800 P.2d 599 (Colo. 1990).

To determine whether statute facially overbroad, it is necessary to examine the extent to which the statute could prohibit speech beyond the reach of governmental regulation. Whimbush v. People, 869 P.2d 1245 (Colo. 1994); Aguilar v. People, 886 P.2d 725 (Colo. 1994).

Overbreadth doctrine neither compels invalidation of statutes nor confers general standing to challenge. The doctrine of overbreadth does not compel indiscriminate facial invalidation of every statute which may chill protected expression, nor does it confer standing to challenge the facial constitutionality of a statute on every defendant whose conduct falls within its prohibitions. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981); Marco Lounge, Inc. v. City of Fed. Heights, 625 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1981).

Former § 18-5-115 (1)(a) unconstitutionally overbroad as infringing on a charitable organization's freedom of speech where more narrowly tailored means of preventing fraud were available. People v. French, 762 P.2d 1369 (Colo. 1988).

Harassment by stalking. By burdening only those communications furthering, promoting, or advancing an expressed credible threat, § 18-9-111 (4)(a)(II) does not reach protected conduct. People v. Baer, 973 P.2d 1225 (Colo. 1999).

Nor is the provision void for vagueness since a person of ordinary intelligence can know what conduct is proscribed. People v. Baer, 973 P.2d 1225 (Colo. 1999).

A statute that regulates unprotected speech is overbroad if its prohibitions encroach upon protected communications. People v. Ryan, 806 P.2d 935 (Colo. 1991); Aguilar v. People, 886 P.2d 725 (Colo. 1994).

Police department rule proscribing conduct unbecoming an officer is not overbroad. The overbreadth was not "real and substantial", and the rule is not constitutionally infirm. Puzick v. City of Colo. Springs, 680 P.2d 1283 (Colo. App. 1983).

Standing to challenge termination of college newspaper funding. The faculty advisor of a student-run college newspaper has no standing on his own behalf to raise first amendment challenges to the termination of funding for the newspaper but does have third party standing to assert students' first amendment interests. State Bd. for Cmty. Colls. & Occupational Educ. v. Olson, 687 P.2d 429 (Colo. 1984).

For discussion of trial court's refusal to recognize reporter's privilege, see Gagnon v. District Court, 632 P.2d 567 (Colo. 1981).

Right under this section does not extend to permit communication between press and prospective jurors who had been admonished not to discuss the pending case. In re Stone, 703 P.2d 1319 (Colo. App. 1985).

Open meetings law strikes proper balance between the public's right of access to information and a legislator's right to freedom of speech. Cole v. State, 673 P.2d 345 (Colo. 1983).

The right of privacy may be qualified when a policeman's off-duty conduct interferes with the compelling state interest in maintaining an efficient police force. Puzick v. City of Colo. Springs, 680 P.2d 1283 (Colo. App. 1983).

Section 1-40-110 does violate right to free speech. Grant v. Meyer, 828 F.2d 1446 (10th Cir. 1987), aff'd, 486 U.S. 414, 108 S. Ct. 1886, 100 L. Ed. 2d 425 1988 (decided under former version of § 1-40-110).

Order of the district court to give notice to customers of class action lawsuit does not violate Mountain Bell's right to free speech. The notice sent by the defendant in this case was content-neutral and it did not result in the utility being compelled to be associated with a message with which it did not agree. Mountain States v. District Court, 778 P.2d 667 (Colo. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 983, 110 S. Ct. 519, 107 L. Ed. 2d 520 (1989).

Termination of employee. In determining whether the termination of a school teacher constitutes an unlawful retaliation for the exercise of freedom of expression, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that his conduct was constitutionally protected and that it was a substantial or motivating factor in the employer's decision not to renew employment. Heywood v. Thompson Sch. Dist. R2-J, 703 P.2d 1308 (Colo. App. 1985); Salida Sch. Dist. R-32-J v. Morrison, 732 P.2d 1160 (Colo. 1987); Ridgeway v. Kiowa Sch. Dist. C-2, 794 P. 2d 1020 (Colo. App. 1989).

School teacher has no first amendment right to use nonapproved controversial learning resources in his classroom without following the school district's controversial materials policy. Where curriculum controls are reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns, they do not violate the free speech rights guaranteed by the first amendment. Bd. of Educ. of Jefferson County v. Wilder, 960 P.2d 695 (Colo. 1998).

The initial determination of whether the conduct is constitutionally protected requires a balancing of the interests of the teacher, as a citizen, in commenting upon matters of public concern, and the interest of the state, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public service it performs through its employees. Ridgeway v. Kiowa Sch. Dist. C-2, 794 P. 2d 1020 (Colo. App. 1989).

If the manner, time, place, and context of an employee's statement, regardless of its otherwise protected content, reveal that the statement constituted a refusal to perform a lawful task within the scope of the employee's duties, it is insubordination and, as such, constitutionally unprotected. Ridgeway v. Kiowa Sch. Dist. C-2, 794 P. 2d 1020 (Colo. App. 1989); Barrett v. Univ. of Colo., 851 P.2d 258 (Colo. App. 1993).

Hiring official's racially derogatory remarks were not constitutionally protected speech where they did not touch upon a matter of public concern, i.e., where they were not directed toward policies pertaining to discrimination, did not tend or seek to expose discriminatory practices, and merely reflected the possible racial bias of an employee in the context of the employer's hiring process. Barrett v. Univ. of Colo., 851 P.2d 258 (Colo. App. 1993).

Four-part test applies to determine whether an employee's constitutional right to free speech has been violated by employer's conduct: (1) The employee must show that the speech touches upon a matter of public concern; (2) if so, the employer has the burden to show that the employer's interests outweigh the employee's interest, as a citizen, in commenting thereon; (3) if the employer's interests do not outweigh the employee's interest, the employee must then show that the protected activity was a substantial or motivating factor in the employer's decision to take the action complained of; and (4) the employer may still prevail if it can show that the same decision would have been made in the absence of the protected conduct. Kemp v. State Bd. of Agric., 803 P.2d 498 (Colo. 1990); Cotter v. Bd. of Trustees of Univ. of Northern Colo., 971 P.2d 687 (Colo. App. 1998).

Public employment cannot be conditioned on a basis that infringes the employee's constitutionally protected interest in freedom of expression. Gabel v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 824 P.2d 26 (Colo. App. 1991); Barrett v. Univ. of Colo., 851 P.2d 258 (Colo. App. 1993).

The determination of whether speech is constitutionally protected is a question of law subject to independent examination by an appellate court in light of the record. Gabel v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 824 P.2d 26 (Colo. App. 1991); Barrett v. Univ. of Colo., 851 P.2d 258 (Colo. App. 1993).

The determination of whether speech touches a matter of public concern, under first part of Kemp four-part test, rests on a particularized examination of each statement to determine whether it can be fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community. Gabel v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 824 P.2d 26 (Colo. App. 1991); Barrett v. Univ. of Colo., 851 P.2d 258 (Colo. App. 1993); Cotter v. Bd. of Trustees of Univ. of Northern Colo., 971 P.2d 687 (Colo. App. 1998); McIntyre v. Jones, 194 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2008).

Petitioner has not sustained his burden to prove that his conduct was constitutionally protected expression by a public employee on a matter of public concern where he asserted that his refusal to perform hall duty stemmed from his belief that such performance would nullify his teaching precepts in the classroom, and that to require hall duty would force him to espouse beliefs he does not hold. Lockhart v. Arapahoe County Sch. Dist. No. 6, 735 P.2d 913 (Colo. App. 1986).

Speech that concerns the use of public funds or discloses evidence of corruption, impropriety, or other malfeasance on the part of public officials or employees touches a matter of public concern, but criticism of internal management decisions made by public officials or employees does not. Cotter v. Bd. of Trustees of Univ. of Northern Colo., 971 P.2d 687 (Colo. App. 1998).

An employer may avoid liability from an employee's civil rights claim for retaliatory discharge upon proving it would have reached the same decision in the absence of the protected conduct or that the relationship between the employer and the employee was of such a personal nature that the employee's conduct materially undermined an overriding governmental interest in the effective administration of state programs. Salida Sch. Dist. R-32-J v. Morrison, 732 P.2d 1160 (Colo. 1987).

This section and the statutory provisions related to open records do not provide a sufficient basis for declaring a confidential termination agreement between a school district and its superintendent void as contrary to public policy. Pierce v. St. Vrain Valley Sch. Dist., 981 P.2d 600 (Colo. 1999).

Where governmental entities or public monies subsidize, approve, or encourage private interests and such private interests restrict the liberty to speak and to dissent, such private restrictions run afoul of the protective scope of this section. Improvements funded by municipal bonds, existence of police substation, patrolling by police officers, existence of recruiting offices of branches of U.S. military, county clerk voter registration drives, and allowance of other public interest groups to congregate at shopping mall created nexus between government and private interests which own mall and effectively precluded mall owners from excluding other political groups from using mall to collect signatures. Bock v. Westminster Mall Co., 819 P.2d 55 (Colo. 1991).

Historical connection between the marketplace of ideas and the market for goods and services is not severed because goods and services today are bought and sold within the confines of a modern mall. To conclude otherwise would be to allow the vagaries of contemporary urban architecture and planning, or the lack thereof, to prevail over our valued tradition of free speech. Bock v. Westminster Mall Co., 819 P.2d 55 (Colo. 1991).

This provision is more inclusive and protective of the rights of citizens than is the first amendment to the federal constitution. In re Canon 35, 132 Colo. 591, 296 P.2d 465 (1956); Pierce v. St. Vrain Valley Sch. Dist., 944 P.2d 646 (Colo. App. 1997), rev'd on other grounds, 981 P.2d 600 (Colo. 1999).

National labor policy does not require unqualified privilege be given employer in a defamation action based upon statements made in a grievance proceeding. Thompson v. Pub. Serv. Co. of Colo., 800 P.2d 1299 (Colo. 1990), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 973, 112 S. Ct. 452, 116 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1991).

A state law defamation action based upon statements made in a grievance or disciplinary proceeding may go forward when a qualified privilege for such statements is recognized. Thompson v. Pub. Serv.

Co. of Colo., 800 P.2d 1299 (Colo. 1990), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 973, 112 S. Ct. 452, 116 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1991).

No violation of right to freedom of expressive association where discovery of names of persons donating to a trust fund was permitted in action for breach of trust in allocating trust moneys. Smith v. District Court, 797 P.2d 1244 (Colo. 1990).

Speech is not protected in the context of employee dismissal controversies unless it relates to a matter of public concern. Salida Sch. Dist. R-32-J v. Morrison, 732 P.2d 1160 (Colo. 1987).

Public employment cannot be conditioned on a basis that infringes the employee's constitutionally protected interest in freedom of expression. If an employee's speech was mainly personal in nature rather than related to public concerns, such speech is not entitled to constitutional protection. Gabel v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 824 P.2d 26 (Colo. App. 1991).

There was no violation of the right to freedom of speech due to the murder of a woman by her husband in a county justice center. Duong v. Arapahoe County Comm'rs, 837 P.2d 226 (Colo. App. 1992).

Distribution of leaflets and cookies by demonstrators in front of a sexually oriented business not protected expressions under this section where the distributions were made on the sidewalk in a privately owned strip shopping center. The court concluded that the shopping center was not the functional equivalent of a downtown business district since it consisted of less than 25 small businesses, had no department stores, had parking for less than 400 cars, had no police substation, no military offices, and no movie theaters. Rouse v. City of Aurora, 901 F. Supp. 1533 (D. Colo. 1995).

Pretrial detainee was not deprived of freedom of speech by jail personnel who monitored his outgoing correspondence to another inmate. The mail was not censored, and a prisoner has fewer free speech rights when corresponding with another prisoner. People v. Whalin, 885 P.2d 293 (Colo. App. 1994).

An inmate has no constitutional right to photocopying services. There is no free speech violation in restricting the photocopying privileges of inmates who otherwise are able to write by hand. Negron v. Golder, 111 P.3d 538 (Colo. App. 2004).

A showing that parent's exercise of free speech threatened the child with physical or emotional harm, or caused such harm, would establish a compelling state interest sufficient to justify a restriction on parent's first amendment free speech rights. In re Newell, 192 P.3d 529 (Colo. App. 2008).

Section 12-47.1-804 (1) did not impose unconstitutional restrictions on ballot access, the right to hold public office, and the right to vote where the state's substantial interest in avoiding corruption and the appearance of corruption in both the gaming industry and local government outweighed the limited burden that § 12-47.1-804 (1) placed on ballot access, the right to hold public office, or on the right to vote. Lorenz v. State, 928 P.2d 1274 (Colo. 1996).

Prospective political candidates lacked standing to challenge § 12-47.1-804 (1) on vagueness grounds where candidates owned a personal interest in gaming licenses or owned corporations that held gaming licenses. Lorenz v. State, 928 P.2d 1274 (Colo. 1996).

II. EX POST FACTO LAWS.

Definition. Ex post facto laws are defined variously as: Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes such action; every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was, when committed; every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment, than the law annexed to the crime, when committed; every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less, or different testimony, than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender. Myers v. District Court, 184 Colo. 81, 518 P.2d 836 (1974).

Implication of term "ex post facto". The term "ex post facto" necessarily implies a fact or act done, after which the law in question is passed. French v. Deane, 19 Colo. 504, 36 P. 609, 24 L.R.A. 387 (1894).

Ex post facto legislation is abhorred in criminal law because it stigmatizes with criminality an act entirely innocent when committed. Police Pension & Relief Bd. v. McPhail, 139 Colo. 330, 338 P.2d 694 (1959).

This section applies solely to statutes which take away or impair a vested right. The provisions of this section prohibiting the passage of laws retrospective in operation apply solely to statutes which take away or impair a vested right acquired under existing laws, or which create a new obligation, impose a new duty, or attach a new disability in respect to transactions already passed. Vail v. Denver Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 108 Colo. 206, 115 P.2d 389 (1941); Peoples Natural Gas Div. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 197 Colo. 152, 590 P.2d 960 (1979); Gambler's Express v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 868 P.2d 405 (Colo. 1994).

Neither an affirmative enactment nor a repealing statute can be so construed under the state constitution as to retroact upon and impair or take away accrued rights, which by the authority of law, and in the manner pointed out by it, had been previously asserted. And especially is this true when such rights have been carried into judgment. Denver S. P. & P. R. R. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162 (1878).

And is aimed only at criminal cases. The prohibition against ex post facto laws is aimed at criminal cases, but it cannot be evaded by giving a civil form to that which in its nature is criminal. French v. Deane, 19 Colo. 504, 36 P. 609 (1894).

The phrase "ex post facto" applies only to criminal cases. French v. Deane, 19 Colo. 504, 36 P. 609 (1894); Wood v. Beatrice Foods Co., 813 P.2d 821 (Colo. App. 1991).

The phrase "ex post facto", as used in the constitution of the United States and this section, does not apply to civil laws. Such laws only are ex post facto as provide for the punishment of a party for acts antecedently done which were not punishable at all, or not punishable to the extent or in the manner prescribed. Denver S. P. & P. R. R. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162 (1878).

Two critical elements must be present for a criminal statute to be stricken down as an ex post facto law: It must be retrospective, and it must disadvantage the offender affected by it. People v. Billips, 652 P.2d 1060 (Colo. 1982).

Section 18-1.4-102 (8) violates prohibition on ex post facto laws. Allowing the supreme court to remand cases back for new penalty proceedings violates the ex post facto clause. Subjecting a defendant, sentenced under an unconstitutional death penalty statute, to a new penalty hearing in front of a jury is ex post facto because of the statutory dictate of a life sentence in § 18-1.3-401 (5) and because the defendants in these cases were identifiable targets of the legislation. People v. Woldt, 64 P.3d 256 (Colo. 2003).

The plain language of § 25-14-204 (2) states that a plaintiff who legally expands his cigar-tobacco bar prior to July 1, 2006, would become subject to penalties as of July 1, 2006, for his pre-enactment expansion. This is impermissible ex post facto legislation; however, the challenge to the retroactive law has become moot by the simple passage of time. Coal. for Equal Rights v. Owens, 458 F. Supp. 2d 1251 (D. Colo. 2006), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. Coal. for Equal Rights, Inc. v. Ritter, 517 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2008).

Statute is not ex post facto where it does not enlarge the punishment to which the accused was liable when his crime was committed, nor make any act involved in his offense criminal that was not criminal at the time he committed the crime for which he was found guilty. People v. Bastardo, 646 P.2d 382 (Colo. 1982).

An inmate does not have a vested right in earned time, so the inmate's punishment is not increased by withholding earned time from the inmate for not participating in sex offender treatment. Reeves v. Colo. Dept. of Corr., 155 P.3d 648 (Colo. App. 2007).

Section 18-3-405 (2)(c) was possibly applied ex post facto, therefore, enhancement portion of conviction is reversed where several assaults occurred before this law was enacted, the verdict could have been based on an act that preceded the law's enactment, and the jury was not instructed that the conviction had to be based on an act that occurred after the law's passage. People v. Graham, 876 P.2d 68 (Colo. App. 1994).

Statutory provision tolling the expiration of parole upon the filing of a parole violation complaint does not violate prohibition against ex post facto laws. Goetz v. Gunter, 830 P.2d 1154 (Colo. App. 1992).

The ex post facto clause of the Colorado Constitution operates primarily to prohibit the retroactive application of legislative changes which make previously lawful behavior a criminal offense or which enhance criminal penalties and, by its own terms, said clause does not apply to the judicial branch of the government. The Colorado supreme court's amendment of C.R.C.P. 24(f), which previously required jurors in a capital case to be sequestered, allowed the trial court to determine in its discretion whether to sequester the jurors in a criminal trial and such amendment did not violate the defendant's constitutional rights. People v. Benney, 757 P.2d 1078 (Colo. App. 1987); People v. Graham, 876 P.2d 68 (Colo. App. 1994).

Time at which offense committed governs ex post facto character of law. Whether a law is ex post facto or not relates, in criminal cases, to the time at which the offense charged was committed. If the law complained of was passed before the commission of the act with which the prisoner is charged, it cannot, as to that offense, be an ex post facto law. If passed after the commission of the offense, it is as to that ex post facto, though whether of the class forbidden by the constitution may depend on other matters. French v. Deane, 19 Colo. 504, 36 P. 609 (1894); Zaragoza v. Dept. of Rev., 702 P.2d 274 (Colo. 1985).

So far as the ex post facto character of a law depends on the time of its enactment, it has reference solely to the date at which the offense was committed to which the new law is sought to be applied. No other time or transaction but this has been in any adjudged case held to govern its ex post facto character. French v. Deane, 19 Colo. 504, 36 P. 609 (1894).

A statute is not rendered unconstitutional as an ex post facto law merely because it might operate on a fact or status preexisting the effective date of the legislation, as long as its punitive features apply only to acts committed after the statutory proscription becomes effective. People v. Billips, 652 P.2d 1060 (Colo. 1982); Gasper v. Gunter, 851 P.2d 912 (Colo. 1993); People v. Graham, 876 P.2d 68 (Colo. App. 1994); Coal. for Equal Rights v. Owens, 458 F. Supp. 2d 1251 (D. Colo. 2006), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. Coal. for Equal Rights, Inc. v. Ritter, 517 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2008).

When defendant pleads guilty and the factual basis provided that defendant committed the acts both during a time period before and after a statute is effective, the defendant cannot claim an ex post facto violation. People v. Bobrik, 87 P.3d 865 (Colo. App. 2003).

This section operates, as to pending causes under a statute, as a saving clause incorporated into the repealing statute. Lundin v. Kansas P. R. R., 4 Colo. 433 (1878); Denver S. P. & P. R. R. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162 (1878).

The ex post facto clause is violated when a statute punishes as a crime conduct which was innocent when done, makes more onerous the punishment for a crime after its commission, or deprives a defendant of a defense that was available at the time the crime was committed. People v. District Court (Thomas), 834 P.2d 181 (Colo. 1992); People v. Aguayo, 840 P.2d 336 (Colo. 1992); People v. Bielecki, 964 P.2d 598 (Colo. App. 1998).

The test for determining whether a criminal law is ex post facto is twofold. First, it must be retrospective, that is, it must apply to events occurring before its enactment. Second, it must disadvantage the offender affected by it. In re R.B., 815 P.2d 999 (Colo. App. 1991); People v. Stewart, 926 P.2d 105 (Colo. App. 1996); People v. Bielecki, 964 P.2d 598 (Colo. App. 1998).

An ex post facto law is one which imposes punishment for an act which was not a crime when it was committed or which imposes additional punishment upon acts then proscribed. People v. Grenemyer, 827 P.2d 603 (Colo. App. 1992).

The test for determining whether posting personal information on the internet about convicted sex offenders constitutes additional criminal punishment in violation of the ex post facto clause is the test contained in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144 (1966). The seven factors are: (1) Whether the sanction involves an affirmative disability or restraint; (2) whether it has historically been regarded as punishment; (3) whether it comes into play only on a finding of scienter; (4) whether its operation will promote the traditional aims of punishment--retribution and deterrence; (5) whether the behavior to which it apples is already a crime; (6) whether an alternative purpose to which it may rationally be connected is assignable for it; and (7) whether it appears excessive in relation to the alternative purpose assigned. People v. Stead, 66 P.3d 117 (Colo. App. 2002).

"Punishment" as referred to in case law discussing ex post facto laws is broader than an increase in the sentence. Punishment in the instant case was increased retrospectively when petitioner was denied the automatic entry of an order limiting access to records relating to the charge against her because of amendment of the statute limiting access after her crime was committed. In re R.B., 815

Requirement that prisoner participate in sex offender treatment program does not violate ex post facto clause even though program did not exist when prisoner was sentenced since participation in the program is a privilege and does not constitute additional punishment. White v. People, 866 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1994).

Requirement that offender register as a sex offender does not violate ex post facto clause, because the registration requirement is intended to assist law enforcement officials in investigating future sex crimes and to protect the public safety. As such, it is remedial, not punitive, and does not unconstitutionally enhance the offender's punishment. Jamison v. People, 988 P.2d 177 (Colo. App. 1999).

Since sex offender registration is not punitive, requiring an offender who plead not guilty by reason of insanity to register as a sex offender upon his or her conditional release does not violate the principles of ex post facto. People v. Durapau, 12 COA 67, 280 P.3d 42.

There is no ex post facto violation when a current qualifying sexually violent predator offense was not a qualifying offense at the time it was committed. Since sexually violent predator status is not punishment, there is no constitutional violation. People v. Mendoza, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2011).

Drug offender surcharge created in § 18-19-103 is properly characterized as a punishment rather than as a nonpunitive, compensatory payment. As such, the surcharge is appropriately scrutinized against constitutional provisions prohibiting ex post facto legislation. People v. Stead, 845 P.2d 1156 (Colo. 1993).

Imposition of drug offender surcharge violated prohibition against ex post facto laws where defendant committed offenses before effective date of statute; retroactive application of the statute would make punishment for defendant's crime more onerous after its commission. People v. Stead, 845 P.2d 1156 (Colo. 1993); People v. Ellington, 854 P.2d 223 (Colo. 1993); People v. Brown, 854 P.2d 228 (Colo. 1993); People v. Stead, 854 P.2d 229 (Colo. 1993).

No ex post facto violation where the amount of restitution did not change. Application of new restitution statute changing to whom the payments would be applied did not violate ex post facto clause. The amount of restitution did not change; the court was authorized to order full restitution under either version of the statute. People v. Woodward, 11 P.3d 1090 (Colo. 2000).

For purpose of ex post facto analysis, the court looks to the law annexed to an offense on the date when the defendant is charged with committing the offense at issue. People v. Henry, 845 P.2d 1160 (Colo. 1993).

Extension of statute of limitations. The legislature may extend the statute of limitations for prosecutions not already time-barred as of the effective date of the extension without violating this section, but there should be a clear legislative statement that that was the intent. People v. Holland, 708 P.2d 119 (Colo. 1985).

Thus, legislation that extends the statute of limitations for a particular crime cannot be retroactively applied to revive a previously barred prosecution. People v. Shedd, 702 P.2d 267 (Colo. 1985).

Unless harsh or oppressive, a statute which changes the rules of evidence after the occurrence of an offense so that previously inadmissible evidence is admissible is not an ex post facto law. People v. Koon, 724 P.2d 1367 (Colo. App. 1986).

Judicial ex post facto is based not on this section, which applies only to legislative acts, but on due process principles. Aue v. Diesslin, 798 P.2d 436 (Colo. 1990); Campbell v. Solano, 807 P.2d 583 (Colo. 1991).

And retroactive application of a parole board's reinterpretation of a statute, where the reinterpretation of the ambiguous statutory language was foreseeable, did not result in a violation of the ex post facto clause or the due process requirements. Lustgarden v. Gunter, 779 F. Supp. 500 (D. Colo. 1991).

Although the prohibitions against ex post facto laws are limitations on the power of the legislature and generally are not construed as being applicable to judicial decisions, such decisions may nevertheless have the effect of ex post facto legislation and, thus, may be found to violate a defendant's rights to due process. People v. Grenemyer, 827 P.2d 603 (Colo. App. 1992).

Colorado will follow the United States supreme court case of Calder v. Bull to determine if there has been a violation of the ex post facto clause. Accordingly, a violation will be found to exist whenever a statute punishes conduct as a crime which conduct was innocent when committed, makes more onerous the punishment for a crime after its commission, or deprives a defendant of a defense that was available at the time the crime was committed. People v. District Court, 834 P.2d 181 (Colo. 1992).

Legislative changes made to language that had been held to be unconstitutional were ameliorative. In fact, the defendant benefitted from the change because it added the possibility that he could receive parole. The court held that the application of this type of change was incapable of violating the ex post facto clause. People v. District Court, 834 P.2d 181 (Colo. 1992).

The fact that the legislature, in reenacting a provision of law, diverts from a more detailed definition does not mean there has been a detrimental change. Not all changes provide grounds for finding that the new language violates the ex post facto clause. People v. District Court, 834 P.2d 181 (Colo. 1992).

Statutory provisions requiring a single trial on sanity and guilt and setting forth procedures after acceptance of a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, adopted in 1996 to "clarify" statutory provisions enacted in 1995, do not violate constitutional proscription against ex post facto laws. People v. Bielecki, 964 P.2d 598 (Colo. App. 1998).

Applied in Titus v. Titus, 96 Colo. 191, 41 P.2d 244 (1935); White v. District Court, 180 Colo. 152, 503 P.2d 342 (1972); Union P. R. R. v. Heckers, 181 Colo. 374, 509 P.2d 1255 (1973); Carlson v. McCoy, 193 Colo. 391, 566 P.2d 1073 (1977); Perl-Mack Enters. Co. v. City & County of Denver, 194 Colo. 4, 568 P.2d 468 (1977); Estate of Barnhart v. Burkhardt, 38 Colo. App. 544, 563 P.2d 972 (1977); Hammer v. Real Estate Comm'n, 40 Colo. App. 260, 576 P.2d 191 (1977).

III. IMPAIRMENT OF OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

Law reviews. For article, "One Year Review of Contracts", see 37 Dicta 1 (1960).

This section protects vested contract rights from impairment. Police Pension & Relief Bd. v. McPhail, 139 Colo. 330, 338 P.2d 694 (1959).

And protects equally from violation the contracts of states with those entered into between private individuals. Hessick v. Moynihan, 83 Colo. 43, 262 P. 907 (1927).

Only vested contractual rights are protected from statutory impairment. Spradling v. Colo. Dept. of Rev., 870 P.2d 521 (Colo. App.

1993).

This section protects a "contract" as the word is used in its ordinary meaning. Klipping v. McCauley, 143 Colo. 444, 354 P.2d 167 (1960).

Nothing in the language of former § 13-30-103 (1)(k)(I) indicates or implies that the county court judge salary calculation formula was contractual in nature. Because the plaintiff had no vested contractual right to be paid according to the formula set forth in former § 13-30-103, he did not have a right or interest protected by this section of the constitution. Alderton v. State of Colo., 17 P.3d 817 (Colo. App. 2000).

Section does not render unconstitutional employment security statute as an impairment to obligation of contracts between operator and drivers of concrete delivery trucks. Weitzel Redi-mix, Inc. v. Indus. Comm'n, 728 P.2d 364 (Colo. App. 1986).

Contract must be valid in its inception. In order to come within the scope of this section, a contract must be valid in its inception. Klipping v. McCauley, 143 Colo. 444, 354 P.2d 167 (1960).

And lawfully entered into. This section extends only to contracts lawfully entered into. Klipping v. McCauley, 143 Colo. 444, 354 P.2d 167 (1960).

Section does not apply to acts validating contracts theretofore made on behalf of state. Miller v. Limon Nat'l Bank, 88 Colo. 373, 296 P. 796 (1931); Farnik v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 139 Colo. 481, 341 P.2d 467 (1959).

State may make laws for the enforcement of existing contracts, curing defects in remedies, confirming rights already existing or adding to the means of securing and enforcing them. Titus v. Titus, 96 Colo. 191, 41 P.2d 244 (1935).

Legislative changes can apply only to conditions in future. The permissible changes, amendments and alterations provided for by the general assembly can apply only to conditions in the future, and never to the past; according to the cardinal principle of justice and fair dealings between government and man, as well as between man and man, the parties shall know prior to entering into a business relationship the conditions which shall govern that relationship. Police Pension & Relief Bd. v. McPhail, 139 Colo. 330, 338 P.2d 694 (1959).

A pension has the attributes of a contract. Police Pension & Relief Bd. v. McPhail, 139 Colo. 330, 338 P.2d 694 (1959).

And is therefore entitled to constitutional protection where it is a contributory pension system. Police Pension & Relief Bd. v. McPhail, 139 Colo. 330, 338 P.2d 694 (1959).

Rights which accrue under a pension plan are contractual obligations which are protected under this section and art. I, § 10, of the United States Constitution. Pension plans promote important public policy considerations because they are structured to reward efficiency, to encourage officers to remain in the service, and to give assurance of a decent living upon retirement. Colo. Springs Fire Fighters v. Colo. Springs, 784 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1989).

The public employee's retirement association (PERA) and the Policemen's and Firemen's Pension Reform Act statutory provisions have established a defined benefit contributory pension system in which most public employees are required to participate. By making these contributions, employees obtain a limited vesting of pension rights, which ripen into vested pension rights upon attainment of the respective eligibility requirements. Colo. Springs Fire Fighters v. Colo. Springs, 784 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1989).

On the issue of whether PERA retirees have a contractual right to a specific cost of living increase, the cases of Police Pension & Relief Bd. v. McPhail, 139 Colo. 330, 338 P.2d 694 (1959), and Police Pension & Relief Bd. v. Bills, 148 Colo. 383, 366 P.2d 581 (1961), remain good law. Justus v. People, 2012 COA 169, __ P.3d __.

PERA retirees have a contractual right to the cost of living adjustment (COLA) in effect when their rights vested. Justus v. People, 2012 COA 169, __ P.3d __.

On the issue of whether any adverse change to the COLA for PERA retirees violates this section, contract clause jurisprudence developed after the McPhail and Bills cases in In re Estate of DeWitt, 54 P.3d 849 (Colo. 2002), must be followed. Therefore, in this respect, McPhail and Bills are no longer good law. Justus v. People, 2012 COA 169, __ P.3d __.

Changes to the PERA retirees' COLA under Senate Bill 10-001 do not violate a retiree's rights under this section if the contract right has not been impaired, if any impairment is not substantial, or if the change in the COLA was reasonable and necessary to serve a significant and legitimate public purpose. Justus v. People, 2012 COA 169, __ P.3d __.

Health plan benefits provided for by city were not pension benefits which were subject to vesting where a consistent pattern emerged upon consideration of the Colorado statutory scheme addressing pension benefits, the attributes of the Colorado Springs ordinance, and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) provisions. Colo. Springs Fire Fighters v. Colo. Springs, 784 P.2d 766 (1989).

Circumstances surrounding the adoption of a city ordinance and the restrictions imposed by the city charter, established that the council did not intend to create a pension type benefit or a contract when it adopted measure. Instead, the council acted within the bounds of its authority and enacted an employee benefit provision, which was to remain in effect until the council, in the exercise of its discretionary legislative powers, elected to modify it. Colo. Springs Fire Fighters v. Colo. Springs, 784 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1989).

Firemen's pension act does not impair the obligation of contracts of employment in violation of this section. Huff v. Mayor of Colo. Springs, 182 Colo. 108, 512 P.2d 632 (1973).

Frustration of pre-annexation agreement was not impairment of a contract and provisions of §§ 31-12-118.5 and 31-12-118 (2)(b) that provide for abeyance of pending annexation proceedings upon the filing of a petition for incorporation when specified criteria are met does not violate this section. Greenwood Vill. v. Petitioners for Proposed City of Centennial, 3 P.3d 427 (Colo. 2000).

A marriage is not a "contract" within meaning of contract clause. In re Franks, 189 Colo. 499, 542 P.2d 845 (1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1043, 96 S. Ct. 766, 46 L. Ed. 2d 632 (1976).

Where contract and lease do not provide an explicit exemption from the Denver facilities development admissions tax, the claim that the ordinance imposing such tax impairs the obligation of contracts is invalid. Denver Center for Performing Arts v. Briggs, 696 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1985).

The application of the amended Colorado exemption limits set forth in § 13-54-102 to a loan and security agreement that was entered into prior to the enactment of the amended exemption statute does not violate the respective "contracts" clauses of the United States and Colorado Constitutions. In re Larsen, 260 B.R. 174 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2001).

Applied in Am. Smelting & Ref. Co. v. People ex rel. Lindsley, 204 U.S. 103, 27 S. Ct. 198, 51 L. Ed. 393 (1907); Colo. Farm & Live Stock Co. v. Beerbohm, 43 Colo. 464, 96 P. 443 (1908); Colo. & S. Ry. v. State R. R. Comm'n, 54 Colo. 64, 129 P. 506 (1912); City & County of Denver v. Stenger, 277 F. 865 (8th Cir. 1922); Driverless Car Co. v. Armstrong, 91 Colo. 334, 14 P.2d 1098 (1932); In re Special Assessments for Paving Dist. No. 3, 105 Colo. 158, 95 P.2d 806 (1939); People ex rel. Rogers v. Waterman's Estate, 108 Colo. 263, 116 P.2d 204 (1941); Bd. of Trustees of Firemen's Fund v. People ex rel. Behrman, 119 Colo. 301, 203 P.2d 490 (1949); Colo. Dept. of Pub. Health & Env't v. Bethell, 60 P.3d 779 (Colo. App. 2002).

IV. LAWS RETROSPECTIVE IN OPERATION.

This section prohibits the enactment of any law retrospective in its operation. Spangler v. Green, 21 Colo. 505, 42 P. 674 (1895); Colo. Fuel & Iron Corp. v. Indus. Comm'n, 148 Colo. 557, 367 P.2d 597 (1961); Taylor v. Pub. Employees' Retirement Ass'n, 189 Colo. 486, 542 P.2d 383 (1975); Stewart v. Pub. Employees' Retirement Ass'n, 43 Colo. App. 25, 612 P.2d 1141 (1979).

Prohibition applies to city council as well as to general assembly. The state constitution provides that no law retrospective in its operation shall be passed by the general assembly. What the general assembly cannot do at the state level in this connection, a city council cannot do in municipal affairs. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

The prohibition against retrospective laws applies to local governments. City of Golden v. Parker, 138 P.3d 285 (Colo. 2006).

Prohibition applies to Denver career service authority board career service rules because the promulgation of such rules is a legislative function delegated by the general assembly to the board. Abromeit v. Denver Career Serv. Bd., 140 P.3d 44 (Colo. App. 2005).

Section is for protection of rights of citizen, not state. Even though a law creates a pensionable status based on services wholly rendered prior to its enactment and in such sense might be considered retrospective in operation it would not offend against this section, for this section, apart of the bill of rights, is for the protection of the rights of the citizen and is not applicable to the state. Bedford v. White, 106 Colo. 439, 106 P.2d 469 (1940).

Prohibition of retrospective legislation parallels provision forbidding ex post facto laws. The purposes of the provisions are similar, viz., to prevent the unfairness entailed in altering the legal consequences of events or transactions after the fact. Peoples Natural Gas Div. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 197 Colo. 152, 590 P.2d 960 (1979).

The word "retrospective" as used in this section has reference to civil cases, and as to such cases it is synonymous with the term "ex post facto", as applied to the criminal law. French v. Deane, 19 Colo. 504, 36 P. 609, 24 L.R.A. 387 (1894).

The term "retrospective", used in this section, was intented to apply to laws which could not properly be said to be included in the description of ex post facto, or laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Denver S. P. & P. R. R. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162 (1878).

The term "retrospective", like the term "ex post facto", is a technical term, and that while the latter applies only to criminal cases, and to those only in a particular way, so the former technically applies only to civil cases, and to those only in a particular way; that if a statute in form affects the remedy only, yet substantially takes away accrued rights, it is unconstitutional and void. Denver S. P. & P. R. R. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162 (1878).

Law is applied retrospectively only when it takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws or creates a new obligation. Stewart v. Pub. Employees' Retirement Ass'n, 43 Colo. App. 25, 612 P.2d 1141 (1979); Bush v. Roche Constructors, Inc., 817 P.2d (Colo. App. 1991); Robinson v. Lynmar Racquet Club, Inc., 851 P.2d 274 (Colo. App. 1993); Am. Comp. Ins. Co. v. McBride, 107 P.3d 973 (Colo. App. 2004).

It includes a statute which takes away or impairs any vested right acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, or imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect to transactions or considerations already past. Denver S. P. & P. R. R. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162 (1878); French v. Deane, 19 Colo. 504, 36 P. 609, 24 L.R.A. 387 (1894); Day v. Madden, 9 Colo. App. 464, 48 P. 1053 (1897); Evans v. City of Denver, 26 Colo. 193, 57 P. 696 (1899); Perry v. City of Denver, 27 Colo. 93, 59 P. 747 (1899); Moore v. Chalmers-Galloway Live Stock Co., 90 Colo. 548, 10 P.2d 950 (1932); California Co. v. State, 141 Colo. 288, 348 P.2d 382 (1959), appeal dismissed, 364 U.S. 285, 81 S. Ct. 42, 5 L. Ed. 2d 37, reh'g denied, 364 U.S. 897, 81 S. Ct. 219, 5 L. Ed. 2d 191 (1960); Spiker v. City of Lakewood, 198 Colo. 528, 603 P.2d 130 (1979); Jefferson County Dept. of Soc. Servs. v. D.A.G., 199 Colo. 315, 607 P.2d 1004 (1980); P-W Invs., Inc. v. City of Westminster, 655 P.2d 1365 (Colo. 1982); Martin v. Bd. of Assessment Appeals, 707 P.2d 348 (Colo. 1985); Ficarra v. Dept. of Reg. Agencies, 849 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1993).

Such as a law that changes ground of action or the nature of defense. The retrospectivity clause was intended to prohibit the making of any law prescribing new rules for the decision of existing causes so as to change the ground of the action or the nature of the defense. Denver S. P. & P. R. R. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162 (1878).

A vested right must be something more than a mere expectation based upon an anticipated continuance of existing law, and it must have become a title, legal or equitable, to the present or future enjoyment of property or a demand, or a legal exemption from a demand made by another. Ficarra v. Dept. of Reg. Agencies, 849 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1993); Nye v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 883 P.2d 607 (Colo. App. 1994); Am. Comp. Ins. Co. v. McBride, 107 P.3d 973 (Colo. App. 2004).

A vested right is one that is not dependent on the common law or statute but instead has an independent existence. Am. Comp. Ins. Co. v. McBride, 107 P.3d 973 (Colo. App. 2004).

Thus, procedure under old law governs if rights have accrued thereunder. Plaintiff was injured by falling on defendant's sidewalk, about 30 days prior to the new law going into effect, and, after said law had become effective, gave notice to the city of her alleged injuries in accordance with the requirements of the new act. It was held that such injury having been received prior to such law taking effect, plaintiff should have complied with the notice required by the the former law, and, upon her failure so to do, the city was not liable. City of Colo. Springs v. Neville, 42 Colo. 219, 93 P. 1096 (1908).

Expectations of parties to litigation are not vested rights and provisions of §§ 31-12-118.5 and 31-12-118 (2)(b) that provide for abeyance of pending annexation proceedings upon the filing of a petition for incorporation when specified criteria are met does not impair vested contractual rights or violate this section. Greenwood Vill. v. Petitioners for Proposed City of Centennial, 3 P.3d 427 (Colo. 2000).

In determining whether a retroactive statute impairs or destroys vested rights, the most important questions are whether: (1) The public interest is advanced or retarded; (2) the retroactive provision gives effect to or defeats the bona fide intentions or reasonable expectations of affected persons; or (3) the statute surprises persons who have long relied on a contrary state of law. Ficarra v. Dept. of Reg. Agencies, 849 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1993); In re Larsen, 260 B.R. 174 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2001).

However, there is no fixed formula that measures the content of all the circumstances under which a person is said to possess a vested right, rather, it is a term that sums up a judicial determination that the facts of the case render it inequitable that a state impede the person from taking certain action. Ficarra v. Dept. of Reg. Agencies, 849 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1993).

A retrospective test consists of two inquiries. First, the statute must either (1) impair a vested right or (2) create a new obligation, duty, or disability. If a statute impairs a vested right, the impairment must be balanced against the public interest in the statute. In re Estate of DeWitt, 54 P.3d 849 (Colo. 2002); City of Golden v. Parker, 138 P.3d 285 (Colo. 2006).

All statutes shall be construed prospectively unless a contrary intention is clearly manifest. California Co. v. State, 141 Colo. 288, 348 P.2d 382 (1959), appeal dismissed, 364 U.S. 285, 81 S. Ct. 42, 5 L. Ed. 2d 37, reh'g denied, 364 U.S. 897, 81 S. Ct. 219, 5 L. Ed. 2d 191 (1960).

A statute will not be given retrospective operation, unless this clearly appears to have been the legislative purpose. British Am. Assurance Co. v. Colo. & S. Ry., 52 Colo. 589, 125 P. 508 (1912).

Standard applied in In re Estate of DeWitt, 54 P.3d 849 (Colo. 2002).

The rule is that if it be doubtful whether or not the law is intended to apply to past transactions, the doubt should be resolved against their inclusion. Bonfils v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 67 Colo. 563, 189 P. 775 (1920).

Past transactions are to be governed by the statutes in force when the causes of action arose; and if the new governing statute does not fix a time in which the actions are to become subject to the law, they are not to be affected by it by reason of its general terms. Bonfils v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 67 Colo. 563, 189 P. 775 (1920).

But retroactive application is permissible where change is procedural. Retroactive application is permissible where the change is procedural or remedial in nature. In re Colo. Mercantile Co., 299 F. Supp. 55 (D. Colo. 1969).

When a law merely affects the remedy or law of procedure, all rights of action will be enforceable under the new procedure without regard to whether they accrued before or after such change of law and without regard to whether the suit has been instituted or not. Smith v. Putnam, 250 F. Supp. 1017 (D. Colo. 1965).

One exception to the constitutional and statutory prohibitions against retroactive legislation, the "substantive-procedural dichotomy", requires a primary characterization of the statute in question as one either "substantive", i.e. creating, destroying, altering vested rights or liabilities, or "procedural", i.e. relating only to remedies or modes of procedure to enforce such rights or liabilities. "Substantive statutes" are resticted to prospective operation only, whereas "procedural" or "remedial" statutes are permitted retrospective application. Smith v. Putnam, 250 F. Supp. 1017 (D. Colo. 1965).

Application of a statute to a subsisting claim for relief does not violate the prohibition of retroactive legislation where the statute effects a change that is only procedural or remedial in nature. Continental Title Co. v. District Court, 645 P.2d 1310 (Colo. 1982); Bingo Games Supply Co., Inc. v. Meyer, 895 P.2d 1125 (Colo. App. 1995).

Application of a statute is not rendered retroactive and unlawful merely because the facts upon which it operates occurred before adoption of the statute. Continental Title Co. v. District Court, 645 P.2d 1310 (Colo. 1982).

Application of the 1979 amendments to § 13-21-101 does not violate this section. Therefore, plaintiff entitled to interest on damages from date of accident even though it occurred prior to effective date of the amendments. Meller v. Heil Co., 745 F.2d 1297 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1206, 104 S. Ct. 1297, 81 L. Ed. 2d 347 (1984).

The legislature may legitimately provide that the revocation of a license to drive be triggered by the last in a series of offenses without offending the proscription against retrospective legislation. Zaragoza v. Dept. of Rev., 702 P.2d 274 (Colo. 1985).

Changes in procedural law operate retrospectively unless contrary legislative intent is expressed and statutes governing forum for judicial review are procedural. Davis v. Bd. of Psychologist Exam'rs, 791 P.2d 1198 (Colo. App. 1989).

There are no vested rights to invoke certain procedures under statutes governing initiative process and the court may apply subsequently adopted procedures. Committee For Better Health Care v. Meyer, 830 P.2d 884 (Colo. 1992).

Retroactive application of amended career service rules that eliminated the right of employees to appeal pay grade classifications is not unconstitutionally retrospective. The right to such an appeal is procedural and remedial only and is not a vested right. Abromeit v. Denver Career Serv. Bd., 140 P.3d 44 (Colo. App. 2005).

However, where there are substantive amendments relating to claims for workers' compensation benefits, such amendments do not have any retrospective effect. Neodata Serv. v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 805 P.2d 1180 (Colo. App. 1991).

Changes to personnel handbook dealing with priority of layoffs and relocation within the institution constituted substantive changes and were therefore unconstitutionally retrospective. Although an employer reserves the right to modify its employment handbook, there are limits if the modifications constitute changes that affect employees retrospectively and substantively. Saxe v. Bd. of Trs. of Metro. State Coll., 179 P.3d 67 (Colo. App. 2007).

Changes to personnel handbook dealing with standards, access to information, and written explanation of termination decisions, however, constituted mere procedural changes and were therefore constitutional even though retrospective. Saxe v. Bd. of Trs. of Metro. State Coll., 179 P.3d 67 (Colo. App. 2007).

The general assembly's legislative powers include enacting generic legislation that clarifies and resolves preexisting issues and applies that resolution to pending cases and controversies. In re Balanson, 107 P.3d 1037 (Colo. App. 2004).

There is no vested right in remedies. The abolition of an old remedy, or the substitution of a new one, neither constitutes the impairment of a vested right nor the imposition of a new duty, for there is no such thing as a vested right in remedies. Moore v. Chalmers-Galloway Live Stock Co., 90 Colo. 548, 10 P.2d 950 (1932); Jefferson County Dept. of Soc. Servs. v. D.A.G., 199 Colo. 315, 607 P.2d 1004 (1980); Continental Title Co. v. District Court, 645 P.2d 1310 (Colo. 1982); Robinson v. Lynmar Racquet Club, Inc., 851 P.2d 274 (Colo. App. 1993).

Thus, changes in the mode of trial which do not deprive an accused of a defense and which operate only in a limited and unsubstantial manner to his disadvantage are not prohibited by the constitution although adopted after the offense is committed. Kolkman v. People, 89 Colo. 8, 300 P. 575 (1931).

Since there is no vested rights in remedies, § 37-45-153 validating water conservancy districts does not violate this section. Taxpayers for Animas-La Plata v. Animas-La Plata, 739 F.2d 1472 (10th Cir. 1984).

Rights to the benefit of particular procedures or remedial measures do not constitute vested rights. Committee for Better Health Care v. Meyer, 830 P.2d 884 (Colo. 1992).

The statute of limitations may be changed by an extension of the time, or by an entire repeal, and affect existing causes of action, which by the existing law would soon be barred. In such cases the right of action is perfect, and no right of defense has accrued from the time already elapsed. But if a right has become vested and perfect, a law, which afterward annuls or takes it away, is retrospective. Denver S. P. & P. R. R. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162 (1878); Jefferson County Dept. of Soc. Servs. v. D.A.G., 199 Colo. 315, 607 P.2d 1004 (1980).

When statutory amendment not retroactive. An amendment to a statute is not retroactively applied if the amendment covers the same subject matter as the original statute and if the person or persons claiming under the amendment had a continuing status under both the original statute and the amendment. Taylor v. Pub. Employees' Retirement Ass'n, 189 Colo. 486, 542 P.2d 383 (1975).

An amended statute, applied to a factual situation which occurred prior to the enactment of the amendment, is not retroactively applied where the act which triggered application of the amended statute occurred after the effective date of the amendment. Nix v. Tice, 44 Colo. App. 42, 607 P.2d 399 (1980).

In public utilities commission action. The fact that there was some lag between a request for a rate increase by a utility and the public utilities commission's decision does not render the commission's action retrospective within the meaning of this section. Peoples Natural Gas Div. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 197 Colo. 152, 590 P.2d 960 (1979).

Retroactive application of enhanced civil remedies in remedial legislation is permissible. Treble-damages provision of Colorado Consumer Protection Act could be applied where health club had violated substantive provisions of act prior to amendment of remedies section, since amendment did not impose new duties on health clubs in relation to their customers. Robinson v. Lynmar Racquet Club, Inc., 851 P.2d 274 (Colo. App. 1993).

No vested right to continue act prohibited under new law where provision of new law is no more restrictive than prohibition contained in regulations promulgated under the former law. Nat'l Advertising Co. v. Dept. of Hwys., 718 P.2d 1038 (Colo. 1986).

A landowner cannot become vested with a right to have property remain outside a local political subdivision of the state. The state's power over the boundaries of subdivisions is plenary. Jefferson Ctr. Metro. Dist. No. 1 v. N. Jeffco Metro. Recreation & Park Dist., 844 P.2d 1321 (Colo. App. 1992).

Inchoate water rights are not vested rights, and thus may be validly affected by legislation. Chatfield E. Well Co. v. Chatfield E. Prop. Owners Ass'n, 956 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1998).

Where the operative occurrence happened seven years after the adoption of the statute, there was no retrospective legislation. The rezoning of agricultural land was the operative occurrence. Jefferson Ctr. Metro. Dist. No. 1 v. N. Jeffco Metro. Recreation & Park Dist., 844 P.2d 1321 (Colo. App. 1992).

There is no vested right in public employees to engage in "moonlighting" activities. Himelgrin v. City and County of Denver, 717 P.2d 1006 (Colo. App. 1986).

City permit as foundation for vested right. A city permit can provide the foundation for a vested right, and thus be constitutionally protected from impairment by subsequent legislation, if the permit holder takes steps in reliance upon the permit. P-W Invs., Inc. v. City of Westminster, 655 P.2d 1365 (Colo. 1982).

Retired judge entitled to increased benefits. Judge who retired prior to effective date of 1977 amendment to § 24-51-607 (2)(a) (increasing pension benefit for judges with more than five and less than ten years service) is entitled to increased benefits from the effective date of the amendment, and the increase is not a retroactive application of the amendment. Stewart v. Pub. Employees' Retirement Ass'n, 43 Colo. App. 25, 612 P.2d 1141 (1979).

Ratemaking by the public utilities commission is subject to the prohibition against retrospective legislation. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 180 Colo. 74, 502 P.2d 945 (1972); Office of Consumer Counsel v. Pub. Serv. Co., 877 P.2d 867 (Colo. 1994).

The public utilities commission's award of attorney fees is quasi-judicial not quasi-legislative; therefore, the award is not subject to the prohibition against retrospective legislation. Lake Durango Water Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 67 P.3d 12 (Colo. 2003).

State interest in preserving finality of criminal convictions subject to constitutional limitations. Even though the Colorado criminal code grants a convicted offender the right to seek collateral review of a constitutionally flawed conviction (§ 18-1-410), the effect of § 16-5-402 (1) is to immediately cut off this right for all persons whose convictions antedate the statute by an interval of time in excess of the statutory limitation period. Such retrospective elimination of an existing statutory right, which the general assembly itself has recognized as a matter of "substantive right" included "within the concept of due process of law", cannot be squared with the constitutional prohibition against retrospectively depriving a person of a statutory right without due process of law. People v. Germany, 674 P.2d 345 (Colo. 1983).

Public records law providing for sealing of criminal records did not create a vested right to such sealing. Thus, repeal of a portion of the public records law took away respondent's unexercised opportunity to seek relief under the statute and denying respondent's request for such sealing made after repeal of the statute did not violate this section. People v. D.K.B., 843 P.2d 1326 (Colo. 1993).

Property assessment by methods used in prior years not a vested right. Property owners have no vested right to have their taxable property assessed by particular methods employed in prior years. Martin v. Bd. of Assessment Appeals, 707 P.2d 348 (Colo. 1985).

Safety code. Application of a safety code to buildings that were constructed in a different period under different code requirements does not constitute unconstitutional retrospective legislation. Van Sickle v. Boyes, 797 P.2d 1267 (Colo. 1990).

Tenure is a constitutionally protected interest. The Teacher Tenure Act creates a contract between the board and its teachers, and tenure rises to the level of a constitutionally protected interest. As such, it is a vested and substantive right which cannot be impaired by the retrospective application of a statute. Lockhart v. Arapahoe County Sch. Dist. No. 6, 735 P.2d 913 (Colo. App. 1986).

Workers' compensation benefits are not a constitutionally protected interest. Statutory benefits created or allowed under the workers' compensation scheme exist only to the extent allowed and intended by applicable statutes, and legislation prospectively limiting or rescinding benefits does not deprive persons of constitutionally protected property interests. Nye v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 883 P.2d 607 (Colo. App. 1994).

Statutory offset against workers' compensation benefits in the amount of claimant's city retirement pension, which was vested, did not affect his entitlement to receive the pension and therefore did not violate this section. Nye v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 883 P.2d 607 (Colo. App. 1994).

The gas cost adjustment tariff did not constitute retroactive ratemaking. Colo. Energy Advocacy v. Pub. Serv. Co., 704 P.2d 298 (Colo. 1985).

Renewal of bail bondsman license was not a constitutionally protected property interest where the applicants failed to show a legitimate claim of entitlement in the renewal of their licenses based, for example, on informal rules and mutually explicit understandings, or on state law, but instead placed substantial reliance only upon a unilateral expectation. Ficarra v. Dept. of Reg. Agencies, 849 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1993).

Amendments to provisions governing conditional water rights in nontributary ground water held not to be retrospective when applied to existing conditional water rights. Language of § 37-92-305 (11) authorizes water courts to limit the exercise of conditional water right decrees in nontributary ground water entered before July 1, 1985, by making the doctrine of prior appropriation inapplicable to such conditional water rights, as well as those entered thereafter, removing the reasonable diligence requirement associated with prior appropriation for such water rights, and allowing the water courts to retain jurisdiction over such rights to adjust withdrawal determinations based on local acquifer characteristics. The application of this subsection to conditional water rights entered prior to July 1, 1985, operates as a reasonable limitation on the exercise of a conditional water right and does not operate retrospectively in violation of this section of the constitution. Qualls, Inc. v. Berryman, 789 P.2d 1095 (Colo. 1990).

Application of the 1989 initiative statute amendments to a proposed initiative which was filed prior to enactment of such amendments was not retroactive where the statutes as amended were not applied to initiative procedures which occurred prior to enactment of the amendments and application of the amendments to initiative procedures which occurred after enactment did not result in the creation of new obligations, the imposition of new duties, or the attachment of new disabilities with respect to those procedures which occurred prior to enactment. Committee for Better Health Care v. Meyer, 830 P.2d 884 (Colo. 1992).

Applying §§ 16-11-801 and 16-11-802 retroactively violates proscription against ex post facto laws where, as a result of the decision in People v. Young, there was no valid death penalty sentencing statute in effect at the time the offenses were committed. People v. Aguayo, 840 P.2d 336 (Colo. 1992).

The plain language of § 25-14-204 (2) states that a plaintiff who legally expands his cigar-tobacco bar prior to July 1, 2006, would become subject to penalties as of July 1, 2006, for his pre-enactment expansion. This is impermissible ex post facto legislation. Coal. for Equal Rights v. Owens, 458 F. Supp. 2d 1251 (D. Colo. 2006), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. Coal. for Equal Rights, Inc. v. Ritter, 517 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2008).

Retroactive application of amendment to § 18-1-105 (10) enacted in 1991 to defendant who committed offense in 1990 violated the provisions of this section. People v. Munoz, 857 P.2d 546 (Colo. App. 1993).

But retrospective application of mandatory parole provisions in § 18-1-105 (1)(a)(V) enacted in 1993 not violative of ex post facto clause where defendant had pleaded guilty to underlying offense with stipulation that the offense occurred within a time frame that happened to include time periods both prior and subsequent to the date such provisions were enacted. People v. Flagg, 18 P.3d 792 (Colo. App. 2000).

Application of statute governing medical utilization review proceeding, § 8-43-501, does not constitute a retroactive application of law contrary to this section of the Colorado Constitution, since claimant's right to treatment was always subject to statutory qualifications. Donn v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 865 P.2d 873 (Colo. App. 1993).

Act establishing new procedures for ensuring that water rights are protected and creating different classes of water rights for certain owners and operators of sand and gravel pits does not alter the vested rights of appellants and, therefore, does not constitute retrospective legislation. Central Colo. Water v. Simpson, 877 P.2d 335 (Colo. 1994).

Purpose of ex post facto laws is to ensure that legislative enactments provide fair warning of the effect of such enactments. People v. Bowring, 902 P.2d 911 (Colo. App. 1995).

To be stricken as an ex post facto law, the legislative enactment must (1) be retrospective in effect; and (2) disadvantage the offender. People v. Bowring, 902 P.2d 911 (Colo. App. 1995).

Section 18-3-405 (2)(c) did not violate the prohibition against ex post facto laws since the defendant had the requisite fair warning of the consequences of committing the offense with which he was charged. People v. Bowring, 902 P.2d 911 (Colo. App. 1995).

Prohibition against retrospective legislation with regard to a statutorily vested right not violated by charter amendment requiring voter approval of location and siting of preparole facility for which developer had already received board approval. The charter amendment did not retrospectively impair a vested right because enactment of a law such as the charter amendment was both anticipated and sanctioned in the statute. Villa at Greeley, Inc. v. Hopper, 917 P.2d 350 (Colo. App. 1996).

Real estate developers who enter into economic incentive development agreements have vested contractual rights that cannot be annulled by a later enacted amendment to the city charter requiring voter approval of all new grants of development subsidies or incentives above a certain value. City of Golden v. Parker, 138 P.3d 285 (Colo. 2006).

The policy allowing the state board of agriculture to consider past annual reviews to review faculty performance is not retrospective because the policy does not take away or impair vested rights, create a new obligation, impose a new duty, or attach a new disability. Johnson v. Colo. State Bd. of Ag., 15 P.3d 309 (Colo. App. 2000).

Where attorneys' right to fee award out of common fund established in class action vested before the enactment of § 13-17-203, this section prohibits the retrospective application of § 13-17-203 to defeat class counsel's right to the court-ordered fee. Kuhn v. State, 924 P.2d 1053 (Colo. 1996).

Father's right not to be subjected to an ex post facto law or a retrospective statute was not violated by court order for past due child support retroactive to date of child's birth since the inherent right to child support belongs to the child, both parents have a legal duty to support the child, and this duty existed before the adoption of the specific statutes applied to this case. People ex rel. J.A.E.S., 7 P.3d 1021 (Colo. App. 2000).

There is no violation of prohibition against ex post facto laws where inmate was required to pay interest and attorney fees pursuant to § 16-18.5-103 (4). The restitution act simply facilitates collection from defendant of the sums he was ordered to pay at the time of his sentencing. People v. Lowe, 60 P.3d 753 (Colo. App. 2002).

The application of the amended Colorado exemption limits set forth in § 13-54-102 to a loan and security agreement that was entered into prior to the enactment of the amended exemption statute does not constitute a "retrospective" application of state law in violation of this section and § 2-4-202. In re Larsen, 260 B.R. 174 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2001).

Applied in Virginia Canon Toll-Road Co. v. People ex rel. Vivian, 22 Colo. 429, 45 P. 398 (1896); United Mines Co. v. Hatcher, 79 F. 517 (8th Cir. 1897); Campbell v. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co., 163 Colo. 400, 431 P.2d 40 (1967); Shell Western E&P v. Dolores County Bd. of Comm'rs, 948 P.2d 1002 (Colo. 1997); Colo. Dept. of Pub. Health & Env't v. Bethell, 60 P.3d 779 (Colo. App. 2002).

V. IRREVOCABLE PRIVILEGES AND FRANCHISES.

Under this section no perpetual franchise of special privilege can be granted. City of Leadville v. Leadville Sewer Co., 47 Colo. 118, 107 P. 801 (1909).

Limitation as to franchises applies to municipalities. Under this section the general assembly is inhibited from making any irrevocable grant of special privileges, franchises or immunities and this limitation also applies to municipalities. Thomas v. City of Grand Junction, 13 Colo. App. 80, 56 P. 665 (1899); Pub. Serv. Co. v. City of Loveland, 79 Colo. 216, 245 P. 493 (1926).

Three-year statute of limitations in § 33-44-111 of the Ski Safety Act based on reasonable grounds and therefore does not violate this section's prohibition against special privileges or immunities. Schafer v. Aspen Skiing Corp., 742 F.2d 580 (10th Cir. 1984).

Statute, on its face, does not violate this section if it contains no "irrevocable grant of special privileges, franchises, or immunities" within its four corners. In re House Bill 91S-1005, 814 P.2d 875 (Colo. 1991).

One-year statute of limitations in §§ 12-46-112.5 and 12-47-128.5 for filing claims against liquor licensees arising from the improper sale, service, or provision of fermented malt and alcoholic beverages to minors or intoxicated persons does not constitute a perpetual or exclusive privilege or franchise and thus neither statute violates the prohibition against special privileges or immunities. Estate of Stevenson v. Hollywood Bar, 832 P.2d 718 (Colo. 1992).

No violation of the prohibition against retrospective laws existed in court's application of two-year statute of repose, rather than prior six-year statute, to homeowners' association's petition for abatement and refund. Woodmoor Imp. v. Prop. Tax Adm'r, 895 P.2d 1087 (Colo. App. 1994).

Applied in Westinghouse Elec. & Mfg. Co. v. Denver Tramway Co., 3 F.2d 285 (D. Colo. 1924); City & County of Denver v. Denver Tramway Corp., 23 F.2d 287 (8th Cir. 1927); Peterson v. McNichols, 128 Colo. 137, 260 P.2d 938 (1953); Enger v. Walker Field, Colo. Pub. Airport Auth., 181 Colo. 253, 508 P.2d 1245 (1973).

Section 12. No imprisonment for debt. No person shall be imprisoned for debt, unless upon refusal to deliver up his estate for the benefit of his creditors in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, or in cases of tort or where there is a strong presumption of fraud.

Source: Entire article added, effective August 1, 1876, see L. 1877, p. 30.

The constitutional provision of this section is clear and unambiguous; it prohibits imprisonment for debt in the absence of evidence bringing the case within specific exceptions. Trujillo v. People, 158 Colo. 362, 407 P.2d 36 (1965).

This section does not prohibit punishment of a contempt in refusing to obey lawful orders or decrees, and a commitment for contempt of a husband for refusing to pay a judgment for separate maintenance of his wife is not an imprisonment for debt. In re Popejoy, 26 Colo. 32, 55 P. 1083 (1899).

This section does not prohibit the punishment of a contempt by imprisonment for refusing to obey the lawful orders or decrees of court, the party not being imprisoned for a debt, but for his refusal to obey the lawful order of the court. Harvey v. Harvey, 153 Colo. 15, 384 P.2d 265 (1963).

A commitment to jail for contempt is justified for failure to pay alimony and attorney's fees in a divorce action, but any commitment for failure of the defendant-husband to pay the plaintiff-wife for money loaned is not justified. Harvey v. Harvey, 153 Colo. 15, 384 P.2d 265 (1963).

A consent judgment to pay moneys owed is purely equitable in nature, not a money judgment, and the prohibitions against imprisonment for debt are inapplicable. One held in civil contempt and imprisoned would not be imprisoned for a debt, but rather for his failure to comply with an order of court. Usery v. Fisher, 565 F.2d 137 (10th Cir. 1977).

Arrest upon ne exeat is not prohibited. An arrest and detention upon a writ of ne exeat to prevent a person from going out of the state until he shall give security for his appearance does not constitute imprisonment for debt within the meaning of this section. People ex rel. Porteus v. Barton, 16 Colo. 75, 26 P. 149 (1891).

Intent to defraud determinative of scope of fraud exception. The critical factor in determining whether or not a criminal prosecution falls within the fraud exception to this constitutional prohibition is the existence of the intent to defraud as an element of the offense. People v. Piskula, 197 Colo. 148, 595 P.2d 219 (1979).

Applied in Robertson v. People, 20 Colo. 279, 38 P. 326 (1894); Corryell v. Lawson, 25 Colo. App. 432, 139 P. 25 (1914); Stotts v. Stotts, 83 Colo. 368, 265 P. 911 (1928); Robinson v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 99 Colo. 150, 60 P.2d 927 (1936); City of Englewood v. Wright, 147 Colo. 537, 364 P.2d 569 (1961); People v. Vinnola, 177 Colo. 405, 494 P.2d 826 (1972); People v. Ausley, 185 Colo. 256, 523 P.2d 460 (1974); Rush v. Baker, 188 Colo. 136, 533 P.2d 36 (1975); Dunlop v. Fisher, 406 F. Supp. 760 (D. Colo. 1976); People v. Washburn, 197 Colo. 419, 593 P.2d 962 (1979).

Section 13. Right to bear arms. The right of no person to keep and bear arms in defense of his home, person and property, or in aid of the civil power when thereto legally summoned, shall be called in question; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to justify the practice of carrying concealed weapons.

No absolute right to bear arms. The right to bear arms is not absolute, and it can be restricted by the state's valid exercise of its police power. People v. Garcia, 197 Colo. 550, 595 P.2d 228 (1979).

The conflicting rights of the individual's right to bear arms and the state's right, indeed its duty under its inherent police power, to make reasonable regulations for the purpose of protecting the health, safety, and welfare of the people prohibits granting an absolute right to bear arms under all situations. People v. Blue, 190 Colo. 95, 544 P.2d 385 (1975).

The right to bear arms is not absolute as that right is limited to the defense of one's home, person, and property. People v. Ford, 193 Colo. 459, 568 P.2d 26 (1977).

Right to bear arms is not absolute. Douglass v. Kelton, 199 Colo. 446, 610 P.2d 1067 (1980); People v. Pflugbeil, 834 P.2d 843 (Colo. App. 1992).

Convicted felons' rights subject to limitation. Defendants cannot invoke the same constitutionally protected right to bear arms as could others where the right of a convicted felon to bear arms is subject to reasonable legislative regulation and limitation. People v. Blue, 190 Colo. 95, 544 P.2d 385 (1975).

Municipal ordinance making it unlawful to possess a dangerous or deadly weapon was unconstitutionally overbroad. Lakewood v. Pillow, 180 Colo. 20, 501 P.2d 744 (1972).

Affirmative defense. A defendant charged under § 18-12-108 who presents competent evidence showing that his purpose in possessing weapons was the defense of his home, person, and property as recognized by this section thereby raises an affirmative defense. People v. Ford, 193 Colo. 459, 568 P.2d (1977).

Trial court properly excluded affirmative defense based on this section and a proposed jury instruction where the defendant's offer of proof was insufficient to support the proposed affirmative defense. People v. Barger, 732 P.2d 1225 (Colo. App. 1986).

In considering a challenge to the validity of an ordinance regulating the exercise of the right to bear arms, a court need not determine the status of the right to bear arms under this section. The trial court erred in reaching the question of the status of the right guaranteed under this section, and in holding that the right is fundamental. Robertson v. City & County of Denver, 874 P.2d 325 (Colo. 1994).

Trial court erred in reviewing ordinance regulating the exercise of the right to bear arms under the strict scrutiny standard. The right to bear arms may be regulated by the state under its police power in a reasonable manner. Robertson v. City & County of Denver, 874 P.2d 325 (Colo. 1994).

Ordinance is related to a legitimate government interest and is a valid exercise of police power where assault weapons are weapons of choice for drug traffickers and other criminals and where they account for thirty percent of the weapons used by organized crime, gun trafficking, and terrorists and over twelve percent of drug-related crimes nationwide. Robertson v. City & County of Denver, 874 P.2d 325 (Colo. 1994).

Applied in People v. Nakamura, 99 Colo. 262, 62 P.2d 246 (1936); People v. Taylor, 190 Colo. 144, 544 P.2d 392 (1975).

Section 14. Taking private property for private use. Private property shall not be taken for private use unless by consent of the owner, except for private ways of necessity, and except for reservoirs, drains, flumes or ditches on or across the lands of others, for agricultural, mining, milling, domestic or sanitary purposes.

This section and the following section protect the individual in his vested rights and prohibit the taking thereof for public or private use without condemnation under proper proceedings and just compensation given therefor. Stuart v. Davis, 25 Colo. App. 568, 139 P. 577 (1914).

Ultimate sources of right of condemnation are this section and § 7 of art. XVI, Colo. Const., which deals with rights-of-way for the transportation of water. Bubb v. Christensen, 200 Colo. 21, 610 P.2d 1343 (1980).

This section is a general inhibition against taking private property for private use without the consent of the owner. Crystal Park Co. v. Morton, 27 Colo. App. 74, 146 P. 566 (1915).

But with certain exceptions. The exceptions are constitutional grants of rights and powers not theretofore existing, namely, the right to take private property for private use, without the consent of the owner, in the instances therein enumerated. Crystal Park Co. v. Morton, 27 Colo. App. 74, 146 P. 566 (1915).

Under this section and title 38, dealing with eminent domain, private persons have the right to take private property for the uses specified in this section. Pine Martin Mining Co. v. Empire Zinc Co., 90 Colo. 529, 11 P.2d 221 (1932).

Because the power to condemn private property is in derogation of the right to own and keep property, the exceptions in this section must be interpreted narrowly, with any uncertainty in the ambit of the power to condemn resolved against the person asserting the power. Akin v. Four Corners Encampment, 179 P.3d 139 (Colo. App. 2007).

Section copied from state of Missouri. United States v. 161 Acres of Land, 427 F. Supp. 582 (D. Colo. 1977).

It is said that consideration for public welfare enters into purposes enumerated in this section. But even if this view be not tenable, still the cases referred to in this section are sui generis, forming a distinct exception to the general rule, if it be granted that the purposes enumerated in this section are not quasi-public in their nature. Lithgow v. Pearson, 25 Colo. App. 70, 135 P. 759 (1913).

The fact that this section permits private property to be taken for certain specified uses is an implied declaration that such uses are so closely connected with the public interest as to be at least quasi-public, or, in a modified sense, affected with a public interest. Pine Martin Mining Co. v. Empire Zinc Co., 90 Colo. 529, 11 P.2d 221 (1932).

Although the words "private use" occur in this section, it is obvious that they do not mean a strictly private use, that is to say one having no relation to the public interest. Pine Martin Mining Co. v. Empire Zinc Co., 90 Colo. 529, 11 P.2d 221 (1932).

Broad rights of condemnation for private rights-of-way exist under Colorado law. United States v. 161 Acres of Land, 427 F. Supp. 582 (D. Colo. 1977).

Supplement to common law. These provisions are in addition to the common law right of necessity and are not limited thereby. Bear Creek Development Corp. v. Dyer, 790 P.2d 897 (Colo. App. 1990).

"Ways of necessity" does not include construction of private railroads over private property. This section recognizes the right to appropriate private property for private ways of necessity, but not for the construction upon and over it of private railroads. People ex rel. Aspen M. & S. Co. v. District Court, 11 Colo. 147, 17 P. 298 (1887).

The term "milling" in this section is synonymous with "manufacturing", the word "power" as used in the articles of incorporation means the product of a manufacturing establishment, and the phrase "other beneficial uses and purposes" will be held to refer to other uses expressed in this section. Lamborn v. Bell, 18 Colo. 346, 32 P. 989 (1893); Denver Power & Irrigation Co. v. Denver & R. G. R. R., 30 Colo. 204, 69 P. 568 (1902).

Operation of utility generating plant is business conducted for public purpose. The operation of a generating plant in the furtherance of the conduct of a utility business is for service to the public, and is a business conducted for a public purpose. Miller v. Pub. Serv. Co., 129 Colo. 513, 272 P.2d 283 (1954), appeal dismissed, 348 U.S. 923, 75 S. Ct. 338, 99 L. Ed. 724 (1955).

Urban renewal is a public use, ultimate private ownership notwithstanding. Tracy v. City of Boulder, 635 P.2d 907 (Colo. App. 1981).

Easement serves public purpose by providing access to property in the state. Bear Creek Development Corp. v. Dyer, 790 P.2d 897 (Colo. App. 1990).

Condemnation of land by mining company for right-of-way for pipe line held not to be in violation of this section. Pine Martin Mining Co. v. Empire Zinc Co., 90 Colo. 529, 11 P.2d 221 (1932).

But private property may not be taken for construction of tramway. The right to condemn and appropriate private property, in the present case, being for a private use, no argument is necessary to show that the taking of private property for the construction of a tramway does not fall within the exceptions specified, to which the legislative power is limited by this section. People ex rel. Aspen M. & S. Co. v. District Court, 11 Colo. 147, 17 P. 298 (1887).

And the state of Colorado can create no right to condemn federally owned lands. United States v. 161 Acres of Land, 427 F. Supp. 582 (D. Colo. 1977).

The phrase "private ways of necessity" does not include natural gas pipelines. Phrase is limited to passageways, such as paths, bridges, and tunnels, and roadways that provide legal access connecting landlocked property to a public road. Petitioners do not seek to condemn an easement to provide such access but rather to construct and maintain an underground natural gas pipeline and related equipment and facilities. As such, petition did not identify a purpose for which taking property is permitted under this section and § 38-1-102 (3). Akin v. Four Corners Encampment, 179 P.3d 139 (Colo. App. 2007).

Condemnation power not assertable by oil and gas lessee. The power of condemnation prescribed by this section may not be asserted by a federal oil and gas lessee. Coquina Oil Corp. v. Harry Kourlis Ranch, 643 P.2d 519 (Colo. 1982).

Power not assertable by owner of unpatented mining claim. Precious Offer. Mineral Exch. v. McLain, 194 P.3d 455 (Colo. App. 2008).

Extraterritorial eminent domain not allowable where specifically excluded. A school district may not invoke this constitutional provision to preclude application of § 22-32-111, which prohibits the district from exercising extraterritorial eminent domain. Clear Creek Sch. Dist. RE-1 v. Holmes, 628 P.2d 154 (Colo. App. 1981).

Landowner limited to temporary relief pending outcome of eminent domain proceedings. When a facility for transportation of water is constructed or utilized by one having the right of eminent domain, without prior acquisition of an easement, the remedy of the landowner is limited to temporary relief pending conduct of the eminent domain proceedings by owners of the water right. Bubb v. Christensen, 200 Colo. 21, 610 P.2d 1343 (1980).

The storage and flow of tributary ground water pursuant to an aquifer recharge and water storage rights application did not involve a "reservoir" under this section where the application did not involve the construction of any project facilities on land owned by a third party; hence, there was no trespass or need to exercise a private right of condemnation. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Park County Sportsmen's Ranch, 45 P.3d 693 (Colo. 2002).

State highway department cannot condemn property for a private way of necessity. Although state highway department has express statutory authority to condemn property for local service roads and for highway construction, the department has no statutory authority to "stand in the shoes" of a private landowner and condemn a private way of necessity. Dept. of Hwys. v. Denver & Rio Grande W.R., 789 P.2d 1088 (Colo. 1990); Bear Creek v. Genesee Found., 919 P.2d 948 (Colo. App. 1996).

An alternative route is not acceptable if it is impractical, unreasonable, or prohibited by cost grossly in excess of the value of the dominant estate. West v. Hinksmon, 857 P.2d 483 (Colo. App. 1992); Bear Creek v. Genesee Found., 919 P.2d 948 (Colo. App. 1996).

The trial court erred in not finding that a way of necessity should be restricted as the constitutional way of necessity only exists because of necessity and not by reason of implied grant. Because a constitutional way of necessity is not limited by the intent of the grantor, it should accommodate future uses when a condemnor can establish that the way is necessary for such reasonable use, but this is limited by the constitutional requirement of necessity. Bear Creek v. Genesee Found., 919 P.2d 948 (Colo. App. 1996).

The way of necessity must terminate if and when another route is procured to access the land, as condemnation only passes such interest as required to accomplish the purpose of condemnation. When a mere easement or terminable fee is created, the land reverts when condemnor ceases to use the grant for the purposes specified. Bear Creek v. Genesee Found., 919 P.2d 948 (Colo. App. 1996).

Trial court did not err in not instructing the commissioners that residual damages includes both diminution in value of all parcels, as well as present value of future development of all parcels, as the individual property owners in the development were not one economic unit. Bear Creek v. Genesee Found., 919 P.2d 948 (Colo. App. 1996).

In an action to condemn a way of necessity, if the defendant pleads the existence of an alternate route of private access across property not owned by defendant, defendant has the burden of establishing the existence of an acceptable alternate route and of proving that plaintiffs have the present enforceable legal right to use it. West v. Hinksmon, 857 P.2d 483 (Colo. App. 1992).

Trial court's determination in declaratory judgment action brought under this section that defendants failed to rebut plaintiff's showing of an entitlement to a private way of necessity is not clearly erroneous. Trial court held plaintiff may condemn private way of necessity across defendants' property pursuant to this section. Trial court's determinations that plaintiff proved that a way of necessity is reasonably necessary and that defendants did not prove, in any concrete fashion, that plaintiff has either an alternate route of access or a present enforceable legal right to use one are not clearly erroneous. Tieze v. Killam, 179 P.3d 10 (Colo. App. 2007).

Adjacent landowner has no standing to challenge a contract involving a "landlocked" parcel of land on the theory that once the agreement is final, the new owner might seek to condemn a way of necessity across the adjacent owner's land. Brotman v. E. Lake Creek Ranch L.L.P., 31 P.3d 886 (Colo. 2001).

In an action to condemn a way of necessity, defendant should be permitted to show that an alternate route across defendant's property exists that would be less damaging than that proposed by plaintiff. West v. Hinksmon, 857 P.2d 483 (Colo. App. 1992).

When a petitioner seeks to condemn private way of necessity for access to property it wishes to develop in the future, it must demonstrate a purpose for the condemnation that enables the trial court to examine both the scope of and necessity for the proposed condemnation, so that the burden to be imposed upon the condemnee's property may be ascertained and circumscribed through the trial court's condemnation order. Glenelk Ass'n v. Lewis, 260 P.3d 1117 (Colo. App. 2011).

Condemnor failed to articulate a concrete development proposal for the subject property nor did he sufficiently engage the county's land use approval process prior to initiating the condemnation proceeding. Record fails to clarify condemnor's intended use of the property or size of the planned road with sufficient specificity to allow trial court to analyze necessity of requested easement. Condemnor's failure to sufficiently articulate development plan prevented trial court from determining scope of proposed condemnation sufficiently to determine scope of burden to be imposed upon the property to be condemned. Given evidentiary shortcomings in the record, trial court correctly concluded that it could not determine whether particular way of necessity requested by condemnor was indispensable and, therefore, trial court correctly denied condemnor's request for immediate possession and dismissed the condemnation petition. Glenelk Ass'n v. Lewis, 260 P.3d 1117 (Colo. App. 2011).

District Court, 636 P.2d 715 (Colo. 1981).

Section 15. Taking property for public use - compensation, how ascertained. Private property shall not be taken or damaged, for public or private use, without just compensation. Such compensation shall be ascertained by a board of commissioners, of not less than three freeholders, or by a jury, when required by the owner of the property, in such manner as may be prescribed by law, and until the same shall be paid to the owner, or into court for the owner, the property shall not be needlessly disturbed, or the proprietary rights of the owner therein divested; and whenever an attempt is made to take private property for a use alleged to be public, the question whether the contemplated use be really public shall be a judicial question, and determined as such without regard to any legislative assertion that the use is public.

This section and fifth amendment to U.S. Constitution prohibit the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. Thompson v. City & County of Denver, 958 P.2d 525 (Colo. App. 1998); Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

This section is merely declaration of law as it stood at time constitution was made. Denver R. R. Land & Coal Co. v. Union P.R.R., 34 F. 386 (D. Colo. 1888).

And guarantees right that exists regardless of constitutional provisions. Not only does this section guarantee the right of a person whose property is taken for public use to receive compensation therefor, but the right exists regardless of constitutional provisions. Chicago B. & Q.R.R. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 69 Colo. 275, 193 P. 726 (1920).

Independent of right of eminent domain. The right of a person owning property to just compensation for the taking or damaging thereof for public use is independent of the state's right of eminent domain. Farmers Irrigation Co. v. Game & Fish Comm'n, 149 Colo. 318, 369 P.2d 557 (1962).

Extension of common-law right. The phrase of this section, "or damaged for public or private use without just compensation", is an extension of the common constitutional provision designed for the protection of private property. It is a recognition of a new right of recovery, which is not limited to cases where an action would have lain at common law. Denver Circle R.R. v. Nestor, 10 Colo. 403, 15 P. 714 (1887); City of Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 36 P. 789 (1894).

Section affords greater protection than federal constitution. This section affords an aggrieved property owner a greater measure of protection than does the constitution of the United States. The fifth amendment of the United States Constitution requires compensation only where there has been an actual taking. The Colorado Constitution, however, provides for compensation where private property has been taken or damaged. Mosher v. City of Boulder, 225 F. Supp. 32 (D. Colo. 1964).

It is remedial in nature and effect. This section while not intended to disturb vested rights, nor in itself prohibitory of the exercise of powers previously granted by the general assembly, is remedial in its nature and effect respecting existing property rights. Its mandate is that, where they are taken or injuriously affected subsequent to the day on which the constitution went into effect, just compensation shall be made. Denver Circle R.R. v. Nestor, 10 Colo. 403, 15 P. 714 (1887).

And should be liberally construed. This section is remedial in character and, for the purpose of giving property holders additional security and under well settled canons of construction, it should be liberally construed. City of Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 36 P. 789 (1894); Srb v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 43 Colo. App. 14, 601 P.2d 1082 (1979).

Purpose of this section of the constitution is to provide a remedy in damages for injury to property, not common to the public, inflicted by the state or one of its political subdivisions; and this section is not limited in application to condemnation proceedings. Srb v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 43 Colo. App. 14, 601 P.2d 1082 (1979).

The purpose of this section is to prevent a property owner from being made to suffer an uncompensated injury, not common to the public, as a result of the construction of a public improvement. Such improvements are frequently made or authorized by counties; and to say that because of that fact damages so suffered cannot be recovered is to deny to the language of the constitution its obvious import. Bd. of Comm'rs v. Adler, 69 Colo. 290, 194 P. 621 (1920).

The actual purpose of this section is to place a limitation even upon legislative enactment. Under the restriction of this section the general assembly itself must exercise care in declaring to be a "public use" (and hence entitled to the right of eminent domain) only that which may meet the legal tests of such use as determined by the judiciary. Potashnik v. Pub. Serv. Co., 126 Colo. 98, 247 P.2d 137 (1952).

This section applies to proceedings in eminent domain, and to situations in which such proceedings would be proper; i.e., where condemnation would be necessary were the required property not otherwise acquired. Bd. of Comm'rs v. Adler, 69 Colo. 290, 194 P. 621 (1920).

But applicability of section is not limited to such proceedings. Bd. of Comm'rs v. Adler, 69 Colo. 290, 194 P. 621 (1920).

This provision is not limited in its application to condemnation proceedings. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

It marks boundary beyond which people have forbidden lawmakers to pass and have commanded their courts to hold any such passage illegal. How inviolable that constitutional inhibition is, is demonstrated by the fact that the supreme court once inadvertently permitted its protection to be threatened (North Sterling Irrigation Dist. v. Dickman, 59 Colo. 169, 149 P. 97 (1915)), but at the first opportunity overruled the dangerous precedent and returned to the solid ground of strict construction. Bd. of Comm'rs v. Adler, 69 Colo. 290, 194 P. 621 (1920); San Luis Valley Irrigation Dist. v. Noffsinger, 85 Colo. 202, 274 P. 827 (1929).

Right to condemn private property is creature of statute, pursuant to which it must clearly appear either by express grant or by necessary implication. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

Private property may not be condemned, even for a purpose which is judicially determined to be a public use within the meaning of this section, in the absence of express or necessarily implied statutory condemnation authority. Buck v. District Court, 199 Colo. 344, 608 P.2d 350 (1980); Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Intermountain Rural Elec. Ass'n, 655 P.2d 831 (Colo. 1982); Dept. of Transp. v. Stapleton, 81 P.3d 1105 (Colo. App. 2003), rev'd on other grounds, 97 P.3d 938 (Colo. 2004).

Subject to constitutional guarantees. The power of eminent domain is an attribute of sovereignty, conditioned by the requirement that just compensation be paid for the taking. Colo. ex rel. Watrous v. District Court of United States, 207 F.2d 50 (10th Cir. 1953).

The right of eminent domain recognizes the due process provision of the constitution, provides for the legal and orderly acquisition of private property for public use, and for just compensation for the taking. Town of Sheridan v. Valley San. Dist., 137 Colo. 315, 324 P.2d 1038 (1958).

Whatever may have been the ancient right of condemnation, it has been restrained by constitutional limitations in the protection of individual property rights. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

The Colorado Constitution, as well as the federal constitution, protects against an arbitrary exercise of eminent domain to correct a blighted area by the urban renewal authority. Urban Renewal Auth. v. Daugherty, 271 F. Supp. 729 (D. Colo. 1967).

Deprivation of use must meet standard of reasonableness. Although, under its police power, there are situations in which a government may deprive the owner of a certain use of property and not be in violation of the prohibition against taking private property without just compensation, nevertheless, there must be a recognition that that exercise of the police power can only be valid under--and only under--a standard of reasonableness. Combined Commc'ns Corp. v. City & County of Denver, 189 Colo. 462, 542 P.2d 79 (1975).

Where city compels owner to bring building into compliance with safety code, but does not deprive owner of all reasonable use of the building, such action by city does not constitute a taking. Van Sickle v. Boyes, 797 P.2d 1267 (Colo. 1990).

A governmental regulation that prohibits all reasonable use of property constitutes a taking. Williams v. City of Central, 907 P.2d 701 (Colo. App. 1995).

There can be no "inverse condemnation" where no right exists in governmental agency to proceed under eminent domain. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

Protection of private property in this section presupposes that it is wanted for public use. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Whether contemplated use is public is judicial question. If it is public, the necessity or expediency of devoting the property to it is a question for the determination of a city. Colo. Cent. Power Co. v. City of Englewood, 89 F.2d 233 (10th Cir. 1937).

Judicial approval of the purpose for the taking of property as a public use is required. Larson v. Chase Pipe Line Co., 183 Colo. 76, 514 P.2d 1316 (1973).

By the last clause of this section an inquiry may be made by the court as to whether a railroad which is proposed to be built is of a public or private character. Denver R.R. Land & Coal Co. v. Union Pac. Ry., 34 F. 386 (1888).

The general right of eminent domain depends upon, first, legislative authority and, second, judicial approval of the purpose as a public use. Potashnik v. Pub. Serv. Co., 126 Colo. 98, 247 P.2d 137 (1952).

The question of whether a contemplated use is a public use is an issue for judicial determination. Shaklee v. District Court, 636 P.2d 715 (Colo. 1981); Pub. Serv. Co. v. Shaklee, 784 P.2d 314 (Colo. 1989).

Trial court properly dismissed petition by county to condemn a portion of owner's property for use as a public road because county presented no valid public purpose for its condemnation of owner's property. Here, public purpose is to benefit private parties; a few, select members of the public will gain access to a private cemetery. Such a private benefit does not constitute a valid public purpose. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Kobobel, 176 P.3d 860 (Colo. App. 2007).

As duty of judiciary to safeguard use of property. Neither the executive nor the legislative branches of government have any right whatsoever to deprive anyone of his life, liberty or property without due process or compensation, and under our system of government it was intended that the judicial branch of the government stand open as a haven for the protection of any citizens whose rights have been invaded, whether it be by an individual or by either of the other branches of our government. Boxberger v. State Hwy. Dept., 126 Colo. 438, 250 P.2d 1007 (1952).

It is the unquestioned duty and responsibility of the judicial branch of government, through the decision of controversies which come before it, to safeguard and maintain the constitutional provisions which guarantee the maximum free and unrestricted use of property by the citizen, and to strike down those enactments which unreasonably and unnecessarily fasten upon him new restraints upon freedom of action in the use and enjoyment thereof. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

A federal district court with diversity jurisdiction can consider an inverse condemnation claim arising under the Colorado constitution and statutes providing a special judicial procedure for condemnation claims. SK Fin. SA v. La Plata County, Bd. of Comm'rs, 126 F.3d 1272 (10th Cir. 1997).

Supreme court, on its own motion, will take notice of invalidity of municipal ordinance enacted in support of exhorbitant demands and authorizing the taking of private property without due process of law. Town of Sheridan v. Valley San. Dist., 137 Colo. 315, 324 P.2d 1038 (1958).

No formula for determining nature of use. No definition has as yet been formulated which would serve as an infallible test in determining whether a use of property sought to be appropriated under the power of eminent domain is public or private. Buck v. District Court, 199 Colo. 344, 608 P.2d 350 (1980); Pub. Serv. Co. v. Shaklee, 784 P.2d 314 (Colo. 1989).

But court's determination reviewable for arbitrariness. When subject to inquiry as to whether a use is public under this section it must be determined by a board of commissioners appointed by the court. If that determination is not made arbitrarily, or capriciously or in bad faith, it is conclusive and not subject to judicial review. Colo. Cent. Power Co. v. City of Englewood, 89 F.2d 233 (10th Cir. 1937).

If primary purpose of condemnation is to advance private interests, the existence of an incidental public benefit does not prevent a court from finding "bad faith" and invalidating a condemning authority's determination that a particular acquisition is necessary. Denver W. Metro. Dist. v. Geudner, 786 P.2d 434 (Colo. App. 1989).

Owner of property to be condemned has burden of proving that taking of property is not for a public purpose. Pub. Serv. Co. v. Shaklee, 784 P.2d 314 (Colo. 1989).

Proposed urban renewal project is public and not private where the underlying object is to eliminate blighted areas and prevent the spread and recurrence of blight conditions and where the grant is to a public agency which acquires the lands in question under a master plan of rehabilitation; the fact that when redevelopment is achieved the properties are sold to private individuals for the purpose of development does not rob the undertaking of its public purpose. Rabinoff v. District Court, 145 Colo. 225, 360 P.2d 114 (1961).

Urban renewal is a public use, ultimate private ownership notwithstanding. Tracy v. City of Boulder, 635 P.2d 907 (Colo. App. 1981).

Even though a private developer may benefit from the city's project, the record supports the trial court's determination that the condemnation of the property was for a valid public purpose and was not incidental. City & County of Denver v. Eat Out, Inc., 75 P.3d 1141 (Colo. App. 2003).

Taking of water for use in operation of hatchery is for public purpose. Farmers Irrigation Co. v. Game & Fish Comm'n, 149 Colo. 318, 369 P.2d 557 (1962).

Construction of dust levees for protection of railroad tracks is public use such as would justify condemnation of private property. Buck v. District Court, 199 Colo. 344, 608 P.2d 350 (1980).

Condemnation of right-of-way across land to construct transmission lines constitutes a public use since others have same right to access to use power from transmission lines on the same terms as the company for which such lines were originally constructed. Pub. Serv. Co. v. Shaklee, 784 P.2d 314 (Colo. 1989).

Urban renewal is a substantial state interest that can justify taking property dedicated to religious uses. Pillar of Fire v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 181 Colo. 411, 509 P.2d 1250 (1973).

Remand necessary so trial court can independently examine the public purpose of the condemnation based on the record of proceedings before urban renewal authority and, without either deferring to the authority's blight determination or considering bad faith, make findings from the existing record reflecting that examination. Sheridan Redev. Agency v. Knightsbridge Land Co., 166 P.3d 259 (Colo. App. 2007).

Counties unable to acquire office space by eminent domain. The general assembly has not impliedly delegated the power of eminent domain to counties for the purpose of acquiring office space for authorized county purposes. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Intermountain Rural Elec. Ass'n, 655 P.2d 831 (Colo. 1982).

Sanitation district has power to condemn land. Under the constitutional provisions establishing the right of eminent domain and the several statutes enacted pursuant thereto, a sanitation district has power and authority to condemn land. Town of Sheridan v. Valley San. Dist., 137 Colo. 315, 324 P.2d 1038 (1958).

And property so acquired cannot be lost by operation of law. Property acquired under the constitution and statutes by exercise of the right of eminent domain, cannot be lost by operation of a municipal ordinance. The legal entity condemning the property obtains the absolute right, title and interest thereto; an ordinance of a municipality providing that all right, title and interest in a sanitary sewer constructed through such municipality pursuant to condemnation of a right-of-way therefor shall vest, not in the sewer district acquiring the right-of-way, but in the town at the expiration of five years, is void. Town of Sheridan v. Valley San. Dist., 137 Colo. 315, 324 P.2d 1038 (1958).

Special assessment without benefit violates section. To enforce a special assessment for a purpose which does not confer a special benefit upon the property upon which it is levied would result in taking property without compensation, and without due process of law. Pomroy v. Bd. of Pub. Waterworks, Dist. No. 2, 55 Colo. 476, 136 P. 78 (1913); Santa Fe Land Imp. Co. v. City & County of Denver, 89 Colo. 309, 2 P.2d 238 (1931); City & County of Denver v. Greenspoon, 140 Colo. 402, 344 P.2d 679 (1959).

As do excessive assessments. An assessment for local improvements apportioned on the area basis insofar as it exceeds the benefits is violative of this section. Ross v. City & County of Denver, 89 Colo. 317, 2 P.2d 241 (1931).

Where taxes result in a flagrant inequality between the burden imposed and the benefit received, they are confiscatory and unconstitutional. Ochs v. Town of Hot Sulphur Springs, 158 Colo. 456, 407 P.2d 677 (1965).

Refusal to enforce racial covenant does not deprive owner of property. The trial court's refusal to recognize the vested interest in defendant and to enforce forfeiture of the property for failure to comply with a racial restrictive covenant did not deprive defendant of property without just compensation and without due process of law. Capitol Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Smith, 136 Colo. 265, 316 P.2d 252 (1957).

Actions of the city requiring a mobile home park owner to bring the park into compliance with the city code do not constitute a taking because enforcement of the code does not deprive the owner of all use of the property. Trailer Haven MHP, LLC v. City of Aurora, 81 P.3d 1132 (Colo. App. 2003).

Inverse condemnation action is based on this section. Ossman v. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co., 184 Colo. 360, 520 P.2d 738 (1974).

In order to pursue an inverse condemnation claim under the Colorado Constitution, that is, to compel the state to exercise its power of eminent domain, a plaintiff must establish: (1) That there has been a taking or damaging of property interest, (2) for a public purpose without just compensation, (3) by a governmental or public entity that has the power of eminent domain but which has refused to exercise it. Thompson v. City & County of Denver, 958 P.2d 525 (Colo. App. 1998).

Inverse condemnation proceeding is ordinarily only remedy available to a litigant whose property has been taken for a public use without just compensation. Collopy v. Wildlife Comm'n, 625 P.2d 994 (Colo. 1981).

To pursue an inverse condemnation claim under the Colorado Constitution, i.e., to compel a public entity to provide compensation to a property owner, the property owner must establish: (1) There has been a taking or damaging of a property interest; (2) for a public purpose; (3) without just compensation; (4) by a governmental or public entity that has the power of eminent domain but which has refused to exercise that power. Thompson v. City & County of Denver, 958 P.2d 525 (Colo. App. 1998); Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001); Betterview Invs., LLC v. Pub. Serv. Co., 198 P.3d 1258 (Colo. App. 2008); Colo. Springs v. Andersen Mahon Enters., 260 P.3d 29 (Colo. App. 2010).

In a regulatory inverse condemnation case, there is a two-tiered inquiry. First, a court must determine whether a per se taking has occurred. Second, if a landowner is unable to prove a per se compensable takings claim (because the regulation has a legitimate purpose and the owner's land has not been rendered economically idle), the landowner may still be able to prove a takings has occurred under a fact-specific inquiry. Animas Valley Sand & Gravel, Inc. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs of La Plata, 38 P.3d 59 (Colo. 2001).

Where a regulation places limitations on land that fall far short of eliminating all economically beneficial use, a taking nonetheless may have occurred, depending on a number of complex factors including the regulation's economic effect on the landowner, the extent to which the regulation interferes with reasonable investment-backed expectations, and the character of the government action. No one factor is dispositive. Each case must be decided on its own facts. Animas Valley Sand & Gravel, Inc. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs of La Plata, 38 P.3d 59 (Colo. 2001).

In a regulatory takings case, a court must determine the regulation's effects on the full rights in the land. Thus, in assessing a takings claim, a court must look to the regulation's effect on the property as a whole, not simply the portion affected by the exaction. Animas Valley Sand & Gravel, Inc. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs of La Plata, 38 P.3d 59 (Colo. 2001).

An inverse condemnation action is to be tried as if it were eminent domain proceeding. Ossman v. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co., 184 Colo. 360, 520 P.2d 738 (1974).

An inverse condemnation action based on this section is to be treated as an eminent domain proceeding, conducted strictly according to the procedures set out in section 38-1-101. Hayden v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 41 Colo. App. 102, 580 P.2d 830 (1978); Linnebur v. Pub. Serv. Co. of Colo., 716 P.2d 1120 (Colo. 1986).

However, an inverse condemnation action is appropriate only where the state entity has eminent domain powers at the time of the taking. In this case, since the department of health did not have condemnation powers until after the regulatory taking, the inverse condemnation claim was dismissed. Dept. of Health v. The Mill, 809 P.2d 434 (Colo. 1991).

Physical condemnation is not required for a property owner to state a claim for relief in an inverse condemnation proceeding, but the owner must show a legal interference that substantially impairs his or her use or possession of the property. Colo. Springs v. Andersen Mahon Enters., 260 P.3d 29 (Colo. App. 2010).

Exhaustion of administrative remedies, notice of claims, and sovereign immunity are not defenses available to the state in an inverse condemnation action. The Mill v. State Dept. of Health, 787 P.2d 176 (Colo. App. 1989).

Governmental immunity inapplicable to inverse condemnation. Given the constitutional genesis of a claim for inverse condemnation and the special nature of the right upon which the claim is founded, the claim is not subject to the limitations of the Governmental Immunity Act. Jorgenson v. City of Aurora, 767 P.2d 756 (Colo. App. 1988).

Section 1983 federal civil rights claim is premature so long as possibility of inverse condemnation exists. Until inverse condemnation has been pursued, where possible, and has failed, there is no taking without compensation that could constitute a deprivation of civil rights. Jorgenson v. City of Aurora, 767 P.2d 756 (Colo. App. 1988).

State statute prohibiting municipality from exacting a fee from telecommunications providers for the use of public rights-of-way, beyond costs directly incurred by the municipality, does not authorize a taking of property for which the municipality would be entitled to compensation by inverse condemnation. A municipality controls public rights-of-way in its governmental capacity, and such property is not "private" for purposes of a takings analysis. City & County of Denver v. Qwest Corp., 18 P.3d 748 (Colo. 2001).

A government entity's entry onto private property for survey purposes prior to initiating eminent domain proceedings does not constitute a compensable taking. San Miguel County Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Roberts, 159 P.3d 800 (Colo. App. 2006).

Application of § 43-2-201 does not constitute a governmental taking for which compensation is required. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Flickinger, 687 P.2d 985 (Colo. 1984).

Redemption interest under § 39-12-103 (3) is a penalty, and when the government exacts a penalty, it may deduct the penalty from a money judgment without effecting a taking. Because the taxpayers had no reasonable expectation that they were exempt from this penalty, the redemption interest charged by the county implicates no property interest and there is no violation of the takings clauses. Dove Valley Bus. Park v. County Comm'rs, 945 P.2d 395 (Colo. 1997).

Exemptions allowed in act regarding the obtainment of well permits and augmentation plans by owners and operators of sand and gravel pits will somewhat decrease the amount of water available in the river for use, but this fact alone does not establish substantial damage to any particular water right owner. There is no violation of the takings clause of the Colorado constitution. Central Colo. Water v. Simpson, 877 P.2d 335 (Colo. 1994).

A claim for wrongful taking under this section must be based on some right of the property owner to exercise or use its property during the period in question. Where the owner had leased the property and the lessee had declared bankruptcy, the owner had no possessory interest in the property during the time the property was held by a receiver and therefore had no claim for injury based on the receiver's actions. Spencer Invs., Inc. v. Bohn, 923 P.2d 140 (Colo. App. 1995).

Landowners have no right to pollute a stream or use property in a manner that could result in the spread of radioactive contamination. A landowner cannot reasonably expect to put property to a use that constitutes a nuisance, even if that is the only economically viable use for the property. Under such circumstances, a government need not pay even for complete takeover or destruction of property if it is justified by the owner's insistence on using the property to injure other people or their property. Aztec Minerals Corp. v. Romer, 940 P.2d 1025 (Colo. App. 1996).

The mere remediation of a contaminated site, even if it resulted in physical damage to the property, could not result in a taking for public or private use. Aztec Minerals Corp. v. Romer, 940 P.2d 1025 (Colo. App. 1996).

Applied in Knoth v. Barclay, 8 Colo. 300, 6 P. 924 (1885); People ex rel. Aspen M. & S. Co. v. District Court, 11 Colo. 147, 17 P. 298 (1887); Searl v. Sch. Dist. No. 2, 133 U.S. 553, 10 S. Ct. 374, 33 L. Ed. 740 (1890); Colo. Cent. R.R. v. Humphreys, 16 Colo. 34, 26 P. 165 (1891); Strickler v. City of Colo. Herring v. Platte River Power Auth., 728 P.2d 709 (Colo. 1986).

II. PROPERTY RIGHTS PROTECTED.

Section protects private property or some right peculiar to owner. It is only when some specific private property, or some right or interest therein or incident thereto, peculiar to the owner, is taken or damaged for public or private use that the constitution guarantees compensation therefor. Gilbert v. Greeley, S. L. & Pac. Ry., 13 Colo. 501, 22 P. 814 (1889).

Property interests are defined by existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source such as state law. Dove Valley Bus. Park v. County Comm'rs, 945 P.2d 395 (Colo. 1997).

Property includes right to freely possess, use and alienate chattel or land. Property, in its broader and more appropriate sense, is not alone the chattel or the land itself, but the right to freely possess, use and alienate the same; and many things are considered property which have no tangible existence, but which are necessary to the satisfactory use and enjoyment of that which is tangible. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

Property is more than the mere thing which a person owns. It is elemental that it includes the right to acquire, use, and dispose of it. The constitution protects these essential attributes of property. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

But section does not guarantee most profitable use of property. The due process and just compensation clauses of the federal and state constitutions do not require that a landowner be permitted to make the best, maximum, or most profitable use of his property. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961); Madis v. Higginson, 164 Colo. 320, 434 P.2d 705 (1967); Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

There is simply no constitutionally protected right under the federal or state constitutions to gain the maximum profit from the use of property. Nopro v. Town of Cherry Hills Vill., 180 Colo. 217, 504 P.2d 344 (1972).

The due process and just compensation clauses do not require that zoning ordinances permit a landowner to make the most profitable use of his property. Bird v. City of Colo. Springs, 176 Colo. 32, 489 P.2d 324 (1971).

All private property is held subject to reasonable police powers of state as exercised through properly constituted authorities; and, certainly all public property is held under no less a power. Asphalt Paving Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 162 Colo. 254, 425 P.2d 289 (1967).

To provide for public welfare and security. One of the essential elements of property is the right to its unrestricted use and enjoyment, and that use cannot be interfered with beyond what is necessary to provide for the welfare and general security of the public. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959); Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

Easements deemed property. Incorporeal hereditaments, particularly those denominated easements, have always been considered property, both by the civil and the common law. They are generally attached to things corporeal, and are said to "issue out of or concern" them. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

Such an easement of abutting owner in street. An easement in a street connected with the lot of an abutting owner is property within the meaning of this and the preceding section, and any interference therewith, which results in injury to the realty, must, with exceptions, be justly compensated. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

Right of access is subject to reasonable control and limitation. Troiano v. Colo. Dept. of Hwys., 170 Colo. 484, 463 P.2d 448 (1969); Thornton v. City of Colo. Springs, 173 Colo. 357, 478 P.2d 665 (1970); Shaklee v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 176 Colo. 559, 491 P.2d 1366 (1971).

And improvements or inconvenience may be damnum absque injuria. Sometimes interferences and the resulting injury may properly be held to be damnum absque injuria, where they are occasioned by a reasonable improvement of the street by the proper authorities for the greater convenience of the public; or where a temporary inconvenience or injury results from a legitimate use thereof by the public. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

For injuries resulting from reasonable and ordinary or usual change and improvement of the street by the municipality, the abutting owner cannot recover, provided the change or improvement is made in a careful and skillful manner for the benefit of the public. City of Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 36 P. 789 (1894); City of Colo. Springs v. Stark, 57 Colo. 384, 140 P. 794 (1914).

Although doctrine of damnum absque injuria has not been applied where municipal authorities have made an unreasonable change in the street, or put it, or allowed it to be put, to an extraordinary or unusual use. City of Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 36 P. 789 (1906).

Consent to reasonable changes presumed. In purchasing his lot or dedicating the easement to the public, the abutting owner is conclusively presumed to have contemplated the power and authority of the city council to skillfully make reasonable changes and improvements, by raising or lowering the grade, or otherwise. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883); City of Denver v. Vernia, 8 Colo. 399, 8 P. 656 (1885).

Including bridges or street railways. Bridges, culverts, and even street railways, but not ordinary railroads, are matters contemplated by the lot owner when he purchases. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

But not viaducts obstructing access to property. The building of a viaduct in a public street over railroad tracks is such an extraordinary use of the street as could not have been reasonably anticipated at the time of the dedication. And under this section, both principle and authority unite in support of the rule allowing the owner of abutting property to recover damages when the means of ingress and egress to his property is obstructed or injured thereby. City of Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 36 P. 789 (1906).

Right to hunt wild game not enforceable property right. The right to hunt wild game upon one's own land is not a property right enforceable against the state under this section. Collopy v. Wildlife Comm'n, 625 P.2d 994 (Colo. 1981).

City ordinances banning billboards unconstitutional. Where the combined effect of two city ordinances would be to eliminate the billboard business in Denver, by enforcing the prohibition against the erection of any new billboards, and by forcing the removal of existing signs, the city ordinances were unconstitutional. Combined Commc'ns Corp. v. City & County of Denver, 189 Colo. 462, 542 P.2d 79 (1975).

Right to use of water acquired by priority of appropriation deemed property right. The people and the courts of Colorado treat as property the right to a use of water acquired by priority of appropriation. The right of user would, of course, be of no value without the water; but it is this right that is mainly the subject of ownership. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

The right to the use of water secured by legal appropriation is property, and a proper construction of §§ 5 and 6 of art. XVI, Colo. Const., dealing with the public nature of water and the diversion of unappropriated water for irrigation purposes harmonized these provisions with the declaration of this section "that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation". Armstrong v. Larimer County Ditch Co., 1 Colo. App. 49, 27 P. 235 (1891).

Rights to the use of water for a beneficial purpose, whatever the use may be, are property, in the full sense of that term, and are protected by this section. Sterling v. Pawnee Ditch Extension Co., 42 Colo. 421, 94 P. 339, 15 L.R.A. 238 (1908).

A priority to the use of water for irrigation or domestic purposes is a property right and as such is fully protected by the constitutional guarantees relating to property in general. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

If a lessee's unexpired leasehold interest is subjected to condemnation, the lessee generally is entitled to compensation. Fibreglas Fabricators, Inc. v. Kylberg, 799 P.2d 371 (Colo. 1990).

An exemplary damages award is a private property right, and the statutory requirement that one-third of all damages collected pursuant to § 13-21-102 be paid into the state general fund constitutes a taking of a judgment creditor's private property without just compensation in violation of the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the United States constitution and this section of the constitution. Kirk v. Denver Pub. Co., 818 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1991).

Church property is private property which can be taken by eminent domain for paramount public use. Pillar of Fire v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 181 Colo. 411, 509 P.2d 1250 (1973).

Fixtures are part of realty for which compensation must be paid to the owner by the condemning authority. Denver Urban Renewal Auth. v. Steiner Am. Corp., 31 Colo. App. 125, 500 P.2d 983 (1972).

Items presumed fixtures. Where the identity of the specific items of property not taken by urban renewal authority is not reflected in the record, and the affidavit stands uncontroverted, it must be presumed that the items for which landowner was awarded compensation were fixtures and equipment used in the condemned plant and that for purposes of eminent domain such fixtures and equipment had become a part of the building. Denver Urban Renewal Auth. v. Steiner Am. Corp., 31 Colo. App. 125, 500 P. 2d 983 (1972).

Where urban renewal authority does not litigate landowner's allegation that machinery and equipment not taken by urban renewal authority are fixtures, urban renewal authority cannot avoid liability for property owner for expenses incurred in moving and relocating the machinery and equipment on the theory that they consist only of personal property. Denver Urban Renewal Auth. v. Steiner Am. Corp., 31 Colo. App. 125, 500 P.2d 983 (1972).

III. DAMAGING OR TAKING OF PROPERTY.

A taking of property occurs when the entity clothed with the power of eminent domain substantially deprives a property owner of the use and enjoyment of that property. A taking can be effected by a legal interference with the physical use, possession, disposition, or enjoyment of the property, or by acts which constitute an exercise of dominion and control by a governmental entity. A taking also occurs if an owner is required to forego all economically beneficial use of his or her property. Clare v. Florissant Water & San. Dist., 879 P.2d 471 (Colo. App. 1994); Thompson v. City & County of Denver, 958 P.2d 525 (Colo. App. 1998); Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Physical taking of private property for public use need not be shown in order to entitle owner to compensation. Harrison v. Denver City Tramway Co., 54 Colo. 593, 131 P. 409 (1913).

As this section makes compensable both taking and damages inflicted by the state of Colorado or one of its agencies or constituent parts. Mosher v. City of Boulder, 225 F. Supp. 32 (D. Colo. 1964).

Purpose of inserting word "damaged" in this section was to add additional right of action. City of Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 36 P. 789 (1894).

And it encompasses results of improvements by eminent domain. The use of the word "damaged" in this section, in connection with the word "taken", indicates clearly that the damage contemplated was such as would result from the making of an improvement in which the right of eminent domain might be called into use. Bd. of Comm'rs v. Adler, 69 Colo. 290, 194 P. 621 (1920).

Intent of including the word "damaged" in this section was to grant relief to property owners who have been substantially damaged by the creation of public improvements abutting their lands, but whose land had not been physically taken by the government. Thompson v. City & County of Denver, 958 P.2d 525 (Colo. App. 1998).

A taking cannot result from simple negligence by a governmental entity. For governmental action to result in a taking, the taking must be a reasonably foreseeable consequence of an authorized action. The government must have the intent to take the property or to do an act that has the natural consequence of taking the property. Hence, the consequence of the action alleged to be a taking must be a "direct, natural, probable result of that action". Trinity Broad. of Denver, Inc. v. City of Westminster, 848 P.2d 916 (Colo. 1993); Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

However, a governmental entity can be held liable for a taking even if the actual conduct complained of was performed by another person or entity. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

The two-pronged test of Trinity Broad. of Denver, Inc. v. City of Westminster, annotated above, is presented in the disjunctive, so it provides a property owner with two separate grounds for establishing a taking. The first prong focuses on the subjective intent of the defendant, while the second prong focuses on objective causation. Under the second prong, a property owner may prevail on an inverse condemnation claim by proving not that the governmental entity subjectively intended to effect a taking but that the government's action had the natural consequence of taking the property. Scott v. County of Custer, 178 P.3d 1240 (Colo. App. 2007).

Property may be damaged though land not appropriated. Although it has been said that property cannot be "taken", within the meaning of this section, except by an appropriation of the land itself, no such limitation is applicable to the clause relating to damages. Mollandin v. Union Pac. Ry., 14 F. 394 (D. Colo. 1882), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Temporary taking differs from a permanent taking in that, once the period of the taking expires, the landowner's legal interest and occupation of the property are reestablished and the taking is for a definite period of time. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Just compensation must be paid for a temporary, as well as a permanent, taking. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Temporary taking differs from a permanent taking in that, once the period of the taking expires, the landowner's legal interest and occupation of the property are reestablished and the taking is for a definite period to time. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Property owner need not provide proof that public entity specifically authorized the precise invasion complained of; rather, property owner must establish that public entity's actions were more than mere negligence and that the use of the parcel was a direct, natural and probable result of actions that public entity specifically authorized its contractors to take. Record supports trial court's finding that use of particular parcel was not authorized by its owner and that public entity temporarily possessed the parcel for a period of 26 months. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

In the case of a temporary taking, landowner is entitled to just compensation for fair rental value of property at its highest and best use, taking into consideration any existing land use restrictions, during the period of temporary taking. In determining fair rental value, the trial court and the jury must assume a free bargaining transaction between a hypothetical lessor and lessee. Changes in land use restrictions may only be considered if they probably could have occurred during the temporary taking period. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Mere ownership of wild game does not expose state to landowner crop loss. Landowners unquestionably possess a cognizable property interest in their crops and residues, but it does not follow, however, that mere state ownership of wild game exposes it to liability for wildlife-caused crop losses. Collopy v. Wildlife Comm'n, 625 P.2d 994 (Colo. 1981).

Right or interest in property must be impaired. It must appear that some right, or interest, whether public or private, pertaining to the property has been destroyed or impaired, before an action can be maintained. Harrison v. Denver City Tramway Co., 54 Colo. 593, 131 P. 409 (1913).

Damage sustained by owner must differ in kind from that suffered by public generally. Under this section the damage must be to the property or its appurtenances; or it must affect some right or interest which the owner enjoys in connection with the property, not shared or enjoyed by the public generally. The damage must differ in kind, not merely in degree. Gilbert v. Greeley, S.L. & Pac. Ry., 13 Colo. 501, 22 P. 814 (1889); Gayton v. Dept. of Hwys., 149 Colo. 72, 367 P.2d 899 (1962); Troiano v. Colo. Dept. of Hwys., 170 Colo. 484, 463 P.2d 448 (1969); Hayutin v. Colo. State Dept. of Hwys., 175 Colo. 83, 485 P.2d 896, cert. denied, 404 U.S. 991, 92 S. Ct. 553, 30 L. Ed. 2d 542 (1971); Thompson v. City & County of Denver, 958 P.2d 525 (Colo. App. 1998); Claassen v. City & County of Denver, 30 P.3d 710 (Colo. App. 2000).

For any injury and annoyance occasioned by an ordinary railroad, which are peculiar to an abutting owner, and not shared by the general public -- which affect his property and impair its value without injuring that of his neighbor -- he ought to receive compensation. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

Where an obstruction resulting from the laying of railroad tracks was not shown to affect ingress or egress from plaintiff's property and did not cause special damage different from that suffered in common by the general public, he may not recover for loss sustained. Gilbert v. Greeley, S.L. & Pac. Ry., 13 Colo. 501, 22 P. 814 (1889).

The annoyance, discomfort, and injury arising from the noise, exhaust pollutants, and vibrations that originate from flights of aircraft arriving and departing from Denver international airport are the same effects, except in degree, as suffered by the public in general; therefore, no compensable damage has occurred. Thompson v. City & County of Denver, 958 P.2d 525 (Colo. App. 1998).

A plaintiff is entitled to recovery in cases where the damages suffered are different in kind from those suffered by the general public, while a recovery is denied for those damages common to all. City of Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 36 P. 789 (1894).

The right disturbed must be a right enjoyed in connection with the property, not shared with the public generally, a right which gives it an additional value and by the disturbance of which the property itself is damaged. Harrison v. Denver City Tramway Co., 54 Colo. 593, 131 P. 409 (1913).

A nonabutting owner's right to recover has to rest upon an extension of the rule which permits recovery only when an owner can allege and prove special damage to his property which differs in kind, and not merely in degree, from that sustained by the public generally. The test is not whether the property abuts, but whether there is special injury. Radinsky v. City & County of Denver, 159 Colo. 134, 410 P.2d 644 (1966).

Where no compensable taking. Where a governmental entity has made no physical ouster of the owners from the property, and has not interfered in any way with the owners' power of disposition or use of the property, there has been no taking which would warrant compensation. Lipson v. Colo. State Dept. of Hwys., 41 Colo. App. 568, 588 P.2d 390 (1978); Colo. Springs v. Andersen Mahon Enters., 260 P.3d 29 (Colo. App. 2010).

Municipal ordinance which imposed reasonable limitations on billboards on private property, thereby requiring modification of said billboards, did not constitute a taking for which just compensation must be paid. Nat'l Adver. v. Bd. of Adjustment of City & County of Denver, 800 P.2d 1349 (Colo. App. 1990).

Seizure of property under tax lien is not a taking. An exercise of the power to assess and collect taxes is distinguishable from the power to take private property for a public use under this section. Burtkin Assocs. v. Tipton, 845 P.2d 525 (Colo. 1993).

Property owners are not entitled to obtain the highest and best use of their property or to gain maximum profits from its use. Van Sickle v. Boyes, 797 P.2d 1267 (Colo. 1990); Nat'l Adver. v. Bd. of Adjustment of City & County of Denver, 800 P.2d 1349 (Colo. App. 1990).

For purposes of calculating and modifying child support, trial court did not impermissibly interfere with husband's constitutional property rights by including in gross income an amount which a one-time post-decree inheritance could be expected to yield. In re Armstrong, 831 P.2d 501 (Colo. App. 1992).

Destruction of access to property compensable. The destruction or infringement of an easement or right of access appurtenant to a landowner's lots is a loss or damage different in kind from that suffered by the rest of the community, and for such damage compensation may be recovered under this section. City of Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 36 P. 789 (1894); Denver Union Term. Ry. v. Glodt, 67 Colo. 115, 186 P. 904 (1919); Minnequa Lumber Co. v. City & County of Denver, 67 Colo. 472, 186 P. 539 (1919).

Whatever permanently prevents the adjacent owner's free use of the street for ingress or egress to or from his lot, and whatever interference with the street permanently diminishes the value of his premises, is as much a damage to his private property as though some direct physical injury were inflicted thereon. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883); City of Denver v. Vernia, 8 Colo. 399, 8 P. 656 (1885).

Right of access to and from a general street system must be substantially impaired, not merely inconvenienced, by modification of the system. Hayutin v. Colo. State Dept. of Hwys., 175 Colo. 83, 485 P.2d 896, cert. denied, 404 U.S. 991, 92 S. Ct. 533, 30 L. Ed. 2d 542 (1971).

A landowner could not recover for any general inconvenience occasioned by a complete blockade of the intersection by railway cars; but for the special and peculiar damage shown by the loss of the intersection which was sole access to plaintiff's street, he is entitled to compensation. Jackson v. Kiel, 13 Colo. 378, 22 P. 504 (1889).

Under this section where a landowner has no fee in the land occupied as a highway, but his land abuts on it, and he has rights therein not shared in common with the general public for purposes of travel and use, a person using or appropriating such highway or a portion of it for other and different purposes than the one contemplated, whereby the highway is obstructed and impaired as a means of ingress and egress, is liable to the abutting owner for any consequential damages arising from such appropriation and use depreciating the value of the property. Town of Longmont v. Parker, 14 Colo. 386, 23 P. 443 (1890); Radinsky v. City & County of Denver, 159 Colo. 134, 410 P.2d 644 (1966).

The general rule is that an abutting landowner is entitled to compensation for limitation or loss of access only if the limitation or loss substantially interferes with his means of ingress and egress to and from his property. State Dept. of Hwys. v. Davis, 626 P.2d 661 (Colo. 1981).

But partial loss of access is not compensable if landowner retains reasonable means of access to and from his property. Troiano v. Colo. Dept. of Hwys., 170 Colo. 484, 463 P.2d 448 (1969); Thornton v. City of Colo. Springs, 173 Colo. 357, 478 P.2d 665 (1970); Shaklee v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 176 Colo. 559, 491 P.2d 1366 (1971).

When a landowner has free and convenient access to his property and the improvements on it and his means of egress and ingress are not substantially interfered with by a limitation of access, he has no cause for complaint, nor is he entitled to any compensation. Shaklee v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 176 Colo. 559, 491 P.2d 1366 (1971).

Factors to consider in determining whether or not there has been a compensable taking of access rights to a highway include whether the property is a single economic unit or consists of separate units with particular access needs, the use of the property, the location of improvements, the contiguity to the highway, the land's topography, and all pertinent characteristics of the property which may be relevant to its access needs. Shaklee v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 176 Colo. 559, 491 P.2d 1366 (1971).

The fact that a municipality may under its police power interfere to a certain extent with access to and from premises does not mean necessarily that such interference constitutes a "taking" for which under amendments 5 and 14, U.S. Const., and under § 25 of art. II, Colo. Const., and this section there must be compensation. Rather, to constitute such a taking there must be an unreasonable or substantial deprivation of access. City of Boulder v. Kahn's, Inc., 190 Colo. 90, 543 P.2d 711 (1975).

Determination whether access has been substantially impaired is question of law and, thus, subject to review on appeal. State Dept. of Hwys. v. Davis, 626 P.2d 661 (Colo. 1981).

Inconvenience of less direct route not compensable. The inconvenience to a lot owner in having to adopt a less direct route to reach certain points from the construction of a freeway interchange is an injury of the same kind as that suffered by the general public. Radinsky v. City & County of Denver, 159 Colo. 134, 410 P.2d 644 (1966).

Mere inconvenience and mere circuity of route necessary for access or egress occasioned by a public improvement are not compensable items of damage. Troiano v. Colo. Dept. of Hwys., 170 Colo. 484, 463 P.2d 448 (1969); Thornton v. City of Colo. Springs, 173 Colo. 357, 478 P.2d 665 (1970).

Where there is mere inconvenience resulting from a more circuitous route and from the diversion of traffic, diminution of value is not compensable. Thornton v. City of Colo. Springs, 173 Colo. 357, 478 P.2d 665 (1970).

Compensation is not permitted for damage caused by circuity of route where the properties involved were used for business purposes such as motels, restaurants, and gas stations, and where the inability of the traveling public to get to the property conveniently had, in effect, diminished the value of the business property. Troiano v. Colo. Dept. of Hwys., 170 Colo. 484, 463 P.2d 448 (1969).

There is not a "taking" where pedestrians are deprived of the right to approach establishments after alighting from a vehicle on street in front of or near the establishments. City of Boulder v. Kahn's, Inc., 190 Colo. 90, 543 P.2d 711 (1975).

In determining whether there has been substantial interference with a landowner's access, inconvenience caused by the required use of a more circuitous route to gain access to property does not constitute substantial impairment of access. State Dept. of Hwys. v. Davis, 626 P.2d 661 (Colo. 1981).

Nor limiting access to specific points. There is no taking of private property which would be subject to compensation when a landowner's access rights to a state highway are limited to two access points of his own choosing. Shaklee v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 176 Colo. 559, 491 P.2d 1366 (1971).

Access to a highway may not be unreasonably cut off without payment of compensation, but an owner is not entitled, as against the public, to access to his land at every point on the property line adjacent to the highway. Shaklee v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 176 Colo. 559, 491 P.2d 1366 (1971).

No right to compensation found in case in which one of two access points to the public streets is taken by condemnation. Per se rule requiring compensation whenever a landowner's access to a particular street is completely taken is rejected. Dept. of Hwys. v. Interstate-Denver West, 791 P.2d 1119 (Colo. 1990).

Nor paying additional ton-mile taxes because of longer routes. As to plaintiffs' contention that they will have to pay additional ton-mile taxes because of the longer routes they must now follow--this is an inconvenience to be borne by all alike who are in the reasonably defined class. Asphalt Paving Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 162 Colo. 254, 425 P.2d 289 (1967).

Nor loss of business value by diversion of traffic. When vehicular traffic was routed away from improvements and business and onto the new highway, and the old highway remained in existence and use, the damage to market value of the business property by diversion of traffic is not compensable. No person has a vested right in the maintenance of the public highway in any particular place. Troiano v. Colo. Dept. of Hwys., 170 Colo. 484, 463 P.2d 448 (1969).

Nor loss of view of property by public. Since a property owner has no right to have the traveling public pass his property, he has no right to have the traveling public afforded a clear view of his property. Loss of view from the property caused by the construction of a viaduct is not compensable. Troiano v. Colo. Dept. of Hwys., 170 Colo. 484, 463 P.2d 448 (1969).

Motorists' visibility of property not a compensable right. Because a landowner has no continued right to traffic passing the property, the landowner likewise has no right in the continued motorists' visibility of the property from a transit corridor. Dept. of Transp. v. Marilyn Hickey Ministries, 159 P.3d 111 (Colo. 2007).

Construction of solid median does not violate right of access to and use of the entire roadway of abutting landowners. Thornton v. City of Colo. Springs, 173 Colo. 357, 478 P.2d 665 (1970).

Purchaser of land with indirect access entitled to damages arising subsequent to sale. In an inverse condemnation action by a landowner against the board of county commissioners and department of highways alleging confiscation of its right of access to and from freeway, the reviewing court concluded that plaintiff bought the property in question subject to a burden of indirect access to freeway and cannot now recover compensation for loss of such direct access; rather, it is limited in its recovery to damages that have arisen since it acquired the property. Majestic Heights Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 173 Colo. 178, 476 P.2d 745 (1970).

Possible right to damages for change of street grade. Under this section a municipality is liable for consequential damages to the owner of a lot abutting on the street on account of the raising or lowering of the grade of the street where such change of grade is unreasonable or has been negligently made. Leiper v. City & County of Denver, 36 Colo. 110, 85 P. 849 (1906).

Under this section where the grade of a street is established by a city and abutting lot owners improve their property in conformity with the established grade, the city is liable for damage to such property caused by a subsequent change of the grade of the street. City of Denver v. Bonesteel, 30 Colo. 107, 69 P. 595 (1902).

Where a city unlawfully attempts to delegate authority to establish street grades, an abutting lot owner was entitled to damages to property caused by reducing the level of the street except for property on the city's right-of-way. Gidley v. City of Colo. Springs, 160 Colo. 482, 418 P.2d 291 (1966).

Use of street damaged by construction of railroad. The use of a street is a right of property in the abutting property owner, which if not "taken" is certainly "damaged", within the meaning of this section, by the act of a railroad company in building its road through that street. Mollandin v. Union Pac. Ry., 14 F. 394 (D. Colo. 1882).

Where liable for damage by licensed subway. A city is liable for injuries occasioned to private property by the construction of a subway, in a public street, which allows passage by the public under the tracks of a railway company. The fact that the railway company constructs the improvement under license of the city does not change the result. Where an improvement is made for the benefit of the public the cost incurred should be generally distributed. City of Colo. Springs v. Stark, 57 Colo. 384, 140 P. 794 (1914).

Vacation of highway does not deprive one who dedicated plats. One dedicating highways to the public by filing plats showing highways located thereon is not unconstitutionally deprived of its property by § 43-2-302 which provides that upon vacation of the highway the title shall vest in the abutting owner. Buell v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 205 F. Supp. 865 (D. Colo. 1962), aff'd, 321 F.2d 468 (10th Cir. 1963).

Excessive regulation deemed taking. While property may be regulated to a certain extent, if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Only when zoning is confiscatory does it rise to a "taking". Gold Run, Ltd. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 38 Colo. App. 44, 554 P.2d 317 (1976).

Zoning upheld where any reasonable or lawful use of property allowed. If the land in question is susceptible to any reasonable or lawful use under the classification imposed by a city, the ordinance will be allowed to stand. Bird v. City of Colo. Springs, 176 Colo. 32, 489 P.2d 324 (1971).

Proof that property was not suitable for any use under intermediate zoning categories must be had as a prerequisite to a determination that the property was being unconstitutionally confiscated. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Simmons, 177 Colo. 347, 494 P.2d 85 (1972).

Zoning ordinances or regulations will not be declared unreasonable and arbitrary unless plainly and palpably so, or if enforced the consequent restrictions will preclude the use of the property for any purpose to which it is reasonably adapted, and if the reasonableness thereof is fairly debatable such ordinance must be upheld. Bird v. City of Colo. Springs, 176 Colo. 32, 489 P.2d 324 (1971).

So zoning which precludes all reasonable uses invalid. To sustain an attack upon the validity of the ordinance an aggrieved property owner must show that if the ordinance is enforced the subsequent restrictions upon his property preclude its use for any purpose to which it is reasonably adapted. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961).

Where the plaintiffs offered no evidence to prove that it was not possible to use and develop the property for any or all of the uses enumerated in the city's zoning ordinance, there was no showing that the city's zoning deprived the plaintiffs of their property without just compensation, nor without due process.

Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

A zoning ordinance which amended the existing zoning and imposed a more restrictive classification on developers' property by changing the minimum lot size from one-half to two and one-half acres was held unconstitutional as applied to developers' property in that its enforcement would preclude the use of developers' property for any purpose to which it is reasonably adaptable and was therefore confiscatory. Trans-Robles Corp. v. City of Cherry Hills Vill., 30 Colo. App. 511, 497 P.2d 335 (1972), aff'd, 181 Colo. 356, 509 P.2d 797 (1973).

And restriction of legitimate, harmless use by zoning is deprivation. Where the provisions of a zoning ordinance do not deprive a party of title to his lots and do not oust him of possession, but do deprive him of the right to put his lots to a legitimate use which does not injure the public, without compensation or any provision therefor, the ordinance clearly deprives him of his property without compensation, and without due process of law. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Under no circumstances can an ordinance amending the zoning map in a way that would deprive the owner of all economic use be upheld. City of Fort Collins v. Dooney, 178 Colo. 25, 496 P.2d 316 (1972).

A city may not confiscate property under pretense of zoning. No power exists in a city to take private property for public use without compensation to the owner thereof, and it may not confiscate such property without compensation under the pretense of zoning. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Owner's rights are same whether action is by city council or by people acting directly. The constitutional rights of a property owner are the same whether zoning is denied or granted by the action of the elected representatives of the people (city council) or by the people acting directly by initiative or referendum. City of Fort Collins v. Dooney, 178 Colo. 25, 496 P.2d 316 (1972).

Effect of zoning ordinance on value of land for one use as compared with another not controlling. Accepting as a fact that land anywhere available for development for commercial purposes has a higher potential value than land restricted to residential use, the effect of the zoning ordinance on the value of plaintiffs' land for one use as compared to another is not the controlling or decisive factor. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961).

The fact that the plaintiff may have paid more than the land was worth under existing zoning in the hope of securing a zoning change is generally not a factor to be considered in the plaintiff's favor in analyzing a taking claim. Cottonwood Farms v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 763 P.2d 551 (Colo. 1988).

The fact that state action diminishes the value of private property, or that the diminution is quantifiable with certainty, does not by itself command compensation. Dept. of Hwys. v. Interstate-Denver West, 791 P.2d 1119 (Colo. 1990).

Off-street parking requirements are not per se unconstitutional as taking of property without just compensation. In these days of environmental concern, it is not unconstitutional to require those who invite large numbers of people to their establishments--who in turn clog the streets, air, and ears of the citizens--to provide parking facilities so that automobiles may be placed in a stall and stilled. Stroud v. City of Aspen, 188 Colo. 1, 532 P.2d 720 (1975).

Improvement district cannot be deprived of right it does not have. The taking of lots within improvement district by a housing authority and releasing them from the liens of the district's tax claims was no violation of the fifth amendment of the federal constitution, or this section, as the property which it is said was taken without compensation was a right to tax which the law never gave them. Moffat Tunnel Imp. Dist. v. Hous. Auth., 109 Colo. 357, 125 P.2d 138 (1942).

Sale of public utility's facilities constitutes taking. The public utility commission may order the lines frozen to present customers. But to order the sale of facilities would constitute a taking of property without just compensation. Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Home Light & Power Co., 163 Colo. 72, 428 P.2d 928 (1967).

Condemnation of easement entitles owners to compensation for the easement and damages to the residue of their property. Madis v. Higginson, 164 Colo. 320, 434 P.2d 705 (1967).

But conveyance of easement was not taking. The limitation on plaintiffs' use of their property was brought about by their own voluntary act in giving the easement for the dam, rather than by the zoning ordinances. They gave the easement with complete knowledge of what uses they were giving up by making the conveyance and resulting damages to the residue. Madis v. Higginson, 164 Colo. 320, 434 P.2d 705 (1967).

Channeling water so as to overflow land not taking. The channeling of water from a higher area to a place contiguous to the land of the plaintiffs so as to overflow on the land of the plaintiffs does not constitute a taking within this constitutional provision. City of Englewood v. Linkenheil, 146 Colo. 493, 362 P.2d 186 (1961).

Flooding preventable at property owner's expense is not taking. No private property was "taken" when a county, at the request of property owners, designed and graded streets that resulted in some flooding of plaintiff's home, because there was neither a change in the use of the streets, nor a new appropriation of private property; and flooding which can be prevented at the expense of adjustments to the property by the property owner does not constitute a taking. Kratzenstein v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 674 P.2d 1009 (Colo. App. 1983).

Water leaking from a municipal water system storage tank into groundwater, saturating the soil, and causing damage to the foundation of an adjacent building does not effect a taking because the leakage was not a direct, natural, or probable result of locating and operating a water storage tank where the tanks were located but instead an incidental and consequential injury inflicted by the municipality's operation of the water tanks. Trinity Broad. of Denver, Inc. v. City of Westminster, 848 P.2d 916 (Colo. 1993).

No triable issue of fact in inverse condemnation claim where building owner claimant failed to show any evidence that municipality intended to act, or refused to act, in such a way that the natural consequence of its acts would result in a taking of claimant's media center because municipality's water saturated the soil beneath the building. Trinity Broad. of Denver, Inc. v. City of Westminster, 848 P.2d 916 (Colo. 1993).

Construction of drainage pipe not a taking. There was no taking of property by implementation of floodway restrictions after construction of underground flood control drainage pipe, where there was no flooding of property from time pipe was completed to time of trial, pipe resulted in thirty percent reduction of flood restrictions on property, only change in use of property was reduction of restrictions in favor of owners, and there was no new appropriation of private property. Morrison v. City of Aurora, 745 P.2d 1042 (Colo. App. 1987).

But diversion resulting in pollution of water compensable damage. When the game and fish commission diverted water from a creek and channeled it through a hatchery where it was so polluted as to render it unfit for the purposes to which it had theretofore been applied by plaintiffs, plaintiffs' property rights therein were destroyed or seriously damaged. Farmers Irrigation Co. v. Game & Fish Comm'n, 149 Colo. 318, 369 P.2d 557 (1962).

Confiscation of excess water. Strict application of the "used and useful" rule of water appropriation might operate to confiscate a utility's property without just compensation where the utility reasonably acquired excess water to guarantee future needs. Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Northwest Water Corp., 168 Colo. 154, 451 P.2d 266 (1969).

A decree of abandonment of a water right is not a taking because water rights are usufructuary in nature. In re Revised Abandonment List, 2012 CO 35, 276 P.3d 571.

A valid state engineer well curtailment order is not a taking because a water right is always subject to the rights of senior water right owners and there is no compensable right to injure other vested water rights. Allowing the wells to divert without the depletions being replaced by a valid plan for augmentation or substitute water supply plan would injure other vested water rights. The fact that the wells' priority predates the 1969 water right adjudication legislation is irrelevant because the wells have always been subject to the constitution's provisions on prior appropriation. Kobobel v. State, 249 P.3d 1127 (Colo. 2011).

Self-inflicted hardship doctrine does not invariably prevent an owner who purchased property with knowledge of applicable zoning regulations from subsequently attacking the validity of those regulations on the ground that they effect an unconstitutional taking of the property. Cottonwood Farms v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 763 P.2d 551 (Colo. 1988).

To show damage in a case for inverse condemnation plaintiff must show legal interference that substantially impairs his use or possession of the property and physical ouster is not necessary. City's unauthorized drilling and subsequent unauthorized and erroneous report on the coal content of plaintiff's land severely diminished the price plaintiff could get for his land and therefore constituted a taking by the city. Grynberg v. City of Northglenn, 829 P.2d 473 (Colo. App. 1991), rev'd on other grounds, 846 P.2d 175 (Colo. 1993).

Taking occurs when the actions of a governmental subdivision, in excluding a private competitor from the market, reduces a person's business to worthlessness. Clare v. Florissant Water & Sanitation Dist., 879 P.2d 471 (Colo. App. 1994).

If business owner's equipment or physical property cannot be removed from the exclusive service area of a special district where the business owner may no longer compete, the district has, as a practical matter, condemned those facilities. Clare v. Florissant Water & Sanitation Dist., 879 P.2d 471 (Colo. App. 1994).

Absent a physical invasion into the airspace above property that is below the navigable airspace, there can be no physical taking. Claassen v. City & County of Denver, 30 P.3d 710 (Colo. App. 2000).

Temporary limitation or interim regulation on property use, resulting from the otherwise good faith, reasonable institution of a moratorium in order to bring about effective governmental decision making does not result in a categorical taking. Williams v. City of Central, 907 P.2d 701 (Colo. App. 1995).

In determining whether a temporary, non-categorical taking entitles the owner to compensation, the court must consider the character of the challenged governmental action, its economic impact, and the extent to which the regulation has interfered with the reasonable investment-backed expectations of the landowner. Williams v. City of Central, 907 P.2d 701 (Colo. App. 1995).

Application of city ordinance requiring relocation underground of overhead electricity and communications facilities by owners and operators at their own cost did not constitute a taking of telecommunications provider's property where its franchise was subject to the city's reasonable exercise of police power and to future regulations governing the location of the provider's facilities in the interest of the public health and welfare. U S West Commc'ns v. City of Longmont, 924 P.2d 1071 (Colo. App. 1995), aff'd on other grounds, 948 P.2d 509 (Colo. 1997).

The application of the amended Colorado exemption limits set forth in § 13-54-102 to a loan and security agreement that was entered into prior to the enactment of the amended exemption statute does not constitute an unconstitutional "taking" of the loan collateral under the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution and the constitution of the state of Colorado. The property interest impairment arises from a valid state regulation and does not rise to the level of a taking requiring just compensation. In re Larsen, 260 B.R. 174 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2001).

The public utilities commission's award of attorney fees was not quasi-legislative, did not have an unreasonable economic impact, and did not interfere with any reasonable economic expectation; therefore, the award was not a taking. Lake Durango Water Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 67 P.3d 12 (Colo. 2003).

IV. JUST COMPENSATION.

A. Measure of Compensation.

Provision for just compensation was designed for benefit of landowner and should be construed so as to give him its benefit to the full extent. Keller v. Miller, 63 Colo. 304, 165 P. 774 (1917).

Primary objective of condemnation proceedings is to satisfy the constitutional guaranty of just compensation and damages to the owner of private property taken for public use. Denver Joint Stock Land Bank v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 105 Colo. 366, 98 P.2d 283 (1940).

General assembly may provide manner of determining compensation due. When the right to take is asserted and adjudged, the question of compensation, a matter entirely independent of the right, still remains for determination. The general assembly may provide under what circumstances and in what manner this compensation shall be determined. Colo. Midland Ry. v. Jones, 29 F. 193 (D. Colo. 1886).

Similar rules in damage suits and condemnation proceedings. This section is inseparably connected with the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and in suits for damages similar rules and tests, so far as applicable, should be applied as in condemnation proceedings. Middelkamp v. Bessemer Irrigating Co., 46 Colo. 102, 103 P. 280 (1909).

But not necessarily measure of damages. Plaintiffs, in demanding relief in the form of damages covering the loss sustained by them, are not forced to accept the measure of damages usually applicable to a condemnation case. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

Public should make good loss to individual occasioned by public improvement. Under this section when it became necessary to inflict damage upon private property in connection with public improvements, the public should make good the loss to the individual. City of Ft. Collins v. Wallace, 23 Colo. App. 452, 130 P. 69 (1913).

Owner entitled to just, not token, compensation. Under this section it is not token that the landowner is entitled to receive; it is just compensation. Swift v. Smith, 119 Colo. 126, 201 P.2d 609 (1948).

General rule is that assessment of damages should include all damages arising to the owner of land from any and every physical effect produced by the construction and use of the canal, if constructed according to the provisions of the statute and with proper care and skill, whether they are damages to be clearly seen and easily estimated, or are uncertain and of doubtful result (except such as result from its negligent construction or use). Middelkamp v. Bessemer Irrigating Co., 46 Colo. 102, 103 P. 280 (1909).

Just compensation equals value of the loss sustained. The just compensation required by this section to be made to the owner is the loss sustained by him by the appropriation. He is entitled to receive the value of what he has been deprived of, and nothing more. Alexander v. City & County of Denver, 51 Colo. 140, 116 P. 342 (1911).

The measure of compensation is the actual diminution in the market value of the premises, for any use to which they may reasonably be put, occasioned by the construction and operation of the railroad through the adjacent street. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

While the authorities differ as to the rule for the ascertainment of damages due to damaged property rights under varying circumstances, it is everywhere admitted that the rule to be applied should be such as will enable the jury to determine, as near as may be, the actual loss suffered. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

The phrase "just compensation" as applied to eminent domain has been commonly defined as payment to the owner of the fair and reasonable market value of his property. Leadville Water Co. v. Parkville Water Dist., 164 Colo. 362, 436 P.2d 659 (1967).

Not value to taker. In a condemnation action the question is, what has the owner lost, not what has the taker gained. Thus value to the taker, or to his neighbors, must be rejected as the measure of compensation. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 195, 363 P.2d 171 (1961).

When a portion of a landowner's property is taken for public use, just compensation includes payment for the portion actually taken and compensation for injury to the remainder of the property. La Plata Elec. Ass'n v. Cummings, 728 P.2d 696 (Colo. 1986); E-470 Pub. Hwy. Auth. v. 455 Co., 983 P.2d 149 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd, 3 P.3d 18 (Colo. 2000); Story v. Bly, 217 P.3d 872 (Colo. App. 2008), aff'd, 241 P.3d 529 (Colo. 2010).

Market value ordinarily means the price the property would bring if sold in the open market under ordinary and usual circumstances, for cash, assuming that the owner is willing to sell and the purchaser willing to buy, but neither under any obligation to do so. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 195, 363 P.2d 171 (1961).

Major factors to be considered in determining market value of real estate in condemnation proceedings are: (a) A view of the premises and their surroundings; (b) a description of the physical characteristics of the property and its situation in relation to points of importance in the neighborhood; (c) the price at which the land was bought, if sufficiently recent to throw light on present value; (d) the price at which similar neighboring land has sold at about the time of the taking; (e) the opinion of competent experts; (f) a consideration of the uses for which the land is adapted and for which it is available; (g) the cost of the improvements if they are such as to increase the value of the land; and (h) the net income from the land, if the property is devoted to one of the uses to which it could be most advantageously and profitably applied. United States v. 25.02 Acres of Land, More or Less, 495 F.2d 1398 (10th Cir. 1974).

If there exists a reasonable probability that land taken by a condemning authority would have been rezoned in the future, so that land could later have been devoted to uses that present zoning would not allow, such probability would likely affect the present value that a willing seller and a willing buyer would place upon the property. As such, the probability of rezoning may be considered by the commissioners insofar as it would reasonably be reflected in present market value. Stark v. Poudre Sch. Dist. R-1, 192 Colo. 396, 560 P.2d 77 (1977); Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

In applying this rule, it is improper to evaluate the subject property by assuming that the subject property is not presently subject to pertinent use restrictions. Rather, it is only to the extent that the prospect of future additional uses for the property has an influence upon its present market value that such prospect is relevant. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

If a condemning authority takes a permanent interest in the property, the transaction resembles the sale of an interest in the property. In such cases, the value of the estate transferred may be influenced, in part, by the probability that the transferee will be able to use the property in the future for purposes for which it cannot presently be used. In contrast, a temporary taking of a parcel resembles the creation of a leasehold interest in the condemning authority more than it does the conveyance of a permanent estate to it. Consequently, the standard that should be used in determining the compensation due an owner for a temporary taking is the fair rental value of the property during the time the condemning authority possessed it. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Evidence that the floodplain restrictions in effect during the time of the temporary taking of the subject parcel might be removed sometime in the future could have no impact upon the parcel's fair rental value during the time of possession. Accordingly, evidence with respect to this subject should not have been considered for any purpose in determining the proper compensation to be paid to the owner for the temporary taking of the parcel. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Evidence of sales of comparable property. In determining the fair market value of real property in condemnation, i.e., that which an owner willing, but not compelled to sell, will take, and what a buyer willing, but not compelled to buy, will give for such property, the best evidence is found in sales of comparable property within a reasonable time before the taking. United States v. 25.02 Acres of Land, More or Less, 495 F.2d 1398 (10th Cir. 1974).

Fair compensation in condemnation cases does not include speculative values either lowering or raising the compensation to be paid. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 195, 363 P.2d 171 (1961).

Just compensation cannot include any increment arising from the very fact of acquisition of the subject property. If the land were sold in the open market under ordinary and usual circumstances, factors relating to public acquisition would have to be excluded from consideration. In such a case there would be no condemnation at issue. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 195, 363 P.2d 171 (1961).

And goodwill and profits are not regarded as elements of just compensation under either the due process or just compensation clauses of the federal and state constitutions. Auraria Businessmen Against Confiscation, Inc. v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 183 Colo. 441, 517 P.2d 845 (1974).

"Just compensation" includes payment of costs. The phrase "just compensation" in this section has been interpreted to mean not only payment to the owner of the market value of his property, but also payment of his costs. Denver Urban Renewal Auth. v. Hayutin, 40 Colo. App. 559, 583 P.2d 296 (1978).

The loss sustained to property rights which have been damaged by the state necessarily includes out-of-pocket expenses incurred by those suffering the damage in an effort to avoid the consequences of the defendants' acts resulting in the loss. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

In condemnation proceedings, the landowner is entitled to compensation for all reasonable costs incurred. Expenses necessarily incurred by reason of the litigation are correctly viewed as such costs. City of Colo. Springs v. Berl, 658 P.2d 280 (Colo. App. 1982).

And inconvenience factors are elements of damage. The inconvenience, discomfort and annoyance occasioned by the pollution of the domestic water supply of various of the plaintiffs is a factor to be taken into consideration by the trial court. The trial court should make a reasonable allowance on account of the foregoing elements of damage. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

Property owner is entitled to additional compensation for physical damage to surface of parcel that was temporarily taken. Absent special circumstances, it is the difference in market value and not the cost of restoration that is the proper measure for compensation. A court may deviate from this standard if conditions exist that would render the award of compensation under this standard unfair or inappropriate. However, any court authorizing such a deviation must be careful to assure that the damages awarded are not a windfall to the landowner and, in any case, must articulate the reasons for its decision so as to facilitate effective appellate review. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 992 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd, 17 P.3d 797 (Colo. 2001).

Where the damage done was susceptible to repair at a reasonably certain cost based on bids placed into evidence, the owner was entitled to the amount awarded by the jury upon such evidence. Fowler Irrevocable Trust 1992-1 v. City of Boulder, 17 P.3d 797

(Colo. 2001).

But attorney fees are not allowed as costs in condemnation actions, and in such cases, are not an element of just compensation. Denver Urban Renewal Auth. v. Hayutin, 40 Colo. App. 559, 583 P.2d 296 (1978).

Nor expenses incurred presenting case. "Costs", as an element of just compensation, includes only those items usually taxed as costs and does not include any and all expenses which an owner may see fit to incur in preparing for and in presenting his side of the case. Denver Urban Renewal Auth. v. Hayutin, 40 Colo. App. 559, 583 P.2d 296 (1978).

Failure to compensate where imminent necessity. When property is taken by the state or one of its political subdivisions under circumstances of imminent necessity, the failure justly to compensate the owner does not violate this section. Srb v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 43 Colo. App. 14, 601 P.2d 1082 (1979).

State highway department held to have discharged its obligation. Where the state highway department paid into court the amount of an award in condemnation proceedings, it discharged its obligation and was relieved of further responsibility for an unpaid city tax lien assessed for the creation of a local public improvement district. Southworth v. Dept. of Hwys., 176 Colo. 82, 489 P.2d 204 (1971).

Extent of coal reserves prior to city's unauthorized drilling and subsequent unauthorized erroneous report which severely diminished the value of those reserves and what a willing purchaser would have paid for the property at the time it was damaged was proper measure of damages. Grynberg v. City of Northglenn, 829 P.2d 473 (Colo. App. 1991).

Requiring owners of condemned land to pay the city's costs under the offer of settlement provision of § 13-17-202 violates the owners' constitutional right to just compensation as determined by a jury or board of commissioners. City of Westminster v. Hart, 928 P.2d 758 (Colo. App. 1996).

All evidence relevant to the determination of the present market value of condemned property is admissible, including evidence of the most advantageous potential future use of the entire property, even if the condemned property would need to be dedicated as part of annexation and rezoning of the entire property in the future. Palizzi v. City of Brighton, 228 P.3d 957 (Colo. 2010).

Evidence of the value of the condemned portion as a part of the whole is admissible and should be evaluated by the fact finder when determining just compensation. Palizzi v. City of Brighton, 228 P.3d 957 (Colo. 2010).

Trial court erred in excluding estimate of the construction cost of a new driveway as evidence relevant to the determination of the value of a nonexclusive access easement over an existing driveway, but failure to admit such evidence was not an abuse of discretion warranting reversal of the trial court's decision where it could not be said with fair assurance that the error substantially influenced the jury's determination of easement value or impaired the basic fairness of the trial. Bly v. Story, 241 P.3d 529 (Colo. 2010).

B. Procedure.

Procedure not limitation on protection. The first sentence of this section prohibiting taking or damaging of private property without just compensation is in no way limited by the following provisions which prescribe the procedure in the appropriation of private property to a public use. Bd. of Comm'rs v. Adler, 69 Colo. 290, 194 P. 621 (1920).

Constitutional objections to eminent domain proceedings should be raised in those proceedings and be determined by the court in limine and not by way of a collateral injunction proceeding. Auraria Businessmen Against Confiscation, Inc. v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 183 Colo. 441, 517 P.2d 845 (1974).

This section is consent by state to bringing of suits against county, for damages to property incurred by the construction of county projects. Bd. of Comm'rs v. Adler, 69 Colo. 290, 194 P. 621 (1920).

But not consent to suit against state. While this section imposes a liability on the state for an uncompensated injury or taking, it does not constitute a consent by the state to a suit against it to enforce such liability and such consent is not given by the eminent domain authority of the state highway board under § 43-1-208. Colo. ex rel. Watrous v. District Court of United States, 207 F.2d 50 (10th Cir. 1953).

Right of action not taken away by governmental immunity. A "right of action" cannot be unconstitutionally taken away or damaged by the application of sovereign immunity to a tort claim, since there is no "right" in the absence of a statute granting such. Abeyta v. City & County of Denver, 165 Colo. 58, 437 P.2d 67 (1968).

As just compensation clause creates exception to doctrine of governmental immunity. Srb v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 43 Colo. App. 14, 601 P.2d 1082 (1979).

Individual or agency inflicting damage responsible for loss. Whosoever damages the property of another, whether he be an individual or an agency of the state, must be held responsible in damages for the loss caused thereby. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

If, in the execution of any power, no matter what it is, the government, federal or state, finds it necessary to take private property for public use, it must obey the constitutional injunction to make or secure just compensation to the owner. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Board of directors of an irrigation district must pay for all lands acquired under the authority of § 37-41-114. San Luis Valley Irrigation Dist. v. Noffsinger, 85 Colo. 202, 274 P. 827 (1929).

Unlawful taking not act of state. When a state agency enters upon land or injures land within the meaning of this section without paying just compensation therefor, or without having commenced condemnation proceedings to ascertain the compensation due for the taking or injury, the act of the state agency is unauthorized and unlawful and is not the act of the state of Colorado. Colo. ex rel. Watrous v. District Court of United States, 207 F.2d 50 (10th Cir. 1953).

And remedy lies against individual state officer. The remedy in Colorado for an unauthorized and unlawful taking or injury of private land for public use without compensation by a state agency is against the state officer, individually, to prevent his unlawful act or for appropriate redress if it has been consummated. Colo. ex rel. Watrous v. District Court of United States, 207 F.2d 50 (10th Cir. 1953).

Action lies despite claim of immunity. Notwithstanding a claim of sovereign immunity from a suit for damages resulting from the torts of agents of the state, upon a showing that the water rights of plaintiffs had been taken or damaged by the game and fish commission through pollution of the water, plaintiffs were entitled to relief in the form of "just compensation" for the property so taken or damaged, and to injunctive relief against a continuance thereof. Farmers Irrigation Co. v. Game & Fish Comm'n, 149 Colo. 318, 369 P.2d 557 (1962).

Action for damages for taking of property right is personal to owner for the property in question, unless it is specifically assigned to the grantee of the property. Majestic Heights Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 173 Colo. 178, 476 P.2d 745 (1970).

The right to compensation for the value of land taken and damages to the residue is a personal one belonging to the owner which does not pass by deed, and where there is no evidence that purchaser ever acquired such right by assignment from the owner, he takes the land in the condition it was in when he acquired title and his right in this action is limited to the damages, if any, which have since accrued. Majestic Heights Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 173 Colo. 178, 476 P.2d 745 (1970); Enke v. City of Greeley, 31 Colo. App. 337, 504 P.2d 1112 (1972).

But change of form of res does not affect rights of owner. In a condemnation proceeding when the condemnor pays the amount of the award for the condemned property into the registry of the court, the change of the form of the res from property to money does not affect the relative rights of the owner and other claimants in the res. Southworth v. Dept. of Hwys., 176 Colo. 82, 489 P.2d 204 (1971).

For injuries to property of abutting landowners, single recovery can be had for the whole damage to result from the act. City of Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 P. 6 (1883).

Jury or board of commissioners must ascertain damages. By the terms of this section the compensation for taking or damaging private property against the owner's consent must be ascertained by a jury or board of commissioners; this requirement is imperative, and the general assembly is powerless to dispense with it. Trippe v. Overacker, 7 Colo. 72, 1 P. 695 (1883).

But party cannot have damages assessed by both. Under this section and the eminent domain act, defendant in an eminent domain proceeding is not entitled to have his damages assessed twice, first by a commission, and then by a jury. Where a jury trial is allowed, it is in lieu of an assessment of damages by a commission. Snider v. Town of Platteville, 75 Colo. 589, 227 P. 548 (1924).

Stipulation reserving compensable nature of property for determination by court and board of commissioners. Where urban renewal authority elects to enter into a stipulation which reserves for determination by a court and board of commissioners the compensable nature of property, it could not now complain that the award of compensation was made in proceedings conducted consistent with that stipulation. Denver Urban Renewal Auth. v. Steiner Am. Corp., 31 Colo. App. 125, 500 P.2d 983 (1972).

Provision for jury at request of party other than owner would contravene express terms of section. Southwestern Land Co. v. Hickory Jackson Ditch Co., 18 Colo. 489, 33 P. 275 (1893).

Jury of freeholders held not waived. Where, although the owner of property involved in a condemnation proceeding requested merely a "jury of six" and the trial court attempted to qualify the jury as freeholders, a juror did not hear the question and thus it was not discovered that he was not a freeholder, there is no waiver of a jury made up of freeholders. The case must be retried before a properly constituted jury. State Dept. of Hwys. v. Ogden, 638 P.2d 832 (Colo. App. 1981).

Landowners waived constitutional right to have just compensation determined by a jury of freeholders. Having agreed to entry of directed verdict and to dismiss jury before any valuation evidence could be considered by it, landowners waived their constitutional rights to have a jury determine just compensation for their properties. Sinclair Transp. Co. v. Sandberg, 228 P.3d 198 (Colo. App. 2009), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Larson v. Sinclair Transp. Co., 2012 CO 36, 284 P.3d 42.

Party seeking to condemn property must pay costs of ascertaining damages. If the parties cannot agree upon the amount of just compensation, it must be ascertained in the manner provided by law. The duty of ascertaining the amount is necessarily cast upon the party seeking to condemn the property, and he should pay all the expenses which attach to the process. Any law which casts this burden upon the owner should be held to be unconstitutional and void. Keller v. Miller, 63 Colo. 304, 165 P. 774 (1917); Southwestern Land Co. v. Hickory Jackson Ditch Co., 18 Colo. 489, 33 P. 275 (1893).

An owner whose property is sought to be taken cannot be required to pay any portion of his reasonable costs necessarily incidental to the trial of the issues on his part, or any part of the costs of the plaintiff; for to require him to do this would reduce the just compensation awarded by the jury by a sum equal to that paid by him for such costs. Dolores No. 2 Land & Canal Co. v. Hartman, 17 Colo. 138, 29 P. 378 (1891); Keller v. Miller, 63 Colo. 304, 165 P. 774 (1917); Leadville Water Co. v. Parkville Water Dist., 164 Colo. 362, 436 P.2d 659 (1967).

This section guarantees the owner a jury trial for ascertaining the value of the land taken and the damages to the residue, and if any part of such costs is taxed to him, his just compensation will be reduced equal to the amount he has to pay out for a jury, and that amounts to depriving him to that extent of the guaranteed just compensation. Wassenich v. City & County of Denver, 67 Colo. 456, 186 P. 533 (1919); Dept. of Hwys. v. Kelley, 151 Colo. 517, 379 P.2d 386 (1963).

But attorney fees not recoverable as costs. The constitution clearly covers only the class of expenses usually taxed as costs. Attorney fees do not fall within that category. Dolores No. 2 Land & Canal Co. v. Hartman, 17 Colo. 138, 29 P. 378 (1891); Leadville Water Co. v. Parkville Water Dist., 164 Colo. 362, 436 P.2d 659 (1967); City of Holyoke v. Schlachter Farms R.L.L.P., 22 P.3d 960 (Colo. App. 2001).

Attorney fees are not included within the meaning of "costs" as applied to this section and are not recoverable in eminent domain proceedings. Dept. of Hwys. v. Intermountain Term. Co., 164 Colo. 354, 435 P.2d 391 (1967).

Adding interest to sum found by jury. When there is nothing in the record from which it can be definitely ascertained that the jury did not take into consideration the question of interest in fixing the amount of their verdict in a condemnation proceeding, even if no instructions in regard to interest were given, the supreme court cannot add interest to the sum found by the jury and the refusal to do so does not contravene this section. Fishel v. City & County of Denver, 106 Colo. 576, 108 P.2d 236 (1940).

Compensation must be made in money. This section and the eminent domain act contemplate a compensation in money to one whose lands are condemned for railroad purposes. Burlington & C. R. R. v. Schweikart, 10 Colo. 178, 14 P. 329 (1887).

This section contemplates compensation to the landowner in money. That is conclusive upon the courts. Great W. Ry. v. Ackroyd, 44 Colo. 454, 98 P. 726 (1908).

Application of § 40-9.5-204, which sets forth a formula for compensating a cooperative electric association whose service territory is taken by a municipality does not violate this section. Such section simply provides a jury under this section with parameters for determining just compensation. Poudre Valley Rural Elec. v. Loveland, 807 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1991).

Judgment for assessment of damages in condemnation proceedings is final and conclusive, and the owner of the land cannot maintain a subsequent action for damages which should have been, but were not, considered or assessed by the jury. Middelkamp v. Bessemer Irrigating Co., 46 Colo. 102, 103 P. 280 (1909).

Money to be paid or deposited before property disturbed. Until the compensation ascertained in one of the two ways provided shall have been first paid or deposited, the title or proprietary rights of the owner cannot be divested, nor can the property be needlessly disturbed. McClain v. People, 9 Colo. 190, 11 P. 85 (1886).

The owner is entitled to receive compensation for property taken for public use before his property is taken or his possession disturbed. Keller v. Miller, 63 Colo. 304, 165 P. 774 (1917).

Although prior payment unnecessary if disturbance necessary. The insertion of the provision relating to needless disturbances of property in this section is a recognition of the fact that there may be needful disturbances thereof; also that such needful disturbances may take place without the prior payment or deposit of compensation ascertained in one of the two methods designated. McClain v. People, 9 Colo. 190, 193, 11 P. 85 (1886).

And necessity determined by general assembly. As to what needful disturbances are, the constitution is silent; therefore the duty of naming them must have been left with the general assembly to recognize, in some general way, a class or classes of disturbances which might be needful in particular cases. McClain v. People, 9 Colo. 190, 11 P. 85 (1886).

Thus statutes may validly provide for preliminary possession of property. San Luis Land, Canal & Imp. Co. v. Kenilworth Canal Co., 3 Colo. App. 244, 32 P. 860 (1893).

Under § 38-1-105(6) the general assembly has determined that, in some instances, the occupancy and use of premises by petitioner, pending condemnation proceedings, may be needful disturbances, within the meaning of the constitution. The exclusive possession and enjoyment of property are undoubtedly "proprietary rights"; but by this statute these rights are not "divested"--they are merely suspended. Every disturbance of property almost of necessity involves the interference with some proprietary right--in many cases the temporary suspension thereof. McClain v. People, 9 Colo. 190, 11 P. 85 (1886).

But court has discretion in particular cases. The use of the word "needlessly" in § 38-1-105 providing for preliminary possession, implies an investigation of some sort. A disturbance which in one case might be deemed needful, in another might, with equal propriety, be adjudged needless. But it is clearly impossible for the general assembly to sit in judgment upon each particular case, and ascertain whether or not the various disturbances sought are needful. While that body has determined that a preliminary possession and use may be a needful disturbance, it has delegated to certain courts, and the judges thereof, the duty of passing upon this question in particular cases as they arise. The statutory expression in section 38-1-105(6) that "the court by rule, may authorize the petitioner to take possession", confers upon the court a discretionary power; and the word

"may" does not mean "shall". McClain v. People, 9 Colo. 190, 11 P. 85 (1886).

Injunction improper where damages provide adequate remedy. Courts will not enjoin the vacation of a street until an abutting property owner has been compensated for his damage for loss of access where access is available by another public road, such owner having an adequate remedy at law for damages. City of Colo. Springs v. Crumb, 148 Colo. 32, 364 P.2d 1053 (1961).

Or where possession before payment authorized. Where the only property right which will be impaired by vacation of a street is the easement or right of ingress and egress to and from an abutting owner's premises, the abutting owner cannot enjoin the vacation merely because damages are not compensated in advance, if the city be acting under sufficient legislative municipal authority. City of Colo. Springs v. Crumb, 148 Colo. 32, 364 P.2d 1053 (1961).

Injunctive relief is an appropriate remedy to prevent pollution and contamination of stream to the injury of appropriators of water from that stream. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

Mandamus will not lie to compel bringing of condemnation proceedings by state agency for the unauthorized act of the state agency in taking or injuring property without the payment of compensation therefor and without first bringing condemnation proceedings to determine the amount of compensation due, because to do so would be to require the state to take affirmative action in the exercise of its sovereign power of eminent domain. Colo. ex rel. Watrous v. District Court of United States, 207 F.2d 50 (10th Cir. 1953).

Burden of proof. In order for plaintiff to be compensated for loss of access it was incumbent upon her to establish to the satisfaction of the trial court that she no longer retains a reasonable means of access to and from her property and the general system of public streets. The property owner has the burden of proof with regard to establishing the existence of damages and the amount of compensation therefor. Troiano v. Colo. Dept. of Hwys., 170 Colo. 484, 463 P.2d 448 (1969).

In order for there to be a taking, the burden rests upon the landowner to show that he has been deprived of all reasonable uses of his land. Bird v. City of Colo. Springs, 176 Colo. 32, 489 P.2d 324 (1971).

Burden rests upon the owner to establish by competent evidence his right to substantial compensation. United States v. 25.02 Acres of Land, More or Less, 495 F.2d 1398 (10th Cir. 1974).

Where a solid median strip across a roadway has been constructed, in order to be compensated for loss of access to the roadway, a claimant must establish that a reasonable means of access to and from her property no longer exists. Thornton v. City of Colo. Springs, 173 Colo. 357, 478 P.2d 665 (1970).

Zoning ordinances, like other legislative enactments, are presumed to be valid, and anyone alleging the invalidity of a zoning ordinance has the burden of proving it beyond a reasonable doubt. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Simmons, 177 Colo. 347, 494 P.2d 85 (1972).

Burden not met. Where contentions regarding the actions of a zoning board were debatable and where there was no showing that the property was not suitable for use under intermediate zoning categories, the burden of proving the invalidity of a zoning ordinance beyond a reasonable doubt was not met. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Simmons, 177 Colo. 347, 494 P.2d 85 (1972).

Passage of initiated measure amending a city charter by requiring voter approval of location and siting of preparole facility did not divest developers of vested property right but suspended the developer's unqualified fulfillment of that right pending an affirmative vote of the county electorate. Villa at Greeley, Inc. v. Hopper, 917 P.2d 350 (Colo. App. 1996

Section 16. Criminal prosecutions - rights of defendant. In criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to appear and defend in person and by counsel; to demand the nature and cause of the accusation; to meet the witnesses against him face to face; to have process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed.

Editor's note: In a United States supreme court case (Escobedo v. State of Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 84 S. Ct. 1758, 12 L. Ed. 2d 977 (1964)) the court held that "where the investigation is no longer a matter of general inquiry into an unsolved crime, but has begun to focus on a particular suspect, the suspect has been taken into police custody, the police carry out a process of interrogations that lends itself to incriminating statements, the suspect has requested and been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer and the police have not effectively warned him of his absolute constitutional right to remain silent" such suspect had been denied his constitutional rights and his confession was not admissible.

In Washington v. People, 158 Colo. 115, 405 P.2d 735 (1965), the Colorado supreme court held the Escobedo case did not apply where accused made a voluntary confession to a friend prior to police interrogation as the Escobedo case was concerned with police tactics during interrogation.

In Ruark v. People, 158 Colo. 110, 405 P.2d 751 (1965), the Colorado supreme court held the Escobedo case did not apply retrospectively to entitle one to relief in case that had been previously decided.

Annotator's notes. (1) In People v. Parada, 188 Colo. 230, 533 P.2d 1121 (1975), the Colorado supreme court determined that the United States supreme court, in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 694 (1966), substituted a "custodial interrogation" requirement for the "focus of the investigation" test which had been enunciated in the Escobedo case.

This section is congruent to the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution. Lucero v. People, 173 Colo. 94, 476 P.2d 257 (1970).

Defendant's guilty plea was unconstitutional since he was illiterate, was told by the interpreter to sign the plea advisement form without having it read to him, had difficulty hearing the interpreter during the plea hearing, was pro se, and lacked the knowledge or understanding of the criminal justice system and process. The guilty plea was not made based on a voluntary and intelligent choice among alternative courses of action. Sanchez-Martinez v. People, 250 P.3d 1248 (Colo. 2011).

The terms "criminal prosecution" and "criminal cases", as used in the constitution, refer to cases which, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, were recognized as criminal or cases which are thereafter made criminal by statute. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

This section does not apply to contempt proceedings either of a civil or criminal nature. Wyatt v. People, 17 Colo. 252, 28 P. 961 (1892); People ex rel. Attorney Gen. v. News-Times Publ'g Co., 35 Colo. 253, 84 P. 912 (1906), appeal dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, 205 U.S. 454, 27 S. Ct. 556, 51 L. Ed. 879 (1907); Guiraud v. Nevada Canal Co., 79 Colo. 289, 245 P. 485 (1926).

This section confers rights for the benefit of accused. The provisions of this section to the effect that in criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to "a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed", confer a right solely for the benefit of the accused. Vigil v. People, 135 Colo. 313, 310 P.2d 552 (1957).

And such rights may be waived. The right to trial by jury, the right to counsel, the right not to incriminate one's self, and related matters are known as alienable constitutional rights or as rights in the nature of personal privilege for the benefit of the person who may seek their protection. Such rights, whenever assertable, may be waived. Geer v. Alaniz, 138 Colo. 177, 331 P.2d 260 (1958).

Defendant is entitled to a fair trial, but not a perfect trial. People v. Sanchez, 184 Colo. 25, 518 P.2d 818 (1974).

Aim of a criminal trial is that the guilty shall not escape nor the innocent suffer an unjust conviction. People v. Rogers, 187 Colo. 128, 528 P.2d 1309 (1974).

Constitutional guaranties protected by this section relate to trial and not to proceedings thereafter unless a new trial is granted. Agnes v. People, 104 Colo. 527, 93 P.2d 891 (1939).

Summary procedure in police courts may not override constitutional rights. While summary procedure in police court cases has been countenanced from the standpoint of expediency, expedience may not override the constitution and dethrone rights guaranteed thereunder. City of Canon City v. Merris, 137 Colo. 169, 323 P.2d 614 (1958).

When sanctions imposed for violation of a municipal ordinance are penal in nature, defendant is entitled to all rights accorded one in a criminal proceeding. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

Municipal power to imprison is criminal sanction. In prosecutions for violation of municipal ordinances, even though considered as in the nature of civil actions, where the effects and consequences are criminal in fact, the power to imprison is a criminal sanction. City of Canon City v. Merris, 137 Colo. 169, 323 P.2d 614 (1958).

Denial of motion for preliminary hearing held not error. People v. Moreno, 181 Colo. 106, 507 P.2d 857 (1973).

This section, by its terms, relates to "criminal prosecutions" only. People in Interest of A.M.D., 648 P.2d 625 (Colo. 1982).

Protection of innocent and preservation of integrity of society. Both the United States and the Colorado Constitutions accord an accused substantive and procedural rights that are binding on the government in a criminal prosecution. Such procedures as are found in this section have been constitutionalized not only to protect the innocent from an unjust conviction but, of equal importance, to preserve the integrity of society itself by keeping sound and wholesome the process by which it visits its condemnation on a wrongdoer. People v. Germany, 674 P.2d 345 (Colo. 1983).

Preliminary hearing to determine probable cause issues should be conducted without regard to whether or not evidence meets standards of constitutional admissibility. People v. Connelly, 702 P.2d 722 (Colo. 1985).

Constitutional protections not necessarily provided to licensees in administrative proceeding. The constitutional protections afforded criminal defendants need not be provided to licensees in an administrative proceeding to revoke a driver's license. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

County or district. Words "county" and "district" are not synonymous in Colorado, and, therefore, criminal trial may be held within the same judicial district in a county other than the one in which the offense occurred. People v. Wafai, 713 P.2d 1354 (Colo. App. 1985).

Reversal is mandated if numerous formal irregularities, each of which in itself might be deemed harmless, in the aggregate show the absence of a fair trial. People v. Vialpando, 809 P.2d 1082 (Colo. App. 1990).

In determining whether prosecutorial impropriety mandates a new trial, appellate courts are obliged to evaluate the severity and frequency of the misconduct, any curative measures taken to alleviate the misconduct, and the likelihood that the misconduct constituted a material factor leading to defendant's conviction. People v. Jones, 832 P.2d 1036 (Colo. App. 1991).

Reversible error exists if there are grounds for believing that the jury was substantially prejudiced by improper conduct. Where the prosecutor's ill-advised and improper comments were so numerous and highly prejudicial, the defendant was deprived of a fair trial requiring that the judgment of conviction be reversed. People v. Jones, 832 P.2d 1036 (Colo. App. 1991).

When a defendant asserts on appeal that there is an error of constitutional dimension and where no contemporaneous objection was made, the court must first determine whether there was an error and, if so, whether it was plain and whether it affected the defendant's substantive rights. If the court finds that there was plain error that affected substantial rights, reversal is required unless the court is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the error is harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Petschow, 119 P.3d 495 (Colo. App. 2004).

Harmless beyond a reasonable doubt standard applies where excluded alternative suspect evidence was directly relevant to an essential element of the crime charged and favorable to defendant's defense. People v. Muniz, 190 P.3d 774 (Colo. App. 2008).

There was a reasonable probability that exclusion of alternative suspect evidence prejudiced defendant. Therefore, defendant's convictions must be reversed. People v. Muniz, 190 P.3d 774 (Colo. App. 2008).

Trial court did not abuse discretion in concluding that suppression of defendant's statements to police was adequate remedy and that dismissal of all charges was not necessary where police officers had acted improperly by: Failing to read defendant his Miranda rights; failing to determine whether defendant was represented by counsel before interviewing him; failing to determine whether defendant understood his right to counsel; continuing to interrogate defendant after he invoked his right to counsel; and making promises and threats constituting coercive police conduct. People v. Medina, 51 P.3d 1006 (Colo. App. 2001), aff'd on other grounds, 71 P.3d 973 (Colo. 2003).

Jury instructions correctly described the four-step process for death penalty sentencing in Colorado. Contrary to defendant's argument, Colorado does not have a presumption of life imprisonment. The "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard at the third and fourth steps refers to a standard imposed on the jury, not a burden placed on either party. The phrase "beyond a reasonable doubt" as used in this context simply conveys the level of certainty the jury must possess before returning a death sentence. The instructions repeatedly stated that a death sentence could only be returned if the jury unanimously agreed beyond a reasonable doubt that death was the appropriate penalty. The instructions were not erroneous because they stated that the jury should impose a life sentence if convinced that life was the appropriate penalty. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

When a defendant places his mental health capacity at issue, the prosecution may rebut the defense with psychological evidence, even if that evidence includes statements not taken in compliance with Miranda. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

The decision to enter a guilty plea or withdraw one is among the few fundamental choices that must be decided by the defendant alone. People v. Davis, 2012 COA 1,

A. Right to Be Present.

Prisoner, in cases of felony, must be present at every step in proceedings, or the proceedings will be invalid. Penney v. People, 146 Colo. 95, 360 P.2d 671 (1961); People ex rel. Farina v. District Court, 185 Colo. 118, 522 P.2d 589 (1974).

Prisoner is guaranteed the right to be present at all critical stages of the trial, including closing arguments and giving instructions to the jury. People v. Luu, 813 P.2d 826 (Colo. App. 1991), aff'd, 841 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1992).

Right to be present and of allocution at sentencing. A defendant must be notified when sentence will be pronounced, and has a right to be present in the court with legal counsel at that time; he has a right of allocution before sentence is handed down which cannot be withheld from him; and the failure of the court to properly insure these rights of a defendant renders invalid a sentence pronounced under those circumstances. People v. Emig, 177 Colo. 174, 493 P.2d 368 (1972).

Defendant must be notified when sentence will be pronounced. People v. Emig, 177 Colo. 174, 493 P.2d 368 (1972).

Defendant has right to be present at every critical stage of criminal proceeding; however, that right does not extend if defendant's presence would be useless or only slightly beneficial. People v. Richardson, 181 P.3d 340 (Colo. App. 2007).

There was no violation of the right to be present when defendant was not present at the hearing on a motion for a continuance. The basis of the motion was counsel's unpreparedness, so the court did not need to consult defendant to determine whether counsel was prepared for trial or not. People v. Richardson, 181 P.3d 340 (Colo. App. 2007).

There was no violation of the right when defendant was not present when the court responded to a jury question. The defendant would not have been useful in helping the court answer the jury's legal question. People v. Richardson, 181 P.3d 340 (Colo. App. 2007).

No right to be present after conviction and sentencing. There is nothing in this section giving one convicted of a felony the right to be present during court proceedings affecting his case subsequent to conviction and sentence; consequently he is without cause for complaint if he is taken to, and confined in the penitentiary before such proceedings are consummated. Agnes v. People, 104 Colo. 527, 93 P.2d 891 (1939).

And defendant may be excluded from hearings on matters of law. Where the question raised by a motion concerns only matters of law, the exclusion of the defendant from such a hearing does not violate the constitutional right to be present at every stage of the trial. Schott v. People, 174 Colo. 15, 482 P.2d 101 (1971).

Thus, defendant is not entitled to have his motion for acquittal heard in open court in his presence and not in chambers in his absence. Schott v. People, 174 Colo. 15, 482 P.2d 101 (1971).

Duty to appear at requested preliminary hearing. When a defendant requests a preliminary hearing, he has not only the constitutional right to be present, but is under an affirmative obligation and duty to appear at the hearing. When the defendant is present, the court, in its discretion, can determine the procedures which should be followed to insure that justice is done. People ex rel. Farina v. District Court, 185 Colo. 118, 522 P.2d 589 (1974).

Prejudice from communications between judge and jury outside of accused's presence not presumed. Although communications between a judge and the jury outside of the presence of the party on trial are frowned upon, prejudice is not to be presumed therefrom. People v. Lovato, 181 Colo. 99, 507 P.2d 860 (1973).

Trial court's denial of jury's request for a transcript in absence of defendant and his counsel was violative of his rights, but, with no showing that defendant's case was in any way prejudiced, this was harmless error beyond a reasonable doubt. Franklin v. People, 734 P.2d 133 (Colo. App. 1986).

Rather, prejudice must be established before any verdict of guilt can be reversed on that ground. People v. Lovato, 181 Colo. 99, 507 P.2d 860 (1973).

Court's statement to jury held not prejudicial error. Where the trial court's communication to the jury in the absence of defendant or his counsel did not relate to any matter that the jury would have to consider in reaching its verdict, the court's statement did not constitute prejudicial error. People v. Lovato, 181 Colo. 99, 507 P.2d 860 (1973).

Trial court's failure to notify defense counsel before responding to jury's question was harmless error because the error did not contribute to the verdict. People v. Trujillo, 114 P.3d 27 (Colo. App. 2004).

A hearing in which the only action taken by the court was to accede to defendant's request to proceed with a providency hearing with one, not two, competency evaluations was not a critical stage and defendant's absence from such hearing did not constitute a deprivation of defendant's constitutional right to be present. People v. White, 870 P.2d 424 (Colo. 1994).

The defendant's right to be present was not violated when the defendant did not attend a general orientation session upon the recommendation of the defendant's defense counsel. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

Defendant forfeited his right to be present when he was disruptive, contumacious, and stubbornly defiant. People v. Cohn, 160 P.3d 336 (Colo. App. 2007).

Where defendant does not speak English, the absence of his interpreter at critical stages of the trial is tantamount to his not being present at all. People v. Luu, 813 P.2d 826 (Colo. App. 1991), aff'd, 841 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1992).

The error in not having an interpreter present at closing arguments and instructions to the jury is harmless where defendant does not allege that the interpreter's absence caused him to forego any jury instructions, there was overwhelming evidence of guilt, and closing arguments were consistent with the evidence. People v. Luu, 813 P.2d 826 (Colo. App. 1991), aff'd, 841 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1992).

Defendant's right to be present at trial violated when trial court held in camera proceedings in defendant's absence during which defendant's attorneys discussed defendant's potential desire to terminate their representation and repeatedly disclosed damaging and attorney-client privileged information. People v. Ragusa, 220 P.3d 1002 (Colo. App. 2009).

Allegations of denial of the right to be present at trial are scrutinized under the harmless error doctrine. Luu v. People, 841 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1992).

Any error suffered by defendant was harmless where there was no evidence that the absence of an interpreter interfered with the defendant's ability to cross-examine witnesses nor was there any indication in the record that the absence of an interpreter during closing arguments and the giving of jury instructions compromised the basic fairness of the trial. Luu v. People, 841 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1992).

The standard to apply in analyzing deprivations of the right to be present when the court responds to jury questions is harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. If the court's response is the same regardless of whether the defendant is present, the error is harmless. Further, it is harmless error if the defendant's counsel is present and does not object to the court's proper response. People v. Grace, 55 P.3d 165 (Colo. App. 2001).

When the defendant's counsel is present and has an opportunity to review and object to the jury's question, and the court properly responds to the question, there is no prejudice, and the defendant's absence is harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Wilford, 111 P.3d 512 (Colo. App. 2004).

Failure to afford defendant the opportunity to be present and heard before a juror is excused is not grounds for reversal without a showing of prejudice. Replacing a juror with an alternate is more in the nature of an administrative task. People v. Anderson, 183 P.3d 649 (Colo. App. 2007).

B. Waiver of Right to Appear and Be Present.

Counsel cannot waive prisoner's right. The right of a prisoner to be present at every step in the proceedings is so important that, except in cases of misdemeanor, it cannot be waived by counsel. Penney v. People, 146 Colo. 95, 360 P.2d 671 (1961); People v. Luu, 813 P.2d 826 (Colo. App. 1991), aff'd, 841 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1992).

Waiver must be knowing, intelligent, and voluntary. Waiver is knowing and intelligent when a defendant has had notice of the consequences of not appearing. People v. Stephenson, 165 P.3d 860 (Colo. App. 2007).

Absence from trial compelled by medical necessity may generally be deemed voluntary, and the determination of whether defendant is "voluntarily absent" requires a fact-specific inquiry into the type of medical condition, the circumstances surrounding the absence, and defendant's conduct and statements. People v. Stephenson, 165 P.3d 860 (Colo. App. 2007).

Implied waiver extinguishing right to requested preliminary hearing. Where the judge of the county court advised counsel that the failure of the defendant to appear would constitute a waiver, the defendant's subsequent refusal to appear constituted an implied waiver and extinguished the defendant's right to a preliminary hearing in the county court. People ex rel. Farina v. District Court, 185 Colo. 118, 522 P.2d 589 (1974).

Where offense is not capital and accused is not in custody, the prevailing rule has been that if, after the trial has begun in his presence, he voluntarily absents himself, this does not nullify what has been done or prevent the completion of the trial, but, on the contrary, operates as a waiver of his right to be present, and leaves the court free to proceed with the trial in like manner and with like effect as if he were present. People v. Thorpe, 40 Colo. App. 159, 570 P.2d 1311 (1977).

C. Right to Testify.

Before a defendant may voluntarily waive his constitutional right to testify, the trial court must advise defendant on the record that if cross-examination by the prosecution reveals prior felony convictions, those convictions may be considered only as to credibility. People v. Curtis, 681 P.2d 504 (Colo. 1984); People v. Turley, 870 P.2d 498 (Colo. App. 1993).

Except that, it is error for a trial court to advise a defendant that elicited prior convictions will be used only to impeach credibility when those prior convictions are an element of the crime. Prior felonies are an element of habitual criminal charges and evidence of prior felonies, including those elicited by a defendant on the witness stand, are admissible substantive evidence during habitual criminal proceedings. People v. Ziglar, 45 P.3d 1266 (Colo. 2002).

But trial court need not give a modified re-advisement during the habitual phase of a trial reflecting that the defendant's admissions can be used as substantive evidence during that phase. People v. Ziglar, 45 P.3d 1266 (Colo. 2002).

Defendant's waiver of the right to testify must be voluntary, knowing and intentional, the court must advise defendant on the record that the prosecution will be permitted to cross-examine defendant if defendant chooses to testify and that if a felony conviction is disclosed to the jury on cross-examination the jury will be instructed to consider it only as it bears on defendant's credibility. People v. Akers, 870 P.2d 528 (Colo. App. 1993).

Trial court's advisement on defendant's right to testify was defective where trial court went beyond the Curtis advisement and misstated the law. When cross-examining a defendant, prosecutor may not ask whether a prior felony conviction arose from a plea or a trial. People v. Gomez, 211 P.3d 53 (Colo. App. 2008).

Defendant was fully aware of the relevant consequences of testifying. Because of the prosecutor's promise not to use defendant's prior conviction and the court's intent to enforce the promise, there was no possibility the previous conviction could have been used; therefore defendant was not left to speculate, nor was he misled, as to the consequences of testifying. People v. McDaniel, 74 P.3d 454 (Colo. App. 2003).

Defendant's fifth amendment right not to testify was not violated when the trial court was unwilling to limit the prosecution's cross-examination after defendant was going to testify regarding the involuntariness of his statements. The prosecution's proffered questions regarding how the alleged coercion could have caused the alleged involuntary statements were within the scope of the proposed direct examination of defendant. The court properly used its discretion in ruling it would allow the prosecution's proffered cross-examination if defendant testified regarding his alleged involuntary statements. People v. Gomez-Garcia, 224 P.3d 1019 (Colo. App. 2009).

Defense counsel may not so completely contradict or wholly undermine defendant's testimony as to nullify defendant's constitutional right to testify. However, defendant has no right to offer perjured testimony or have it accommodated by the attorney's representations or trial strategy. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

D. Right to Defend in Person.

Denial of defendant's request to address jury was not error. Where defendant made no objection to representation by counsel during the presentation of evidence, the record revealed that counsel for the defendant diligently conducted the defense, and defendant himself took the stand and told his story to the jury, the supreme court could find no error in the denial of the defendant's request to address the jury. Moore v. People, 171 Colo. 338, 467 P.2d 50 (1970).

A defendant has a constitutional right to defend himself under this section. Moore v. People, 171 Colo. 338, 467 P.2d 50 (1970); Martinez v. People, 172 Colo. 82, 470 P.2d 26 (1970); People v. Rice, 40 Colo. App. 357, 579 P.2d 647, cert. denied, 439 U.S. 898, 99 S. Ct. 261, 58 L. Ed. 2d 245 (1978).

A criminal defendant is constitutionally entitled to defend himself, provided he has an intelligent understanding of the consequences of so doing. People v. Moody, 630 P.2d 74 (Colo. 1981); People v. Rocha, 872

P.2d 1285 (Colo. App. 1993).

A criminally accused clearly has the right of self-representation. People v. Lucero, 200 Colo. 335, 615 P.2d 660 (1980); People v. Mogul, 812 P.2d 705 (Colo. App. 1991).

A defendant has a constitutional right to defend himself under this section. People v. Price, 903 P.2d 1190 (Colo. App. 1995).

Providing trial judge shall find him competent to conduct his own defense. Moore v. People, 171 Colo. 338, 467 P.2d 50 (1970).

The federal courts have recognized the right of a defendant to proceed without counsel only if he has an intelligent understanding of the consequences of so doing. Martinez v. People, 172 Colo. 82, 470 P.2d 26 (1970); Reliford v. People, 195 Colo. 549, 579 P.2d 1145 (1978).

Inept pro se defense resulted in lack of due process. Where the defendant was so inept that he did not and could not conduct a proper defense for himself, the absence of defense counsel and the total ineptness of the defendant to conduct a defense for himself actually resulted in a lack of due process. Martinez v. People, 172 Colo. 82, 470 P.2d 26 (1970).

Exclusion of pro se defendant from courtroom because of his misconduct was constitutional error. Constitutional error occurs when defendant is deprived of the presence of counsel at critical stages of the proceedings where there is more than a minimal risk that counsel's absence will undermine the defendant's right to a fair trial. People v. Cohn, 160 P.3d 336 (Colo. App. 2007).

Excluding pro se defendant from the portion of the proceedings concerning the exercise of peremptory challenges is inherently prejudicial and cannot be considered harmless. People v. Cohn, 160 P.3d 336 (Colo. App. 2007).

A defendant's right to counsel will be preserved by appointing standby counsel to be ready to step in should the trial court find it necessary (1) to make a finding that the defendant, by his conduct, has waived the right to self-representation, and (2) to exclude the defendant from the courtroom when disruptive behavior occurs. People v. Cohn, 160 P.3d 336 (Colo. App. 2007).

Accused cannot defend both by counsel and himself. This section does not mean that a defendant has the right during trial both to accept the services of counsel and to conduct his own defense at the same time, or alternating at defendant's pleasure. Moore v. People, 171 Colo. 338, 467 P.2d 50 (1970).

So long as defendant is represented by counsel at the trial, he has no right to be heard by himself. Moore v. People, 171 Colo. 338, 467 P.2d 50 (1970).

Pro se defendant must accept burdens of defense. Any person has the constitutional right to defend a criminal action "in person and by counsel", but one who elects to act as his own attorney must accept the burden and hazards incident thereto. Dyer v. People, 148 Colo. 22, 364 P.2d 1062 (1961); Reliford v. People, 195 Colo. 549, 579 P.2d 1145 (1978); People v. Rice, 40 Colo. App. 357, 579 P.2d 647, cert. denied, 439 U.S. 898, 99 S. Ct. 261, 58 L. Ed. 2d 245 (1978).

Where the record established that the defendant, fully understanding his constitutional right to counsel, knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily relinquished the benefits of counsel and elected to represent himself, the defendant could not, thereafter, whipsaw the court between his constitutional right of self-representation and his own ineffectiveness at trial. People v. Lucero, 200 Colo. 335, 615 P.2d 660 (1980).

Action of trial court does not constitute violation of due process, where trial court denied defendant's motion for continuance of criminal trial for misdemeanor theft and defendant asserted that he had been unable to prepare pro se case in two weeks. The court's action was taken after defendant requested the withdrawal of his public defender, and the court granted the request only after extended discussion regarding the defendant's right to counsel, the disadvantages of self-representation, and notice that the trial would proceed as scheduled. People v. Denton, 757 P.2d 637 (Colo. App. 1988).

The wisdom of defendant's election to proceed pro se in a first-degree murder trial was not the question before the trial court; it was proper to accept defendant's choice of self-representation, where defendant intelligently and understandingly waived his right to counsel. People v. Reliford, 39 Colo. App. 474, 568 P.2d 496 (1977), aff'd, 195 Colo. 549, 579 P.2d 1145 (1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1076, 99 S. Ct. 851, 59 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1979).

But court must instruct jury on elements of defense. Where the defendant was proceeding without counsel the trial court should have recognized drunkenness as an element in defense of the charge and should have instructed the jury on the manner of voluntary drunkenness. Martinez v. People, 172 Colo. 82, 470 P.2d 26 (1970).

But not where defendant conditions exercise of right upon mistrial. Although a criminal defendant has a constitutional right to defend himself, there is no violation of that right where the defendant conditions the exercise of that right upon the trial court's grant of a motion for mistrial. People v. Moody, 630 P.2d 74 (Colo. 1981).

Burden rests upon defendant to show satisfactory cause for a late request to proceed pro se and trial court, in exercising its discretion whether to deny or grant request, must first determine if request is timely. People v. Mogul, 812 P.2d 705 (Colo. App. 1991).

Unless request to represent self is made in ample time prior to trial date, trial court must determine whether request is made for purposes of delay or to gain tactical advantage and whether lateness of request may hinder administration of justice. People v. Mogul, 812 P.2d 705 (Colo. App. 1991).

Request for self-representation must be unequivocal and must constitute a valid, knowing, and voluntary waiver of right to counsel. In order to make such a determination, the trial court must first enter into dialogue with defendant to explain consequences of self-representation as well as its dangers and disadvantages. People v. Mogul, 812 P.2d 705 (Colo. App. 1991); People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 303 (Colo. App. 1993).

The right to self-representation is not self-executing, therefore, the defendant must make a continuing unequivocal request to trigger it. Defendant's request was not unequivocal since it was tied to a properly refused demand for an immediate trial. When defendant was informed he would not receive the immediate trial, he abandoned his request for self-representation indicating he wanted to continue with his lawyer. People v. Abdu, 215 P.3d 1265 (Colo. App. 2009).

Defendant's equivocal statements that he wished to proceed pro se "only for today" and, on another occasion, to "speak in my own defense along with the attorney" were not effective as a request for self-representation. People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 303 (Colo. App. 1993).

Defendant's request that he or she proceed pro se "against my will" rendered his or her request not unequivocal and was, therefore, not granted because the thrust of his or request was the appointment of new counsel and a continuance. People v. King, 121 P.3d 234 (Colo. App. 2005).

Defendant's statement at pretrial hearing that he was ready to continue pro se, after which he did not object to the appointment of a new counsel, was not an unequivocal demand to represent himself. People v. Shepard, 989 P.2d 183 (Colo. App. 1999).

Defendant did not make an unequivocal request to proceed pro se when the defendant first indicated a willingness to go to trial with or without counsel but later appeared for trial with counsel and did not object to the new counsel. People v. Edwards, 101 P.3d 1118 (Colo. App. 2004), aff'd on other grounds, 129 P.3d 977 (Colo. 2006).

A defendant who is not capable of knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waiving representation is not, for that reason, incompetent to stand trial. Trial court did not err in summarily denying defendant's request to dismiss his attorney, based on defendant's statement that antibiotics were preventing him from thinking clearly, and proceeding with the trial. People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 303 (Colo. App. 1993).

Defendant's technical legal knowledge is not factor under consideration by trial court in determining whether to grant or deny motion for pro se representation. However, court is not obligated to put up with disruption or intemperate conduct or with defendant's ignoring of procedural or substantive rules of law and may appoint advisory counsel, over objections of defendant, to insure orderly proceedings and to provide assistance to the defendant. People v. Mogul, 812 P.2d 705 (Colo. App. 1991).

A defendant proceeding pro se is subject to the same rules, procedures, and substantive law as a licensed attorney. People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 311 (Colo. App. 1993).

Advisory counsel can assist self-representing defendant only when requested. Where the defendant exercises his constitutional right of self-representation, advisory counsel can assist the defendant only if and when the defendant requests such assistance. People v. Lucero, 200 Colo. 335, 615 P.2d 660 (1980).

Trial court's failure to direct advisory counsel to take control of case when defendant voluntarily absented himself did not violate defendant's right to counsel. Without a request from defendant, or obstreperous conduct justifying termination of self-representation, trial court's sua sponte appointment of counsel could have violated defendant's right to self-representation. People v. Brante, 232 P.3d 204 (Colo. App. 2009).

But may not be used to impede efficient administration of justice. People v. Mogul, 812 P.2d 705 (Colo. App. 1991); People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 303 (Colo. App. 1993).

No constitutional right to appointment of advisory counsel to assist pro se defendant. People v. Romero, 694 P.2d 1256 (Colo. 1985).

Accused cannot be defended both by counsel and by himself. Denial of defendant's request to represent himself as cocounsel was proper. People v. Avila, 770 P.2d 1330 (Colo. App. 1988); People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 303 (Colo. App. 1993).

Court not required to instruct on affirmative defense of self-induced intoxication when pro se defendant does not present evidence raising such defense. People v. Romero, 694 P.2d 1256 (Colo. 1985).

When an indigent defendant voices objections to court-appointed counsel, the trial court has the obligation to inquire into the reasons for the dissatisfaction; however, once the court has appropriately determined that a substitution of counsel is not warranted, the court can insist that the defendant choose between continued representation by existing counsel and appearing pro se. People v. Arguello, 772 P.2d 87 (Colo. 1989); People v. Rocha, 872 P.2d 1285 (Colo. App. 1993); People v. Arko, 159 P.3d 713 (Colo. App. 2006), rev'd on other grounds, 183 P.3d 555 (Colo. 2008).

The standard for an appellate review of a claim of the denial of the right to self-representation is de novo. People v. Abdu, 215 P.3d 1265 (Colo. App. 2009).

E. Right to Counsel.

Law reviews. For article, "The Colorado Counsel Conundrum: Plea Bargaining, Misdemeanors, and the Right to Counsel", see 89 Denv. U.L. Rev. 327 (2012).

Defendant in criminal trial has constitutional right to be assisted and represented by counsel. Moore v. People, 171 Colo. 338, 467 P.2d 50 (1970).

Constitutional right to counsel of choice violated, even though defendant did not move for entry of a particular counsel or expressly object to counsel during trial, where defendant's attorneys purposefully kept defendant ignorant of the nature of in camera proceedings and the disclosure of privileged information attorneys made during those proceedings. Attorneys' conduct, which was compounded by the court permitting defendant to be excluded from the proceedings, effectively and wrongfully deprived defendant of a knowing exercise of defendant's choice of counsel. People v. Ragusa, 220 P.3d 1002 (Colo. App. 2009).

To determine whether a court may deny the appearance of defendant's newly chosen counsel, the court must balance defendant's right to be represented by his or her counsel of choice against the court's interest in the orderly administration of justice. The factors that a court should consider are: Whether the defendant's motive is dilatory or contrived, the availability of the new counsel, the impact on the court's docket, and the prejudice to the prosecution. In this case, the court abused its discretion in denying the entry of new counsel since the court's only consideration was that witnesses had been subpoenaed multiple times before. People v. Brown, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2011).

Presence of counsel in extradition proceedings. The language of § 16-19-111, dealing with the rights of fugitives in extradition proceedings, establishes a right to the presence of legal counsel, and due process requirements prohibit the denial of this right to indigents, when it has been made available to those able to afford counsel. Mora v. District Court, 177 Colo. 381, 494 P.2d 596 (1972).

Indigent defendant entitled to appointed counsel at state expense. By reason of this section of the Colorado Constitution and the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution, an indigent defendant in a criminal proceeding is entitled to have counsel appointed at the expense of the state to assist him in his defense. Martinez v. People, 173 Colo. 515, 480 P.2d 843 (1971); People v. Cardenas, 62 P.3d 621 (Colo. 2002).

And a conviction obtained in violation of a defendant's right to counsel cannot be used in subsequent sentencing for felony conviction to deny defendant probation pursuant to § 16-11-201 (2). People v. McIntosh, 695 P.2d 795 (Colo. App. 1984).

But this right does not carry the right in the indigent defendant to choose counsel. Valarde

v. People, 156 Colo. 375, 399 P.2d 245 (1965); Martinez v. People, 172 Colo. 82, 470 P.2d 26 (1970); People v. Shook, 186 Colo. 339, 527 P.2d 815 (1974).

The defendant's right to counsel does not grant the defendant the right to pick the public defender of his choice. Maynes v. People, 178 Colo. 88, 495 P.2d 551 (1972).

While an indigent defendant has no right to choose court-appointed counsel, an indigent defendant does have a presumptive right to continued representation by court-appointed counsel absent a factual and legal basis to terminate that appointment. People v. Harlan, 54 P.3d 871 (Colo. 2002).

Defendant has the right to have conflict-free counsel appointed to pursue post-conviction remedies for the prior conviction. People v. Cross, 114 P.3d 1 (Colo. App. 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 127 P.3d 71 (Colo. 2006).

Standby, advisory counsel discretionary with judge. While the appointment of advisory counsel is generally a fair and commendable practice, even the most persuasive authority does not mandate the appointment of standby counsel in all cases, but rather leaves the decision to the trial judge's sound discretion. Reliford v. People, 195 Colo. 549, 579 P.2d 1145 (1978).

Trial court's failure to direct advisory counsel to take control of case when defendant voluntarily absented himself did not violate defendant's right to counsel. Without a request from defendant, or obstreperous conduct justifying termination of self-representation, trial court's sua sponte appointment of counsel could have violated defendant's right to self-representation. People v. Brante, 232 P.3d 204 (Colo. App. 2009).

Courts may require reasonable proof of indigency. Where the right to counsel is conditioned upon indigency of the defendant, it is the right of the trial courts to set reasonable rules as to the manner in which the indigency must be proved. Adargo v. People, 159 Colo. 321, 411 P.2d 245 (1966).

Such proof may be affidavit of indigency and should accompany a petition for appointment of counsel to prosecute a writ of error. Adargo v. People, 159 Colo. 321, 411 P.2d 245 (1966).

It is abuse of discretion not to grant defendant's request for assistance of counsel even though no affidavit of indigency is filed where there is a lack of funds to retain counsel to prosecute writ of error and time for prosecuting appeal is rapidly running out. Adargo v. People, 159 Colo. 321, 411 P.2d 245 (1966).

Record need not show that accused was informed of right to counsel. Santo v. Santo, 120 Colo. 13, 206 P.2d 341 (1949).

Right to have counsel present at interrogation is indispensable. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966).

The right to counsel under the sixth amendment, particularly in light of the fifth amendment privilege, includes not merely the right to consult with counsel prior to questioning, but also to have counsel present during any questioning if the defendant so desires. People v. Pierson, 633 P.2d 485 (Colo. App. 1981), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 670 P.2d 770 (Colo. 1983).

And accused must be clearly informed of this right. An individual held for interrogation must be clearly informed that he has the right to consult a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation. This warning is an absolute prerequisite to interrogation. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966).

Accused must also be warned that if indigent, counsel will be appointed. In order fully to apprise a person interrogated of the extent of his rights under this system, it is necessary to warn him not only that he has the right to consult with an attorney, but also that if he is indigent a lawyer will be appointed to represent him. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966).

The purpose of the Miranda rule is to protect a suspect against investigative interrogation and not from the routine gathering of basic identifying data needed for booking and arraignment. People v. Anderson, 837 P.2d 293 (Colo. App. 1992).

Right to counsel at confrontations for identification after June 12, 1967. Vigil v. People, 174 Colo. 164, 482 P.2d 983 (1971).

Right to counsel when the court is instructing the jury is fundamental. Nieto v. People, 160 Colo. 179, 415 P.2d 531 (1966).

As is right to counsel during sentencing. The nature and possibilities of this important and critical stage of the proceedings, i.e. the time of sentence, are such as make the absence of counsel at this time presumably prejudicial. Doe v. People, 160 Colo. 215, 416 P.2d 376 (1966).

Preparatory steps do not require counsel. The United States supreme court distinguished "mere preparatory" steps in the gathering of evidence from those stages described as critical stages, such as line-up, where the accused has a right to counsel. Sandoval v. People, 172 Colo. 383, 473 P.2d 722 (1970).

The denial of a right to have accused's counsel present at scientific or technical analyses does not violate the sixth amendment or this section; they are not critical stages since there is minimal risk that counsel's absence at such stages might derogate from the right to a fair trial. Sandoval v. People, 172 Colo. 383, 473 P.2d 722 (1970).

Scientific analyses of accused's fingerprints, blood samples, clothing, hair, etc., are preparatory steps. Sandoval v. People, 172 Colo. 383, 473 P.2d 722 (1970).

As is photographing accused to preserve his appearance. The photographing of an accused to preserve visually his appearance at a time near that of the alleged commission of the offense is not in a critical stage of the proceeding, entitling the accused to the assistance of counsel. Sandoval v. People, 172 Colo. 383, 473 P.2d 722 (1970).

Right to effective counsel extends throughout plea negotiations. Carmichael v. People, 206 P.3d 800 (Colo. 2009).

Decision to exercise right of appeal is personal to convicted person. Cruz v. Patterson, 253 F. Supp. 805 (D. Colo.), aff'd, 363 F.2d 879 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 975, 87 S. Ct. 501, 17 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1966).

And does not reside in his counsel. Cruz v. Patterson, 253 F. Supp. 805 (D. Colo.), aff'd, 363 F.2d 879 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 975, 87 S. Ct. 501, 17 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1966).

Screening procedures by counsel deny appellate rights of indigent defendants. Screening procedures by counsel, such as appointment of counsel to determine whether any reversible error occurred during trial, have been found to be incompatible with the constitutional requirement that the criminal defendant, asserting his right to appeal, be accorded equal protection of the law despite his financial condition. In such procedures, counsel assumes primarily the role of an advisor to the court as to whether the case warrants further consideration, rather than the role of advocate. Cruz v. Patterson, 253 F. Supp. 805 (D. Colo.), aff'd, 363 F.2d 879 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 975, 87 S. Ct. 501, 17 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1966).

An attorney who entered appearance in behalf of accused cannot withdraw his appearance on day set for trial. Altobella v. Priest, 153 Colo. 309, 385 P.2d 585 (1963).

Unless granted permission to do so for good cause. Altobella v. Priest, 153 Colo. 309, 385 P.2d 585 (1963).

No right to appointed counsel in civil proceeding. There is no constitutional right to appointed counsel for an indigent litigant in a civil proceeding brought by a private party involving only property interests. In re McCue, 645 P.2d 854 (Colo. App. 1982).

Sophisticated request not necessary for right to counsel. Neither a "sophisticated" request nor a "legally proper form" is necessary to invoke the right to counsel. People v. Cook, 665 P.2d 640 (Colo. App. 1983).

Right to counsel attaches at or after time adversary judicial proceedings are initiated against defendant. People v. Anderson, 842 P.2d 621 (Colo. 1992).

Right to counsel improperly denied where trial court made factual finding that although, defendant's income exceeded income eligibility guidelines, defendant was still financially unable to retain private counsel. People v. Tellez, 890 P.2d 197 (Colo. App. 1994), cert. denied, 909 P.2d 1105 (Colo. 1996).

Waiver of counsel cannot be voluntary if based upon impermissible choice. Where attorney's actions are constitutionally deficient, the trial court's improper denial of motion for substitute counsel effectively forces defendant to choose between his right to counsel and other trial rights. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

Where defendant proceeds pro se after erroneous denial of request for new counsel, any violation of sixth amendment rights results in a complete denial of right to counsel. Such complete violations constitute structural errors in the trial process and warrant a new trial. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

Defendant's request for new counsel requires inquiry into four factors: (1) The timeliness of the motion, (2) the adequacy of the court's inquiry into the defendant's complaint, (3) whether the attorney-client conflict results in a total lack of communication or prevents an adequate defense, and (4) the extent to which the defendant substantially and unreasonably contributed to the underlying conflict with the attorney. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

Tape recording of defendant's conversation with accomplice made without his knowledge in the back of police car did not violate his sixth amendment right to counsel since that right does not attach until the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings and the defendant had not yet been charged at the time of the recording. People v. Palmer, 888 P.2d 348 (Colo. App. 1994).

Defendant's right to counsel violated but no reversible error occurred where prosecution introduced in case-in-chief evidence obtained from defendant in her counsel's absence and without waiver after formal proceedings had been initiated against her triggering her right to counsel. People v. Ridley, 872 P.2d 1377 (Colo. App. 1994).

Even though the court should not have allowed evidence of the defendant's drug enforcement administration cooperative activities in the prosecution's case-in-chief because defendant's right to counsel had been violated, since it was clearly admissible in rebuttal to impeach defendant's claim of entrapment, any error by the trial court in admitting the evidence out of order was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. People v.

Ridley, 872 P.2d 1377 (Colo. App. 1994).

No violation of right to counsel where defendant's incriminating statements to undercover agent were obtained pursuant to defendant's express invitation. People v. Battle, 694 P.2d 359 (Colo. App. 1984).

Or where defendant's incriminating statements to district attorney were made before bribery charges were pending against him, since no right to counsel yet existed on the bribery charges. People v. Hyun Soo Son, 723 P.2d 1337 (Colo. 1986).

Or where defendant, two days before she was formally charged with aggravated distribution of cocaine, met with drug enforcement administration agents, agreed to become an informant and broker large drug deals in that capacity, signed a cooperative agreement, and gave them certain information. People v. Ridley, 872 P.2d 1377 (Colo. App. 1994).

No impermissible use by prosecution of defendant's invocation of the right to counsel where defendant was asked what he meant when he told a deputy "I've got a lot to get off my chest but I'd be cutting my own throat" and he answered, "Probably only that it would be foolish of me to talk to the police very much without first talking to an attorney," because he knew that he had committed a crime "of sorts", since defendant was not invoking his right to counsel when he made spontaneous incriminating statements to the deputy in a restroom, without any interrogation by the deputy. People v. Gordon, 32 P.3d 575 (Colo. App. 2001).

While defendant has constitutional right to counsel, there is no right to a particular counsel. People v. Anaya, 732 P.2d 1241 (Colo. App. 1986), rev'd on other grounds, 764 P.2d 779 (Colo. 1988).

However, where original counsel of choice was erroneously disqualified, defendant need not demonstrate constitutionally ineffective assistance of trial attorney before receiving a new trial. Anaya v. People, 764 P.2d 779 (Colo. 1988).

The right to be represented by counsel exists at every critical stage of a criminal trial including jury deliberations. People v. Key, 851 P.2d 228 (Colo. App. 1992); People v. Vega, 870 P.2d 549 (Colo. App. 1993); People v. Loyd, 902 P.2d 889 (Colo. App. 1995).

In camera proceedings in defendant's absence were a critical stage of criminal trial. In camera proceedings in defendant's absence during which defendant's attorneys discussed defendant's potential desire to terminate their representation and repeatedly disclosed damaging and attorney-client privileged information were critical. People v. Ragusa, 220 P.3d 1002 (Colo. App. 2009).

Defendant's absence was not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Ragusa, 220 P.3d 1002 (Colo. App. 2009).

An in camera proceeding is a critical stage of the proceedings at which the right to counsel attaches. People v. Delgadillo, 2012 COA 33, 275 P.3d 772.

A sentencing hearing is a critical stage of a criminal proceeding. People v. Loyd, 902 P.2d 889 (Colo. App. 1995).

This section does not create a constitutional right to counsel in a Crim. P. 35 hearing. People v. Duran, 757 P.2d 1096 (Colo. App. 1988).

Right to counsel not dependent on classification of crime. The right to counsel does not depend upon the general assembly's classification of the crime charged. People v. Roybal, 618 P.2d 1121 (Colo. 1980).

This section does not create a constitutional right to counsel to appeal a conviction when the only sentence was a fine. An indigent defendant has a constitutional right to appointed counsel only when, if the defendant loses, the defendant may be deprived of his or her physical liberty. Knapper v. Aurora Mun. Court, 985 P.2d 105 (Colo. App. 1999).

Because neither party requested a hearing, the motion to extend probation was not a critical stage that would require the presence of counsel. Therefore, court rejected defendant's claim that the motion to extend probation was invalid because defendant signed the motion without the benefit of legal counsel. People v. Romero, 198 P.3d 1209 (Colo. App. 2007).

Right to counsel in contempt proceedings. The right to counsel must be extended to all contempt proceedings, whether labeled civil or criminal, which result in the imprisonment of the witness. Padilla v. Padilla, 645 P.2d 1327 (Colo. App. 1982); In re Wyatt, 728 P.2d 734 (Colo. App. 1986); Griffin v. Jackson, 759 P.2d 839 (Colo. App. 1988).

If a husband cited for contempt for failure to make child support payments to his former wife was refused legal services by at least two private attorneys because he was unable to pay requested fee, he was entitled to have his assets examined and considered by court in determining eligibility for court-appointed counsel under supreme court indigency guidelines. In re Wyatt, 728 P.2d 734 (Colo. App. 1986).

Right to counsel extends to the following critical stages: Jury deliberation and return of verdict. People v. Johnson, 802 P.2d 1105 (Colo. App. 1990), rev'd on other grounds, 815 P.2d 427 (Colo. 1991).

Filing of detainer against an incarcerated defendant pursuant to the Interstate Agreement on Detainers is not a critical stage of the proceedings, and therefore, defendant's constitutional right to counsel is not implicated. People v. Evans, 971 P.2d 229 (Colo. App. 1998).

Critical stage of criminal proceeding requires that there be more than a minimal risk that the absence of counsel might impair a defendant's right to a fair trial. Key v. People, 865 P.2d 822 (Colo. 1994).

An ex parte scheduling conference with jurors during deliberations occurred at a critical stage of the criminal proceedings. Key v. People, 865 P.2d 822 (Colo. 1994).

Although trial court's actions in conducting a scheduling conference without defendant's counsel present constituted error, it was harmless considering the totality of all facts and circumstances and did not warrant an automatic reversal. People v. Key, 851 P.2d 228 (Colo. App. 1992).

Court's speaking to jury concerning the status of deliberations without counsel present harmless error where there was no suggestion of coercion. People v. Urrutia, 893 P.2d 1338 (Colo. App. 1994).

There was no suggestion of coercion where trial court, outside the presence of defense counsel, answered jury question concerning unanimity of verdict with its own question as to whether further deliberations would assist the jury to arrive at a verdict. People v. Trujillo, 114 P.3d 27 (Colo. App. 2004).

The court's failure to allow the defendant and the defendant's counsel the opportunity to appear and review the jury's request to review the trial transcript was harmless error. Since the court is vested with the discretion to allow the jury to review transcripts and the defendant cannot show that this case was prejudiced by allowing the jury to review the transcript, there is no reversible error. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

Court ordered competency examination is a critical stage of aggregate adversary proceedings for purposes of right to counsel. A criminal defendant must be given the opportunity to consult with counsel prior to submitting to a court-ordered competency examination under § 16-8-106. People v. Branch, 786 P.2d 441 (Colo. App. 1989).

If a court-ordered competency examination is required, the trial court must provide the defendant with adequate safeguards calculated to ensure protection not only of the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination but also such defendant's right to counsel. People v. Branch, 805 P.2d 1075 (Colo. 1991).

However, the sixth amendment does not guarantee an absolute right to counsel of choice in all cases. When a defendant's desire to retain a particular attorney would significantly undermine public confidence in the impartiality and fairness of the judicial process because of the circumstances of the case, the defendant may be precluded from retaining attorney. Rodriguez v. District Court, 719 P.2d 699 (Colo. 1986).

The trial court must use a balancing approach and evaluate the defendant's preference for particular counsel, the witness' right to confidentiality of communications, and the public's interest in maintaining the integrity of the judicial process as well as the nature of the particular conflict of interest involved. Rodriguez v. District Court, 719 P.2d 699 (Colo. 1986).

The interest of the public in the fair and proper administration of justice includes concerns that trials be conducted in an evenhanded manner; that the participants in the adversary process, including witnesses, be protected from unfair tactics; and that the courts maintain the integrity of the judicial system and the highest standards of the legal profession. Rodriguez v. District Court, 719 P.2d 699 (Colo. 1986).

For a defendant to invoke his or her right of self-representation, the right must be asserted timely and unequivocally. Defendant's requests for self-representation was secondary to his or her request for conflict-free counsel. Since the court appointed conflict-free counsel, defendant's requests for self-representation were not unequivocal. People v. Shreck, 107 P.3d 1048 (Colo. App. 2004).

Court may pay the cost of a defendant's expert when defendant is represented by a private attorney and defendant meets the requisite constitutional showing for obtaining state-funded support services. Court payment of defendant's support costs is appropriate if: (1) The defendant becomes indigent during the case; (2) defendant has insufficient funds to pay the costs; and (3) appointment of a public defender or alternate defense counsel would be too disruptive to the proceedings. People v. Orozco, 210 P.3d 472 (Colo. App. 2009).

F. Waiver of Right to Counsel.

Valid waiver will not be presumed from silence of accused. An express statement that an individual is willing to make a statement and does not want an attorney followed closely by a statement could constitute a waiver, but a valid waiver will not be presumed simply from the silence of an accused after warnings are given or simply from the fact that a confession was in fact eventually obtained. Constantine v. People, 178 Colo. 16, 495 P.2d 208 (1972).

Guilty plea does not create presumption of waiver. A plea of guilty has some probative value in determining waiver of counsel. Although a plea of guilty of itself creates no presumption of waiver, it may be considered where there is no claim of innocence. Martinez v. People, 166 Colo. 132, 442 P.2d 422, cert. denied, 393 U.S. 990, 89 S. Ct. 474, 21

Threshold question in interrogation was whether waiver was made. Whether or not the police ignored the fact that the defendant had an attorney in another case, when they questioned him in a separate case, the threshold question was whether, as a matter of law, the defendant made a knowing and intelligent waiver of his right to counsel before he made any statement to the police. Constantine v. People, 178 Colo. 16, 495 P.2d 208 (1972).

Judicial determination. The matter of comprehension of constitutional rights is the very essence of the broader determination of voluntariness and admissibility, and these issues, in the first instance, must be determined by the trial court at an in camera hearing. Constantine v. People, 178 Colo. 16, 495 P.2d 208 (1972).

Considerations of court in passing on waiver issue. In passing on whether a statement is voluntary and whether the accused waived his right to counsel, the court must consider and examine the totality of the facts and circumstances of the case, and also the conduct of the accused. Duncan v. People, 178 Colo. 314, 497 P.2d 1029 (1972); People v. Romero, 953 P.2d 550 (Colo. 1998).

Right to counsel held waived. Where a defendant is able to understand fully the meaning of explanations given him and thereafter enters a plea of guilty to a charge contained in an information, and at no time indicates that he is without funds to employ counsel, and does not request that counsel be appointed to represent him, his action amounts to a waiver of the right to appointed counsel. Little v. People, 138 Colo. 572, 335 P.2d 863 (1959); People v. Litsey, 192 Colo. 19, 555 P.2d 974 (1976).

Where defendant acknowledged he understood what his rights were and specifically stated he did not want an attorney and where conversations yielding incriminating admissions were spontaneously initiated by defendant and were not the result of any investigative interrogation, the record amply demonstrates that proper Miranda warnings were given the defendant and that he knowingly and intelligently waived his right to an attorney. Gass v. People, 177 Colo. 232, 493 P.2d 654 (1972).

Juvenile defendant's execution of financial eligibility form and interview by member of public defender's office did not constitute an unambiguous invocation of the right to counsel. Under totality of the circumstances, statement by juvenile's mother to police concerning public defender representation simply indicated mother's concern over legal representation in light of financial circumstances, and was not a clear assertion of right to counsel. People v. Grant, 30 P.3d 667 (Colo. App. 2000), aff'd on other grounds, 48 P.3d 543 (Colo. 2002).

No effective waiver of right to counsel during interrogation can be recognized unless specifically made after Miranda warning is given. Constantine v. People, 178 Colo. 16, 495 P.2d 208 (1972).

Burden is on state to prove waiver of right to counsel. If interrogation continues without the presence of an attorney and a statement is taken, a heavy burden rests on the government to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966).

When police officers interrogate a defendant without the presence of an attorney, and a statement is taken, the burden is on the people to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel. Neitz v. People, 170 Colo. 428, 462 P.2d 498 (1969).

The burden of proving that a waiver of counsel is knowingly and intelligently made is on the prosecution. People v. Bowen, 176 Colo. 302, 490 P.2d 295 (1971).

To constitute an express waiver, the attendant facts must show clearly and convincingly that the accused did relinquish his constitutional rights knowingly, intelligently and voluntarily. Constantine v. People, 178 Colo. 16, 495 P.2d 208 (1972).

Warnings and waiver of rights are prerequisite to admissibility of statements by defendant. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966); Perez v. People, 176 Colo. 505, 491 P.2d 969 (1971).

Miranda requirements not met. Where the defendant, a high school student who came from a poor family who spoke broken English and whose home was a small rural community, was not informed that he had a right to have an attorney present before any questioning; and secondly, he was not informed that if he desired to have an attorney present but could not afford one, one would be appointed for him without charge, the requirements of Miranda were not met. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 373, 489 P.2d 588 (1971).

Evidence held sufficient that defendant waived Miranda rights. Massey v. People, 179 Colo. 167, 498 P.2d 953 (1972).

Defendant's Miranda waiver was not coerced. There was no evidence in the record that waiver was the product of intimidation, coercion, or deception. People v. Madrid, 179 P.3d 1010 (Colo. 2008).

Waiver must be made knowingly and intelligently. Once it is established that a defendant has a right to counsel, the court must establish that any waiver of the constitutional right is made knowingly and intelligently. Padilla v. Padilla, 645 P.2d 1327 (Colo. App. 1982); People v. Romero, 694 P.2d 1256 (Colo. 1986); People v. Arguello, 772 P.2d 87 (Colo. 1989); People v. Trujillo, 773 P.2d 1086 (Colo. 1989); People v. Martinez, 789 P.2d 420 (Colo. 1990).

Defendant voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waived right to counsel where record showed that he did so in order to choose his own trial strategy. It was irrelevant that the court failed to conduct a specific colloquy as to each of the areas of inquiry specified in case law. Further the record showed that any shortcoming in the colloquy was the result of defendant's obstreperous and disruptive conduct. People v. Smith, 881 P.2d 385 (Colo. App. 1994); People v. Smith, 77 P.3d 751 (Colo. App. 2003).

And may be made without attorney's presence. There is no rule that whenever a defendant is represented by an attorney, she may not waive her right to counsel without the presence of the attorney. People v. Mann, 646 P.2d 352 (Colo. 1982).

Waiver of counsel cannot be voluntary if based upon impermissible choice. Where attorney's actions are constitutionally deficient, trial court's improper denial of motion for substitute counsel effectively forces defendant to choose between his right to counsel and other trial rights. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

Where defendant proceeds pro se after erroneous denial of request for new counsel, any violation of sixth amendment rights results in a complete denial of right to counsel. Such complete violations constitute structural errors in the trial process and warrant a new trial. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

In addition, an accused may knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waive the right to conflict-free counsel. But a court on notice of a conflict has a duty to inquire into the propriety of continued representation by current counsel. People v. Campbell, 58 P.3d 1148 (Colo. App. 2002).

Although there is no per se rule requiring reversal if the court fails to inquire into counsel's conflict of interest, reversal is required if the defendant shows a conflict of interest that adversely affects counsel's representation. People v. Campbell, 58 P.3d 1148 (Colo. App. 2002).

Waiver of counsel cannot be voluntary if based upon impermissible choice. Where attorney's actions are constitutionally deficient, trial court's improper denial of motion for substitute counsel effectively forces defendant to choose between his right to counsel and other trial rights. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

Where defendant proceeds pro se after erroneous denial of request for new counsel, any violation of sixth amendment rights results in a complete denial of right to counsel. Such complete violations constitute structural errors in the trial process and warrant a new trial. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

Waiver may take the form of an express statement or may be implied from the circumstances. King v. People, 728 P.2d 1264 (Colo. 1986).

Waiver not found where evidence showed defendant's repeated assertions of his desire to be represented by counsel at trial and repeated seeking of assistance of privately retained or court-appointed counsel. King v. People, 728 P.2d 1264 (Colo. 1986).

But before the court permits a waiver of counsel, the defendant should be made aware of the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation, so that the record will establish that he knows what he is doing and his choice is made with eyes open. People v. Campbell, 58 P.3d 1148 (Colo. App. 2002).

To conclude that defendant made an implied waiver, the record as a whole must establish that the defendant knowingly and voluntarily undertook a course of conduct that shows an unequivocal intent to abandon legal representation. The record may include those reasons proffered by the defendant, together with his or her background, experience, and conduct. King v. People, 728 P.2d 1264 (Colo. 1986); People v. Stanley, 56 P.3d 1241 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. Alengi, 114 P.3d 883 (Colo. App. 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 148 P.3d 154 (Colo. 2006).

Waiver of right to counsel not upheld where conduct of defendant might imply a "voluntary" waiver of right to counsel, but where the record did not establish that the implied waiver was knowing and intelligent, where the defendant's status as co-counsel or pro se party was never clarified or decisively determined by the court, and where the defendant clearly expressed his desire for counsel at every possible opportunity. People v. Arguello, 772 P.2d 87 (Colo. 1989).

Although every possible presumption against waiver of the right to representation should be indulged, a waiver may be implied if it is shown that a defendant knowingly and willingly undertook a course of conduct that revealed his intent to relinquish that right. People v. Rocha, 872 P.2d 1285 (Colo. App. 1993).

Absent waiver, no imprisonment unless representation by counsel. Absent a knowing and intelligent waiver, no person may be imprisoned for any offense however classified unless he was represented by counsel at his trial. People v. Roybal, 618 P.2d 1121 (Colo. 1980).

Court's responsibility to ascertain accused's intelligent waiver of right to counsel. The responsibility of the trial court when confronted with a request for self-representation is to ascertain whether the accused knowingly and intelligently decides to forego the traditional benefits associated with the right to counsel. People v. Lucero, 200 Colo. 335, 615 P.2d 660 (1980).

A court must make a careful inquiry of a defendant who, having previously indicated a desire to be represented, appears without counsel. This duty to inquire does not require the trial court to maintain a continuing vigilance over the financial affairs of the accused. People v. Alengi, 114 P.3d 883 (Colo. App. 2004), aff'd, 148 P.3d 154 (Colo. 2006).

A defendant may not manipulate the right to counsel in a manner that will impede the effective and efficient administration of justice. People v. Alengi, 114 P.3d 883 (Colo. App. 2004), aff'd, 148 P.3d 154 (Colo. 2006).

A trial court is not compelled to grant a criminal defendant's request to withdraw a valid waiver of the right to counsel, but must exercise its discretion in evaluating the circumstances surrounding the request. People v. Price, 903 P.2d 1190 (Colo. App. 1995).

If a defendant relinquishes the right to representation by counsel, that defendant also relinquishes the right to pursue any claim of ineffective assistance in the event that advisory counsel is appointed. People v. Downey, 994 P.2d 452 (Colo. App. 1999), aff'd, 25 P.3d 1200 (Colo. 2001).

However, defendant may assert an ineffective assistance of counsel claim if advisory counsel exceeds his role as advisory counsel and exercises a degree of control appropriate for legal representation. Limits imposed upon advisory counsel's unsolicited participation: (1) A pro se defendant must be allowed to control the organization and content of his own defense; and (2) advisory counsel may not, through unrequested participation, destroy the jury's perception that the defendant represents himself. Downey v. People, 25 P.3d 1200 (Colo. 2001).

Appropriate standard for appellate review of the validity of an in-court waiver of the right to counsel requires that, when defendant asserts such a waiver was invalid, the prosecution must establish a prima facie case that the waiver was effective. When the prima facie case has been established, the defendant may overcome it by presenting evidence from which it could be reasonably inferred that the waiver was not voluntary, knowing, and intentional. Prosecution need not demonstrate validity of waiver by clear and convincing evidence. People v. Arguello, 772 P.2d 87 (Colo. 1989); People v. Stanley, 56 P.3d 1241 (Colo. App. 2002).

A waiver cannot be knowing and intelligent unless the record clearly establishes that the defendant understands: The nature of the charges; the statutory offenses included within them; the range of allowable punishments; possible defenses to the charges and circumstances in mitigation; all of the facts essential to a broad understanding of the whole matter; and the requirement of complying with the rules of procedure at trial. People v. Arguello, 772 P.2d 87 (Colo. 1989); People v. Stanley, 56 P.3d 1241 (Colo. App. 2002).

The trial judge's benchbook provides several questions a trial court should ask every defendant who seeks to proceed pro se. People v. Arguello, 772 P.2d 87 (Colo. 1989); People v. Stanley, 56 P.3d 1241 (Colo. App. 2002).

In determining whether defendant's waiver is knowing and intelligent, the court must not only look at the advisement but also weigh the totality of the circumstances. People v. Arguello, 772 P.2d 87 (Colo. 1989); People v. Stanley, 56 P.3d 1241 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. Alengi, 114 P.3d 883 (Colo. App. 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 148 P.3d 154 (Colo. 2006).

A defendant's statement that he is aware of the right to counsel and desires to waive the right does not automatically end the court's responsibility. People v. Stanley, 56 P.3d 1241 (Colo. App. 2002).

Defendant's express waiver held invalid where the trial court's inquiries were not adequate to establish that defendant was aware of the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation. But a court's failure substantially to comply with this requirement does not alone preclude a valid implied waiver. People v. Arguello, 772 P.2d 87 (Colo. 1989); People v. Stanley, 56 P.3d 1241 (Colo. App. 2002).

Trial court did not adequately ascertain that defendant knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily decided to represent himself or herself. Defendant did not impliedly waive his or her right to counsel where, under the totality of the circumstances, defendant's conduct did not show an unequivocal intent to give up his or her right. People v. Rawson, 97 P.3d 315 (Colo. App. 2004).

Competency to stand trial is not a substitute for the level of inquiry and degree of competency necessary for a valid waiver of counsel. People v. Rawson, 97 P.3d 315 (Colo. App. 2004).

Trial court erred by denying request for appointment of conflict-free counsel at state expense for sentencing hearing. Defendant neither expressly nor impliedly waived his right to counsel; he merely stated that he did not want to represent himself. Defendant did not knowingly and willingly undertake a course of conduct that demonstrated an unequivocal intent to relinquish his right to representation. People v. Wallin, 167 P.3d 183 (Colo. App. 2007).

When a competent, but mentally ill defendant requests to represent himself or herself, the trial court must determine whether defendant is so mentally ill at the time of the request that defendant is incompetent to conduct the trial without the assistance of counsel. The court must consider whether the defendant is able to carry out the basic tasks needed to present his or her defense in the absence of counsel. People v. Davis, 2012 COA 1, __ P.3d __.

G. Miranda Rights and Exclusion of Evidence for Violation.

Exclusion of incriminating statements given without assistance of counsel. Under Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 84 S. Ct. 1758, 12 L. Ed. 2d 977 (1964), where an investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unsolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect, the suspect has been taken into police custody, the police carry out a process of interrogations that lends itself to eliciting incriminating statements, the suspect has requested and been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer, and the police have not effectively warned him of his absolute constitutional right to remain silent, the accused has been denied the assistance of counsel and no statement elicited by the police during the interrogation may be used against him at a criminal trial. Bean v. People, 164 Colo. 593, 436 P.2d 678 (1968).

Before statement from suspect in custody is excluded from evidence by reason of Escobedo rule, there must be (1) interrogation by police, (2) a denial of the accused's request to consult with counsel, and (3) a failure to warn. Bean v. People, 164 Colo. 593, 436 P.2d 678 (1968).

Miranda warning does not automatically apply when a defendant is interrogated by foreign officials in a foreign jurisdiction. Generally voluntary statements elicited by foreign officials are admissible. People v. Gomez-Garcia, 224 P.3d 1019 (Colo. App. 2009).

There is a joint venture exception to the general rule that Miranda warnings are not required by foreign officials in a foreign country. The exception applies when American agents actively participate in questioning conducted by foreign officials or somehow use foreign officials as their interrogation agents to circumvent a Miranda warning. In this case, the American official's role was limited to providing intelligence to the foreign officials and being present when the suspect made the statements to the foreign officials. The American official did not participate in the limited questioning by the foreign officials, so there was no joint venture. People v. Gomez-Garcia, 224 P.3d 1019 (Colo. App. 2009).

While an officer is obligated to ensure that a suspect is aware of and understands his or her constitutional rights, an officer is under no obligation to provide a lengthier explanation of the rights or the consequences of waiving those rights when the suspect clearly indicates he or she understands the rights. The officer told the suspect that the victim died after the suspect indicated she understood the Miranda warning, therefore, it had no bearing on the suspect's ability to understand her constitutional rights or her ability to make a knowing and intelligent waiver of her rights. People v. Humphrey, 132 P.3d 352 (Colo. 2006).

Officer gave defendant a sufficient Miranda advisement, and defendant was sufficiently coherent to validly waive his Miranda rights. People v. Grenier, 200 P.3d 1062 (Colo. App. 2008).

A request for counsel must be clear, unequivocal, and unambiguous. The court uses an objective inquiry to determine whether the request was clear, unequivocal, and unambiguous. In this case, defendant's statements related to an attorney were ambiguous. People v. Grenier, 200 P.3d 1062 (Colo. App. 2008).

"When can I talk to a lawyer?" is an unambiguous request for counsel. People v. Lynn, 2012 CO 45, 278 P.3d 365.

Defendant's invocation of the right to remain silent must be clear and unequivocal. Defendant did not clearly, unambiguously, and unequivocally invoke his right to remain silent. People v. Grenier, 200 P.3d 1062 (Colo. App. 2008).

Whether a statement is voluntary depends on the totality of the circumstances, which must demonstrate that the accused's statement is the product of his or her free will and rational choice. People v. Baird, 66 P.3d 183 (Colo. App. 2002).

Trial court erred in excluding statements based solely on the defendant's intoxication. Intoxication is only one factor the court can consider when considering the totality of circumstances. The record supports the defendant made a knowing and voluntary waiver of his or her rights despite his or her intoxication. People v. Platt, 81 P.3d 1060 (Colo. 2004).

Defendant's statements were not voluntary. Defendant was interrogated by police in his hospital bed after repeatedly indicating that he wanted to speak to an attorney and did not want to answer their questions, the officers informed him that he was not entitled to an attorney because he was not in custody, and a police officer was posted outside his hospital room during his stay; in total these circumstances indicate that defendant' statements were not voluntary. Effland v. People, 240 P.3d 868 (Colo. 2010).

Based on the totality of the circumstances, police violated defendant's right to remain silent by continuing to conduct a custodial interrogation after defendant invoked his right to remain silent. Detective did not scrupulously honor defendant's right to remain silent. During the three interviews, defendant was in a "harried emotional state". Detective failed to immediately cease questioning once defendant invoked his right, detective failed to give new Miranda warnings before the second interview or the beginning of the third interview, defendant was questioned about the same crime in all three interviews, and detective cast doubt on the usefulness of having an attorney present. In total, detective's words and actions demonstrated defendant's right to remain silent would not be respected. People v. Bonilla-Barraza, 209 P.3d 1090 (Colo. 2009).

Defendant's statements were knowingly and voluntarily made and were not the product of custodial interrogation. People v. Patnode, 126 P.3d 249 (Colo. App. 2005).

Defendant's statements were voluntary since the record does not indicate there was any coercion in getting defendant to make the statements. The trial court's concern over the lack of a videotape of the interrogation, the quick initiation of the questioning after securing the Miranda waiver, and the abrupt end to the audiotape do not suggest that the defendant was coerced into making any statements. People v. Gonzales-Zamora, 251 P.3d 1070 (Colo. 2011).

Defendant did not make a knowing and intelligent waiver of his Miranda rights because of the combined effects of translator's inadequate translation, substantial miscommunication between parties, and defendant's cultural background and limited intellectual functioning. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Translator did not adequately translate because of her own lack of understanding of the meaning of the rights. Translation was also flawed because the translator interrupted defendant, improperly summarized his responses, and did not always effectively explain instructions to him. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Miscommunication demonstrated that parties "frequently had no idea what the other was talking about". Miscommunication between parties took two forms: Interruptions by the interrogating officer and the interpreter, and unresponsive and nonsensical answers by the defendant. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Where defendant was functionally illiterate and had recently emigrated to the United States from a culture that had an entirely different cultural conception of legal disputes, defendant's cultural background and limited intellectual ability contributed to his inability to understand his Miranda rights. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

In considering the intoxication factor, the following issues are relevant: Whether the defendant seemed oriented to the surroundings and situation; whether the defendant's answers were responsive and appeared to be the product of a rational thought process; whether the defendant was able to appreciate the seriousness of the situation; whether the defendant had the foresight to attempt to deceive police in hopes of avoiding prosecution; whether the defendant expressed remorse for his or her actions; and whether the defendant expressly stated he or she understood their rights. People v. Platt, 81 P.3d

Volunteered statements not in response to interrogation not excluded. Where defendant, having been given the full warning of his constitutional rights on numerous occasions, requests to have an attorney before a lie detector test is disclosed, such request does not foreclose police from offering testimony concerning volunteered statements not in response to interrogation, made by defendant after he came face-to-face with person he had accused of participating in the robbery-murder. People v. Smith, 179 Colo. 413, 500 P.2d 1177 (1972).

Where defendant made an incriminating statement voluntarily and not in response to a question, his rights were not violated by its use at trial, even though he was not accompanied by counsel at the time he made the statement. Olguin v. People, 179 Colo. 26, 497 P.2d 1254 (1972).

Where defendant, after being informed of his Miranda rights and requesting counsel, asked a detective a question and then made an incriminating statement in response to the detective's answer, the response was voluntary and not a product of interrogation and, therefore, was admissible. People v. Knight, 167 P.3d 147 (Colo. App. 2006).

Defendant not subject to interrogation before receiving Miranda warning because detective's statements were not the functional equivalent of direct questioning. Detective's pre-Miranda warning statements were not intended to elicit an incriminating response, should not have been recognized as likely to elicit an incriminating response, and did not in fact elicit an incriminating response. Instead, detective's statements appear to have been an explanation of why defendant was being interviewed. People v. Madrid, 179 P.3d 1010 (Colo. 2008).

Where defendant made voluntary, knowing and intelligent waiver of his right to counsel and his right to remain silent, the trial court's ruling that the oral statement of the defendant was admissible is not error. Dyett v. People, 177 Colo. 370, 494 P.2d 94 (1972); People v. Blessett, 155 P.3d 388 (Colo. App. 2006).

Defendant's course of conduct indicated that he knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his Miranda rights. Defendant acknowledged that he understood his rights, answered the officer's questions without hesitation, had numerous opportunities to pause and invoke his rights and failed to do so until the officer told him that witnesses had identified him as the shooter. People v. Martin, 222 P.3d 331 (Colo. 2010).

Defendant's waiver was voluntary since the record lacked any evidence of government intimidation, misconduct, or trickery. Defendant's waiver was knowing and intelligent even though he did not provide any verbal responses, and defendant's non-verbal cues indicated that he was aware of and comprehending the rights he was waiving. People v. Gonzales-Zamora, 251 P.3d 1070 (Colo. 2011).

The trial court erred as a matter of law finding that the defendant's statements were involuntary. The court must find that the defendant's will had been overborne by coercive official action to make a finding that the defendant's statements were involuntary. People v. Wood, 135 P.3d 744 (Colo. 2006).

Record supports trial court's finding that defendant's will was not overborne by police conduct or coercion and that his waiver and subsequent statements were voluntary. Although the interview began in a confrontational manner and officers were initially aggressive with defendant, after that initial tension, interrogation became civil and calm. People v. McGlotten, 166 P.3d 182 (Colo. App. 2007).

Defendant's failure to request counsel did not bar application of Escobedo rule. Nez v. People, 167 Colo. 23, 445 P.2d 68 (1968); People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 373, 489 P.2d 588 (1971).

Alleged error in introducing defendant's admission at trial held not reviewable on appeal. Alleged error in introducing at trial, through the testimony of a police officer, defendant's post-arrest admission of his age, which was made without benefit of counsel, was not reviewable on appeal where no contemporaneous objection was made to the evidence and the alleged error was not raised in the motion for new trial. People v. Chavez, 179 Colo. 316, 500 P.2d 365 (1972).

No reason exists for exclusion of evidence obtained from uncounseled witness so long as the evidence obtained is not offered against that witness. People v. Knapp, 180 Colo. 280, 505 P.2d 7 (1973).

Whether one is in custody for purposes of Miranda rights is a factual determination to be made by the trial court. If defendant was not in custody, he may not have statements suppressed. People v. Braxton, 807 P.2d 1214 (Colo. App. 1990).

But for purposes of appeal, determining whether a person is in custody for Miranda purposes is a mixed question of law and fact that requires de novo review by the appellate courts. People v. Matheny, 46 P.3d 453 (Colo. 2002); People v. Elmarr, 181 P.3d 1157 (Colo. 2008).

The court erred by applying the standard for fourth amendment seizures to the question of custody for Miranda purposes. People v. Hughes, 252 P.3d 1118 (Colo. 2011).

Miranda warnings are not required in routine traffic stops, especially where the offense for which the defendant was stopped will result in only the issuance of a summons. People v. Clements, 665 P.2d 624 (Colo. 1983).

Miranda warnings are not required when the interrogation occurs over the telephone. People v. Platt, 81 P.3d 1060 (Colo. 2004).

In determining whether interaction between police and a suspect constitutes interrogation under Miranda, the primary focus is on the perceptions of the suspect, but the intent of the police may have a bearing on whether the police should have known that their words or actions were reasonably likely to evoke an incriminating response. People v. Shetewi, 679 P.2d 1107 (Colo. App. 1983).

Defendant's statement was not result of the custodial interrogation. Defendant stated "I done bad" while holding a knife to his throat after the officer asked him "What are you doing?" Under the totality of circumstances, there was no custodial interrogation. People v. Vigil, 104 P.3d 258 (Colo. App. 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 127 P.3d 916 (Colo. 2006).

The police did not pose any question to the defendant that prompted the statement about the fanny pack, nor did they make any statements or take any actions that they should have known were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response, thus there was no Miranda violation as to that statement. People v. Milligan, 77 P.3d 771 (Colo. App. 2003).

Nontestimonial evidence obtained after defendant initiates further communication and makes a voluntary statement about the evidence's location is admissible, even after law enforcement issues a Miranda advisement and defendant states that he does not want to speak further. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

In determining whether questioning of an inmate was "custodial" for purposes of a Miranda advisement, a different standard must be applied. The court must look at the totality of the circumstances to determine whether the questioning involved an added imposition on the inmate's freedom of movement. People v. Parsons, 15 P.3d 799 (Colo. App. 2000).

Defendant should have been advised of his Miranda rights because he was in custody when officer proceeded to interrogate him after finding pot pipe during valid consensual pat down search. People v. Thomas, 839 P.2d 1174 (Colo. 1992).

Routine police encounter turned into a custodial situation following a failed sobriety test; defendant was physically surrounded by officers, was not free to go during questioning, and had "objective reasons to believe that he was under arrest"; such circumstances constituted custody. Incriminating statements made by defendant prior to being advised of his Miranda rights were consequently suppressed. People v. Null, 233 P.3d 670 (Colo. 2010).

Court erred in finding defendant was not in custody during interview. The record shows defendant had been arrested, handcuffed, and transported to a secure interview room with officers where he was interviewed for about two hours. A reasonable person in that situation would believe that he was not free to leave, even though defendant was questioned about offenses other than those for which he was arrested. People v. McGlotten, 166 P.3d 182 (Colo. App. 2007).

Trial court erred by failing to consider the totality of the circumstances in determining that defendant was in custody. The trial court cannot suppress defendant's statements made in response to police interrogation without a Miranda warning based solely on the fact that, after the polygraph test, the detective told defendant that she failed and that she lied. People v. Pittman, 2012 CO 55, 284 P.3d 59.

Defendant's incriminating statements were obtained in violation of his Miranda rights, and trial court's order to suppress the statements was appropriate. A reasonable person in defendant's circumstances would have felt deprived of his or her freedom of action in a manner similar to a formal arrest. Therefore, defendant was in custody and subject to interrogation without being advised of his Miranda rights. People v. Holt, 233 P.3d 1194 (Colo. 2010).

Record supports court's finding that defendant was not in custody during second interview. Defendant was interviewed after being released while assisting the police as a confidential informant. People v. McGlotten, 166 P.3d 182 (Colo. App. 2007).

Miranda warnings not required when defendant was not in custody at time of detective's brief questioning. Defendant was not in custody when police officers asked him to sit outside his home with other occupants of the home while the officers searched it. People v. Mumford, 275 P.3d 667 (Colo. App. 2010), aff'd, 2012 CO 2, 270 P.3d 953.

Defendant was not in custody when a consensual interview took place at the defendant's residence and in the presence of defendant's wife. People v. Cowart, 244 P.3d 1199 (Colo. 2010).

Defendant not in custody. The interrogation took place in broad daylight and lasted less than 15 to 20 minutes. The deputies spoke in normal tones, did not display their weapons, and did not threaten or accuse the defendant. Based on the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person would not have found his or her freedom of action deprived to the degree associated with a formal arrest. People v. Allman, 2012 COA 212, __

P.3d __.

Statements made by the defendant to a police informant are admissible and did not violate the defendant's right to counsel. People v. Aalbu, 696 P.2d 796 (Colo. 1985).

It was harmless error for the judge to conduct an ex parte interview of a child victim prior to a sentencing hearing under circumstances in which the record of the interview demonstrated that the child's statements were already available to the court through other means. People v. Loyd, 902 P.2d 889 (Colo. App. 1995).

Questioning must cease upon request for counsel. Once the accused has asked for counsel, questioning by law enforcement officers must be terminated immediately and may not be resumed until counsel is present. People v. Pierson, 633 P.2d 485 (Colo. App. 1981), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 670 P.2d 770 (Colo. 1983); People v. Benjamin, 732 P.2d 1167 (Colo. 1987).

Police questioning should immediately cease when the defendant expresses a need to consult an attorney. People v. Cook, 665 P.2d 640 (Colo. App. 1983); People v. Martinez, 789 P.2d 420 (Colo. 1990).

Where defendant's request for counsel pursuant to Miranda was ambiguous and equivocal, interrogating officer's subsequent clarifying questions were permissible. People v. Broder, 222 P.3d 323 (Colo. 2010).

Statement by defendant's attorney in a proceeding unrelated to an investigation did not constitute a request for counsel. This conclusion is based upon the following: The supreme court has never held that a person can invoke his or her Miranda rights anticipatorily in a context other than custodial interrogation; the fifth amendment right to counsel is a personal right that may be invoked only by suspect; counsel's statement was made to a court and not to an investigatory law enforcement authority; and the invocation of the sixth amendment right to counsel does not invoke the fifth amendment right to counsel. People v. Vasquez, 155 P.3d 588 (Colo. App. 2006).

"I should talk to a lawyer . . . because I want to go to trial on this." was a sufficient request for counsel under the totality of the circumstances. Oral and written statements made after the request must be suppressed. People v. District Court, 953 P.2d 184 (Colo. 1998).

Thirty-second pause did not constitute the cessation of interrogation by police and the voluntary resumption by defendant. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Defendant's statements that "I'm going to have to talk to an attorney about that" and response of "well, yeah" when asked if he wanted "to talk to a lawyer now" constituted an unambiguous and unequivocal request for counsel during interrogation, and the trial court properly suppressed defendant's subsequent incriminating statements. People v. Bradshaw, 156 P.3d 452 (Colo. 2007).

When an accused makes an ambiguous statement that might reasonably be construed as a request for counsel, interrogation must cease immediately except for very limited questions to clarify the ambiguous statement or to clarify the defendant's wishes regarding the presence of counsel. People v. Benjamin, 732 P.2d 1167 (Colo. 1987).

Defendant's initial request for counsel not ambiguous and police officer's assurance that defendant was not being questioned about a specific crime and that he did not need an attorney to answer questions about that crime did not render the request for counsel ambiguous. People v. Kleber, 859 P.2d 1361 (Colo. 1991).

Fact that the police deliberately failed to disclose to the defendant the subject matter of the interrogation cannot transform defendant's clear request for counsel into an ambiguous statement. People v. Kleber, 859 P.2d 1361 (Colo. 1993).

Else statements inadmissible. Once the accused has requested counsel, any statements made in response to further interrogation by the law enforcement officers are inadmissible. People v. Pierson, 633 P.2d 485 (Colo. App. 1981), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 670 P.2d 770 (Colo. 1983).

Defendant's statement to police made after request for counsel was result of unlawful interrogation, and, since such statement contained the only evidence of an element of the crime (forgery), use of the statement at trial constituted prejudicial error. People v. Johnson, 712 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1985).

Reinterrogation after release from custody. Defendant's request for counsel, made while in police custody and prior to release, does not prohibit police interrogation at a later time if defendant is properly advised of his rights before any subsequent interrogation; however, such reinterrogation is not permissible if the defendant's release was contrived, pretextual, or done in bad faith. People v. Trujillo, 773 P.2d 1086 (Colo. 1989).

Evidence held inadmissible where it was obtained after police officer told defendant not to talk to his attorney. People v. Hyun Soo Son, 723 P.2d 1337 (Colo. 1986).

Unless the court determines that the statements made were voluntary and that the statements themselves denote an intent to waive the right to counsel. Where an accused initiates further conversations with the police and makes additional statements after the police have ceased questioning him, a valid waiver of the right to counsel may be determined by the totality of the circumstances. People v. Fox, 691 P.2d 349 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Martinez, 789 P.2d 420 (Colo. 1990).

Unless defendant initiates conversation. However, where defendant, properly advised of his rights, initiated a conversation with detective and the detective's response was not custodial interrogation, the trial court did not err in admitting the defendant's statements into evidence. People v. Morgan, 681 P.2d 970 (Colo. App. 1984).

Trial court erred in suppressing voluntary statements made by arrestee to police investigator. Arrestee initiated conversation with the investigator and the investigator did not deliberately elicit statements from the arrestee. The court, upon finding that the arrestee was not being subjected to interrogation, need not have considered whether the arrestee waived his fifth or sixth amendment rights. People v. Ross, 821 P.2d 816 (Colo. 1992).

No readvisement of Miranda rights required for voluntary statement made after police ended interrogation because of request for counsel. People v. Rivas, 13 P.3d 315 (Colo. 2000).

Case remanded for further findings of fact to determine whether the questioned statement was obtained as a product of custodial interrogation in violation of Edwards and Miranda. People v. Martinez, 789 P.2d 420 (Colo. 1990).

Two inquiries must be made when the defendant seeks to suppress statements on the basis that governmental officials improperly ignored a request for counsel: (1) Whether an accused actually invoked his right to counsel; and (2) if so, whether that request was scrupulously honored. People v. Benjamin, 732 P.2d 1167 (Colo. 1987).

Where defendant's lawyer was denied access to defendant during interrogation in which confessions were obtained, defendant was denied the right to counsel, and all of defendant's statements made after defendant's counsel arrived at police station to see him were inadmissible. People v. Harris, 703 P.2d 667 (Colo. App. 1985).

The general rule is that statements will be admitted after retention of counsel where the accused initiates the conversation, there is a valid waiver of the right to counsel and the right to remain silent, and the defendant's statements were voluntary. People v. Tafoya, 703 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1985).

Reading Miranda rights not necessarily sufficient to purge taint of initial illegal questioning. Simply reading a defendant his Miranda rights is not necessarily sufficient to purge the taint of an initial illegal questioning by breaking the causal chain between that questioning and the statement obtained subsequent to the time the defendant received his Miranda rights. People v. Lowe, 200 Colo. 470, 616 P.2d 118 (1980).

However, the United States supreme court in Oregon v. Elstad, 105 U.S. 1285, 105 S. Ct. 1285, 84 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1985), ruled that a careful and thorough administration of Miranda warnings may cure the condition that rendered the previous unwarned statement inadmissible. People v. Harris, 703 P.2d 667 (Colo. App. 1985).

Even though defendant's initial voluntary statements to police officer prior to Miranda warnings were not admissible, defendant's subsequent confession, made after belated Miranda warnings were read to defendant, was admissible where there was no evidence that either the environment or the manner of the initial interrogation was coercive and, although belated, the reading of defendant's rights was complete and was completed three times. People v. Harris, 703 P.2d 667 (Colo. App. 1985).

Defendant's execution of a request for a determination of indigency form and fact that defendant was interviewed by an investigator from the public defender's office was not sufficient to constitute an unambiguous invocation of his right to counsel; therefore, subsequent voluntary waiver of right to counsel after being readvised of his rights by officer with no knowledge of earlier events was not obtained by impermissible police conduct and was not subject to suppression. People v. Benjamin, 732 P.2d 1167 (Colo. 1987).

Even if defendant was placed under arrest without probable cause, defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to remain silent, and, thus, his second statement to police chief did not require suppression as product of illegal arrest, where probable cause to arrest existed within minutes after arrest and defendant received full and complete Miranda advisement before giving second statement. People v. Koolbeck, 703 P.2d 673 (Colo. App. 1985).

In determining whether a person is in custody for purposes of Miranda rights, a court must consider whether a reasonable person in the suspect's position would consider himself significantly deprived of his liberty. People v. Johnson, 671 P.2d 958 (Colo. 1983); People v. Thiret, 685 P.2d 193 (Colo. 1984); People v. Black, 698 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1984); People v. Gordon, 738 P.2d 404 (Colo. App. 1987); People v. Fury, 872 P.2d 1280 (Colo. App. 1993); People v. Baird, 66 P.3d 183 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. Trujillo, 75 P.3d 1133 (Colo. App. 2003); People v. Milligan, 77 P.3d 771 (Colo. App. 2003); People v. Howard, 92 P.3d 445 (Colo. 2004).

In deciding whether a reasonable person would believe himself or herself to be deprived of his or her freedom of action, the court must consider the totality of circumstances.

The factors the court should consider are: The time, place, and purpose of the encounter; the persons present during the interrogation; the words spoken by the officer to the defendant; the officer's tone of voice and general demeanor; the length and mood of the interrogation; whether any limitation of movement or other form of restraint was placed on the defendant during the interrogation; the officer's response to any questions asked by the defendant; whether directions were given to the defendant during the interrogation; and the defendant's verbal or nonverbal response to such directions. People v. Howard, 92 P.3d 445 (Colo. 2004); People v. Elmarr, 181 P.3d 1157 (Colo. 2008).

Subjective intent of police officer is not a factor to consider in determining whether a suspect is in custody for purposes of Miranda warning. Court may not rest its conclusion that a defendant is in custody based upon a police officer's unarticulated plan to arrest the defendant. The standard is whether, after analyzing the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have felt deprived of freedom to the degree associated with a formal arrest. People v. Klinck, 259 P.3d 489 (Colo. 2011).

Voluntary statements made in violation of Miranda may be used for impeachment purposes. People v. Klinck, 259 P.3d 489 (Colo. 2011).

And the police officer's subjective state of mind is not an appropriate standard for determining whether an individual has been deprived of his freedom of movement in any significant way under the fifth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. People v. Black, 698 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1984); People v. Howard, 92 P.3d 445 (Colo. 2004); People v. Klinck, 259 P.3d 489 (Colo. 2011).

Defendant was in custody for purposes of Miranda. Defendant was interrogated by police in his hospital bed after repeatedly indicating that he wanted to speak to an attorney and did not want to answer their questions, the officers informed him that he was not entitled to an attorney because he was not in custody, and a police officer was posted outside his hospital room during his stay; in total these circumstances indicate that defendant was in custody. Effland v. People, 240 P.3d 868 (Colo. 2010).

Not in custody for Miranda purposes. People v. Howard, 92 P.3d 445 (Colo. 2004).

Interrogation, for purposes of the Miranda rule, does not include questions "normally attendant to arrest and custody" such as the routine gathering of basic identifying data needed for booking and arraignment. People v. Anderson, 837 P.2d 293 (Colo. App. 1992).

A defendant is not subject to "custodial" questioning when the detectives tell the defendant he or she is free to leave before the questioning begins and remind the defendant during the questioning. People v. Blessett, 155 P.3d 388 (Colo. App. 2006).

Detective's questioning to elicit incriminating response constituted custodial interrogation. Where detective intended to elicit an incriminating response from the defendant, detective's initial question to the defendant, "Do you know why you are here?", constituted custodial interrogation. People v. Lowe, 200 Colo. 470, 616 P.2d 118 (1980).

Whether an interrogation is custodial determined from totality of circumstances. People v. Thiret, 685 P.2d 193 (Colo. 1984).

Trial court's findings that police officers were dishonest with the defendant, that questioning took place in a private room, that the officers physically separated the defendant from the door, that significant portions of the interview were highly confrontational and accusatory, and that interrogating officer's questions provided all the details of the incident and were designed essentially to force agreement from the defendant were sufficient, under the totality of the circumstances, for the defendant to reasonably believe that he was in custody, despite officer's belief that defendant was not in custody until warrant was executed. People v. Minjarez, 81 P.3d 348 (Colo. 2003).

Interrogation includes any words or actions on the part of an interrogating officer that he or she should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the defendant. To determine if an officer should have known his or her actions or words were reasonably likely to elicit a response, the totality of the circumstances surrounding the statement are considered. The focus of inquiry is on whether the officer reasonably should have known his or her words or actions would cause the defendant to perceive that he or she was being interrogated. In this instance, the defendant's statements were in response to the detective's "relationship building" efforts, in response to information presented by the detective about the investigation, and in response to the detective's desire to get defendant's side of the story. In totality, the statements were the product of a custodial interrogation. People v. Wood, 135 P.3d 744 (Colo. 2006).

The transportation officer's questions did not constitute interrogation. The officer's questions were asked to determine the cooperation level of the defendant, and the officer had no reason to expect the questions would elicit an incriminating response. People v. Wilson, 2012 COA 163M, __ P.3d __.

Validity of waiver based on totality of circumstances. The ultimate question in situations where an initial Miranda advisement was given and a waiver obtained followed by a later interrogation not preceded by another Miranda advisement is whether, considering the totality of the circumstances, the defendant was sufficiently aware of the continuing nature of his constitutional rights as to render any subsequent statement the result of a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of those rights. People v. Chase, 719 P.2d 718 (Colo. 1986).

No violation of Miranda rights. Defendant was sufficiently advised of his Miranda rights after receiving three separate Miranda advisements, each of which were individually sufficient. Defendant's waiver was knowing and intelligent based on his questions regarding his rights and his indication that he understood his rights. Further, there is no evidence that his alleged intoxication precluded a knowing and intelligent waiver: The defendant was oriented to his surroundings and provided answers to the detective's questions and asked his own questions. Finally, defendant's waiver was voluntary since he did not face any societal or subjective pressures any different from anyone else in a similar situation. People v. Clayton, 207 P.3d 831 (Colo. 2009).

Defendant's statement after waiving his Miranda right was voluntary. People v. Al-Yousif, 206 P.3d 824 (Colo. App. 2006).

Intoxication does not per se preclude a defendant from making a voluntary waiver of his or her Miranda rights. The court must consider the totality of circumstances to determine whether the defendant was capable of understanding the nature and consequences of the rights being waived. People v. Cardenas, 25 P.3d 1258 (Colo. App. 2000).

Record required to show waiver of Miranda rights. A knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of Miranda rights requires more than a silent record. People v. Chavez, 632 P.2d 574 (Colo. 1981).

Evidence held insufficient that defendant waived Miranda rights. People v. Chavez, 632 P.2d 574 (Colo. 1981).

When demand for counsel akin to effort to forestall trial. Prior rejection of the court's repeated offers to appoint counsel and continued opposition to any assistance from advisory counsel at all times made defendant's request for counsel on the day of trial more akin to a calculated effort to forestall the trial than to a legitimate request for legal assistance. People v. Lucero, 200 Colo. 335, 615 P.2d 660 (1980).

Interrogation by police in employer's office was custodial interrogation considering totality of circumstances including purpose of the interview, the words used by the officers, the setting and duration of the interview, and that defendant was never informed that he was free to leave. People v. LaFrankie, 858 P.2d 702 (Colo. 1993).

Physical evidence collected by swabbing of defendant's mouth following a Miranda violation properly admitted because the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine does not apply to Miranda violations and the swabs were not collected in violation of the fourth or fifth amendment. People v. Bradshaw, 156 P.3d 452 (Colo. 2007).

For a confession to be involuntary, police coercion must play a significant role in obtaining it. The test is whether defendant's will was overborne by mentally or physically coercive conduct. Under the totality of circumstances, any threats or promises made during interrogation did not play a significant role in inducing defendant to confess. People v. Blessett, 155 P.3d 388 (Colo. App. 2006).

Coercive governmental action to render a statement involuntary means more than just misstatements or refusing to stop an interrogation when a defendant is upset. People v. Speer, 216 P.3d 18 (Colo. App. 2007).

Interrogation by the booking officer after defendant confessed did not require a new Miranda warning since the questioning was similar to the original questioning and was sought to clarify the previous statement. People v. Blessett, 155 P.3d 388 (Colo. App. 2006).

A defendant's spontaneous utterance will not be excluded where there is no interrogation. The defendant's statements recorded by a video camera while the detective was out of the room are admissible. The defendant does not have to consent to the recording before the statements may be admissible. People v. Wood, 135 P.3d 744 (Colo. 2006).

H. Right to Counsel During Line-up.

It is constitutional error to conduct a line-up for identification purposes without presence of counsel unless waived by the suspect. Brady v. People, 175 Colo. 252, 486 P.2d 436 (1971).

Juvenile suspect is to be afforded same rights as adult with respect to line-up procedures. In re Rules by Juvenile Court, 178 Colo. 268, 496 P.2d 1014 (1972).

Line-up identification made prior to filing of charges is not tainted by the absence of defendant's consent or the absence of a warning to the defendant concerning the possible consequences of the line-up and the function of counsel. Massey v. People, 179 Colo. 167, 498 P.2d 953 (1972).

Line-up on unrelated charge with counsel present. A person properly detained on an unrelated charge can be exhibited in a line-up where he is advised of his rights and represented by counsel. People v. Hodge, 186 Colo. 189, 526 P.2d 309 (1974).

Where in-court identifications have source independent from line-up. Assuming absence of counsel at line-up, unfair suggestiveness that might lead to irreparable in-court misidentification does not result where the record supports an informed judgment that the in-court identifications have an independent source, separate and apart from the line-up. People v. Duncan, 179 Colo. 253, 500 P.2d 137 (1972).

Line-up information sheet found inadequate to advise accused of his right to counsel. People v. Bowen, 176 Colo. 302, 490 P.2d 295 (1971).

Line-up testimony properly excluded where the state did not meet its burden of showing by clear and convincing evidence that defendant was represented by counsel at the line-up. Fresquez v. People, 178 Colo. 220, 497 P.2d 1246 (1972).

Defendant not denied effective assistance of counsel at pretrial line-up when the attorney who represented him also appeared for a codefendant at the line-up and was later appointed to represent a codefendant who elected to testify for the prosecution if there was no evidence that counsel failed to safeguard the rights of the defendant or that counsel was ineffective in eliminating the hazards which make the line-up a critical stage of the proceedings. Ortega v. People, 178 Colo. 419, 498 P.2d 1121 (1972).

Where an attorney actually participated in the events that led up to the presentation of the participants in the line-up, that is, where he was permitted to confer with two of the persons who were placed for viewing; he conferred with the defendant; his efforts resulted in the defendant being viewed as clean-shaven, with his hair combed, to conform with that aspect of the appearance of the other members of the line-up; he was successful in having all such members placed in jackets to conform with the fact that defendant was wearing a jacket, albeit the defendant's was plaid; and he never objected as to the manner in which the line-up was conducted nor objected to the line-up itself, defendant could not claim that his right to counsel had been abridged. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

Where counsel for defendant was not allowed to be present during a police post line-up interrogation of an eyewitness, but where the court disregarded the line-up identification in rendering its decision, defendant was not deprived of his right to counsel. Stewart v. People, 175 Colo. 304, 487 P.2d 371 (1971).

Where the defendant asserts that the identification which occurred at the line-up was tainted because he had not been taken before a magistrate in accordance with the requirements of Crim. P. 5, and had, therefore, not been properly advised of his rights, he overlooked the fact that he signed advisement forms which fully complied with the dictates of Miranda and he was also represented by the public defender at the line-up and reversal, therefore, was not called for. People v. Bugarin, 181 Colo. 57, 507 P.2d 879 (1973).

Counsel need not be provided for photographic identification procedures. People v. Barker, 180 Colo. 28, 501 P.2d 1041 (1972); People v. Knapp, 180 Colo. 280, 505 P.2d 7 (1973).

Counsel is not required at a photographic display or line-up which takes place during the investigative stage of the criminal proceeding. Brown v. People, 177 Colo. 397, 494 P.2d 587 (1972); People v. Bugarin, 181 Colo. 57, 507 P.2d 879 (1973); People v. Moreno, 181 Colo. 106, 507 P.2d 857 (1973); People v. Renfro, 181 Colo. 159, 508 P.2d 396 (1973); People v. Ortega, 181 Colo. 223, 508 P.2d 784 (1973).

Photographic identification while a criminal case is in the investigatory stage must be approved if the procedures used are not suggestive and do not coerce identification. Brown

v. People, 177 Colo. 397, 494 P.2d 587 (1972).

Where a photographic line-up occurred more than one month prior to the filing of a formal charge, the issue of provision of counsel is shorn of its significance because counsel need not be provided to an accused at a line-up when the line-up occurred at the investigatory stage of the proceedings and before the commencement of the adversary criminal proceedings. People v. Barker, 180 Colo. 28, 501 P.2d 1041 (1972).

Where the record showed that all photographic displays and line-ups were conducted during the investigative stages of the case, several months prior to the indictment of appellant, appellant was not, therefore, entitled to counsel either at the photographic displays or at the line-ups under these circumstances. People v. Lowe, 184 Colo. 182, 519 P.2d 344 (1974).

Where face-to-face identification preceded filing of information, there was no requirement of provision of counsel. People v. Barker, 180 Colo. 28, 501 P.2d 1041 (1972).

I. Effective Assistance of Counsel.

Law reviews. For comment, "Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Under People v. Pozo: Advising Non-Citizen Criminal Defendants of Possible Immigration Consequences in Criminal Plea Agreements", see 80 Colo. L. Rev. 793 (2009).

Competent counsel and defense satisfy court's obligation. When the state provides competent counsel, and that counsel ably and competently conducts the defense, the state has satisfied its constitutional obligation. Valarde v. People, 156 Colo. 375, 399 P.2d 245 (1965); Martinez v. People, 173 Colo. 515, 480 P.2d 843 (1971).

If the court appoints one attorney, that is sufficient, and the judge may assume his duty is fulfilled unless the defendant makes known some good reason why the counsel appointed could not fairly or properly represent him, or something comes to the court's attention which might reasonably so indicate. Martinez v. People, 173 Colo. 515, 480 P.2d 843 (1971).

Right of indigent defendant to assistance of counsel during critical stages of criminal proceeding is absolute, beginning with the accusatory stage, continuing through the arraignment, the actual trial on the merits of the cause, and culminating in the appellate phases of the criminal proceeding. Cruz v. Patterson, 253 F. Supp. 805 (D. Colo.), aff'd, 363 F.2d 879 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 975, 87 S. Ct. 501, 17 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1966).

In addition to an accused's guaranteed right to the presence of counsel at trial, such right is available to him at any stage of the prosecution, formal or informal, where the absence of counsel might derogate from his right to a fair trial. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

Indigent defendants convicted of a crime are entitled to have counsel appointed at state expense to represent them at trial and on review. Stanmore v. People, 157 Colo. 207, 401 P.2d 829, cert. denied, 380 U.S. 985, 85 S. Ct. 1355, 14 L. Ed. 2d 277 (1965); Adargo v. People, 159 Colo. 321, 411 P.2d 245 (1966).

Where the merits of the one and only appeal an indigent has as of right are decided without benefit of counsel, an unconstitutional line has been drawn between rich and poor. In re Griffin, 152 Colo. 347, 382 P.2d 202 (1963).

This principle is clear and unambiguous. Cruz v. Patterson, 253 F. Supp. 805 (D. Colo.), aff'd, 363 F.2d 879 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 975, 87 S. Ct. 501, 17 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1966).

The rationale is twofold: (1) The presence of a defense-oriented professional might serve to prevent the use of prejudicial identification measures, and (2) the absence of counsel at a line-up might deprive an accused of the ability effectively to reconstruct at trial any unfairness that occurred at the line-up and thus deprive him of his only opportunity meaningfully to attack the credibility of the witnesses' courtroom identification. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

Right to counsel requires effective assistance of advocate. The indigent, like the nonindigent, is entitled to the benefit of counsel's examination into the record, research of the law, and marshalling of arguments on his behalf. The indigent is entitled to the full and complete assistance of counsel at all phases of the appellate review. It is inherent in such guarantee that counsel so appointed by the state shall be effective counsel. For counsel to be an effective representative of his client, he must be an advocate of that client's cause. Cruz v. Patterson, 253 F. Supp. 805 (D. Colo.), aff'd, 363 F.2d 879 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 975, 87 S. Ct. 501, 17 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1966).

Effective assistance of counsel is one of defendant's most fundamental rights. People v. O'Neill, 185 Colo. 202, 523 P.2d 123 (1974).

The constitutional right to counsel requires that defense counsel render reasonably effective assistance. People v. Stroup, 624 P.2d 913 (Colo. App. 1980), rev'd in application of principle, 656 P.2d 680 (Colo. 1982).

A criminal defendant is entitled to receive the reasonably effective assistance of an attorney acting as his diligent and conscientious advocate. People v. Norman, 703 P. 2d 1261 (Colo. 1985); People v. Benney, 757 P.2d 1078 (Colo. App. 1987).

And lack impairs other rights. Defendant's ability to assert any right may be seriously impaired by lack of effective assistance of counsel. People v. O'Neill, 185 Colo. 202, 523 P.2d 123 (1974).

The mere presence of an attorney does not constitute effective representation of counsel. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

A defendant who expressly waives his or her right to assert ineffective assistance of counsel in a plea agreement can still raise that challenge on the question of whether the guilty plea was knowing, voluntary, and intelligent. People v. Stovall, 2012 COA 7M, 284 P.3d 151.

In order to allege ineffective assistance of counsel, the defendant must demonstrate to the trial court that his trial counsel was guilty of palpable malfeasance, misfeasance or nonfeasance. Valdez v. District Court, 171 Colo. 436, 467 P.2d 825 (1970); People v. O'Neill, 185 Colo. 202, 523 P.2d 123 (1974).

Bad faith, sham, or farcical representation would have to appear to sustain a collateral attack against the conviction upon the theory of denial of effective assistance of counsel. Melton v. People, 157 Colo. 169, 401 P.2d 605 (1965), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 624, 86 S. Ct. 624, 15 L. Ed. 2d 528 (1966).

To prove a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, defendant must establish: (1) Counsel's performance fell below the level of reasonably competent assistance demanded of attorneys in criminal cases; and (2) the deficient performance prejudiced the defense. To establish prejudice, the defendant must demonstrate a reasonable probability that, but for the counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004); People v. Vieyra, 169 P.3d 205 (Colo. App. 2007); People v. Carmichael, 179 P.3d 47 (Colo. App.

2007), rev'd on other grounds, 206 P.3d 800 (Colo. 2009).

There is no dispute that trial counsel rendered deficient performance; therefore, defendant must establish he was prejudiced by that performance. To establish prejudice, defendant must provide some objective evidence supporting his self-serving claims of prejudice. There are three pieces of objective corroborating sources of evidence. First, defendant's attorney testified that he believed defendant rejected the plea bargain based on the attorney's deficient advice. Second, there was a large disparity in the sentence exposure that defendant's attorney told him he was facing compared to the actual sentence exposure. Finally, defendant was pursuing a plea bargain despite his claims of innocence. Carmichael v. People, 206 P.3d 800 (Colo. 2009).

The appropriate remedy in this case in which defendant's attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel during plea negotiations is a new trial. A new trial will restore the defendant to the position he enjoyed prior to his attorney's flawed performance, allowing the defendant to reengage in plea negotiations. Carmichael v. People, 206 P.3d 800 (Colo. 2009).

Counsel's failure to exercise peremptory challenges does not amount to ineffective assistance of counsel absent a showing that defendant was prejudiced by counsel's failure to exercise the challenges. People v. Vieyra, 169 P.3d 205 (Colo. App. 2007).

Incompetency of counsel. When trial counsel fails to prepare his client's case and offers representation that is no more than a sham and a facade and constitutes a mockery of justice, the claim of incompetency of counsel is well-founded. People v. White, 182 Colo. 417, 514 P.2d 69 (1973).

Competency of counsel. Defendant was not denied his constitutional right to the effective assistance of counsel. Defense counsel performed a sufficient investigation and follow-up of the mental health mitigation evidence. Defense counsel made a reasonable decision not to present the mental health mitigation evidence considering it would open the door to damaging malingering evidence. Assuming arguendo that the decision not to present the evidence was deficient, there was no prejudice to the alleged error since the strength of the evidence against defendant at the guilt and penalty phase was overwhelming. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

The right to effective assistance of counsel includes the right to conflict-free counsel. That right can be waived, however, by the defendant through a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent waiver. In this case, defendant provided a written waiver, and the court questioned defendant in regard to the waiver, finding defendant's waiver was voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. In addition, defendant's right to retain counsel of choice is entitled to great deference. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Defense counsel made a reasonable decision not to present evidence that defendant would be housed at a maximum security facility if sentenced to life imprisonment since the prosecution had contrary videotape evidence of convicted murderers in less secure facilities. Although defendant disagreed with the strategic choice, he did not prove that the decision fell below the "wide range of reasonable professional assistance". Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

The record does not support defendant's argument that the guilt phase opening statement fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. The strategic changes by the defense during trial that deviated from the opening statement were reasonable decisions considering the circumstances of the trial. Even if the guilt phase opening statement was deficient, defendant was not prejudiced. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

The record does not support defendant's argument that the opening statement during the penalty phase fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. The fact that the witnesses did not provide as graphic and effective testimony as hoped for does not render counsel's representation ineffective. Even if the penalty phase opening statement was deficient, defendant was not prejudiced. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Defense counsel's expression of dislike of defendant during the closing was part of a reasonable strategy to empower at least one juror to pick a life sentence instead of the death penalty. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Defense counsel's stipulation to defendant's gang affiliation was reasonable since it fit into the defense's theory that peer influence contributed to the crime. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Defense counsel devised a reasonable strategy not to object at every potential opportunity during the trial in order to maintain credibility with the jury and not call undue attention to the objectionable material. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Trial counsel's failure to exhaust all of defendant's peremptory challenges was not ineffective assistance of counsel. Defense counsel made a reasonable decision to accept the jury prior to exhausting all of the peremptory challenges to ensure he would be able to strike anyone the prosecution might add later. Defense counsel made a strategic choice entitled to deference. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Because defendant was advised orally or in writing of each of the asserted counsel errors, there was no deficient performance by counsel or prejudice. People v. Aguilar, 2012 COA 181, __ P.3d __.

Although counsel may have made some errors in advising the defendant to confess the motion to revoke the deferred judgment so that defendant could have the opportunity to go to a community corrections program, the alternative of contesting the revocation of the deferred judgment would not have been a reasonable option for the defendant. People v. Finney, 2012 COA 38, __ P.3d __.

Attorney serving coconspirators not ineffective. Record fails to support any conclusion of ineffective assistance of counsel by the simple fact that the attorney involved served both conspirators. People v. Gutierrez, 182 Colo. 55, 511 P.2d 20 (1973).

The fact that others employ attorney for defendant does not necessarily result in conflict of interest, especially when defendant has full knowledge of the circumstances of the employment and when he knows he could have court-appointed counsel. Bresnahan v. Patterson, 352 F. Supp. 1180 (D. Colo. 1973).

One who has knowledge that he could have court appoint counsel if desired and consents to representation by counsel employed by another for him cannot complain that counsel was ineffective without a showing of substantial prejudice to the defendant because of counsel's representation. Bresnahan v. People, 175 Colo. 286, 487 P.2d 551 (1971).

Defense counsel is responsible for trial strategy, and the defendant will not be heard to complain when trial strategy falls short of accomplishing an acquittal. People v. Moreno, 181 Colo. 106, 507 P.2d 857 (1973); People v. Shook, 186 Colo. 339, 527 P.2d 815 (1974).

Right to assistance of counsel is not guarantee against mistakes of strategy or exercise of judgment in the course of a trial as viewed through the 20-20 vision of hindsight following the return of a verdict in a criminal case. Dolan v. People, 168 Colo. 19, 449 P.2d 828 (1969); Valdez v. District Court, 171 Colo. 436, 467 P.2d 825 (1970); LaBlanc v. People, 177 Colo. 250, 493 P.2d 1089 (1972); Steward v. People, 179 Colo. 31, 498 P.2d 933 (1972); People v. Shook, 186 Colo. 339, 527 P.2d 815 (1974); People v. Stroup, 624 P.2d 913 (Colo. App. 1980), rev'd in application of principle, 656 P.2d 680 (Colo. 1982).

When the alleged mistakes of appointed counsel are those of strategy or judgment only, a defendant's constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel is not in any way infringed. Evans v. People, 175 Colo. 269, 486 P.2d 1062 (1971).

Justice does not require errorless representation, but it does demand that counsel render reasonably effective assistance. People v. White, 182 Colo. 417, 514 P.2d 69 (1973).

The requirement for effective assistance of counsel does not mean that the defendant is constitutionally guaranteed such assistance as will result in his acquittal at trial. People v. Johnson, 638 P.2d 61 (Colo. 1981).

And does not guarantee attorney with whose advice defendant can agree. The standard of effective assistance of counsel does not guarantee a defendant an attorney with whose advice he can agree. Martinez v. People, 173 Colo. 515, 480 P.2d 843 (1971).

Mere disagreement as to trial strategy does not equate with ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. McCormick, 181 Colo. 162, 508 P.2d 1270 (1973).

Trial court made adequate inquiry into defendant's ineffective assistance of counsel and conflict of interest claims before rejecting the request. The trial court found with record support that defendant's dissatisfaction with trial counsel related to matters of trial preparation, strategy, and tactics, which are left to the discretion of counsel. In addition, trial counsel informed the court that she could continue representing defendant despite defendant's ethics complaint against her. People v. Davis, 2012 COA 1, __ P.3d __.

Acts and omissions of attorney during trial are binding upon his client, particularly where the client cannot specify a constitutional right of which he was deprived by the inaction of his attorney. Valdez v. District Court, 171 Colo. 436, 467 P.2d 825 (1970).

Pretrial investigation necessary to effective counsel. In the absence of adequate pretrial investigation--both factual and legal--knowledgeable preparation for trial is impossible, and without knowledgeable trial preparation, defense counsel cannot reliably exercise legal judgment and, therefore, cannot render reasonably effective assistance to his client. People v. White, 182 Colo. 417, 514 P.2d 69 (1973).

Whenever defense counsel commits errors at trial which are a direct result of inadequate pretrial investigation or self-imposed ignorance of the law, his representation is incompetent and relief must be granted. People v. White, 182 Colo. 417, 514 P.2d 69 (1973).

Failure to investigate thoroughly the background of a key prosecution witness fell below the level of a reasonably competent attorney. People v. Davis, 759 P.2d 742 (Colo. App. 1988).

Client cannot require attorney to call witnesses, if there is no likelihood of the truth of the testimony that will be elicited and where the attorney's well-founded judgment is that its production at the trial would do more harm than good. Martinez v. People, 173 Colo. 515, 480 P.2d 843 (1971).

And failure to call them does not constitute reversible error. Failure of counsel to call to the stand and examine witnesses as desired by the defendant does not constitute reversible error. Stone v. People, 174 Colo. 504, 485 P.2d 495 (1971).

A refusal to call a particular witness because of an obedience to ethical standards which prohibit the presentation of fabricated testimony does not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. Schultheis, 638 P.2d 8 (Colo. 1981).

Failure of trial counsel to call certain witnesses or to propound certain hypothetical questions do not amount to ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. McCormick, 181 Colo. 162, 508 P.2d 1270 (1973).

When and whether counsel has properly raised objections during trial is matter of trial strategy and technique. Valdez v. District Court, 171 Colo. 436, 467 P.2d 825 (1970).

Supreme court cannot second-guess petitioner's counsel insofar as valid defenses are concerned, particularly when the court is not informed as to the specific defense. Valdez v. District Court, 171 Colo. 436, 467 P.2d 825 (1970).

Court, and not defendant, will determine from record whether defense has been adequate. Valarde v. People, 156 Colo. 375, 399 P.2d 245 (1965).

But defendant controls three areas. There are three areas in which the will of the defendant must be allowed to prevail, namely: whether to plead guilty, whether to waive jury trial, and whether to testify; moreover, in making each of these decisions, the accused should have the full and careful advice of his lawyer. Martinez v. People, 173 Colo. 515, 480 P.2d 843 (1971); McClendon v. People, 174 Colo. 7, 481 P.2d 715 (1971).

Failure to object to effectiveness of counsel bars claim. The client will not be heard to complain that he was denied the effective assistance of counsel if he stands by, permits the case to be tried, and objects for the first time after receiving an adverse decision. Thompson v. People, 139 Colo. 15, 336 P.2d 93 (1959), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 972, 80 S. Ct. 606, 4 L. Ed. 2d 552 (1960); Valdez v. District Court, 171 Colo. 436, 467 P.2d 825 (1970).

Able representation of the defense of a criminal charge by associate counsel, where an attorney originally employed is engaged in another trial making discharge of his duty impossible, is not an impropriety, and defendants who make no complaint or objection to such representation until the filing of a motion for a new trial after conviction, are in no position to complain, their failure to apprise the court of their objection in good time amounting to acquiescence. Thompson v. People, 139 Colo. 15, 336 P.2d 93 (1959), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 972, 80 S. Ct. 606, 4 L. Ed. 2d 552 (1960).

Availability of remedy of trial de novo bars claim of ineffective assistance on counsel. Defendant, a 14 year old who was found guilty of reckless driving and sentenced to 90 days in jail, was not entitled to habeas corpus relief on the ground of alleged violation of his right to counsel where he did not appeal to county court where adequate remedy of trial de novo was available, but instead proceeded immediately by way of habeas corpus. Garrett v. Knight, 173 Colo. 419, 480 P.2d 569 (1971).

Failure of defense attorneys to present evidence favorable to defendant. Where defendant failed to receive a fair trial because of the failure of his trial attorneys to present any of the evidence favorable to the defendant which was clearly available and discoverable by even rudimentary investigation, and, as a result, the damaging prosecution's version of the incident was allowed to remain uncontradicted and unimpeached, even though there was evidence to challenge it, the defendant was denied his constitutional right to a fair trial which requires that the defendant's conviction be vacated and that he be afforded a new trial. People v. Moya, 180 Colo. 228, 504 P.2d 352 (1972).

Counsel sufficiently prosecuted appeal. In considering the questions of when the public defender is required to prosecute an appeal and the duties which he has on appeal, the Colorado supreme court held that since the public defender had prepared a brief presenting each of the points that the defendant urged as a basis for appeal, he had carried out the highest standards of the advocate in presenting his client's case. McClendon v. People, 174 Colo. 7, 481 P.2d 715 (1971).

Effective assistance of counsel is not denied when a trial court refuses to grant a short continuance after a mistrial. Padilla v. People, 171 Colo. 521, 470 P.2d 846 (1970).

A criminal defendant does not have a constitutional right to counsel to pursue applications for review in the U.S. supreme court. Thus, a defendant cannot be deprived of the effective assistance of counsel by counsel's failure to timely file an application. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

Where following the refusal of the trial court to allow counsel to withdraw, counsel presented himself at the time scheduled for trial and ably and competently conducted the defense, and where the attorney appointed for the defendant had some 17 years experience, there is no evidence that defendant was denied a fair trial or that counsel failed in any way to adequately represent the defendant during the course and conduct of the trial. Martinez v. People, 173 Colo. 515, 480 P.2d 843 (1971).

Effective assistance of counsel was not denied defendant where there is no evidence to support the assertion that counsel did not keep defendant informed or that anything but full consideration was given to his case. People v. Crater, 182 Colo. 248, 512 P.2d 623 (1973).

When a different member of the public defender's staff assumes responsibility for a trial a few days prior to its commencement, and he has access to all of the records and investigatory materials which have been compiled after counsel has been appointed for defendant, the defendant is adequately represented even though the defendant contends that his new counsel failed to make proper investigation prior to trial and was unprepared to defend him. Maynes v. People, 178 Colo. 88, 495 P.2d 551 (1972).

When a trial court considers a defendant's contention that he has been denied effective assistance of counsel before denying a motion for new trial, and new counsel is appointed to assist the defendant on appeal, defendant has not been denied effective assistance of counsel on the theory that the trial court failed to provide him with separate counsel at a new trial hearing to present his claim as to the denial of effective assistance of counsel at trial. Maynes v. People, 178 Colo. 88, 495 P.2d 551 (1972).

Where jailer accidentally and not by planned eavesdropping or monitoring overhears defendant's admission of guilt to an attorney, defendant's constitutional right to effective representation of counsel is not denied. People v. Gallegos, 179 Colo. 211, 499 P.2d 315 (1972).

Where record discloses that one day before trial defendant's counsel informed the court that she was prepared for trial, where the tactical decision not to call an expert witness was within the discretion of trial counsel, and where defendant voluntarily testified after advisement. People v. Bradley, 25 P.3d 1271 (Colo. App. 2001).

Sections 16-8-103.6, 16-8-106, and 16-8-107 do not violate a defendant's fundamental right to present a defense or the right to effective assistance of counsel. A defendant can present a defense if he or she complies with the statutes. People v. Bondurant, 2012 COA 50, __ P.3d __.

In general, a defendant who knowingly and voluntarily waives his right to counsel and chooses to proceed pro se cannot later claim ineffective assistance of counsel. However, defendant may assert an ineffective assistance of counsel claim if advisory counsel exceeds his role as advisory counsel and exercises a degree of control appropriate for legal representation. Limits imposed upon advisory counsel's unsolicited participation: (1) A pro se defendant must be allowed to control the organization and content of his own defense; and (2) advisory counsel may not, through unrequested participation, destroy the jury's perception that the defendant represents himself. Downey v. People, 25 P.3d 1200 (Colo. 2001).

When appointment of successive attorneys amounts to denial of effective counsel. Before the appointment of the successive attorneys may amount to a denial of the right to effective counsel, it must be shown that the ultimate trial counsel has been deprived of his opportunity to protect adequately the defendant's constitutional rights or prepare for trial. The burden of making such a showing, under Colorado law, rests on the defendant. People v. O'Neill, 185 Colo. 202, 523 P.2d 123 (1974).

Sufficient time to prepare for trial. The "effective assistance of counsel" encompasses a guarantee that defense counsel shall have sufficient time to prepare adequately for trial. People v. O'Neill, 185 Colo. 202, 523 P.2d 123 (1974).

Defendant who neglects to prepare for trial at appointed time, where sufficient time has been provided therefor, cannot complain if trial is had at time appointed. Altobella v. Priest, 153 Colo. 309, 385 P.2d 585 (1963).

Postconviction testimony of attorney, contacted but not retained on behalf of defendant, as to statements made by defendant, but not in a process of interrogation that lends itself to eliciting incriminating statements, disclosed no violation of defendant's constitutional right to counsel. LaBlanc v. People, 177 Colo. 250, 493 P.2d 1089 (1972).

And right to effective assistance of counsel extends to appellate process. People v. Stroup, 624 P.2d 913 (Colo. App. 1980), rev'd in application of principle, 656 P.2d 680 (Colo. 1982).

Right to counsel not violated where attorney unlicensed for failure to take oath. A criminal defendant's right to counsel is not violated where the accused unwittingly retains a representative for trial who is in all respects qualified to practice law in Colorado, yet remains unlicensed due to his failure to take the mandatory oath for admission. Wilson v. People, 652 P.2d 595 (Colo.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1218, 103 S. Ct. 1221, 75 L. Ed. 2d 457 (1983).

Right to reasonably effective assistance of counsel. A defendant is not constitutionally entitled to errorless counsel but rather to reasonably effective assistance of counsel. People v. Velasquez, 641 P.2d 943 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 459 U.S. 809, 103 S. Ct. 28, 74 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1982), reh'g denied, 459 U.S. 1138, 103 S. Ct. 774, 74 L. Ed. 2d 986 (1983); People v. Norman, 703 P.2d 1261 (Colo. 1985).

Failure of counsel to interview witnesses, do legal research, and otherwise prepare for trial violated right to effective assistance of counsel. People v. Cole, 775 P.2d 551 (Colo. 1989).

Mere strategic or judgmental errors do not constitute incompetent representation. People v. Wimer, 681 P.2d 967 (Colo. App. 1983).

Admission of testimony of defense-retained handwriting expert called by prosecution constitutes denial of effective assistance of counsel. Perez v. People, 745 P.2d 650 (Colo. 1987).

Judicial scrutiny of counsel's performance must be highly deferential and, where trial court concluded that the outcome of the trial would not have been different had the attorney done everything that the defendant's experts now say he should have done, the claim of ineffectiveness can and should be disposed of on the basis of lack of sufficient prejudice. People v. Fulton, 754 P.2d 398 (Colo. App. 1987); People v. Rivas, 77 P.3d 882 (Colo. App. 2003).

Right to reasonably effective assistance of counsel violated. Prosecution's use in its case-in-chief of defense-retained handwriting expert, absent compelling justification or waiver, violates defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel where prejudice to defendant is found. Hutchinson v. People, 742 P.2d 875 (Colo. 1987); Perez v. People, 745 P.2d 650 (Colo. 1987).

Defense-retained expert able to testify favorably for prosecution not a compelling reason to allow exception to rule against use of defense-retained expert and use in trial violated defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel. Perez v. People, 745 P.2d 650 (Colo. 1987).

Calling expert to testify at a Crim. P. 32(d) hearing to set aside plea does not constitute waiver of defendant's right to object to prosecutor's use of same expert at trial. Perez v. People, 745 P.2d 650 (Colo. 1987).

Defendant's statement to psychiatrist that was provided to the prosecution under Crim. P. 16 loses its confidential nature and cross-examination of the defendant concerning such statements as prior inconsistent statements is proper impeachment, even if the psychiatrist did not testify at the defendant's trial. Use of such statements do not violate the attorney-client privilege or the right to effective assistance of counsel. People v. Lanari, 811 P.2d 399 (Colo. App. 1989), aff'd, 827 P.2d 495 (Colo. 1992).

In addition, it does not violate the attorney-client privilege or the right to effective assistance of counsel when a defendant places his or her mental condition at issue and the prosecution is allowed to use the testimony of a physician or psychologist retained by the defense but whom the defense does not intend to use as a witness at trial. In fact, the prosecution may use pre-offense or post-offense information concerning the defendant's mental condition. Gray v. District Ct., 884 P.2d 286 (Colo. 1994).

The authoritative standard for evaluating an ineffective-assistance claim was formulated by the U.S. supreme court in Strickland v. Washington. This standard consists of two components: whether defense counsel's performance was constitutionally deficient and whether the deficient performance prejudiced the defense. People v. Naranjo, 840 P.2d 319 (Colo. 1992); People v. Sparks, 914 P.2d 544 (Colo. App. 1996); People v. Russell, 36 P.3d 92 (Colo. App. 2001); People v. Rivas, 77 P.3d 882 (Colo. App. 2003).

A defendant's assertion that had he known that plea counsel had not thoroughly reviewed the evidence and interviewed witnesses he would not have pleaded guilty is entirely speculative and insufficient to meet the burden of alleging facts that would allow the postconviction court to find he was prejudiced by counsel's alleged failure to investigate. People v. Stovall, 2012 COA 7M, 284 P.3d 151.

Representation must be within range of competence. In order to meet the constitutional requirement of effective assistance of counsel, the level of representation furnished to a defendant must be within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases. People v. Stroup, 624 P.2d 913 (Colo. App. 1980), rev'd in application of principle, 656 P.2d 913 (Colo. App. 1980); People v. Dillard, 680 P.2d 243 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Loggins, 709 P.2d 25 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Rivers, 727 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1986).

Defendant was deprived of effective assistance of counsel where: (1) The only significant evidence against him came from codefendants in the case, who had made various inconsistent statements, but no adequate attempt was made to impeach the witnesses; (2) several witnesses who were in possession of relevant facts were not interviewed; and (3) during closing argument defense counsel abandoned theory of defense on which case had been tried and essentially admitted conduct on part of defendant constituting first-degree felony murder. People v. Dillon, 739 P.2d 919 (Colo. App. 1987).

Record conclusive as justification for denial of defendant's motion for a new trial based on ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. Loggins, 709 P.2d 25 (Colo. App. 1985).

Benchmark for judging claim of ineffective assistance of counsel is whether counsel's conduct so undermined the proper functioning of the adversarial process that the trial cannot be relied on as having produced a just result. People v. Davis, 849 P.2d 857 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 871 P.2d 769 (Colo. 1994).

And an error by counsel which does not undermine the functioning of the trial such that it cannot be relied upon as having produced a just result does not violate the defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel. Banks v. People, 696 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1985).

And determination of whether defendant has received his constitutional entitlement must be based on a review of all circumstances surrounding the proceedings. People v. Wimer, 681 P.2d 967 (Colo. App. 1983).

Evidentiary hearing is necessary to resolve the defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel where defendant asserted that attorney's failure to pursue collateral attack on prior felony conviction prevented him from testifying on his own behalf and where defendant did not testify at trial and did not make an offer of proof as to what his testimony would have been. Cummings v. People, 785 P.2d 920 (Colo. 1990).

Defendant entitled to a hearing on his claim that counsel was ineffective by erroneously advising him about his eligibility for parole; at the hearing, defendant will have the burden of proving that counsel gave inaccurate advice and that there is a reasonably probability that but for the counsel's error, the defendant would not have entered in his guilty pleas and would have insisted on going to trial on all the original charges. People v. Sudduth, 991 P.2d 315 (Colo. 1999).

Defendant could not be deprived of opportunity to prove counsel's choices lacked sound strategic motive unless the existing record clearly established otherwise or those choices could not have been prejudicial in any event. Ardolino v. People, 69 P.3d 73 (Colo. App. 2003).

Defendant entitled to evidentiary hearing as long as the allegations of his motion, in light of the existing record, were not clearly insufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome of the trial by demonstrating a reasonable probability that but for counsel's challenged conduct, the defendant would not have been convicted. Ardolino v. People, 69 P.3d 73 (Colo. App. 2003).

Trial court proper in dismissing ineffective assistance of counsel claims without hearing since defendant failed to allege that potential appellate issues that were not raised were stronger or had a better chance of prevailing than issues raised by appellate counsel in direct appeal. People v. Trujillo, 169 P.3d 235 (Colo. App. 2007).

Failure to hold hearing on motion, if error, was harmless where defendant's sole contention on appeal was that a hearing was required, but defendant did not contend that representation was ineffective or that he was denied fundamental fairness. People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 303 (Colo. App. 1993); People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 311 (Colo. App. 1993).

Strickland ineffective assistance standard requires that the court evaluate the evidence from the perspective of defense counsel as of the time of the representation in question and to indulge a strong presumption that defense counsel's efforts constituted effective assistance. People v. Naranjo, 840 P.2d 319 (Colo. 1992).

Defendant's disagreement with counsel about strategy decisions not sufficient to prove ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. Swainson, 674 P.2d 984 (Colo. App. 1983); People v. Bossert, 722 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1986); People v. Rivers, 727 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Bowman, 738 P.2d 387 (Colo. App. 1987); People v. Tackett, 742 P.2d 957 (Colo. App. 1987); People v. Davis, 849 P.2d 857 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 871 P.2d 769 (Colo. 1994).

While defendant is entitled to pretrial investigation sufficient to reveal potential defenses and the facts relevant to guilt or penalty, mere disagreement as to trial strategy will not support a claim of ineffectiveness of counsel. People v. Apodaca, 998 P.2d 25 (Colo. App. 1999).

And while counsel may not prevent a defendant from presenting an alibi during his own testimony without a voluntary, knowing, and intentional waiver of his right to testify, where defendant's alibi is to be established by testimony of witnesses other than defendant, the decision whether to present such defense is a strategic and tactical decision is within the exclusive province of defense counsel. People v. Tackett, 742 P.2d 957 (Colo. App. 1987).

"Decisions of trial strategy" available to defense attorney are limited by fundamental, constitutional choices by defendant, the requirement of honesty and integrity imposed upon court officers, and standards of professional reasonableness. People v. Bergerud, 223 P.3d 686 (Colo. 2010).

Where a defendant and his attorney disagree about whether a lesser nonincluded offense instruction should be submitted to the jury, and both the defendant and his attorney make their respective positions clear to the court, and the prosecution is not entitled to such an instruction or, if entitled to it, did not request it, the court should accede to the defendant's request. The decision whether to request a lesser nonincluded offense instruction implicates a defendant's fundamental rights, and, therefore, belongs to the defendant. People v. Arko, 159 P.3d 713 (Colo. App. 2006).

The decision whether to request a lesser offense instruction is a matter to be decided by counsel after consultation with the defendant. Arko v. People, 183 P.3d 555 (Colo. 2008).

Failure to present mitigating evidence at a capital sentencing hearing is not always defective performance of counsel. People v. Davis, 849 P.2d 857 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 871 P.2d 769 (Colo. 1994).

For pre-Curtis cases, the right to effective assistance of counsel provides the appropriate legal norm for resolving defendant's claim that he was not adequately advised by counsel of his right to testify. People v. Naranjo, 840 P.2d 319 (Colo. 1992).

Inquiry into question of effectiveness of counsel. Where guilty plea subjected defendant to deportation proceedings, inquiry must begin with initial determination that defense counsel in criminal case was aware that his client was an alien, and therefore was reasonably required to research relevant immigration law. People v. Pozo, 746 P.2d 523 (Colo. 1987).

But representation is not inadequate where defendant, though not informed of mandatory deportation, was nevertheless warned of possible deportation before entering guilty plea. People v. Paul, 759 P.2d 740 (Colo. App. 1988).

Proper standard for determining if counsel's performance prejudiced the defense is whether there is reasonable probability that, but for the counsel's errors, the defendant would not have pleaded guilty but would have insisted on going to trial. People v. Garcia, 815 P.2d 937 (Colo. 1991).

Requiring a defendant to proceed pro se after he or she has alleged that current counsel is ineffective, without further inquiry by the court, violates the defendant's right to counsel and necessitates a new trial. People v. Campbell, 58 P.3d 1148 (Colo. App. 2002).

Burden on defendant to show inadequate representation. A conviction will not be set aside unless the defendant can show there was a denial of fundamental fairness. People v. Dillard, 680 P.2d 243 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Benney, 757 P.2d 1078 (Colo. App. 1987).

And defendant must overcome presumption that alleged errors can be considered part of trial strategy. People v. Oliner, 745 P.2d 222 (Colo. 1987).

Substandard performance and actual prejudice to defendant must be demonstrated to prove ineffective assistance of counsel. Defendant failed to establish substandard performance and actual prejudice due to state limits on fees payable to appointed counsel. People v. District Court, 761 P.2d 206 (Colo. 1988).

Prejudice must be established to prove ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. Drake, 785 P.2d 1257 (Colo. 1990).

To demonstrate that counsel's assistance was so defective as to require reversal of a conviction, a defendant must show: (1) That his attorney's performance fell below an objective standard of reasonableness, and (2) that the deficient performance resulted in prejudice to the defendant. Reasonableness of the attorney's performance must be judged on the facts of the particular case viewed as of the time of the attorney's conduct. People v. Ball, 813 P.2d 759 (Colo. App. 1990).

Representation by attorney adequate. Although advice defendant received concerning parole was no longer correct, it did reflect the actual practice of the parole board at the time it was given and did not fall beneath the standards prevailing in the community. Eligibility for parole is a collateral consequence of defendant's pleas and there is no requirement that defendant be advised on this subject. People v. Moore, 844 P.2d 1261 (Colo. App. 1992).

Defendant was not deprived of effective assistance of counsel when less experienced public defender was required to go forward with trial while more experienced public defender was unavailable, because defendant failed to show any particular acts or omissions of counsel that fell outside the range of reasonably competent representation, and failed to show that, but for trial counsel's performance, the result of his trial would have been different. People v. Ball, 813 P.2d 759 (Colo. App. 1990).

Application of the Strickland v. Washington two-part test in resolving an ineffective assistance claim obviates any need to engage in harmless error analysis. People v. Naranjo, 840 P.2d 319 (Colo. 1992).

Claim of ineffective assistance of counsel by court-appointed attorney is premature before representation has occurred and, therefore, attorney was not entitled to withdraw from case. Stern v. County Court, 773 P.2d 1074 (Colo. 1989).

Facts sufficient to show ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. Danley, 758 P.2d 686 (Colo. App. 1988).

Court order requiring defendant's counsel to turn over her entire file to counsel for defendant in another case did not deny defendant effective assistance of counsel even though prosecutors were the same in both cases where the trial court issued order designed to remedy the alleged error and render it harmless. Had the prosecution taken steps to separate the two prosecutorial functions there could have been no claim made by defendant that the turnover order resulted in prejudice. Furthermore, even in an instance of deliberate governmental interference with the attorney-client relationship, dismissal of the charge is not mandated absent demonstrable prejudice. People v. Reali, 895 P.2d 161 (Colo. App. 1994).

Effective assistance of counsel may be violated by conflict of interest. The right to effective assistance of counsel may be violated by representation that is intrinsically improper due to a conflict of interest. People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983).

Defendant's right to conflict-free counsel violated when defendant's trial attorneys undermined the attorney-client relationship by disclosing privileged communications and concealing the disclosure from defendant. People v. Ragusa, 220 P.3d 1002 (Colo. App. 2009).

Actual conflict of interest existed at trial when defense counsel represented two defendants and could not properly refer to the disparate charges of criminal conduct or comment about this state of evidence to the jury. Armstrong v. People, 701 P.2d 17 (Colo. 1985).

Actual conflict of interest that adversely affected attorney's performance existed where attorney represented two defendants accused of sexually assaulting the same victim. People v. Miera, 183 P.3d 672 (Colo. App. 2008).

Combining the roles of advocate and witness can create a conflict of interest between the attorney and the client, because a lawyer cannot act as an advocate on behalf of his client and yet give testimony adverse to the interests of that client in the same proceeding. People v. Finley, 141 P.3d 911 (Colo.

App. 2006).

When defendant alleges denial of his or her right to conflict-free counsel, establishes an actual conflict of interest, and establishes that the conflict adversely affected counsel's performance, defendant need not show actual prejudice. People v. Curren, 228 P.3d 253 (Colo. App. 2009).

An actual conflict of interest arises when it places counsel in the position of having to simultaneously defend his or her client and himself or herself, particularly in those instances in which counsel faces potential professional and criminal sanctions. People v. Curren, 228 P.3d 253 (Colo. App. 2009).

Attorney representing both husband and wife not ineffective even where attorney moved for an acquittal for wife and not for husband. People v. Drake, 785 P.2d 1257 (Colo. 1990).

And showing of actual prejudice not required for relief. If an accused demonstrates that his lawyer labored under an actual conflict of interest during the trial, a showing of actual prejudice is not a condition for relief. People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983); People v. Miera, 183 P.3d 672 (Colo. App. 2008).

The defense attorney's representation of the district attorney in separate litigation, while simultaneously representing the defendant, creates a conflict of interest which denies him effective assistance of counsel. People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983).

Viewing all of the following actions in combination, defense counsel had an actual conflict of interest: The swearing-in of defense counsel to testify about communications he had with defendant pertaining to ongoing representation; the possibility that the prosecution could have obtained material from defense counsel to impeach defendant during the questioning; defense counsel's disclosure of attorney-client privileged information and defense strategy during the questioning; and the specter of an ineffective assistance of counsel claim. People v. Delgadillo, 2012 COA 33, 275 P.3d 772.

Defense counsel's conflict of interest adversely affected the adequacy of defendant's representation, and thus the only remedy is a new trial. Defense counsel and the court failed to disclose the conflict to the defendant, and defense counsel disclosed privileged communications and defense strategies during the in camera proceedings. The in camera proceeding gave the impression that defense counsel lost sight of his responsibilities to defendant and thus his conduct adversely affected the quality of representation. Further, defendant was without the assistance of counsel during the in camera proceedings, which was a critical stage of the proceedings. People v. Delgadillo, 2012 COA 33, 275 P.3d 772.

But potential conflict of interest insufficient. A mere potential conflict of interest, however, is not the equivalent of ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983).

No actual conflict of interest was found to exist when defendant's attorney was charged with the traffic offense of failure to obey a traffic signal and failure to produce proof of insurance. People v. Mata, 56 P.3d 1169 (Colo. App. 2002).

Defendant may waive right to conflict-free representation. If the court, upon inquiry of the defendant, is satisfied that he voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waives all conflicts that are reasonably foreseeable, it may accept the waiver, even though it views the defendant's decision as an improvident one. Rodriguez v. District Court, 719 P.2d 699 (Colo. 1986); People v. Czemerynski, 786 P.2d 1100

(1990).

Defendant who is properly counseled and advised understandingly waived his right to conflict-free representation where second chair defense counsel formerly represented prosecution witness concerning a separate legal matter. Such a waiver is not prohibited by any public policy. People v. Czemerynski, 786 P.2d 1100 (Colo. 1990).

Given that the potential conflict in this case is waivable, an informed and knowing waiver must be recognized. However, if right to conflict-free counsel is not waived, the court may then properly order disqualification. People v. Harlan, 54 P.3d 871 (Colo. 2002).

Defendant voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waived his right to conflict-free representation where the court, the attorneys, and the defendant all considered the implications of defendant's attorney's conflicts of interest; during the course of multiple discussions among the court, the prosecution, defense counsel, special counsel, and defendants, the conflicts were fully explained to the defendant; the discussions were particularized, specific, and detailed; each of three conflicts was addressed and the court questioned defendant regarding whether he waived the conflicts; at the last conference, defendant indicated that he understood all of the ramifications of the conflicts and all of his questions regarding the conflicts had been answered; and, based on his central concern of establishing his innocence as quickly as possible, defendant waived the conflicts in order to expedite the trial. People v. Martinez, 869 P.2d 519 (Colo. 1994).

District court's order directing retained attorney representing both husband and wife to represent neither deprived them of the right to counsel of their choice where there was full disclosure by the court and husband and wife signed waivers and affidavits indicating the court's advisement of a potential conflict of interest and evincing their intent to have their retained attorney represent both their interest. Tyson v. District Ct. for the Fourth Jud. Dist., 891 P.2d 984 (Colo. 1995).

By waiving their right to conflict-free representation, defendants waived their right to later assert a claim for effective assistance of counsel as caused by the conflict of interest. Tyson v. District Ct. for the Fourth Jud. Dist., 891 P.2d 984 (Colo. 1995).

Although defendant privately expressed desire to have attorney who was subject to an actual conflict of interest continue to represent him after the conflict was disclosed, a waiver was not made on the record, and there was no proper advisement by the court. The trial court was precluded from finding that defendant made a knowing, free, and voluntary relinquishment of the right to conflict-free counsel. People v. Miera, 183 P.3d 672 (Colo. App. 2008).

Even though defendant failed to object to attorneys' representation in the context of a Curtis advisement, defendant could not have knowingly or intelligently waived the right to conflict-free representation because attorneys concealed from defendant their disclosure of privileged communications to the court and the nature of the representation they provided defendant. People v. Ragusa, 220 P.3d 1002 (Colo. App. 2009).

A defense attorney's erroneous assessment of a probable sentence does not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. Absent a showing of a deliberate misrepresentation that induced a defendant's guilty plea, counsel's erroneous assessment concerning sentencing does not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel.

People v. Zuniga, 80 P.3d 965 (Colo. App. 2003).

Requirement for postconviction claim of conflict of interest. When no objection has been raised during trial concerning the alleged conflict, a constitutional predicate for a postconviction claim of ineffective assistance of counsel requires a showing that the attorney's representation of the defendant conflicted with some other interest that the attorney also had professionally undertaken to serve. People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983).

Justifiable excuse or excusable neglect would be established if the public defender's failure to file a motion for post-conviction relief on behalf of defendant was the result of ineffective counsel. People v. Chang, 179 P.3d 240 (Colo. App. 2007).

Effective assistance of counsel right extends to appeal. The constitutional right to reasonably competent assistance of counsel extends to counsel's assistance and advice with regard to the pursuit of appeal rights made available by state procedure. Stroup v. People, 656 P.2d 680 (Colo. 1982); People v. Long, 126 P.3d 284 (Colo. App. 2005).

The Strickland two-part test applies to claims of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel. People v. Long, 126 P.3d 284 (Colo. App. 2005).

Under this test, a defendant must show (1) that counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness and (2) that counsel's deficient performance prejudiced the defendant. People v. Long, 126 P.3d 284 (Colo. App. 2005).

The test will vary in its application, however, depending on the type of claim presented. People v. Long, 126 P.3d 284 (Colo. App. 2005).

One type of claim is based on counsel's representation during the course of a perfected appeal that resulted in a judgment on the merits. A typical example would involve allegations that counsel overlooked a meritorious argument. To demonstrate error in this context, the defendant must show that counsel failed to present the case effectively. To demonstrate prejudice, the defendant must show a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's errors, he or she would have prevailed on the appeal. People v. Long, 126 P.3d 284 (Colo. App. 2005).

A different type of claim is based on counsel's failure to perfect an appeal. A lawyer who disregards specific instructions from the defendant to file a notice of appeal acts in a manner that is professionally unreasonable. The prejudice resulting from the failure to file a notice of appeal is not in the outcome of the proceeding but in the forfeiture of the proceeding itself. Accordingly, the defendant need not show a likelihood of success on appeal. Thus, for example, a defendant who shows that counsel disregarded specific instructions to appeal will have established both prongs of the Strickland test. People v. Long, 126 P.3d 284 (Colo. App. 2005).

The sole remedy for a defendant deprived of the right to appeal caused by ineffective assistance of counsel is reinstatement of this right. People v. Long, 126 P.3d 284 (Colo. App. 2005).

What constitutes effective assistance on appeal. To render reasonably effective assistance, an attorney must at a minimum advise the defendant of possible grounds for appeal that counsel deems meritorious without interjecting extraneous considerations. Stroup v. People, 656 P.2d 680 (Colo. 1982).

There is not a constitutionally mandated standard that appellate counsel must advise the defendant regarding opportunities for statutory postconviction relief or federal habeas corpus, especially absent evidence that counsel had reason to believe such relief would succeed or that defendant indicated an interest in such efforts. People v. Alexander, 129 P.3d 1051 (Colo. App. 2005).

Joint representation does not result in a per se violation of the right to effective counsel. Since neither defendant testified, defense counsel was not faced with the possibility of commenting on the credibility of one to the detriment of the other. People v. Tafoya, 833 P.2d 841 (Colo. App. 1992).

Conviction against unrepresented defendant not usable to establish habitual traffic offender status. Absent a valid waiver of the right to counsel, a conviction obtained against a defendant who is not represented by counsel may not be used to establish habitual traffic offender status for the purpose of imposing punishment for driving after judgment prohibited. People v. Roybal, 618 P.2d 1121 (Colo. 1980); People v. Hampton, 619 P.2d 48 (Colo. 1980).

But prohibition on use of uncounseled convictions not absolute. The United States Constitution does not always prohibit collateral use of uncounseled convictions to increase the penalty for subsequent criminal misconduct, but should be interpreted so that only in the clearest of cases will a statute be construed to permit such use. People v. Roybal, 618 P.2d 1121 (Colo. 1980).

III. RIGHT TO DEMAND NATURE AND CAUSE OF ACCUSATION.

This section is substantially redeclaration and affirmation of ancient rule of common law that no one shall be held to answer to an indictment or information unless the crime with which it is intended to charge him is set forth with precision and fullness, to the end that he may have opportunity to make his defense and avail himself of his conviction or acquittal in a subsequent prosecution for the same cause. Fehringer v. People, 59 Colo. 3, 147 P. 361 (1915).

The right to demand the nature and cause of the accusation is interwoven into the fundamental principles of the common law, embodied in Magna Charta, and guaranteed in both the state and federal constitutions. Fehringer v. People, 59 Colo. 3, 147 P. 361 (1915).

Notice of charges foundation of due process. The right of an accused to notice of the charges which have been made against him constitutes a fundamental constitutional guarantee and lies at the foundation of due process of law. People v. Cooke, 186 Colo. 44, 525 P.2d 426 (1974).

Purpose of sufficient notice. The notice given must be sufficient to advise the accused of the charges, to give him a fair and adequate opportunity to prepare his defense, and to ensure that he is not taken by surprise because of evidence offered at the time of trial. People v. Cooke, 186 Colo. 44, 525 P.2d 426 (1974).

Defendant is only required to meet specific accusation made against him. A defendant on trial for a specific offense is not expected or required to meet anything other than the specific accusation made against him, for an accused has the right to know precisely what he has to defend against. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

Denial of defendant's motion for a bill of particulars was proper where defendant was on notice from the charging document, the probable cause affidavit, and the preliminary hearing. People v. Quintano, 81 P.3d 1093 (Colo. App. 2003), aff'd, 105 P.3d 585 (Colo. 2005).

Where accused knows general nature of the crime involved, he can make an effective waiver of his constitutional rights. People v. Weaver, 179 Colo. 331, 500 P.2d 980 (1972).

Defendant must be made aware of elements of crime with which he is charged before guilty plea may be accepted. People v. Musser, 187 Colo. 198, 529 P.2d 626 (1974).

Evidence held sufficient to show advisement of charge before waiver of rights. An information charging possession of narcotics with intent to sell was sufficient to advise the defendant that he must be prepared to controvert evidence of possession and to defend on that charge. Because possession is an essential element of possession with intent to sell, the defendant can scarcely claim surprise by the introduction of evidence establishing possession. McClain v. People, 178 Colo. 103, 495 P.2d 542 (1972); People v. Cooke, 186 Colo. 44, 525 P.2d 426 (1974).

Power to prescribe sufficiency of indictment subject to this section. Without questioning the power of the general assembly, within certain limits, to prescribe the technical sufficiency of an indictment or information, its power in that regard cannot deprive a defendant of his right to demand and have furnished the nature and cause of the accusation against him. Fehringer v. People, 59 Colo. 3, 147 P. 361 (1915).

Thus, provisions as to form of indictment apply except where they fail to give nature and cause of action. Statutory provisions dealing with the sufficiency of allegations in indictments were intended to apply to all informations except where in so doing they fail to give the defendant the nature and cause of the accusation as required by this section of the constitution. Highley v. People, 65 Colo. 497, 177 P. 975 (1918).

Pleading charging offense must set forth sufficient facts to adequately identify transaction and to enable the court to determine whether the facts alleged are sufficient in law to constitute the acts inhibited by the statute. This has not been done when the indictment or information fails to set forth any of the particulars essential to constitute the crime. Fehringer v. People, 59 Colo. 3, 147 P. 361 (1915).

Essential elements of crime must be included in information. An information is sufficient to apprise a defendant of the charge he faces if it sets forth the essential elements to be included in an information charging the crime. Howe v. People, 178 Colo. 248, 496 P.2d 1040 (1972).

There is no requirement, either constitutional or statutory, that every element of theft be alleged in information. People v. Ingersoll, 181 Colo. 1, 506 P.2d 364 (1973).

Complaint must be filed when violation of ordinance may include imprisonment. Where a judgment against a defendant under an ordinance may include imprisonment in the first instance, the failure to file a complaint giving adequate notice of the charge is inexcusable, especially where violations of city ordinances are held to be in the nature of civil cases although of a quasi-criminal or penal nature where imprisonment may be inflicted. City of Canon City v. Merris, 137 Colo. 169, 323 P.2d 614 (1958).

Indefinite legislation denies right. Indefiniteness which leaves to officer, court, or jury the determination of standards in a case-by-case process invalidates legislation as being violative of due process, as contravening the mandate that an accused be advised of the nature and cause of the accusation, and as constituting an unlawful delegation of legislative power to courts or enforcement agencies. Dominguez v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 233, 363 P.2d 661 (1961).

Effect of material variance between allegations and proof. The allegations and the proof must correspond, and if in some matter essential to the charge there is a discrepancy between the averments and the proof, there is a variance. If the variance is material, as where it misleads accused in making his defense or exposes him to the danger of being again put in jeopardy for the same offense, the variance is fatal to a conviction. Skidmore v. People, 154 Colo. 363, 390 P.2d 944 (1964).

Information held sufficient to inform defendant of nature and cause of accusation. An information which charged that defendant aided a prisoner to escape, though no attempt to escape was actually made, by conveying or causing to be delivered to the prisoner instruments to facilitate his escape, held to sufficiently inform defendant of the nature and cause of the accusation. Compton v. People, 84 Colo. 106, 268 P. 577 (1928).

The contention of counsel for the optometrist that the terms, "immoral", "unprofessional", and "dishonorable" are so vague and indefinite as to unconstitutionally deprive the holder of a license of his right to be fully apprised of charges against him, is without merit. Cardamon v. State Bd. of Optometric Exam'rs, 165 Colo. 520, 441 P.2d 25 (1968).

Information held insufficient. The property answering the description contained in the information, a dwelling, was never burned, and yet the defendant stands convicted of burning it. Such conviction cannot stand. The defendant was never notified or informed of the fact that he was accused of burning a building other than the dwelling named in the information, and therefore the "nature" of the offense with which he was never charged was never disclosed to him. Skidmore v. People, 154 Colo. 363, 390 P.2d 944 (1964).

Indictment held insufficient. Where an indictment for second-degree official misconduct set forth the failure to perform a duty, but failed to specify the source of the legal duty alleged to have been breached, the defendant was not given effective notice of the crime charged and therefore was not afforded adequate opportunity to prepare a defense. People v. Beruman, 638 P.2d 789 (Colo. 1982).

Lesser included offense instruction may be given. Where the lesser included offense upon which the prosecution requested an instruction is (1) easily ascertainable from the charging instrument, and (2) not so remote in degree from the offense charged that the prosecution's request appears to be an attempt to salvage a conviction from a case which has proven to be weak, the prosecution may obtain a lesser included offense instruction over the defendant's objection. People v. Cooke, 186 Colo. 44, 525 P.2d 426 (1974).

Lesser included offense doctrine places some burden upon the defendant to determine specific charges. People v. Cooke, 186 Colo. 44, 525 P.2d 426 (1974).

Where investigating officer was not aware of possible forgery charge against defendant, he cannot be expected to have anticipated the charge, and defendant's rights were not violated by the fact that he was not apprised of the charge before making a statement. Duncan v. People, 178 Colo. 314, 497 P.2d 1029 (1972).

Accessory to crime may be charged as principal. All participants in a crime, whether accessory or principal, are made alike guilty of the crime and therefore when properly charged with the crime, they are sufficiently advised of the accusation against them, within the requirement of this constitutional provision. Mulligan v. People, 68 Colo. 17, 189 P. 5 (1920).

Defendant held informed of reason for arrest. The advice given the defendant at the outset--that he was held in connection with a shooting that occurred that evening--was adequate information as to the reason for his arrest under Miranda. Carroll v. People, 177 Colo. 288, 494 P.2d 80 (1972).

Where court allowed prosecution to amend information one week before trial and then denied defendants' motions for continuance, the defendants were not thereby denied a fair trial where their counsel knew of the amendment two weeks before trial, where the trial was reset so as to grant a week's continuance, where the amendment added nothing substantial to the original charge, and where there was no showing in the record that defendants were prejudiced by the denial. People v. Buckner, 180 Colo. 65, 504 P.2d 669 (1972).

Applied in Bizup v. Tinsley, 211 F. Supp. 545 (D. Colo. 1962); Municipal Court v. Brown, 175 Colo. 433, 488 P.2d 61 (1971).

A. Right to Confrontation and Cross-Examination.

Right to confront witnesses is a fundamental right. Morse v. People, 180 Colo. 49, 501 P.2d 1328 (1972).

The right of cross-examination is a valuable constitutional right guaranteed to all defendants. Simms v. People, 174 Colo. 85, 482 P.2d 974 (1971); People v. Fresquez, 186 Colo. 146, 526 P.2d 146 (1974).

Cross-examination is a fundamental right, and not a mere privilege. Puncec v. City & County of Denver, 28 Colo. App. 542, 475 P.2d 359 (1970).

Statutory child hearsay exception created in § 13-25-129 for statements by sexual assault victims violates the confrontation clause of the sixth amendment of the U.S. Constitution where the statements admitted are testimonial in nature and where defendant has not been afforded the opportunity to cross-examine the witness. People v. Moreno, 160 P.3d 242 (Colo. 2007).

Where a child's hearsay statement offered under § 13-25-129 is nontestimonial, the federal confrontational clause is not implicated. People v. Phillips, 2012 COA 176, __ P.3d __.

Even if the statement is testimonial, where the defendant is afforded an opportunity to cross-examine the child at trial, the federal confrontation clause also is not implicated. People v. Phillips, 2012 COA 176, __ P.3d __.

To use the forfeiture doctrine to deprive a defendant of the protection of the confrontation clause, the prosecution must show that defendant's wrongful conduct was designed, at least in part, to subvert the criminal justice system by depriving that system of the evidence upon which it depends. The people must prove that the defendant intended to prevent or dissuade the child from testifying against him or her. People v. Moreno, 162 P.3d 242 (Colo. 2007).

Testimonial hearsay statements are admissible only if: (1) The declarant is unavailable to testify and (2) the defendant had a previous opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. The juvenile victim's statement to an investigating officer in a question and answer format is a testimonial statement. Since the defendant did not have an opportunity to cross-examine the juvenile victim, the statement is inadmissible. People ex rel. R.A.S., 111 P.3d 487 (Colo. App. 2004).

A nontestifying witness's out-of-court testimonial statement, regardless of its reliability, may be admitted against an accused only if the witness is unavailable and the accused had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness when the statement was made. People v. Couillard, 131 P.3d 1146 (Colo. App. 2005).

Testimonial hearsay statements of confidential informant are admissible at a pretrial suppression hearing without demonstrating declarant unavailability and prior opportunity to cross-examine declarant. The protections afforded by the confrontation clause apply at a criminal trial but not at the pretrial stage. People v. Felder, 129 P.3d 1072 (Colo. App. 2005).

A criminal defendant does not have a constitutional right to testify at a pretrial suppression hearing where his counsel decides not to call him as a witness. Unlike the decision whether to go to trial, the decision whether to move to suppress evidence is a strategic one for counsel to make in the exercise of professional discretion. Additionally, the reasons for allowing a defendant to decide whether he will testify at trial do not apply in the suppression hearing context. People v. Krueger, 2012 COA 80, __ P.3d __.

Out-of-court statement offered against an accused is constitutionally admissible only if the prosecution demonstrates that the declarant is unavailable and that the statement either falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception or bears particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. People v. Stephenson, 56 P.3d 1112 (Colo. App. 2001).

And wife's statement against penal interest made to police did not fall within a firmly rooted exception to the hearsay rule. People v. Stephenson, 56 P.3d 1112 (Colo. App. 2001).

And wife's statement against penal interest did not bear particularized guarantees of trustworthiness because it was presumptively unreliable as a statement by an accomplice that implicated another accused. People v. Stephenson, 56 P.3d 1112 (Colo. App. 2001).

And improper admission of wife's statement against penal interest was not harmless error as there was a reasonable probability that the defendant was prejudiced by the error. People v. Stephenson, 56 P.3d 1112 (Colo. App. 2001).

The juvenile victim's statement to his father and father's friend made immediately after incident were an excited utterance. The statements were made while the child was upset, did not have any formal character, and were made to persons unassociated with the government.

People v. Vigil, 104 P.3d 258 (Colo. App. 2004).

Although unsuccessful, the prosecution made all reasonable efforts to secure the witness for trial, so the witness was unavailable for confrontation clause purposes. People v. Banks, 2012 COA 157, __ P.3d __.

The defendant's confrontation rights were not violated since officer's testimony regarding the unavailable informant was not hearsay. Informant's statements regarding drug deal's arrangements, the suppliers and their street names, and identifying them when they arrived at the scene were introduced to show why the officers went to that particular location to arrest defendant, not for the truthfulness of those statements. People v. Robinson, 226 P.3d 1145 (Colo. App. 2009).

Two-part test to determine whether questioning by someone other than a law enforcement officer constitutes the functional equivalent of police interrogation. The test directs courts to examine (1) whether and to what extent government officials were involved in producing the statements; and then (2) whether their purpose was to develop testimony for trial. People v. Vigil, 127 P.3d 916 (Colo. 2006); People v. Sharp, 155 P.3d 577 (Colo. App. 2006).

This determination is fact specific and must be made on a case-by-case basis. People v. Vigil, 127 P.3d 916 (Colo. 2006); People v. Sharp, 155 P.3d 577 (Colo. App. 2006).

Statements made during the functional equivalent of police interrogation are testimonial. People v. Sharp, 155 P.3d 577 (Colo. App. 2006).

In order to determine if a doctor's questions, as part of a sexual assault examination, constitute the functional equivalent of police interrogation, a court must consider to what extent government officials were involved in producing the statement and whether the purpose was to develop testimony for trial. In this case, the doctor's questions were intended to help the doctor's diagnosis and treat the patient and were not directed by a government official, and a government official was not present during the questioning. Therefore, the questioning did not constitute the equivalent of a police interrogation. People v. Vigil, 127 P.3d 916 (Colo. 2006).

The test in determining whether a child's out-of-court statement is testimonial depends on whether an objective person in the child's position would believe his or her statements would lead to punishment of the defendant. People v. Sharp, 143 P.3d 1047 (Colo. App. 2005).

Factors to be considered in determining whether a child declarant would reasonably believe his or her statements could be used by the prosecution at trial include: (1) The declarant's age; (2) the declarant's awareness of government involvement; and (3) the declarant's awareness that the defendant faces the possibility of criminal punishment. People v. Sharp, 143 P.3d 1047 (Colo. App. 2005).

Applying the "objective witness" test, the child victim's statements to the doctor were not testimonial. The objective witness test asks whether a reasonable person making the statements would believe their statements would be used at trial. In this case, a reasonable child victim would expect that his or her statements would be used to provide a diagnosis for the child and to make the child feel better, not for prosecution at a trial. People v. Vigil, 127 P.3d 916 (Colo. 2006).

Applying the "objective witness" test, the child victim's statements to his father and father's friend were not testimonial. The statements were not made under circumstances that a reasonable seven-year-old boy would believe his statements would be used at trial. People v. Vigil, 127 P.3d 916 (Colo. 2006).

The functional equivalent of police interrogation test is separate and in addition to the objective witness test. If a child victim makes a statement to a government agent as part of a police interrogation, his or her statement is testimonial irrespective of the child's expectations regarding whether the statement will be available for use at a later trial. People v. Sharp, 155 P.3d 577 (Colo. App. 2006).

Child victim's videotaped statements to private forensic interviewer were the functional equivalent of police interrogation and were testimonial. The police detective arranged and, to a certain extent, directed the interview even though the detective was not physically present in the room. Moreover, the purpose of the interview was to elicit statements that would be used at a later criminal trial to convict the perpetrator. People v. Sharp, 155 P.3d 577 (Colo. App. 2006).

Defendant's constitutional rights were violated by the introduction of child victim's videotaped statements at trial. The prosecutor admitted child victim's videotaped statements in lieu of her testimony because the child was unavailable. Defendant did not have an opportunity, however, to cross-examine the child either during the videotaped interview or during trial. People v. Sharp, 155 P.3d 577 (Colo. App. 2006).

Plea allocutions are testimonial and, thus, inadmissible unless the defendant has had an opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. People v. Couillard, 131 P.3d 1146 (Colo. App. 2005).

For out-of-court statements that are not testimonial, the prosecution must make a two-part showing to demonstrate compliance with the state constitution. First, the prosecution must either produce the declarant or show that he or she is unavailable for trial. Second, if the declarant is unavailable, the government may use the out-of-court statements only if they bear sufficient indicia of reliability. People v. Couillard, 131 P.3d 1146 (Colo. App. 2005).

Criminal laboratory reports are testimonial statements subject to the U.S. supreme court's decision in Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004). Hinojos-Mendoza v. People, 169 P.3d 662 (Colo. 2007).

The laboratory report was introduced at trial to establish the elements of the offense with which defendant was charged, and, under such circumstances, the report is testimonial in nature. Hinojos-Mendoza v. People, 169 P.3d 662 (Colo. 2007).

Booking reports and mittimus not "testimonial" and thus did not trigger defendant's confrontation rights. Trial court did not err in admitting them as public records. People v. Warrick, 284 P.3d 139 (Colo. App. 2011).

Essence of right to confront one's accusers is to meet adverse witnesses face-to-face and to have opportunity to cross-examine them. People v. Bastardo, 191 Colo. 521, 554 P.2d 297 (1976).

The right to confront witnesses under this section translates into the right of cross-examination. D.W. v. District Court, 193 Colo. 194, 564 P.2d 949 (1976); People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

The admission of hearsay evidence does not violate the sixth amendment when the declarant's truthfulness is so clear from the surrounding circumstances that the test of cross-examination would be of marginal utility. Generally, hearsay meets the requirements of the confrontation clause only when the statement bears either adequate indicia of reliability or has particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. People v.

Gilmore, 97 P.3d 123 (Colo. App. 2003).

Purpose of right of confrontation and cross-examination is to prevent conviction by ex parte affidavits, to sift the conscience of the witness, and to test his recollection to see if his story is worthy of belief. People v. Scheidt, 182 Colo. 374, 513 P.2d 446 (1973); People v. Bastardo, 191 Colo. 521, 554 P.2d 297 (1976).

And waiver of such right is not to be lightly found. Morse v. People, 180 Colo. 49, 501 P.2d 1328 (1972).

This decision is properly responsibility of defense counsel, and therefore, the decision of defense counsel to allow the prosecution to use depositions of witnesses in court is an effective waiver. Morse v. People, 180 Colo. 49, 501 P.2d 1328 (1972).

Waiver not required prior to guilty plea. The language of Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238, 89 S. Ct. 1709, 23 L. Ed. 2d 274 (1969), does not expressly require that the right against compulsory self-incrimination and the right to confront one's accusers at trial must be specifically waived by a defendant before a trial court may accept his guilty plea. People v. Marsh, 183 Colo. 258, 516 P.2d 431 (1973).

Right to confront witnesses is inapplicable in administrative hearing to determine whether a driver's license should be revoked for accumulated traffic violations. Campbell v. State, 176 Colo. 202, 491 P.2d 1385 (1971).

Pretrial confrontation prior to appointment of defense counsel is unconstitutional. A pretrial confrontation of defendant by a witness to the crime, prior to appointment of defense counsel, is unconstitutional. Gallegos v. People, 176 Colo. 191, 489 P.2d 1301 (1971).

Confrontation clause violations are trial errors, and trial errors are reviewed under the plain error doctrine if the defendant does not raise the confrontation clause objection at trial. Since the jury had ample evidence to find the defendant guilty, the admission of the videotaped police interview did not constitute plain error. People v. Vigil, 127 P.3d 916 (Colo. 2006).

Even where there has been illegal confrontation, witness may make in-court identification if there is an independent source upon which to base such an identification apart from the illegal confrontation. Glass v. People, 177 Colo. 267, 493 P.2d 1347 (1972).

The defendant's confrontation right is not violated when the court admits out-of-court statements of declarants who testify at trial and are available for cross-examination about the out-of-court statements. People v. Rincon, 140 P.3d 976 (Colo. App. 2005).

A defendant's right to confrontation is satisfied when the hearsay declarant is produced for cross-examination. People v. Oliver, 745 P.2d 222 (Colo. 1987); People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

Cross-examination provides meaningful confrontation. Knowledge of techniques of scientific and technologic analyses is sufficiently available and the variables in techniques few enough that the accused has the opportunity for a meaningful confrontation of the government's case at trial through the ordinary process of cross-examination of the government's expert witnesses and the presentation of the evidence of his own experts. Sandoval v. People, 172 Colo. 383, 473 P.2d 722 (1970).

Cross-examination should not be unduly restricted, but, rather, should be liberally extended to permit thorough inquiry into the motives of a witness testifying for the prosecution. People v. Key, 185 Colo. 72, 522 P.2d 719 (1974).

Trial judge may determine scope and limits of cross-examination. Puncec v. City & County of Denver, 28 Colo. App. 542, 475 P.2d 359 (1970); Simms v. People, 174 Colo. 85, 482 P.2d 974 (1971); People v. Fresquez, 186 Colo. 146, 526 P.2d 146 (1974).

And except for abuse of discretion, his rulings will not be disturbed on review. Simms v. People, 174 Colo. 85, 482 P.2d 974 (1971); People v. Fresquez, 186 Colo. 146, 526 P.2d 146 (1974); People v. Knight, 167 P.3d 147 (Colo. App. 2006).

Right by cross-examination to require witness to give his residence address is in aid of a defendant's right of confrontation, but this right, however, is not without exceptions. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 177 Colo. 429, 494 P.2d 841 (1972).

Defendant's constitutional right to confront an adverse witness violated when court ruled defendant could not cross-examine witness regarding a pending misdemeanor case that might have influenced witness's testimony. Kinney v. People, 187 P.3d 548 (Colo. 2008).

Defendant need only show that the witness's testimony might be influenced by a promise for, or hope or expectation of, immunity or leniency with respect to the pending charges against the witness in exchange for favorable testimony. Kinney v. People, 187 P.3d 548 (Colo. 2008).

There is a duty to protect witness from questions which go beyond bounds of proper cross-examination merely to harass, annoy or humiliate him. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 177 Colo. 429, 494 P.2d 841 (1972).

Witness's loss of memory. Where a witness takes the stand and is available for cross-examination, the witness's actual or feigned memory loss, even if memory loss is total regarding prior inconsistent statements, does not violate a defendant's confrontation right. People v. Pepper, 193 Colo. 505, 568 P.2d 446 (1977).

The fact that at the time of trial witness no longer recalled the statements or events does not alter the conclusion that there was no violation of defendant's confrontation rights. Defense counsel had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness about her statements and the witness was available for further testimony. People v. Candelaria, 107 P.3d 1080 (Colo. App. 2004), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 148 P.3d 178 (Colo. 2006).

District attorney is not obliged to call all witnesses endorsed upon information. Harris v. People, 174 Colo. 483, 484 P.2d 1223 (1971).

Application of § 16-10-201 in allowing prosecution to impeach its own witness with prior inconsistent statements was not a violation of right to confront accuser, to assistance of counsel, to appear when depositions against one were taken, or to due process of law. People v. Bastardo, 191 Colo. 521, 554 P.2d 297 (1976).

Failure to call complaining witness at trial did not prevent confrontation. Where the defendant argued that he was not given an opportunity to confront the complaining witness who by her complaint initiated one count of assault with a deadly weapon, it was held that the defendant had failed to distinguish the difference between the charge of the offense and the proof of the offense. The information, which was based to a large extent upon what the officers had learned from the woman, was the vehicle by which the people advised the defendant of the crime he was alleged to have committed. It was not used, and necessarily could not be used, as evidence to prove the charge. Proof of the elements of the offense charged may be established not only by the testimony of the victim, but also they may be proved by any other competent evidence. The defendant could not complain, since he was afforded an opportunity to cross-examine every witness used to prove the several elements of the offense with which he was charged. Harris v. People, 174 Colo. 483, 484 P.2d 1223 (1971).

Failure to advise pro se claimant of right of cross-examination was improper. Where the referee of the industrial commission used hospital records in rendering a decision against a claimant, his failure to advise claimant, who was appearing pro se, of her right of cross-examination was improper, as was his failure to offer her an opportunity to inspect the records before using them against her. Puncec v. City & County of Denver, 28 Colo. App. 542, 475 P.2d 359 (1970).

In joint prosecution of two roommates for possession of hashish, the attorney for the first defendant, who did not testify, should have been allowed to cross-examine a witness who was called by the second defendant and who testified that the second defendant had seldom been at the apartment for two weeks before the search but that the two defendants shared the closet where the hashish was discovered. Eder v. People, 179 Colo. 122, 498 P.2d 945 (1972).

There was no deprivation of constitutional rights in allowing witnesses to be impeached by their previous statements where neither witness invoked the fifth amendment and there was opportunity to cross-examine them as to both their previous and present statements. Gaitan v. People, 167 Colo. 395, 447 P.2d 1001 (1968).

Right of confrontation denied. This section precludes the admission of the transcript of a preliminary hearing at a subsequent trial when the witness whose testimony is sought has become unavailable. People v. Smith, 198 Colo. 120, 597 P.2d 204 (1979); People v. Sisneros, 44 Colo. App. 65, 606 P.2d 1317 (1980); People v. Fry, 74 P.3d 360 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd on other grounds, 92 P.3d 970 (Colo. 2004).

Right to confront witness was denied when witness was allowed to testify over the phone and the unavailability of said witness had not been established. Gonsoir v. People, 793 P.2d 1165 (Colo. 1990).

Defendant's right to confront witness was denied by allowing physician who had treated victim to testify by telephone since physician was actually available to testify, although to do so would have been extremely inconvenient. Topping v. People, 793 P.2d 1168 (Colo. 1990).

Denial by the trial court for defense counsel to cross-examine prosecution witnesses with respect to use immunity granted to the witnesses violated confrontation clause of the United States Constitution, and was not harmless error. Merritt v. People, 842 P.2d 162 (Colo. 1992).

If victim's statements are deemed testimonial and the defendant did not have an opportunity to cross-examine the victim, the admission of the statements is a violation of defendant's confrontation rights under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004). People v. Couillard, 131 P.3d 1146 (Colo. App. 2005).

Factors to be considered in determining whether a confrontation violation constitutes harmless error include: (1) The importance of the evidence to the prosecution's case; (2) whether the evidence was cumulative; (3) the presence or absence of corroborating or contradicting testimony on the material points of the improperly admitted evidence; (4) the extent of cross-examination otherwise permitted; and (5) the overall strength of the prosecution's case. People v. Harris, 43 P.3d 221 (Colo. 2002); People v. Fry, 92 P.3d 970 (Colo.

2004); People v. Couillard, 131 P.3d 1146 (Colo. App. 2005).

Although a defendant must have been provided with a prior adequate opportunity to cross-examine an unavailable witness before the state can admit that witness's previous testimony into evidence, the preliminary hearing does not provide an adequate opportunity to cross-examine sufficient to satisfy the confrontation clause requirements. People v. Fry, 92 P.3d 970 (Colo. 2004).

Test for a hearsay statement that would not deprive a defendant of his constitutional right to be confronted with the witnesses against him is whether the declarant's truthfulness is so clear from the surrounding circumstances that the test of cross-examination would be of marginal utility. To meet that high burden of truthfulness, the statement must either fall within a firmly rooted hearsay exception or bear particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. People v. Farrell, 34 P.3d 401 (Colo. 2001).

Statement against interest by a co-defendant made during custodial interrogation does not fall within a firmly rooted hearsay exception, but statement made by co-defendant in case at hand, after examining totality of circumstances, was genuinely self-inculpatory, not induced by threats, coercion, or promises, and not intended to shift blame to defendant; thus, admission of statement bore particularized guarantees of trustworthiness and did not deprive defendant of his constitutional right to be confronted with the witness against him. People v. Farrell, 34 P.3d 401 (Colo. 2001).

Right of confrontation not denied. Where prosecution used depositions of two witnesses at trial and where defendant was present with counsel and was granted full rights of cross-examination at the time of the taking of the depositions before a judge, he was not deprived of his right to confront witnesses at trial where the depositions were used without a finding of unavailability of the deponents, where it was a matter of his counsel's trial strategy. Morse v. People, 180 Colo. 49, 501 P.2d 1328 (1972).

Where defendant was prohibited from revealing to jury through cross-examination that a witness was in custody in another state on unrelated charges where such testimony would have been cumulative and of little or no probative value and where defendant was otherwise provided with ample opportunity to impeach the witness' credibility by showing ulterior motive. People v. Griffin, 867 P.2d 27 (Colo. App. 1993).

Where the declarant was unavailable as a witness due to her age, the requirement of spontaneity underlying the res gestae exception provided an adequate proxy for the truth-exacting sanction of an oath, and the admission of the hearsay assertion of the declarant under the res gestae exception did not violate the confrontation rights of the defendant. Lancaster v. People, 200 Colo. 448, 615 P.2d 720 (1980).

Where the witness testified under oath and was thoroughly cross-examined by defendant's attorney, the jury had the opportunity to observe the witness' demeanor, and the written hearsay statement did not contain any information which was not the subject of his examination and cross-examination. People v. Sharrock, 709 P.2d 973 (Colo. App. 1985).

Court properly denied defendant's request to cross-examine witness concerning illicit use of drugs five months prior the offense on grounds it was too remote to be probative of witness's credibility. People v. Fultz, 761 P.2d 242 (Colo. App. 1988).

The right to confront witness was not denied when the physician who treated victim testified over the telephone but was fully cross-examined by the defense in jury's presence. The inherent reliability of physician's testimony arising from lack of personal interest in outcome of case and uncontested nature of testimony compensated for any minor reduction in defendant's ability to confront witness face to face. People v. Topping, 764 P.2d 369 (Colo. App. 1988).

The right of confrontation does not come into play when a potential witness neither testifies nor provides evidence at trial. A defendant has no absolute right to confront the victim when the victim does not appear as a witness and no evidence supplied by the victim is presented at trial. People v. Walters, 821 P.2d 887 (Colo. App. 1991).

Where defendant's counsel made a deliberate, tactical choice to introduce bystander's hearsay statement into case, defendant invited any error that may have resulted from its introduction. Therefore, hearsay admission did not violate defendant's right to confront the witnesses against him. People v. Gibson, 203 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2008).

An excited utterance made to a police officer was nontestimonial, thus Crawford v. Washington 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354, 158 L. Ed. 2d 177 (2004), does not apply, there is no violation of the sixth amendment, and the defendant has no constitutional right to confront. If a victim makes an excited utterance to a police officer, in a noncustodial setting and without indicia of formality, the statement is a nontestimonial interrogation under Crawford. People v. King, 121 P.3d 234 (Colo. App. 2005).

Prosecutor as witness for defense. Every prosecutor may potentially be a witness for the defense insofar as he has interviewed other witnesses and investigated the facts of the case. This alone cannot be a sufficient basis to prevent the execution of his office as prosecutor because it would allow prosecution only by unprepared counsel. On the other hand, the defendant has a right to call witnesses on his own behalf and to prevent the prosecutor from adding to the weight or credibility of the evidence by acting as both witness and officer of the court. People v. District Court, 192 Colo. 480, 560 P.2d 463 (1977).

Where, in the course of investigations into activities of defendant, the grand jury prosecutor asked certain questions of defendant, the responses to these questions formed the basis for a subsequent indictment of defendant for perjury, and the grand jury prosecutor continued his role as prosecutor for the case at trial, granting defendant's motion to dismiss the prosecutor on the grounds that the defendant intended to call the prosecutor as a witness to the alleged crime was error since the testimony of the prosecutor did not play a significant role in the posture of the case and was not of sufficient consequence to prevent a fair trial. People v. District Court, 192 Colo. 480, 560 P.2d 463 (1977).

When defense witness has not been subpoenaed by defendant and due to witness's absence, a motion for continuance is made but denied, there is no violation of this provision. Edwards v. People, 176 Colo. 478, 491 P.2d 566 (1971).

Expenses of obtaining testimony of witnesses for indigent defendant must be paid by state. People v. McCabe, 37 Colo. App. 181, 546 P.2d 1289 (1975).

Advancement of costs by state. Since the state will ultimately pay the costs of securing out-of-state witnesses for the defendant, there is no legal justification for holding that it is not liable for advancement of such costs as mileage and witness fees. People v. McCabe, 37 Colo. App. 181, 546 P.2d 1289 (1975).

The United States and Colorado Constitutions guarantee an accused the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. This right is a fundamental element in the panoply of constitutional protections afforded a person accused of crime. People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

The permissible purposes of the right of cross-examination include, among others, that the witness may be sought and offered of his reputation for veracity in his own neighborhood; that the jury may interpret his testimony in the light reflected upon it by knowledge of his environment; and that facts may be brought out tending to discredit the witness by showing that his testimony in chief was untrue or biased. People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990); Luu v. People, 841 P.2d 271 (Colo. 1992).

Right of confrontation not absolute and withholding of victim's address not material enough to prejudice defendant's defense. Court did not err in extending personal safety exception to the victim and applying it to the defendant's right of cross-examination since victim did not give her present address because of concerns for her safety arising out of an unrelated, pending homicide case in which she was a witness and which was then in another courtroom. People v. Joyce, 878 P.2d 48 (Colo. App. 1994).

Nondisclosure of witnesses' addresses proper in postconviction proceeding for defendant convicted of murdering witness. Significant threat to witness safety was not overcome by evidence of any materiality of witnesses' addresses to postconviction proceedings. People v. Ray, 252 P.3d 1042 (Colo. 2011).

Constitutional right to confrontation is not absolute. Topping v. People, 793 P.2d 1168 (Colo. 1990).

An accused's right to confront and to cross-examine witnesses is not absolute and may be limited by the court to accommodate other legitimate interests in the criminal trial process after carefully scrutinizing such competing interests. People v. Cole, 654 P.2d 830 (Colo. 1982); People v. Benney, 757 P.2d 1078 (Colo. App. 1987); People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990); People v. Ray, 109 P.3d 996 (Colo. App. 2004).

The court may limit an attack on the credibility of a witness to avoid wasting time and to protect the witness from harassment or undue embarrassment without violating the confrontation clause. The line of questioning defendant wanted to pursue would have injected collateral issues into the case and unduly prolonged the proceedings, so it was proper for the court to disallow the questioning. People v. Rincon, 140 P.3d 976 (Colo. App. 2005).

Defendant's misconduct resulting in wrongful prevention of future testimony from a witness or potential witness may result in a forfeiture of constitutional right of confrontation. A defendant is not to benefit from his or her wrongful prevention of future testimony. In the present case, defendant sought to overrule the allowance of victim's testimony under the excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule based on a violation of the defendant's right of confrontation. However, since victim was unavailable to testify because her death was the result of defendant's actions, defendant thus forfeited his right to claim a confrontation violation in connection with the admission of victim's statements into evidence. People v. Moore, 117 P.3d 1 (Colo. App. 2004).

Defendant forfeits right to confront witness in all proceedings in which witness's statements are otherwise admissible if (1) the witness is unavailable; (2) the defendant was involved in, or responsible for, procuring the unavailability of the witness; and (3) the defendant acted with the intent to deprive the criminal justice system of evidence. Vasquez v. People, 173 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2007); Pena v. People, 173 P.3d 1107 (Colo. 2007).

In order to establish forfeiture, these elements must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence in an evidentiary hearing outside the presence of the jury. Vasquez v. People, 173 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2007); Pena v. People, 173 P.3d 1107 (Colo. 2007).

Once the court determines that forfeiture by wrongdoing has been established, the court must examine the admissibility of victim's hearsay statements according to rules of evidence. Vasquez v. People, 173 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2007); Pena v. People, 173 P.3d 1107 (Colo. 2007).

Section 16-3-309 (5) is constitutional on its face. Section 16-3-309 (5), which requires a defendant to affirmatively request a laboratory technician's presence at trial, is an acceptable precondition to a defendant's exercise of his right to confrontation and is therefore not unconstitutional. A defendant's right to confrontation is not denied as he can preserve that right, pursuant to § 16-3-309, with minimal effort. People v. Mojica-Simental, 73 P.3d 15 (Colo. 2003).

Defendant's attorney's failure to comply with § 16-3-309 (5) waived defendant's right to confront technician who prepared forensic report that was introduced without technician's testimony. Defendant's attorney's ignorance of the statute's requirements does not affect the waiver of the right to confrontation. Defendant received sufficient notice of the existence of the report and its possible introduction at trial. Cropper v. People, 251 P.3d 434 (Colo. 2011).

The right of confrontation includes the right to elicit a witness's address by cross-examination. People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

The address, however, may be kept confidential if prosecution shows that witness legitimately fears reprisal from defendant or defendant's associates. People v. Victorian, 165 P.3d 890 (Colo. App. 2007).

Right to cross-examine witness tempered by trial court's authority. The constitutional right to confront and cross-examine witnesses is tempered by the trial court's authority to prohibit cross-examination on matters wholly irrelevant and immaterial to issues at trial. People v. Loscutoff, 661 P.2d 274 (Colo. 1983); People v. Rubanowitz, 688 P.2d 231 (Colo. 1984); People v. Collins, 730 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1986); People v. Bell, 809 P.2d 1026 (Colo. App. 1990); People v. Kerber, 64 P.3d 930 (Colo. App. 2002).

The trial court has the ability to limit recross-examination when no new matters have been raised on redirect or additional testimony would be only marginally relevant. People v. Kerber, 64 P.3d 930 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. Baker, 178 P.3d 1225 (Colo. App. 2007).

Right to cross-examine drug enforcement agency agents concerning incentive programs for obtaining drug convictions in order to establish bias improperly denied by the trial court. The testimony would have revealed agents' strong interest in the outcome of the case and motive for giving testimony favorable to the prosecution. However, error was harmless because the facts in question were fully established by other evidence. Vega v. People, 893 P.2d 107 (Colo. 1995).

Right to confront adverse witnesses does not supersede a victim's statutory psychologist-patient privilege under § 13-90-107. Once the psychologist-patient privilege attaches, the only basis for authorizing a disclosure of the confidential information is an express or an implied waiver. People v. District Court, 719 P.2d 722 (Colo. 1986).

The victim advocate privilege in § 13-90-107 (1)(k)(I) extends to records of service or assistance provided by the victim's advocate, and the withholding of such records does not violate the rights to confrontation and compulsory process. People v. Turner, 109 P.3d 639 (Colo. 2005).

A court must allow broad cross-examination of a prosecution witness as to bias, prejudice, and motivation for testifying. People v. Bowman, 669 P.2d 1369 (Colo. 1983); People v. Schwartz, 678 P.2d 1000 (Colo. 1984); People v. Benney, 757 P.2d 1078 (Colo. App. 1987).

However, a trial court must disallow cross-examination upon matters wholly irrelevant and immaterial to the issues at trial, and the court has broad discretion to preclude repetitive and harassing interrogation. People v. Bowman, 669 P.2d 1369 (Colo. 1983); People v. Schwartz, 678 P.2d 1000 (Colo. 1984).

The ability to cross-examine a prosecution witness about use immunity allows a defendant to elicit testimony that would show bias, and results in the elimination of reasonable but false inferences raised by the testimony of a witness granted immunity. Denial by the trial court for defense counsel to cross-examine prosecution witnesses with respect to use immunity granted to the witnesses violated confrontation clause of the United States Constitution, and was not harmless error. Merritt v. People, 842 P.2d 162 (Colo. 1992).

While a trial court does have discretion to limit cross-examination, it is constitutional error to limit excessively a defendant's cross-examination of a witness regarding the credibility of the witness especially cross-examination concerning the witness bias, prejudice, or motive for testifying. Merritt v. People, 842 P.2d 162 (Colo. 1992); People v. Russom, 107 P.3d 986 (Colo. App. 2004).

Trial court did not excessively limit cross-examination of prosecution witnesses regarding their gang affiliation, and thus, there was no constitutional error. Contrary to defendant's assertions, the trial court admitted substantial testimony regarding the prosecution witnesses' gang affiliations. To the extent that the court limited defendant's ability to inquire into other topics noted in his various offers of proof, defendant's proffers as to those subjects were speculative and conclusory at best, and the court did not abuse its discretion in precluding such inquiries. People v. Gonzales-Quevedo, 203 P.3d 609 (Colo. App. 2008).

The court may constitutionally prohibit cross-examination of a witness concerning the underlying facts of pending cases against that witness because factual details of a witness' pending cases are not relevant to the witness' biases, prejudices, or motives for testifying against defendant. People v. Russom, 107 P.3d 986 (Colo. App. 2004).

In determining whether a defendant's right to confrontation is violated, a reviewing court shall determine whether the trial court limited excessively the defendant's cross examination of a witness with respect to the witness' bias, prejudice, or motive for testifying. Merritt v. People, 842 P.2d 162 (Colo. 1992).

On review of conviction where a defendant asserts that the violation of the defendant's constitutional right to confrontation did not result in harmless error, the prosecution has the burden of showing that the trial court's limit on cross examination did not contribute to the defendant's conviction. Merritt v. People, 842 P.2d 162 (Colo. 1992).

A defendant is presumptively entitled to cross-examine a prosecution witness as to the witness's address and place of employment. Absent sufficient justification for withholding this information, a defendant's right to it is unqualified, and the defendant is under no obligation to provide reasons for seeking it. The prosecution's showing must consist of more than the mere expression of apprehension by a witness who is reluctant to divulge her identity, address or place of employment. At a minimum, the danger claimed by the witness must in some way relate to the particular defendant. There must be a nexus such that the witness legitimately fears reprisal from the defendant or his associates. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 177 Colo. 429, 494 P.2d 841 (1972); People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

Statements acknowledging the existence of a committed romantic relationship are not evidence of sexual conduct or sexual orientation for purposes of the rape shield statute. As such, if evidence of such a committed romantic relationship is otherwise relevant to the case, it is admissible and not barred by the rape shield statute. People v. Golden, 140 P.3d 1 (Colo. App. 2005).

Trial court erred in concluding that initial questions as to whether victim was in a committed relationship at the time of the alleged sexual assault inquired into sexual conduct and in foreclosing cross-examination through use of prior inconsistent statements in that regard. People v. Golden, 140 P.3d 1 (Colo. App. 2005).

Court properly excluded cross-examination of victim by precluding questioning on victim's reasons for seeking postpartum depression treatment since the issue was irrelevant and tangential to the victim's credibility. People v. Brown, 218 P.3d 733 (Colo. App. 2009), aff'd, 239 P.3d 764 (Colo. 2010).

Trial court erred in precluding defendant from inquiring into, and if necessary, presenting evidence of, a romantic relationship between alleged victim and a friend. Evidence of alleged victim's romantic and sexual relationship with friend was relevant to a material issue in the case, namely, victim's motive to lie. Trial court's exclusion of the motive evidence infringed upon defendant's constitutional right to confront witnesses. People v. Owens, 183 P.3d 568 (Colo. App. 2007).

Right of confrontation requires defendant to have opportunity to conduct an effective cross-examination of adversary witnesses but this opportunity does not mean unlimited cross-examination. People v. Griffin, 867 P.2d 27 (Colo. App. 1993).

The extent of cross-examination with respect to an appropriate subject of inquiry is within the sound discretion of the trial court, which is under a duty to protect a witness from questions which go beyond the bounds of proper cross-examination merely to harass, annoy or humiliate him. People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

Where the right to confrontation is limited by a self-imposed tactical constraint, and not by any trial court ruling limiting cross-examination, there is no constitutional violation. A criminal defendant has the right to conduct liberal cross-examination of prosecution witnesses in order to establish possible bias or prejudice; however, the right to confrontation is not denied simply because the prosecution is permitted to examine a witness whom the defense declines for tactical reasons to cross-examine. People v. District Court of El Paso

County, 869 P.2d 1281 (Colo. 1994).

Right to cross-examination not denied when court properly prohibited witness for the prosecution from answering question regarding potential penalties if the witness had not entered a plea bargain, where the jury was fully informed that the witness had been allowed to plead guilty to a lesser charge and had received two years' probation and deferred sentence. People v. Collins, 730 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1986).

Trial court carefully balanced defendant's need for cross-examination against the need to preserve the attorney-client privilege and struck a balance accommodating both interests which did not violate the defendant's constitutional rights. People v. Benney, 757 P.2d 1078 (Colo. App. 1987).

But defendant's confrontation clause rights were violated when the court precluded defendant from cross-examining a witness regarding the details of her plea agreement. The record overwhelmingly supported the prosecution's case, so the error was harmless. People v. Houser, 2013 COA 11, __ P.3d __.

Right to confrontation under the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution not denied by limiting defendant's cross-examination of victim where trial court restricted some inquiries but generously afforded defendant ample opportunity to explore issues material to his defense. Matthews v. Price, 83 F.3d 328 (10th Cir. 1996).

A defendant's right to confrontation is not violated when the court excludes evidence regarding the difference between potential penalties for the original crime charged and those for the charge the witness pleaded guilty to, if the jury receives adequate facts to draw inferences about the witness's bias and motive. Witness's testimony that she expected to receive probation and pleaded guilty to "stay out of jail" was sufficient for the jury to determine bias. People v. McKinney, 80 P.3d 823 (Colo. App. 2003), rev'd on other grounds, 99 P.3d 1038 (Colo. 2004).

Right to compel witness to testify not denied. Where there is no suggestion that a subpoenaed witness' unavailability was due to any action or omission by the prosecution or court, defendant's rights to compulsory process were not denied. People v. Chastain, 733 P.2d 1206 (Colo. 1987).

Requirements for use of witness' former testimony. To satisfy the requirements of constitutional confrontation, a party offering a witness' former testimony must establish the present unavailability of the witness. Also, there must have been a sufficient opportunity for the accused to cross-examine the witness at the former hearing so as to afford the trier of fact a satisfactory basis for evaluating the truth of the prior statement. People v. Madonna, 651 P.2d 378 (Colo. 1982).

Removal of defendant from court during trial did not abridge defendant's constitutional rights. Where defendant had been warned numerous times about his courtroom behavior including getting up from his seat and moving towards judge on one occasion and physically attacking a witness on the witness stand on another so that court would either have to shackle, bind, and gag defendant in court or remove him to another room where he could watch the trial via closed-circuit television and freely talk to his attorney by telephone, trial court used constitutionally permissible method to deal with disruptive defendant. People v. Davis, 851 P.2d 239 (Colo. App. 1993).

A balancing approach may be used to measure the state's interest in enforcing discovery rules against the defendant's right to call witnesses in his favor. The factors considered in such approach include: (1) The reason for and the degree of culpability associated with the failure to timely respond to the prosecution's specification of time and place; (2) whether and to what extent the nondisclosure prejudiced the prosecution's opportunity to effectively prepare for trial; (3) whether events occurring subsequent to the defendant's noncompliance mitigate the prejudice to the prosecution; (4) whether there is a reasonable and less drastic alternative to the preclusion of alibi (or other defense) evidence; (5) and any other relevant factors arising out of the circumstances of the case. People v. Hampton, 696 P.2d 765 (Colo. 1985); People v. Pronovost, 773 P.2d 555 (Colo. 1989).

This case implicates the fundamental right of criminal defendants to call witnesses on their own behalf, and accordingly, raises concerns not present where the exclusion is of a prosecution witness in a criminal case. People v. Melendez, 80 P.3d 883 (Colo. App. 2003), aff'd, 102 P.3d 315 (Colo. 2004).

While abuse of discretion in exclusion of a witness called by the accused in a criminal case remains the standard for appellate review, the constitutional implications of the sanction necessary affect the determination of whether abuse of discretion has been shown. People v. Melendez, 80 P.3d 883 (Colo. App. 2003), aff'd on other grounds, 102 P.3d 315 (Colo. 2004).

Right of confrontation paramount to immunity of juvenile proceedings. Where two juveniles admittedly participated in the crimes which were charged against the defendant, both juveniles were seeking leniency, both had already obtained the dismissal of serious felony counts which would have mandated imprisonment, their dispositional hearings were purposely set for a time subsequent to the defendant's trial, and no testimony tied the defendant to the crime other than that of the juvenile witnesses, the defendant's constitutional right to confrontation and cross-examination was paramount to the interests afforded the juveniles under § 19-1-109 (2), which relates to the inadmissibility of evidence from a juvenile proceeding in a criminal action. People v. Pate, 625 P.2d 369 (Colo. 1981).

Restrictions imposed on the cross-examination of juvenile prosecution witness, stepson of the defendant, held to violate the defendant's right of confrontation under the federal and state constitutions. People v. Bowman, 669 P.2d 1369 (Colo. 1983).

Applied in People v. Flores, 39 Colo. App. 556, 575 P.2d 11 (1977); People v. Marin, 686 P.2d 1351 (Colo. App. 1983); People v. Greenwell, 830 P.2d 1116 (Colo. App. 1992).

B. Disclosure of Informant's Identity; Personal Safety Exception.

In order for witness to avoid answering question because of personal safety consideration, there must be a nexus such that the witness legitimately fears reprisal from the defendant or his associates. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 177 Colo. 429, 494 P.2d 841 (1972); People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990); People v. Turley, 870 P.2d 498 (Colo. App. 1993).

If inquiry which tends to endanger personal safety of witness is one that is normally permissible, the state or the witness should at the very least come forward with some showing of why the witness must be excused from answering the question, and the trial judge can then ascertain the interest of the defendant in the answer and exercise an informed discretion in making his ruling. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 177 Colo. 429, 494 P.2d 841 (1972).

Trial court was in error in ordering witness to answer without some showing by the defendant that the disclosure was so material as to outweigh the matter of the safety of the witness. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 177 Colo. 429, 494 P.2d 841 (1972).

When conclusion that question is not patently material is justified. Where a question on its face has no bearing on the witness's credibility and where no explanation of the materiality of the witness's address is made, the trial court is, under the circumstances, justified in concluding that the question is not inevitably and patently material. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 177 Colo. 429, 494 P.2d 841 (1972).

Defendant bears the initial burden of showing that a confidential informant is a likely source of helpful evidence to the accused. If defendant meets this initial burden, the court must balance the interest in protecting flow of information to law enforcement officers with the defendant's need to obtain evidence. People v. Walters, 768 P.2d 1230 (Colo. 1989); People v. Anderson, 837 P.2d 293 (Colo. App. 1992).

Burden is on the defendant requesting disclosure of informant's identity to make an initial showing that the informant will provide information essential to the merits of his suppression ruling. To do this the defendant must establish a reasonable basis in fact to believe one of two things: Either that the informant does not exist or that the informant did not give police the information on which they purportedly relied. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982); People v. Garcia, 752 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1988).

The government's refusal to reveal the identity of a police informant who is not a witness against the defendant has been clearly distinguished from its refusal to do so where the informant is also a witness. The former does not deny the accused's right of confrontation; in the latter situation, the witness's identity generally must be revealed. People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

Decision as to whether identity of confidential informant should be disclosed to defense is within the discretion of the trial court, and such decision requires a balancing of the public interest in protecting the flow of information regarding violations of the law against the individual's right to prepare his defense. People v. Roy, 723 P.2d 1345 (Colo. 1986); People v. Garcia, 752 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1988).

Identity of confidential informants should not have been disclosed since the informants were not eyewitnesses or earwitnesses to the crime, were unavailable as witnesses, and were not deeply involved in the criminal transaction. People v. Villanueva, 767 P.2d 1219 (Colo. 1989).

In determining whether the identity of a confidential informant should be revealed to a defendant, the court must determine whether the informant is a likely source of relevant evidence. In this case, the informant was not an earwitness or eyewitness to the crime, he was not available since the prosecution did not know his identity, other witnesses were available to testify, and the informant had no involvement in the criminal transaction. As a result, the court found that the trial court abused its discretion when it ruled that the charges against the defendant would be dismissed if the prosecution did not reveal the identity of the informant. People v. District Court, 767 P.2d 1208 (Colo. 1989).

And balancing test must consider at least these five factors: Whether the informant was an eyewitness or earwitness; whether the informant is available or could be made available by the exercise of reasonable diligence; whether other witness can testify to the likelihood that the informant's testimony will vary significantly from other witnesses' testimony; whether the defendant knew or could without undue effort discover the informant's identity; and whether the informant was peripherally or deeply involved in the criminal transaction. People v. Marquez, 546 P.2d 482 (Colo. 1976); People v. Garcia, 752 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1988); People v. Martinez, 51 P.3d 1029 (Colo. App. 2001), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 69 P.3d 1029 (Colo. 2003).

Balancing test is applied in People v. Anderson, 837 P.2d 293 (Colo. App. 1992); People v. Martinez, 51 P.3d 1029 (Colo. App. 2001), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 69 P.3d 1029 (Colo. 2003).

Disclosure of confidential informant's identity is justified if the accused can show that the informant either witnessed or participated in the crime. People v. Bueno, 646 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1982); People v. Garcia, 752 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1988).

Colorado has recognized a "personal safety exception". A witness's assertion of concern for personal safety does not have a talismanic quality automatically giving the witness the right to withhold information about identity, address and place of employment. Rather, the proper resolution of such issues requires careful attention to the facts of each case and application of the law concerning the right of an accused to confront adverse witnesses. People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

In order to withhold the address of a witness under the exception there must be a nexus showing that the witness legitimately fears reprisal from the defendant or the defendant's associates. People v. Turley, 870 P.2d 498 (Colo. App. 1993).

After the witness has made a showing that his safety would be endangered if he answered, the defendant has the duty to show that the information sought has some materiality. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 177 Colo. 429, 494 P.2d 841 (1972); People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990); People v. Turley, 870 P.2d 498 (Colo. App. 1993).

The rule that an adequate showing by the prosecution that the witness legitimately fears for his safety requires some showing in turn by the defendant that the disclosure is so material as to outweigh the matter of the safety of the witness, followed by a balancing of interests by the trial court, should not be interpreted as requiring a threshold demonstration by the defendant that the information to be developed from learning the witness's identity, address and place of employment would prove highly material. The defendant's burden extends only to showing that the confidential informant is a material witness on the issue of guilt and that nondisclosure would deprive the defendant of a fair opportunity to test the witness's credibility. People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

The trial court, in exercising its sound discretion, is in the best position to assess the basis for and seriousness of the witness's apprehension. When such apprehension is expressed, the key consideration for a trial court in assessing a defendant's constitutional claim to a witness's identity, address or place of employment is whether in absence of that information the defendant will have sufficient opportunity to place the witness in his proper setting. People v. Thurman, 787 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1990).

C. Admissibility of Evidence.

Hearsay evidence violates right to meet witnesses face to face. In a criminal action for first degree murder where one of two psychiatrists who were called and examined as witnesses testified to the fact of agreement between themselves and two other psychiatrists, who were not called as witnesses, concerning the sanity of defendant, such testimony was clearly hearsay testimony and should have been excluded, and its admission violated the constitutional rights of the defendant, and particularly this section which provides among other things that the accused shall have the right "to meet the witnesses against him face to face". Carter v. People, 119 Colo. 342, 204 P.2d 147 (1949).

But admission of counsel's statement of proof does not. When a statement by the prisoner's counsel, of what a witness would swear to (it being favorable to the prisoner), is admitted in evidence, the admission of such statement cannot be construed as being in conflict with the provision of this section. Wilson v. People, 3 Colo. 325 (1877).

No violation of confrontation rights where a taped statement of the ALJ during the parole hearing was admitted at trial. Taped statement was not hearsay since it was merely offered to prove defendant was on notice that he was not to escape the confines of his intensive supervision parole. People v. Taylor, 74 P.3d 396 (Colo. App. 2002).

No violation of confrontation rights where detective's limited testimony regarding statements made by coconspirator was admitted at trial. Detective's limited testimony regarding statements made by coconspirator that led to the inclusion of defendant in a photo lineup did not include hearsay. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony. People v. Martinez, 224 P.3d 1026 (Colo. App. 2009), aff'd on other grounds, 244 P.3d 135 (Colo. 2010).

Evidence showing motive and interest of paid informant witness should be admitted. Where evidence is offered to show the motive of a paid informant witness and his interest in the outcome of the case by reason of pending criminal charges against him, the prosecution of which may or may not be pursued by reason of the testimony he has given on behalf of the people, such evidence is competent and to deny its admissibility would erode defendant's right of confrontation. People v. King, 179 Colo. 94, 498 P.2d 1142 (1972).

Where the defendant contends that the witness' probationary status was motivation for providing statements to the police, but there is no evidence to suggest the witness believed probationary status was in jeopardy, such evidence is irrelevant and properly excluded. People v. Jones, 971 P.2d 243 (Colo. App. 1998).

Prosecutor's warnings to a defense witness regarding potential perjury and false reporting charges did not deprive defendant of fair trial. To determine whether substantial governmental interference occurred, look to the totality of the circumstances, including factors such as the manner in which the prosecutor raises the issue, the warning's effect on the witness's willingness to testify, and whether the prosecutor capitalized on the witness's absence by directing the jury's attention to it during closing arguments. People v. Blackwell, 251 P.3d 468 (Colo. App. 2010).

Admission of hearsay evidence challenged as violation of constitutional right of confrontation. Two-part test is applied when the admission of hearsay evidence is challenged on constitutional grounds. First, the hearsay declarant must be unavailable. Second, the hearsay evidence must bear sufficient indicia of reliability to ensure accuracy in the fact finding process. People v. Dement, 661 P.2d 675 (Colo. 1983); People v. Moore, 693 P.2d 388 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Hise, 738 P.2d 13 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Mitchell, 829 P.2d 409 (Colo. App. 1991); People v. Green, 884 P.2d 339 (Colo. App. 1994); Blecha v. People, 962 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1998).

In applying second part of two-part test, reliability of hearsay evidence may be inferred if such evidence falls within firmly rooted hearsay exception. People v. Dement, 661 P.2d 675 (Colo. 1983); People v. Moore, 693 P.2d 388 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Green, 884 P.2d 339 (Colo. App. 1994); Blecha v. People, 962 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1998).

But the reliability of a declaration against penal interest should not be inferred. People v. Fincham, 799 P.2d 419 (Colo. App. 1990).

Two-part test is not applicable as testimony given by witness over telephone does not constitute hearsay evidence. Topping v. People, 793 P.2d 1168 (Colo. 1990); People v. Mitchell, 829 P.2d 409 (Colo. App. 1991).

Excited utterance, admissible under C.R.E. 803(2), is inherently trustworthy and trial court is not required to make findings concerning reliability under second part of Dement two-part test. People v. Mitchell, 829 P.2d 409 (Colo. App. 1991); People v. Green, 884 P.2d 339 (Colo. App. 1994).

Admission of excited utterance into evidence despite prosecution's failure to demonstrate declarant's unavailability, although a violation of this section, was harmless and did not require reversal. People v. Martinez, 83 P.3d 1174 (Colo. App. 2003).

The state of mind exception is firmly rooted, and, therefore, statements admitted pursuant to the exception implicitly bear sufficient indicia of reliability to satisfy second part of the Dement two-part test. Accordingly, trial court's failure to make a reliability determination regarding statements by an unavailable witness did not constitute plain error. People v. Gash, 165 P.3d 779 (Colo. App. 2006).

In the wake of Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), the constitutional requirements for admission of testimonial hearsay evidence are that the declarant is unavailable and the defendant had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. The two-part test of declarant unavailability and reliability continues to apply to nontestimonial hearsay evidence. Compan v. People, 121 P.3d 876 (Colo. 2005).

The dual requirements of unavailability and reliability for admission of nontestimonial hearsay evidence sufficiently protect the Colorado confrontation clause's underlying purposes of face-to-face confrontation and cross-examination in cases involving a declarant's excited utterances. Compan v. People, 121 P.3d 876 (Colo. 2005).

Admission of out-of-court unsworn statements of two co-defendants, neither of whom was on trial with a third defendant, violated the confrontation clause of this section. Admission of the statements at the third defendant's trial lacked sufficient reliability to overcome a presumption of unreliability in that such defendants were tried separately from the third defendant, the third defendant made no statement that interlocked with the co-defendants' statements, and there were discrepancies between such co-defendants' statements. Editing of said discrepancies by the court could not improve the reliability of such statements. People v. Smith, 790 P.2d 862 (Colo. App. 1989).

Admission of hearsay statements made by unavailable witness through police officer's testimony to prove the truth of the matter asserted violated defendant's confrontation rights and constituted constitutional error. People v. Harris,

43 P.3d 221 (Colo. 2002).

Court erred in prohibiting defendant, on hearsay grounds, from eliciting evidence of what he and an alleged coconspirator said to one another. Nonhearsay verbal act evidence is admissible on the issue of whether a conspiratorial agreement existed because the statement is admitted merely to show that it was actually made, not to prove the truth of what was asserted in it. People v. Scearce, 87 P.3d 228 (Colo. App. 2003).

Trial court erred in prohibiting defendant, on hearsay grounds, from eliciting evidence of what he and his alleged coconspirator said to one another about the subject of the alleged conspiracy. Defendant argued, to no avail, that he was entitled to present evidence of whether there was any type or even suggestion of agreement between himself and the woman to use force, threats, or intimidation against the victim. People v. Scearce, 87 P.3d 228 (Colo. App. 2003).

Defendant was prohibited from eliciting testimony about statements he and his alleged coconspirator made, not for the truth of the matters contained in the statements, but for the very fact that they were made, to dispute the prosecution's claim that there was an agreement to use force, threats, or intimidation with a deadly weapon against the victim. As such, the evidence was admissible, and the trial court erred in excluding it. People v. Scearce, 87 P.3d 228 (Colo. App. 2003).

Testimonial hearsay must be excluded when declarant is unavailable and there has been no prior opportunity for cross-examination by defendant. Raile v. People, 148 P.3d 126 (Colo. 2006).

When the primary purpose of an interrogation is either to elicit statements that establish or prove past events or to elicit statements that are potentially relevant to a later criminal prosecution, the statements elicited are testimonial. On the other hand, nontestimonial statements are statements made during an on-going emergency to assist the police in their efforts to assess the current situation. Raile v. People, 148 P.3d 126 (Colo. 2006).

Statements in response to a police interrogation the primary purpose of which was to investigate possible crimes already committed were testimonial and should not have been admitted. Any emergency situation that may have occurred had passed by the time the interrogation began. The admission, however, was harmless error. Raile v. People, 148 P.3d 126 (Colo. 2006).

The court did not violate defendant's confrontation rights when it admitted nontestimonial statements made to medical personnel. The victim's statement to the triage nurse that she had been raped and her statement to the emergency room doctor that her assailant held her mouth closed during the assault would not be reasonably considered testimonial; each statement was given in order for the victim to receive medical care. People v. Jones, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2011).

The admission of documentary evidence to show a previous conviction for habitual count purposes are business records and, therefore, not "testimonial statements" subject to Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354, 158 L. Ed. 2d 177 (2004). People v. Shreck, 107 P.3d 1048 (Colo. App. 2004).

Admission of proofs of service attached to defendant's driving record were not testimonial for purposes of Crawford because the proofs reflected the administrative status of defendant's driving privilege, and their primary functions were to notify defendant that he was not permitted to drive a motor vehicle in Colorado and to record that such notice was given. People v. Espinoza, 195 P.3d 1122 (Colo. App. 2008).

Although an objective person who prepared such a proof of service might reasonably believe it would be available in the event of a later traffic violation, this possibility does not make the document testimonial where the document served a routine administrative function and was created before the charged crime occurred. People v. Espinoza, 195 P.3d 1122 (Colo. App. 2008).

Booking reports and mittimus not "testimonial" and thus did not trigger defendant's confrontation rights. Trial court did not err in admitting them as public records. People v. Warrick, 284 P.3d 139 (Colo. App. 2011).

For analysis to be followed in challenges to hearsay evidence on constitutional grounds, see People v. Dement, 661 P.2d 675 (Colo. 1983); People v. Nunez, 698 P.2d 1376 (Colo. App. 1984), aff'd, 737 P.2d 422 (Colo. 1987); People v. Mathes, 703 P.2d 608 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Welsh, 58 P.3d 1065 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd on other grounds, 80 P.3d 296 (Colo. 2003).

D. Right to Compel Attendance.

The provision giving accused right to have process to compel attendance of witnesses in his behalf is mandatory. Osborn v. People, 83 Colo. 4, 262 P. 892 (1927).

It refers only to witnesses residing within state. Baker v. People, 72 Colo. 68, 209 P. 791 (1922).

Rationale for compelling attendance of only resident witnesses. Although the right to compel the attendance of a witness has been held to extend only to witnesses residing within the state, the rationale supporting that limitation on the duty of the court has been the absence of any means by which the state could compel the presence of out-of-state witnesses. People v. McCabe, 37 Colo. App. 181, 546 P.2d 1289 (1975).

Method for compelling attendance of out-of-state witnesses. Section 16-9-201 et seq. provides a method whereby, among states that have adopted the act, a court of one state may certify the need for the appearance and testimony of a material witness residing in another state and thereby invoke the authority of the court in the resident state to compel the witness's attendance in the certifying court. Hence, at least under the circumstances specified in the statute, a Colorado court may now compel the attendance of out-of-state witnesses. People v. McCabe, 37 Colo. App. 181, 546 P.2d 1289 (1975).

Defendant may obtain presence of any or all witnesses endorsed on information. Where a defendant wishes to obtain the presence of any or all of the witnesses endorsed on the information, he is free to do so, since the court's process and subpoena power is available to him. Scott v. People, 176 Colo. 289, 490 P.2d 1295 (1971).

V. RIGHT TO SPEEDY PUBLIC TRIAL.

Law reviews. For comment on Hicks v. People appearing below, see 34 Rocky Mt. L. Rev. 397 (1962). For comment on Thompson v. People appearing below, see 42 Den. L. J. 54 (1965) and 37 U. Colo. L. Rev. 511 (1965). For article, "Pronouncements of the U.S. Supreme Court Relating to the Criminal Law Field: 1985-1986", which discusses cases relating to speedy trials, see 15 Colo. Starts of Speedy Trial Rights in Colorado--Part II", see 31 Colo. Law. 59 (August 2002).

A. Right to Speedy Trial.

The right to a speedy trial is a basic constitutional right, guaranteed by both the Colorado and United States Constitutions in essentially the same language. Valdez v. People, 174 Colo. 268, 483 P.2d 1333 (1971); Jaramillo v. District Court, 174 Colo. 561, 484 P.2d 1219 (1971); People v. Small, 177 Colo. 118, 493 P.2d 15 (1972).

The right to a speedy trial is guaranteed by this section, and this constitutional protection is independent of any right established by statute or rule. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

An accused person's right to a speedy trial is ultimately grounded on the federal and state constitutions, and statutes relating to speedy trial are intended to render these constitutional guarantees more effective. Simakis v. District Court, 194 Colo. 436, 577 P.2d 3 (1978).

Primary objective of right to speedy trial. A speedy public trial involves a trial, a judicial examination of issues present in a criminal case in order to arrive at a just result. Justice to both the accused and the public is the primary objective. Speed is important insofar as it aids in the achievement of such justice. Medina v. People, 154 Colo. 4, 387 P.2d 733 (1963), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 848, 85 S. Ct. 88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1964).

The right to a speedy trial is not only for the benefit of the accused, but also for the protection of the public. It is essential that an early determination of guilt be made, so that the innocent may be exonerated and the guilty punished. Jaramillo v. District Court, 174 Colo. 561, 484 P.2d 1219 (1971).

The right to a speedy trial has been formulated to force the prosecution to try a defendant promptly in compliance with the statutes, rules, and constitutional requirements of each case. People ex rel. Coca v. District Court, 187 Colo. 280, 530 P.2d 958 (1975).

A criminal case must be promptly tried, not only to limit the possibility that delay will impair the ability of an accused to defend himself, but also to protect the public in insuring prompt disposition of criminal cases for delay inflicts injury because evidence and witnesses disappear, memories fade, and events lose their perspective. Scott v. People, 176 Colo. 289, 490 P.2d 1295 (1971).

The essential ingredient of the constitutional requirement of a speedy trial is that the defendant and society have a mutual right to expect the orderly expedition of criminal charges, not mere speed. People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1101, 102 S. Ct. 678, 70 L. Ed. 2d 644 (1981).

Right of accused to speedy trial is an important civil right, and when the constitutional mandate is invoked, the matter should receive careful consideration by the courts. Ex parte Russo, 104 Colo. 91, 88 P.2d 953 (1939).

This section is mandatory. Hicks v. People, 148 Colo. 26, 364 P.2d 877 (1961).

Sixth amendment guarantee to speedy trial has been extended to protect defendants in state criminal actions. The safeguard in the federal constitutional guarantee of a speedy trial is no more restrictive than that found in the state constitution. Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969).

State provision is congruent to federal. Colorado constitutional provision guaranteeing a speedy, public trial is congruent to the United States constitutional provision entitling a defendant in a criminal case to a speedy trial. Lucero v. People, 173 Colo. 94, 476 P.2d 257 (1970).

Finding under state provision requires finding under federal. A conclusion of the supreme court that defendant has not been denied a speedy trial under the Colorado Constitution requires the concomitant finding that the requirements of the United States Constitution have also been met. Lucero v. People, 173 Colo. 94, 476 P.2d 257 (1970).

The constitutional right to a speedy trial derived from the federal and Colorado constitutions, is distinct from the statutory speedy trial right and the determination as to one does not necessarily dispose of the other. People v. Harris, 914 P.2d 425 (Colo. App. 1995).

Constitutional and statutory right distinguished. The constitutional right to a speedy trial, as distinguished from the statutory right to a speedy trial, does not require that a defendant be tried within a specified period of time. People v. O'Neill, 185 Colo. 202, 523 P.2d 123 (1974).

Provisions of Crim. P. 48 and constitutional issue as to denial of speedy trial are mutually exclusive, and the resolution of one does not necessarily determine the resolution of the other. Potter v. District Court, 186 Colo. 1, 525 P.2d 429 (1974).

Right to speedy trial in juvenile proceedings. Trial courts are bound by the statutory and constitutional speedy trial requirements in juvenile as well as adult proceedings; fundamental fairness requires no less. P.V. v. District Court, 199 Colo. 357, 609 P.2d 110 (1980).

Right to speedy trial on de novo appeal. An accused on appeal to the county court from conviction of an offense, is entitled to a speedy trial de novo in such court, notwithstanding a speedy first trial before a justice of the peace. Hicks v. People, 148 Colo. 26, 364 P.2d 877 (1961).

The invocation of the speedy-trial provision need not await indictment, information or other formal charge. Dodge v. People, 178 Colo. 71, 495 P.2d 213 (1972); People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Defendant's being at large under bond manifestly does not divest him of right to speedy trial which is guaranteed by the constitution. Ex parte Miller, 66 Colo. 261, 180 P. 749 (1919); Hicks v. People, 148 Colo. 26, 364 P.2d 877 (1961).

The right to a speedy trial is not dissipated by the fact that the defendant is granted bail. Jaramillo v. District Court, 174 Colo. 561, 484 P.2d 1219 (1971).

Incarceration under prior conviction does not dissipate right to speedy trial. A sovereign may not deny an accused person a speedy trial by reason of the circumstance that he is incarcerated in a penal institution of that sovereign under a prior conviction and sentence in a court also of that sovereign. Rader v. People, 138 Colo. 397, 334 P.2d 437 (1959).

Nor does imprisonment in foreign jurisdiction. The fact that an accused was imprisoned by a foreign jurisdiction does not ipso facto deprive him of his rights to a speedy trial in another jurisdiction. There devolves upon the prosecuting attorney in the accusing state the duty to exercise good faith in an attempt to extradite the accused from a foreign jurisdiction so that he might be given a speedy trial. If the district attorney is able to secure the accused's presence in Colorado for trial, petitioner may at the trial raise and have determined the question as to whether he has been prejudiced by the state's delay to such an extent as to violate his constitutional right to a speedy trial. If the district attorney is unable to secure his presence for trial on the date set, then, the district court must continue the trial date until such time as his presence at trial can be secured. Rudisill v. District Court, 169 Colo. 66, 453 P.2d 598, cert. denied, 395 U.S. 925, 89 S. Ct. 1779, 23 L. Ed. 2d 241 (1969); Egbert v. People, 169 Colo. 169, 454 P.2d 811 (1969).

District attorney's failure to initiate timely extradition proceedings denied petitioner his constitutional right to a speedy trial. Potter v. District Court, 186 Colo. 1, 525 P.2d 429 (1974).

Ad hoc balancing test is to be used to determine whether right to speedy trial has been denied. People v. Spencer, 182 Colo. 189, 512 P.2d 260 (1973); People v. Buggs, 186 Colo. 13, 525 P.2d 421 (1974); People v. Haines, 37 Colo. App. 302, 549 P.2d 786 (1976).

The determination of whether defendant's constitutional rights to a speedy trial have been violated requires a balancing of the conduct of the people and of the defendant, which compels an ad hoc approach to cases where the right is asserted. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975); People v. Jamerson, 198 Colo. 92, 596 P.2d 764 (1979).

Four factors relate to the constitutional concept of a speedy trial: (1) The length of the delay, (2) the reason for the delay, (3) the prejudice to the defendant, and (4) waiver by the defendant. Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969); People v. Spencer, 182 Colo. 189, 512 P.2d 260 (1973); People v. Buggs, 186 Colo. 13, 525 P.2d 421 (1974).

In determining whether right to a speedy trial has been denied, four factors to be weighed in the balance are the length of the delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion or demand for a speedy trial, and the prejudice to the defendant. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975); People v. Haines, 37 Colo. App. 302, 549 P.2d 786 (1976); People v. Jamerson, 198 Colo. 92, 596 P.2d 764 (1979); People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1101, 102 S. Ct. 678, 70 L. Ed. 2d 644 (1981); People v. Velasquez, 641 P.2d 943 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 459 U.S. 805, 103 S. Ct. 28, 74 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1982), reh'g denied, 459 U.S. 1138, 103 S. Ct. 774, 74 L. Ed. 2d 986 (1983); Franklin v. People, 734 P.2d 133 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Bost, 770, P.2d 1209 (Colo. 1989); Moody v. Corsentino, 843 P.2d 1355 (Colo. 1993); People v. Harris, 914 P.2d 425 (Colo. App. 1995); People v. Fears, 962 P.2d 272 (Colo. App. 1997).

Factors in determining whether speedy trial afforded. The circumstances of each case must be examined to determine whether a speedy trial has been afforded, and, in making this determination, the court must consider the length of the pretrial delay, the reasons for the delay, whether the defendant has demanded a speedy trial, and whether any prejudice actually resulted to the defendant. Gelfand v. People, 196 Colo. 487, 586 P.2d 1331 (1978).

But, prior to application of four factors, court must determine that the length of delay is at least presumptively prejudicial to the defendant before further inquiry is warranted. Moody v. Corsentino, 843 P.2d 1355 (Colo. 1993); People v. Harris, 914 P.2d 425 (Colo. App. 1995).

Court found eight years was sufficient delay to warrant consideration of other three factors. Moody v. Corsentino, 843 P.2d 1355 (Colo. 1993).

No one factor determinative. Regarding the factors to be considered in determining whether defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated, no one of these factors alone is determinative. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Such as prejudice. Whether or not defendant can show prejudice from delay to bring him to trial is simply a factor to be considered and is not decisive of whether defendant's constitutional rights have been violated. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Where there has been no finding that the people were in some way to blame for unnecessary delay in bringing defendant to trial, then the absence of a finding of prejudice to the defendant must be heavily weighed in the balancing process for determining whether defendant was denied a speedy trial. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Or where there is supportive evidence of defendant's desire for speedy trial, that fact alone is not determinative of whether defendant was denied such right. That factor, though in the defendant's favor, is to be weighed along with the other elements which must be given consideration in the balancing of the rights of the defendant and the people. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Prejudice cannot be presumed where delay has not been shown to be arbitrary or oppressive. Scott v. People, 176 Colo. 289, 490 P.2d 1295 (1971).

Prejudice to the defendant cannot be presumed solely from the length of delay, nor from unsupported allegations of such prejudice. People v. Jamerson, 198 Colo. 92, 596 P.2d 764 (1979).

Allegations of anxiety, disappearance of witnesses, and financial strain must be documented to support a claim of denial of one's right to a speedy trial. People v. Jamerson, 198 Colo. 92, 596 P.2d 764 (1979).

Weight given to defendant's delay in determining denial. The defendants' delay in asserting their right to a speedy trial is entitled to strong evidentiary weight in determining whether the defendants were denied their constitutional right to a speedy trial. People v. Spencer, 182 Colo. 189, 512 P.2d 260 (1973).

This section is a guarantee only against arbitrary and oppressive delays. Jordan v. People, 155 Colo. 224, 393 P.2d 745 (1964); Valdez v. People, 174 Colo. 268, 483 P.2d 1333 (1971).

A speedy public trial is a relative concept. Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969).

The right to a speedy trial is necessarily relative. Gonzales v. People, 156 Colo. 252, 398 P.2d 236, cert. denied, 381 U.S. 945, 85 S. Ct. 1788, 14 L. Ed. 2d 709 (1965); Arthur v. People, 165 Colo. 63, 437 P.2d 41 (1968); Valdez v. People, 174 Colo. 268, 483 P.2d 1333 (1971).

Depending upon the circumstances of each case. Medina v. People, 154 Colo. 4, 387 P.2d 733 (1963), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 848, 85 S. Ct. 88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1964); Casias v. People, 160 Colo. 152, 415 P.2d 344, cert. denied, 385 U.S. 979, 87 S. Ct. 523, 17 L. Ed. 2d 441 (1966); Ferguson v. People, 160 Colo. 389, 417 P.2d 768 (1966); Maes v. People, 169 Colo. 200, 454 P.2d 792 (1969); Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969); People v. Small, 177 Colo. 118, 493 P.2d 15 (1972).

The right of a speedy trial is consistent with delays and depends upon circumstances. It secures rights to a defendant. It does not preclude the rights of public justice. Medina v. People, 154 Colo. 4, 387 P.2d 733 (1963), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 848, 85 S. Ct. 88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1964); Arthur v. People, 165 Colo. 63, 437 P.2d 41 (1968).

And consistent with court's business. The constitutional guarantee of a speedy trial has been held to be a trial consistent with the court's business. Gonzales v. People, 156 Colo. 252, 398 P.2d 236, cert. denied, 381 U.S. 945, 85 S. Ct. 1788, 14 L. Ed.

2d 709 (1965); Adargo v. People, 159 Colo. 321, 411 P.2d 245 (1966); Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969); Padilla v. People, 171 Colo. 521, 470 P.2d 846 (1970); Jaramillo v. District Court, 174 Colo. 561, 484 P.2d 1219 (1971); People v. Small, 177 Colo. 118, 493 P.2d 15 (1972); People v. Mayes, 178 Colo. 429, 498 P.2d 1123 (1972); Rowse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 44, 502 P.2d 422 (1972); People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

A speedy public trial does not mean trial immediately after accused is apprehended and indicted, but public trial consistent with the court's business. Medina v. People, 154 Colo. 4, 387 P.2d 733 (1963), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 848, 85 S. Ct. 88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1964); Maes v. People, 169 Colo. 200, 454 P.2d 792 (1969).

The constitutional right to a speedy trial requires only that a trial be held within a time period consistent with the court's case load. People v. O'Neill, 185 Colo. 202, 523 P.2d 123 (1974).

An accused is not under a duty to demand trial within any specific time before he can claim the protection of this mandatory section affording him the right to a speedy public trial. Hicks v. People, 148 Colo. 26, 364 P.2d 877 (1961).

But objection to delay at trial is prerequisite to discharge. The objection that the defendant has not had a speedy trial must be speedily raised when the case is moved for trial. Such an objection is a prerequisite to his claim for discharge under § 18-1-405 and under this section. Keller v. People, 153 Colo. 590, 387 P.2d 421 (1963).

Defendant can waive his constitutional and statutory right to a speedy trial by his failure to make a timely objection. People v. O'Donnell, 184 Colo. 104, 518 P.2d 945 (1974).

To properly raise question, accused may apply for discharge or dismissal for lack of a speedy trial. Jordan v. People, 155 Colo. 224, 393 P.2d 745 (1964); Jaramillo v. District Court, 174 Colo. 561, 484 P.2d 1219 (1971).

Or petition for habeas corpus. The question of whether a speedy public trial by an impartial jury in a criminal case as provided in this section has been denied, is properly raised by a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Rader v. People, 138 Colo. 397, 334 P.2d 437 (1959).

Petition for habeas corpus treated as motion under Crim. P. 35(b). When the issues before a trial court in a habeas corpus proceeding raise substantive constitutional questions concerning the right to a speedy trial, the issues are within the purview of postconviction remedy, and a petition for habeas corpus would be treated as a motion under Crim. P. 35(b). Dodge v. People, 178 Colo. 71, 495 P.2d 213 (1972).

Judicial question. Whether an accused has been denied a speedy public trial within the constitution is a judicial question. Medina v. People, 154 Colo. 4, 387 P.2d 733 (1963), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 848, 85 S. Ct. 88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1964); Casias v. People, 160 Colo. 152, 415 P.2d 344, cert. denied, 385 U.S. 979, 87 S. Ct. 523, 17 L. Ed. 2d 441 (1966); Jaramillo v. District Court, 174 Colo. 561, 484 P.2d 1219 (1971).

The burden is upon defendant to prove that an expeditious trial was denied him. Maes v. People, 169 Colo. 200, 454 P.2d 792 (1969); Ziatz v. People, 171 Colo. 58, 465 P.2d 406 (1970).

A motion for discharge or for dismissal for want of due prosecution of a charge of crime must be sustained by the accused; he has the burden of showing that he was not afforded a speedy trial. Jordan v. People, 155 Colo. 224, 393 P.2d 745 (1964); Jaramillo v. District Court, 174 Colo.

561, 484 P.2d 1219 (1971).

The burden is upon the defendant to prove that he has been denied an expeditious trial to his prejudice. Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969); Scott v. People, 176 Colo. 289, 490 P.2d 1295 (1971); People v. Small, 177 Colo. 118, 493 P.2d 15 (1972).

Burden is upon defendant who asserts denial of speedy trial to show facts establishing that, consistent with court's trial docket conditions, he could have been afforded trial. Rowse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 44, 502 P.2d 422 (1972); People v. O'Neill, 185 Colo. 202, 523 P.2d 123 (1974).

The defendant has the burden of proving that his constitutional speedy trial right has been denied. People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1101, 102 S. Ct. 678, 70 L. Ed. 2d 644 (1981); People v. Velasquez, 641 P.2d 943 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 459 U.S. 805, 103 S. Ct. 28, 74 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1982), reh'g denied, 459 U.S. 1138, 103 S. Ct. 774, 74 L. Ed. 2d 986 (1983).

Right to speedy trial may be waived. Keller v. People, 153 Colo. 590, 387 P.2d 421 (1963); Chambers v. District Court, 180 Colo. 241, 504 P.2d 340 (1972).

Affirmative action is necessary for waiver. The constitutional right of an accused to a speedy public trial is not waived by inaction on the part of the accused. Affirmative action on the part of the accused, such as an express consent to delay or request therefor, is necessary to constitute such waiver. Hicks v. People, 148 Colo. 26, 364 P.2d 877 (1961); Chambers v. District Court, 180 Colo. 241, 504 P.2d 340 (1972).

Failure to request a speedy trial is one factor to be considered in determining if defendant waived his constitutional right, nevertheless, a defendant does not have the responsibility of bringing himself to trial. Action on the defendant's part, such as consent to delay or request therefor, is necessary to constitute such waiver. Potter v. District Court, 186 Colo. 1, 525 P.2d 429 (1974).

Failure to object to delay can waive right. The constitutional guarantee of a speedy trial can be waived by failure to make objection to the delay at the time of trial. Keller v. People, 153 Colo. 590, 387 P.2d 421 (1963); Keller v. Tinsley, 335 F.2d 144 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 938, 85 S. Ct. 342, 13 L. Ed. 2d 348 (1964); Valdez v. People, 174 Colo. 268, 483 P.2d 1333 (1971).

Failure to object is a factor which may be considered in determining whether a waiver of the right to a speedy trial took place. Chambers v. District Court, 180 Colo. 241, 504 P.2d 340 (1972).

Failure to assert right makes it difficult to prove denial. Failure to assert the right to a speedy trial will make it difficult for a defendant to prove that he was denied a speedy trial. People v. Buggs, 186 Colo. 13, 525 P.2d 421 (1974).

A plea of guilty to a charge acts as a waiver to any argument a defendant may have had concerning the denial of a speedy trial. Wixson v. People, 175 Colo. 348, 487 P.2d 809 (1971).

Where defendant had already pleaded guilty and had been sentenced when his motion to dismiss for denial of speedy trial was filed, he waived any argument he may have had concerning a denial of a speedy trial. Wixson v. People, 175 Colo. 348, 487 P.2d 809 (1971).

The erroneous denial of a motion to dismiss for violation of statutory speedy trial right does not divest the court of subject matter jurisdiction to accept a guilty plea. People v. McMurtry, 122 P.3d 237 (Colo. 2005).

A guilty plea waives a defendant's right to claim the improper denial of his or her statutory right to a speedy trial. People v. McMurtry, 122 P.3d 237 (Colo. 2005).

Delay attributable to the defense does not deny speedy trial. Where delays in a case being set for trial occur and are not solely attributable to the prosecution but must be recognized to be in part a product of the defense, a speedy public trial has not been denied. People v. Small, 177 Colo. 118, 493 P.2d 15 (1972).

Where the record shows the withdrawal of counsel, the appointment of new counsel, and a continuance by agreement, it cannot be said that defendant was denied a speedy public trial. Medina v. People, 154 Colo. 4, 387 P.2d 733 (1963), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 848, 85 S. Ct. 88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1964).

The record did not disclose that defendant was denied the "speedy" public trial guaranteed him by the constitution where at least certain of the delays in getting to trial were of his own making. Lucero v. People, 161 Colo. 568, 423 P.2d 577 (1967); People v. Bost, 770 P.2d 1209 (Colo. 1989).

Where the record disclosed four continuances at the request, or with the consent of defendant, the appointment, withdrawal, and reappointment of counsel, and the entry and withdrawal of a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, the defendant was not denied a speedy trial. Gonzales v. People, 156 Colo. 252, 398 P.2d 236, cert. denied, 381 U.S. 945, 85 S. Ct. 1788, 14 L. Ed. 2d 709 (1965).

Where, following a continuance that is not attributable to the defendant, the court sets a trial date within the speedy trial period but defense counsel objects to that date because of his or her own scheduling conflict, the latter delay is attributable to the defendant. Hills v. Westminster Mun. Court, 215 P.3d 1221 (Colo. App. 2009).

Where part of the delay in trial was due to the trial court's protection of the accused by finding that his counsel had not had sufficient time to confer with him to make proper preparations for trial, it cannot be said that the trial was unreasonably delayed in contravention of this section. Rhodus v. People, 160 Colo. 407, 418 P.2d 42 (1966).

A defendant is not denied a speedy trial, when trial is held more than 14 months after he is charged when the delay which preceded trial was occasioned, to a large extent, by the defendant who requested and obtained numerous continuances in an attempt to effectuate a plea bargain. Maynes v. People, 178 Colo. 88, 495 P.2d 551 (1972).

Where the delay at the time defendant filed his motion to dismiss was less than one year from the date of indictment, he had been out on bond for most of that time, his motion for continuances caused at least nine weeks of delay, he was represented by counsel at all relevant times, and he appeared before the court several times, and yet he did not request an early trial date, considering all these factors, the defendant was not denied his constitutional right to a speedy trial. People v. Reliford, 186 Colo. 6, 525 P.2d 467 (1974).

Where the record reflects that the defendants made no demand for a speedy trial until 14 months expired and showed no prejudice as a result of the delay, reflects that the delay occurred to permit the defendants to obtain expert testimony and prepare for trial, and moreover, the defendants were free on bond at all times prior to trial, taking all of the factors into account, the defendants were not denied their constitutional right to a speedy trial. People v. Spencer, 182 Colo. 189, 512 P.2d 260 (1973).

Right to speedy trial not denied where delay was only three and one-half months; the reasons for delay were reasonable and legitimate under the circumstances; defendant had not asserted his right was violated when the court reset the case for trial; nor did defendant suffer prejudice based on additional expense and anxiety since during the delay defendant was on bond. People v. Wolfe, 9 P.3d 1137 (Colo. App. 1999).

Delay consistent with court's business was not prejudicial. Where the docket of the trial court was extremely congested, a delay of eight months before trial was consistent with the orderly business of the court, and where the defendant failed to show that the delay was purposeful or oppressive, or that it resulted in prejudice, the defendant was accorded a fair trial in accordance with his constitutional rights. Falgout v. People, 170 Colo. 32, 459 P.2d 572 (1969).

The record is devoid of any showing that the trial was not held as soon as consistent with the court's business or that defendant suffered any prejudice by reason of the short delay when between the date of charge and of trial, defendant, with his counsel, made seven appearances in court to dispose of various pretrial matters. Maes v. People, 169 Colo. 200, 454 P.2d 792 (1969).

Defendant did not sustain the burden of showing that a continuance of over three months was not consistent with the court's business in that defendant was prejudiced by the continuance. Padilla v. People, 171 Colo. 521, 470 P.2d 846 (1970).

Docket congestion factor in reasonableness of delay in retrial. Although it is clear that docket congestion would not warrant a retrial later than the three-month maximum period for delay caused by a mistrial, it is a factor in determining the reasonableness of the delay within the statutory and procedural time periods of § 18-1-405 (6)(e) and Crim. P. 48 (b)(6)(V). Pinelli v. District Court, 197 Colo. 555, 595 P.2d 225 (1979).

When a trial court continues a case due to docket congestion, but makes a reasonable effort to reschedule within the speedy trial period, and defense counsel's scheduling conflict does not permit a new date within the speedy trial deadline, the resulting delay is attributable to defendant. The period of delay is excludable from time calculations for purposes of the applicable speedy trial provision. Hills v. Westminster Mun. Court, 245 P.3d 947 (Colo. 2011).

Prosecution allowed reasonable time to prepare for trial. Under this section an accused person is entitled to a trial, as soon as, regard being had to the terms of the court, reasonable opportunity is afforded to the prosecution, by fair and honest exercise of reasonable diligence, to prepare for trial. Ex parte Miller, 66 Colo. 261, 180 P. 749 (1919).

A speedy public trial envisions a reasonable opportunity for the prosecution, by a fair and honest exercise of diligence, to prepare for trial, after which, if there is a term of court at which the trial might be had, the prosecution may try the case. Medina v. People, 154 Colo. 4, 387 P.2d 733 (1963), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 848, 85 S. Ct. 88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1964).

Where delay is the product of a valid investigative or prosecutorial purpose, it is not chargeable against the government. People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1101, 102 S. Ct. 678, 70 L. Ed. 2d 644 (1981).

It is responsibility of district attorney and trial court to assiduously avoid any occasion for useless and unnecessary delay in the trial of a criminal case. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Defendant's right to speedy trial held denied. Day v. People, 152 Colo. 152, 381 P.2d 10, cert. denied, 375 U.S. 864, 84 S. Ct. 134, 11 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1963).

Thirteen-month delay held denial of right of speedy trial. Where defendant was charged with unlawful sale of narcotics in one indictment and was subjected to jurisdiction of court for 13 months, a subsequent indictment charging defendant with same offense must be dismissed for lack of speedy trial. Rowse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 44, 502 P.2d 422 (1972).

As was delay of two and one-half years. A delay of two and one-half years from the time of arrest and restraint until the time of trial was a denial of defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial even if defendant was in the state prison part of the time for another crime. Dodge v. People, 178 Colo. 71, 495 P.2d 213 (1972).

And deliberate postponement by district attorney. Where the facts clearly establish that the petitioner was denied a speedy trial through no fault of his own and as a result of the deliberate election of the district attorney to postpone the trial so that efforts could be made to obtain the petitioner's testimony in companion and related cases, the petitioner has been denied a speedy trial under the provisions of Crim. P. 48(b). Jaramillo v. District Court, 174 Colo. 561, 484 P.2d 1219 (1971).

And neglect or laches of prosecution in preparing for trial. If the trial is delayed or postponed beyond such period necessary to provide a reasonable opportunity for a diligent prosecutor to prepare for trial, when there is a term of court at which the trial might be had, by reason of the neglect or laches of the prosecution in preparing for trial, such delay is a denial to the defendant of his rights to a speedy trial and in such case a party confined, upon application by habeas corpus, is entitled to discharge from custody. Ex parte Miller, 66 Colo. 261, 180 P. 749 (1919).

But delay before second trial not prejudicial. The defendant was tried with reasonable promptness following the mandate of the United States supreme court that his guilty plea be set aside, although eight and one-half years had passed since the date of the crime, the record discloses that defendant was not deprived of any defense, or that any witness was unavailable because of the delay, and the defendant was in no manner prejudiced by delay. Arthur v. People, 165 Colo. 63, 437 P.2d 41 (1968).

Delay caused by mistrial not counted between arraignment and trial. Pinelli v. District Court, 197 Colo. 555, 595 P.2d 225 (1979).

Time involved in people's petition for writ of prohibition is not to be included in calculating the period of delay to determine if there was a denial of the right to a speedy trial. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Delay in ruling on motion for new trial did not violate defendant's right to a speedy trial guaranteed by both this section and the federal constitution. Vaughn v. Trujillo, 171 Colo. 24, 464 P.2d 292 (1970).

Defendant's right to speedy trial held not denied. Ferguson v. People, 160 Colo. 389, 417 P.2d 768 (1966); Rowse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 44, 502 P.2d 422 (1972).

Delay of nine to 10 months not violative. Where delay has occurred, but defendant has not made a showing of prejudice, nor can any significant part of the delay be said to have been unnecessarily caused by the people, the fact of delay of from nine to 10 months in bringing defendant to trial is insufficient alone to amount to a violation of defendant's right to a speedy trial. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Delay of over three years, occasioned by two original proceedings in the Colorado supreme court in which the prosecution made a legitimate effort to clarify the constitutional status of the death penalty statute and which did not materially prejudice the defendant, did not constitute a denial of the defendant's right to a speedy trial. People v. Fears, 962 P.2d 272 (Colo. App. 1997).

A six-month delay between the defendant's conviction and sentencing is not presumptively prejudicial; therefore, there is no constitutional speedy trial violation in relation to the sentencing. People v. Green, 2012 COA 68M, __ P.3d __.

Delay of resentencing for 29 months not violative. Although there was no apparent reason for the lengthy delay, particularly in light of the numerous requests defendant made for court action, the absence of any showing that the delay was intentionally caused by the prosecution or that defendant was prejudiced thereby leads to the conclusion that there was no violation of defendant's speedy trial right. People v. Luu, 983 P.2d 15 (Colo. App. 1998).

Reason for delay was attributable to defendant's concerns about his representation by the public defender, and the court's subsequent accommodations of such concern was made, in part, to protect defendant's right to adequate representation. Therefore, any prejudice defendant suffered by the 46-day extension was outweighed by the trial court's concerns for adequate representation. People v. Brewster, 240 P.3d 291 (Colo. App. 2009).

A denial of credit for time spent in the county jail pending appeal is not a violation of defendant's rights to a speedy trial, to due process of law or to be free from double jeopardy. People v. Falgout, 176 Colo. 94, 489 P.2d 195 (1971).

Where defendant's complex criminal behavior causes him to be in the penitentiary when his case is set for trial, the delay that occurs cannot be interpreted to be a violation of his constitutional rights. Scott v. People, 176 Colo. 289, 490 P.2d 1295 (1971).

Where defendants escaped from jail shortly prior to the date of their trial, and delay of trial was caused exclusively by such escape and the interval during which they remained at large, a claim that defendants were denied a speedy trial is without merit. Kostal v. People, 144 Colo. 505, 357 P.2d 70 (1960), cert. denied, 365 U.S. 804, 81 S. Ct. 471, 5 L. Ed. 2d 462 (1961).

No violation even though defendant did not contribute to delay. A period of undesirable delay which falls short of violating statutory and procedural rule protection is not a denial of defendant's right to a speedy trial merely because defendant did not cause the delay. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Calculation of delay for corporate defendant. Where defendant is a corporation, and hence not subject to incarceration, the period of delay relevant to the assertion of defendant's right to a speedy trial began on the date when probable cause was determined and the defendant was bound over to the district court at the preliminary hearing in county court because it was on this date that the defendant was placed in the same relative position, as far as its status as an "accused" is concerned, as if there had been an indictment or information filed in the district court. People v. Slender Wrap, Inc., 36 Colo. App. 11, 536 P.2d 850 (1975).

Forfeiture action under Colorado public nuisance statute is civil in nature and therefore is not subject to constitutional or statutory speedy trial provisions applicable to criminal prosecutions. People v. Milton, 732 P.2d 1199 (Colo. 1987).

When right to speedy trial attaches. The constitutional right to a speedy trial attaches when a defendant is formally accused by a charging document, such as a criminal complaint, information, or indictment. People v. Velasquez, 641 P.2d 943 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 459 U.S. 805, 103 S. Ct. 28, 74 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1982), reh'g denied, 459 U.S. 1138, 103 S. Ct. 774, 74 L. Ed. 2d 986 (1983).

Defendant must assert right. A criminal defendant has no duty to bring himself to trial; but he does have a responsibility to assert his right to a speedy trial. People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1101, 102 S. Ct. 678, 70 L. Ed. 2d 644 (1981).

But defendant is precluded from raising the issue for the first time on appeal. People v. Scialabba, 55 P.3d 207 (Colo. App. 2002).

Even if defendant's statement regarding a dismissal can be construed as request for motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds, it was nonetheless without merit since it was made before the speedy trial time ended and defendant was still represented by counsel. People v. Abdu, 215 P.3d 1265 (Colo. App. 2009).

Computation of length of delay is not subject to specific limitations or exclusions, such as the fixed time periods established by statute or rule. People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1101, 102 S. Ct. 678, 70 L. Ed. 2d 644 (1981).

Reinstitution of identical criminal charges held not to violate speedy trial principles. People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo. 1981).

Defendant's actions held to delay proceedings. The defendant may not whipsaw the court between its obligation to protect his right of confrontation and his right to a speedy trial. When, as a result of defendant's actions, the court cannot determine whether he has waived his right to be present at trial, it is clear that defendant has delayed proceedings within the meaning of C.M.C.R. 248, a speedy trial provision. Crandall v. Municipal Court ex rel. City of Sterling, 650 P.2d 1324 (Colo. App. 1982).

Dismissal of detainer. In determining whether to dismiss charges for lack of prompt notification, a court must consider more than the general factors underlying the constitutional right to a speedy trial because the Uniform Mandatory Disposition of Detainers Act effectuates other policies besides the speedy trial right. People v. Higinbotham, 712 P.2d 993 (1986).

Twenty-nine-month delay between arrest in Arizona on Colorado offense and filing of detainer not violative of speedy trial rights where delay was not an attempt to hamper defense. People v. Bost, 770 P.2d 1209 (Colo. 1989).

Court found defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial was not violated, even though sentencing was delayed for eight years, where defendant's actions caused most of the delay, there was no evidence that prosecution intentionally caused delay to prejudice defendant's case, the record showed only limited efforts by defendant to seek speedy sentencing, and defendant was unable to show prejudice resulting from sentencing delay. Moody v. Corsentino, 843 P.2d 1355 (Colo. 1993).

Court uses four-factor test to evaluate speedy appeal claim. The four factors are: (1) Length of delay; (2) the reason for delay; (3) defendant's assertion of the right; and (4) any prejudice to defendant resulting from delay. People v. McGlotten, 166 P.3d 182 (Colo. App. 2007).

Prejudice in appellate delay case is essential element, and review depends on procedural context of defendant's claim. If the claim is presented to gain temporary release pending appeal, several factors are considered, but, if the inquiry is on direct appeal, the only consideration is whether the delay has impaired defendant's ability to prosecute the appeal. People v. McGlotten, 166 P.3d 182 (Colo. App. 2007).

Applying four-part test, defendant's right to speedy appeal has been prejudiced. First, five-year delay clearly excessive and inordinate. Second, reason for delay in this case must be attributed to the government since the delay is the result of court reporter's illness and inability to contract with other court reporters experienced in transcribing notes. Third, defendant has asserted his right since he timely filed his appeal and has actively sought relief. The first three factors all weigh in favor of defendant, so court must consider critical fourth element, prejudice. People v. McGlotten, 166 P.3d 182 (Colo. App. 2007).

In order for defendant to show prejudice, he must show the delay has impaired his ability to present his arguments on appeal. Defendant claims trial court committed constitutional error by failing to consult with defense before answering question from jury. Review of claim is impossible, transcript of what happened is unavailable, and appellate court's instructions to reconstruct the record on remand failed to produce enough information to review the claim. Thus, passage of time has put the necessary information to evaluate the claim out of reach. Since appellate court is unable to evaluate defendant's substantive claim, he has been prejudiced by the appellate delay, so defendant is entitled to a new trial. People v. McGlotten, 166 P.3d 182 (Colo. App. 2007).

When conducting speedy trial analysis, delay caused by appointed counsel is attributable to defendant, not the state. Considering the totality of the circumstances, defendant did not carry burden of proving a constitutional violation. People v. Glaser, 250 P.3d 632 (Colo. App. 2010).

When court delays sentencing so that another case against defendant may be resolved that would allow the court to increase the sentence in case before the court, the court violates defendant's right to speedy sentencing. The defendant was prejudiced by the court's decision to delay sentencing for six months and seven days, which resulted in a sentence that was double what the court could have imposed immediately after trial. People v. Sandoval-Candelaria, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2011).

B. Right to Public Trial.

Accused in criminal case has right to public trial. Anderson v. People, 176 Colo. 224, 490 P.2d 47 (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1042, 92 S. Ct. 1376, 31 L. Ed. 2d 583 (1972).

The term "public trial" contemplated by the constitution is a trial which is not secret, one that the public is free to attend. Hampton v. People, 171 Colo. 153, 465 P.2d 394 (1970).

It is a relative term and its meaning depends largely on the circumstances of each particular case. Hampton v. People, 171 Colo. 153, 465 P.2d 394 (1970).

When reasonable portion of public is suffered to attend, without partiality or favoritism, the requirement of a public trial is fairly observed. Hampton v. People, 171 Colo. 153, 465 P.2d 394 (1970).

Right to public trial is not absolute, for in some instances, the right to a public trial may be subordinated to the higher right and duty of the court to insure that the defendant receives a fair trial. Anderson v. People, 176 Colo. 224, 490 P.2d 47 (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1042, 42 S. Ct. 1376, 31 L. Ed. 2d 583 (1972).

Public right to be informed is superior to defendant's right to privacy. The initial determination that there exists probable cause to believe the named defendant has committed a crime charged creates in the public a right superior to that of the individual and by which the privilege or right of privacy is destroyed. At that point in time the public has a right to know and the press to disclose such facts relative to the pending criminal case as may reasonably be expected to be relevant and material thereto. Lincoln v. Denver Post, 31 Colo. App. 283, 501 P.2d 152 (1972).

But this does not absolve press of responsibility to report fairly and accurately and to avoid prejudicing the defendant's right to a fair trial. Lincoln v. Denver Post, 31 Colo. App. 283, 501 P.2d 152 (1972).

The right of privacy, if any, conferred upon plaintiff by statute dealing with use and preservation of child welfare records ceased to exist when she became criminal defendant charged with a crime directly connected with that statute and this right of privacy was lost without regard to the outcome of the charges. Lincoln v. Denver Post, 31 Colo. App. 283, 501 P.2d 152 (1972).

Right to public trial includes that stage of proceedings which is devoted to selection of jury. Anderson v. People, 176 Colo. 224, 490 P.2d 47 (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1042, 92 S. Ct. 1376, 31 L. Ed. 2d 583 (1972).

Defendant waived his right to a public trial by failing to object in trial court to closure of the courtroom during jury selection. People v. Stackhouse, 2012 COA 202, __ P.3d __.

Limited exclusion of public during time jury was chosen held not reversible error. Where the defendant is not the victim of any unjust prosecution, the limited exclusion of the general public at his trial during the time that a jury is chosen cannot be elevated to the constitutional plateau of reversible error to escape the jury's verdict. Anderson v. People, 176 Colo. 224, 490 P.2d 47 (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1042, 92 S. Ct. 1376, 31 L. Ed. 2d 583 (1972).

Exclusion must be limited to particularly justified class. The constitution precludes the general indiscriminate exclusion of the public from the trial of a criminal case over the objection of the defendant and limits the trial judge to the exclusion of those persons or classes of persons only whose particular exclusion is justified by lack of space or for reasons particularly applicable to them. Thompson v. People, 156 Colo. 416, 399 P.2d 776 (1965).

Court may not exclude general public from trial of sexual offense. Whatever may have been the view in more formally modest age, attitude of the present day toward matters of sex precludes a determination that all members of the public, the mature as well as the immature and impressionable may reasonably be excluded from the trial of a sexual offense upon ground of public morals. Thompson v. People, 156 Colo. 416, 399 P.2d 776 (1965).

But exclusion during testimony of prosecuting witness is permissible. In a case, such as a prosecution for statutory rape, in which the prosecuting witness is of such tender years as to be seriously embarrassed in giving her testimony by the presence of spectators not concerned with the trial, the trial judge may during that witness' testimony exclude all members of the public not directly concerned with the trial. Thompson v. People, 156 Colo. 416, 399 P.2d 776 (1965).

Defendant need not show specific prejudice by denial of public trial. It is not necessary for the defendant to show that he was in fact prejudiced by the action of the trial judge in denying a public trial. If that action violated a constitutional right, such violation necessarily implies prejudice, and more than that need not appear. It would be difficult for a defendant to point to any definite, personal injury. To require him to do so would impair or destroy the safeguard. Thompson v. People, 156 Colo. 416, 399 P.2d 776 (1965).

The right to a public trial, guaranteed by both the federal and state constitutions, is one that is so fundamental to a fair hearing that, if the right is violated, a defendant is entitled to appropriate relief, even if no prejudice can be shown to have resulted from such violation; however, a court may, under justifiable circumstances, bar spectators during a portion of the trial, and such action will not amount to a denial of the right. People v. Thomas, 832 P.2d 990 (Colo. App. 1991).

A defendant's right to a public trial was not violated where the trial court temporarily excluded certain members of the public from the trial proceedings. The court's interest in protecting witnesses from intimidation and in maintaining orderliness and fairness of proceedings outweighed the defendant's interest in a public trial. People v. Angel, 790 P.2d 844 (Colo. App. 1989).

Defendant's right to public trial not violated where courtroom was only partially closed to the public; the court merely limited the flow of traffic in and out of the courtroom; no member of the public was excluded as long as he or she was seated before testimony began; an officer announced the court's decision to all those outside the courtroom, providing ample opportunity for spectators to make arrangements to attend; and the restriction was only in place for a short part of defendant's trial. People v. Whitman, 205 P.3d 371 (Colo. App. 2007).

Upon remand to determine whether locking courtroom was a denial of a public trial, court's findings should determine the length of the time that the doors to the courtroom were locked and the nature of the proceedings that took place during that time; how many, if any, members of the public were excluded from viewing the trial; the nature of any orders given by the court respecting the locking of the door and whether any such orders were disobeyed; whether any members of the public were admitted by the guards while the doors were locked and, if so, what criteria were used in admitting certain members of the public and excluding others; and any other fact the court considers to be germane to establishing the nature of the actions taken by the guards with reference to admitting persons to the courtroom during defendant's trial. People v. Thomas, 832 P.2d 990 (Colo. App. 1991).

C. Right to Speedy Appeal.

There was no violation of the right to a meaningful appeal. The transcripts were sufficiently complete and reliable to enable an intelligent review of defendant's substantive rights. People v. Whittiker, 181 P.3d 264 (Colo. App. 2006); People v. Carmichael, 179 P.3d 47 (Colo. App. 2007), rev'd on other grounds, 206 P.3d 800 (Colo. 2009).

A court must consider the following four factors in determining whether defendant's right to speedy appeal was violated. First, the length of the delay, second, the reason for the delay, third, the defendant's assertion of the right, and, finally, any prejudice to defendant. The first three factors in this case benefit the defendant, but, since there is no showing of prejudice, there is no violation of defendant's right to speedy appeal. The delay, in this case, has not impaired the defendant's ability to present his appeal. People v. Whittiker, 181 P.3d 264 (Colo. App. 2006).

VI. RIGHT TO IMPARTIAL

JURY; VENUE.

Law. 1592 and 1593 (1986).

A. Right to Impartial Jury.

This section guarantees right to trial by impartial jury to the accused in all criminal prosecutions. Oaks v. People, 150 Colo. 64, 371 P.2d 443 (1962).

Where a jury trial is granted, the right to a fair and impartial jury is a constitutional right which can never be abrogated. Brisbin v. Schauer, 176 Colo. 550, 492 P.2d 835 (1971).

It is fundamental that a defendant is entitled to a fair trial by an impartial jury. Maes v. District Court, 180 Colo. 169, 503 P.2d 621 (1972).

Right to fair and impartial jury is all-inclusive; it embraces every class and type of person. Oaks v. People, 150 Colo. 64, 371 P.2d 443 (1962).

Right to fair trial may require limitations on exercise of other constitutional rights. The interest of an accused, whose life and liberty are in jeopardy, to a fair trial by impartial jury is paramount and may require, depending on circumstances of case, limitations upon exercise of right of free speech and of press. Stapleton v. District Court, 179 Colo. 187, 499 P.2d 310 (1972).

Constitutional guarantees are not always absolute and full exercise thereof is not always possible. Stapleton v. District Court, 179 Colo. 187, 499 P.2d 310 (1972).

The constitutional guarantee of a trial by a panel of impartial jurors must be considered in light of the concomitant right of the public and press to the full protections of the first amendment. People v. Botham, 629 P.2d 589 (Colo. 1981).

Petty offense may be constitutionally tried to court without jury. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

Although the proceeding against petitioner is criminal in nature by reason of the imposition of penal sanctions, the offense charged, the unlawful use of a traffic lane by a motor vehicle, is a petty offense and not a criminal offense which would entitle petitioner to a jury trial as comprehended by the constitution of Colorado. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

There is no federal or state constitutional right to a jury trial in cases involving petty offenses. Hardamon v. Municipal Court, 178 Colo. 271, 497 P.2d 1000 (1972).

But such right could be granted by general assembly. Either the general assembly, on a statewide basis, or the legislative body of a home rule city, within its territorial limits, could grant a jury trial in petty offense cases. Hardamon v. Municipal Court, 178 Colo. 271, 497 P.2d 1000 (1972).

"Petty offense" defined. In the interests of the orderly administration of justice and in the absence of legislative mandate by statute or charter to the contrary, petty offenses under the constitution, general laws, charters and ordinances, are those crimes or offenses the punishment for which do not exceed in extent imprisonment for more than six months or a fine of more than $500, or a combination of imprisonment and fine within such limits. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

Contempt has not been classified as either a "petty" or "serious" offense, so the determinant of whether a particular contempt charge is sufficiently serious to require a jury trial is the severity of the fine actually imposed upon the contemnor. People v. Shell, 148 P.3d 162 (Colo. 2006).

Right to jury trial is inapplicable in administrative hearing to determine whether a driver's license should be revoked for accumulated traffic violations. Campbell v. State, 176 Colo. 202, 491 P.2d 1385 (1971).

Defendant may waive his right to trial by jury, and on a plea of not guilty be tried by the court, and, if found guilty, a valid sentence may be pronounced thereon. Munsell v. People, 122 Colo. 420, 222 P.2d 615 (1950).

Guilty plea operates as waiver of a defendant's constitutional right to a jury trial, but coercion deprives it of its effect as a waiver. Von Pickrell v. People, 163 Colo. 591, 431 P.2d 1003 (1967).

The right to trial by jury comprehends a fair verdict, free from the influence or poison of evidence which should never have been admitted, and the admission of which arouses passions and prejudices which tend to destroy the fairness and impartiality of the jury. Oaks v. People, 150 Colo. 64, 371 P.2d 443 (1962).

The juror's oath prescribes his duty. By the obligation thus imposed, he is to well and truly try the issues joined and a true verdict render according to the law and the evidence. Padilla v. People, 171 Colo. 521, 470 P.2d 846 (1970).

It is sufficient if the juror can lay aside his opinion or extrajudicial information received through pretrial publicity so that he can render a verdict based on the evidence presented in court. People v. McCrary, 190 Colo. 538, 549 P.2d 1320 (1976).

Trial court to determine competence of juror. A juror's assurances that he is equal to the task cannot be dispositive, and it is the duty of the trial court to determine the competence and credibility of the juror. People v. McCrary, 190 Colo. 538, 549 P.2d 1320 (1976).

The fact that jurors have read newspaper articles relating to a case does not disqualify them as jurors. This is true even though a juror may have had a preconceived notion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. People v. McCrary, 190 Colo. 538, 549 P.2d 1320 (1976).

Test as to juror's impartiality after pretrial publicity. The test is whether the nature and strength of the opinion formed or of the information learned from pretrial publicity are such as necessarily raise the presumption of partiality or of the inability of the potential juror to block out the information from his consideration. People v. McCrary, 190 Colo. 538, 549 P.2d 1320 (1976).

Factors to be considered. A juror's exposure to highly inflammatory information that is inadmissible at trial can, in some cases, be sufficient to disbelieve a juror's assurances that he can lay it aside. However, normally other factors must also be considered such as the detail of the information, the strength of the juror's recollection, the length of time since his exposure to the information, the juror's willingness to exclude the evidence from his consideration, the juror's opinion as to its relevance, the confidence the juror expresses in the news source, and, finally, the atmosphere that will pervade the trial. People v. McCrary, 190 Colo. 538, 549 P.2d 1320 (1976).

It is counsel's duty to make diligent inquiry into the existence of potential prejudice that might exist in the jurors' minds by reason of defendant's racial heritage. Maes v. District Court, 180 Colo. 169, 503 P.2d 621 (1972); People v. Baker, 924 P.2d 1186 (Colo. App. 1996).

Thus, voir dire inquiry is permissible into matters of racial prejudice in the interest of obtaining a fair and impartial jury. Maes v. District Court, 180 Colo. 169, 503 P.2d 621 (1972).

Defendant who failed to exhaust his or her peremptory challenges has no claim that his or her substantial right to the use of peremptory challenges was violated. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Disqualification of a juror for inability to join in a verdict imposing the death penalty in a proper case is not error where the jury has the duty to determine the defendant's guilt or innocence and his punishment if he is found guilty. Padilla v. People, 171 Colo. 521, 470 P.2d 846 (1970).

A constitutional right to a trial by a jury of his peers is not denied a defendant because twenty-nine and three-tenths percent of the jury panel were excluded on challenge for cause because of their unwillingness to consider under any circumstances the imposition of the death penalty. Padilla v. People, 171 Colo. 521, 470 P.2d 846 (1970).

But exclusion for opposition to capital punishment vitiates death penalty. A death sentence cannot constitutionally be executed if imposed by a jury from which have been excluded for cause those who, without more, are opposed to capital punishment or have conscientious scruples against imposing the death penalty. This decision does not govern where the jury recommended a sentence of life imprisonment. Padilla v. People, 171 Colo. 521, 470 P.2d 846 (1970).

And denies representative jury and equal protection. Belief against capital punishment on the part of jurors who are vested with a dichotomy of functions, the determination of the issue of guilt, and the degree of punishment, cannot be allowed to disqualify a substantial part of the venire when it is not established that the views of the persons so disqualified will preclude them from making a fair determination on the issue of guilt, aside from the issue of punishment. Such disqualification prevents the jury in its function of determining the issue of guilt from being fairly representative of the community, and thus violates equal protection of the laws. Padilla v. People, 171 Colo. 521, 470 P.2d 846 (1970).

Death qualified jury not denial of impartial jury. Death qualified juries are not more prone to convict than to acquit, and do not deny a defendant his right to an impartial jury. People v. Manier, 184 Colo. 44, 518 P.2d 811 (1974); People v. Mackey, 185 Colo. 24, 521 P.2d 910 (1974); People v. Casey, 185 Colo. 58, 521 P.2d 1250 (1974); People v. Rodriguez, 786 P.2d 472 (Colo. App. 1989).

Peremptory challenge after juror accepted. A trial court has the right, upon the showing of good cause, to authorize a defendant to peremptorily challenge a juror even after he has been accepted. Simms v. People, 174 Colo. 85, 482 P.2d 974 (1971).

Improper for court to require challenge for cause, and subsequent argument, in the presence of potential jurors. However, not plain error requiring reversal of conviction where there is no evidence in record supporting assertion that the challenged jurors were biased by hearing the challenges for cause nor were the challenges so obviously inflammatory to raise the presumption that bias resulted. People v. Flockhart, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2009).

Recess did not prejudice jury. Where defense counsel became ill during the course of the trial resulting in a recess of over a week, a situation was not created where the jury was prejudiced by the recess. Valdez v. District Court, 171 Colo. 436, 467 P.2d 825 (1970).

Court did not err by allowing jury to deliberate past midnight because a juror had travel plans for the next day. People v. Baird, 66 P.3d 183 (Colo. App. 2002).

Instructing jury that they may engage in predeliberation discussion of the case is constitutional error. The error is trial error rather than structural error. The burden rests with the people to establish harmlessness beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Flockhart, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2009).

Predeliberation instruction creates a rebuttable presumption of prejudice. Defendant must make prima facie showing that predeliberation instruction was made, without conflicting instructions prohibiting predeliberation, and that the jury had the opportunity to predeliberate. The people may then rebut the prima facie case by establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that predeliberation did not occur. People v. Flockhart, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2009).

When analyzing prejudice from predetermination instructions, courts consider the mitigating effect of additional jury instructions. People v. Flockhart, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2009).

Denial of trial by impartial jury not established. Where the record in a first-degree murder case contained only excerpts from the voir dire examination, referring solely to those jurors excused for cause, who stated in effect that under no circumstances would they impose a death sentence, and nothing was brought before the supreme court to support a claim that the jury was not impartial, the defendant did not establish a violation of his rights under this section. Carroll v. People, 177 Colo. 288, 494 P.2d 80 (1972).

Coercion of juror violated section. The provision of this section as to a trial by an impartial jury was violated where 11 jurors, instead of 12, fixed the death penalty upon defendant, the twelfth juror having been coerced to agree. Such juror's sworn statement can be admitted to show procurement of his assent by threats. Wharton v. People, 104 Colo. 260, 90 P.2d 615 (1939).

Court may not act in a manner that could coerce a verdict by causing juror to surrender honest convictions as to the weight and effect of the evidence for the mere purpose of returning a verdict. Denial of mistrial was improper because court created unacceptably high risk of coerced verdict by threatening previously absent juror with contempt sanctions and admonishing the juror on several occasions before deliberations. People v. Dahl, 160 P.3d 301 (Colo. App. 2007).

Separate hearings of the issues raised by pleas of insanity and not guilty, in a criminal case, do not violate the constitutional right to a speedy public trial by an impartial jury, or of due process of law. Leick v. People, 136 Colo. 535, 322 P.2d 674, cert. denied, 357 U.S. 922, 78 S. Ct. 1363, 2 L. Ed. 2d 366 (1958).

A bifurcated trial on the guilt issue and the punishment issue in a first-degree murder case is neither statutorily permitted nor constitutionally required. Jorgensen v. People, 178 Colo. 8, 495 P.2d 1130 (1972).

Where questions by district attorney convince jury that defendant has been involved in other criminal offenses besides the one for which he is being tried, defendant's right to a fair trial is vitiated in a substantive manner. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

The right to an impartial jury includes the right to a jury drawn from a representative or fair cross-section of the community. Fields v. People, 732 P.2d 1145 (Colo. 1987).

The right to an impartial jury does not require counsel be granted unlimited voir dire examination. People v. O'Neill, 803 P.2d 164 (Colo. 1990).

The right to a jury comprising a fair cross-section of the community does not require that each petit jury mirror the demographic composition of the community or that any particular jury actually contain members of the defendant's own group. Fields v. People, 732 P.2d 1145 (Colo. 1987).

Although a defendant is entitled to a trial by a fair and impartial jury, he is not entitled to any particular juror. People v. Johnson, 757 P.2d 1098 (Colo. App. 1988).

The presumption exists that the prosecutor has exercised peremptory challenges on constitutionally permissible grounds, but said presumption may be rebutted by the demonstration of a prima facie case of discrimination. Fields v. People, 732 P.2d 1145 (Colo. 1987).

In evaluating allegations of discriminatory jury selection, the court employs a three-step process. First, the defendant must make a prima facie showing that the people excluded jurors based solely on their race. Second, if the defendant makes this showing, then the burden shifts to the people to articulate a race-neutral reason for excluding the jurors in question. This burden requires the people to provide only a facially race-neutral reason, not an explanation that is persuasive or even plausible. Third, if the people provide a race-neutral reason, the trial court must consider all relevant circumstances to determine whether the defendant has proved purposeful racial discrimination. Valdez v. People, 966 P.2d 587 (Colo. 1998); People v. Hinojos-Mendoza, 140 P.3d 30 (Colo. App. 2005), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 169 P.3d 662 (Colo. 2007).

There is a three-step process for evaluating claims of racial discrimination in jury selection. To establish a prima facie showing, the defendant: (1) Must demonstrate that the prosecution struck a member of a cognizable racial group from the jury; (2) can rely on the fact that peremptory challenges constitute a jury selection practice that permits those who are of a mind to discriminate to discriminate; and (3) must show that the totality of the relevant facts gives rise to an inference of purposeful discrimination. People v. Hogan, 114 P.3d 42 (Colo. App. 2004).

Relevant factors in determining whether an inference of intentional racial discrimination exists include the disproportionate effect of peremptory strikes, a pattern of strikes against jurors of a particular race, and the prosecutor's questions and statements during voir dire. Defendant failed to demonstrate a prima facie case of racial discrimination. People v. Hogan, 114 P.3d 42 (Colo. App. 2004).

Test for prima facie case of discrimination in jury selection includes: (1) That a distinctive and cognizable group exists; (2) that the group is systematically excluded from the jury selection process; and (3) that the resulting jury pool fails to be reasonably representative of the community. People v. Sepeda, 196 Colo. 13, 581 P.2d 723 (1978).

A prima facie case of discrimination in jury selection is demonstrated by showing that the persons excluded are members of a cognizable group and that, considering all the circumstances of the case, there is a strong likelihood that the jurors were excused solely because of their membership in the group. Fields v. People, 732 P.2d 1145 (Colo. 1987).

Failure to voir dire can demonstrate intent to exclude jurors on the basis of race. Applying non-racial criteria for peremptory challenge differently to different jurors can also indicate a peremptory challenge used to discriminate because of race. People v. Gabler, 958 P.2d 505 (Colo. App. 1997).

Whether the defendant has established a prima facie case of discrimination in jury selection is moot where the prosecution explained its use of peremptory challenges before the trial court determined whether an inference of systematic exclusion existed. People v. Mendoza, 860 P.2d 1370 (Colo. App. 1993).

Upon the court's determination that a prima facie case of discrimination has been proven, the burden shifts to the state to rebut the inference that jurors were excluded solely because of group membership by statements by the prosecutor stating reasons for excluding such jurors that are unrelated to membership in a cognizable group and reasonably related to the particular case. Fields v. People, 732 P.2d 1145 (Colo. 1987).

Question of whether a party has established a prima facie case of racial discrimination during the jury selection process is a matter of law to which an appellate court should apply a de novo standard of review. Valdez v. People, 966 P.2d 587 (Colo. 1998).

Once the prosecution has articulated a race-neutral reason for excluding the juror in question, the trial court must consider the plausibility of the prosecutor's race-neutral explanation. The court may consider a number of factors including the prosecutor's demeanor, how reasonable the explanations are, and whether the proffered rationale has some basis in accepted trial strategy. People v. Collins, 187 P.3d 1178 (Colo. App. 2008).

Because reviewing court is not as well positioned as trial court to make credibility determinations, the trial court's determination as to whether the proponent has exercised purposeful racial discrimination is reviewed only for clear error. People v. Robinson, 187 P.3d 1166 (Colo. App. 2008); People v. Collins, 187 P.3d 1178 (Colo. App. 2008).

Prosecutor's use of peremptory challenge held to be purposeful discrimination where at least three of prosecutor's race-neutral reasons were refuted by the record, the trial court failed to specifically credit the other reasons given, and the prosecutor's failure to inquire into the facts of one of the articulated reasons suggested pretext and undermined the persuasiveness of the underlying concern. People v. Collins, 187 P.3d 1178 (Colo. App. 2008).

Striking a single potential juror for a discriminatory reason violates the equal protection clause even where jurors of the same race are seated. People v. Collins, 187 P.3d 1178 (Colo. App. 2008).

Where prosecutor offered explanation of peremptory challenge of the only remaining member of defendant's race from jury panel before defendant was afforded the opportunity to make out a prima facie case of discrimination, defendant's burden of proof is moot and court must consider whether the prosecution espoused a sufficient race-neutral rationale for striking juror. People v. Arrington, 843 P.2d 62 (Colo. App. 1992).

Defendant's right to equal protection was violated where prosecutor's peremptory challenge against the only remaining member of defendant's race was founded upon impermissibly race specific reasons.

People v. Arrington, 843 P.2d 62 (Colo. App. 1992).

Prosecutor's striking of a prospective juror was a Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), violation. Both of the prosecutor's race-neutral explanations for striking the prospective juror were refuted by the record and, therefore, supported a finding of pretext. Further, the prosecutor did not challenge other jurors who expressed similar concerns that formed the basis for the prosecutor's race-neutral explanations. People v. Wilson, 2012 COA 163M, __ P.3d __.

A Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), violation is a structural error requiring reversal. People v. Wilson, 2012 COA 163M, __ P.3d __.

Spanish-surnamed persons are a cognizable group for purposes of determining whether a defendant has been denied the opportunity for a jury composed of a fair cross-section of the community, and for equal protection analysis. Fields v. People, 732 P.2d 1145 (Colo. 1987).

A prosecutor's purposeful, discriminatory, and systematic exercise of peremptory challenges in a given case to exclude from the jury panel Spanish-surnamed persons solely on the basis of presumed group characteristics violates this constitutional provision. Fields v. People, 732 P.2d 1145 (Colo. 1987).

If even one of the prosecutor's explanations of the bases for the peremptory challenges is insufficient, the trial court should rule that the exclusion violates both the defendant's and the prospective juror's equal protection rights. People v. Mendoza, 860 P.2d 1370 (Colo. App. 1993).

A defendant's objection to the prosecutor's peremptory challenge must be made before the venire is dismissed and the trial begins since the procedures for proving such a claim include requiring the prosecutor to state neutral reasons for striking the potential juror. Therefore, defendant was precluded from making an objection after the venire was dismissed, the jury panel had been sworn, and the trial had begun. People v. Mendoza, 860 P.2d 1370 (Colo. App. 1993).

Error, if any, in granting prosecution's challenge for cause to prospective juror was harmless where prosecution did not use all its peremptory challenges. People v. Orth, 121 P.3d 256 (Colo. App. 2005).

Test for excluding a juror is whether the juror would render a fair and impartial verdict based on evidence presented at trial and on instructions given by the court. People v. Abbott, 690 P.2d 1263 (Colo. 1984).

Rebuttable presumption that defendant's right to a fair trial has been prejudiced arises when, over objection of defendant, a regular juror who has become unable to continue deliberations is substituted with a discharged alternate juror. People v. Burnette, 775 P.2d 583 (Colo. 1989); People v. Patterson, 832 P.2d 1083 (Colo. App. 1992).

Such presumption arises independent of the question of the authority by which the substitution is made. People v. Patterson, 832 P.2d 1083 (Colo. App. 1992).

Thus, even where defendant contents to the fact of the juror substitution, the defendant does not waive the right to challenge the procedure followed in accomplishing the juror substitution and thereby waive the right to a fair and impartial jury. People v. Patterson, 832 P.2d 1083 (Colo. App. 1992).

Presumption of prejudice not rebutted where, even though defendant consented to the fact of a juror substitution, he was not present when the actual substitution was made and neither he nor his counsel were aware of the manner in which the substitution was accomplished until after deliberations had been concluded and where trial court: failed to question regular jurors prior to substitution regarding their willingness and ability to start deliberations anew with an alternate juror; never instructed reconstituted jury to start deliberations anew; failed to question alternate juror about his ability to serve or as to whether he had received any extraneous information or formed any opinions while discharged until after the deliberative process; and where trial court's instruction may have sent message to jurors that their deliberations should continue from the point at which they had been interrupted. People v. Patterson, 832 P.2d 1083 (Colo. App. 1992).

The length of time a jury deliberates prior to juror substitution may influence the issue of whether defendant's right to a fair trial has been prejudiced; the longer the delay in inserting the substitute juror, the stronger the presumption of prejudice. People v. Patterson, 832 P.2d 1083 (Colo. App. 1992).

The promptness of the juror substitution cannot, by itself, defeat the presumption that defendant's right to a fair trial has been prejudiced by substitution of a regular juror who has become unable to continue deliberations with a discharged alternate juror; rather, promptness of substitution is one of several factors important to such determination. People v. Patterson, 832 P.2d 1083 (Colo. App. 1992).

If a trial court interrupts deliberations of a jury and suspends the jury's fact finding functions to investigate allegations of juror misconduct, the court's inquiry must not intrude into the deliberative process. In the exercise of judicial discretion, before a juror is dismissed from a deliberating jury due to an allegation of juror misconduct, the court must make findings supporting a conclusion that the allegedly offending juror will not follow the court's instructions. Garcia v. People, 997 P.2d 1 (Colo. 2000).

Jury to be selected from representative cross-section of community. The constitutional guarantees of due process and trial by jury require that juries be selected from a representative cross-section of the community. People v. Moody, 630 P.2d 74 (Colo. 1981).

But each jury need not reflect exact ethnic proportion. There is no constitutional requirement that each petit jury reflect the exact ethnic proportion of the population to which the defendant belongs. People v. Moody, 630 P.2d 74 (Colo. 1981).

Prosecutor may not exercise peremptory jury challenge based solely on gender. Cause remanded for further consideration of gender discrimination question since trial court made no finding on claim. People v. Gandy, 878 P.2d 68 (Colo. App. 1994).

The term "district" is intended to express a concept of local vicinity. Wafai v. People, 750 P.2d 37 (Colo. 1988).

Residents of a particular urban area do not constitute a distinctive group for purposes of trial by a jury fairly representing a cross-section of the community. People v. Rubanowitz, 688 P.2d 231 (Colo. 1984).

Selection of jurors from a different county than the county of venue preserved defendant's right to a fair trial. People v. Wafai, 713 P.2d 1354 (Colo. App. 1985), aff'd, 750 P.2d 37 (Colo. 1988).

Municipal court jury trials. The term "district", as applicable to a municipal court prosecution for an ordinance violation in a multi-county municipality, refers to the area served by the municipal court which means the territorial boundaries of the city. City of Aurora v. Rhodes, 689 P.2d 603

(Colo. 1984).

Term "district", within the meaning of this section which gives an accused the right to a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, refers to a governmental area district from a county and includes a judicial district. People v. Taylor, 732 P.2d 1172 (Colo. 1987).

Strong aversion to particular crime not automatic disqualification of prospective juror. A strong aversion to a particular crime, such as child abuse, does not automatically disqualify a prospective juror, where the juror states that she can, and will, set aside her adverse feelings and decide the case based upon the evidence and the law, and the juror's statement is not otherwise impugned by the record. People v. Taggart, 621 P.2d 1375 (Colo. 1981).

No abuse of discretion when court denies a challenge for cause after the challenged juror has committed to put aside his or her biases and has expressed that he or she can be fair. People v. Shover, 217 P.3d 901 (Colo. App. 2009).

Court did not abuse its discretion in deciding not to excuse two jurors for cause. Although each juror expressed some reservations about the burden of proof, nothing in their statements indicated that they did not understand the burden of proof or would not follow the court's instruction regarding the burden of proof. People v. Rabes, 258 P.3d 937 (Colo. App. 2010); People v. Taylor, 2012 COA 91, __ P.3d __.

Same jury requirement under habitual criminal statute upheld. Under the habitual-criminal statute, the same jury which returns a guilty verdict on the underlying offense must then decide whether the defendant committed the necessary prior crimes to be adjudged an habitual criminal. Despite this "same-jury" requirement in § 16-13-103, the defendant can have an impartial jury during the habitual-criminal sentencing hearing, as guaranteed by this section and § 25 of this article. People ex rel. Faulk v. District Court ex rel. County of Fremont, 673 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1983).

Decision of trial judge to deny challenge for cause will not be disturbed on review in the absence of a manifest abuse of discretion. People v. Taggart, 621 P.2d 1375 (Colo. 1981); People v. Abbott, 690 P.2d 1263 (Colo. 1984).

Trial court's decision to excuse a juror during trial will not be disturbed absent a gross abuse of discretion. People v. Abbott, 690 P.2d 1263 (Colo. 1984).

Trial court did not abuse its discretion when it dismissed a juror and did not commit reversible error by not recording the side bar conference. A defendant must establish specific prejudice that resulted from an incomplete record. People v. Wolfe, 9 P.3d 1137 (Colo. App. 1999).

Trial court's decision to allow juror questioning in a criminal trial does not, in and of itself, violate a defendant's constitutional rights to a fair and impartial jury. Medina v. People, 114 P.3d 845 (Colo. 2005).

The court's decision to permit juror questioning did not constitute an abuse of discretion as the testimony elicited by the jurors was not new or different from other evidence already admitted. People v. Milligan, 77 P.3d 771 (Colo. App. 2003).

There was no abuse of discretion in denying challenge for cause. Juror stated she would express her opinions in the jury room, so the court reasonably concluded the juror could serve. People v. Collins, 250 P.3d 668 (Colo. App. 2010).

There was no abuse of discretion in denying defendant's challenge for cause where juror repeatedly stated he would not make a decision about the appropriate penalty until all of the evidence had been heard. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Trial court's decision to grant prosecution's challenge for cause to a juror who stated he would vote for life imprisonment if any mitigation existed, however slight, was supported by the record. Juror's statement showed he was substantially impaired in his ability to fairly and impartially weigh the aggravating and mitigating evidence. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

The constitutional basis for the prosecutorial duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrong conviction as well as to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one is the right to trial by a fair and impartial jury guaranteed by both the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution and art. II, §§ 16 and 23, of the Colorado Constitution. Harris v. People, 888 P.2d 259 (Colo. 1995).

Prosecutorial misconduct that misleads a jury can warrant reversal of a conviction because the right to trial includes the right to trial by an impartial jury empaneled to determine the issues solely on the basis of the evidence introduced at trial rather than on the basis of bias or prejudice for or against a party. Harris v. People, 888 P.2d 259 (Colo. 1995); People v. Walters, 148 P.3d 331 (Colo. App. 2006).

Comments on defendant's demeanor are not considered prosecutorial misconduct if defendant testifies in his or her own defense, thus making his or her demeanor and credibility proper subjects for the jury to consider. The prosecutor may not, however, inject his or her own credibility into the case. People v. Walters, 148 P.3d 331 (Colo. App. 2006).

It is improper and therefore constitutes prosecutorial misconduct for prosecutor to ask the jury to consider anecdotal evidence regarding acquaintances and personal experiences or other information outside the record that serves only to inflame the jurors' passion. People v. Walters, 148 P.3d 331 (Colo. App. 2006).

It is prosecutorial misconduct for an attorney to characterize a witness's testimony or his character for truthfulness with any form of the word "lie". A violation of this prohibition, although sanctionable in other ways, does not warrant reversal if it was harmless. Domingo-Gomez v. People, 125 P.3d 1043 (Colo. 2005); Crider v. People, 186 P.3d 39 (Colo. 2008).

Potential for jury prejudice is significantly diminished when a trial court sustains defense counsel's objection. People v. Suazo, 87 P.3d 124 (Colo. App. 2003).

Failure to instruct jury on element not necessarily structural, requiring reversal. If element uncontested, supported by overwhelming evidence, and jury verdict would have been same absent error, failure to instruct harmless. People v. Geisendorfer, 991 P.2d 308 (Colo. App. 1999).

Right to a fair trial before an impartial jury was not violated when evidence was admitted that at the time of the arrest the defendant had a handgun, the defendant was wearing multiple clothing, and several items of clothing identified by the police at trial were found in the defendant's car. This evidence was relevant, and no error existed in its admission. People v. Boehmer, 872 P.2d 1320 (Colo. App. 1993).

Defendant's right to fair trial held not violated when the prosecutor's argument, while supported by evidence admitted at trial, was contrary to facts outside the record but prosecutor was not aware of the facts outside the record. People v. Perry, 68 P.3d 472 (Colo. App. 2002).

Court's failure to question jury about possible juror misconduct did not prejudice defendant. Any error in not questioning the jury was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Alternate jurors' conversation about defendant's previous conviction occurred outside the presence of the regular jurors and there was no evidence that the regular jurors were exposed to the information. Alternate juror's statement to regular juror congratulating regular juror on the guilty verdicts also did not prejudice defendant because the incident occurred after the guilty verdicts were announced and had no effect on the jury during the guilt phase. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Applied in Stone v. People, 71 Colo. 162, 204 P. 897 (1922); Dikeou v. Food Distribs. Ass'n, 107 Colo. 38, 108 P.2d 529 (1940); People v. Benney, 757 P.2d 1078 (Colo. App. 1987).

B. Venue and Pretrial Publicity.

In Colorado, a person is subject to prosecution in any Colorado district court if he or she commits an offense either wholly or partly within the state. People v. Sharp, 155 P.3d 577 (Colo. App. 2006).

Venue in a criminal case generally lies in the county where the offense was committed. Claxton v. People, 164 Colo. 283, 434 P.2d 407 (1967).

Right to trial in county where alleged offense is committed may be waived. The provision of this section that defendant in a criminal case shall have the right to a trial in the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, is solely for the benefit of the accused and may be waived by him at his pleasure. Davis v. People, 83 Colo. 295, 264 P. 658 (1928).

Where the defendant enters a plea of guilty to the charge, there is no "trial" within the import of the language of the provision which guarantees the right to a "speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district". Even where a not guilty plea is entered and the issues of fact are determined by a jury, the accused may waive his right to trial in the county where the offense is committed. Vigil v. People, 135 Colo. 313, 310 P.2d 552 (1957).

Where defendant expressly consented to the proceedings in the county where the arraignment was had, he waived whatever right he might otherwise have had to be arraigned in the county where the alleged offense was committed. Vigil v. People, 135 Colo. 313, 310 P.2d 552 (1957).

This provision is guarantee of right to proper venue only and is for the sole benefit of the accused and may be waived. People v. Rice, 40 Colo. App. 357, 579 P.2d 647, cert. denied, 439 U.S. 898, 99 S. Ct. 261, 58 L. Ed. 2d 245 (1978).

This provision makes no reference to where arraignments shall be had. Vigil v. People, 135 Colo. 313, 310 P.2d 552 (1957); People v. Joseph, 920 P.2d 850 (Colo. App. 1995).

Effect of prejudice in community. Where there is a reasonable likelihood that prejudicial news prior to trial will prevent a fair trial, the judge should continue the case until the threat abates, or transfer it to another county not so permeated with publicity. Walker v. People, 169 Colo. 467, 458 P.2d 238 (1969).

If a community is prejudiced against a citizen or if other circumstances are likely to deny him a fair and impartial jury trial, then a change of venue must be granted. Brisbin v. Schauer, 176 Colo. 550, 492 P.2d 835 (1971).

Only when the publicity is so ubiquitous and vituperative that most jurors in a community could not ignore its influence is a change of venue required before voir dire examination. People v. McCrary, 190 Colo. 538, 549 P.2d 1320 (1976).

Factors as to whether pretrial publicity capable of biasing community. Some of the cumulative factors to be considered by a trial court in determining swhether there is such massive, pervasive, and prejudicial pretrial publicity as to bias a community are: the size and type of the locale, the reputation of the victim, the revealed sources of the news stories, the specificity of the accounts of certain facts, the volume and intensity of the coverage, the extent of comment by the news reports on the facts of the case, the manner of presentation, the proximity to the time of trial, and the publication of highly incriminating facts not admissible at trial. People v. McCrary, 190 Colo. 538, 549 P.2d 1320 (1976).

Balance between fair trial and freedom of press. To strike the proper balance between the accused's right to a fair trial and the freedom of the press, the trial judge may: (1) Cause extensive voir dire examination of prospective jurors; (2) change the trial venue to a place less exposed to intense publicity; (3) postpone the trial to allow public attention to subside; (4) empanel veniremen from an area that has not been exposed to intense pretrial publicity; (5) enlarge the size of the jury panel and increase the number of peremptory challenges; or (6) use emphatic and clear instructions on the sworn duty of each juror to decide the issues only on the evidence presented in open court. People v. Botham, 629 P.2d 589 (Colo. 1981).

Mere existence of extensive pretrial publicity, by itself, does not trigger a due process entitlement to a change of venue. People v. Bartowsheski, 661 P.2d 235 (Colo. 1983).

A defendant, in order to prevail on this argument, must show that the publicity was so "massive, pervasive, and prejudicial" as to create a presumption of an unfair trial or, or alternatively, that the publicity created actual hostility on the part of the jurors. People v. Bartowsheski, 661 P.2d 235 (Colo. 1983); People v. Tafoya, 703 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1985).

Defendant failed to meet this burden where the trial court allowed extensive in camera voir dire and gave cautionary remarks to the jury concerning avoidance of publicity and where the defendant failed to exhaust his peremptory challenges. People v. Tafoya, 703 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1985).

Mere familiarity with a case due to pretrial publicity does not, in itself, create a constitutionally defective jury. People v. Loscutoff, 661 P.2d 274 (Colo. 1983).

Mere speculation by a defendant that the jurors read and were prejudiced by unfavorable news articles does not constitute a basis for reversal, and a defendant bears the burden of showing that prejudice occurred. People v. Davis, 39 Colo. App. 63, 565 P.2d 1347 (1977); People v. Tafoya, 703 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1985).

The trial court's failure to sequester the jury or its failure to give the complete admonitory instruction when requested, and its refusal to allow any inquiry with regard to the jurors' exposure to out-of-court information, in light of the circumstances surrounding the trial, was an abuse of discretion. Under the circumstances of the case, this error, combined with others, required reversal. People v. Vialpando, 809 P.2d 1082 (Colo. App. 1990).

Presumption of partiality shown. Where it is shown that a significant number of jurors entertained an opinion of the defendant's guilt, had been exposed to pretrial publicity, and had knowledge of the details of the crime, the defendant has met his burden of showing the existence of an opinion in the minds of the jurors which raises a presumption of partiality. People v. Botham, 629 P.2d 589 (Colo. 1981).

VII. RIGHT TO UNANIMOUS JURY VERDICT.

There was no unanimity problem with the guilty verdict based on a series of sexual contacts since the defendant did not allege that some occurred and others did not. People v. Greer, 262 P.3d 920 (Colo. App. 2011).

The people adequately elected the specific acts underlying each count that constituted the pattern of sexual abuse. People v. Greer, 260 P.3d 920 (Colo. App. 2011).

There was a unanimity problem with four of the guilty verdicts since the jury indicated that it did not find a specific act was committed to support the guilty verdict for each count. Because the court did not resolve that problem by merging each of the four convictions into one conviction, reversal of the convictions is the proper remedy. People v. Greer, 262 P.3d 920 (Colo. App. 2011).

Section 16a. Rights of crime victims. Any person who is a victim of a criminal act, or such person's designee, legal guardian, or surviving immediate family members if such person is deceased, shall have the right to be heard when relevant, informed, and present at all critical stages of the criminal justice process. All terminology, including the term "critical stages", shall be defined by the general assembly.

ANNOTATION

It is within the general assembly's discretion to define the technical or special terminology included in this section, including "critical stages" and "right to be heard". People v. Herron, 874 P.2d 435 (Colo. App. 1993).

This section does not grant a victim the right to challenge a district attorney's decision to dismiss charges by appealing the trial court's order of dismissal since the general assembly did not include that right in defining victims' rights in § 24-4.1-302.5. People v. Herron, 874 P.2d 435 (Colo. App. 1993).

The right of a victim's surviving immediate family member to be present at all critical stages of the criminal justice process takes precedence over a party's right to sequester witnesses under C.R.E. 615. The father of a murder victim who testified in the defendant's trial was wrongly excluded from subsequent portions of the trial. People v. Coney, 98 P.3d 930 (Colo. App. 2004).

Section 17. Imprisonment of witnesses - depositions - form. No person shall be imprisoned for the purpose of securing his testimony in any case longer than may be necessary in order to take his deposition. If he can give security he shall be discharged; if he cannot give security his deposition shall be taken by some judge of the supreme, district or county court, at the earliest time he can attend, at some convenient place by him appointed for that purpose, of which time and place the accused and the attorney prosecuting for the people shall have reasonable notice. The accused shall have the right to appear in person and by counsel. If he has no counsel, the judge shall assign him one in his behalf only. On the completion of such examination the witness shall be discharged on his own recognizance, entered into before said judge, but such deposition shall not be used if in the opinion of the court the personal attendance of the witness might be procured by the prosecution, or is procured by the accused. No exception shall be taken to such deposition as to matters of form.

ANNOTATION

Law reviews. For article, "Report of the Denver Bar Association's Committee on the Administration of Criminal Justice in Colorado", see 2 Den. B. Ass'n Rec. 2 (Feb. 1925).

Main thrust of section is prevention of imprisonment of a witness who cannot give bond or security for his or her appearance. Morse v. Wilson, 500 F.2d 1264 (10th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1121, 95 S. Ct. 804, 42 L. Ed. 2d 821 (1975).

This and preceding section must be construed in pari materia, and when so construed no doubt can be entertained that in this state there is constitutional sanction for the taking of a deposition on the part of the prosecution and the introduction of the same against the accused upon final trial, under some circumstances. Ryan v. People, 21 Colo. 119, 40 P. 775 (1895).

Use of depositions not deprivation of right to confront witness. Where prosecution used depositions of two witnesses at trial, and where defendant was present with counsel and was granted full rights of cross-examination at the time of the taking of the depositions before a judge, he was not deprived of his right to confront witnesses at trial where the depositions were used without a finding of unavailability of the deponents, where it was a matter of his counsel's trial strategy. Morse v. People, 180 Colo. 49, 501 P.2d 1328 (1972).

Clause of this section dealing with use of deposition is incidental provision. Morse v. Wilson, 500 F.2d 1264 (10th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1121, 95 S. Ct. 804, 42 L. Ed. 2d 821 (1975).

Waiver of deposition. Reading the deposition provision in its entirety and considering its object and purpose, there can be a waiver. Morse v. Wilson, 500 F.2d 1264 (10th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1121, 95 S. Ct. 804, 42 L. Ed. 2d 821 (1975).

Application of section 16-10-201 in allowing prosecution to impeach its own witness with prior inconsistent statements was not a violation of right to confront accuser, to assistance of counsel, to appear when depositions against one were taken, or to due process of law. People v. Bastardo, 191 Colo. 521, 554 P.2d 297 (1976).

Applied in Baker v. People, 72 Colo. 68, 209 P. 791 (1922); People v. District Court, 647 P.2d 1206 (Colo. 1982).

Section 18. Crimes - evidence against one's self - jeopardy. No person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal case nor shall any person be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. If the jury disagree, or if the judgment be arrested after the verdict, or if the judgment be reversed for error in law, the accused shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy.

Protection of innocent and preservation of integrity of society. Both the United States and the Colorado Constitutions accord an accused substantive and procedural rights that are binding on the government in a criminal prosecution. Such procedures protect the innocent from an unjust conviction and preserve the integrity of society itself by keeping sound and wholesome the process by which it visits its condemnation on a wrongdoer. People v. Germany, 674 P.2d 345 (Colo. 1983).

Derivative evidence rule which excludes evidence obtained as a result of violations of a defendant's constitutional rights applies to fourth, fifth, and sixth amendment violations, and prosecution bears burden to prove that evidence sought for admission was not acquired as a result of a constitutional violation. People v. Connelly, 702 P.2d 722 (Colo. 1985).

Applied in Imboden v. People, 40 Colo. 142, 90 P. 608 (1907); Morletti v. People, 72 Colo. 7, 209 P. 796 (1922); Sweeney v. Cregan, 89 Colo. 94, 299 P. 1058 (1931); French v. II. SELF-INCRIMINATION.

Law reviews. For note, "Involuntary Confessions -- Fourth Stage in Colorado", see 31 Dicta 133 (1954). For comment on French v. District Court appearing below, see 36 U. Colo. L. Rev. 280 (1964). Sections 16-8-103.6, 16-8-106, and 16-8-107 do not violate a defendant's constitutional privilege against self-incrimination. The information obtained in compulsory mental examinations is admissible only on the issue of mental condition and insanity raised by defendants themselves. People v. Bondurant, 2012 COA 50, __ P.3d __.

Common-law privilege fixed in constitution. Immunity from self-incrimination is a privilege immovably fixed in our constitution. The existence of the privilege is one of the outstanding and distinctive features of the common-law system of jurisprudence and one of the highest protections to the liberty of the citizens of a free democracy. Always the courts have been, and they should be, zealous in preserving the privilege. In so doing, however, they ought not to give it more than its due significance. It is to be respected rationally for its merits, not worshipped blindly as a fetish. People v. Clifford, 105 Colo. 316, 98 P.2d 272 (1939); People v. Schneider, 133 Colo. 173, 292 P.2d 982 (1956); People v. Austin, 159 Colo. 445, 412 P.2d 425 (1966).

"Criminal cases", as used in the constitution, refers to cases which at the time of the adoption of the constitution were recognized as criminal, or cases which should thereafter be made criminal by statute. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

Privilege is only against self-incrimination. People v. Knapp, 180 Colo. 280, 505 P.2d 7 (1973).

A witness is possessed of a constitutional right not to incriminate himself. Smaldone v. People, 158 Colo. 16, 404 P.2d 276 (1965).

It does not permit witness to remain silent to avoid incriminating third party. People v. Knapp, 180 Colo. 280, 505 P.2d 7 (1973).

Self-incrimination is personal right. Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. District Court, 180 Colo. 388, 505 P.2d 1300 (1973).

And privilege may not be invoked by corporations. Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. District Court, 180 Colo. 388, 505 P.2d 1300 (1973).

The right to be free from self-incrimination applies to pre-arrest silence. Allowing the substantive use of such silence would substantially impair the policies behind the privilege. People v. Welsh, 58 P.3d 1065 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd on other grounds, 80 P.3d 296 (Colo. 2003).

The use of pre-arrest silence when the defendant does not testify impermissibly burdens the privilege guaranteed by the fifth amendment and thus is inadmissible in the prosecution's case-in-chief as substantive evidence of guilt or sanity; no evidentiary inference of consciousness of guilt or sanity can trump a fifth amendment right. People v. Welsh, 58 P.3d 1065 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd on other grounds, 80 P.3d 296 (Colo. 2003).

No privilege against self-incrimination under the fifth amendment where defendant's incriminating statements to undercover agent were obtained pursuant to defendant's express invitation. People

v. Battle, 694 P.2d 359 (Colo. App. 1984).

Defendant has no protection from testifying about whether he requested counsel because such testimony has no bearing on his guilt or innocence. People v. Turtura, 921 P.2d 40 (Colo. 1996).

Trial court erred in suppressing voluntary statements made by arrestee to police investigator. Arrestee initiated conversation with the investigator and the investigator did not deliberately elicit statement from the arrestee. The court, upon finding that the arrestee was not being subjected to interrogation, need not have considered whether the arrestee waived his fifth or sixth amendment rights. People v. Ross, 821 P.2d 816 (Colo. 1992).

Volunteered statements by a defendant are not proscribed by the fifth amendment, therefore, defendant's right against self-incrimination was not violated by the introduction of such voluntary statements. People v. Ridley, 872 P.2d 1377 (Colo. App. 1994).

Section applies to witness in any investigation. The provision of this section that "no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal case" was not intended merely for the protection of the individual in a criminal prosecution against himself, but its purpose was to insure that a person could not be required, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which might tend to show that he, himself, had committed a crime. Tuttle v. People, 33 Colo. 243, 79 P. 1035 (1905).

Privilege applies both at trial and in other proceedings. The privilege against self-incrimination operates to protect the accused against compulsory testimony not only at the trial but also in other proceedings. Early v. People, 142 Colo. 462, 352 P.2d 112, cert. denied, 364 U.S. 847, 81 S. Ct. 90, 5 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1960).

Since a witness-defendant's forced incriminating statements could influence the court to impose a harsher sentence than it might have imposed absent the involuntary testimony, a defendant who has not yet been sentenced retains the privilege against self-incrimination. She may refuse to testify about any aspect of the subject matter giving rise to the guilty verdict which might influence the trial court's sentencing decision. Steinberger v. District Court, 198 Colo. 55, 596 P.2d 755 (1979).

Defendant's fifth amendment claim necessarily failed because he waived his right to remain silent at sentencing when he chose to "speak my piece". There is no reason why the court could not consider what a defendant who chose to speak at sentencing said as well as what defendant did not say. There is no constitutional right to be free from a court considering a dissembling sentencing allocution. People v. McBride, 228 P.3d 216 (Colo. App. 2009).

Defendant police officers appearing before a citizens group created by city ordinance to review conduct of police officers could not be compelled to answer such group's questions over their assertion of their fifth amendment privilege not to incriminate themselves. City and County of Denver v. Powell, 969 P.2d 776 (Colo. App. 1998).

A party may not call a witness to testify if that party knows the witness will exercise her privilege against self-incrimination, and this prohibition applies whether or not the claim of privilege is proper. People v. Newton, 940 P.2d 1065 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 966 P.2d 563 (Colo. 1998).

If the prosecutor asks whether the witness is invoking his or her right against self-incrimination and the witness does not respond, there is no violation of the right. If the witness does not invoke the right at trial, the question of whether the prosecution called the witness solely to extract the witness's claim of the right does not apply. People v. Banks, 2012 COA 157, __ P.3d __.

Privilege not extended to civil commitment proceedings. Due process does not require that the privilege against self-incrimination be extended to civil commitment proceedings. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

Nor to sentencing proceedings. Defendant's statutory privilege against self-incrimination during course of court-ordered psychiatric examinations and protection from being confronted with evidence acquired from examinations did not extend to proceedings conducted for sentencing purposes. And, even if the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination is assumed to apply to the use of information for sentencing purposes after guilt has been established, the defendant waived his right against self-incrimination where he consented to use of reports from court-ordered psychiatric examination at sentencing hearing and had been apprised of his constitutional rights by his attorney. People v. Hernandez, 768 P.2d 755 (Colo. App. 1988).

And scope of privilege includes proceedings before grand juries. People v. McPhail, 118 Colo. 478, 197 P.2d 315 (1948).

But completed criminal contempt in presence of court is not protected by the constitutional privilege against incrimination. Smaldone v. People, 158 Colo. 7, 405 P.2d 208 (1965), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 1012, 86 S. Ct. 616, 15 L. Ed. 2d 527 (1966).

If the court finds the claim of privilege to be invalid, it should consider contempt penalties against the witness, rather than allowing questioning that could be prejudicial to the defendant. People v. Newton, 940 P.2d 1065 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 966 P.2d 563 (Colo. 1998).

Immunity allows state to compel testimony. A grant of immunity as extensive as a witness' constitutional privilege against self-incrimination allows a state to compel testimony which might otherwise be unobtainable. People ex rel. Smith v. Jordan, 689 P.2d 1172 (Colo. App. 1984).

Citizens group created by city ordinance to review conduct of police officers could not compel police officers under group's review to answer such group's questions over their assertion of their fifth amendment privilege not to incriminate themselves when group had no authority to grant immunity to such police officers. City and County of Denver v. Powell, 969 P.2d 776 (Colo. App. 1998).

When the privilege against self-incrimination is invoked in a civil case, the finder of fact should be permitted to draw an adverse inference therefrom. Asplin v. Mueller, 687 P.2d 1329 (Colo. App. 1984); Chaffin, Inc. v. Wallain, 689 P.2d 684 (Colo. App. 1984).

Prior to determining what consequence will flow from a plaintiff's invocation of the privilege, the trial court must consider the defendant's need for the information withheld, whether the defendant has any alternative means of obtaining that information, and whether any effective remedy, short of dismissal, is available to safeguard both parties' interests. Steiner v. Minn. Life Ins. Co., 85 P.3d 135 (Colo. 2004).

Privilege applies both at trial and in other proceedings. Attorney's exercise of privilege against self-incrimination was valid at hearings to determine whether attorney had ability to pay court-ordered restitution, as there was the threat of incarceration for punitive reasons arising out of contempt proceedings. People v.

Razatos, 699 P.2d 970 (Colo. 1985).

Fifth amendment protections afforded a criminal defendant apply in post-dissolution contempt proceedings in which the potential exists for a sanction of imprisonment to be imposed as punishment. In re Alverson, 981 P.2d 1123 (Colo. App. 1999).

The privilege against self-incrimination protects one accused of a crime from providing the state, not a private employer, with evidence of a testimonial nature. Wilson v. Indus. Comm'n, 730 P.2d 911 (Colo. App. 1986).

Administrative hearing need not be continued pending outcome of parallel criminal charge. If person invokes privilege against self-incrimination and this is not held against the person, the privilege is satisfied, and there is no denial of due process despite pending criminal proceedings. Smith v. Charnes, 728 P.2d 1287 (Colo. 1986).

Statements used for impeachment purposes. Statements made by an accused under circumstances rendering the statement inadmissible for substantive purposes may be admitted for the limited purpose of impeaching the accused's credibility if statements were voluntarily given. People v. Mickens, 734 P.2d 646 (Colo. App. 1986).

There is no exception to the exclusionary rule for the use of excluded evidence to impeach a witness who is not the defendant. People v. Trujillo, 30 P.3d 760 (Colo. App. 2000), aff'd, 49 P.3d 316 (Colo. 2002).

If a defendant's statements to the arresting officer were the subject of his direct examination, the defendant could be subjected to cross-examination about those statements without violating any constitutional rights, federal or state. People v. Moran, 983 P.2d 143 (Colo. App. 1999).

It was not error for the prosecution to refer to evidence concerning the omissions from defendant's statements at the time of his arrest in closing arguments, because the evidence was properly admitted. Contrary to defendant's characterization, the prosecutor was not improperly commenting on defendant's post-arrest "silence". Rather, the prosecutor was properly commenting on reasonable inferences that could be drawn about defendant's credibility from his testimony and his statements to the arresting officer. People v. Moran, 983 P.2d 143 (Colo. App. 1999).

No violation of defendant's right to due process where defendant volunteered that he had invoked his right to remain silent and the prosecutor did not comment on it in the jury's presence. Prosecutor did not deliberately elicit testimony from defendant that he had invoked his right to remain silent. Prosecutor asked defendant leading questions intended to elicit testimony that he had refused to consent to a search. People v. Chavez, 190 P.3d 760 (Colo. App. 2007).

Fifth amendment protection does not extend to protection from being called as a witness in a civil proceeding even if party is claiming the privilege. In re Hoyt, 742 P.2d 963 (Colo. App. 1987).

Although punitive contempt is not a common law or statutory crime, the possibility of incarceration associated with such proceedings is sufficient to require recognition and protection of the rights afforded to criminal defendants, including the right not to be called as a witness. In re Alverson, 981 P.2d 1123 (Colo. App. 1999) (disagreeing with In re Hoyt cited above and decided prior to 1995 amendments to C.R.C.P. 107).

Although privilege against self-incrimination under the fifth amendment generally applies only to state action, where no state action is involved in an accused making incriminating statements to a private individual under circumstances that so overbear a person's will as to render such statements involuntary, a confession is inadmissible. People v. Freeman, 739 P.2d 856 (Colo. App. 1987).

Defendant protected from supplying link in evidence against himself. The provision of this section that no person shall be compelled to testify against himself was not intended merely to protect a party from being compelled to make confession of guilt, but protects him from being compelled to furnish a single link in a chain of evidence by which his conviction of a criminal offense might be secured. Tuttle v. People, 33 Colo. 243, 79 P. 1035 (1905).

But not every type of evidence derived from defendant is protected or privileged under defendant's right to not incriminate himself. Thompson v. People, 181 Colo. 194, 510 P.2d 311 (1973).

As the privilege is prohibition of use of physical or moral compulsion to exact communications. Serratore v. People, 178 Colo. 341, 497 P.2d 1018 (1972).

Privilege against self-incrimination is specifically limited to testimonial compulsion. Lanford v. People, 159 Colo. 36, 409 P.2d 829 (1966); Serratore v. People, 178 Colo. 341, 497 P.2d 1018 (1972).

The privilege against self-incrimination protects a person against the production of evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature. Houston v. Manerbino, 185 Colo. 1, 521 P.2d 166 (1974); People v. District Court, 187 Colo. 333, 531 P.2d 626 (1975); People v. Ramirez, 199 Colo. 367, 609 P.2d 616 (1980).

The federal and state constitutional privilege against self-incrimination is concerned with and limited to testimonial compulsion, as distinguished from compulsion to exhibit physical characteristics. People v. Brown, 174 Colo. 513, 485 P.2d 500 (1971), appeal dismissed, 404 U.S. 1007, 92 S. Ct. 671, 30 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1972); Sandoval v. People, 172 Colo. 383, 473 P.2d 722 (1972).

And privilege is inapplicable to real or demonstrative evidence. Early v. People, 142 Colo. 462, 352 P.2d 112, cert. denied, 364 U.S. 847, 81 S. Ct. 90, 5 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1960).

The privilege against self-incrimination does not extend to demonstrative evidence obtained from the defendant or from a witness, to performance of acts in or out of court, or to blood tests. People v. District Court, 187 Colo. 333, 531 P.2d 626 (1975).

The constitution protects one against an admission of guilt coming from his own lips under compulsion and against the will of the accused and has no relation whatever to real as distinguished from testimonial evidence. Vigil v. People, 134 Colo. 126, 300 P.2d 545 (1956).

Trial court's ruling that defendant's suppression hearing testimony was admissible to impeach sister's character testimony did not violate constitutional protections. The fourth amendment right to suppress inadmissible testimony, the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination, and the sixth amendment right to present evidence in a defense are all at play in the question of whether the prosecution could use defendant's suppression testimony that he had sexual contact with the victim to impeach the defendant's sister's character testimony that the defendant would not commit sexual assault. The following factors supported the court's ruling to admit the testimony: The evidence was not offered on the issue of guilt; the defendant still has an obligation to present truthful testimony; the defendant's statement was made under oath, not based on a hypothetical assumption that defendant was guilty of the crime; and the trial court's willingness to allow the defendant to use leading questions when presenting defendant's sister's testimony. Thus, each of defendant's constitutional rights were protected. People v. Dembry, 91 P.3d 431 (Colo. App. 2003).

Defendant may be compelled to submit to fingerprinting, photographing, or measurements, to write or speak for identification, to appear in court, to stand, to assume a stance, to walk, or to make a particular gesture. The privilege against self-incrimination is a bar against compelling communications or testimony; but that compulsion which makes a suspect or accused the source of real or physical evidence does not violate it. Sandoval v. People, 172 Colo. 383, 473 P.2d 722 (1970).

Statements made by defendant during booking process regarding possession of marijuana violated fifth amendment privilege and, therefore, were inadmissible. Because defendant made statements to booking officers denying possessing contraband without the benefit of Miranda warnings, the trial court erred in admitting those statements. The statements did not fall under the booking question exception because the questions were unrelated to basic identifying data, nor did the statements fall under the public safety exception because the officer's questions exceeded the scope by asking about items beyond weapons or dangerous instruments. People v. Allen, 199 P.3d 33 (Colo. App. 2007).

Evidence of physical facts relating to defendant admissible. The purpose of the provision against self-incrimination is to prevent a man from being compelled to utter words that will incriminate him, and not to exclude all evidence of physical facts relating to defendant. Block v. People, 125 Colo. 36, 240 P.2d 512 (1951), cert. denied, 343 U.S. 978, 72 S. Ct. 1076, 96 L. Ed. 1370, reh'g denied, 344 U.S. 848, 73 S. Ct. 6, 97 L. Ed. 659 (1952).

The provision against self-incrimination is limited to protection against testimonial compulsion, and does not extend to the exclusion of the body as evidence when such evidence may be relevant and material. Vigil v. People, 134 Colo. 126, 300 P.2d 545 (1956); LaBlanc v. People, 161 Colo. 274, 421 P.2d 474 (1966).

Such as tattoos. There was no error in allowing a police officer to testify concerning his examination of the defendant's arm and to describe the tattoo he found. The examination in question was not violative of the prohibition against compulsory self-incrimination, and testimony concerning the examination is admissible if relevant and material. LaBlanc v. People, 161 Colo. 274, 421 P.2d 474 (1966).

Results of physical examination. The admission of testimony based upon a physical examination is not violative of the constitutional immunity against self-incrimination. Vigil v. People, 134 Colo. 126, 300 P.2d 545 (1956).

Results of roadside sobriety test. The privilege against self-incrimination does not extend to the results obtained from a roadside sobriety test. Such a test does not contravene the privilege by requiring the subject to divulge any knowledge he might have; the fact that the subject's guilt may be inferred from the results of the test goes to the probity of the testing method, not to its character as a supposed confession surrogate. People v. Ramirez, 199 Colo. 367, 609 P.2d 616 (1980).

Miranda warnings are not required before the administration of a roadside sobriety test. People v. Helm, 633 P.2d 1071 (Colo. 1981).

Motion pictures of defendant. In a proceeding to determine whether defendant was driving under the influence of intoxicating liquors, a motion picture that is taken without the defendant's consent and shows his refusal to submit to tests does not violate defendant's constitutional rights against self-incrimination. Lanford v. People, 159 Colo. 36, 409 P.2d 829 (1966); People v. Ramirez, 199 Colo. 367, 609 P.2d 616 (1980).

Photographs. The taking of photographs of a suspect does not involve his privilege against self-incrimination. Sandoval v. People, 172 Colo. 383, 473 P.2d 722 (1970).

And business records. Seizure of business records does not violate defendant's privilege against self-incrimination because defendant was not "compelled" to produce the papers; the papers are not communicative in nature; the papers are business records of which others must have knowledge, rather than personal and private writings; and the papers are instrumentalities of the crime with which defendant is charged. People v. Tucci, 179 Colo. 373, 500 P.2d 815 (1972).

Withdrawal of blood and use of analysis in case does not involve compulsion to testify against one's self, or otherwise provide the state with evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature. People v. Brown, 174 Colo. 513, 485 P.2d 500 (1971), appeal dismissed, 404 U.S. 1007, 92 S. Ct. 671, 30 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1972).

Because blood tests are not testimony of the defendant, the nonconsensual withdrawal of a blood sample does not violate the defendant's protection against self-incrimination. People v. Duemig, 620 P.2d 240 (Colo. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 971, 101 S. Ct. 2048, 68 L. Ed. 2d 350 (1981).

Admission of blood alcohol test is not barred by this section. Block v. People, 125 Colo. 36, 240 P.2d 512 (1951), cert. denied, 343 U.S. 978, 72 S. Ct. 1076, 96 L. Ed. 1370, reh'g denied, 344 U.S. 848, 73 S. Ct. 6, 97 L. Ed. 659 (1952).

Where the defendant was charged with causing injury while driving under the influence of intoxicating liquor, the trial court correctly denied the motion to suppress the blood sample where the defendant was in a semiconscious condition and was unable to consent or to refuse to give his consent. People v. Fidler, 175 Colo. 90, 485 P.2d 725 (1971).

Since breath tests are not testimony of defendant, nonconsensual test does not violate defendant's protection against self-incrimination. People v. Bowers, 716 P.2d 471 (Colo. 1986).

A refusal to take a blood or breath test when a police officer has lawfully requested it is not compelled testimony entitled to protection under the Colorado Constitution. Cox v. People, 735 P.2d 153 (Colo. 1987).

Mere fact that witness observed the defendant at a hearing in which the defendant gave immunized testimony does not constitute a use of that testimony in violation of the right not to incriminate oneself. Defendant could have been compelled to appear before the witness and to speak even in the absence of the grant of immunity since the right does not extend to non-testimonial actions. People v. Reali, 895 P.2d 161 (Colo. App. 1994).

Allowing prosecution to use notices of alibi for impeachment when defendant testified inconsistently with the information contained in such notices did not violate defendant's fifth amendment rights. People v. Lowe, 969 P.2d 746 (Colo. App. 1998).

Prearraignment mental examination of accused does not of itself violate his privilege against self-incrimination any more than the taking of a statement from him constitutes a per se violation. Early v. People, 142 Colo. 462, 352 P.2d 112, cert. denied, 364 U.S. 847, 81 S. Ct. 90, 5 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1960).

Plea of not guilty by reason of insanity not compulsory incrimination. Since a defendant can offer evidence of his insanity as bearing upon his ability to form criminal intent, he is not compelled to enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, and hence there is no basis for holding his election to do so as compulsory incrimination. Castro v. People, 140 Colo. 493, 346 P.2d 1020 (1959).

Commitment for observation and examination after insanity plea does not violate section. Confinement of a defendant, who urges the defense of insanity, in a hospital for observation and examination does not offend against this section. Ingles v. People, 92 Colo. 518, 22 P.2d 1109 (1933).

An accused who submits to the procedures prescribed by statute in connection with criminal insanity cannot at the same time claim that he is being compelled to testify against himself. No change in the matter of incarceration and observation is provided by the procedure save from jail to hospital, and such incarceration and examination does not violate defendant's constitutional exemption from testifying against himself. Wymer v. People, 114 Colo. 43, 160 P.2d 987 (1945); Castro v. People, 140 Colo. 493, 346 P.2d 1020 (1959).

And defendant may refuse to cooperate in examinations after pleading insanity. A person accused of a crime who enters a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity cannot be compelled to carry on conversations against his will under the penalty of forfeiture of the defense for failure to respond to questions, or for a refusal to "cooperate" with persons appointed to examine him. The procedures prescribed by statute to be followed upon the entry of a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity cannot operate to destroy the constitutional safeguards against self-incrimination. French v. District Court, 153 Colo. 10, 384 P.2d 268 (1963).

Section 16-8-107 (1.5)(a) does not violate the privilege against self-incrimination. The only permissible use of statements made during a sanity examination is to determine whether a defendant was capable of forming a culpable mental state. People v. Herrera, 87 P.3d 240 (Colo. App. 2003).

Information produced at psychiatric commitment hearing not usable in criminal proceedings. No information produced at a hearing on involuntary short-term certification for psychiatric treatment, unless available to the people from other sources, can be used to incriminate the person sought to be committed in future criminal proceedings. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

Prosecution may not elicit defendant's incriminating admissions from his psychiatrist. The prosecution may not call as a witness in its case-in-chief a psychiatrist privately retained by the defendant in connection with an insanity plea and elicit from the psychiatrist incriminating admissions made by the defendant during a sanity examination. People v. Rosenthal, 617 P.2d 551 (Colo. 1980).

This reasoning applies with equal force to communications made by indigent defendants to court-appointed psychiatrists pursuant to § 16-8-108 (1). People v. Roark, 643 P.2d 756 (Colo. 1982).

Counseling for abusive men for defendant arrested on domestic violence charges and alcohol-related misdemeanors as a condition of bond implicates defendant's fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination and the presumption of innocence since such counseling may encourage or even require participants to admit their abusive behavior. Martell v. County Court of Summit County, 854 P.2d

1327 (Colo. App. 1992).

If a court-ordered competency examination is required, the trial court must provide the defendant with adequate safeguards calculated to ensure protection not only of the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination but also such defendant's right to counsel. People v. Branch, 805 P.2d 1075 (Colo. 1991).

Privilege against self-incrimination is option of refusal, not prohibition of inquiry. People v. Austin, 159 Colo. 445, 412 P.2d 425 (1966).

Two-prong test to determine whether statements are compelled by threat of discharge from employment: (1) A person must subjectively believe that he will be fired for asserting his fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination, and (2) that belief must be objectively reasonable under the circumstances. People v. Sapp, 934 P.2d 1367 (Colo. 1997); Hopp & Flesch v. Backstreet, 123 P.3d 1176 (Colo. 2005).

Whether a subjective belief that a person will be terminated from employment for asserting the fifth amendment privilege is objectively reasonable under the circumstances is an issue of law. People v. Sapp, 934 P.2d 1367 (Colo. 1997); Hopp & Flesch v. Backstreet, 123 P.3d 1176 (Colo. 2005).

In order for such a belief to be objectively reasonable, the belief must result from some significant coercive action of the state. People v. Sapp, 934 P.2d 1367 (Colo. 1997); Hopp & Flesch v. Backstreet, 123 P.3d 1176 (Colo. 2005).

The action of the state must be more coercive than that resulting from the general obligation imposed on a witness to give truthful testimony. People v. Sapp, 934 P.2d 1367 (Colo. 1997); Hopp & Flesch v. Backstreet, 123 P.3d 1176 (Colo. 2005).

A person's subjective belief that he will be dismissed from employment for asserting the fifth amendment privilege is not objectively reasonable even though the person was interviewed by three supervising officers who knew that criminal charges might be warranted and did not so advise the person and who searched him and his workstation, with his consent, and held his badge and keys during that search. Such facts do not comprise the level of state coercion necessary to support objective reasonableness. People v. Koverman, 38 P.3d 85 (Colo. 2002).

Nor does an employment policy stating that if an employee is requested to make a statement in the course of an official investigation, the employee shall make full, complete, and truthful statements, support an objectively reasonable fear of termination. People v. Koverman, 38 P.3d 85 (Colo. 2002).

Proper procedure for asserting privilege. The privilege against self-incrimination may not be asserted in advance of the questions actually propounded. The proper procedure is to wait until a question which tends to be incriminating has been asked and then decline to answer. Otherwise the privilege is normally waived when the question is answered. People v. Austin, 159 Colo. 445, 412 P.2d 425 (1966); People in Interest of I.O., 713 P.2d 396 (Colo. App. 1985).

Grant of immunity as extensive as witness' constitutional privilege against self-incrimination allows the state to compel testimony which might otherwise be unattainable. Steinberger v. District Court, 198 Colo. 55, 596 P.2d 755 (1979).

Subject of investigation may not be summoned to testify before grand jury. It is intolerable that one whose conduct is being investigated for the purpose of fixing on him a criminal charge, should, in view of the constitutional mandate of this section, be summoned before a grand jury to testify against himself and furnish evidence upon which he may be indicted. It is a plain violation both of the letter and spirit of the organic law. People v. Clifford, 105 Colo. 316, 98 P.2d 272 (1939); People v. Schneider, 133 Colo. 173, 292 P.2d 982 (1956).

Unless fully warned of privilege. A defendant cannot be called before a grand jury which is investigating suspected offenses unless the putative or focused-on defendant is fully warned of his or her privilege against self-incrimination, and this principle remains true even though the focused-on defendant is not yet formally charged. People v. Spencer, 182 Colo. 189, 512 P.2d 260 (1973).

But voluntary appearance and testimony do not violate privilege. The appearance and voluntary testimony by a potential defendant before a grand jury, after being fully advised both of his constitutional rights and that he is the subject of the investigation, is not in violation of the privilege against self-incrimination. People v. Austin, 159 Colo. 445, 412 P.2d 425 (1966).

And persons so testifying chargeable. Under the Colorado rule, voluntary testimony before a grand jury by one who is the subject of the investigation does not in and of itself grant immunity to the witness against a subsequent prosecution, and a charge may be brought by a grand jury against one who, although advised he was a subject of the investigation and warned of the privilege against self-incrimination, appears unsubpoenaed before the grand jury. People v. Austin, 159 Colo. 445, 412 P.2d 425 (1966).

Defendant's mere silence throughout a period of questioning that included two advisements of his rights and written waivers thereof gave no indication that he wished to invoke his right to terminate interrogation. People v. Cooper, 731 P.2d 781 (Colo. App. 1986).

Testimony before grand jury admissible in later perjury trial. Defendants who were not advised of their rights against self-incrimination prior to their grand jury appearance are not entitled to have their testimony before the grand jury suppressed in later perjury prosecution. People v. Spencer, 182 Colo. 189, 512 P.2d 260 (1973).

Since warning applies only to admissions as to past acts. The required warning concerning one's privilege against self-incrimination in a grand jury appearance relates to admissions concerning past acts, and its absence does not grant witnesses the right to commit perjury before the grand jury. People v. Spencer, 182 Colo. 189, 512 P.2d 260 (1973).

Defendant has right to remain silent after arrest. People v. Campbell, 187 Colo. 354, 531 P.2d 381 (1975).

In-custody defendant must be informed of right to remain silent. At the outset, if a person in custody is to be subjected to interrogation, he must first be informed in clear and unequivocal terms that he has the right to remain silent. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966).

Since in-custody questioning jeopardizes privilege against self-incrimination. When an individual is taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom by the authorities in any significant way and is subjected to questioning, the privilege against self-incrimination is jeopardized. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966).

Measures required for in-custody interrogation. Unless other fully effective means are adopted to notify the person of his right of silence and to assure that the exercise of the right will be scrupulously honored, the following measures are required. He must be warned prior to any questioning that he has the right to remain silent, that anything he says can be used against him in a court of law, that he has the right to the presence of an attorney, and that if he cannot afford an attorney, one will be appointed for him prior to any questioning if he so desires. Opportunity to exercise these rights must be afforded to him throughout the interrogation. After such warnings have been given, and such opportunity afforded him, the individual may knowingly and intelligently waive these rights and agree to answer questions or make a statement. But unless and until such warnings and waiver are demonstrated by the prosecution at trial, no evidence obtained as a result of interrogation can be used against him. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966).

Miranda protections must be afforded when the person suspected of criminal conduct is subjected to police interrogation while in custody at the station or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way. Roybal v. People, 178 Colo. 259, 496 P.2d 1019 (1972).

Basis for pronouncement in Miranda was that a defendant should not be convicted by his own words unless he waived the rights that the U.S. supreme court deemed fundamental under the provisions of the fifth and sixth amendments to the United States Constitution. Redmond v. People, 180 Colo. 24, 501 P.2d 1051 (1972).

If defendant wishes to remain silent, interrogation must cease. If an individual indicates in any manner, at any time prior to or during questioning, that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966).

Defendant's brief statement to the arresting officer, after he had been informed of his right to refrain from responding to questions, made as a result of a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of his right to remain silent did not deprive him of his right to refrain from answering any further inquiries. People v. Ortega, 198 Colo. 179, 597 P.2d 1034 (1979).

No interrogation until rights exercised by defendant. Where a defendant is advised of his rights, he cannot be effectively interrogated until given an opportunity to exercise his rights, unless he has knowingly and intelligently waived them. Roybal v. People, 178 Colo. 259, 496 P.2d 1019 (1972).

Periodic repeating of interrogation after refusal to make statement not permitted. When the police are met with a refusal to make any statement during an attempted in-custody interrogation, a periodic repeating of the procedure until the accused finally makes a statement is not permitted. Dyett v. People, 177 Colo. 370, 494 P.2d 94 (1972).

But police are not forever banned from asking defendant further questions. Miranda referred to those cases in which the police refuse to take "no" for an answer and continue to question, harass, cajole, and coerce the defendant in total disregard of his desire to exercise his constitutional right to remain silent but it did not mean that after an accused has once refused to talk to law enforcement officers, they are forever barred from asking the defendant any further questions. Sergent v. People, 177 Colo. 354, 497 P.2d 983 (1972); Dyett v. People, 177 Colo. 370, 494 P.2d 94 (1972).

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966), did not mean that after an accused has once refused to talk to law enforcement officers, the police are forever barred from questioning or talking to the defendant about any phase of the criminal conduct that was charged. People v. Naranjo, 181 Colo. 273, 509 P.2d 1235 (1973).

Every person accused of a crime has the right to remain silent in the face of a criminal accusation. People v. Burress, 183 Colo. 146, 515 P.2d 460 (1973).

What the supreme court condemned in Miranda v. Arizona (384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694, 10 A.L.R.3d 974 (1966)), were those cases in which the police refuse to take "no" for an answer and continue to question, harass, and coerce the defendant to cast aside his desire to exercise his constitutional right to remain silent. People v. Naranjo, 181 Colo. 273, 509 P.2d 1235 (1973).

Miranda rule applies only to custodial interrogation, which means questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way. Walker v. People, 175 Colo. 173, 489 P.2d 584 (1971); People v. Algien, 180 Colo. 1, 501 P.2d 468 (1972); People v. Viduya, 703 P.2d 1281 (Colo. 1985); People v. Kurts, 721 P.2d 1201 (Colo. App. 1986).

The Miranda warning to be given to defendants before confessions elicited will be admissible is required only in those instances where there is investigatory activity being directed against the defendant by state agents. Lewis v. People, 174 Colo. 334, 483 P.2d 949 (1971).

Where a statement made by the defendant was prior to the accusatory stage and was made before he was taken into custody, it does not come under the prohibitions of Miranda. Walker v. People, 175 Colo. 173, 489 P.2d 584 (1971); Yerby v. People, 176 Colo. 115, 489 P.2d 1308 (1971).

Defendant's rights were not violated where she was not in custody or the subject of police interrogation at the time she made statements to Drug Enforcement Administration agents about other drug transactions and agreed to arrange at least one such transaction. People v. Ridley, 872 P.2d 1377 (Colo. App. 1994).

Once a suspect is confronted with custodial interrogation, he is entitled to Miranda warnings. Such requirement is not contingent upon a defendant's actual or presumed knowledge of his rights or on his status but, rather, must be honored in all instances of custodial interrogation. People v. Probasco, 795 P.2d 1330 (Colo. 1990).

In determining whether defendant is in custody for Miranda purposes, objective test should be applied, that is, whether under the circumstances a reasonable man would believe himself to be deprived of his freedom in any significant way. People v. Algien, 180 Colo. 1, 501 P.2d 468 (1972).

Where defendant's driver's license was taken by a police officer and he was instructed to remain in a particular place, each, in itself, a significant deprivation of his liberty, the defendant reasonably believed that, under the circumstances, he was not free to leave if he wished and police questioning of defendant was "custodial interrogation" for purposes of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966); and, in the absence of prior Miranda warnings, defendant's answers may be properly suppressed. People v. Gutierrez, 198 Colo. 118, 596 P.2d 759 (1979).

A trial court's inquiry when considering whether a defendant is in custody for Miranda purposes is limited to an objective assessment whether, under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person in the defendant's position would consider himself to be deprived of his freedom of action to the degree associated with a formal arrest. People v. Matheny, 46 P.3d 453 (Colo. 2002).

Custodial presence not precluded by initially voluntary appearance. That defendant's appearance for a polygraph examination was initially voluntary did not preclude the characterization of his presence thereafter as custodial, and the interrogation as custodial interrogation. People v. Algien, 180 Colo. 1, 501 P.2d 468 (1972).

Miranda warnings to be given before commencement of polygraph examinations. Prudent police practice requires that when polygraph examinations are to be given persons in custody under investigation for suspected criminal conduct, they should be given Miranda warnings before the commencement of such examinations. People v. Algien, 180 Colo. 1, 501 P.2d 468 (1972).

Failure to give defendant a Miranda advisement violated his due process rights and his statements to a counselor at a juvenile detention center about shooting the victim were inadmissible because the counselor was an agent of the state based on an examination of the totality of the circumstances, where the counselor was paid by the state, he was aware that his questioning was likely to elicit an incriminating response, and he was obligated to inform the district attorney of the information he learned. People v. Robledo, 832 P.2d 249 (Colo. 1992).

Circumstances sufficient to constitute custody for Miranda purposes. People v. Algien, 180 Colo. 1, 501 P.2d 468 (1972); People v. Rodriguez, 645 P.2d 857 (Colo. App. 1982); People v. Viduya, 703 P.2d 1281 (Colo. 1985); People v. Jones, 711 P.2d 1270 (Colo. 1986); People v. Wallace, 724 P.2d 670 (Colo. 1986); People v. Kurts, 721 P.2d 1201 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Cleburn, 782 P.2d 784 (Colo. 1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 923, 110 S. Ct. 1959, 109 L. Ed. 2d 321 (1990); People v. Trujillo, 784 P.2d 788 (Colo. 1990); People v. Horn, 790 P.2d 816 (Colo. 1990); People v. Probasco, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990); People v. Polander, 41 P.3d 698 (Colo. 2001).

Subsequent statement not tainted by prior refusal to make statement. When the police fully honor a defendant's refusal to make a statement, the fact of a prior refusal to make any statement should not taint the statement subsequently given voluntarily and with full advisement of rights. Dyett v. People, 177 Colo. 370, 494 P.2d 94 (1972).

Custodial interrogation when person arrested spontaneously changes his mind and volunteers that he wishes to talk does not violate the person's rights. Carroll v. People, 177 Colo. 288, 494 P.2d 80 (1972).

Test for whether a person is in police custody is whether a reasonable person in the suspect's position would consider himself deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way. People v. Cleburn, 782 P.2d 784 (Colo. 1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 923, 110 S. Ct. 1959, 109 L. Ed. 2d 321 (1990); People v. Probasco, 795 P.2d 1324 (Colo. 1990); People v. Dracon, 884 P.2d 712 (Colo. 1994).

Defendant's inculpatory statement was properly suppressed where the police did not give the defendant Miranda warnings and the court found evidence that a reasonable person would have considered himself or herself deprived of freedom of action. The defendant was escorted into his apartment by police officers, other officers searching the apartment initially drew their weapons upon defendant's entrance, the defendant's movement was restricted to sitting on the recliner during the search and questioning, and an officer stood five feet from defendant during the search and questioning. People v. Moore, 900 P.2d 66 (Colo. 1995).

Under the "reasonable person" standard neither the interrogating officer's subjective state of mind nor the suspect's mental state is conclusive on the issue of whether a reasonable person in the situation would have considered the interrogation to be custodial. People v. Trujillo, 785 P.2d 1290 (Colo. 1990); People v. Hamilton, 831 P.2d 1326 (Colo. 1992); People v. Dracon, 884 P.2d 712 (Colo. 1994).

The court must consider the totality of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation in order to determine whether a reasonable person in the suspect's position would consider himself deprived of his freedom of action in a significant way. People v. Probasco, 795 P.2d 1330 (Colo. 1990); People v. Hamilton, 831 P.2d 1326 (Colo. 1992).

The validity of the right to remain silent must be resolved on the basis of the totality of circumstances surrounding a custodial interrogation. People v. Delgado, 832 P.2d 971 (Colo. App. 1991).

Prosecution must prove the validity of a waiver of Miranda rights by a preponderance of the evidence, and a waiver will be valid only if the totality of the circumstances surrounding an interrogation reveal both an uncoerced choice and the requisite level of comprehension on behalf of the suspect. People v. Al-Yousif, 49 P.3d 1165 (Colo. 2002); People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

A person acting as an interpreter must be sufficiently capable of accurately expressing the substance of the suspect's rights. People v. Mejia-Mendoza, 965 P.2d 777 (Colo. 1998); People v. Aguilar-Ramos, 86 P.3d 397 (Colo. 2004); People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Even though suppression order had been based on linguistic as well as cultural barriers, defendant's rudimentary understanding of the rights as read to him or her was sufficient to uphold his or her waiver. People v. Al-Yousif, 49 P.3d 1165 (Colo. 2002).

Every bilingual effort between an officer and a suspect need not be perfect in order to withstand scrutiny. A defendant need only minimally understand that he or she had the right to remain silent and to have counsel present and that anything he or she said could be used against him or her. People v. Aguilar-Ramos, 86 P.3d 397 (Colo. 2004).

Defendant did not make a knowing and intelligent waiver of his Miranda rights because of the combined effects of translator's inadequate translation, substantial miscommunication between parties, and defendant's cultural background and limited intellectual functioning. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Translator did not adequately translate because of her own lack of understanding of the meaning of the rights. Translation was also flawed because translator interrupted defendant, improperly summarized his responses, and did not always effectively explain instructions to him. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Miscommunication demonstrated that parties "frequently had no idea what the other was talking about". Miscommunication between parties took two forms: Interruptions by the interrogating officer and the interpreter, and unresponsive and nonsensical answers by the defendant. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Where defendant was functionally illiterate and had recently emigrated to the United States from a culture that had an entirely different cultural conception of legal disputes, defendant's cultural background and limited intellectual ability contributed to his inability to understand his Miranda rights. People v. Redgebol, 184 P.3d 86 (Colo. 2008).

Factors to be considered in determining the validity of a waiver of the right to remain silent include: (1) The lapse of time between an initial Miranda advisement and any subsequent interrogation; (2) whether the defendant or the interrogating officer initiated the interview; (3) whether and to what extent the interrogating officer reminded the defendant of his rights prior to the interrogation by asking him if he recalled his rights, understood them, or wanted an attorney; (4) the clarity and form of the defendant's acknowledgement and waiver, if any; and (5) defendant's background and experience with the criminal justice system. People v. Delgado, 832 P.2d 971 (Colo. App. 1991).

Defendant with alleged limited command of English knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his right to remain silent through his execution of a written waiver of his rights, his demonstration of his ability to converse in the English language, and the temporal proximity of a subsequent interview to the initial advisement of his rights. People v. Delgado, 832 P.2d 971 (Colo. App. 1991).

Knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of Miranda rights not found where defendant did not in fact understand his rights. Defendant with limited mental capacity, no education, and limited ability in English and Spanish did not understand that he had rights and what those rights were and could not therefore knowingly and intelligently waive those rights. People v. Jiminez, 863 P.2d 981 (Colo. 1993).

Trial court properly admitted defendant's statements into evidence because of defendant's knowing, voluntary, and intelligent waiver. Defendant received thorough advisements in Spanish at every stage, there was no evidence of coercive government conduct, and the different dialect of the translator produced little difficulty. People v. Preciado-Flores, 66 P.3d 155 (Colo. App. 2002).

Knowing and intelligent waiver by developmentally delayed defendant found where: (1) Interrogating officers who initiated interview clearly adivsed defendant of her Miranda rights and reminded her of those rights by asking if she understood them; (2) the clarity and form of defendant's acknowledgment and waiver of rights was satisfactory; and (3) defendant, despite her diminished mental capacity, had adequate mental capacity to make knowing and intelligent waiver. People v. Kaiser, 32 P.3d 480 (Colo. 2001).

Where defendant was detained for ten-minute period after his refusal to talk, during which a police officer at the jail was doing the necessary paper work in order to book him, there was no unreasonableness nor any coercion, direct or indirect, so as to violate his rights. Carroll v. People, 177 Colo. 288, 494 P.2d 80 (1972).

Half-hour delay between defendant's expression of willingness to talk and the arrival of a detective to do the questioning did not violate defendant's rights. Carroll v. People, 177 Colo. 288, 494 P.2d 80 (1972).

The roadside questioning of a motorist detained pursuant to a routine traffic stop does not necessarily constitute "custodial interrogation" for purposes of Miranda warnings. Therefore, statements made prior to the Miranda warnings are admissible. People v. Archuleta, 719 P.2d 1091 (Colo. 1986).

As a general rule, routine traffic stops do not constitute custody for Miranda purposes even though the stop significantly curtails the freedom of action of the driver and the passengers. Given the non-coercive nature of a traffic stop, Miranda protections need not be applied unless the defendant's freedom of action is curtailed to a degree associated with formal arrest. People v. Reddersen, 992 P.2d 1176 (Colo. 2000).

Defendant was not in custody of state agents when he made statements to private security guard who had detained him. People v. Chastain, 733 P.2d 1206 (Colo. 1987).

Officer's request and retention of motorist's driver's license coupled with the instruction to exit the vehicle and stand next to the bridge while the search of the vehicle was conducted do not amount to custody because they are not tantamount to a formal arrest. People v. Stephenson, 159 P.3d 617 (Colo. 2007).

Custody issue is not disposed of by consideration of whether a reasonable police officer might have been imprudent in allowing an individual to leave where officer had reason to believe individual had committed a crime. People v. Sandoval, 736 P.2d 1201 (Colo. 1987).

Custody includes, but is not limited to, the situation in which the defendant is actually placed under arrest. People v. Probasco, 795 P.2d 1330 (Colo. 1990).

The totality of the circumstances could not amount to a finding that there was a custodial interrogation of the defendant on-duty policeman where defendant called for assistance, was asked to sit in his police car and nothing in record supported a claim that the defendant reasonably believed he was suspected of wrongdoing or that officer intended to interrogate him, or that a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have believed his freedom was curtailed in a meaningful way or that he was in custody. People v. Probasco, 795 P.2d 1330 (Colo. 1990).

Whether statement is made voluntarily is not an issue when statement is not made to law enforcement officials or their agents. People v. Bowman, 812 P.2d 725 (Colo. App. 1991).

Defendant should have been advised of his Miranda rights because he was in custody when police officer proceeded to interrogate him after finding pot pipe during valid consensual pat down search. People v. Thomas, 839 P.2d 1174 (Colo. 1992).

Defendant's confession of sexual abuse of child to social worker at alcohol treatment facility which defendant was voluntarily admitted to was not given involuntarily as defendant was not in custody and no advisement of his rights was required. People v. Bowman, 812 P.2d 725 (Colo. App. 1991).

Standards for questioning of suspects by police officers. Police officers are not trained lawyers and the interrogation of suspected felons need not be conducted with the same formality and decorum of a trial. Questioning by police officers of a suspected felon naturally takes the form of leading questions, as upon cross-examination in a trial, but interrogation conducted by third degree methods cannot be tolerated. Romero v. People, 170 Colo. 234, 460 P.2d 784 (1969).

Detective's questioning to elicit incriminating response constituted custodial interrogation. Where detective intended to elicit an incriminating response from the defendant, detective's initial question to the defendant, "Do you know why you are here?", constituted custodial interrogation. People v. Lowe, 200 Colo. 470, 616 P.2d 118 (1980).

Questioning of the defendant while hospitalized following a traffic accident did not constitute custodial interrogation. The trooper's question to defendant in the emergency room regarding whether or not he was the driver of the motorcycle involved in the accident is the type of general question which could have been asked at the accident scene as part of "general on-the-scene questioning as to facts" surrounding the accident. A statement in this context is not violative of the fifth amendment simply because the question was asked at the hospital rather than at the scene of the accident. People v. Milhollin, 751 P.2d 43 (Colo. 1988).

Questioning an inmate concerning an altercation between the inmate and another inmate constituted an on-the-scene investigation rather than an interrogation under Miranda and its progeny. People v. Denison, 918 P.2d 1114 (Colo. 1996).

Instead of the "free to leave" standard, a "restriction" standard is applied when questioning an inmate concerning an offense that was committed while the inmate was incarcerated. Under the "restriction" standard, four factors are to be considered: (1) The language used to summon the individual; (2) the physical surroundings of the interrogation; (3) the extent to which the prisoner is confronted with evidence of guilt; and (4) the additional pressure exerted to detain the prisoner. People v. Denison, 918 P.2d 1114 (Colo. 1996).

Trial court must make specific findings concerning the "totality of circumstances" when there are disputed issues of fact surrounding a confession. People v. Rosales, 911 P.2d 644 (Colo. App. 1995).

When determining voluntariness of a confession, statement by police officer instructing a suspect not to lie may constitute a threat. People v. Rosales, 911 P.2d 644 (Colo. App. 1995).

When detective asked if defendant lived in the home that was being searched and whether there was anything the police needed to know, defendant was not in custody. Police officers asked defendant to sit outside the home with other occupants of the home while officers searched it. When detective questioned defendant, the detective's tone was conversational and his brief questioning was not accusatory. There was no police overreaching or coercion that could have overborne defendant's will. Defendant's incriminating statement, therefore, was made voluntarily, and jury was properly allowed to consider it. People v. Mumford, 275 P.3d 667 (Colo. App. 2010), aff'd, 2012 CO 2, 270 P.3d 953.

A police officer may ask "Do you know what happened?" to parties not in custody. This does not constitute an interrogation but is within the officer's right to gather information relevant to the investigation. People v. Rosales, 911 P.2d 644 (Colo. App. 1995).

The totality of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation, including the defendant's prior confession to the theft to the victim, the fact that the victim called the police while the defendant was present so that the police could deal with the defendant there, and the conversation between the victim and the police officer in the presence of the defendant prior to the interrogation, indicate custodial interrogation. Moreover, the officer's initial question to the defendant, "What's happening here between you and Mr. Worley?", was reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the defendant. People v. Hamilton, 831 P.2d 1326 (Colo. 1992).

Constitutional right may be waived. The right to trial by jury, the right to counsel, the right not to incriminate one's self, and related matters are known as alienable constitutional rights or as rights in the nature of personal privilege for the benefit of the person who may seek their protection. Such rights, whenever assertable, may be waived. Geer v. Alaniz, 138 Colo. 177, 331 P.2d 260 (1958); People v. Bennett, 183 Colo. 125, 515 P.2d 466 (1973).

Where accused knows the general nature of the crime involved, an effective waiver by defendant of his constitutional rights can be made. People v. Weaver, 179 Colo. 331, 500

P.2d 980 (1972).

A defendant may waive his right against self-incrimination if done "knowingly and intelligently". People v. Stephens, 188 Colo. 8, 532 P.2d 728 (1975).

A defendant can waive his privilege against self-incrimination by his conduct before the grand jury. People v. Austin, 159 Colo. 445, 412 P.2d 425 (1966).

Constitutional privilege against self-incrimination can be waived when an accused broadcasts his version of a criminal incident to others and then elects to take the witness stand and explain his conduct in the criminal transaction or in ensuing police investigation. People v. Storr, 186 Colo. 242, 527 P.2d 878 (1974).

At a contempt hearing, attorney's production of documents before the master had a chance to consider whether the fifth amendment privilege might prevent their compelled disclosure constituted a waiver of the privilege. People v. Razatos, 690 P.2d 970 (Colo. 1985).

A suspect may waive the right to remain silent as long as the waiver is knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily made. People v. Delgado, 832 P.2d 971 (Colo. App. 1991).

Factors in determining applicability of Miranda procedural safeguards. The procedural safeguards required by Miranda are triggered only when a suspect is interrogated in a custodial setting. Inquiry should also be made into the voluntariness of statements made. People v. Corley, 698 P.2d 1336 (Colo. 1985).

Finding of waiver must be supported by evidence. Where at the close of an in camera hearing a trial court finds that a confession is voluntary and in compliance with Miranda requirements, that finding of a knowing and intelligent waiver must be supported by the evidence. Quintana v. People, 178 Colo. 213, 496 P.2d 1009 (1972).

Waiver of Miranda rights must be proven by preponderance of evidence. People v. Bowman, 812 P.2d 725 (Colo. App. 1991).

Language of Miranda does not require express declination as an absolute from which, and only from which, a valid waiver of one's constitutional rights can flow. People v. Weaver, 179 Colo. 331, 500 P.2d 980 (1972).

Waiver may be implied. Knowing, intelligent and voluntary waiver of rights on part of accused may be implied from surrounding circumstances where there is no express declination. People v. Reed, 180 Colo. 16, 502 P.2d 952 (1972).

Strong and unmistakable circumstances may establish effective equivalent to express waiver by showing clearly and convincingly that the accused did relinquish his constitutional rights knowingly, intelligently and voluntarily. Roybal v. People, 178 Colo. 259, 496 P.2d 1019 (1972).

The waiver need not be express; strong and unmistakable circumstances may suffice. People v. Stephens, 188 Colo. 8, 532 P.2d 728 (1975).

Miranda requirements satisfied under circumstances by nonverbal waiver. People v. Ferran, 196 Colo. 513, 591 P.2d 1013 (1978).

Voluntary testimony waives privilege. Where a potential defendant appears without subpoena, gives voluntary testimony before a grand jury, answers each question freely and without objection that the answer might tend to incriminate him after being advised of his right not to answer, the privilege against self-incrimination is waived. People v. Austin, 159 Colo. 445, 412 P.2d 425 (1966).

The initial declaration of a defendant when asked his name prior to his arrest--"I'm the one you're looking for"--was noncustodial and voluntarily made, and therefore not subject to the Miranda requirements. Jorgensen v. People, 178 Colo. 8, 495 P.2d 1130 (1972).

Statements freely made to police informant are not the product of any sort of coercion and are admissible. People v. Aalbu, 696 P.2d 796 (Colo. 1985).

Silence by police officer in response to statements made by an arrestee during arrest was not interrogation. Statements by the arrestee were the product of the arrestee's free and unconstrained choice. People v. Sharples, 807 P.2d 590 (Colo. 1991).

But valid waiver will not be presumed simply from silence of accused after warnings are given in in-custody interrogation or simply from the fact that a confession was in fact eventually obtained. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966); Roybal v. People, 178 Colo. 259, 496 P.2d 1019 (1972); People v. Garcia, 690 P.2d 869 (Colo. App. 1984).

Even if defendant were placed under arrest without probable cause, defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to remain silent, and, thus, his second statement to police chief did not require suppression as product of illegal arrest, where probable cause to arrest existed within minutes after arrest and defendant received full and complete Miranda advisement before giving second statement. People v. Koolbeck, 703 P.2d 673 (Colo. App. 1985).

And defendant's refusal to sign written acknowledgment of waiver is not preclusive to knowing and intelligent waiver. People v. Stephens, 188 Colo. 8, 532 P.2d 728 (1975).

Waiver of fifth amendment rights not affected by presence of attorney desiring to meet with defendant. People v. Page, 907 P.2d 624 (Colo. App. 1995).

Broad privilege against self-incrimination announced in Miranda must be carefully confined in its application to the realm of coerced confessions and statements. People v. Ramirez, 119 Colo. 367, 609 P.2d 616 (1980).

Fruit of the poisonous tree. Third-party live-witness testimony is fruit under the poisonous tree doctrine under the fifth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. As such, the "fruits" analysis must be utilized in any case in which the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination is implicated. People v. Briggs, 709 P.2d 911 (Colo. 1985).

Where the attenuation doctrine is invoked to support the admissibility of a witness's evidence that is known to be derived from the "poisonous tree", it must be ascertained whether the relationship between the defendant's involuntary statements and the challenged evidence is so attenuated as to be free from contamination. People v. Briggs, 709 P.2d 911 (Colo. 1985).

The attenuation exception allows the admission of evidence obtained as the fruit of an illegal warrantless search or seizure when the connection between the lawless conduct of the police and the discovery of the challenged evidence has "become so attenuated as to dissipate the taint". People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999).

The proper inquiry is whether any attenuating events intervened between the arrest and the interview. People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999).

In determining whether a witness's extra-judicial statements, testimony, and tape-recorded conversation with the defendant are attenuated from the defendant's involuntary statements such that they are admissible, the trial court shall consider at least: (1) The role played by the defendant's involuntary statements in inducing the witness's cooperation;

(2) the length of time between the involuntary statements and discovery of the challenged evidence; (3) whether the witness was a suspect; (4) the degree of free will exercised by the witness; and (5) the time, place, and manner of all of the questioning of the witness. People v. Briggs, 709 P.2d 911 (Colo. 1985).

Because the fifth amendment of the U.S. Constitution is directly concerned with the introduction of tainted evidence at trial, balancing the factors of flagrancy and purpose of official misconduct against the deterrent effect of the exclusionary rule is not an appropriate consideration to be taken into account by the trial court in consideration. People v. Briggs, 709 P.2d 911 (Colo. 1985).

Whether the agreement between the witness and the state is characterized as a promise of immunity or a grant of immunity is critical to an attenuation analysis, particularly of the free will criterion. Because the consequences of the characterization are different, no per se rule that immunized testimony is never an act of free will can be established. People v. Briggs, 709 P.2d 911 (Colo. 1985).

Even though the witness had been given a conditional promise of immunity, his evidence would have been admissible if it had been demonstrated that the evidence would have been discovered as a matter of course if independent investigations were allowed to proceed. People v. Briggs, 709 P.2d 911 (Colo. 1985).

Even if the attenuation doctrine did not permit the admission of the witness's evidence, such evidence could have been properly admitted if it had been demonstrated, at the suppression hearing, that the evidence would have been inevitably discovered. People v. Briggs, 709 P.2d 911 (Colo. 1985).

When Miranda rights not required to be readvised. Readvisement not required to be given to defendant when subject of interrogation changes because defendant was adequately forewarned that subject matter of interrogation was about to change from sexual assault to armed robbery and there was no evidence of improper police conduct. People v. Longoria, 717 P.2d 497 (Colo. 1986).

Awareness of all possible subjects of questioning in advance of interrogation is not relevant to determining whether suspect voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination. Colo. v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564, 107 S. Ct. 851, 93 L. Ed. 2d 809 (1987).

Even though it is better practice for the police to advise a suspect before each interrogation, there is no categorical constitutional requirement that Miranda warnings must be repeated before every interrogation in order for a suspect to validly waive his Miranda rights. People v. Hopkins, 774 P.2d 849 (Colo. 1989).

Waiver will not automatically be held invalid simply because the advisement was made only by a written document. Miranda warnings need not be given in any particular format so long as they reasonably convey a suspect's rights. People v. Elangnaf, 829 P.2d 484 (Colo. App. 1991).

Fellow inmate of defendant, who gained confidence of defendant and to whom defendant purportedly described crime and asked inmate to kill identifying witness, did not have status of police informant at time of confession so as to violate defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel during critical stage of criminal proceeding, even though inmate had acted as paid informant with regard to other cases. People v. Wieghard, 727 P.2d 383 (Colo. App. 1986).

Tape recording of defendant's conversation with accomplice made without his knowledge in the back of police car did not violate his fifth amendment right against self-incrimination since he was not responding to any sort of police coercion and it was not an interrogation within the meaning of Miranda and its progeny. People v. Palmer, 888 P.2d 348 (Colo. App. 1994).

Defendant's statements to witness who was former police officer was properly admitted into evidence where police involvement was not so extensive as to create an agency relationship between the witness and the police. People v. Topping, 764 P.2d 369 (Colo. App. 1988).

Any evidence that accused was threatened, tricked, or cajoled into waiver will show that the defendant did not voluntarily waive his privilege. Redmond v. People, 180 Colo. 24, 501 P.2d 1051 (1972).

Compulsion to confess, whether induced physically or mentally, vitiates any confession. Lewis v. People, 174 Colo. 334, 483 P.2d 949 (1971).

An officer's comment that the police had found incriminating evidence and that defendant should probably be cooperative did not constitute either a threat or a promise. People v. Bostic, 148 P.3d 250 (Colo. App. 2006).

Defendant's incriminating statement should not have been allowed into evidence where defendant was not advised of his right to an attorney in connection with an independent criminal proceeding. People v. Stamus, 902 P.2d 936 (Colo. App. 1995).

Psychologically coerced statement involuntary. Police officers from an independent investigation had enough evidence to consider defendant as a prime suspect and had probable cause to believe she had committed several burglaries in the apartment building where she lived, but they did not obtain a search warrant for a search of defendant's apartment. Rather, the officers testified defendant had been the victim of a break-in and sexual assault and one of their officers had interviewed defendant concerning that attack. Thus, the officers said they gained admittance on the pretext that they desired to consult defendant further about the unsolved crime against her person. Under the totality of the circumstances the defendant's actions in consenting to a search of her apartment and admissions of criminality made by her were induced by psychological coercion and a promise made to her by the police that she would not be taken to jail. Thus, consent to the search was not freely and voluntarily given nor was the statement made voluntarily. People v. Coghlan, 189 Colo. 99, 537 P.2d 745 (1975).

Evidence of involuntariness. Whether a statement of an accused can be excluded on the ground that it is involuntary generally depends on direct testimony of threats or other coercion or surrounding facts and circumstances which give rise to a conclusion that the statement was involuntary. Castro v. People, 140 Colo. 493, 346 P.2d 1020 (1959).

Where defendant told focus of attention on coconspirator. A Miranda warning was meaningless after the defendant was told that parts of his statement would not be used and that the focus of attention was not upon him, but upon a coconspirator, because with promises of this type that prompt a confession, it is impossible to determine what parts of the confession were truly voluntary and those segments which were, at best, inadmissible. Redmond v. People, 180 Colo. 24, 501 P.2d 1051 (1972).

In camera hearing required on voluntariness. When an objection is properly raised at trial challenging the voluntariness of a confession, the trial court is obligated to conduct an in camera hearing to determine voluntariness, regardless of whether the confession was made to a police officer or to a private individual. Hunter v. People, 655 P.2d 374 (Colo. 1982).

Psychological pressures may render confession involuntary. Psychological as well as physical pressures may be brought to bear on a suspect to induce his confession and under some circumstances may render it involuntary. People v. Freeman, 668 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1983).

Mental disorder of defendant. Taking of statements of defendant who, while mentally ill, approached police officer and confessed to homicide after being advised of his Miranda rights and without any coercion on the part of the police did not violate due process. Colo. v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 107 S. Ct. 515, 93 L. Ed. 2d 473 (1986).

A finding of involuntariness of a statement cannot be supported solely by evidence that the statement was impelled by a serious mental disorder. People v. Rhodes, 729 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1986).

Fact that defendant may have been psychotic when she made inculpatory statements did not render statements involuntary in the absence of showing that statements were induced by coercive police activity. People v. Rhodes, 729 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1986).

The mental condition of the defendant is a relevant consideration in determining whether a defendant effectively waived his Miranda rights. People v. Clements, 732 P.2d 1245 (Colo. App. 1986).

The degree of a person's intoxication is relevant to his mental state and may be pertinent in determining a statement's voluntariness. People v. Rivers, 727 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1986).

Intoxication alone does not automatically render statements involuntary, or invalidate an otherwise valid waiver of Miranda rights. People v. Martin, 30 P.3d 758 (Colo. App. 2000).

It is the defendant's obligation to ask the trial court to reconsider a pretrial suppression ruling based on evidence subsequently adduced at trial. People v. Martin, 30 P.3d 758 (Colo. App. 2000).

Where issue of defendant's intoxication at time of Miranda waiver was not raised at pretrial suppression hearing, and evidence of intoxication presented at trial was not of such quality as to suggest defendant's statements would have been suppressed had the evidence been presented at the suppression hearing, the trial court was not required to reconsider, sua sponte, its earlier denial of the motion to suppress the statements. People v. Martin, 30 P.3d 758 (Colo. App. 2000).

Simply because the defendant became upset when learning of the victim's death was not a sufficient basis for the trial court's conclusion that defendant's statement was involuntary. People v. Smith, 716 P.2d 1115 (Colo. 1986).

Privilege against self-incrimination is not concerned with moral and psychological pressures to confess emanating from sources other than official coercion. Colo. v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 107 S. Ct. 515, 93 L. Ed. 2d 473 (1986).

Where there was no evidence of threats or coercion and where the defendant was adequately advised of the subject matter of the interview at the time of waiver and spoke freely and without reservation, circumstances were sufficient to show knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver. Jones v. People, 711 P.2d 1270 (Colo. 1986).

And the presence or absence of official misconduct as factors in the determination of whether a statement is voluntary must be considered within the totality of the circumstances. People v. Cooper, 731 P.2d 781 (Colo. App. 1986).

Police officers' false representation regarding extent of their knowledge and evidence of defendant's participation in attempted robbery and murder did not make defendant's statement involuntary, absent showing that other aspects of the interrogation were improper. People v. Cooper, 731 P.2d 781 (Colo. App. 1986).

Coercive police activity is a necessary predicate to the finding that a confession is not voluntary. People v. Rhodes, 729 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1986).

Defendant's confession to murder made to county court judge during court appearance after having been fully apprised of his rights was properly admitted in murder trial, even though statements were made subsequent to tainted confession, as second confession was voluntary, where factors which necessitated suppression of tainted confession had dissipated by the time defendant appeared before county court. People v. Freeman, 739 P.2d 856 (Colo. App. 1987).

Mere silence by law enforcement officers as to subject matter of interrogation is not "trickery" sufficient to invalidate suspect's waiver of Miranda rights. Colo. v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564, 107 S. Ct. 851, 93 L. Ed. 2d 809 (1987).

Critical to any finding of involuntariness is the existence of coercive governmental conduct, physical or mental, that plays a significant role in inducing a confession or inculpatory statement. People v. Gennings, 808 P.2d 839 (Colo. 1991).

Trial court erroneously suppressed statements of defendant made to polygraph examiner after polygraph test since, in considering the totality of the circumstances, the examiner's statements to defendant did not constitute coercive police activity and defendant had waived his Miranda rights. People v. Hutton, 831 P.2d 486 (Colo. 1992).

A suspect may waive his right to remain silent as long as the waiver is knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily made. People v. Delgado, 832 P.2d 971 (Colo. App. 1991).

In light of the totality of the circumstances there was no error in the trial court's denial of the motion to suppress the statements of defendant and the record supported a conclusion that the prosecution met its burden of proof to show the validity of the defendant's waiver of his rights by a preponderance of the evidence. The defendant's execution of the written waiver of his rights, his demonstration of his ability to converse in the English language, and the temporal proximity of the subsequent interview to the initial advisement belied his assertion that the waiver was not given knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily. People v. Delgado, 832 P.2d 971 (Colo. App. 1991).

A confession or inculpatory statement will not be deemed involuntary unless there is evidence of some form of coercive governmental action that plays a significant role in inducing the statement. People v. Branch, 805 P.2d 1075 (Colo. 1991).

There need not be evidence of physical abuse or threats directed against the defendant for a confession or inculpatory statement to be deemed involuntary. Subtle forms of psychological coercion, when utilized by a governmental agent, can play a significant role in a court's inquiry into constitutional voluntariness. People v. Branch, 805 P.2d 1075 (Colo. 1991).

Burden of proving waiver is on government. If interrogation continues without the presence of an attorney and a statement is taken, a heavy burden rests on the government to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S.

436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966); Neitz v. People, 170 Colo. 428, 462 P.2d 498 (1969).

The burden of establishing waiver rests upon the people. People v. Stephens, 188 Colo. 8, 532 P.2d 728 (1975).

The burden is upon the people to show attendant circumstances sufficient from which a knowing and intelligent waiver may be implied. Roybal v. People, 178 Colo. 259, 496 P.2d 1019 (1972).

And burden of proof of admissibility of confession is on people. Neitz v. People, 170 Colo. 428, 462 P.2d 498 (1969); People v. Rhodes, 729 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1986).

But it does not require corroboration of witnesses who testify for people on the issue of admissibility, as when the officer is alone with the defendant when a waiver is signed. Neitz v. People, 170 Colo. 428, 462 P.2d 498 (1969).

The prosecution must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that a defendant's confession or inculpatory statement to a governmental agent was voluntarily made before such confession or statement may be admitted into evidence at trial. People v. Branch, 805 P.2d 1075 (Colo. 1991).

When voluntariness of defendant's statement challenged, prosecution must show a preponderance of the evidence that, under the totality of the circumstances, the statement was made voluntarily. People v. Hutton, 831 P.2d 486 (Colo. 1992); People v. Dracon, 884 P.2d 712 (Colo. 1994); People v. Trujillo, 938 P.2d 117 (Colo. 1997).

Exclusion of incriminating statements given without assistance of counsel. Under the holding of Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 84 S. Ct. 1758, 12 L. Ed. 2d 977 (1964), where the investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unsolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect, the suspect has been taken into police custody, the police carry out a process of interrogations that tends itself to eliciting incriminating statements, the suspect has requested and been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer, and the police have not effectively warned him of his absolute constitutional right to remain silent, the accused has been denied the assistance of counsel and no statement elicited by the police during the interogation may be used against him at a criminal trial. Bean v. People, 164 Colo. 593, 436 P.2d 678 (1968); Nez v. People, 167 Colo. 23, 445 P.2d 68 (1968).

If written confession is direct exploitation of prior illegality, it is inadmissible. People v. Algien, 180 Colo. 1, 501 P.2d 468 (1972).

When confession will be admitted. Law enforcement officers in their efforts to solve a murder case, and in the interest of justice, must have a reasonable latitude in arresting and questioning one justifiably suspected, and if in so doing the investigating authorities give proper consideration to the comfort and well-being of the suspected person, and conduct themselves in a manner free from threats, promises, or mistreatment of the suspect, a confession thus secured may be received in evidence, even though it was the result of several extended periods of interrogation of the accused. Romero v. People, 170 Colo. 234, 460 P.2d 784 (1969).

Two-step analysis required to resolve suppression motion based on an allegedly inadequate Miranda advisement: First, the court must determine whether the defendant was adequately warned of his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to counsel; and, second, the court must determine whether the defendant knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived these rights. People v. Chase, 719 P.2d 718 (Colo. 1986).

To be admissible, confession must be voluntary. Castro v. People, 140 Colo. 493, 346 P.2d 1020 (1959); Gallegos v. People, 145 Colo. 53, 358 P.2d 1028 (1960), rev'd on other grounds, 370 U.S. 49, 82 S. Ct. 1209, 8 L. Ed. 2d 325 (1962); Dyett v. People, 177 Colo. 370, 494 P.2d 94 (1972); Gimmy v. People, 645 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1982).

To be admissible, a confession must be free and voluntary; that is, it must not be extracted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight. People v. Pineda, 182 Colo. 385, 513 P.2d 452 (1973); People v. Raffaelli, 647 P.2d 230 (Colo. 1982); People v. Rhodes, 729 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1986); People v. Clements, 732 P.2d 1245 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Bowman, 812 P.2d 725 (Colo. App. 1991).

The trial court did not err in admitting incriminating statements made by defendant subsequent to his indication of a desire to remain silent, where defendant was given a proper warning, knew what his rights were, and then voluntarily waived those constitutional rights. Sergent v. People, 177 Colo. 354, 497 P.2d 983 (1972).

No rule bars the admissibility of a defendant's voluntary incriminating statement made in answer to a question from his friend. No holding of the United States supreme court interdicts such an extrajudicial statement, where there is nothing in the record to indicate that the statement was made in response to any process of interrogation initiated by the police. Washington v. People, 169 Colo. 323, 455 P.2d 656 (1969).

Where the defendant voluntarily and spontaneously made statements as to his willingness to plead guilty on certain conditions to a jailer who, at the time, was engaged in an activity wholly unrelated to the defendant, if the defendant chooses to make such spontaneous declarations as these, nothing is present to bar the people from presenting them to a jury for their consideration. Lewis v. People, 174 Colo. 334, 483 P.2d 949 (1971).

The fact that no advisement form was signed by defendant after the first advisement of his rights, and that defendant did not expressly decline the verbal offer of counsel did not render his statements concerning his dual identity inadmissible where he was not coerced or forced to give the statements and the record reveals the he may not have been responding to interrogation at all but may simply have responded to preliminary statements by the police officer concerning his identification. Duncan v. People, 178 Colo. 314, 497 P.2d 1029 (1972).

The issue of the voluntariness of defendant's statement remains the threshold factor in determining whether that statement can even be offered for purposes of impeachment. People v. Salazar, 44 Colo. App. 242, 610 P.2d 1354 (1980), rev'd on other grounds, 627 P.2d 246 (Colo. 1981).

Statements obtained through promises, threats, violence, or any other improper influence may not be admissible. People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985).

To be admissible in evidence, a confession must be shown to be free and voluntary, made without threats of violence or promises of special consequences, and made without the exertion of improper influences. People v. Bookman, 646 P.2d 924 (Colo. 1982); People v. Smith, 716 P.2d 1115 (Colo. 1986).

Once the requirements for a valid waiver are satisfied, then whether the statement was voluntarily made must be considered. The test of voluntariness, in this context, means that the statement was the product of a rational intellect and a free will and was not the result of any force, threats, promises, or other forms of undue influence that affected the defendant's decision to speak. People v. Chase, 719

P.2d 718 (Colo. 1986).

The goal of the voluntariness inquiry is to determine whether the challenged statement was the product of a rational intellect and a free will. People v. Rhodes, 729 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1986).

To be admissible for any purpose, confessions, admissions, and statements given by a defendant must be voluntary. People v. Amato, 631 P.2d 1172 (Colo. App. 1981); People v. Garcia, 690 P.2d 869 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Kurts, 721 P.2d 1201 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Jensen, 747 P.2d 1247 (Colo. 1987).

Whether an alleged promise by a police detective to keep defendant's girlfriend out of homicide investigation rises to the level of coercion that would render the defendant's confession involuntary is a question of fact for trial court's determination on remand. People v. Sparks, 748 P.2d 795 (Colo. 1988).

The prosecution may not use a defendant's involuntary statement for any purpose at trial. People v. Branch, 805 P.2d 1075 (Colo. 1991).

Confessions, admissions, and statements given by a defendant, unless voluntary, are not admissible for any purpose. People v. Salazar, 44 Colo. App. 242, 610 P.2d 1354 (1980), rev'd on other grounds, 627 P.2d 246 (Colo. 1981).

Confession otherwise admissible is not rendered inadmissible simply because it is oral, and not written. Moore v. People, 164 Colo. 222, 434 P.2d 132 (1967).

When taint of illegal questioning is purged. The taint of initial illegal questioning is purged if sufficient time has passed, if there are sufficient intervening circumstances between the statements, and if there was a valid purpose to the official misconduct which led to the suppression of the earlier statement. People v. Mann, 646 P.2d 352 (Colo. 1982).

However, the United States supreme court in Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 105 S. Ct. 1285, 84 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1985), ruled that a careful and thorough administration of Miranda warnings may cure the condition that rendered the previous unwarned statement inadmissible. People v. Harris, 703 P.2d 667 (Colo. App. 1985).

Reading Miranda rights not necessarily sufficient to purge taint of initial illegal questioning. Simply reading a defendant his Miranda rights is not necessarily sufficient to purge the taint of an initial illegal questioning by breaking the causal chain between that questioning and the statement obtained subsequent to the time the defendant received his Miranda rights. People v. Lowe, 200 Colo. 470, 616 P.2d 118 (1980); People v. Jones, 828 P.2d 797 (Colo. 1992).

But taint of illegal questioning on a written confession is not purged where there was no break in time between the invalid interrogation and the written confession, there was no change in location and no change in persons involved, and police officer's coercive and threatening questions were designed to elicit incriminating statements. People v. Thomas, 839 P.2d 1174 (Colo. 1992).

Police threat to defendant's family relationship operated in a continuum through the interview at which defendant confessed, and nothing occurred that relieved or removed the taint of illegality. Because trial court's finding of fact and conclusion of law that threat had a significant role in inducing defendant's confession is supported by the evidence, trial court's suppression order upheld. People v. Medina, 25 P.3d 1216 (Colo. 2001).

Only if the defendant's initial statement was voluntary in a constitutional sense and his subsequent statements were preceded by a valid waiver of Miranda rights, and were otherwise constitutionally voluntary, would the defendant's subsequent statements be admissible under Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 105 S. Ct. 1285, 84 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1985). People v. Hamilton, 831 P.2d 1326 (Colo. 1992).

Under Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 105 S. Ct. 1285, 84 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1985), a finding of constitutional voluntariness with respect to the defendant's initial and subsequent inculpatory statements is fundamental to a resolution of the constitutional admissibility of those statements. People v. Hamilton, 831 P.2d 1326 (Colo. 1992); People v. Trujillo, 938 P.2d 117 (Colo. 1997).

Admissible statement not invalidated for noncompliance with Crim. P. 5. If a statement is admissible as being in compliance with Miranda supreme court decision, it should not be invalidated because of noncompliance with Crim. P. 5 if the record also shows, as it does here, that there was no studied attempt to avoid taking the defendant before a county judge. People v. Weaver, 179 Colo. 331, 500 P.2d 980 (1972).

Failure to comply with Crim. P. 5 did not result in prejudice to the defendant, inasmuch as the defendant was properly advised as required by Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694, 10 A.L.R.3d 974 (1966), and thereafter chose to make incriminating statements rather than to remain silent. People v. Gilmer, 182 Colo. 96, 511 P.2d 494 (1973).

Rules governing admissibility of confession as outlined in Miranda, are not retrospective in operation. Arthur v. People, 165 Colo. 63, 437 P.2d 41 (1968).

Even though defendant's initial voluntary statements to police officer prior to Miranda warnings were not admissible, defendant's subsequent confession, made after belated Miranda warnings were read to defendant, was admissible where there was no evidence that either the environment or the manner of the initial interrogation was coercive, and, although belated, the reading of defendant's rights was complete and was repeated three times. People v. Harris, 703 P.2d 667 (Colo. App. 1985).

The absence of a Miranda warning does not require the suppression of a statement given by the defendant in the presence of the defendant's lawyer. People v. Mounts, 784 P.2d 792 (Colo. 1990).

A defendant's statement which is constitutionally voluntary but which nevertheless has been obtained in violation of procedural safeguards designed to ensure protection of the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination and defendant's right to counsel may not be used by the prosecution as substantive evidence in its case-in-chief but may be used to impeach the defendant's testimony at trial. People v. Branch, 805 P.2d 1075 (Colo. 1991).

When a defendant does not testify, the defendant's voluntary, unwarned custodial statements may not be used either to rebut the defendant's theory of defense or to impeach a witness other than the defendant. People v. Trujillo, 49 P.3d 316 (Colo. 2002) (following James v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 307 (1990)).

Court must make findings that statements voluntary and admissible. Before a trial court may find that statements to which objections have been made are admissible in evidence, the court must make findings of fact and law that the statements under consideration were voluntarily given with full understanding of the accused's rights. Martinez v. People, 174 Colo. 125, 482 P.2d 375 (1971).

Preferred practice is for the trial judge to make clear and explicit findings as to the voluntariness of a confession at the conclusion of the in-camera hearing. People v. Apple, 186 Colo. 180, 526 P.2d 311 (1974).

Whether or not a confession is voluntary is primarily a question for a trial court. Its admissibility is largely within the discretion of that court, and on review, its ruling will not be disturbed, unless there has been a clear abuse of discretion. Castro v. People, 140 Colo. 493, 346 P.2d 1020 (1959).

Before a criminal defendant's extrajudicial statement is admissible as evidence against him, a trial court must find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was fully informed of his constitutional rights, and that he intelligently and expressly waived them. People v. Vigil, 175 Colo. 373, 489 P.2d 588 (1971).

The question of admissibility is for the court. The jury is not permitted to pass on that question. Gallegos v. People, 145 Colo. 53, 358 P.2d 1028 (1960), rev'd on other grounds, 370 U.S. 49, 82 S. Ct. 1209, 8 L. Ed. 2d 325 (1962); Deeds v. People, 747 P.2d 1266 (Colo. 1987).

Trial court's findings of fact concerning voluntariness shall be given deference by appellate court. People v. Hutton, 831 P.2d 486 (Colo. 1992).

Where a suppression order is based on conclusions that statements were the product of an illegal arrest and of a custodial interrogation not preceded by Miranda warnings, a district court must make sufficient findings of fact and conclusions of law to identify each of the statements at issue and to permit appellate review of its rulings with regard to whether the statements must be suppressed. People v. Haurey, 859 P.2d 889 (Colo. 1993).

And must consider totality of facts and conduct of accused. In passing on whether a statement is voluntary and whether the accused waived his right to counsel, the court must consider and examine the totality of the facts and circumstances of the case, and also the conduct of the accused. Duncan v. People, 178 Colo. 314, 497 P.2d 1029 (1972); People v. York, 189 Colo. 16, 537 P.2d 294 (1975).

The totality of the circumstances is to be considered by the trial court in determining whether a confession is voluntary. Gimmy v. People, 645 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1982); People v. Bookman, 646 P.2d 924 (Colo. 1982); People v. Sandoval, 685 P.2d 215 (Colo. App. 1983); Kwiatkowski v. People, 706 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1985); People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985); People v. Hutton, 831 P.2d 486 (Colo. 1992).

The fact that a statement is made during a polygraph examination does not automatically render it involuntary; rather, the examination is a factor to be considered in determining voluntariness under the circumstances. People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985).

A trial court must consider all of the circumstances surrounding the making of the statement, and the mental condition of the person making the statement at the time the statement is made is one of the factors relevant to the question of voluntariness. People v. Rhodes, 729 P.2d 982 (Colo. 1986).

Under the totality of the facts and circumstances, the defendant's statements were voluntary since the defendant willingly accompanied police officers to the police station where he was reminded of his Miranda rights before each interview and was repeatedly told he was free to leave. People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985); People v. Sandoval, 736 P.2d 1201 (Colo. 1987).

Under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person in defendant's position would not have considered himself deprived of his freedom of action to the degree associated with a formal arrest. People v. Smith, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App.

2010).

In determining whether a confession is voluntary, the totality of the circumstances must be considered, and an appellate court is bound by the trial court's factual findings in that regard when supported by adequate evidence in the record and will not lightly disturb the trial court's findings. People v. Harris, 703 P.2d 667 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Rivers, 727 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1986).

In determining voluntariness, the trial court is required to access the totality of the circumstances surrounding the statement, including the atmosphere and events surrounding the elicitation of the statement, the conduct of the defendant before and during the interrogation, and the defendant's mental condition at the time the statement is made. People v. Clements, 732 P.2d 1245 (Colo. App. 1986).

Term "totality of circumstances" refers to the significant details surrounding and inherent to the interrogation. People v. Hutton, 831 P.2d 486 (Colo. 1992).

Among the circumstances court examines in determining the voluntariness of a confession are: Whether the defendant was in custody; whether the defendant was free to leave; whether the defendant was aware of the situation; whether the police read Miranda rights to the defendant; whether the defendant understood and waived Miranda rights; whether the defendant had an opportunity to confer with counsel or anyone else prior to or during the interrogation; whether the statement was made during the interrogation or volunteered later; whether the police threatened defendant or promised anything directly or impliedly; the method or style of the interrogation; the defendant's mental and physical condition just prior to the interrogation; the length of the interrogation; the location of the interrogation; and the physical conditions of the location where the interrogation occurred. People v. Medina, 25 P.3d 1216 (Colo. 2001).

In analyzing the totality of the circumstances, factors to consider include, but are not limited to: The time interval between the initial Miranda advisement and any subsequent interrogation; whether the defendant or the interrogating officer initiated the interview; whether and to what extent the interrogating officer reminded the defendant of his rights prior to the interrogation by asking him if he recalled his rights, understood them, or wanted an attorney; the clarity and form of the defendant's acknowledgment and waiver, if any; the background and experience of the defendant in connection with the criminal justice system; any language barriers encountered by a defendant; and the defendant's age, experience, education, background, and intelligence. People v. Kaiser, 32 P.3d 480 (Colo. 2001).

The totality of the circumstances test is applied in People v. Lesko, 701 P.2d 638 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Lytle, 704 P.2d 331 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Robinson, 713 P.2d 1333 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Pearson, 725 P.2d 782 (Colo. 1986); People v. Jensen, 747 P.2d 1247 (Colo. 1987); People v. Bowman, 812 P.2d 725 (Colo. App. 1991); People v. Dracon, 884 P.2d 712 (Colo. 1994); People v. Al-Yousif, 49 P.3d 1165 (Colo. 2002); People v. Aguilar-Ramos, 86 P.3d 397 (Colo. 2004).

Including any suggestion of voluntariness from defendant. The premise that the court must proceed to determine voluntariness of defendant's confession independent of any suggestion thereof from the defendant is faulty. Ciccarelli v. People, 147 Colo. 413, 364 P.2d 368 (1961).

Voluntariness of confession induced by promise. Generally, for confessions induced by the promises of private parties to be involuntary, the promises must be made by one with apparent power to perform the promise, such as the prosecuting attorney or one representing him. People v. Amato, 631 P.2d 1172 (Colo. App. 1981).

People bear the burden of showing that incriminating statements are result of fully voluntary action. People v. Allen, 185 Colo. 190, 523 P.2d 131 (1974).

Where the question was whether the defendants' statement to the authorities was voluntary, the burden of proof lies with the people, for it must be shown by the preponderance of the evidence that the statements were made voluntarily. People v. Martinez, 185 Colo. 187, 523 P.2d 120, aff'd, 186 Colo. 225, 526 P.2d 1325 (1974).

Once the issue of voluntariness has been raised, the burden is upon the state to establish that the statement in question was voluntarily given. People v. Salazar, 44 Colo. App. 242, 610 P.2d 1354 (1980), rev'd on other grounds, 627 P.2d 246 (Colo. 1981).

Prosecution must prove by clear and convincing evidence that a defendant voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waived his Miranda rights. People v. Clements, 732 P.2d 1245 (Colo. App. 1986).

Waiver of Miranda rights need only be proven by a preponderance of the evidence. Colo. v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 107 S. Ct. 515, 93 L. Ed. 2d 473 (1986); People v. Sandoval, 736 P.2d 1201 (Colo. 1987).

The burden is on the prosecution to show voluntariness by a preponderance of the evidence. Gimmy v. People, 645 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1982); People v. Raffaelli, 647 P.2d 230 (Colo. 1982); People v. Corley, 698 P.2d 1336 (Colo. 1985); People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985); People v. DeBaca, 736 P.2d 25 (Colo. 1987); Deeds v. People, 747 P.2d 1266 (Colo. 1987); People v. Gennings, 808 P.2d 839 (Colo. 1991); People v. Bowman, 812 P.2d 725 (Colo. App. 1991); People v. Hutton, 831 P.2d 486 (Colo. 1992).

Two-step procedure is proper to resolve issue of voluntariness of confession: First, the trial judge must determine whether the confession is voluntary; and second, if the confession is voluntary and is admitted into evidence, the trial judge should instruct the jury on the weight to be given the confession. People v. Shearer, 181 Colo. 237, 508 P.2d 1249 (1973).

Where the defendant initiates the contact with the police, the resulting promises of leniency do not render the statement involuntary. People v. Mounts, 784 P.2d 792 (Colo. 1990).

Stereotype warning cannot be sole basis of court's determination that statement was voluntary and that the defendant was aware of his rights and waived and relinquished his rights. People v. Moreno, 176, Colo. 488, 491 P.2d 575 (1971).

Question should be considered as to substance rather than form. The question of constitutional inhibition of self-incrimination whether raised by motion or plea should be considered as to its substance rather than its form. People v. Clifford, 105 Colo. 316, 98 P.2d 272 (1939).

Circumstances demonstrating effective waiver of constitutional rights by defendant. Massey v. People, 179 Colo. 167, 498 P.2d 953 (1972); People v. Weaver, 179 Colo. 331, 500 P.2d 980 (1972).

Where officers twice gave defendant complete Miranda warnings after arrest and defendant twice stated he understood his rights yet failed to exercise them, and where confession immediately followed second warning, circumstances were sufficient to show knowing, intelligent and voluntary waiver. People v. Reed, 180 Colo. 16, 502 P.2d 952 (1972).

Where counsel fails to object on direct examination to testimony that may have been a transgression of Miranda, but cross-examines on the subject, there is a waiver. People v. Sanchez, 180 Colo. 119, 503 P.2d 619 (1972).

When statement is reversible error. Even if a statement allowed into evidence can be construed as a violation of the defendant's constitutional right, reversible error exists only under circumstances in which the prosecution directs the attention of the jury to the defendant's silence and uses it as a means of inferring guilt. People v. Key, 185 Colo. 72, 522 P.2d 719 (1974); People v. Benevidez, 679 P.2d 125 (Colo. App. 1984).

Defendant's statement to police made after request for counsel was result of unlawful interrogation, and, since such statement contained the only evidence of an element of the crime (forgery), use of the statement at trial constituted prejudicial error. People v. Johnson, 712 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1985).

Defendant was in custody for Miranda purposes and was exposed to risk of self-incrimination when initially questioned by police officer prior to being advised of Miranda rights and the officer testified that defendant was not free to leave, the undisputed facts do not allow an inference that the defendant was not in custody and the police questioning was reasonably likely to evoke an incriminating response. People v. Harris, 703 P.2d 667 (Colo. App. 1985).

Evidence held sufficient to support finding of voluntary confession. People v. Valencia, 181 Colo. 36, 506 P.2d 743 (1973).

And questioning a suspect over a period of time does not automatically render a statement involuntary. People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985).

But custody alone is not sufficient to render statements involuntary. People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985).

Whether suspect clearly invoked the right to remain silent is determined under a reasonableness standard. Before the police must scrupulously honor a suspect's right to remain silent, the suspect must clearly articulate that right so that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the suspect's words and conduct to mean that the suspect wants to exercise his or her right to cut off further questioning. People v. Arroya, 988 P.2d 1124 (Colo. 1999).

The fact that the subject of the second interrogation is the same as the first has significance only as it bears on the overriding question of whether the defendant's right to cut off questioning at any time was scrupulously honored. People v. Quezada, 731 P.2d 730 (Colo. 1987).

Subsequent statement not tainted by prior refusal to make statement. People v. Quezada, 731 P.2d 730 (Colo. 1987).

Statements made during second interrogation 45 minutes after defendant invoked her right to cut off questioning in first interrogation concerning same crime were admissible where police immediately ceased initial interrogation upon defendant's request, defendant was given sufficient opportunity to assess her interests in making statement, second interrogating officer gave new Miranda warnings, and second officer was unaware of prior invocation of right to cut off questioning. People v. Quezada, 731 P.2d 730 (Colo. 1987).

Requirement that police scrupulously honor suspect's assertion of right to remain silent is independent of requirement that any waiver of rights be knowing, intelligent, and voluntary. People v. Quezada, 731 P.2d 730 (Colo. 1987).

Defendant's statements held properly admitted. Where the trial court made finding supported by the evidence to the effect that defendant's intoxication was not to an extent which would make his statement inadmissible, the jury was properly instructed as to the requirement of voluntariness of a statement, and the defendant did not attempt to introduce evidence as to his intoxication, offered no instruction on the subject, and did not mention the point in the motion for new trial, it was not reversible error to admit defendant's statements. Carroll v. People, 177 Colo. 288, 494 P.2d 80 (1972).

Lengthy conversation about wanting to end the police interview did not show that defendant had stopped agreeing to talk on a voluntary basis or that defendant had invoked the right to remain silent. A reasonable police officer could have understood the statements as an expression of defendant's desire to go home promptly, rather than as an invocation of the right to remain silent. Accordingly, the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion to suppress. People v. Muniz, 190 P.3d 774 (Colo. App. 2008).

Defendant's statements held inadmissable. Once the right to remain silent is clearly articulated, some additional circumstances must occur before police may resume questioning. Merely giving the suspect a short break from the interrogation was insufficient. People v. Arroya, 988 P.2d 1124 (Colo. 1999).

Police threat played a significant role in inducing defendant's statements, rendering those statements involuntary. Trial court found that police conduct calculated to cause defendant to believe that, (1) unless he confessed, detective would cause child to lose his mother and the mother, her child; and (2) if he did confess, mother and child would be together and detective would help defendant be reunited with them. Trial court's findings regarding the existence of the threat, its duration, and effect on the defendant, in light of his emotional and psychological condition, are supported by the evidence. Trial court's conclusion of involuntariness, based on its totality of the circumstances analysis, was justified. People v. Medina, 25 P.3d 1216 (Colo. 2001).

"Public safety" exception to Miranda not applicable where defendant had invoked his constitutional right to remain silent, had been safely in custody for several hours such that there was no immediate necessity to justify the detective's decision not to scrupulously honor defendant's invocation of this right to silence, and there was no exigency in the circumstances surrounding the interrogation. The detective's interrogation was investigatory since his questioning did not relate to an objectively reasonable need to protect the police or the public from any immediate danger. People v. Ingram, 984 P.2d 597 (Colo. 1999).

Police are not forever banned from asking defendant further questions. In determining admissibility of statements obtained after suspect has invoked right of silence, court should consider particular circumstances under which custodial statement was obtained, including the four factors discussed in Michigan v. Mosley, (423 U.S. 96, 96 S. Ct. 321, 46 L. Ed. 2d 313 (1975)). These four factors are to be considered along with any other factor bearing on whether the police fully respected the suspect's right to cut off questioning. People v. Quezada, 731 P.2d 730 (Colo. 1987).

The admissibility of statements obtained after the person in custody has decided to remain silent depends according to Miranda on whether the person's right to cut off questioning was scrupulously honored. People v. Close, 867 P.2d 82 (Colo. App. 1993).

Defendant's prior knowledge of the crime about which he is questioned and the source of that understanding are factors to be considered in the totality of the circumstances surrounding the making of a statement for purposes of determining a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent waiver of Miranda rights. People v. Spring, 713 P.2d 865 (Colo. 1985), rev'd on other grounds, 479 U.S. 564, 107 S. Ct. 851, 93 L. Ed. 2d 809 (1987).

Defendant must be aware of the consequences of making the statement to satisfy the requirement that waiver of Miranda rights must be knowing and intelligent. People v. May, 859 P.2d 879 (Colo. 1993).

When issue in suppression hearing is voluntariness of defendant's statements, trial court should base decision upon fifth and fourteenth amendment analysis of the totality of the circumstances, including the conduct of the police and the defendant's mental condition at the time the statements were made, and not blur legal concepts by considering fourth amendment doctrines regarding the expectation of privacy in telephone conversations. People v. Smith, 716 P.2d 1115 (Colo. 1986); People v. May, 859 P.2d 879 (Colo. 1993).

But in instructing the jury on the issue of voluntariness of a confession, the court need not define the term since the general understanding of the word is clear. Kwiatkowski v. People, 706 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1985).

However, an appellate court may not ignore uncontradicted credible evidence in the record. People v. Cummings, 706 P.2d 766 (Colo. 1985); People v. DeBaca, 736 P.2d 25 (Colo. 1987).

It is proper for the trial court to instruct the jury that, although the defendant's confession had been admitted into evidence, it is the sole prerogative of the jury to determine what weight, if any, is to be given to the confession and any testimony directly related to the confession. Deeds v. People, 747 P.2d 1266 (Colo. 1987).

Review of trial court's finding on voluntariness. A trial court's finding of fact on the voluntariness of a confession will be upheld by the supreme court on review where it is supported by adequate evidence in the record. People v. Raffaelli, 647 P.2d 230 (Colo. 1982); People v. Corley, 698 P.2d 1336 (Colo. 1985); People v. Kurts, 721 P.2d 1201 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Clements, 732 P.2d 1245 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Jensen, 747 P.2d 1247 (Colo. 1987); People v. Bowman, 812 P.2d 725 (Colo. App. 1991).

Admission of oral and written incriminating statements held improper. Nez v. People, 167 Colo. 23, 445 P.2d 68 (1968).

Evidence of prior criminal transactions not admissible where defendant was acquitted of similar act. The doctrine of collateral estoppel prevents the introduction of similar transactions for which a defendant has been acquitted. People v. Arrington, 682 P.2d 490 (Colo. App. 1983).

Evidence from former trial admissible. Defendant's testimony from prior trial at which he was acquitted does not constitute hearsay and is admissible as defendant's statement in his individual capacity. People v. Arrington, 682 P.2d 490 (Colo. App. 1983).

Admission not to be product of illegally obtained statement. The burden is on the prosecution to establish that a tape-recorded statement by the defendant was not the product of the defendant's prior incriminating response, which was illegally obtained. People v. Lowe, 200 Colo. 470, 616 P.2d 118 (1980).

Defendant's statement to police made after request for counsel was result of unlawful interrogation, and, since such statement contained the only evidence of an element of the crime (forgery), use of the statement at trial constituted prejudicial error. People v. Johnson, 712 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1985).

A consent to search is not the type of incriminating statement toward which the fifth amendment is directed. Trial court correctly found that defendant's written consent to search the trailer was voluntary and that the refusal to talk did not extend Miranda protection to his right to give consent to search. People v. Beaver, 725 P.2d 96 (Colo. App. 1986).

Courts have duty to quash indictment based upon testimony which violates defendant's constitutional guarantee against self-incrimination. People v. Schneider, 133 Colo. 173, 292 P.2d 982 (1956).

Jury must determine weight to be given confession. Where the court has admitted the confession in evidence, it is for the jury to determine the weight to which it is entitled, great weight, little weight, or no weight at all, depending upon the circumstances surrounding the making of the confession. Gallegos v. People, 145 Colo. 53, 358 P.2d 1028 (1960), rev'd on other grounds, 370 U.S. 49, 82 S. Ct. 1209, 8 L. Ed. 2d 325 (1962).

Where trial court conducts full in camera hearing to determine whether defendant's confession was voluntary and to ascertain whether defendant was advised of rights afforded him by Miranda v. Arizona and where these issues are resolved against defendant, weight to be given to defendant's confession is properly left to jury. People v. Lovato, 180 Colo. 445, 506 P.2d 361 (1973).

Where a defendant elects neither to testify nor to offer any explanation of the evidence in his own behalf, he cannot later successfully complain upon review that the jurors drew inferences of his guilt which were warranted by the circumstantial evidence. Pooley v. People, 164 Colo. 484, 436 P.2d 118 (1968); Deeds v. People, 747 P.2d 1266 (Colo. 1987).

Not every reference to a defendant's silence mandates reversal; reversible error occurs only if the jury's attention is directed to a defendant's exercise of the right not to testify and defendant's silence is used to infer guilt. People v. Reali, 895 P.2d 161 (Colo. App. 1994).

Fifth amendment error does not occur when the prosecution elicits evidence of and comments upon a defendant's conduct, demeanor, and lack of concern on the night of the crime. The evidence and comments defendant challenged referred not to his silence in the face of police questioning but rather his failure, while speaking to the police, to show concern even for the welfare of his girlfriend. People v. Rogers, 68 P.3d 486 (Colo. App. 2002).

Inferences drawn when defendant fails to testify permissible. Where the defendant does not choose to testify, the jury may draw any reasonable inference of guilt warranted by the evidence in the case. Montoya v. People, 169 Colo. 428, 457 P.2d 397 (1969).

As, in protecting accused against unfair comment, the court is not compelled to limit advocacy or to gag the prosecution in legitimate oral argument covering the evidence and inferences which can be drawn from the evidence. People v. Todd, 189 Colo. 117, 538 P.2d 433 (1975).

But defense shall not call witness, when it is known that witness will claim valid privilege not to testify, for the purpose of impressing upon the jury the fact of the claim of privilege. People v. Dikeman, 192 Colo. 1, 555 P.2d 519 (1976).

And the exercise of privilege against self-incrimination is not evidence to be used in case by any party. People v. Dikeman, 192 Colo. 1, 555 P.2d 519 (1976).

Once the defendant has indicated in any way that he does not wish to answer a question or questions, the interrogating officers have an affirmative and emphatic duty to determine whether the suspect is in fact exercising his privilege against self-incrimination with regard to specific questions or the entire subject from that point forward. People v. Spring, 713 P.2d 865 (Colo. 1985).

So state may not comment on refusal to testify. Comment on the refusal to testify is a remnant of the inquisitorial system of criminal justice, which the constitution outlaws because it is a penalty imposed by courts for exercising a constitutional privilege. It cuts down on the privilege by making its assertion costly. Montoya v. People, 169 Colo. 428, 457 P.2d 397 (1969).

The prosecution cannot comment on or in any way use the silence of the accused as an instrument for inferring or suggesting guilt. People v. Burress, 183 Colo. 146, 515 P.2d 460 (1973); People v. Robles, 183 Colo. 4, 514 P.2d 630 (1973).

At trial the prosecution may not allude to defendant's silence after arrest as indicating a consciousness of guilt, as that would impermissibily penalize the defendant for exercising his privilege against self-incrimination during police custodial interrogation. People v. Campbell, 187 Colo. 354, 531 P.2d 381 (1975).

The defendant was unconstitutionally prejudiced by the district attorney's questioning and closing argument, the composite of which brought forth with clarity for the jury's consideration the fact that he had exercised his right to remain silent when questioned by the police after his arrest. Hines v. People, 179 Colo. 4, 497 P.2d 1258 (1972).

Defendant's assertion that court ruling affected testimonial rights sufficient for review. When a defendant asserts that a ruling of the trial court has affected the exercise of his constitutionally protected testimonial rights, he has alleged prejudice sufficient to seek review of that ruling. People v. Salazar, 44 Colo. App. 242, 610 P.2d 1354 (1980), rev'd on other grounds, 627 P.2d 246 (Colo. 1981).

Such comment reversible error if calculated to influence jury. Any direct, or even indirect, statement concerning a defendant's failure to testify in a criminal proceeding may well constitute reversible error, to be determined by the "true test" of whether the comment, in context, was calculated or intended to direct the attention of the jury to the defendant's neglect or failure to exercise his right to testify in his own behalf. Montoya v. People, 169 Colo. 428, 457 P.2d 397 (1969); People v. Todd, 189 Colo. 117, 538 P.2d 433 (1975).

Improper comment by the prosecution on a defendant's failure to testify constitutes plain error. People v. Ortega, 198 Colo. 179, 597 P.2d 1034 (1979).

If a defendant does not waive or otherwise justify comment by the prosecutor, reversal and a new trial must be ordered when the prosecutor causes the defendant's silence to be highlighted in his closing arguments to the jury. People v. Storr, 186 Colo. 242, 527 P.2d 878 (1974).

Intent to steal being an essential element of proof of the crimes charged, the district attorney's comments were clearly directed to defendant's failure to testify concerning his intent at the time of the transaction and were prejudicial. Montoya v. People, 169 Colo. 428, 457 P.2d 397 (1969).

Factors determinative of whether argument constitutional. Factors which have entered into the determination of whether the prosecution's argument constituted fair comment or an unconstitutional reference to the failure of the accused to testify have been: (1) Whether the comment referred specifically to the defendant's failure to take the stand or to rebut the evidence against him; (2) whether the trial judge, after objection was made, gave a cautionary instruction to the jury to disregard the comments or the remarks relating to the failure of the accused to testify; (3) whether the prosecutorial comments were aggravated or repetitive; (4) whether the defendant was the only person who could refute the evidence which caused the comments to be directly pointed at the accused. People v. Todd, 189 Colo. 117, 538 P.2d 433 (1975).

Where references to silence of defendant are not intentionally designed to provoke adverse inferences of guilt in the minds of the jury, nor so repeated or gross in character as to provoke such inferences of guilt, reversal is not required. People v. Hauschel, 37 Colo. App. 114, 550 P.2d 876 (1976); People v. Nave, 689 P.2d 645 (Colo. App. 1984).

Defendant held not prejudiced by district attorney's remarks. Where the district attorney's remarks are directed toward calling the jury's attention to the sufficiency of the evidence rather than to the defendant's exercise of the right to refrain from testifying, the defendant is not prejudiced. Meader v. People, 178 Colo. 383, 497 P.2d 1010 (1972).

Where the district attorney said of the accused, "He can take the witness stand if he so desires like any other witness in this case", and where the court instructed the jury that the arguments, objections, and statements of counsel were not evidence and should not be considered, the trifling comment that occurred in the heat of trial did not impinge upon the defendant's right to silence and did not constitute reversible constitutional error. People v. Gilkey, 181 Colo. 103, 507 P.2d 855 (1973).

Where the prosecutor's remarks in summation are not reasonably calculated to direct the jury's attention to the defendant's post-arrest silence, there is no violation of the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination. People v. DeHerrera, 697 P.2d 734 (Colo. 1985).

Prosecutor's comments about "uncontradicted" evidence did not impermissibly infringe on defendant's right to remain silent. Prosecutor never referred directly to defendant's failure to testify; the trial court corrected any error with a limiting instruction; and prosecutor abided by court's direction to stop using the word. People v. Gomez, 211 P.3d 53 (Colo. App. 2008).

The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a motion for mistrial when prosecutor's remarks during closing argument referred to defendant's silence. At the time of the silence, defendant was not in custody and there was no interrogation. Any prejudice created by prosecution's remarks did not result in a miscarriage of justice. People v. Richardson, 58 P.3d 1039 (Colo. App. 2002).

Improper allusion to defendant's silence. Not only does a defendant have the right to remain silent, but it is improper for the prosecution to allude to his exercise of that right as indicating a consciousness of guilt. People v. Wright, 182 Colo. 87, 511 P.2d 460 (1973).

Trial testimony as to defendant's silence in custodial interrogation inadmissible. Testimony introduced at trial showing that the defendant refused to answer certain questions while undergoing custodial interrogation by police officers was inadmissible and violated privilege against self-incrimination. People v. Mingo, 180 Colo. 390, 509 P.2d 800 (1973).

Court may properly allow testimony concerning defendant's pre-advisement silence concerning failure to contact authorities to correct discrepancies in documents if defendant testified and the evidence of defendant's pre-advisement silence was elicited in the cross-examination of defendant for credibility purposes. People v. Taylor, 159 P.3d 730 (Colo. App. 2006).

Cross-examination regarding defendant's silence, when considered in light of the direct examination, pointed out that defendant's pre-Miranda phone interview with the detective was inconsistent with defendant's statement that he told her "everything". People v. Davis, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2010).

Police officer's testimony was properly allowed when the officer testified that the defendant slammed the door in the officer's face after the officer identified himself as a police officer because there was no evidence that the officer requested to search the premises before the door was slammed, and commenting on slamming the door cannot be construed to be analogous to prosecutorial comments upon defendant's right to remain silent. People v. Turner, 730 P.2d 333 (Colo. App. 1986).

But testimony as to refusal to sign Miranda forms admissible. Where the defendants did not claim their constitutional rights against self-incrimination but instead talked freely when questioned by police, they could not at their trial object to the introduction of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S. Ct. 1602, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1966), advisement forms which showed that the defendants understood their rights but refused to sign the forms. People v. Trujillo, 186 Colo. 329, 527 P.2d 52 (1974).

Waiver of Miranda rights valid even though advisement on witness statement form contained an inaccurate statement of privilege against self-incrimination at trial. People v. Owens, 969 P.2d 704 (Colo. 1999).

Police testimony as to defendant's oral confession was proper and permissible in all its aspects, where the record indicates that before being questioned the defendant was advised of her complete rights; that she read and signed a rights advisement form; that she understood her rights; that she indicated a willingness to talk; and that she "freely and voluntarily" told the police about her involvement in the crime. People v. Gallegos, 181 Colo. 264, 509 P.2d 596 (1973).

Jury instructions regarding defendant's failure to testify. Jury instructions stating that defendant's failure to testify in a criminal case should not be taken by the jury as evidence of defendant's guilt or innocence is frowned upon when the defendant has objected to the instruction, but it does not constitute prejudicial error. White v. People, 175 Colo. 119, 486 P.2d 4 (1971); People v. Roark, 643 P.2d 756 (Colo. 1982).

It is error to refuse a tendered instruction containing language that the defendant is not compelled to testify and that the fact that he does not cannot be used as an inference of guilt and should not prejudice him in any way. People v. Crawford, 632 P.2d 626 (Colo. App. 1981).

Call of coconspirator to witness stand prejudiced defendant. Where the district attorney was alerted, as was the trial court, that the coconspirator was facing criminal charges and did not intend to testify, he could not have entertained a good faith belief that the coconspirator would testify if called. Thus, calling him appears as a studied attempt to bring to the attention of the jury his refusal to testify and his claim of the "fifth amendment". This staged incident is prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. Absent good faith on the part of the district attorney instructions that the jury disregard the byplay, it is impossible to conclude that such procedure did not have an adverse affect on the rights of the defendant. DeGesualdo v. People, 147 Colo. 426,

364 P.2d 374 (1961).

Attorney of defendant who took stand may not comment on another defendant's silence. In a joint prosecution of two roommates for possession of hashish which has been discovered in a closet shared by them and each contends that the hashish belongs to the other, where one defendant fails to take the stand, the attorney of the defendant who did take the stand cannot comment on the other defendant's silence, for to do so would violate the silent defendant's constitutional rights. Eder v. People, 179 Colo. 122, 498 P.2d 945 (1972).

Where prosecution requests in front of jury that defendant participate in physical demonstration to illustrate the correctness of the prosecution's theory and defendant refuses, the request violates the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination and warrants reversal. Serratore v. People, 178 Colo. 341, 497 P.2d 1018 (1972).

Privilege not violated by prosecution as accessory after fact. Defendant's constitutional privilege against self-incrimination was not violated by prosecution as an accessory after the fact. Such an accessory by definition does not assent to the commission of the principal's crime, and the statute defining the offense did not impose liability upon defendant for his failure to reveal his complicity, but rather for his affirmative acts which constituted the interdicted conduct. Self v. People, 167 Colo. 292, 448 P.2d 619 (1968).

Or by cross-examination of defendant at pretrial suppression hearing. Where no evidence elicited at a pretrial suppression hearing from the defendant compelling him to testify against himself was offered either on direct or cross-examination by the prosecution at defendant's trial and the record did not support the contention by the defendant that trial testimony by police officers was based upon evidence adduced upon his cross-examination at the pretrial suppression hearing, any error in permitting such cross-examination of the defendant was harmless. Dickerson v. People, 179 Colo. 146, 499 P.2d 1196 (1972).

Suppression of statement under use-immunity principle. Where a police officer obtains a statement from a suspect in exchange for his implicit promise not to prosecute her for what she tells him, and the suspect has reasonably and detrimentally relied upon the promise, a remedy that accords substantial justice is to treat the statement as if it has been obtained pursuant to a grant of use-immunity. The statement must be suppressed under the use-immunity principle, as well as any evidence derived directly or indirectly from the statement. People v. Manning, 672 P.2d 499 (Colo. 1983).

Defendant who introduces a statement as part of his or her case-in-chief cannot later claim that that same statement, or portions thereof, if being used by the prosecution, was admitted in violation of Miranda. People v. Grant, 174 P.3d 798 (Colo. App. 2007).

Once a criminal defendant demonstrates that he has been compelled to testify under a grant of use immunity, the prosecution is prohibited from using the compelled testimony in any respect and the prosecution has the duty to prove that evidence it proposes to use is derived from an independent source. People v. Reali, 895 P.2d 161 (Colo. App. 1994).

A waiver of the right to remain silent resulting from an election to testify must be made by the defendant personally and must be made voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently if it is to be effective. People v. Mozee, 723 P.2d 117 (Colo. 1986).

The absence of an on-the-record advisement and determination of waiver before the defendant testifies will not automatically render a defendant's waiver invalid. People v. Mozee, 723 P.2d 117 (Colo. 1986).

Failure of court to advise defendant that he could testify despite his attorney's advice did not require reversal of conviction where defendant stated on the record that his waiver of the right to testify was made freely and voluntarily. People v. Woodard, 782 P.2d 1212 (Colo. App. 1989).

Trial court is not required to ask the defendant personally, on the record, whether he wishes to waive his right to testify as long as competent evidence exists to support the trial court's determination that the defendant has effectively waived his right to testify. Roelker v. People, 804 P.2d 1336 (Colo. 1991).

Right to testify on own behalf. An accused in a criminal trial has the right to testify in his own behalf even in the face of contrary advice from his attorney. People v. Palmer, 631 P.2d 1160 (Colo. App. 1981).

The defendant has a constitutionally protected right to testify on his own behalf. People v. Curtis, 657 P.2d 990 (Colo. App. 1982), aff'd, 681 P.2d 504 (Colo. 1984).

In deciding as to a waiver of the defendant's right to testify on his own behalf, the defense counsel must be governed by the will of the defendant. People v. Curtis, 657 P.2d 990 (Colo. App. 1982), aff'd, 681 P.2d 504 (Colo. 1984).

Waiver of the right must be voluntary, knowing, and intentional, and the existence of effective waiver should be ascertained by the trial court on the record. People v. Curtis, 681 P.2d 504 (Colo. 1984); People v. Clouse, 859 P.2d 228 (Colo. App. 1992).

However, this holding was given only prospective effect, and, therefore, in trials conducted prior to People v. Curtis it was necessary only to determine from the record whether the waiver was voluntary, knowing, and intentional. People v. Somerville, 703 P.2d 615 (Colo. App. 1985).

Trial court has a duty to determine whether the waiver of the right to testify by the defendant was in fact voluntary, knowing, and intentional. People v. Pietrantonio, 727 P.2d 407 (Colo. App. 1986).

Satisfactory advisement prior to waiver of the right to testify should inform defendant of the right to testify; the fact that this decision is personal; the prosecution's ability to cross-examine the defendant; the fact that prior felony convictions could be disclosed to the jury; the limited purpose for which such prior convictions would be admitted; and the consequences of testifying. People v. Gray, 920 P.2d 787 (Colo. 1996); People v. Ziglar, 45 P.3d 1266 (Colo. 2002).

Failure of the court to give a proper People v. Curtis advisement constitutes reversible error. People v. Gray, 920 P.2d 787 (Colo. 1996).

Requirements of People v. Curtis substantially complied with. People v. Roelker, 780 P.2d 17 (Colo. App. 1989); People v. Whitley, 998 P.2d 31 (Colo. App. 1999); People v. McDaniel, 74 P.3d 454 (Colo. App. 2003).

The right to testify is so fundamental that only the defendant may waive it, and this waiver must be voluntary, knowing, and intentional. People v. Ball, 813 P.2d 759 (Colo. App. 1990).

Defendant who was facing habitual criminal charges received adequate advisement about his right to testify and thus made a knowing, voluntary, and intentional waiver of his right to testify. Defendant was given advisements twice to the effect that he had a right to testify, that nobody could prevent him from testifying, that if he did testify the prosecution was entitled to cross-examine him and ask him about prior felony convictions, and that, if a felony conviction was disclosed to the jury, then the jury could be instructed to consider the felony conviction only as it had bearing on the defendant's credibility. People v. Ball, 813 P.2d 759 (Colo. App. 1990).

Trial court's advisement that was episodic, discursive, and given in colloquial terms but which was not deficient in substance did not constitute a denial of defendant's right to remain silent. People v. Tyler, 854 P.2d 1366 (Colo. App. 1993).

Trial court's advisement that the jury would be instructed to consider the defendant's felony conviction as it bears on the defendant's character was deficient. The evidentiary concept of character and the trait of credibility are substantively different terms when used by the trial court. By using character instead of credibility, the trial court incorrectly advised the defendant of the consequences of testifying at his or her trial. People v. Harding, 104 P.3d 881 (Colo. 2005).

Although a deficient Curtis advisement entitles a defendant to a post-conviction hearing concerning the validity of his waiver of the right to testify, a deficient trial court advisement does not invariably render the defendant's waiver invalid. People v. Blehm, 983 P.2d 779 (Colo. 1999).

A criminal defendant who voluntarily takes the witness stand in his or her own defense waives the fifth amendment protection against incrimination to the extent necessary to permit effective cross-examination. People v. Sallis, 857 P.2d 572 (Colo. App. 1993).

The procedure of conducting a mock cross-examination of defendant outside the presence of the jury was improper. Having waived the protection of the fifth amendment, the defendant should not have the benefit of procedures that are not extended to other witnesses. People v. Sallis, 857 P.2d 572 (Colo. App. 1993).

Proper response to a deficient trial court advisement is a post-conviction hearing concerning the validity of the defendant's waiver of the right to testify. People v. Blehm, 983 P.2d 779 (Colo. 1999); People v. Harding, 17 P.3d 183 (Colo. App. 2000).

Trial record alone was not sufficient to prove that the defendant was fully aware of the impeachment consequences of testifying. People v. Harding, 104 P.3d 881 (Colo. 2005).

Crim. P. 16 part II (b) and (c), do not violate privilege against self-incrimination. People v. District Court, 187 Colo. 333, 531 P.2d 626 (1975).

The court's limiting instruction and surrounding instructions regarding the expert's testimony on the issue of defendant's sanity adequately protected defendant's privilege against self-incrimination. People v. Grenier, 200 P.3d 1062 (Colo. App. 2008).

III. FORMER JEOPARDY.

Law reviews. For note, "Former Jeopardy -- Effect of State's Appeal in Colorado", see 24 Rocky Mt. L. Rev. 94 (1951). For comment on Krutka v. Spinuzzi appearing below, see 36 U. Colo. L. Rev. 581 (1964).

This section protects person against second jeopardy for same offense. Roland v. People, 23 Colo. 283, 47 P. 269 (1896); Davidson v. People, 64 Colo. 281, 170 P. 962 (1918).

This section of the constitution provides that no person may be twice put in jeopardy for the some offense. Menton v. Johns, 151 Colo. 276, 377 P.2d 104 (1962); Krutka v. Spinuzzi, 153 Colo. 115, 384 P.2d 928 (1963); Casias v. People, 160 Colo.

152, 415 P.2d 344, cert. denied, 385 U.S. 979, 87 S. Ct. 523, 17 L. Ed. 2d 441 (1966).

The constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy means that no person shall twice be put in danger of conviction and punishment for the same offense. People v. King, 181 Colo. 439, 510 P.2d 233 (1973).

This section protects not only against a second trial for the same offense but also against multiple punishments for the same offense. People v. Tallwhiteman, 124 P.3d 827 (Colo. App. 2005).

Upon a clear showing of legislative intent, the general assembly is free to authorize multiple punishments based upon the same criminal conduct without offending the double jeopardy clause. In the absence of express legislative authorization, the court must ascertain whether the offenses are sufficiently distinguishable to permit the imposition of multiple punishments. People v. Tallwhiteman, 124 P.3d 827 (Colo. App. 2005).

Double jeopardy protections are accorded retroactive effect because the constitutional guarantee against double jeopardy is significantly different from other procedural guarantees. People v. Allen, 843 P.2d 97 (Colo. App. 1992).

Reviewing court may review double jeopardy claim not raised during trial using the plain error standard. People v. Tillery, 231 P.3d 36 (Colo. App. 2009), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. People v. Simon, 266 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2011).

To establish that the state has imposed multiple punishments in violation of the double jeopardy clause, an individual must demonstrate that: (1) The state has subjected the individual to separate proceedings; (2) the conduct precipitating the separate proceedings consisted of one offense; and (3) the penalties in each of the proceedings may be considered punishment for the purposes of the double jeopardy clause. People v. Coolidge, 953 P.2d 949 (Colo. App. 1997).

Applicable in criminal actions. The double jeopardy clause protects persons against being brought to trial again for the same criminal offense; a defendant is sued in a civil action, he is not "brought to trial" or prosecuted within the meaning of the double jeopardy clause. E.F. Hutton & Co. v. Anderson, 42 Colo. App. 497, 596 P.2d 413 (1979).

Double jeopardy provisions of United States Constitution and Colorado Constitution, which prohibit multiple punishments for the same offense, apply only to criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings. People v. Milton, 732 P.2d 1199 (Colo. 1987).

A civil as well as a criminal sanction constitutes punishment when the sanction as applied in the civil case serves the goals of punishment. People v. Frank, 943 P.2d 28 (Colo. App. 1996).

Two-pronged test to determine whether a statutory forfeiture proceeding is essentially criminal in character for purposes of the double jeopardy clause: (1) Whether general assembly expressly or impliedly indicated a preference for criminal or civil categorization; and, (2) in the event the general assembly did indicate an intent to treat a forfeiture proceeding as civil, whether the statutory scheme is so punitive either in purpose or effect as to negate the legislative intention. People v. Milton, 732 P.2d 1199 (Colo. 1987).

The test for determining whether punishment is criminal or civil for double jeopardy purposes is the test contained in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144 (1966). The seven factors are: (1) Whether the sanction involves an affirmative disability or restraint; (2) whether it has historically been regarded as punishment; (3) whether it comes into play only on a finding of scienter; (4) whether its operation will promote the traditional aims of punishment--retribution and deterrence; (5) whether the behavior to which it applies is already a crime; (6) whether an alternative purpose to which it may rationally be connected is assignable for it; and (7) whether it appears excessive in relation to the alternative purpose assigned. In re Caldwell, 50 P.3d 897 (Colo. 2002); People v. Howell, 64 P.3d 894 (Colo. App. 2002).

The U.S. supreme court emphasized that these factors are to be considered only in relation to the statute on its face, and only the clearest proof will suffice to override legislative intent and transform what has been denominated a civil remedy into a criminal penalty. In re Caldwell, 50 P.3d 897 (Colo. 2002).

To establish the imposition of multiple punishments in violation of prohibition against double jeopardy, an individual must demonstrate that: (1) The state has subjected the individual to separate proceedings; (2) the conduct precipitating the separate proceedings consisted of one offense; and (3) the penalties in each of the proceedings may be considered punishment for the purposes of double jeopardy. People v. Mayes, 981 P.2d 1106 (Colo. App. 1999).

Convictions for two counts of aggravated robbery arising out of the same criminal episode are not multiplicitous. The issue turns on whether two robberies can arise out of a single taking of property. The inquiry then focuses on whether the crime of robbery is intended to protect people or property. If robbery is intended to protect people, a single taking could support multiple convictions if the one item is taken from multiple people with control over the item. The plain language of the robbery statute is ambiguous as to whether it is intended to protect people or property. The common law history of robbery and case law indicates robbery statutes are intended to protect people. Therefore, a single taking can support multiple convictions for robbery if the taking is made in the presence of multiple victims. People v. Borghesi, 66 P.3d 93 (Colo. 2003); People v. Clifton, 74 P.3d 519 (Colo. App. 2003).

No double jeopardy concerns where the trial court committed harmless error by not requiring the prosecution to elect which of the five incidents related to each of the five charges and by giving the jurors the typical unanimity instruction. People v. Quintano, 81 P.3d 1093 (Colo. App. 2003), aff'd, 105 P.3d 585 (Colo. 2005).

Double jeopardy does not apply to an administrative hearing for failure to submit to a breath or blood alcohol test. Such is a remedial sanction, not punishment. People v. Olson, 921 P.2d 51 (Colo. App. 1996).

Characterization of a statute as civil or criminal is not dispositive of whether the penalty imposed pursuant to such section is punishment for purposes of the prohibition against double jeopardy. People v. Olson, 921 P.2d 51 (Colo. App. 1996).

Forfeiture action pursuant to Colorado public nuisance statute is essentially civil in nature and thus does not violate double jeopardy provisions of the constitution. People v. Milton, 732 P.2d 1199 (Colo. 1987).

Forfeiture of money found in defendant's car under the public nuisance statute does not constitute punishment for double jeopardy purposes. The general assembly intended forfeiture proceedings to be civil in nature and its sanctions are primarily directed toward the salutary goal of preventing and terminating the harmful use of property. In addition, the proceedings are not so punitive in form and effect as to render them criminal. People v. Frank, 943 P.2d 28 (Colo. App. 1996).

A lawyer discipline proceeding is not a criminal proceeding and is therefore not a successive criminal prosecution in violation of constitutional protections against double jeopardy. Furthermore, disciplinary sanctions imposed pursuant to lawyer discipline proceeding do not constitute punishment for purposes of the multiple punishment component of double jeopardy since the aim in determining the level of discipline is not punishment but protection of the public. People v. Marmon, 903 P.2d 651 (Colo. 1995); In re Cardwell, 50 P.3d 897 (Colo. 2002).

The fact that statute defines a public nuisance to include every vehicle used in the commission of any felony not otherwise included in the section did not transform forfeiture action into a criminal proceeding subject to double jeopardy provisions. People v. Martin, 732 P.2d 1210 (Colo. 1987).

Using the same prior conviction to enhance or aggravate two different counts does not violate double jeopardy. The prior conviction was used as a sentence enhancer under § 18-9-111 (5)(a.5) and for the purposes of the habitual criminal sentencing statute, but neither is new jeopardy, rather each creates a stiffer penalty. People v. Cross, 114 P.3d 1 (Colo. App. 2004), rev'd on other grounds, 127 P.3d 71 (Colo. 2006).

Protection afforded is not against peril of second punishment, but against being again tried for same offense. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957).

Constitutional prohibitions against twice putting a person in jeopardy relate to retrials for the same offense. People v. Smith, 182 Colo. 228, 512 P.2d 269 (1973).

Concept of jeopardy requires that accused be on trial for the offense charged--that he be present at a judicial proceeding aimed at reaching a final determination of his guilt or innocence. People v. King, 181 Colo. 439, 510 P.2d 333 (1973).

No double jeopardy in probation revocation proceedings. The function of probation revocation proceedings is not to punish a defendant for a new crime. Rather, their purpose is to ascertain an appropriate sentence for an offense of which defendant has already been convicted and for which probation was granted. People v. Preuss, 920 P.2d 859 (Colo. App. 1995).

In the course of probation revocation proceedings, the trial court was authorized to impose any sentence within the range that originally could have been imposed, and had discretion to impose that sentence either concurrently with or consecutively to another sentence. People v. Preuss, 920 P.2d 859 (Colo. App. 1995).

No double jeopardy prohibition was implicated where deferred judgment and sentence was revoked, since the trial court needed only to ascertain the appropriate sentence for the offense to which the defendant had already pleaded guilty. People v. Lopez, 97 P.3d 223 (Colo. App. 2004).

Section 17-22.5-403 (9) does not violate double jeopardy. Defendant was on notice that, under certain circumstances, he or she could be subject to post-release supervision and reincarceration following mandatory parole. Thus, he or she could not have had a legitimate expectation of finality in the sentence announced by the court at sentencing. Therefore, the defendant's double jeopardy rights were not violated when, because of intervening circumstances, the defendant was subject to the additional period of statutorily required supervision. People v. Jackson, 109 P.3d 1017 (Colo. App. 2004).

Provision of this section as to jeopardy needs no construction; it is as plain and clear as language can make it. It means: First, if the jury disagree, that the accused may be tried again upon the charge as if no trial had been had; second, if the judgment be arrested after the verdict, for any reason, that the defendant shall be deemed not to have been in jeopardy, and may be again tried as originally; and, third, if the judgment be reversed for error in law, that then the defendant shall be deemed not to have been in jeopardy, and may be again tried under the information, upon every charge contained in it. Young v. People, 54 Colo. 293, 130 P. 1011 (1913).

State may not proceed contrary to inhibitions of this section. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539, 75 A.L.R.2d 678 (1958).

And dual sovereignty no longer viable. In early cases the courts recognized the concept of dual sovereignty for the purposes of prosecution and punishment of an accused in both a state and municipal court for the same act. The concept of dual sovereignty is no longer viable in Colorado. People v. Horvat, 186 Colo. 202, 527 P.2d 47 (1974).

Dual prosecution for violation of a city ordinance and a state statute based on the same acts constitutes double jeopardy. Vela v. People, 174 Colo. 465, 484 P.2d 1204 (1971).

The fact that a city has the power to legislate does not recognize dual sovereignty or double prosecutions. The determination that there is nothing basically invalid about legislation on the same subject, for example, gambling, by both a home rule city and the state, does not affect the prohibition against double prosecution, nor does it undermine any basic safeguards. Woolverton v. City & County of Denver, 146 Colo. 247, 361 P.2d 982 (1961).

Juveniles entitled to protection against double jeopardy. A juvenile charged with delinquency is entitled to the same constitutional protection against double jeopardy as is a defendant in a criminal case. People in Interest of P.L.V., 176 Colo. 342, 490 P.2d 685 (1971).

Juveniles are entitled to the fundamental protection of the bill of rights in proceedings that may result in confinement or other sanctions, whether the state labels these proceedings "criminal" or "civil". People in Interest of P.L.V., 176 Colo. 342, 490 P.2d 685 (1971).

Collateral estoppel may act as complete bar to subsequent prosecution if the issue previously decided in the defendant's favor would be essential to the case against him on the second charge or if the issue previously decided is not decisive of the outcome in the second prosecution, the doctrine of collateral estoppel accords to the accused the right to claim finality with respect to a fact or group of facts previously determined in his favor. People v. Kernanen, 178 Colo. 234, 497 P.2d 8 (1972).

Collateral estoppel is an integral part of the concept of double jeopardy. Simply stated, collateral estoppel bars relitigation between the same parties of issues actually determined at a previous trial. People v. Horvat, 186 Colo. 202, 527 P.2d 47 (1974).

Application of collateral estoppel. The doctrine of collateral estoppel is applicable if an issue of ultimate fact determined by one court is germane to the determination to be made by a second court and the other prerequisites to the applicability of the doctrine, namely, a valid and final judgment and identity of parties, have been satisfied. People v. Kernanen, 178 Colo. 234, 497 P.2d 8 (1972).

Reprosecution in a second proceeding is barred if an issue previously decided in defendant's favor is essential to the case against him in the later proceeding. People v. Hoehl,

629 P.2d 1083 (Colo. App. 1980).

A party who has pled guilty to a crime in Colorado state court is collaterally estopped from relitigating the elements of that crime in a subsequent civil action. Jiron v. City of Lakewood, 392 F.3d 410 (10th Cir. 2004).

But collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion, does not apply to bar the right of a defendant to a trial where defendant had been charged with the crime of driving with a revoked license, which constituted both a violation of his probation and a new criminal act. Defendant did not have a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the probation revocation hearing. A determination of guilt or innocence in a probation revocation hearing would undermine the function of the criminal trial process. Byrd v. People, 58 P.3d 50 (Colo. 2002).

Probation revocation hearings are held for different purposes, governed by different procedures, and do not protect a defendant's rights as does a criminal trial. Byrd v. People, 58 P.3d 50 (Colo. 2002).

Subsequent prosecution for separate crime not barred. The determination by one district court that defendant was insane at the time of a crime committed within that district does not bar a subsequent prosecution in another district court for a separate crime committed a few hours later within that district. People v. Kernanen, 178 Colo. 234, 497 P.2d 8 (1972).

Trial court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury on two lesser included offenses the defendant requested in a subsequent trial when the defendant was convicted of the lesser included offenses in the previous trial. The trial court adequately instructed the jury on the defendant's theory of the case. Although the trial court did not instruct the jury on the lesser included offenses the defendant requested, the court did instruct the jury on different lesser included offenses that allowed the defendant to argue his theory of the case. People v. Trujillo, 83 P.3d 642 (Colo. 2004).

Prohibition deemed proper proceeding to prevent double jeopardy. Where it appears that defendants were in jeopardy and that a court is about to place them in jeopardy a second time for the same offense, prohibition is the proper proceeding to protect defendants in their constitutional right against being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539 (1958).

Jeopardy is danger of valid judgment. It is not ordinarily necessary that a prior trial shall have resulted in a valid judgment either of conviction or acquittal since it is not the verdict or judgment which places a prisoner in jeopardy. It is sufficient if the prisoner was actually placed in jeopardy in that he was in danger of having a valid judgment pronounced as the result of a trial. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539 (1958).

Jeopardy does not attach for the second time until after some form of judgment, acquittal or dismissal is reached in the first instance. People in Interest of J.A.M., 174 Colo. 245, 483 P.2d, 362 (1971).

Jeopardy does not attach when a charge is dismissed on grounds unrelated to a defendant's criminal liability. Where, prior to the commencement of trial, a charge was dismissed on the basis of a finding of incompetency to stand trial, jeopardy did not attach in such prosecution. Chatfield v. Colo. Court of Appeals, 775 P.2d 1168 (Colo. 1989).

Plea of former jeopardy must be based on former valid proceeding. The lack of any fundamental requisite that would make a verdict and sentence valid, defeats a plea of former jeopardy. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539, 75

Effect of conviction on plea of nolo contendere. For purposes of a criminal proceeding, a conviction on a plea of nolo contendere is equivalent to a conviction on a plea of guilty. Jones v. District Court, 196 Colo. 261, 584 P.2d 81 (1978); People v. Carpenter, 709 P.2d 72 (Colo. App. 1985).

Court of appeals bound by mandate of supreme court that retrial of defendant would not violate prohibition against double jeopardy. People v. Gurule, 699 P.2d 9 (Colo. App. 1984).

When jeopardy attaches. A person is in legal jeopardy when he is put on trial, before a court of competent jurisdiction, on an indictment or information which is sufficient in form and substance to sustain a conviction, and a jury is impaneled and sworn. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957); Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539 (1958); Menton v. Johns, 151 Colo. 276, 377 P.2d 104 (1962); Krutka v. Spinuzzi, 153 Colo. 115, 384 P.2d 928 (1963); People v. Abrahamsen, 176 Colo. 52, 489 P.2d 206 (1971); Maes v. District Court, 180 Colo. 169, 503 P.2d 621 (1972); Espinoza v. District Court, 180 Colo. 391, 506 P.2d 131 (1973); People v. King, 181 Colo. 439, 510 P.2d 333 (1973); People v. Paulsen, 198 Colo. 458, 601 P.2d 634 (1979).

The double jeopardy guaranty is extended through the subsequent prosecution provisions of § 18-1-408. People v. McCormick, 859 P.2d 846 (Colo. 1993).

Where the jury was in the process of being impaneled but had not been sworn to try the issues, the defendant was not place in jeopardy. People v. Abrahamsen, 176 Colo. 52, 489 P.2d 206 (1971).

A plea of guilty to an indictment, in good faith, with its entry on the record, is jeopardy, although judgment is suspended or the prosecution is dismissed without the consent of accused. As against any new charge for the same offense, the defendant may plead the former conviction. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539 (1958).

In a case submitted to the court without a jury, jeopardy begins after accused has been indicted, arraigned, and has pleaded, and the court has begun to hear the evidence, or the trial has begun by the reading of the indictment to the court, assuming that a court has jurisdiction. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539 (1958).

Jeopardy attaches in the prosecution of a criminal case which is tried to the court without a jury at the point where presentation of proof begins after accused has been indicted, arraigned, and has pleaded. McCoy v. District Court, 156 Colo. 115, 397 P.2d 733 (1964).

Jeopardy attaches when the defendant is present at a judicial proceeding aimed at reaching a final determination of his guilt or innocence. People v. Paulsen, 198 Colo. 458, 601 P.2d 634 (1979).

Where the trial had commenced and proceeded until the first witness for the people had been sworn and answered all questions put to him, until he collapsed, the defendant was in jeopardy. McCoy v. District Court, 156 Colo. 115, 397 P.2d 733 (1964).

When both the prosecution and the defense present their cases in full and rest, a defendant is placed in jeopardy. Menton v. Johns, 151 Colo. 276, 377 P.2d 104 (1962); Maes v. District Court, 180 Colo. 169, 503 P.2d 621 (1972).

When a defendant pleads guilty to an offense, jeopardy attaches when the court finally accepts the defendant's plea. Jeffrey v. District Court, 626 P.2d 631 (Colo. 1981); People v. Carpenter, 709 P.2d 72 (Colo. App. 1985).

Jeopardy does not attach until the jury has been impaneled and sworn. People v. Avery, 736 P.2d 1233 (Colo. App. 1986); Barela v. People, 826 P.2d 1249 (Colo. 1992).

In a trial to the court, jeopardy attaches when the first witness is sworn. Barela v. People, 826 P.2d 1249 (Colo. 1992).

In the absence of clear legislative authority for cumulative punishment, the double jeopardy clause prohibits cumulative punishment for convictions under separate statutory provisions that proscribe the same conduct. People v. Dixon, 950 P.2d 686 (Colo. App. 1997).

The issue of legislative authority for cumulative punishment does not arise until it is shown that two statutes apply to the same offense. If each of the offenses requires proof of an element not contained in the other statute, they are not directed to the same conduct for purposes of double jeopardy analysis. People v. Dixon, 950 P.2d 686 (Colo. App. 1997).

The reviewing court is required to examine the record to determine whether the same conduct that constituted the basis for the first prosecution is necessary to establish an essential element charged in a subsequent prosecution. If the record reflects that the entirety of the conduct for which the defendant was convicted in the first prosecution will also be used to establish the elements of the second prosecution, the double jeopardy bar is triggered. People v. Allen, 843 P.2d 97 (Colo. App. 1992).

Determination of whether successive prosecution for same statutory offense is barred by double jeopardy principles involves, first, an examination of the scope of prosecution authorized by the statutory prescription, and, next, an examination of the factual components of each prosecution and the evidence in support thereof. People v. Williams, 651 P.2d 899 (Colo. 1982).

Defendant's federal prosecution under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) and subsequent state conviction for first degree murder for the same incident do not constitute double jeopardy, as the RICO conviction required proof of facts not necessary for the state murder conviction, and the two laws seek to prohibit substantially different evils.People v. Gladney, 250 P.3d 762 (Colo. App. 2010).

Effect of jeopardy to prohibit any further prosecution in the same proceeding. Once jeopardy has attached, any further prosecution in the same proceeding is barred, as is a prosecution for the same offense. Korr v. District Court, 661 P.2d 668 (Colo. 1983); People v. Carpenter, 709 P.2d 72 (Colo. App. 1985).

Sufficiency of plea of former jeopardy or autrefois acquit. To be sufficient in law the plea of autrefois acquit must be based upon the fact that the matter set out in the second indictment or information is such as would be admissible and sustain a conviction, under the first. Dill v. People, 19 Colo. 469, 36 P. 229 (1894); Davis v. People, 22 Colo. 1, 43 P. 122 (1895); Davidson v. People, 64 Colo. 281, 170 P. 962 (1918); Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957).

The plea of autrefois acquit is unavailing unless the charge to which it is interposed is precisely the same in law and fact as the former charge relied on and the evidence required to sustain each is the same. Johnson v. People, 152 Colo. 586, 384 P.2d 454 (1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 922, 84 S. Ct. 682, 11 L. Ed. 2d 617 (1964); Martinez v. People, 174 Colo. 365, 484 P.2d 792 (1971); People v. Smith, 182 Colo. 228, 512 P.2d 269 (1973); People v. Mendoza, 190 Colo. 519, 549 P.2d 766 (1976).

In a prosecution for embezzlement where the time and the sum alleged could have been included in a former prosecution for embezzlement, of which defendant was convicted, a plea of former jeopardy as to the second prosecution is valid. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957).

Indictment must be sufficient to prevent subsequent prosecution. One charged in an indictment must not only be so definitely apprised of the exact nature of the accusation as to adequately prepare and present his defense, but, when convicted or acquitted, to protect himself from further prosecution for the same offense, or double jeopardy, as guaranteed by this section. People v. Warner, 112 Colo. 565, 151 P.2d 975 (1944).

But indictment or information need not plead offense in such detail as to be self-sufficient as bar to further prosecution for the same offense for the judgment constitutes the bar. Howe v. People, 178 Colo. 248, 496 P.2d 1040 (1972).

Effect of material variance between allegations and proof. The allegations and the proof must correspond, and if in some matter essential to the charge there is a discrepancy between the averments and the proof, there is a variance. If the variance is material, as where it misleads accused in making his defense or exposes him to the danger of being again put in jeopardy for the same offense, the variance is fatal to a conviction. Skidmore v. People, 154 Colo. 363, 390 P.2d 944 (1964).

Defense of former jeopardy waivable. "Former jeopardy" is a personal privilege which a defendant may take advantage of or waive as he pleases, and his waiver may be implied from his conduct. Ballensky v. People, 116 Colo. 34, 178 P.2d 433 (1947).

Implied and expressed waiver. A plea of former jeopardy is expressly waived by a defendant's request for a mistrial, or impliedly waived where there is an opportunity to object before the jury is discharged. Worrell v. County Court, 34 Colo. App. 401, 529 P.2d 654 (1974).

Mistrial granted at instance of defendant operates as waiver of the claim of double jeopardy. Worrell v. County Court, 34 Colo. App. 401, 529 P.2d 654 (1974); People v. Bastardo, 191 Colo. 521, 554 P.2d 297 (1976).

Defendant should not be able to challenge a mistrial declaration where defense counsel's willful violation of court order barring defense from alluding to certain facts regarding the victim necessitated the declaration. People v. Owens, 183 P.3d 568 (Colo. App. 2007).

A mistrial, occasioned by the misconduct of the prosecutor in abandoning a line of questioning and releasing the witness, and granted at the instance of and pursuant to a defense motion, did not provide a basis for a claim of double jeopardy upon retrial of the defendant. People v. Baca, 193, Colo. 9, 562 P.2d 411 (1977).

Defense must be made at earliest reasonable time and before trial on the merits begins, usually before arraignment. Ballensky v. People, 116 Colo. 34, 178 P.2d 433 (1947).

The time to raise the defense of former jeopardy is when there is an attempt to punish under both the criminal and the civil proceedings, not when petitioner has not yet been punished for failure to make support payments either by the Colorado court under the uniform reciprocal enforcement of support act, or by the state of California pursuant to its criminal laws. Conrad v. McClearn, 166 Colo. 568, 445 P.2d 222 (1968).

And defense should be presented by special plea to trial court. In re Allison, 13 Colo. 525, 22 P. 820 (1889).

Dual convictions for murder of single victim improper. The rule of lenity prohibits the entry of dual convictions and sentences for felony murder and murder after deliberation when the convictions and sentences are predicated upon the killing of a single victim. People v. Lowe, 660 P.2d 1261 (Colo. 1983); People v. Bartowsheski, 661 P.2d 235 (Colo. 1983); People v. Glover, 893 P.2d 1311 (Colo. 1995).

Convictions for both second degree murder and first degree felony murder may not be entered when there is only one victim. People v. Driggers, 812 P.2d 702 (Colo. App. 1991).

Single act may be offense against two statutes. Briefly stated, the rule is that a single act may be an offense against two statutes; and if each statute requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not, an acquittal or conviction under either statute does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other. People v. Bugarin, 181 Colo. 62, 507 P.2d 875 (1973); People v. Hancock, 186 Colo. 30, 525 P.2d 435 (1974); People v. Mendoza, 190 Colo. 519, 549 P.2d 766 (1976).

More than one felony conviction may, in a proper case, be based upon the same occurrence without running afoul of either federal or state double jeopardy prohibitions. People v. Opson, 632 P.2d 602 (Colo. App. 1980).

The federal and state constitutional guarantees of equal protection and due process as well as guarantees against double jeopardy are not violated even though one course of conduct is proscribed by two different statutes since the legislature unmistakably intended to authorize cumulative punishment under the two statutes. People v. Haymaker, 716 P.2d 110 (Colo. 1986); People v. Powell, 716 P.2d 1096 (Colo. 1986); People v. Schruder, 735 P.2d 905 (Colo. App. 1986). People v. Goodman, 733 P.2d 1204 (Colo. 1987).

And one continuing transaction may contain distinct offenses. Where evidence discloses that defendant robbed a tavern and while in flight shot and killed a police officer, acquittal of the murder does not bar prosecution on the charge of aggravated robbery, the offenses not being the same in law and fact, but separate and distinct crimes even though a part of one continuing criminal transaction. Johnson v. People, 152 Colo. 586, 384 P.2d 454 (1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 922, 84 S. Ct. 682, 11 L. Ed. 2d 617 (1964).

Assault against one man and the alleged assault against another were not "precisely the same in law and in fact", but are "separate and distinct crimes, even though a part of one continuing criminal transaction". People v. Mendoza, 190 Colo. 519, 549 P.2d 766 (1976).

Defendant's possession and distribution convictions were based upon factually distinct conduct and, therefore, not subject to double jeopardy. People v. Flowers, 128 P.3d 285 (Colo. App. 2005).

Colorado has long followed interpretation of federal double jeopardy provision to determine whether two offenses are the same. People v. Bugarin, 181 Colo. 62, 507 P.2d 875 (1973).

"Same offense" standard applies for purposes of the double jeopardy prohibition against successive prosecutions for separate statutory crimes. Double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent prosecution where at least one of the elements of the offense in the second prosecution is different from the elements of the offense in the first prosecution. People v. Allen, 868 P.2d 379 (Colo. 1994); People v. Stenson, 902 P.2d 389 (Colo. App. 1994); People v. Carey, 198 P.3d 1223 (Colo. App. 2008).

A defendant may not be convicted of more than one offense if one offense is a lesser included offense of the other. Armintrout v. People, 864 P.2d 576 (Colo. 1993);

People v. Moore, 877 P.2d 840 (Colo. 1994); People v. Fisher, 904 P.2d 1326 (Colo. App. 1994).

The lesser included offense "merges" into the conviction of the greater offense and the defendant cannot be separately punished for it. Litwinsky v. Zavaras, 132 F. Supp. 2d 1316 (D. Colo. 2001).

In order to determine whether one offense is included in another, the court must compare the elements of the statutes involved. Litwinsky v. Zavaras, 132 F. Supp. 2d 1316 (D. Colo. 2001); People v. Tallwhiteman, 124 P.3d 827 (Colo. App. 2005).

The rule of merger in Colorado treats an offense as lesser included when proof of the essential elements of the greater offense necessarily establishes the elements required to prove the lesser offense. Boulies v. People, 770 P.2d 1274 (Colo. 1989); Armintrout v. People, 864 P.2d 576 (Colo. 1993); Litwinsky v. Zavaras, 132 F. Supp. 2d 1316 (D. Colo. 2001).

Evidence determines identity of offenses. If the evidence which is necessary to support a second indictment was admissible under a former, related to the same crime, and is sufficient if believed by a jury to have warranted a conviction of that crime, the offenses are identical, and a plea of former conviction or acquittal is a bar. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957); Martinez v. People, 174 Colo. 365, 484 P.2d 792 (1971).

The conduct needed to establish the essential elements of criminal trespass and menacing is the same conduct for which defendant was held in contempt and thus the double jeopardy threshold is met. People v. Allen, 843 P.2d 97 (Colo. App. 1992); People v. Watson, 892 P.2d 388 (Colo. App. 1994).

Crime of simple possession is lesser included offense of the crime of possession with the intent to distribute. Conviction of simple possession constitutes double jeopardy. People v. Gilmore, 97 P.3d 123 (Colo. App. 2003).

Aggravated sentence based upon circumstance that was also element of substantive offense is not prohibited by constitution. Aggravated sentence was permissible where defendant's confinement in correctional facility was both element of attempt to introduce contraband into a detention facility and circumstance requiring sentence in the aggravated range under § 18-1-105 (9)(a)(V). People v. Chavez, 764 P.2d 356 (1988).

Sentencing for contempt. When an individual imprisoned for contempt is given a punitive sentence, as opposed to a remedial sentence, the proscriptions against double jeopardy apply. People v. Matheson, 671 P.2d 968 (Colo. App. 1983).

Because the elements of contempt and the elements of the criminal offenses with which the defendant was charged are not the same, the subsequent prosecution of the defendant is not barred. People v. Allen, 868 P.2d 379 (Colo. 1994); People v. Stenson, 902 P.2d 389 (Colo. App. 1994).

Each violation supports separate indictment if not continuous. If a violation of law is not continuous in its nature, separate indictments or informations may be maintained for each violation of the same species of crime. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957).

An acquittal or conviction is no bar to a subsequent indictment for the same offense or the same species of crime, where the latter is alleged to have been committed at a different date from that previously tried, or is a distinct repetition of a prohibited act, even on the same day, unless the offense is continuous. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885

(1957).

A defendant's double jeopardy rights are not violated when the court sentences a defendant to consecutive sentences based on separate incidents involving the same victim. People v. Shepard, 98 P.3d 905 (Colo. App. 2004).

The unit of prosecution for leaving the scene of an accident is the number of accident scenes, not the number of injured victims at those scenes; consequently, where two people were injured at a single accident scene, defendant's conviction on two counts of leaving the scene of an accident violates the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. People v. Arzabala, 2012 COA 99, __ P.3d __.

Double jeopardy violated where statute does not expressly provide that possession in the course of manufacturing a controlled substance is a separately punishable offense, and the offenses are not otherwise sufficiently distinguishable to permit multiple punishment. Patton v. People, 35 P.3d 124 (Colo. 2001).

Distinct elements and evidence allow trial for separate offenses. Double jeopardy does not prevent the state from trying a defendant in county court for driving under the influence when he has previously entered a guilty plea in municipal court to a speeding charge arising from the same incident since the state charge contains elements and requires evidence fully distinct from that required by the municipal prosecution. Blum v. County Court, 631 P.2d 1191 (Colo. App. 1981).

Manufacturing a controlled substance is a lesser included offense of child abuse based on manufacturing a controlled substance. People v. Laurent, 194 P.3d 1053 (Colo. App. 2008) (decided under law in effect prior to 2006 amendment to § 18-6-401 (1)(c)).

But prosecution for part of one offense will bar prosecution for whole where the crime charged and the facts proved constitute but one offense. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957).

Where a continuous offense is charged between specified dates, if any portion of the time covered by the indictment has been used on or applied under a former indictment and has resulted in a conviction, the former conviction is a bar. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957).

If a subsequent prosecution for the same statutory offense requires proof of the same facts upon which a conviction under the first prosecution was based, then the second prosecution would be barred under the "same offense" prohibition of the double jeopardy clause. People v. Williams, 651 P.2d 899 (Colo. 1982).

Distinct repetition of a prohibited act, even on the same day, may constitute a second offense and incur an additional penalty. People v. Williams, 654 P.2d 319 (Colo. App. 1982).

And bar against double jeopardy precludes conviction of offense and lesser included offense where both charges are based on the same criminal transaction; hence, it was error to refuse defendants' tendered instruction which stated that if the jury found the defendants guilty of possession of narcotic drugs for sale, they must find them not guilty of possession of narcotic drugs. People v. Brown, 185 Colo. 272, 523 P.2d 986 (1974); Boulies v. People, 770 P.2d 1274 (Colo. 1989).

A defendant cannot be convicted of an offense which is a lesser included offense of another crime of which he was also convicted. People v. Hancock, 186 Colo. 30, 525 P.2d 435 (1974); People v. Grant, 40 Colo. App. 46, 571 P.2d 1111 (1977); People v. Delgado-Elizarras, 131 P.3d 1110 (Colo. App. 2005).

When defendant is convicted of both a greater and lesser offense, in order to protect the defendant against multiple punishments for the same offense, the conviction of the lesser offense should be vacated and the conviction of the greater offense should be affirmed. People v. Driggers, 812 P.2d 702 (Colo. App. 1991).

When offense deemed lesser included. An offense is lesser included if it is impossible to commit the greater offense without also having satisfied every essential element of the lesser offense. People v. Grant, 40 Colo. App. 46, 571 P.2d 1111 (1977).

When a jury deadlocks on a greater charge but convicts on a lesser included charge, the hung jury rule, not the implied acquittal rule, applies. Thus, retrial of the greater charge does not result in a double jeopardy violation. People v. Aguilar, 2012 COA 181, __ P.3d __.

Because duplicate convictions of reckless endangerment were based on identical acts, they violated defendant's right to be free from double jeopardy. People v. Delgado-Elizarras, 131 P.3d 1110 (Colo. App. 2005).

The crime of sexual assault on a child as part of a pattern of sexual abuse is not a lesser included offense of the crime of sexual assault on a child by one in a position of trust. In addition, neither of these are sentence enhancers for a person convicted of sexual assault on a child. All are separate crimes and each requires proof of facts not required by any of the others. People v. Valdez, 874 P.2d 415 (Colo. App. 1994).

The "pattern" provisions of §§ 18-3-405 (2)(d) and 18-3-405.3 (2)(b) do not violate the double jeopardy protection against multiple punishments. Separate convictions and punishments authorized by the legislature never violate double jeopardy. The general assembly intended to authorize separate convictions for each incident of sexual assault on a child or sexual assault on a child by one in a position of trust and authorized enhanced punishment of each assault that is committed as part of a "pattern of sexual abuse". People v. Simon, 266 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2011).

No double jeopardy violation for imposing sentences under §§ 18-3-405 and 18-3-405.3. Each section required a different element, a pattern of abuse for the first and being in a position of trust for the second, thus, there was no double jeopardy violation. People v. Tillery, 231 P.3d 36 (Colo. App. 2009), aff'd sub nom. People v. Simon, 266 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2011).

Convictions on four separate counts of sexual assault on a child, based upon different types of sexual contact, but not clearly separate incidents, violates constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. Defendant, therefore, received more than one sentence for each single contact, and the charges were multiplicative. People v. Woellhaf, 105 P.3d 209 (Colo. 2005).

For purposes of double jeopardy, the critical factor is whether defendant's aggregate sentence on resentencing is less severe than the original aggregate sentence. Here, although the trial court doubled the length of the original sentence for a single count, the aggregate sentence for all counts was lower so there was no double jeopardy. People v. Woellhaf, 199 P.3d 27 (Colo. App. 2007).

Multiple punishments for two counts of sexual assault on a child by one in a position of trust and for two counts of aggravated incest are barred by double jeopardy. The evidence supported the conclusion that the two types of sexual contact constituted a single factual offense of sexual assault on a child by one in a position of trust and a single factual offense of aggravated incest. People v.

Mintz, 165 P.3d 829 (Colo. App. 2007).

Use and possession of narcotics distinct offenses. Where a single transaction involves two distinct offenses, one grounded on narcotics addiction (use) and the other on possession, a plea of former jeopardy is properly denied. People v. McKenzie, 169 Colo. 521, 458 P.2d 232 (1969).

Possession and sale of marijuana. Possession and sale are directed at different sorts of criminal conduct which may be independently punished. Therefore, the prohibition against double jeopardy is not violated by a conviction for both possession and simple or "soft" sale of marijuana. People v. Bloom, 195 Colo. 246, 577 P.2d 288 (1978).

There is no double jeopardy violation when a conviction for possession of a controlled substance and a conviction for distribution of a controlled substance were each based on a different quantum of drugs. People v. Davis, 2012 COA 1, __ P.3d __.

And, assault with intent to murder and aggravated robbery. The offense of assault with intent to murder requires proof of a specific intent to kill, a fact not necessary to sustain a charge of aggravated robbery. On the other hand, aggravated robbery requires proof of a robbery, a fact not necessary for assault. Therefore, punishment for both of these offenses committed during one course of conduct does not violate the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy for the same offense. People v. Bugarin, 181 Colo. 62, 507 P.2d 875 (1973).

There was no double jeopardy violation for a conviction of sexual assault on a child and a conviction of sexual assault on a child-pattern. Each count was based on an incident that was separated by time and intervening events. People v. Greer, 262 P.3d 920 (Colo. App. 2011).

Conspiracy and crime which is its object are different and distinct offenses. Goddard v. People, 172 Colo. 498, 474 P.2d 210 (1970).

Defendant was not being tried for what is really one offense where the essence of the crime of conspiracy is the illegal agreement or combination, while the essence of the accessory statute establishing guilt equal to that of a principal is to punish for participation in the criminal act. Goddard v. People, 172 Colo. 498, 474 P.2d 210 (1970).

It is not a violation of the double jeopardy provision to be convicted of both aggravated robbery and conspiracy to commit robbery. People v. Rivera, 178 Colo. 373, 497 P.2d 990 (1972).

Defendant charged with assault with a deadly weapon and conspiracy to assault with deadly weapon was not subjected to double jeopardy by conspiracy instruction in combination with accessory instruction. People v. Grass, 180 Colo. 346, 505 P.2d 1301 (1973).

So conviction on conspiracy and acquittal on substantive charge not inconsistent. Conviction on a charge of conspiracy to commit assault to rape was not inconsistent with an acquittal on a substantive charge of assault with intent to commit rape. People v. Walker, 182 Colo. 317, 512 P.2d 1243 (1973).

One conspiracy does not become several when object violates several statutes. Where the conspiracy violated but a single statute, only a single penalty could be imposed, as this section prohibits double punishment for the same crime. People v. Bradley, 169 Colo. 262, 455 P.2d 199 (1969).

Court did not err in failing to merge defendant's aggravated robbery and kidnapping conviction. The sentence enhancer, robbery, is not an element of the kidnapping offense that would require merger. People v. Hogan, 114 P.3d 42 (Colo. App. 2004).

Doctrine of merger required convictions for attempted aggravated robbery to be vacated where separately charged crime of attempted aggravated robbery of each victim was lesser included offense of crime of first-degree assault on each victim. People v. Griffin, 867 P.2d 27 (Colo. App. 1993).

When separate convictions proper for first-degree murder and robbery. Although a separate judgment of conviction for robbery may not simultaneously exist with a judgment of conviction for first-degree murder predicated upon the killing of the robbery victim, there is no such impediment to the entry of both a judgment of conviction for first-degree murder based upon the killing of another after deliberation and a separate judgment of conviction for the robbery of the same victim. People v. Lowe, 660 P.2d 1261 (Colo. 1983); People v. Bartowsheski, 661 P.2d 235 (Colo. 1983).

The defendant's conviction of the greater offense of felony murder, predicated as it is upon his killing of the robbery victim, precludes his simultaneous conviction of the lesser-included offense of robbery. People v. Lowe, 660 P.2d 1261 (Colo. 1983); People v. Bartowsheski, 661 P.2d 235 (Colo. 1983); Boulies v. People, 770 P.2d 1274 (Colo. 1989); People v. Driggers, 812 P.2d 702 (Colo. App. 1991).

Conviction and sentencing for both second degree assault and commission of a violent crime does not constitute double jeopardy. People v. Anaya, 732 P.2d 1241 (Colo. App. 1986), rev'd on other grounds, 764 P.2d 779 (Colo. 1988).

Second degree burglary and second degree sexual assault are not the same offense for purposes of the prohibition against double jeopardy because the elements of the two offenses are different. Childs v. Zavaras, 90 F. Supp. 2d 1141 (D. Colo. 1999).

Acquittal of one criminal offense pleaded as res judicata of another. Where different criminal offenses are separately charged and separately tried, the same evidence being offered in support of each, an acquittal on one can be pleaded as res judicata of the other if the facts found by the jury to acquit on the first are inconsistent with guilt on the trial of the second. Packer v. People, 8 Colo. 361, 8 P. 564 (1885); Crane v. People, 91 Colo. 21, 11 P.2d 567 (1932).

And acquittal bars second trial for same offense set in one or two indictments. Where a judgment of acquittal upon the first count of the information was entered after the jury had been sworn, and the testimony was all in, defendant cannot be convicted of a second count which describes precisely the same offense as the first, simply because it is set out in slightly different verbiage. This is equally true whether the offense is charged in different and wholly independent informations, or is set out in separate counts in one and the same information. Davidson v. People, 64 Colo. 281, 170 P. 962 (1918).

Acquittal constitutes jeopardy. From the time the jury is sworn, the defendant was in jeopardy, and where the trial court granted a motion for judgment of acquittal, even if the court committed reversible error, the defendant could not be retried. People v. Terry, 189 Colo. 177, 538 P.2d 466 (1975).

The provision that if a judgment in a criminal case be reversed for errors of law the accused shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy must be reviewed as of the time of its adoption and construed in the sense in which the framers understood it, and it cannot be deemed to apply in a situation where the people on review by appeal obtain disapproval of a judgment of acquittal in a criminal proceeding, since at the time of its adoption the people did not have the right to appeal in a criminal case. Krutka v. Spinuzzi, 153 Colo. 115, 384 P.2d 928 (1963).

Where a minor child aged 16 was alleged to be a delinquent, grounded on the allegation that he had committed an assault and battery, but at the close of the evidence presented by the people, the court ruled that the evidence presented was not sufficient to sustain the allegations of the petition and entered a judgment of acquittal, on appeal by the people it was held that the case was moot. The minor had been acquitted of the charge contained in the petition and could not again be put in jeopardy for this offense. People in Interest of G.D.K. v. G.D.K., 30 Colo. App. 54, 491 P.2d 81 (1971).

When a defendant's motion for judgment of acquittal on the charge of first degree murder should have been granted, a new trial on the charge of first degree murder would be contrary to the guarantee against double jeopardy. Hervey v. People, 178 Colo. 38, 495 P.2d 204 (1972); People v. Rutt, 179 Colo. 180, 500 P.2d 362 (1972).

Proceedings following granting of motion of acquittal improper. Where the trial court stated that a motion for judgment of acquittal should be granted and then allowed the prosecution a chance to present more evidence in areas in which it was deficient, the further proceedings were a violation of the prohibition against double jeopardy. People v. Meeker, 661 P.2d 1193 (Colo. App. 1982).

Unless erroneous acquittal can be corrected without prejudice. The double jeopardy prohibition should not preclude a trial judge from correcting, during the trial itself, an erroneous ruling on a motion for a judgment of acquittal when no threat of retrial would arise from the correction and the accused has suffered no demonstrable prejudice by reason of the correction. People v. District Court, 663 P.2d 616 (Colo. 1983).

Defendants in Colorado are on notice that a midtrial order granting a motion for judgment of acquittal is not final and is subject to change until the jury is dismissed. Until the jury is dismissed and the judgment of acquittal is final, the defendant has not been subjected to double jeopardy based upon a trial court's reversal of the acquittal. People v. Madison, 176 P.3d 793 (Colo. App. 2007).

Flawed jury verdict as implied acquittal of higher offense. Defendant, who was charged with two counts of first degree murder but who was convicted by a jury, after one juror had consulted a legal dictionary, of the lesser-included offense of second degree murder, could be retried only on two counts of second degree murder and appropriate lesser-included offenses, since the jury verdict, though flawed, constituted an implied acquittal of the higher offense of first degree murder. Niemand v. District Court, 684 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1984).

Double jeopardy does not bar reinstatement of a juvenile delinquency judgment where an intermediate appellate court erroneously reverses the judgment and a higher court later reverses the judgment of the intermediate appellate court. People ex rel. J.G., 97 P.3d 300 (Colo. App. 2004).

Supreme court may reinstate jury verdict. Where a judgment of acquittal was improperly granted by the trial court there is no double jeopardy prohibition against the supreme court reinstating the jury verdict. People v. Rivas, 197 Colo. 131, 591 P.2d 83 (1979).

When an appellate court reverses a trial court's order granting a judgment of acquittal notwithstanding the verdict, it may properly remand the case to the trial court with directions to reinstate the jury verdict without violating the constitutional prohibition against twice placing the defendant in jeopardy for the same offense. People v. Parks, 749 P.2d 417 (Colo. 1988); People v. Madison, 176 P.3d 793 (Colo. App. 2007).

But may not order retrial. When jeopardy has attached and a judgment of acquittal has been granted at the defendant's request following the close of the prosecution's case, the defendant cannot be tried again on the same charge. Retrial is precluded even when the trial court erred as a matter of law in granting the judgment of acquittal. People v. Paulsen, 198 Colo. 458, 601 P.2d 634 (1979).

Where retrial proscribed. The double jeopardy clause proscribes retrial both because a conviction for menacing in a first trial impliedly acquitted the defendant of one of the charges in the new information (a second-degree assault charge) and because the defendant has a legitimate interest in having the charges against him determined by the jury first impaneled to hear his case. Ortiz v. District Court, 626 P.2d 642 (Colo. 1981).

Retrial on habitual criminality barred notwithstanding trial court's erroneous interpretation or application of substantive law in dismissing habitual charges against the defendant where such dismissal occurs after jeopardy attached upon the impaneling and swearing of the jury. People v. Hrapski, 718 P.2d 1050 (Colo. 1986).

Retrial on habitual criminality prohibited. Where habitual criminal counts have been dismissed by the trial court after jeopardy has already attached on substantive charges, this section prohibits a retrial of the defendant on habitual criminality. Appellate review under these circumstances is limited to approval or disapproval of the judgment. People v. Leonard, 673 P.2d 37 (Colo. 1983).

Retrial following mistrial permitted over objection when based on manifest necessity. The double jeopardy clause does not prohibit a retrial of an accused following the declaration of a mistrial over the defendant's objection whenever, in the opinion of the court, taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is a manifest necessity for the act or the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated. People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983); People v. Muniz, 190 P.3d 774 (Colo. App. 2008).

Retrial of first-degree murder charge and lesser-included offenses was not barred by double jeopardy as declaration of mistrial was manifestly necessary. Jury indicated that they had reached a unanimous verdict on only one charge and that they were not making progress towards unanimity on the other two charges, including first degree murder. People v. Richardson, 184 P.3d 755 (Colo. 2008).

Test for retrial applied in People v. Clark, 705 P.2d 1017 (Colo. App. 1985).

Retrial prohibited when first trial's final judgment is favorable to defendant. A retrial on a criminal accusation is prohibited whenever the first trial results in a final judgment favorable to the defendant. People v. Quintana, 634 P.2d 413 (Colo. 1981).

Regardless of character of judgment. The precise character of the trial court's judgment -- whether an improper judgment of dismissal on grounds unrelated to factual guilt or innocence or an acquittal based on an erroneous application of evidentiary standards -- is not determinative of the retrial bar under the Colorado double jeopardy clause. People v. Quintana, 634 P.2d 413 (Colo. 1981).

Motion for acquittal or dismissal. When an order sustains a motion for acquittal or dismissal and discharges a defendant after a trial to a jury, it ends the case, and the defendant can not be again tried for the same offense. Menton v. Johns, 151 Colo. 276, 377 P.2d 104 (1962).

Motion for new trial does not relinquish right to invoke double jeopardy guarantees against retrial of a charge upon which no verdict was returned. Ortiz v. District Court, 626 P.2d 642 (Colo. 1981).

Directed verdict of not guilty equivalent to acquittal. When a court has directed a verdict of not guilty in a criminal case, such directed verdict is equivalent to an acquittal and will support a plea of former jeopardy. Krutka v. Spinuzzi, 153 Colo. 115, 384 P.2d 928 (1963).

As is withdrawal of count. Where the defendant was put in jeopardy upon the first trial for the offense charged in the first count of the information, the action of the trial court in withdrawing that count from the consideration of the jury on account of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction of the offense was equivalent to an acquittal of the defendant. Roland v. People, 23 Colo. 283, 47 P. 269 (1896); Davidson v. People, 64 Colo. 281, 170 P. 962 (1918).

But dismissal entered before jeopardy attaches is not equivalent to acquittal and does not operate to bar a subsequent prosecution for the same offense. People v. Abrahamsen, 176 Colo. 52, 489 P.2d 206 (1971).

Conviction of lesser degree of homicide is acquittal of all higher degrees of that crime, so long as that conviction stands. Young v. People, 54 Colo. 293, 130 P. 1011 (1913).

In test for determining whether jury is unable to reach a unanimous verdict and thus whether a mistrial should be declared, trial court should consider these factors: The jury's collective opinion that it cannot agree; the length of the trial; the complexity of the issues; the length of time the jury has deliberated; whether the defendant has made timely objections to a mistrial; and the effects of exhaustion or coercion on the jury. People v. Schwartz, 678 P.2d 1000 (Colo. 1984).

Mistrial bars retrial unless justified or defendant consented. After jeopardy attaches, if a jury is discharged without returning a verdict, the defendant cannot again be put in jeopardy unless he consented to the discharge or legal necessity required it. Barriner v. District Court, 174 Colo. 447, 484 P.2d 774 (1971); Espinoza v. District Court, 180 Colo. 391, 506 P.2d 131 (1973); Paul v. People, 105 P.3d 628 (Colo. 2005).

Once a defendant is placed in jeopardy, the remaining question is whether there was legal justification to declare a mistrial which in turn prevents a defendant from sustaining a plea of former jeopardy. McCoy v. District Court, 156 Colo. 115, 397 P.2d 733 (1964).

Where trial judge, despite objections of district attorney, erroneously declared a mistrial sua sponte based upon alleged improper conduct of defense counsel in closing argument, second trial was barred by double jeopardy. Espinoza v. District Court, 180 Colo. 391, 506 P.2d 131 (1973).

Where trial judge, despite objections of defense attorney, erroneously declared a mistrial sua sponte because a key staff member resigned, the docket was crowded, and the trial ran longer than was anticipated, second trial was barred by double jeopardy. The court's reasons for declaring a mistrial were not substantial enough to warrant a finding of "manifest necessity". People v. Berreth, 13 P.3d 1214 (Colo. 2000).

It was proper for defense counsel to inquire, on cross-examination, about the witness's prior act of shoplifting, therefore, the trial court was not justified in declaring a mistrial. Without manifest necessity to declare a mistrial, double jeopardy barred retrial. People v. Segovia, 196 P.3d 1126 (Colo. 2008).

No waiver if motion for mistrial is provoked by prosecutorial misconduct which was committed for the purpose of provoking or forcing the defendant to move for a mistrial. People v. Espinoza, 666 P.2d 555 (Colo. 1983).

Court must determine whether the motion was provoked and the standard to be applied is one of overreaching flowing from bad faith or negligence. People v. Baca, 193 Colo. 9, 562 P.2d 411 (1977).

Standard applied in People v. Reyher, 728 P.2d 333 (Colo. App. 1986).

As where prejudicial conduct has occurred which makes it unjust to proceed. People v. Moore, 701 P.2d 1249 (Colo. App.), cert. denied, 706 P.2d 802 (Colo. 1985).

For mistrial to be legally justified, there must be a reasonable objective sought and a substantial purpose attained. It need only be such as could affect, interfere with, retard, or influence to even a slight degree, the administration of honest, fair, even-handed justice to any of the parties. When it appears that such an irregularity prevails and when in the exercise of his judgment, a judge declares a mistrial, he has fairly exercised his judicial discretion and his action is properly and legally justified. McCoy v. District Court, 156 Colo. 115, 397 P.2d 733 (1964).

When defendant's consent to mistrial has no force or validity. A defendant's "consent" to the discharge of the jury and declaration of mistrial has no force or validity where the conditions and assumptions upon which it was based were never legally met, as where the defendant agreed to a future situation of "hopelessly deadlocked", where he had a right to anticipate that the court would follow the usual procedures in discharging a jury, not declare a mistrial based upon hearsay and procedural violations, done off the record and out of court, where no objection to the procedure was possible. Barriner v. District Court, 174 Colo. 447, 484 P.2d 774 (1971).

And failure to object initially to granting of mistrial not consent. When defense counsel initially does not object to the trial court granting a mistrial but changes his mind before the jury is discharged, there is no irretrievable binding consent to a mistrial of waiver or the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. Maes v. District Court, 180 Colo. 169, 503 P.2d 621 (1972).

Although failure to object to discharge of jury returning insufficient verdict deemed consent. Where a jury returned a verdict of guilty of manslaughter without designating whether it was voluntary or involuntary and the defendant made no objection to the discharge of the jury but merely excepted to the verdict and subsequently consented that judgment be entered on the verdict for involuntary manslaughter, which the court declined to do but set aside the verdict because it was insufficient to sustain a judgment, the defendant, by failing to object to the discharge of the jury, must be held to have consented to their discharge and his plea of former jeopardy, interposed in objection to another trial, was properly overruled. Mahany v. People, 31 Colo. 365, 73 P. 26 (1903).

Jury, upon failure to agree, may be discharged without prejudice to another trial. Barriner v. District Court, 174 Colo. 447, 484 P.2d 774 (1971).

Where, upon first trial of defendant jury was unable to reach a verdict, jeopardy did not attach. People v. Garner, 187 Colo. 294, 530 P.2d 496 (1975).

Under the provision of this section which provides that "if the jury disagree the accused shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy", unless it appears that the discretion of the trial court in discharging the jury for failure to agree has been grossly abused, the plea of prior jeopardy, even when properly interposed, will not avail. In re Allison, 13 Colo. 525, 22 P. 820 (1889).

Where a trial is terminated by a deadlocked jury that cannot reach a verdict, reprosecution of an accused is not barred by the double jeopardy doctrine. Ortiz v. District Court, 626 P.2d 642 (Colo. 1981); People v. Cisneros, 665 P.2d 145 (Colo. App. 1983).

"Disagree". Where there was no motion for a mistrial by the district attorney in the last session in open court, no indication of an inability on the part of the jury to agree upon a verdict, and in fact, no juror ever stated in open court that he thought the jury could not agree on a verdict, but the jury was discharged by the bailiff without the jury returning to the courtroom to directly communicate the state of their deliberations to the trail judge, the jury did not "disagree" within the contemplation of that term as used in this section of the constitution. Barriner v. District Court, 174 Colo. 447, 484 P.2d 774 (1971).

Declaration of mistrial for failure to reach verdict discretionary. The declaration of a mistrial because of the inability of the jury to agree upon a verdict lies within the sound discretion of the trial judge. Barriner v. District Court, 174 Colo. 447, 484 P.2d 774 (1971); People v. Schwartz, 678 P.2d 1000 (Colo. 1984).

Prosecution on invalid information does not constitute jeopardy and does not preclude prosecution on a valid information. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539 (1958).

Jeopardy does not attach if an information is insufficient in form and substance to sustain a conviction. People v. Garner, 187 Colo. 294, 530 P.2d 496 (1975).

Where first trial of defendant upon rape charge resulted in a guilty verdict, but verdict was set aside for failure of information to charge defendant with a crime, jeopardy did not attach. People v. Garner, 187 Colo. 294, 530 P.2d 496 (1975).

Nor invalid plea of guilty. A plea of guilty extorted by duress or by fear of mob violence does not place an accused in jeopardy. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539, 75 A.L.R.2d 678 (1958).

A defendant is placed in jeopardy when the defendant is adjudicated and found not guilty by reason of insanity. Such an adjudication is a final judgment in favor of the defendant. A retrial of the defendant is precluded by the double jeopardy clause of the Colorado Constitution even when the trial court erred as a matter of law in granting the judgment of acquittal. People v. Serravo, 823 P.2d 128 (Colo. 1992).

Guilty plea not jeopardy in a continuing proceeding. The rule that a plea of guilty constitutes jeopardy has its proper application and force only as against a new charge for the same crime, and not to a continuing proceeding on the one, original charge. Markiewicz v. Black, 138 Colo. 128, 330 P.2d 539 (1958).

During pendency of appeal, conviction bars new trial. A plea of former jeopardy based on a conviction for the same offense does not depend upon the former conviction being final. A conviction even though not yet final, due to its appeal, should and does afford the defendant with a shield against a second or later prosecution for the same offense while the former action is pending. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957).

An accused under indictment for murder may be tried for manslaughter and the fact that he had been tried and convicted of murder, which judgment was reversed because of error in entering the same--the law having been so modified as to forbid the judgment--will not warrant his discharge on the ground of former jeopardy when subsequently tried for manslaughter on the same indictment. In re Garvey, 7 Colo. 384, 3 P. 903 (1884).

No constitutional or statutory impediment to retrying defendant where he appeals his conviction on the basis of a fatally infirm charge and the original conviction has, at the defendant's behest, been wholly nullified and the slate wiped clean. People v. Fueston, 749 P.2d 952 (Colo. 1988).

Conviction reversed for error of law not jeopardy. This section means that in the same action, upon retrial, if the judgment was reversed for errors of law a defendant shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy due to the first trial. Bustamante v. People, 136 Colo. 362, 317 P.2d 885 (1957); Stafford v. People, 165 Colo. 328, 438 P.2d 696 (1968); People v. Ovalle, 51 P.3d 1073 (Colo. App. 2002).

If judgment of conviction is reversed for error in law, accused is not deemed to have been in jeopardy, and, under circumstances, trial court correctly interpreted district court's reversal without direction as necessitating a new trial. Gomez v. Ensor, 694 P.2d 869 (Colo. App. 1984).

Nor where reversal of prior, unsatisfied conviction. It is an established rule that when a defendant obtains a reversal or vacation of a prior, unsatisfied conviction, he may be retried in the normal course of events. White v. District Court, 180 Colo. 147, 503 P.2d 340 (1972).

Accused stands as if there never had been former trial, and the state stands in precisely the same position. The second trial is de novo. The same presumption of innocence of any degree of unlawful homicide, although accused has been convicted of one degree thereof, prevails as upon the first trial. This is the evident purpose and intent of the framers of the constitution. Young v. People, 54 Colo. 293, 130 P. 1011 (1913).

The reversal of a conviction does not result in jeopardy and defendant is not entitled to credit for four years served under the void conviction for murder. Stafford v. People, 165 Colo. 328, 438 P.2d 696 (1968).

Double jeopardy principles were not violated when the court granted a continuance during a habitual offender hearing for the prosecution to fix a technical defect with the evidence of the previous convictions. In this case, the defendant's "first" jeopardy was not ended by the continuance, so the delay did not create a double jeopardy problem. People v. Valencia, 169 P.3d 212 (Colo. App. 2007).

Second hearing in juvenile proceeding not jeopardy. A second hearing before the judge on motions of the people in juvenile proceedings and modification of the referee's findings do not place a child twice in jeopardy. People in Interest of J.A.M., 174 Colo. 245, 483 P.2d 362 (1971).

Nor continuance of four days to amend information. Where the court granted a continuance of four days to amend an information, defendant was not placed in double jeopardy. McKee v. People, 175 Colo. 410, 487 P.2d 1332 (1971).

Nor proceedings to revoke driver's license on basis of previous convictions for violations. The proceedings to revoke a driver's license on the basis of previous convictions for violations are not intended as a further punishment of the violator, but are designed solely for the protection of the public in the use of highways and does not in the legal sense, subject the licensee to double jeopardy or punishment. Campbell v. State, 176

Colo. 202, 491 P.2d 1385 (1971).

Resentencing not double jeopardy. When an original sentence is illegal, resentencing does not constitute double jeopardy even if the subsequent sentence is longer than the original and even though the defendant has begun serving the original sentence. People v. District Court, 673 P.2d 991 (Colo. 1983).

No double jeopardy for second sentence when the first sentence was not fully served. Defendant who discharged imprisonment portion of sentence, but not the mandatory parole portion, had not completed sentence. Therefore, defendant was still serving original sentence when original conviction was vacated and defendant was re-sentenced. People v. Ovalle, 51 P.3d 1073 (Colo. App. 2002).

There is no double jeopardy claim when the defendant is resentenced to the department of corrections and a term of mandatory parole after termination of a community corrections sentence. Since a community corrections sentence is subject to modification, the defendant had no expectation of finality in his sentence and thus, no double jeopardy claim. As well, the imposition of mandatory parole is part of the statutory sentencing scheme, so the defendant was on notice that he could be subject to a longer period of restraint, if his community corrections sentence was terminated. People v. Chavez, 32 P.3d 613 (Colo. App. 2001).

Parole revocation does not violate double jeopardy since it is an administrative proceeding and does not punish criminal defendants for violating criminal laws. People v. Taylor, 74 P.3d 396 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. Harper, 111 P.3d 482 (Colo. App. 2004).

No double jeopardy violation where conviction follows the revocation of defendant's parole based on the same conduct. Parole is a privilege and its revocation is an administrative proceeding; revocation does not punish the defendant for his conduct but merely reaffirms the original sentence. People v. Taylor, 74 P.3d 396 (Colo. App. 2002).

Sentence change is not double jeopardy if the sentence is increased but the defendant has not yet begun serving the sentence. People v. Reed, 43 P.3d 644 (Colo. App. 2001).

"Manifest necessity" construed. Manifest necessity encompasses those situations, substantial and real, that interfere with or retard the administration of honest, fair, evenhanded justice to either, both, or any of the parties to the proceeding. People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983).

Remand for new trial not former jeopardy. Evidence showing a child's condition during the two-day period prior to her death and showing that her father chose to forego medical treatment despite urgings from friends and police would have been sufficient to support conviction of the father for child abuse resulting in death, so that remand for new trial did not constitute double jeopardy. People v. Lybarger, 700 P.2d 910 (Colo. 1985).

Although charges pending after reversal of the defendant's conviction on appeal were not "untried" within the meaning of the Uniform Mandatory Disposition of Detainers Act, remand for a new trial on those charges does not violate the double jeopardy clause. People v. Campbell, 885 P.2d 327 (Colo. App. 1994).

Where double jeopardy rights not violated. Where the court was apprised of the fact that a plea bargain had been entered into; the defendant voluntarily entered his plea after he was advised that he could receive any sentence that fell within the statutory limits; the charge which was the subject of the plea bargain was not the basis of the defendant's presentence confinement; the trial judge did not indicate that he was giving the defendant credit for his jail time; and the trial court was well aware of the time that had been served before sentence was imposed, there was no violation of defendant's equal protection or double jeopardy rights where the sentence was within statutory limits. People v. Mieyr, 176 Colo. 90, 489 P.2d 327 (1971).

Cumulative punishment in a single trial may only be imposed for statutory offenses proscribing the same conduct where legislature has specifically authorized cumulative punishment for these offenses. Boulies v. People, 770 P.2d 1274 (Colo. 1989).

Total sentence was not increased in violation of prohibition against double jeopardy where amended judgment and mittimus only clarified original judgment and mittimus. Graham v. Cooper, 874 P.2d 390 (Colo. 1994).

But an increase in the sentence is impermissible even if the court alters the sentence solely to conform to or clarify its original intent. People v. Sandoval, 974 P.2d 1012 (Colo. App. 1998).

Sentences are presumed concurrent. Where the trial court is advised of a preexisting Colorado sentence but does not specify whether the new sentence is to be concurrent with or consecutive to the prior sentence, the new sentence will be presumed to run concurrently with the prior sentence. After the defendant begins serving the new sentence, the presumption in effect becomes conclusive, since any subsequent increase in the sentence would be impermissible. People v. Sandoval, 974 P.2d 1012 (Colo. App. 1998).

Changing a sentence from concurrent to consecutive constitutes an increase in the sentence. People v. Sandoval, 974 P.2d 1012 (Colo. App. 1998).

A sentence may be increased without violating double jeopardy prohibitions if the defendant could have no legitimate expectation of finality in the sentence. People v. Rodriguez, 55 P.3d 173 (Colo. App. 2002); Romero v. People, 179 P.3d 984 (Colo. 2007).

Jeopardy does not attach where a remand is required for correction of the mittimus in order to reference a mandatory period of parole. People v. Barth, 981 P.2d 1102 (Colo. App. 1999); People v. Espinoza, 985 P.2d 68 (Colo. App. 1999).

A defendant is not subject to multiple punishments for the same offense or conduct in violation of the double jeopardy clause where a civil penalty has not been imposed. In this instance, the defendants have not paid any money to the state nor has the state taken any steps to collect the tax obligation allegedly owed pursuant to §§ 39-28.7-102 and 39-28.7-107. People v. Litchfield, 902 P.2d 921 (Colo. App. 1995), aff'd on other grounds, 918 P.2d 1099 (Colo. 1996).

Imposition of two surcharges for conviction does not violate the prohibition against double jeopardy. The surcharge created by § 18-21-103 (1)(c) and the surcharge created by § 24-4.2-104 (1)(a)(II)(A) may both be applied to the conviction for second degree sexual assault. People v. Thien Van Vo, 932 P.2d 849 (Colo. App. 1996).

No double jeopardy violation where the imposition of costs is primarily remedial rather than punitive. The reviewing court first considers if the legislature intended a criminal or civil sanction, then determines if the statutory scheme is primarily punitive. People v. Howell, 64 P.3d 894 (Colo. App. 2002).

Costs are imposed to reimburse the state for the actual expenses incurred in prosecuting a defendant; costs are not traditionally considered to be punishment; the imposition of costs does not serve the goals of retribution and deterrence. People v. Howell, 64 P.3d 894 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. McQuarrie, 66 P.3d 181 (Colo. App. 2002).

The drug offender surcharge, a criminal sanction, constitutes punishment for purposes of double jeopardy analysis. People v. McQuarrie, 66 P.3d 181 (Colo. App. 2002).

Under certain circumstances, a civil penalty may rise to the level of a "punishment" for double jeopardy clause purposes. People v. Maurello, 932 P.2d 851 (Colo. App. 1997) (decided under former § 39-28.7-107 as it existed prior to the 1996 repeal of article 28.7 of title 39).

The Colorado controlled substances tax constituted a penalty that triggered double jeopardy with respect to the subsequent prosecution of a defendant for a criminal offense involving the possession of the marihuana taxed. People v. Maurello, 932 P.2d 851 (Colo. App. 1997) (decided under former § 39-28.7-107 as it existed prior to the 1996 repeal of article 28.7 of title 39).

Once a legal sentence including restitution has been imposed and the defendant has begun serving the sentence, the restitution amount cannot be increased without violating the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy. People v. Wright, 18 P.3d 816 (Colo. App. 2000).

An increase in the amount of restitution ordered after sentence has been imposed and the defendant has begun serving it violates double jeopardy protections. People v. Shepard, 989 P.2d 183 (Colo. App. 1999).

Where there is no increase in the amount of restitution ordered, there is no double jeopardy violation. People v. Lowe, 60 P.3d 753 (Colo. App. 2002).

An illegal sentence including restitution may be corrected without violating defendant's right to be free from double jeopardy. People v. Pagan, 165 P.3d 724 (Colo. App. 2006).

Defendant not subjected to double jeopardy where restitution was not ordered, and judgment was not entered, until defendant had an opportunity to contest the matter of restitution in a hearing. People v. Harman, 97 P.3d 290 (Colo. App. 2004).

The state does not violate the double jeopardy clause by subjecting individuals to criminal prosecution pursuant to the DUI or DUI per se statutes subsequent to subjecting them to an administrative license revocation proceeding. Deutschendorf v. People, 920 P.2d 53 (Colo. 1996).

Because mandatory parole is a required part of any sentence to the department of corrections, it is not a second sentence for the same crime and does not violate the protection against double jeopardy. People v. Mayes, 981 P.2d 1106 (Colo. App. 1999).

Section 19. Right to bail - exceptions. (1) All persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties pending disposition of charges except:

(a) For capital offenses when proof is evident or presumption is great; or

(b) When, after a hearing held within ninety-six hours of arrest and upon reasonable notice, the court finds that proof is evident or presumption is great as to the crime alleged to have been committed and finds that the public would be placed in significant peril if the accused were released on bail and such person is accused in any of the following cases:

(I) A crime of violence, as may be defined by the general assembly, alleged to have been committed while on probation or parole resulting from the conviction of a crime of violence;

(II) A crime of violence, as may be defined by the general assembly, alleged to have been committed while on bail pending the disposition of a previous crime of violence charge for which probable cause has been found;

(III) A crime of violence, as may be defined by the general assembly, alleged to have been committed after two previous felony convictions, or one such previous felony conviction if such conviction was for a crime of violence, upon charges separately brought and tried under the laws of this state or under the laws of any other state, the United States, or any territory subject to the jurisdiction of the United States which, if committed in this state, would be a felony; or

(c) (Deleted by amendment, L. 94, p. 2853, effective upon proclamation of the Governor, L. 95, p. 1434, January 1, 1995.)

(2) Except in the case of a capital offense, if a person is denied bail under this section, the trial of the person shall be commenced not more than ninety days after the date on which bail is denied. If the trial is not commenced within ninety days and the delay is not attributable to the defense, the court shall immediately schedule a bail hearing and shall set the amount of the bail for the person.

(2.5) (a) The court may grant bail after a person is convicted, pending sentencing or appeal, only as provided by statute as enacted by the general assembly; except that no bail is allowed for persons convicted of:

(I) Murder;

(II) Any felony sexual assault involving the use of a deadly weapon;

(III) Any felony sexual assault committed against a child who is under fifteen years of age;

(IV) A crime of violence, as defined by statute enacted by the general assembly; or

(V) Any felony during the commission of which the person used a firearm.

(b) The court shall not set bail that is otherwise allowed pursuant to this subsection (2.5) unless the court finds that:

(I) The person is unlikely to flee and does not pose a danger to the safety of any person or the community; and

(II) The appeal is not frivolous or is not pursued for the purpose of delay.

(3) This section shall take effect January 1, 1995, and shall apply to offenses committed on or after said date.

Annotator's note. The following annotations include cases decided under the prior version of this section.

Purpose of bail is to insure the defendant's presence at the time of trial and not to punish a defendant before he has been convicted. Lucero v. District Court, 188 Colo. 67, 532 P.2d 955 (1975); L.O.W. v. District Court, 623 P.2d 1253 (Colo. 1981).

The purpose of confining the defendant before trial is not for punishment but to insure his presence at the trial. People v. Spinuzzi, 149 Colo. 391, 369 P.2d 427 (1962).

This section confers absolute right to bail in all cases, except for capital offenses, where the proof is evident and the presumption is great that the accused committed the crime. Gladney v. District Court, 188 Colo. 365, 535 P.2d 190 (1975); L.O.W. v. District Court, 623 P.2d 1253 (Colo. 1981).

This section in effect changes the common law so as to confer an absolute right to bail after indictment in all other felonies than capital cases. Proofs may be required in determining the amount of bail, but the right thereto is no longer a matter of judicial inquiry or discretion. In re Losasso, 15 Colo. 163, 24 P. 1080, 10 L.R.A. 847 (1890); Shanks v. District Court, 153 Colo. 332, 385 P.2d 990 (1963).

Bail, as a matter of right, for all but the most heinous crimes, has been recognized in Colorado. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 179 Colo. 304, 500 P.2d 358 (1972).

But bail not guaranteed to offender of law of another state. The right to bail guaranteed by this section does not apply to one charged with an offense under the laws of another state. Johnson v. District Court, 199 Colo. 458, 610 P.2d 1064 (1980).

Child does not have absolute constitutional or statutory right to bail pending adjudication of the charges filed against him in juvenile court. L.O.W. v. District Court, 623 P.2d 1253 (Colo. 1981).

The inquiry concerning whether an exception to the presumption of bail for juveniles should be recognized focuses primarily on the circumstances surrounding the conduct and character of the juvenile rather than on the nature of particular detention facilities. People v. Juvenile Court, 893 P.2d 81 (Colo. 1995).

Lack of absolute right to bail after service of governor's warrant does not mean that the court has lost its inherent power to grant bail after that time, but simply reflects a determination that the legislative intent to deny bail after service of the governor's warrant is a reasonable and appropriate limitation on that power absent the most extraordinary circumstances. Johnson v. District Court, 199 Colo. 458, 610 P.2d 1064 (1980).

Section modifies common-law rule as to bail in capital offenses. This constitutional provision modifies the common-law rule by providing, in effect, that in capital offenses, even after indictment, if upon investigation it is found that the "proof is not evident or the presumption great", bail should be allowed. In re Losasso, 15 Colo. 163, 24 P. 1080, 10 L.R.A. 847 (1890).

Section includes persons accused of any crime, before or after indictment. This constitutional provision is entirely silent as to the status of the prosecution. It does not say that upon indictment for a felony, or for a particular kind of felony, the beneficent privilege conferred is withdrawn. On the contrary, its terms are broad enough to include persons accused of any crime whatever, after as well as before indictment. In re Losasso, 15 Colo. 163, 24 P. 1080, 10 L.R.A. 847 (1890).

But bail need not be matter of right in every case. People v. Jones, 176 Colo. 61, 489 P.2d 596 (1971).

Defendant is not entitled to bail when accused of first-degree murder. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 180 Colo. 107, 502 P.2d 420 (1972).

And bail need not be granted after conviction. People v. Roca, 17 P.3d 835 (Colo. App. 2000).

No right to trial within 90 days of revocation pursuant to § 16-4-103 (2) for defendant whose bail was denied because proof was evident and presumption great in capital offense case. People v. Avery, 736 P.2d 1233 (Colo. App. 1986).

Only exception expressly made has reference to capital offenses, but this exception is wholly inoperative if the proof of guilt be not evident and the presumption great. In re Losasso, 15 Colo. 163, 24 P. 1080 (1890).

Bail as a matter of right in capital cases is denied; but, when some competent authority ascertains by inquiry that the proof is not evident and the presumption not great, its allowance is imperatively commanded. Shanks v. District Court, 153 Colo. 332, 385 P.2d 990 (1963).

When proof is evident or presumption great, denial of bail is mandatory. People v. District Court, 187 Colo. 164, 529 P.2d 1335 (1974); Goodwin v. District Court, 196 Colo. 246, 586 P.2d 2 (1978).

Under the plain meaning of this section, a defendant convicted of a crime of violence must be denied an appeal bond until the conviction becomes final, even where defendant's conviction was reversed at the appellate court level. The conviction is not final until the defendant has exhausted all direct appeals. The bond must be denied when the defendant may ultimately be successful on appeal, acquitted upon retrial, and will have fully served the sentence. People v. Stewart, 26 P.3d 17 (Colo. App. 2000), rev'd on other grounds 55 P.3d 107 (Colo. 2002).

Historical reason for denying bail in capital case is because temptation for the defendant to leave the jurisdiction of the court and thus avoid trial is particularly great in such case. Courts should therefore proceed with extreme caution in permitting bail in a capital case and in the determination of whether the proof is evident or the presumption great. People v. Spinuzzi, 149 Colo. 391, 369 P.2d 427 (1962).

Furman v. Georgia did not deprive section of vitality. The United States supreme court decision Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, 92 S. Ct. 2726, 33 L. Ed. 2d 346 (1972), which prohibited the imposition of the death penalty in certain circumstances, did not deprive this section of vitality. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 179 Colo. 304, 500 P.2d 358 (1972).

Mention of one exception excludes other exceptions. Palmer v. District Court, 156 Colo. 284, 398 P.2d 435, 11 A.L.R.3d 1380 (1965).

Although ineligibility for death penalty does not foreclose denial of bail. Fact that defendant was 16 years of age, a minor, who could not be subjected to the death penalty, would not have foreclosed the denial of bail. Lucero v. District Court, 188 Colo. 67, 532 P.2d 955 (1975).

Implementation of right to bail must be determined by hearing where the people's proof of guilt is presented. Orona v. District Court, 184 Colo. 55, 518 P.2d 839 (1974).

It is duty of court to determine for itself whether proof is evident or the presumption great in each case. People v. Spinuzzi, 149 Colo. 391, 369 P.2d 427 (1962); Shanks v. District Court, 153 Colo. 332, 385 P.2d 990 (1963).

Failure of court to determine for itself request for bail requires remand. While the trial court does nothing more than summarily sustain the objections of the district attorney to the request for bail, and does not determine for itself from any competent evidence that the proof is evident or the presumption great that the accused was guilty of the crime charged, the cause will be remanded to the trial court for a hearing on the matter. Shanks v. District Court, 153 Colo. 332, 385 P.2d 990 (1963).

Burden of proof on those opposing bail. Because the state constitution establishes that the right to bail is absolute except were a capital crime has been committed and "the proof is evident or the presumption great" that the one charged committed the crime, the burden of proof rests with those opposing bail. Orona v. District Court, 184 Colo. 55, 518 P.2d 839 (1974).

Burden is upon the prosecution to show that the exception to the right to bail is applicable, and only with that showing can the conditional freedom secured by bail properly be denied. Gladney v. District Court, 188 Colo. 365, 535 P.2d 190 (1975).

If bail is to be denied, prosecution must show proof is evident or presumption great. If bail is to be denied, it is incumbent upon the prosecution to come forward and show that the proof is evident or the presumption great that the crime set forth was committed by the defendant. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 179 Colo. 304, 500 P.2d 358 (1972).

The people bear burden of proving that proof is evident and presumption great, and the fact that charges have been made that the offense allegedly committed by the defendant is a capital offense which meets the constitutional standard for denial of bail does not satisfy the prosecution's burden. Goodwin v. District Court, 196 Colo. 246, 586 P.2d 2 (1978).

Standard greater than probable cause. The standard which the constitution requires before bail may be denied is greater than probable cause, though less than that required for a conviction. Orona v. District Court, 184 Colo. 55, 518 P.2d 839 (1974); Gladney v. District Court, 188 Colo. 365, 535 P.2d 190 (1975).

Guilt or innocence of accused is not issue in a bail hearing. Gladney v. District Court, 188 Colo. 365, 535 P.2d 190 (1975).

And no need of proof enough to impose death penalty. The language, "when the proof is evident or the presumption great", pertains to proof of guilt, not to the kind of proof needed for the imposition of the death penalty. Where the state's evidence, although circumstantial in nature, was considerable, it is enough to constitute "evident proof" within the meaning of the constitution. Corbett v. Patterson, 272 F. Supp. 602 (D. Colo. 1967).

Offense does not cease to be capital where evidence circumstantial. Although by statute the death penalty cannot be imposed on the basis of only circumstantial evidence, petitioner does not cease to be charged with a "capital" offense and become entitled to bail as a matter of right where the prosecution probably did not have the direct evidence necessary to seek the death penalty.

The offense with which he was charged was still a capital one, even if it should later develop that the type of evidence adduced did not support a verdict imposing the death penalty. Corbett v. Patterson, 272 F. Supp. 602 (D. Colo. 1967).

Hearsay evidence is admissible in bail hearings. Gladney v. District Court, 188 Colo. 365, 535 P.2d 190 (1975).

But denial of bail may not be predicated upon hearsay alone although such evidence may be admitted in corroboration. Gladney v. District Court, 188 Colo. 365, 535 P.2d 190 (1975).

Filing of information or binding over for trial insufficient. The mere fact that an information has been filed--or that the defendant has been bound over for trial--is not equivalent to a determination that the proof of guilt is evident or the presumption great so as to warrant a denial of bail. Orona v. District Court, 184 Colo. 55, 518 P.2d 839 (1974).

As is production of evidence. The mere filing of an information or the production of evidence which would establish probable cause that the crimes charged were committed will not meet the Colorado constitutional standard for denying bail in capital cases. Lucero v. District Court, 188 Colo. 67, 532 P.2d 955 (1975).

Indictment may create strong presumption that prisoner is guilty of capital offense. In re Losasso, 15 Colo. 163, 24 P. 1080 (1890); Shanks v. District Court, 153 Colo. 332, 385 P.2d 990 (1963).

And burden of overcoming this presumption is cast upon prisoner. Shanks v. District Court, 153 Colo. 332, 385 P.2d 990 (1963).

If evidence is not presented by prosecution, court must set reasonable bail in compliance with Colorado constitution and the eighth amendment of the constitution of the United States. People ex rel. Dunbar v. District Court, 179 Colo. 304, 500 P.2d 358 (1972).

If evidence of the proper nature and kind is not presented by the district attorney, it is incumbent upon the court, looking to the guidelines laid down in section 16-4-105 (1)(h) and in the case of Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1, 72 S. Ct. 1, 96 L. Ed. 3 (1951), to set reasonable bail in compliance with the Colorado constitution and the eighth amendment of the constitution of the United States. Lucero v. District Court, 188 Colo. 67, 532 P.2d 955 (1975).

Colorado constitution recognizes that monetary bail is constitutionally permissible. People v. Jones, 176 Colo. 61, 489 P.2d 596 (1971).

Factors which should be considered by trial court in determining whether bail should be set, and amount of such bail, include the seriousness of the offense, the possible danger to the community, the penalty, the character and reputation of the accused and the probability of his appearing. Corbett v. Patterson, 272 F. Supp. 602 (D. Colo. 1967).

While the guilt or innocence of the accused is not to be determined, the quantity and character of the proofs on this point are, for the special purpose of determining bail, necessarily considered. Shanks v. District Court, 153 Colo. 332, 385 P.2d 990 (1963).

Although an accused has a constitutional right to bail in noncapital cases, the trial court has the discretion to set the amount and conditions of bail, subject to statutory limitations. Martell v. County Court of Summit County, 854 P.2d 1327 (Colo. App. 1992).

One who enters plea of not guilty by reason of insanity at time of commission of alleged crime cannot be denied bail pending trial. The trial court was powerless to construct an exception in such a case, and the denial of bail was erroneous. Palmer v. District Court, 156 Colo. 284, 398 P.2d 435 (1965).

Person guilty of contempt entitled to bail pending review. Where a petitioner is adjudged guilty of contempt of court for refusal to answer questions before the grand jury and is sentenced to four months in jail, refusal of the trial court to stay execution or admit the petitioner to bail pending review by the supreme court is an abuse of discretion. Smaldone v. People, 153 Colo. 208, 385 P.2d 127 (1963).

But right to bail after conviction not absolute. This section does not give a defendant an absolute right to bail after conviction and before sentence, this being a matter within the discretion of the trial court. Romeo v. Downer, 69 Colo. 281, 193 P. 559 (1920).

And requires showing of peculiar circumstances by prisoner. Accused persons, bailable before trial but having no absolute right to be admitted to bail after conviction, should be admitted to bail with great caution after conviction, only where the extraordinary or peculiar circumstances of the case render it right and proper. The burden of showing such circumstances is, of course, on the accused. Romeo v. Downer, 69 Colo. 281, 193 P. 559 (1920).

Where denial of bail not arbitrary. Where petitioner was charged with first-degree murder, punishable by death, and had previously been convicted of second-degree murder and had escaped, it is obvious under the relevant standards that the bail denial cannot be viewed as unreasonable or arbitrary, or as an infringement upon petitioner's constitutional rights. Corbett v. Patterson, 272 F. Supp. 602 (D. Colo. 1967).

Due process requirements met regarding denial of bail. Where denial of bail is not arbitrary and is not based solely upon the defendant's financial condition, due process requirements are met. People v. Jones, 176 Colo. 61, 489 P.2d 596 (1971).

Unconstitutional bail condition. The imposition of conditions, relating to the defendant's right to remain at liberty on bail, that complies with the constitution is in keeping with the recommendations of the standards for criminal justice. However, the trial judge imposed an improper and unconstitutional condition where the bail order included the following condition: "If probable cause shall be shown to this court that any of the above offenses shall have been committed by either defendant, bond for that particular defendant shall be immediately terminated". Lucero v. District Court, 188 Colo. 67, 532 P.2d 955 (1975).

Order refusing bail is order that accused shall be confined. Robran v. People, 173 Colo. 378, 479 P.2d 976 (1971).

And wilfull release of prisoner in violation of order contempt. Where a sheriff knows that his prisoner has been refused bail, it is a contempt of the court refusing the bail for the sheriff wilfully to permit the prisoner to be at large. Robran v. People, 173 Colo. 378, 479 P.2d 976 (1971).

Bail bond with but one surety is sufficient. Van Gilder v. People, 75 Colo. 515, 227 P. 386 (1924).

Applied in Wesson v. Johnson, 195 Colo. 521, 579 P.2d 1165 (1978); People v. Olds, 656 P.2d 705 (Colo. 1983); People ex rel. Gallagher v. District Court, 656 P.2d 1287 (Colo. 1983); People v. Walker, 665 P.2d 154 (Colo. App. 1983), aff'd sub nom. Yording v. Walker, 683 P.2d 788 (Colo. 1984).

Section 20. Excessive bail, fines or punishment. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Bail need not be matter of right in every case. People v. Jones, 176 Colo. 61, 489 P.2d 596 (1971).

The right to bail does not amount to a guarantee that every defendant who is charged with a crime will be released without bail if he is indigent. People v. Jones, 176 Colo. 61, 489 P.2d 596 (1971).

Monetary bail is constitutionally permissible. People v. Jones, 176 Colo. 61, 489 P.2d 596 (1971).

Bail should be reasonably sufficient to secure prisoner's presence at trial; it should not be more than will be reasonably sufficient to prevent evasion of the law by flight or concealment. Palmer v. District Court, 156 Colo. 284, 398 P.2d 435 (1965).

Hearing may be necessary for trial court to reasonably fix bail. Proofs may be required in determining the amount of bail, but the right thereto is no longer a matter of judicial inquiry or discretion. The scope and character of the hearing envisage consideration of factors which throw light on what would be reasonable bail in order to assure the prisoner's presence at the trial. Palmer v. District Court, 156 Colo. 284, 398 P.2d 435 (1965).

Remedy for excessive bail. Where the bond fixed by the trial court in a criminal case is so grossly excessive as to amount to a denial of the right of accused to be admitted to bail in a reasonable amount, the supreme court will direct that the accused be admitted to bail in reasonable amount. Altobella v. District Court, 153 Colo. 143, 385 P.2d 663 (1963).

If bail is set in an excessive amount, the defendant has the right to petition for reduction of bail or appeal the bail decision. People v. Jones, 176 Colo. 61, 489 P.2d 596 (1971).

Section refers to sentencing statutes and not the sentence. This section and the eighth amendment of the United States constitution refer to statutes providing the maximum and minimum sentences for conviction of a crime, and not to the sentence. Walker v. People, 126 Colo. 135, 248 P.2d 287 (1952).

The constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment does not require strict proportionality between the crimes committed and the sentences imposed. Instead, such prohibition forbids only extreme sentences that are "grossly disproportionate" to the crime. People v. Mershon, 874 P.2d 1025 (Colo. 1994); People v. Oglethorpe, 87 P.3d 129 (Colo. App. 2003).

Punishing a person who cannot, because of his or her voluntary use of intoxicating substances, distinguish right from wrong does not violate the constitutional proscription on cruel and unusual punishment. People v. Grant, 174 P.3d 798 (Colo. App. 2007).

Power to declare what punishment may be assessed for violation of statute is legislative and not judicial. Walker v. People, 126 Colo. 135, 248 P.2d 287 (1952); Normand v. People, 165 Colo. 509, 440 P.2d 282 (1968).

The matter of punishment for commissions of crime is a matter for determination by the general assembly. People v. Summit, 183 Colo. 421, 517 P.2d 850 (1974).

But a defendant is entitled to a proportionality review of a statutorily mandated sentence. The crime of violence statute, § 18-1.3-406, requires the court to impose consecutive sentences if the defendant is convicted of multiple crimes of violence. Because this takes away the trial court's discretion in considering the sentence and the trial court's opportunity to conduct its own proportionality review in imposing the sentence, the defendant is entitled to have the court of appeals conduct an abbreviated proportionality review of the sentence imposed. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002).

The defendant's age should not be considered in determining whether to conduct an abbreviated or an extended proportionality review. Valenzuela v. People, 856 P.2d 805 (Colo. 1993).

Sentence of life imprisonment with no possibility of parole for 40 years for a juvenile offender under the automatic sentencing provisions mandated by § 16-11-103 for first degree murder was not disproportionate in violation of the eighth amendment. Valenzuela v. People, 856 P.2d 805 (Colo. 1993).

The U.S. supreme court concluded in Miller v. Alabama, __U.S. __, 132 S. Ct. 2455, 183 L. Ed. 2d 407 (2012), that the eighth amendment prohibits a mandatory life sentence without the possibility of parole for juvenile offenders. People v. Banks, 2012 COA 157, __ P.3d __.

Because defendant was a minor when the trial court mandatorily sentenced him to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole, and because defendant's case was still pending on direct review when the U.S. supreme court decided Miller, the no-parole provisions contained in §§ 17-22.5-104 (2)(d)(I) and § 18-1.3-401 are unconstitutional as applied to defendant in that they deny defendant the opportunity of parole. People v. Banks, 2012 COA 157, __ P.3d __.

The legislative intent of §§ 17-22.5-104 (2)(d)(IV) and 18-1.3-401 support sentencing defendant to life imprisonment with the possibility of parole after 40 calendar years. People v. Banks, 2012 COA 157, __ P.3d __.

The prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment is not per se applicable to a juvenile in a delinquency proceeding, but it may nevertheless be considered in assessing whether the child has been accorded fundamental fairness under the due process clause. People v. T.S.R., 843 P.2d 105 (Colo. App. 1992).

Mitigating factors such as defendant's age are irrelevant in determining whether a punishment is proportionate to the crime. Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 103 S. Ct. 3001, 77 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1983); People v. Cisneros, 855 P.2d 822 (Colo. 1993).

A defendant's age is not a relevant factor to be considered by a court in a proportionality review. People v. Anaya, 894 P.2d 28 (Colo. App. 1994).

If defendant faced with life sentence without possibility of parole, a more extensive review is required rather than a limited proportionality review to protect the defendant against cruel and unusual punishment. Under such extended proportionality review, the court should be guided by objective criteria including: (1) The gravity of the offense and the harshness of the penalty; (2) the sentences imposed on other criminals in the same jurisdiction; and (3) the sentences imposed for commission of the same crime in other jurisdictions. Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 103 S. Ct. 3001, 77 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1983); People v. Cisneros, 824 P.2d 16 (Colo. App. 1991), rev'd on other grounds, 855 P.2d 822 (Colo. 1993).

Sentence within limits fixed by constitutional statute deemed valid. If a statute is not in violation of the constitution, then any punishment assessed by a court within the limits fixed thereby cannot be adjudged excessive. Walker v. People, 126 Colo. 135, 248 P.2d 287 (1952).

The supreme court cannot find cruel and unusual punishment as proscribed by the United States and Colorado constitutions to be present as it affects an individual, where the sentence is within the statutory limits, and where it does not shock the conscience of the court. Normand v. People, 165 Colo. 509, 440 P.2d 282 (1968); Trujillo v. People, 178 Colo. 136, 496 P.2d 1026 (1972); People v. O'Donnell, 184 Colo. 104, 518 P.2d 945 (1974); People v. McKnight, 41 Colo. App. 372, 588 P.2d 886 (1978); People v. Nieto, 715 P.2d 1262 (Colo. App. 1985).

In determining if a sentence constitutes cruel and unusual punishment, an appellate court may not substitute its judgment for that of the sentencing court as to the appropriateness of a particular sentence; rather, it determines only if the sentence is within constitutional limits. People v. Nieto, 715 P.2d 1262 (Colo. App. 1985).

If a sentence imposed is within limits fixed by statute, it will not be disturbed on review. Harris v. People, 174 Colo. 483, 484 P.2d 1223 (1971); People v. Lutz, 183 Colo. 312, 516 P.2d 1132 (1973); People v. Fulmer, 185 Colo. 366, 524 P.2d 606 (1974).

Where procedural due process is accorded a defendant and the sentence imposed is within the statutory limits and is not of such severity as to shock the conscience of the court, it is not necessary to bring the sentence within this constitutional proscription. Wolford v. People, 178 Colo. 203, 496 P.2d 1011 (1972).

For a juvenile tried as an adult, age is not a relevant factor in conducting a proportionality review of a sentence. People v. Moya, 899 P.2d 212 (Colo. App. 1994).

Classification of felony with mandatory sentences not violative of section. The establishment of driving after judgment prohibited as a class 5 felony with mandatory sentencing does not violate the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

The sentence of a 20-year-old non-habitual offender to life imprisonment with no possibility of parole for 40 years--the minimum sentence possible under the statutory scheme--is not disproportionate to the crime of first degree murder. People v. Smith, 848 P.2d 365 (Colo. 1993).

No requirement that mitigating factors be considered in sentencing habitual criminals. The uniquely grave nature of the death penalty is the wellspring from which flows the constitutional requirement that mitigating factors be considered in sentencing, notwithstanding the number or seriousness of defendant's prior offenses; no such requirement is included within the Colorado Constitution's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment as applied to the sentencing of habitual criminals. People v. Gutierrez, 622 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1981).

And absence of discretion in sentencing habitual offenders not violative. The absence of sentencing discretion, even when coupled with a prescribed life sentence, does not render § 16-13-101 (2) facially invalid as violative of the prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment in this section. People v. Gutierrez, 622 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1981).

Trial and appellate courts must conduct an abbreviated proportionality review of a life sentences imposed under the habitual criminal statute. Alvarez v. People, 797 P.2d 37 (Colo. 1990).

Proportionality review required upon imposition of a life sentence under the habitual criminal statute. People v. Gaskins, 825 P.2d 30 (Colo. 1992), cert. denied, 505 U.S. 1213, 112 S. Ct. 3015, 120 L. Ed. 2d 888 (1992).

Where defendant was convicted of multiple crimes of violence, the court of appeals was required to conduct a proportionality review, upon the defendant's request, of the consecutive sentence imposed for the crimes of violence, even though the statute mandates that the sentences be consecutive. Because the statutory mandate strips the trial court of discretion in sentencing and removes the trial court's ability to assess the proportionality of the sentences imposed, the court of appeals must conduct a separate abbreviated proportionality review. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002).

Solem v. Helm three-prong analysis applied in proportionality review of life sentence under eighth amendment. People v. Gaskins, 923 P.2d 292 (Colo. App. 1996).

Request for proportionality review alleging that sentence violates the eighth amendment to the U.S. constitution is subject to the limitation period set forth in § 16-5-402. People v. Moore-El, 160 P.3d 393 (Colo. App. 2007).

Only an abbreviated form of proportionality review, consisting of a comparison of the gravity of the offense and the harshness of the penalty, is required when a defendant, in either a habitual or a non-habitual offender case, challenges the constitutionality of a life sentence. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002); People v. McNally, 143 P.3d 1062 (Colo. App. 2005).

Only an "abbreviated" proportionality review is needed when the crimes supporting a habitual criminal sentence include grave or serious offenses and a defendant will become eligible for parole. People v. Anaya, 894 P.2d 28 (Colo. App. 1994); People v. Merchant, 983 P.2d 108 (Colo. App. 1999).

An abbreviated proportionality review, in which only the gravity of the crime and the sentence imposed are considered, is all that is required when the offense is a serious one. Great deference must be afforded to the general assembly's authority to establish the punishments for crimes. People v. Mandez, 997 P.2d 1254 (Colo. App. 1999); People v. Oglethorpe, 87 P.3d 129 (Colo. App. 2003).

Court of appeals could not conduct a proper proportionality review without clarification on the record regarding two counts to which the defendant's transcript and the verdict forms rendered contradictory findings of guilt. Sumpter v. People, 994 P.2d 1045 (Colo. 2000).

Where there is wide spread between minimum and maximum punishment, whether any particular sentence is "cruel or unusual" is a matter to be determined under all the facts and circumstances surrounding each offense. People v. Summit, 183 Colo. 421, 517 P.2d 850 (1974).

In order to impose death penalty without violating prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, capital sentencing scheme must satisfy two requirements: (1) The discretion of the sentencing body must be suitably directed and limited so as to minimize the risk of wholly arbitrary and capricious action; and (2) the sentencing body must be allowed to consider any relevant mitigating evidence regarding defendant's character and background and the circumstances of the offense. People v. Tenneson, 788 P.2d 786 (Colo. 1990).

Death penalty statute provision under § 16-11-103 (2)(b)(III) held to contravene the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment when such provision required jury to return a sentence of death for conviction of first degree murder if mitigating and aggravating factors are found to be in equipose without making a separate deliberation to determine whether death is the appropriate penalty to be imposed beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Young, 814 P.2d 834 (Colo. 1991) (decided under law in effect prior to 1991 repeal and reenactment of § 16-11-103).

Imposition of death penalty is not in itself infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. No independent basis exists under this section on which to base a per se challenge to capital punishment. People v. Davis, 794 P.2d 159 (Colo. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1018, 111 S. Ct. 662, 112 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1991).

Execution by lethal gas does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and is not distinguishable from other permissible methods of execution. People v. Davis, 794 P.2d 159 (Colo. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1018, 111 S. Ct. 662, 112 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1991).

The capital sentencing scheme under § 16-11-103 which affords discretion to the prosecutor, who determines against whom to seek a death sentence, to the jury, which determines who is to receive a sentence of death, and to the governor, who determines who shall be granted clemency, does not violate the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. People v. Davis, 794 P.2d 159 (Colo. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1018, 111 S. Ct. 662, 112 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1991).

No constitutional infirmity in capital sentencing scheme. By requiring that the jury find both that a statutory aggravator has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt and that mitigation does not outweigh aggravation before a defendant is even eligible to receive the death penalty, Colorado's sentencing scheme is sufficiently reliable to pass constitutional muster. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

Prohibition of smoking in county jail facilities does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Elliott v. Bd. of Weld County Comm'rs, 796 P.2d 71 (Colo. App. 1990).

Punishment held not to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. People v. Shaver, 630 P.2d 600 (Colo. 1981).

Where consecutive sentences not excessive or cruel. Consecutive sentences imposed on two counts of assault with a deadly weapon did not amount to excessive, cruel, and unusual punishment, where the two women assaulted were in two different places and were not assaulted contemporaneously or as part of one criminal transaction. Harris v. People, 174 Colo. 483, 484 P.2d 1223 (1971).

When the defendant requests a proportionality review of consecutive sentences imposed under the statute pertaining to crimes of violence, the court is required to review the proportionality of each individual sentence, not the cumulative sentence. The cumulative sentence is not reviewable in the aggregate. Since each sentence represents punishment for a distinct and separate crime, it follows that a separate proportionality review should be completed for each sentence, even though the defendant is required to serve the sentences consecutively. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002).

There is no constitutional right to credit of presentence jail time against sentence imposed. People v. Coy, 181 Colo. 393, 509 P.2d 1239 (1973); People v. Nelson, 182 Colo. 1, 510 P.2d 441 (1973).

And defendant's health condition is not generally basis for constitutional challenge that his sentence constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. McKnight v. People, 199 Colo. 313, 607 P.2d 1007 (1980).

Colorado supreme court precedent has determined that the crimes of burglary, attempted burglary, conspiracy to commit burglary, felony menacing, possession or sale of narcotic drugs, aggravated robbery, robbery, and accessory to first-degree murder are grave or serious. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002).

When the crimes listed above are involved, a sentencing court may proceed directly to the second part of an abbreviated proportionality review: A consideration of the harshness of the penalty. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002).

Because court precedent has determined that certain crimes are grave or serious, it is highly likely that the legislatively mandated sentence for these crimes will be constitutionally proportionate in nearly every instance. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002).

Thus, the ability to proceed to the second part of the abbreviated proportionality review, namely the harshness of the penalty, when a grave or serious crime is involved results in a near-certain upholding of the sentence. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002).

Sentence for burglary conviction not grossly disproportionate. Burglary is a "grave or serious" crime, and the sentence imposed by the trial court fell within the presumptive range established by the legislature. People v. Thomeczek, 284 P.3d 110 (Colo. App. 2011).

The possession and sale of narcotic drugs is a grave and serious offense and supports a sentence of life imprisonment with eligibility for parole after 40 years. People v. Cisneros, 855 P.2d 822 (Colo. 1993).

Violence is a relevant consideration but not the sole criterion by which to evaluate whether defendant's crimes, when examined in combination, are lacking in gravity or seriousness. Conviction for crimes involving sale and distribution of heroin and other drugs along with prior convictions for felonies of robbery, theft, and attempted criminal mischief justifies imposition of life sentence under habitual criminal act and does not violate this section or the eighth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. People v. Mershon, 874 P.2d 1025 (Colo. 1994).

Burglary involves violence or the potential for violence and meets the requirement of gravity or seriousness to support a life sentence with eligibility for parole after 40 years. People v. Cisneros, 855 P.2d 822 (Colo. 1993).

Assault convictions meet the requirement of grave and serious for the purpose of completing an abbreviated proportionality review. Defendant and his associates caused actual harm to the victims and the evidence clearly indicated defendant's culpability in the assaults. Close v. People, 48 P.3d 528 (Colo. 2002).

Petitioner not entitled to an extended proportionality review just because his life expectancy does not exceed the 40-year period of parole ineligibility. People v. Ates, 855 P.2d 822 (Colo. 1993); People v. Cisneros, 855 P.2d 822 (Colo. 1993).

Violation of this section does not state cause of action under federal civil rights act. The fact that defendants, acting under color of state law, may have violated this section or § 27-26-104 (repealed, see now § 17-26-104), providing for proper feeding of prisoners, is not a basis for an action under the federal civil rights act, unless the violations result in a deprivation of some right which the plaintiffs have under the federal constitution and laws. Ruark v. Schooley, 211 F. Supp. 921 (D. Colo. 1962).

And this section is binding upon all departments of government, and is a special restriction upon the courts. People ex rel. Connor v. Stapleton, 18 Colo. 568, 33 P. 167 (1893).

Administrative transfer to prison from reformatory proper. Statutes authorizing administrative boards or a court, on their petition, to transfer to the state prison or other penal institution one originally sentenced to a reformatory are valid, notwithstanding objections that they constitute a denial of due process, confer judicial powers on an administrative body, or authorize the infliction of cruel and unusual punishment, since the power conferred on the boards is one of administrative control or discipline, as distinguished from a judicial function. Where statutes conferring the power of transfer on the administrative boards are effective at the time of the sentence, the possibility of transfer is an incident impliedly annexed to sentencing by the court. Tinsley v. Crespin, 137 Colo. 302, 324 P.2d 1033 (1958).

Conviction and sentence prerequisite to justiciable question. Until some person has been convicted of a crime and a sentence has been imposed which is then asserted to be "cruel and unusual", there is no justiciable question that punishment prescribed by a statute is cruel and unusual. People v. Summit, 183 Colo. 421, 517 P.2d 850 (1974).

Until defendants have actually been sentenced in "cruel or unusual" manner they cannot be heard to say that they or some other person might at some future time be subjected to "cruel or unusual" punishment. People v. Summit, 183 Colo. 421, 517 P.2d 850 (1974).

When question properly before supreme court. Question presented by writ of error, whether the consecutive sentences constitute cruel and unusual punishment, raised for the first time in the postconviction motion is properly before supreme court. Trujillo v. People, 178 Colo. 136, 496 P.2d 1026 (1972).

Whether a punishment is "cruel and unusual" and whether a fine is "excessive" are separate concepts and different criteria are required in making the two determinations. People v. Malone, 923 P.2d 163 (Colo. App. 1995).

In determining the appropriate level of a fine, the court must consider the particular financial circumstances of the defendant, as well as the severity of the offense, the defendant's character and background, and any other appropriate circumstances. If the amount of the fine is so disproportionate to the defendant's circumstances that there can be no realistic expectation that he or she will be able to pay the fine levied, the fine is excessive. People v. Malone, 923 P.2d 163 (Colo. App. 1995); People v. Pourat, 100 P.3d 503 (Colo. App. 2004).

Imposition of the mandatory $1,000 fine imposed by § 18-21-103 for persons convicted of a class 4 felony sex offense was not unconstitutionally excessive where the trial court discussed the defendant's ability to pay the surcharge at the sentencing hearing and defendant did not object to the amount of the fine or request a reduction of the amount. People v. Bolt, 984 P.2d 1181 (Colo. App. 1999).

Municipal ordinances that provide for a fine of $2,000 per violation were not excessive where one of the ordinances provides that the fine may be up to $2,000 and the other sets forth factors that a court must consider when imposing a fine. Boulder County Apt. Ass'n v. City of Boulder, 97 P.3d 332 (Colo. App. 2004).

Insurance authority lacked standing to assert that fines imposed under former § 8-53-116 violated the provisions of this section where the authority was an "arm of the state" and where, even if the authority had standing, the $6540 fine imposed for delay in reimbursing workers' compensation claimant for medical bill was not excessive. Pueblo Sch. Dist. No. 70 v. Toth, 924 P.2d 1094 (Colo. App. 1996).

If the victim has suffered a pecuniary loss then full restitution is to be ordered regardless of the defendant's ability to pay. Ordering restitution regardless of the defendant's ability to pay is not imposing an excessive fine, because restitution is not a fine. A fine is solely a monetary penalty where restitution is to make the victim whole. People v. Stafford, 93 P.3d 572 (Colo. App. 2004); People v. Cardenas, 262 P.3d 913 (Colo. App. 2011).

Applied in Cardillo v. People, 26 Colo. 355, 58 P. 678 (1899); Flick v. Indus. Comm'n, 78 Colo. 117, 239 P. 1022 (1925); Chasse v. People, 119 Colo. 160, 201 P.2d 378 (1948); Jackson v. City of Glenwood Springs, 122 Colo. 323, 221 P.2d 1083 (1950); Bernard v. Tinsley, 144 Colo. 244, 355 P.2d 1098 (1960), cert. denied, 365 U.S. 830, 81 S. Ct. 718, 5 L. Ed. 2d 708 (1961); Specht v. Morgan, 189 Colo. 256, 539 P.2d 130 (1975); Heninger v. Charnes, 200 Colo. 194, 613 P.2d 884 (1980); L.O.W. v. District Court, 623 P.2d 1253 (Colo. 1981).

Section 21. Suspension of habeas corpus. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall never be suspended, unless when in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

"Greatest of all writs". Habeas corpus has been designated the "greatest of all writs", and the precious safeguard of personal liberty, concerning which courts are admonished that there is no higher duty than to maintain it unimpaired. Its ascendancy among the writs should be ever sustained. Geer v. Alaniz, 138 Colo. 177, 331 P.2d 260 (1958).

Any person has absolute and unconditional right to seek writ of habeas corpus. Stilley v. Tinsley, 153 Colo. 66, 385 P.2d 677 (1963).

Writ of habeas corpus may be sought in supreme court or any district court. People ex rel. Wyse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 88, 503 P.2d 154 (1972).

Each application for habeas corpus must be disposed of by court by exercising sound discretion. People ex rel. Wyse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 88, 503 P.2d 154 (1972).

Writ of habeas corpus is not to be hedged or in anywise circumscribed with technical requirements. People ex rel. Wyse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 88, 503 P.2d 154 (1972).

And conditions to application, other than by statute, may not be imposed. To impose any other or additional conditions than are in § 13-45-101 on one seeking the writ would be doing exactly what the constitution and the general assembly have said shall not be done. To impose conditions on issuance of the writ, such as exhausting other available remedies in certain situations, is pro tanto a suspension of the writ. Stilley v. Tinsley, 153 Colo. 66, 385 P.2d 677 (1963).

The situation where petitions are discouraged to the point where it may be said that, in effect, the writ of habeas corpus has been unconstitutionally suspended should be avoided. Williams v. District Court, 160 Colo. 348, 417 P.2d 496 (1966).

Time limitations of § 16-5-402 do not violate the constitutional prohibition against suspending the right of habeas corpus. People v. Wiedemer, 852 P.2d 424 (Colo. 1993).

Although procedural mechanism for exercise of writ may change. Although the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is constitutionally guaranteed, the procedural mechanism for its exercise may change. People ex rel. Wyse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 88, 503 P.2d 154 (1972).

Where it appears on the face of an appellant's petition and supporting documents that he is not entitled to habeas relief, court may properly deny the petition without a hearing. Martinez v. Furlong, 893 P.2d 130 (Colo. 1995).

A petition for habeas corpus relief which fails to establish prima facie that the petitioner is not validly confined and is thus entitled to immediate release or that the petitioner has suffered a serious infringement of a fundamental constitutional right resulting in a significant loss of liberty is insufficient and should be dismissed without a hearing. Jones v. Zavaras, 926 P.2d 579 (Colo. 1996).

Defendant's challenges to procedures by which he was sentenced rather than the legality of his confinement may be raised by means of a Crim. P. 35(c) motion but not by means of a habeas corpus petition. Jones v. Zavaras, 926 P.2d 579 (Colo. 1996).

Absent a prima facie showing that the trial judge who sentenced the defendant lacked jurisdiction to do so, the trial court did not err in denying defendant's petition without conducting an evidentiary hearing. Jones v. Zavaras, 926 P.2d 579 (Colo. 1996).

Criminal due process safeguards attach to habeas corpus. Despite a common-law tradition and a constitutional tradition which treat habeas corpus as a civil matter and as a matter to which criminal due process safeguards do not attach, the supreme court is of the opinion that this tradition does not comport with recent developments in the constitutional law. Mora v. District Court, 177 Colo. 381, 494 P.2d 596 (1972).

Criminal safeguards attach regardless of the formal designation of a proceeding if the proceeding substantially involves incarceration or other criminal sanctions. Mora v. District Court, 177 Colo. 381, 494 P.2d 596 (1972).

Contents of petition for habeas corpus. Generally, a petition for writ of habeas corpus should contain in substance merely an allegation that petitioner is unlawfully restrained of his liberty. Statements of evidentiary matter should not be inserted. People ex rel. Palmer v. Adams, 83 Colo. 321, 264 P. 1090 (1928).

Supreme court will decline to take original jurisdiction in habeas corpus proceeding where there is adequate remedy otherwise. People ex rel Palmer v. Adams, 83 Colo. 321, 264 P. 1090 (1928).

And condition of seeking other remedies not suspension of writ. A requirement that a prisoner must pursue his remedies under Rule 35(b), Crim. P. before petitioning for habeas corpus does not constitute a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. People ex rel. Wyse v. District Court, 180 Colo. 88, 503 P.2d 154 (1972).

No inherent power is lodged in any court to stay order of discharge, for habeas corpus would be deprived of its efficacy if any court should undertake to continue an imprisonment once held to be unlawful. Such action on the part of a court would defeat the very purpose of habeas corpus. This declaration is in harmony with the concept of the individuality, personality and dignity of man, so pervasively present in the federal and state constitutions, and nowhere therein more indelibly engraved than in that portion of the bills of rights in which those governments are charged with never suspending the privilege of habeas corpus, unless when in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it. Geer v. Alaniz, 138 Colo. 177, 331 P.2d 260 (1958).

Petitioner may not be punished on other grounds. One may seek a writ of habeas corpus without running any risk whatsoever, other than the risk of having his petition denied and the possibility of being chargeable with the costs of the proceedings. He cannot in such proceedings, whereby he seeks release from illegal restraint, be legally incarcerated or punished on other grounds. Stilley v. Tinsley, 153 Colo. 66, 385 P.2d 677 (1963).

Custody reviewable by habeas corpus. The custody of an accused who was committed because he was found incompetent to stand trial may be reviewed at the instance of the accused by a writ of habeas corpus. Parks v. Denver Dist. Court, 180 Colo. 202, 503 P.2d 1029 (1972).

An inmate's claim that he has been improperly denied credit for good time that would result in an earlier parole date is not grounds for habeas relief. An appellant is entitled to a hearing on a petition for habeas corpus only if the petitioner makes a prima facie showing that the questioned confinement is invalid. Vasquez v. Zavaras, 893 P.2d 105 (Colo. 1995).

Military authorities need not turn over persons arrested during insurrection to civil authorities. Where the militia, being called out by the governor to suppress an insurrection in a county, arrested a person for participating in or aiding and abetting such insurrection, the military authorities were not required to turn over such arrested person to the civil authorities during the continuance of the insurrection, but could detain such prisoner in custody until the insurrection was suppressed, when he should be turned over to the civil authorities to be tried. The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate in criminal cases; but a jury in civil cases in all courts, or in criminal cases in courts not of record, may consist of less than twelve persons, as may be prescribed by law. Hereafter a grand jury shall consist of twelve persons, any nine of whom concurring may find an indictment; provided, the general assembly may change, regulate or abolish the grand jury system; and provided, further, the right of any person to serve on any jury shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex, and the general assembly may provide by law for the exemption from jury service of persons or classes of persons.

II. TRIAL BY JURY.

A. In General.

Fundamental right to trial by jury in criminal cases is paramount constitutional right guaranteed by amendment VI of the U.S. Constitution and this section. People v. Evans, 44 Colo. App. 288, 612 P.2d 1153 (1980).

Where jury trial is granted, right to fair and impartial jury is constitutional right which can never be abrogated. Brisbin v. Schauer, 176 Colo. 550, 492 P.2d 835 (1971).

Prosecutor's comment on defendant's choice of a trial by jury violated the defendant's constitutional rights but, in this case, the prosecutorial misconduct was not reversible error since the evidence at trial was sufficient in both quantity and quality to support the conclusion that the jury could not have arrived at a verdict other than guilty. People v. Rodgers, 756 P.2d 980 (Colo. 1988).

Requirement that defendant waive his or her sixth amendment right to a jury trial on all facts essential to a death penalty eligibility determination jointly with a guilty plea to the underlying capital crime violates the sixth amendment. The right to have a jury trial on sentencing facts is independent of the right to a jury trial on the underlying offense. By coupling the waiver of the jury hearing on a death sentence with the guilty plea to the underlying charge, there is no opportunity for an independent, knowing, voluntary, and intelligent waiver, rather the waiver is automatic. Without such a waiver, the provision is unconstitutional. People v. Montour, 157 P.3d 489 (Colo. 2007).

To cure the constitutional defect, the offending provision is severed. After severing the language, the result is to remand the case back to the trial court for sentencing hearing with a jury unless the defendant waives the sentencing hearing with a jury. This remedy is consistent with the intent of the general assembly to maintain a valid and operative death penalty. The other remedy, requiring a life sentence when pleading guilty to a capital crime, would subject a defendant to the death penalty only when he or she choose a jury trial; such a result would create an unconstitutional burden on the defendant's sixth amendment right. People v. Montour, 157 P.3d 489 (Colo. 2007).

The U.S. Constitution does not forbid states to prescribe relevant qualifications for their jurors. The states remain free to confine the selection to citizens, to persons meeting specified qualifications of age and educational attainment, and to those possessing good intelligence, sound judgment, and fair character. People v. Lee, 93 P.3d 544 (Colo. App. 2003).

The right to a 12-person jury is purely statutory. The sixth and fourteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution guarantee the right to trial by jury, but do not, nor does the Colorado Constitution guarantee the right to a 12-person jury. People v. Chavez, 791 P.2d 1210 (Colo. App. 1990).

Constitutional right to a jury of 12 lies only with felony cases and does not extend to misdemeanor cases. The phrase "courts not of record" is a reference to "justice courts" which were eliminated in 1962, and their jurisdiction was combined with county courts in 1962. The key to determining whether a court is "of record" lies in the difference between misdemeanor and felony offenses. People v. Rodriguez, 112 P.3d 693 (Colo. 2005).

Section 18-1-406 (1) and Crim. P. 23, which provide for six jurors in misdemeanor cases, are constitutional under this section of the constitution. People v. Rodriguez, 112 P.3d 693 (Colo. 2005).

The statutory right to a 12-person jury could be waived by counsel's statements. The requirement that a defendant must make a written or oral "announcement" of his intention to waive a jury does not extend to a reduction in the number of jurors. People v. Chavez, 791 P.2d 1210 (Colo. App. 1990).

The defendant's right to a jury of 12 is violated if one juror has an inability to hear, and the effect of this inability is tantamount to the juror not being in attendance for more than one-third of the trial. People v. Trevino, 826 P. 2d 399 (Colo. App. 1991).

As consent of prosecuting attorney cannot be imposed by rule as a condition on the defendant's right to waive trial by jury. Garcia v. People, 200 Colo. 413, 615 P.2d 698 (1980).

This section secures right of trial by jury in criminal cases, but imposes no restriction upon general assembly in respect to trial of civil causes. Huston v. Wadsworth, 5 Colo. 213 (1880); Clough v. Clough, 10 Colo. App. 433, 51 P. 513 (1897), aff'd, 27 Colo. 97, 59 P. 736 (1899); Parker v. McGinty, 77 Colo. 458, 239 P. 10 (1925).

"Criminal cases", as used in this section, refers to cases, which at the time of the adoption of the constitution, were recognized as criminal, or cases which should thereafter be made criminal by statute. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

Defendant not entitled to jury trial on habitual criminal charges. People v. Carrasco, 85 P.3d 580 (Colo. App. 2003); People v. Petschow, 119 P.3d 495 (Colo. App. 2004); People v. Kyle, 111 P.3d 491 (Colo. App. 2004); People v. Benzor, 100 P.3d 542 (Colo. App. 2004); People v. Green, 2012 COA 68M, __ P.3d __.

Complaint which fixes the nature of the suit determines whether an action is tried by a jury and, since a proceeding to establish an attorney's lien is equitable in nature, there is no right to a jury trial in such actions. In re Rosenberg, 690 P.2d 1293 (Colo. App. 1984).

Right to trial by jury comprehends fair verdict, free from the influence or poison of evidence which should never have been admitted, and the admission of which arouses passions and prejudices which tend to destroy the fairness and impartiality of the jury. Oaks v. People, 150 Colo. 64, 371 P.2d 443 (1962).

In determining whether prosecutorial impropriety mandates a new trial, appellate courts are obliged to evaluate the severity and frequency of the misconduct, any curative measures taken to alleviate the misconduct, and the likelihood that the misconduct constituted a material factor leading to defendant's conviction. People v. Jones, 832 P.2d 1036 (Colo. App. 1991).

In determining whether prosecutor's improper statements so prejudiced the jury as to affect the fundamental fairness of the trial, the court shall consider the language used, the context in which the statements were made, and the strength of the evidence supporting the conviction. Domingo-Gomez v. People, 125 P.3d 1043 (Colo. 2005); Crider v. People, 186 P.3d 39 (Colo. 2008).

Reversible error exists if there are grounds for believing that the jury was substantially prejudiced by improper conduct. Where the prosecutor's ill-advised and improper comments were so numerous and highly prejudicial, the defendant was deprived of a fair trial requiring that the judgment of conviction be reversed. People v. Jones, 832 P.2d 1036 (Colo. App. 1991).

No plain error where court failed to instruct the jury on which of two acts constituted tampering with a witness. Prosecution specifically identified one of the two acts and defendant raised the issue for the first time on appeal. People v. Scialabba, 55 P.3d 207 (Colo. App. 2002).

The constitutional basis for the prosecutorial duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrong conviction as well as to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one is the right to trial by a fair and impartial jury guaranteed by both the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution and art. II, §§ 16 and 23, of the Colorado Constitution. Harris v. People, 888 P.2d 259 (Colo. 1995).

Prosecutorial misconduct that misleads a jury can warrant reversal of a conviction because the right to trial includes the right to trial by an impartial jury empaneled to determine the issues solely on the basis of the evidence introduced at trial rather than on the basis of bias or prejudice for or against a party. Harris v. People, 888 P.2d 259 (Colo. 1995).

Change of venue where a fair, impartial jury trial is likely will be denied. But if a community is prejudiced against a citizen or if other circumstances are likely to deny him a fair and impartial jury trial, then a change of venue must be granted. Brisbin v. Schauer, 176 Colo. 550, 492 P.2d 835 (1971).

Informal communications between court and jury, via bailiff, are improper; all communications should be made in open court with the parties afforded an opportunity to make timely objections to any action by the court or jury which might be deemed irregular. Barriner v. District Court, 174 Colo. 447, 484 P.2d 774 (1971).

Presence of alternate juror during jury's deliberations sufficiently impinges upon defendant's constitutional right to a jury that renders its verdict in secret as to create a presumption of prejudice that requires reversal if not rebutted, and, where it is unclear from the record whether the alternate juror was actually present during the jury deliberations, the issue should be remanded for an evidentiary hearing. People v. Boulies, 690 P.2d

1253 (Colo. 1984).

Jurors are constitutional officers; they have their appointed functions to perform, one of which is to fix the penalty in first degree murder cases. Fleagle v. People, 87 Colo. 532, 289 P. 1078 (1930).

Jury is indispensable fact-finding tribunal in all capital cases, and its findings, based on sufficient evidence, will not be disturbed on review. Herrera v. People, 87 Colo. 360, 287 P. 643 (1930).

The constitution and laws of the state provide for the trial by a jury of a person charged with murder. A jury alone determines the facts, and no court, either trial or appellate, has a right to constitute itself a trier of facts, and thus invade the province of a jury. No matter how lightly the court may regard the testimony offered on behalf of the defense, the question of its weight and the credibility of the witnesses is to be determined by the jury, properly instructed as to the law. Unless this course is followed, a defendant is deprived of his constitutional right of a trial by jury. Where there is testimony tending to prove manslaughter, whether or not it is sufficient to justify a veridict of manslaughter is for the jury to determine, and not the court. Gallegos v. People, 136 Colo. 321, 316 P.2d 884 (1957).

Hence, under this section, on charge of murder, trial by jury is imperative. Weiss v. People, 87 Colo. 44, 285 P. 162 (1930).

Separate hearings of issues raised by pleas of insanity and not guilty, in a criminal case, do not violate the constitutional right to a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of twelve, or of due process of law. Leick v. People, 136 Colo. 535, 322 P.2d 674, cert. denied, 357 U. S. 922, 78 S. Ct. 1363, 2 L. Ed. 2d 366 (1958).

Separate housing of men and women jurors for night does not violate the rule against separation of the jury, but is made necessary by the amendment to this section making women eligible for jury service. Eaddy v. People, 115 Colo. 488, 174 P.2d 717 (1946).

Protecting juror deliberation secrecy more important than preventing disregard of law or facts. In contempt of court case against a juror, once the evidence shows any possibility that the juror was attempting to apply the law, further investigation into the jury deliberations must cease. People v. Kriho, 996 P.2d 158 (Colo. App. 1999).

Although there is a statutory right to a unanimous verdict in criminal cases in Colorado, the state constitution does not explicitly guarantee the right to a unanimous verdict. Nevertheless, there are some cases in which the jury may return a general verdict of guilty when instructed on alternative theories of principal and complicitor liability and in which the state constitution has provided a criminal defendant the right to a unanimous jury verdict. People v. Hall, 60 P.3d 728 (Colo. App. 2002).

Trial by jury may be waived. The right to trial by jury, the right to counsel and related matters, are alienable constitutional rights in the nature of personal privileges for the benefit of those seeking protection, and may be waived. Geer v. Alaniz, 138 Colo. 177, 331 P.2d 260 (1958).

Based on the constitutional right to a trial by jury, there is a correlative right to waive a trial by jury, and such a right applies to all criminal cases. People v. Cisneros, 720 P.2d 982 (Colo. App. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 887, 107 S. Ct. 982, 93 L. Ed. 2d 257 (1986).

Prosecutor has no constitutional right to either demand or waive trial by jury. Garcia v. People, 200 Colo. 413, 615 P.2d 698 (1980).

Right to waive trial by jury is substantive in nature. Garcia v.

People, 200 Colo. 413, 615 P.2d 698 (1980).

Right to waive jury trial applies to all criminal cases. People v. Cisneros, 720 P.2d 982 (Colo. App. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 887, 107 S. Ct. 982, 93 L. Ed. 2d 257 (1986).

Determination of waiver. A defendant in a criminal case may waive his right to a jury trial; however, that waiver must be understandingly, voluntarily, and deliberately made, and a determination of waiver must be a matter of certainty and not implication. People v. Evans, 44 Colo. App. 288, 612 P.2d 1153 (1980).

But defendant in criminal case does not have constitutional right to waive jury and be tried by the court. People v. Linton, 193 Colo. 64, 565 P.2d 919 (1977).

There is no absolute constitutional right of a criminal defendant to waive his right to trial by jury. Garcia v. People, 200 Colo. 413, 615 P.2d 698 (1980); People v. Cisneros, 720 P.2d 982 (Colo. App. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 887, 107 S. Ct. 982, 93 L. Ed. 2d 257 (1986); People v. District Court, 843 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1992); People v. Clouse, 859 P.2d 228 (Colo. App. 1992).

Section 18-1-406 (2) and Crim. P. 23(a)(5) deal with question of waiver of trial by jury by a criminal defendant, but statutory section controls over the rule. Garcia v. People, 200 Colo. 413, 615 P.2d 698 (1980).

This section does not guarantee the right to trial by jury in favor of prosecution where an accused is entitled to a jury trial but elects trial before the court. People v. District Court, 843 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1992).

So petty offense may be constitutionally tried to court without jury. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

The proceeding against petitioner is criminal in nature by reason of the imposition of penal sanctions, but the offense charged, the unlawful use of a traffic lane by a motor vehicle, is a petty offense and not a criminal offense the trial of which would entitle petitioner to a jury trial as comprehended by the constitution of Colorado. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

"Petty offense". In the interests of the orderly administration of justice and in the absence of legislative mandate by statute or charter to the contrary, petty offenses under the constitution, general laws, charters, and ordinances, are those crimes or offenses the punishment for which does not exceed in extent imprisonment for more than six months or a fine of more than $500, or a combination of imprisonment and fine within such limits. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 170 Colo. 448, 462 P.2d 600 (1969), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 910, 90 S. Ct. 1703, 26 L. Ed. 2d 69 (1970).

Right to trial by jury has been expanded to include petty offenses. Garcia v. People, 200 Colo. 413, 615 P.2d 698 (1980).

Waiver procedure adequate. Where, when the jury was assembled in the courtroom ready for trial, defendants' counsel orally announced that defendants had decided to waive their right to a jury trail, and the court inquired of each defendant if that was their desire and both indicated in the affirmative, and as a further precaution, the court then insisted that a written waiver of jury trial be prepared and be signed by each defendant and their counsel, which was done, it will be presumed that defendants understandingly, voluntarily, and deliberately decided to waive the jury. People v. Fowler, l83 Colo. 300, 516 P.2d 428 (1973).

Where the record of the trial court discloses that the trial judge orally advised the defendant of his right to a jury, the defendant further read and signed a written waiver, and he failed to give any indication to the trial court that his waiver was not voluntary, there was substantial evidence to support the findings that the waiver was voluntary. People v. Simms, 185 Colo. 214, 523 P.2d 463 (1974).

Right to jury trials in civil cases is regulated by C.R.C.P. 38. Gibson v. Angros, 30 Colo. App. 95, 491 P.2d 87 (1971).

The provisions of C.R.C.P. 38 do not violate this section or the Colorado mandatory arbitration act because there is no constitutional right to a jury trial, and either party may reject the results of the arbitration and proceed to district court for a de novo trial. Firelock Inc. v. District Court, 776 P.2d 1090 (Colo. 1989).

Trial by jury in civil action or proceeding is not matter of right under our constitution, but our general assembly may provide for it. Londoner v. People ex rel. Barton, 15 Colo. 557, 26 P. 135 (1890); Corthell v. Mead, 19 Colo. 386, 35 P. 741 (1894); Kahm v. People, 83 Colo. 300, 264 P. 718 (1928); Parker v. Plympton, 85 Colo. 87, 273 P. 1030 (1928); Gibson v. Angros, 30 Colo. App. 95, 491 P.2d 87 (1971).

Issue of fact triable to jury upon demand in action for personal injuries. Although there is no constitutional right to a jury trial in civil cases in Colorado, an issue of fact must be tried to a jury upon demand in an action for personal injuries. Gleason v. Guzman, 623 P.2d 378 (Colo. 1981).

Authority of general assembly over civil juries within its sphere is supreme, except as limited by the constitution expressly, or by necessary implication. People v. Wright, 6 Colo. 92 (1881); People ex rel. Attorney Gen. v. Richmond, 16 Colo. 274, 26 P. 929 (1891); City of Denver v. Hyatt, 28 Colo. 129, 63 P. 403 (1900).

But only legislative authority granted over civil juries is to reduce number of jurors. The authority to reduce the number of jurors from 12 is created by this section and in the absence of any express declaration of the further intention regarding trial by juries in civil actions, it follows that the general assembly was granted no other authority than this, and impliedly, that all other rights of trial by jury in civil actions were reserved. City of Denver v. Hyatt, 28 Colo. 129, 63 P. 403 (1900).

There is no constitutional right to jury trial in probate proceeding. In re Estate of Etchart, 179 Colo. 142, 500 P.2d 363 (1972).

The Colorado Constitution does not require a jury trial in civil cases or in probate proceedings. Such right is present only when set forth by statute or rule of court and there is no statute or rule of court in Colorado which requires a trial by jury in a proceeding to determine objections to a final report of a conservator. Jones v. Estate of Lambourn, 159 Colo. 246, 411 P.2d 11 (1966).

There is no constitutional right to a jury trial in an attorney discipline proceeding. In re Egbune, 971 P.2d 1065 (Colo. 1999).

Jury trial not required for less serious delinquency adjudications. Statute limiting right of juvenile to jury trial is constitutional. People in Interest of T. M., 742 P.2d 905 (Colo. 1987) (decided prior to 1987 repeal and reenactment of the Colorado Children's Code).

This section does not apply to contempt proceedings. Wyatt v. People, 17 Colo. 252, 28 P. 961 (1892); People ex rel. Attorney Gen. v. News-Times Publishing Co., 35 Colo. 253, 84 P. 912 (1906), appeal dismissed, 205 U.S. 454, 27 S. Ct. 556, 51 L. Ed. 879 (1907).

Court made a structural constitutional error in sentencing defendant for a class 4 felony when defendant was convicted of a class 5 felony. Because the error was confined to defendant's sentencing and did not affect the trial, jury's conviction for the class 5 felony need not be disturbed. Although it was not clear from the charging documents whether defendant was charged with a class 4 felony or a class 5 felony, that confusion was cleared up when prosecution proffered a jury instruction for the class 5 felony and based its theory of the case on the class 5 felony elements. The court's error, therefore, was not the result of a mistake in the jury instructions. Medina v. People, 163 P.3d 1136 (Colo. 2007).

Structural error applies in this case because the court sentenced defendant for the class 4 felony and there was no jury verdict for that crime. In essence, the court judged defendant guilty of a new crime. The structural error in this case was confined to the sentencing proceedings, so the conviction is affirmed, but the sentence is vacated and the case remanded for resentencing. Medina v. People, 163 P.3d 1136 (Colo. 2007).

Right to jury trial not violated. People v. Will, 730 P.2d 898 (Colo. App. 1986).

B. Required Jury Findings in Criminal Cases.

Court should not apply Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466, 120 S. Ct. 2348, 147 L. Ed. 2d 435 (2000), retroactively to convictions that were already final when the U.S. supreme court issued its opinion. A new rule of criminal procedure is not applied retroactively unless it forbids criminal punishment of certain kinds of conduct or is a "watershed" rule. Apprendi does not represent a "watershed" rule, that is, a rule that implicates the fundamental fairness of the trial. People v. Bradbury, 68 P.3d 494 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. Boespflug, 107 P.3d 1118 (Colo. App. 2004); People v. Alexander, 129 P.3d 1051 (Colo. App. 2005); People v. Starkweather, 159 P.3d 665 (Colo. App. 2006).

The provisions of Washington v. Blakely, 542 U.S. 296, 124 S. Ct. 2531, 159 L. Ed. 2d 403 (2004), which applies the rule of Apprendi, do not apply retroactively to collateral attacks on judgments that were final when Blakely was announced. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004); People v. Alexander, 129 P.3d 1051 (Colo. App. 2005).

The U.S. supreme court held in Apprendi that, other than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury, and proved beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Bradbury, 68 P.3d 494 (Colo. App. 2002).

The rules announced in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), and Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004), apply retroactively to all criminal cases pending on direct review or not yet final. In this case, the defendant's conviction was entered after Apprendi was announced, and time to file an appeal had not run when Blakely was announced; therefore, both cases could be applied to defendant's case. People v. McAfee, 160 P.3d 277 (Colo. App. 2007).

A court should not apply Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2005), retroactively to convictions that were final when the supreme court announced the decision. Blakely v. Washington announced a new procedural rule. A new procedural rule is applied retroactively only if it is a "watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating fundamental fairness and accuracy of the criminal proceeding". Blakely v. Washington does not qualify for the "watershed" exception. People v. Johnson, 142 P.3d 722 (Colo. 2006).

Defendant's sentence was not illegal under Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000). Defendant's sentence did not exceed the statutory maximum. Defendant was sentenced to 15 years, and the presumptive range for aggravated robbery is four to 16 years. The presumptive range for aggravated robbery is extended from 12 years to 16 years because it is an extraordinary risk crime. People v. Kendrick, 143 P.3d 1175 (Colo. App. 2006).

The "presumptive range" of penalties referred to in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), is only that portion of the sentence that subjects the defendant to incarceration or imprisonment. Therefore, when a defendant receives a sentence of imprisonment within the presumptive range, plus a period of mandatory parole, the sentence is constitutional. People v. Kendrick, 143 P.3d 1175 (Colo. App. 2006).

Defendant is not entitled to a jury finding on the fact of defendant's prior convictions to satisfy Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000). People v. Flowers, 129 P.3d 285 (Colo. App. 2005).

Trial court's adjudication of defendant as a sexually violent predator subjecting him to community notification did not violate defendant's right to trial under Apprendi v. New Jersey. Community notification is not additional punishment giving rise to right to trial by jury. People v. Rowland, 207 P.3d 890 (Colo. App. 2009).

Defendant is not entitled to a jury determination of whether defendant's prior convictions were separately brought and tried. People v. Flowers, 129 P.3d 285 (Colo. App. 2005).

The rule announced in Blakely v. Washington, 524 U.S. 296 (2004), does not apply retroactively to cases on collateral review because it is a new rule of criminal procedure. People v. Wenzinger, 155 P.3d 415 (Colo. App. 2006).

A sentence based on extraordinary aggravating factors, § 18-1.3-401 (6), does not require an Apprendi jury finding. The sentence was based on unenumerated and unspecified factors frequently considered in sentencing decisions. Those are not the types of factors considered in Apprendi and its progeny. People v. Rivera, 62 P.3d 1056 (Colo. App. 2002).

Defendant's aggravated sentence did not violate Apprendi principles. Although the sentencing range was beyond the maximum, the enhancement did not require any proof beyond the elements of the charged offenses which were necessarily proved beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Hogan, 114 P.3d 42 (Colo. App. 2004).

Sentence in the aggravated range proper when based upon a prior conviction even after U.S. supreme court decision in Blakely v. Washington. Language in Colorado constitution does not require application of a more forceful jury-trial requirement than federal constitution. People v. Huber, 139 P.3d 628 (Colo. 2006).

When defendant admits the fact that is the basis for the enhanced sentence, the defendant's sentence was not illegal under Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000). Even though it was defense counsel that represented the defendant was on probation during the commission of the felony, the defendant did not object to this statement. Thus, the statement was an admission of the defendant. People v. Fogle, 116 P.3d 1227 (Colo. App. 2004).

Court may not use defendant's admissions to impose an aggravated sentence unless defendant knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently waives his or her sixth amendment right to have a jury find the facts that support the aggravated sentence. Defendant's admissions in the presentence investigation report do not qualify as an admitted fact, thus, the court could not rely upon them to aggravate the defendant's sentence. People v. McAfee, 160 P.3d 277 (Colo. App. 2007); People v. Banark, 155 P.3d 609 (Colo. App. 2007).

The court erred in using defendant's admissions to aggravate the sentence, but, in this instance, the error did not require the court to vacate the sentence. When defendant was resentenced, he had already been convicted of a charge of indecent exposure that the court was unaware of. There is every reason to believe that, had the court known of that conviction, it would have relied upon that previous conviction to aggravate the sentence. The previous indecent exposure conviction is a previous conviction that the court could rely upon without a jury finding to support the aggravated sentence. People v. Banark, 155 P.3d 609 (Colo. App. 2007).

Section 18-1.3-401 (6), properly applied, is constitutional in light of Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), and Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004). A constitutional aggravated sentence based on § 18-1.3-401 (6) must rely on one of four kinds of facts: (1) Facts found by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) facts admitted by the defendant; (3) facts found by the judge after the defendant stipulates to judicial fact-finding for sentencing purposes; and (4) facts regarding prior convictions. The first three are "Blakely-compliant" facts, and the fourth is a "Blakely-exempt" fact. Defendant's aggravated sentence was based in part on a prior conviction; therefore, the sentence was constitutional. Lopez v. People, 113 P.3d 713 (Colo. 2005); DeHerrera v. People, 122 P.3d 992 (Colo. 2005); People v. Huber, 139 P.3d 628 (Colo. 2006).

The existence of one Blakely-exempt fact does not alone make a defendant death penalty eligible. The defendant has the right to have the jury weigh all mitigating factors against aggravating factors. People v. Montour, 157 P.3d 489 (Colo. 2007).

A conviction for an offense that occurs after the offense that the court is applying aggravated sentencing to may be a "prior conviction" for "Blakely-exempt" purposes if the conviction is entered before the sentencing on the aggravated sentence offense. Lopez v. People, 113 P.3d 713 (Colo. 2005).

Conviction that occurs while defendant is on probation after initial sentence still qualifies for the previous conviction exception for Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004), purposes if the court relies upon that conviction to resentence defendant after a probation violation. People v. Banark, 155 P.3d 609 (Colo. App. 2007).

All convictions obtained in accordance with the sixth and fourteenth amendments of the federal constitution fall within the prior-conviction exception to Apprendi and Blakely. People v. Huber, 139 P.3d 628 (Colo. 2006).

The exception extends beyond the fact of conviction to facts regarding prior convictions. People v. Huber, 139 P.3d 628 (Colo. 2006).

The court properly considered the fact that defendant was on probation in sentencing defendant in the enhanced range. A sentencing court may impose an aggravated range sentence based on any one of four Blakely facts listed above. Here, two of the four exceptions apply. First, defendant through counsel stipulated to the particular judicial fact-finding at issue, so the stipulation exception applies. Second, the fact that defendant was on probation is inextricably linked to his prior conviction, so the "facts regarding prior convictions" exception applies. People

v. Linares-Guzman, 195 P.3d 1130 (Colo. App. 2008).

A defendant's prior-conviction-related probation or supervision falls within the exception. The prior-conviction exception extends to facts regarding prior convictions that are contained in conclusive judicial records. Because a defendant's sentence to probation or supervision can be found in the judicial record, a trial court may properly consider this fact without violating the defendant's Blakely rights. People v. Huber, 139 P.3d 628 (Colo. 2006); People v. Roberts, 179 P.3d 129 (Colo. App. 2007), aff'd, 203 P.3d 513 (Colo. 2009).

Defendant may be constitutionally subjected to an aggravated sentence based on a "simultaneous conviction" under the "prior conviction" exception to Apprendi v. New Jersey. People v. Misenhelter, 214 P.3d 497 (Colo. App. 2009), aff'd, 234 P.3d 657 (Colo. 2010).

The "concurrent or simultaneous" conviction is Blakely-exempt if there is no constitutional error in entering the plea and the conviction predated the sentencing at which it was used for aggravation purposes. Misenhelter v. People, 234 P.3d 657 (Colo. 2010).

A single "Blakely-compliant" fact or "Blakely-exempt" fact is sufficient to support an aggravated sentence. Lopez v. People, 113 P.3d 713 (Colo. 2005); DeHerrera v. People, 122 P.3d 992 (Colo. 2005); People v. Huber, 139 P.3d 628 (Colo. 2006).

The sentence is constitutional even if the court relies on facts that satisfy Blakely and facts that violate Blakely. Lopez v. People, 113 P.3d 713 (Colo. 2005); DeHerrera v. People, 122 P.3d 992 (Colo. 2005).

Defendant admitted facts essential to establish the elements of aggravated incest in conformance with the constitutional safeguards in Apprendi v. New Jersey. Defendant was fully advised and acknowledged his understanding of the elements of aggravated incest, as well as his right to have a jury determine his guilt or innocence beyond a reasonable doubt to that offense. Defendant waived that right knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently, and the prosecutor set forth the factual basis for the offense. Defendant did not need to be specifically advised that the facts admitted could be used to aggravate the sentence. Thus, the court's reliance on those facts to impose an aggravated sentence was constitutionally sufficient. People v. Misenhelter, 214 P.3d 497 (Colo. App. 2009), aff'd on other grounds, 234 P.3d 657 (Colo. 2010).

On resentencing after a probation revocation, a trial court may only consider a defendant's admissions for sentence aggravation if the trial court has obtained a valid waiver from the defendant regarding the admissions. If a waiver is not obtained, the court must sentence the defendant within the presumptive range. Villanueva v. People, 199 P.3d 1228 (Colo. 2008).

Defendant's aggravated sentence for vehicular assault must be vacated, because the court imposed the sentence by relying upon facts not found by the jury. People v. Smith, 121 P.3d 243 (Colo. App. 2005).

Defendant did not receive aggravated sentence for first degree assault crime, therefore, Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), does not apply. First degree assault is a class 3 felony that is a per se crime of violence and an extraordinary risk crime that triggers a special legislatively created penalty range, not a judicially imposed aggravated sentence. Since defendant was sentenced within special penalty range created by the legislature, there was no Apprendi violation. People v. Trujillo, 169 P.3d 235 (Colo. App. 2007).

Colorado law does not contemplate an increase in the statutory maximum sentence to which a defendant has subjected himself by pleading guilty, based on subsequent jury findings, which are the functional equivalent of elements of a greater offense than the one to which he pled. People v. Lopez, 148 P.3d 121 (Colo. 2006).

Allowing consideration of subsequent jury findings to increase a defendant's statutory maximum sentence would violate the requirement of Crim. P. 11 that the defendant understand the elements of the offense to which he pleads and the effects of his plea before his plea can be accepted. People v. Lopez, 148 P.3d 121 (Colo. 2006).

The three findings for habitual criminal sentencing are not in addition to the "fact" of the prior convictions. Therefore, the court may find that the prior crimes were separately brought and tried, that they arose out of separate and distinct criminal episodes, and that the accused was the person named in each prior conviction without violating the principle in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000). People v. Nunn, 148 P.3d 222 (Colo. App. 2006).

It was plain error for the court to sentence the defendant in the aggravated range based upon the court's factual findings that were neither admitted by the defendant nor found by the jury. People v. Elie, 148 P.3d 359 (Colo. App. 2006).

The fact of a prior misdemeanor conviction falls within the prior conviction exception to the rule of Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000). People v. Blessett, 155 P.3d 388 (Colo. App. 2006).

The principle in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), not violated when court increases defendant's penalty based upon court's finding that defendant was on probation or parole at the time of the offense. The fact that defendant was on probation or parole at the time of the offense is inextricably linked to a prior conviction, so the finding falls into the prior conviction exception in Apprendi. People v. Montoya, 141 P.3d 916 (Colo. App. 2006).

III. REGULATION OF GRAND JURY.

Power to regulate grand jury is expressly delegated to general assembly by this section. de'Sha v. Reed, 194 Colo. 367, 572 P.2d 821 (1977); In re 2000-2001 Dist. Grand Jury Report, 22 P.3d 922 (Colo. 2001).

This section authorizes the general assembly to change, regulate, or abolish the grand jury system, and therefore prosecutions by information may be provided by the general assembly without violating this section. Saleen v. People, 41 Colo. 317, 92 P. 731 (1907).

And changes must apply equally to all. The change, regulation or abolition of the jury system must be so made as to equally affect the whole community in respect to the same rights and immunities, under the same or similar circumstances. In re Lowrie, 8 Colo. 499, 9 P. 489, 54 Am. R. 558 (1885).

Mode of selecting grand jurors. This section limits the number of persons to constitute a grand jury to 12, nine of whom must concur in finding a bill, but the mode of selecting the jurors, until altered by law, remains the same as provided by the territorial statute. The supreme court is not permitted to presume, in the silence of the record, that the court adopted an illegal method in convening the grand jury. Wilson v. People, 3 Colo. 325 (1877).

Challenge to array and challenge to poll of grand jury. People ex rel. Bonfils v. District Court, 29 Colo. 83, 66 P. 1068 (1901).

Practice of effecting charge through information is not unconstitutional deprivation of protection of grand jury. Sergent v. People, 177 Colo. 354, 497 P.2d 983 (1972).

Grand jury is an accusatory and not an adjudicatory body, therefore there is no constitutional requirement that a grand jury hear and consider exculpatory evidence. Evidence missed by absent juror would only be inculpatory, and since all of the grand jurors were present when the defendant elected to testify before the grand jury and since no exculpatory evidence was presented in those sessions where some jurors were absent, there was no structural error in the grand jury proceedings. People v. Ager, 928 P.2d 784 (Colo. App. 1996).

Section 18-7-302 (4) is a sentence enhancer, not a substantive offense. Therefore, the prosecution must prove the prior convictions to the court, not the jury. The burden of proof to the court is preponderance of the evidence. People v. Schreiber, 226 P.3d 1221 (Colo. App. 2009).

Section 24. Right to assemble and petition. The people have the right peaceably to assemble for the common good, and to apply to those invested with the powers of government for redress of grievances, by petition or remonstrance.

There was no violation of the right to assemble and petition government due to the murder of a woman by her husband in a county justice center. Duong v. Arapahoe County Comm'rs, 837 P.2d 226 (Colo. App. 1992).

Right of freedom of association of student athletes was not unconstitutionally burdened by rule of high school athletic association which generally prohibited such student athletes who practiced with nonschool teams from competing in interscholastic athletics. Fraternities are subject to antidiscrimination regulations. The plaintiffs cannot insist on immunity from state regulation. The particular relationship of fraternities to a state university renders the plaintiffs susceptible to regulation which seeks to promote the principle of racial and religious equality. The purpose of a resolution, to eliminate from the charters and rituals of the organizations affected a provision which compels discrimination on the basis of race, color or creed, is valid and clearly within the powers of the board of regents. Sigma Chi Fraternity v. Regents of Univ. of Colo., 258 F. Supp. 515 (D. Colo. 1966).

Presentation of grievances on governor's lawn protected. Where a crowd collected on the governor's lawn and by the use of placards and shouting sought to express their grievances to the governor, but there was no violence ot discourtesy shown by the crowd, such conduct was protected by this section of the constitution. Flores v. City & County of Denver, 122 Colo. 71, 220 P.2d 373 (1950).

Full protection of the right to petition requires that each district have an identifiable representative at all times. In re Reapportionment of Colo. Gen. Ass'y, 647 P.2d 191 (Colo. 1982).

While the right to petition does not limit citizens to petitioning only those representatives for whom they have voted, it is clear that legislators will be most responsive to citizens who place them in office and who, more importantly, reserve the power to remove a particular legislator from office during his term or return him to office by reelection. In re Reapportionment of Colo. Gen. Ass'y, 647 P.2d 191 (Colo. 1982).

POME standard for consideration of motion to dismiss claim for abuse of process based on First Amendment right to petition. Trial court should consider whether the petitioning activities on the part of the party being sued for abuse of process were not immunized from liability by the first amendment because: (1) Those activities are devoid of factual support or, if supportable in fact, have no cognizable basis in law; (2) the primary purpose of the petitioning activities is to harass the other party or to effectuate some other improper objective; and (3) those petitioning activities have the capacity to have an adverse effect on a legal interest of the other party. Protect Our Mountain v. District Court, 677 P.2d 1361 (Colo. 1984) (decided prior to 1981 amendment).

Concerned Members v. District Court, 713 P.2d 923 (Colo. 1986).

Heightened standard of Protect Our Mountain Environment, Inc. v. District Court, 677 P.2d 1361 (Colo. 1984) (POME), does not apply when the underlying alleged petitioning activity was the filing of an arbitration complaint that led to a purely private dispute. Gen. Steel Domestic Sales v. Bacheller, 2012 CO 68M, 291 P.3d 1.

Applied in Knowlton v. Cervi, 142 Colo. 394, 350 P.2d 1066 (1960).

Section deemed guaranty against exercise of arbitrary power. The exercise of arbitrary power by any department of government, or agency thereof, is inconsistent with democracy. The guaranties against the exercise of such arbitrary power are found in this section and section 10 of this article. People v. Harris, 104 Colo. 386, 91 P.2d 989 (1939).

The fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution and article II, § 25, of the Colorado Constitution protect individuals from arbitrary governmental restrictions on property and liberty interests. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

Due process of law is summarized constitutional guarantee of respect for those personal immunities which are so rooted in the traditions and conscience of the people as to be ranked as fundamental, or are implicit in the concept of ordered liberty. Toland v. Strohl, 147 Colo. 577, 364 P.2d 588 (1961).

Minimum guarantees. The due process clause of this section requires at a minimum the same guarantees as those protected by the due process clause of the federal constitution. Air Pollution Variance Bd. v. Western Alfalfa Corp., 191 Colo. 455, 553 P.2d 811 (1976); City and County of Denver v. Eggert, 647 P.2d 216 (Colo. 1982).

Constitutional guarantees are not always absolute and full exercise thereof is not always possible. Stapleton v. District Court, 179 Colo. 187, 499 P.2d 310 (1972).

State may enlarge, but not abridge, federal concept of due process. Under the United States Constitution the state cannot deny a right or impose a liability which is contrary to the federal concept of due process of law; it does not say that a state has no right, under the state due process clause, to create protections for its citizens which might not be required under the federal concept. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

And federal power will not nullify state's concept of due process. So long as state action does not deny a right protected under the federal concept of due process, or impose a liability prohibited thereby, the federal power will not nullify the rights and protections which, within the state, are recognized as part and parcel of due process under the state constitution. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

Due process takes precedence over legislation. The requirements of due process of law under both the United States and Colorado Constitutions take precedence over statutory enactments of the general assembly. White v. Davis, 163 Colo. 122, 428 P.2d 909 (1967).

The hand of the general assembly is restrained by the due process clause of the state constitution from overturning established principles of private rights and distributive justice. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

The general assembly may not constitutionally authorize the deprivation of a property interest, once conferred, without appropriate procedural safeguards. Weston v. Cassata, 37 P.3d 469 (Colo. App. 2001).

Conformity to due process does not require ideal system, nor does it demand of an act that it provide against every possible hardship that may befall. People ex rel. Dunbar v. First Nat'l Bank, 144 Colo. 412, 356 P.2d 967 (1960).

This section is applicable to rights, not to remedies. White v. Ainsworth, 62 Colo. 513, 163 P. 959, 1918E Ann. Cas. 179 (1917); Scholz v.

Metro. Pathologists, P.C., 851 P.2d 901 (Colo. 1993); Simon v. State Comp. Ins. Auth., 903 P.2d 1139 (Colo. App. 1994); Norsby v. Jensen, 916 P.2d 555 (Colo. App. 1995), rev'd on other grounds, 946 P.2d 1298 (Colo. 1997).

And only rights existing under substantive law. This section operates only to prohibit the deprivation of rights where such rights exist under substantive law. Faber v. State, 143 Colo. 240, 353 P.2d 609 (1960).

And procedural guarantees stemming from state law or local ordinance do not create a constitutionally cognizable property interest under this section. A claim that a right to notice of, and opportunity to participate in, a special use permit hearing provided for in a municipal code was denied therefore does not rise to the level of a due process claim. Hillside Cmty. Church, S.B.C. v. Olson, 58 P.3d 1021 (Colo. 2002).

And not violated by sovereign immunity. This section is not violated by application of the rule that the state and its instrumentalities are not liable in tort actions. Faber v. State, 143 Colo. 240, 353 P.2d 609 (1960).

Assertions of an unconstitutional deprivation of a "right of action" have no merit under the governmental immunity doctrine. In Colorado there is no "right" in the absence of a statute granting such, thus it cannot be taken away or damaged by the application of sovereign immunity to a tort claim. Abeyta v. City & County of Denver, 165 Colo. 58, 437 P.2d 67 (1968).

Scope of judicial review of due process issued is generally limited inquiry, for courts only need find that the legislation is a proper subject of legislative power to uphold a statute. Gates Rubber Co. v. South Sub. Metro. Recreation & Park Dist., 183 Colo. 222, 516 P.2d 436 (1973).

Denial of "due process" includes denial of "equal protection of the law". The contention that a statute abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens and denies equal protection of the law is included within the objection that it denies "due process". They stand or fall together. People v. Max, 70 Colo. 100, 198 P. 150 (1921).

Right to equal protection of the laws is included within due process of law under the Colorado Constitution. Colo. Auto & Truck Wreckers Ass'n v. Dept. of Rev., 618 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1980); People v. Gutierrez, 622 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1981); People v. Chavez, 629 P.2d 1040 (Colo. 1981); People v. Montoya, 647 P.2d 1203 (Colo. 1982); People in Interest of S.P.B., 651 P.2d 1213 (Colo. 1982); People v. Dunoyair, 660 P.2d 890 (Colo. 1983); People in Interest of M.M., 726 P.2d 1108 (Colo. 1986); People in Interest of D.G., 733 P.2d 1199 (Colo. 1987); Mayo v. Nat'l Farmers Union, 833 P.2d 54 (Colo. 1992).

The constitutional guarantee of due process of law includes the right to equal protection of the laws. City of Montrose v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 629 P.2d 619 (Colo. 1981).

The right to equal protection of the laws finds support in the due process clause of the Colorado Constitution. DeScala v. Motor Vehicle Div., 667 P.2d 1360 (Colo. 1983).

State law that creates a property interest protected by the fourteenth amendment may relate to a claim of deprivation of due process under state law and form the basis of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claim. Conde v. State Dept. of Pers., 872 P.2d 1381 (Colo. App. 1994).

Person cannot be deprived of his life or liberty on presumption, unless presumption and fact accord. Du Bois v. Clark, 12 Colo. App. 220, 55 P. 750 (1898).

Subject of an attorney disciplinary proceeding is entitled to procedural due process, including the right to be heard by a neutral and detached decision maker. In re Egbune, 971 P.2d 1065 (Colo. 1999).

Section 12-47.1-804 (1) did not impose unconstitutional restrictions on ballot access, the right to hold public office, and the right to vote where the state's substantial interest in avoiding corruption and the appearance of corruption in both the gaming industry and local government outweighed the limited burden that § 12-47.1-804 (1) placed on ballot access, the right to hold public office, or on the right to vote. Lorenz v. State, 928 P.2d 1274 (Colo. 1996).

Prospective political candidates lacked standing to challenge § 12-47.1-804 (1) on vagueness grounds where candidates owned a personal interest in gaming licenses or owned corporations that held gaming licenses. Lorenz v. State, 928 P.2d 1274 (Colo. 1996).

Foster parent does not have a protected liberty interest in expecting to continue as foster parent. People ex rel. A.W.R., 17 P.3d 192 (Colo. App. 2000).

II. DEFINITIONS.

"Due process of law" and "law of the land" have same meaning. The phrases "due process of law" and "law of the land", although verbally different, express the same thought, and the meaning is the same in every case. In re Lowrie, 8 Colo. 499 (1885).

"Law of the land". By the "law of the land" is clearly intended the general law; a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, his liberty, property and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. In re Lowrie, 8 Colo. 499, 9 P. 489 (1885).

"Law" in the expression "due process of law" does not mean that whatever process is provided by the general assembly shall be the measure of the protection provided by the due process clause. Such a construction would render the guaranty mere nonsense for it would then mean no state shall deprive a person of life, liberty, or property, unless the state shall choose to do so. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

"Life" and "liberty". In interpreting constitutional provisions providing for the right to enjoy life and liberty, the right of personal liberty consists in the power of locomotion--to go where one pleases, and when, and to do that which may lead to one's business or pleasure, only so far restrained as the rights of others may make it necessary for the welfare of all other citizens. Dominquez v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 233, 363 P.2d 661 (1961).

"Liberty", as used in this section and section 3 of this article, connotes far more than mere freedom from physical restraint; it is broad enough to protect one from governmental interference in the exercise of his intellect, in the formation of opinions, in the expression of them and in action or inaction dictated by his judgment, or choice in countless matters of purely personal concern. Zavilla v. Masse, 112 Colo. 183, 147 P.2d 823 (1944).

"Property" defined. The term "property" as used in the due process clause of the state constitution, and protected by the federal constitution, includes the right of the citizen to make any legitimate use or disposition of the asset owned. City of Englewood v. Apostolic Christian Church, 146 Colo. 374, 362 P.2d 172 (1961).

Property is more than the mere thing which a person owns. It is elemental that it includes the right to acquire, use, and dispose of it. The constitution protects these essential attributes of property. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

The term "property" within the meaning of the due process clause includes the right to make full use of the property which one has the inalienable right to acquire. People v. Nothaus, 147 Colo. 210, 363 P.2d 180 (1961).

III. DUE PROCESS.

A. Generally.

1. Standards for Determining Due Process.

Due process standards of justice are not authoritatively formulated as specifics. Toland v. Strohl, 147 Colo. 577, 364 P.2d 588 (1961).

Test of due process. An act of the general assembly which arbitrarily destroys or impairs the right of the individual to the free use and enjoyment of his property lawfully acquired, and permits price fixing for the benefit of a special group, is lacking in due process, and unconstitutional. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Due process of law must be tested by those principles of civil liberty and constitutional protection which have become established in our system of laws. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

In addressing due process issues, courts employ a bifurcated analysis requiring an initial delineation of the nature and extent of the asserted interest and, in the event that interest is constitutionally protected, an evaluation of the adequacy of the challenged process. People v. Chavez, 629 P.2d 1040 (Colo. 1981); Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

Due process is flexible and calls for such procedural protections as the particular situation demands. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

Due process is a flexible standard and recognizes that not all situations calling for procedural safeguards call for the same kind of procedure. People v. Chavez, 629 P.2d 1040 (Colo. 1981); People v. Lamb, 732 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1987).

The due process clauses of the federal and state constitutions protect individuals and entities from immediate governmental interference with present property interests - not possible governmental interference with potential property interests. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

Thus a person claiming an unfair governmental deprivation of an interest in property must possess more than an anticipation of ownership of property. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

When the state seeks to terminate the relationship between a parent and child, it must comply with the due process clause, which requires a fundamentally fair procedure. People ex rel. T.D., 140 P.3d 205 (Colo. App.), cert. denied, 549 U.S. 1020, 127 S. Ct. 564, 166 L. Ed. 2d 411, and 549 U.S. 1024, 127 S. Ct. 565, 166 L. Ed. 2d 419 (2006).

For procedural due process purposes, fairness is assessed by application of the three-factor test set forth in Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335, 96 S. Ct. 893, 903, 47 L. Ed. 2d 18 (1976), which requires consideration of three distinct factors: (1) The private interest that will be affected by the official action; (2) the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and (3) the state interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail. People ex rel. T.D., 140 P.3d 205 (Colo. App.), cert. denied, 549 U.S. 1020, 127 S. Ct. 564, 166 L. Ed. 2d 411, and 549 U.S. 1024, 127 S. Ct. 565, 166 L. Ed. 2d 419 (2006).

2. Application of General Due Process Standard.

Statutory presumptions. The constitutional validity of a criminal presumption under the due process clause depends upon the existence of a rational connection between the fact to be inferred and the proven fact. People v. Seven Thirty-five East Colfax, Inc., 697 P.2d 348 (Colo. 1985).

Procedural due process is not violated merely because a single agency investigates, charges, and then adjudicates a claim. There is a presumption of integrity, honesty, and impartiality in favor of those who serve in quasi-judicial capacities and the presumption cannot be overcome absent a personal, financial, or official stake in the decision that evidences a conflict of interest on the part of the decision-maker. Meyerstein v. City of Aspen, 282 P.3d 456 (Colo. App. 2011).

Due process and equal protection rights under the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution not violated by denying defendant a free transcript of prior proceedings where transcript would have offered relatively little value to defendant in the presentation of an effective defense. Matthews v. Price, 83 F.3d 328 (10th Cir. 1996).

Due process and equal protection rights under the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution not violated by denying defendant an investigator or a psychiatric expert at state expense where defendant did not demonstrate that such services were necessary to an adequate defense or that the court's refusal to appoint such experts substantially prejudiced his defense. Matthews v. Price, 83 F.3d 328 (10th Cir. 1996).

There was no violation of due process under this section due to the murder of a woman by her husband in a county justice center. Duong v. Arapahoe County Comm'rs, 837 P.2d 226 (Colo. App. 1992).

Due process not violated where police report concerning basis of conclusion that driver was under the influence of marijuana was admitted into evidence but where officer who prepared report was not present at revocation hearing since report was available for discovery before hearing and driver could have called officer to testify. Halter v. Dept. of Rev., 857 P.2d 535 (Colo. App. 1993).

No violation of due process rights where court failed to instruct the jury on which of two acts constituted tampering with a witness. Prosecution specifically identified one of the two acts and defendant raised the issue for the first time on appeal. People v. Scialabba, 55 P.3d 207 (Colo. App. 2002).

Two-day suspension with pay constituted de minimis deprivation of a property right, and due process protections were not implicated. Gabel v. Jefferson County Sch. Dist. R-1, 824 P.2d 26 (Colo. App.

1991).

Hearing officer did not deprive employer and insurer of due process in denying their request either to depose experts in different city even though, as a result, experts did not testify since deposition should have been taken in advance and employer and insurer were advised 60 days in advance of hearing date that all evidence was to be presented at that time. IPMC Transp. v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 753 P.2d 803 (Colo. App. 1988).

Solatium statute that merely requires a hearing to determine liability but not extent of damages does not deny procedural due process. Dewey v. Hardy, 917 P.2d 305 (Colo. App. 1995).

Fundamental fairness does not require that officers inform suspects of the evidentiary effect of a decision whether to perform roadside sobriety maneuvers when constitutional rights or statutory consequences are not implicated by the choice. McGuire v. People, 749 P.2d 960 (Colo. 1988).

Defendant, who was convicted of vehicular assault while under the influence, vehicular assault by driving recklessly, and driving under the influence, was not denied her right to procedural due process by the prosecution's failure to preserve a second sample of her breath at the time the breathalyzer test was administered to her or to keep the victim's car in storage. Defendant failed to meet the test of materiality set forth in People v. Greathouse (742 P.2d 334 (Colo. 1987)) or the test for bad faith set forth in Arizona v. Youngblood (488 U.S. 51 (1988)). People v. Acosta, 860 P.2d 1376 (Colo. App. 1993).

Regulatory scheme for the control of outdoor advertising which imposed permit requirement and set limitations on placement of roadside signs is not violative of due process, but is reasonably related to the achievement of a legitimate state interest. Orsinger Outdoor Adv. v. State Dept. of Hwys., 752 P.2d 55 (Colo. 1988).

Members of the military are precluded from suing their superior officers for recovery of damages for a claimed violation of state constitutional rights. Thus, a technician in the Colorado Air National Guard was precluded from suing for wrongful termination. Williams v. Colo. Air Nat'l Guard, 821 P.2d 922 (Colo. App. 1991).

A public officer has no property or vested interest in public office, therefore, procedural due process requirements are not applicable when removing a public officer from office. Wilkerson v. State, 830 P.2d 1121 (Colo. App. 1992).

Due process was denied to father whose name was placed on child abuse central registry where the father was denied the opportunity to confront child witness face-to-face at administrative hearing concerning the expungement of the father's name from the registry. Absent finding by the administrative law judge that the witness would suffer harm, the father had the right to confront his accuser. Jefferson v. Colo. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 874 P.2d 408 (Colo. App. 1993).

A public employee who has a vested right to continue in his or her employment may not be deprived of that employment for reasons that have no rational connection with the employment requirements or goals and that are so arbitrary as to offend notions of fairness. Givan v. City of Colo. Springs, 876 P.2d 27 (Colo. App. 1993).

Procedure that permits college president to both initiate and resolve employee dismissal denies employee's right to procedural due process. Saxe v. Bd. of Trs. of Metro. State Coll., 179 P.3d 67 (Colo. App. 2007).

Section 16-8-110 (1) declared unconstitutional as violation of due process to the extent that it allows an accused to be tried on the issue of insanity notwithstanding a judicial finding that the accused is incompetent to proceed. Coolbroth v. District Court, 766 P.2d 670 (Colo. 1988).

Trial court violated defendant's right to due process by imposing a sentence in the aggravated range when defendant was advised only of the possibility of a sentence in the presumptive range at the providency hearing. Defendant's guilty plea, therefore, was not entered knowingly and voluntarily. People v. Corral, 179 P.3d 837 (Colo. App. 2007).

Trial court violated due process when it took no corrective action after an anonymous juror submitted a note demonstrating a presumption of the defendant's guilt prior to hearing evidence. The error was not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt under the constitutional error standard. People v. Harmon, 284 P.3d 124 (Colo. App. 2011).

No constitutional infirmity in capital sentencing scheme. By requiring that the jury find both that a statutory aggravator has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt and that mitigation does not outweigh aggravation before a defendant is even eligible to receive the death penalty, Colorado's sentencing scheme is sufficiently reliable to pass constitutional muster. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

"Clear and convincing" evidence standard constitutional. The standard of proof ("clear and convincing" evidence) fixed by the general assembly in § 27-10-111 (1) meets the minimum standards of procedural due process. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

Ample evidence of defendants' mistreatment and neglect of cattle supported trial court's decision to permanently enjoin defendants from owning, managing, controlling, or otherwise possessing livestock. The permanent injunction was not overly broad in light of the undisputed facts. Nor did the injunction violate defendants' due process rights under this section and the United States constitution because the injunction served the legitimate public interest of protecting livestock from mistreatment and neglect. Stulp v. Schuman, 2012 COA 144, __ P.3d __.

No substantive due process violation where prosecutors select which of the juveniles who meet the statutory requirement for direct filing will be filed upon in district court. It is a valid exercise of prosecutorial discretion and it is not unreasonable to treat certain offenders differently from others. People v. Hughes, 946 P.2d 509 (Colo. App. 1997).

No substantive due process violation where the mandatory parole scheme imposes a more severe sanction on non-sex offenders than on sex offenders whose crimes are in the same felony classification. People v. Harper, 111 P.3d 482 (Colo. App. 2004).

Neither due process nor equal protection concerns are implicated by a determination of accrued child support debt of an absent parent when there has been no prior order of support where obligor parent was notified and attended all hearings that were conducted to determine child support and the judgment for arrearages and where such parent did not establish that he was treated differently from similarly situated parents. People ex rel. J.A.E.S., 7 P.3d 1021 (Colo. App. 2000).

To satisfy due process concerns, the court must advise a defendant of the direct consequences of his or her guilty plea, but the court need not advise the defendant of collateral consequences. The loss of the right to vote while imprisoned is a collateral consequence for which no advisement is required. People v. Boespflug, 107 P.3d 1118 (Colo. App. 2004).

To satisfy procedural due process, a "simple unelaborate statement" standard requires a hearing officer to issue a decision stating, at a minimum, the reasons for the decision and the evidence relied upon. Saxe v. Bd. of Trs. of Metro. State Coll., 179 P.3d 67 (Colo. App. 2007).

Parole board's discretion to impose maximum length of reincarceration does not violate due process. Since the reincarceration does not constitute a new sentence, there is no basis for a due process challenge. People v. Barber, 74 P.3d 444 (Colo. App. 2003).

Due process does not require that an inmate receive an additional hearing on his sexual misconduct or reclassification on the sexual violence scale when the reclassification is based on a prior disciplinary hearing conviction for a code of penal discipline offense of a sexual nature. The previous hearing provided sufficient due process protections. Reeves v. Colo. Dept. of Corr., 155 P.3d 648 (Colo. App. 2007).

Trial court created a liberty interest in a potentially reduced sentence in defendant's favor because, in mandatory language, it granted a suspension of 10 years from defendant's 25-year sentence upon defendant's successful completion of sex offender treatment. While the trial court had discretion in determining the original sentence to impose upon defendant, the court exercised that discretion in a way as to create a legitimate claim of entitlement to a 10-year suspension when and if defendant could demonstrate successful completion of sex offender treatment. Defendant was entitled, therefore, to due process protections before the trial court modified the sentence. The trial court imposed the modified sentence in an illegal manner and therefore erred in denying defendant's Crim. P. 35(a) motion. People v. Sisson, 179 P.3d 193 (Colo. App. 2007).

The Colorado Clean Indoor Air Act, part 2 of article 14 of title 25, does not violate substantive due process by imposing criminal liability on bar and restaurant owners for the acts of others. The plain language of subsection (1) prohibits both smoking by patrons and the allowing of smoking by bar and restaurant owners. The act does not criminalize owners for the acts of others. It criminalizes their own actions allowing their patrons to smoke. Coal. for Equal Rights v. Owens, 458 F. Supp. 2d 1251 (D. Colo. 2006), aff'd sub nom. Coal. for Equal Rights, Inc. v. Ritter, 517 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2008).

Benefits received by individuals at state mental hospital from veterans administration and the Colorado old age pension program may be applied to cover costs of care at the hospital under § 27-12-104. Therefore, there was neither an unlawful taking nor any violation of their due process rights. In re Estate of Nau, 183 P.3d 626 (Colo. App. 2007).

B. Jurisdiction.

Requirement of minimum contacts for in personam actions. Due process requires only that in order to subject a defendant to a judgment in personam, if he be not present within the territory of the forum, he have certain minimum contacts with it such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. Clemens v. District Court, 154 Colo. 176, 390 P.2d 83 (1964); Knight v. District Court, 162 Colo. 14, 424 P.2d 110 (1967).

The due process clause does not contemplate that a state may make binding a judgment in personam against an individual or corporate defendant with which the state has no contacts, ties, or relations. Clemens v. District Court, 154 Colo. 176, 390 P.2d 83 (1964).

Relationship with, and reliance upon, nonresident attorney may allow exercise of in personam jurisdiction. A professional relationship of substantial duration and a client's claimed reliance upon her nonresident attorney's advice with respect to the client's financial interests and the attorney's failure to communicate with the client or to take any action in regard to the client's interests may be productive of adverse consequences to the client in this state, so as to provide a sufficient connection and render reasonable the exercise of in personam jurisdiction over the nonresident. Waterval v. District Court, 620 P.2d 5 (Colo. 1980), cert. denied, 452 U.S. 960, 101 S. Ct. 3108, 69 L.Ed.2d 971 (1981).

C. Procedural Due Process - Notice and Hearing.

1. Requirements for Notice.

Law reviews. For article, "Extraterritorial Service of Municipally Owned Water Works in Colorado", see 21 Rocky Mt. L. Rev. 56 (1948). For article, "Notice and Opportunity to Be Heard", see 29 Dicta 432 (1952). For note, "Right of Cross-Examination Before Administrative Agencies in Colorado", see 29 Dicta 446 (1952). For article, "Colorado's 'Short-Arm' Jurisdiction", see 37 U. Colo. L. Rev. 309 (1965). For comment on Clemens v. District Court appearing below, see 43 Den. L.J. 215 (1966).

Elements of procedural due process. The elements of the constitutional guaranty of due process in its procedural aspect are notice and an opportunity to be heard or defend before a competent tribunal in an orderly proceeding adapted to the nature of the case; also, to have the assistance of counsel, if desired, and a reasonable time for preparation for trial. Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. Palmer, 157 Colo. 40, 400 P.2d 914 (1965).

The requirements of procedural due process have been met when the individual concerned is under the court's jurisdiction and has been given an opportunity to be heard, regardless of whether he takes advantage of it. McFadzean v. Lohr, 152 Colo. 31, 380 P.2d 20 (1963).

Procedural due process requires that in addition to a fair and open hearing, there must be due notice and an opportunity to be heard, and the procedure must be consistent with the essentials of a fair trial, and the agency must act upon evidence and not arbitrarily. Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Colo. Motorway, Inc., 165 Colo. 1, 437 P.2d 44 (1968); Buckingham v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 180 Colo. 267, 504 P.2d 677 (1972).

Due process implies timely notice and reasonable opportunity to defend rights. Due process of law within the meaning of this section includes law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice; it also implies that any individual whose life, liberty, or property may be affected by any judicial proceeding shall have timely notice thereof and reasonable opportunity to be heard in defense of his rights. In re Dolph, 17 Colo. 35, 28 P. 470 (1891); Woodson v. Ingram, 173 Colo. 65, 477 P.2d 455 (1970).

Due process in having one's rights and duties judicially determined contemplates notice of the proceedings. Michels v. Clemens, 140 Colo. 82, 342 P.2d 693 (1959); Clemens v. District Court, 154 Colo. 176, 390 P.2d 83 (1964).

Due process under applicable rules requires notice, by actual or substituted service of process. Weber v. Williams, 137 Colo. 269, 324 P.2d 365 (1958).

The essence of procedural due process is fundamental fairness. This embodies adequate advance notice and an opportunity to be heard prior to state action resulting in deprivation of a significant property interest. City & County of Denver v. Eggert, 647 P.2d 216 (Colo. 1982).

Procedural due process requires that a person with a possessory interest in property seized by the state must be afforded an opportunity for a hearing and adequate notice of the hearing. Patterson v. Cronin, 650 P.2d 531 (Colo. 1982).

Proper notice depends on facts and purpose of investigation. The question of what is proper notice, or of what constitutes a specific designation of the issue raised or charges made, depends necessarily upon the facts of each case, the type of investigation being conducted, the violations alleged, and the penalty or order sought to be imposed. White v. Davis, 163 Colo. 122, 428 P.2d 909 (1967); Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. Colo. Motorway, Inc., 165 Colo. 1, 437 P.2d 44 (1968).

Sufficiency of notice. The constitutional sufficiency of the content of a notice to interested parties must depend on the particular facts and circumstances of the case, and therefore the court's inquiry must focus on the reasonableness of the notice, giving due regard to the subject with which the statute deals and the practicalities and peculiarities of the case. Closed Basin Landowners Ass'n v. Rio Grande, 734 P.2d 627 (Colo. 1987).

Person must be apprised of object of hearing. Where the purpose of the proceeding is or may be equivocal from the vantage of the person to be affected, it is the duty of the court to apprise him of the object of the hearing. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 156 Colo. 180, 397 P.2d 743 (1964); People v. Barron, 677 P.2d 1370 (Colo. 1984).

Procedures for notifying defendants, whether owners, drivers, nonresidents or residents, must be such as are reasonably calculated to apprise the defendants of the action pending against them and to afford to them an opportunity to be heard. Clemens v. District Court, 154 Colo. 176, 390 P.2d 83 (1964).

Where a judgment against a defendant under an ordinance may include imprisonment in the first instance, the failure to file a complaint giving adequate notice of the charge is inexcusable. City of Canon City v. Merris, 137 Colo. 169, 323 P.2d 614 (1958); Garcia v. City of Pueblo, 176 Colo. 96, 489 P.2d 200 (1971).

Notice to party's attorney. If the attorney through no fault of his own is denied notice of the critical determination in the case, and by reason thereof fails to take procedural steps necessary to preserve his client's rights, fundamental unfairness results. Procedural due process cannot be satisfied when counsel, upon whom a client is entitled to rely, is not notified of decisions affecting his client's interests. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Dept. of Labor & Emp., 184 Colo. 334, 520 P.2d 586 (1974); Hall v. Home Furniture Co., 724 P.2d 94 (Colo. App. 1986).

Procedural due process may extend statutory or regulatory notice requirements. Hall v. Home Furniture Co., 724 P.2d 94 (Colo. App. 1986).

Actions in rem or quasi in rem require notice. In order that a valid judgment may be rendered in a proceeding in rem or quasi in rem, every person who has an interest in the res must have legal notice of the proceeding and an opportunity to be heard. Weber v. Williams, 137 Colo. 269, 324 P.2d 365 (1958).

Ex parte adjudication without notice is not due process.

Dalton v. People ex rel. Moors, 146 Colo. 15, 360 P.2d 113 (1961).

Absence of notice requirement in statute does not violate due process. Where due process requires notice of hearing to terminate parent-child relationship, and parent had been given adequate notice of the hearing, the absence of a notice requirement in the statute is not a constitutional infirmity. People in Interest of M.M., 726 P.2d 1108 (Colo. 1986).

Rights to notice and hearing prior to civil judgment are subject to waiver. Thus, the parties to a contract may agree in advance to submit a claim to arbitration and to waive any further notice and hearing incident to the entry of judgment on the award. Due process of law requires no more than that the waiver be voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently made. Columbine Valley Constr. Co. v. Bd. of Dirs., 626 P.2d 686 (Colo. 1981).

And contract manifesting waiver under C.R.C.P. 109 constitutional. When the provisions of a construction contract clearly manifest that waiver which permits the entry of judgment upon the ex parte filing of an arbitration award under C.R.C.P. 109, it is consistent with due process of law. Columbine Valley Constr. Co. v. Bd. of Dirs., 626 P.2d 686 (Colo. 1981).

2. Elements for Hearing.

The essence of due process is fair procedure, but no particular or perfect procedure is required so long as the elements of opportunity for hearing and judicial review are present. Norton v. Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs, 821 P.2d 897 (Colo. App. 1991); Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. Hoffner, 832 P.2d 1062 (Colo. App. 1992).

Due process is satisfied by providing adequate notice of opposing claims, a reasonable opportunity to defend against those claims, and a fair and impartial decision. Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. Hoffner, 832 P.2d 1062 (Colo. App. 1992).

Due process is satisfied where a lessor has the ability to unconditionally exempt property from the statutory tax liens resulting from a lessee's conduct pursuant to §§ 39-26-117 and 39-22-604. Burtkin Assocs. v. Tipton, 845 P.2d 525 (Colo. 1993).

Because the basic requirement of due process is fundamental fairness, the adequacy of particular procedural protections necessarily must be considered in view of the circumstances of each particular case. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

To determine whether a particular statutory process is fundamentally fair, a balancing test is employed requiring consideration of three factors: (1) The importance of the individual interest at stake; (2) the weight of the governmental interest in retaining the challenged procedures, including the interest in avoiding increased administrative and fiscal burdens; and (3) the degree to which proposed alternative procedures will lessen the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the individual's liberty or property. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

Due process always implies hearing or trial and judgment. It secures the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributive justice. People v. Max, 70 Colo. 100, 198 P. 150 (1921); La Plata River & Cherry Creek Ditch Co. v. Hinderlider, 93 Colo. 128, 25 P.2d 187 (1933), appeal dismissed for want of final judgment, 291 U.S. 650, 54 S. Ct. 557, 78 L.Ed. 1044 (1934).

An open, overt hearing before a fair tribunal is basic to due process. Austin v. City & County of Denver, 156 Colo. 180, 397 P.2d 743 (1964).

When matters involving the intent of an attorney cited for contempt for not appearing in court at the designated time happened outside the presence of the court, it is necessary to hold a hearing on the contempt charge, for a procedure which accords with due process of law is essential. Harthun v. District Court, 178 Colo. 118, 495 P.2d 539 (1972).

And there cannot be due process of law unless party affected has his day in court. Due process of law requires that those parties whose interests are at stake be before the court. In re Senate Resolution, 12 Colo. 466, 21 P. 478 (1889); In re Priority of Legislative Appropriations, 19 Colo. 58, 34 P. 277 (1893); Hidden Lake Dev. Co. v. District Court, 183 Colo. 168, 515 P.2d 632 (1973).

But hearing for each member of public is not necessary where public action affects every citizen's rights. People ex rel. State Bd. of Equaliz. v. Hively, 139 Colo. 49, 336 P.2d 721 (1959).

Due process of law does not require every taxpayer to be individually consulted relative to the levying of a tax of a general nature upon his property. People ex rel. State Bd. of Equaliz. v. Hively, 139 Colo. 49, 336 P.2d 721 (1959); Bradfield v. Pueblo, 143 Colo. 559, 354 P.2d 612 (1960).

In most circumstances, a state may not deprive persons of protected liberty interests without first affording such persons meaningful opportunities to prevent such governmental action; however, when a state can demonstrate necessity for immediate action to protect a legitimate interest of its own, adequate post-deprivation hearings may satisfy due process standards. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

No violation of procedural due process where there was no hearing for juvenile to determine whether punishment as an adult was appropriate. Defendant had no liberty interest in being treated as a juvenile and the decision where to file charges was a function of prosecutorial discretion. People v. Hughes, 946 P.2d 509 (Colo. App. 1997).

Due process requires that civil litigants be allowed to secure assistance of counsel. Aspen Props. Co. v. Preble, 780 P.2d 57 (Colo. App. 1989).

Failure of law to require hearing not cured by holding one as matter of favor. When the validity of a law or ordinance is questioned upon the ground that it authorized the taking of property without satisfactory notice or hearing, the objection is not obviated by proof that a hearing has been had, as a matter of favor, in the case. Nor does it satisfy the requirements of this section that the assessment is fair and just. Brown v. City of Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 P. 455 (1884).

Quasi-judicial actions of administrative agencies require notice and hearing. Actions of administrative agencies which are quasi-judicial in nature involve the determination of juridical facts on which the impact of a law upon an individual depends. Therefore, procedural due process requires that an agency when acting in a quasi-judicial capacity give notice and afford a hearing to every affected individual. Shoenberg Farms, Inc. v. People ex rel. Swisher, 166 Colo. 199, 444 P.2d 277 (1968).

But quasi-legislative actions do not. Administrative agencies act in quasi-legislative capacities when pursuant to legislative authority they enact rules or promulgate orders to carry out the purposes of the legislation. Where an administrative agency is acting in a quasi-legislative capacity, procedural due process does not require notice and hearing.

Shoenberg Farms, Inc. v. People ex rel. Swisher, 166 Colo. 199, 444 P.2d 277 (1968).

Where an administrative or municipal agency is acting in a quasi-legislative rather than a quasi-judicial capacity, there is no constitutional requirement for notice and a hearing. Cottrell v. City & County of Denver, 636 P.2d 703 (Colo. 1981); State Farm v. City of Lakewood, 788 P.2d 808 (Colo. 1990).

If an administrative adjudication turns on questions of fact, due process requires that the parties be apprised of all the evidence to be submitted and considered, and that they be afforded a reasonable opportunity in which to confront adverse witnesses and to present evidence and argument in support of their position. Hendricks v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 809 P.2d 1076 (Colo. App. 1990).

The disregard of the express stipulation of the parties concerning the issue of medical improvement was a violation of procedural due process because claimant was not afforded the opportunity to submit evidence or argument in support of claimant's position. Hendricks v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 809 P.2d 1076 (Colo. App. 1990).

In reviewing a student expulsion hearing, the district court must examine the entire procedure used in the student's expulsion, including the board's exercise of discretion to provide a certain level of due process to the student. Nichols ex rel. Nichols v. DeStefano, 70 P.3d 505 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd by operation of law, 84 P.3d 496 (Colo. 2004).

Rather than a narrow focus on particular factors, the court must examine the totality of the procedures afforded and their effect on the fundamental fairness of the hearing. Nichols ex rel. Nichols v. DeStefano, 70 P.3d 505 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd by operation of law, 84 P.3d 496 (Colo. 2004).

To ensure the fairness of expulsion hearings, due process requires, at a minimum, notice and an opportunity to be heard in a meaningful manner. Nichols ex rel. Nichols v. DeStefano, 70 P.3d 505 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd by operation of law, 84 P.3d 496 (Colo. 2004).

3. Application of Notice and Hearing Requirements.

Due process requires industrial commission to enact rules governing procedures under the subsequent injury fund in order to inform employers and claimants of the procedures for invoking participation of the subsequent injury fund in workmen's compensation proceedings. Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Baca, 682 P.2d 11 (Colo. 1984).

Summary revocation of fireworks licenses was improper without the secretary of state making an initial finding of deliberate and wilful conduct because the licensee suffers an immediate loss of livelihood without due process protections of prior notice and formal hearing. Sanchez v. State, 730 P.2d 328 (Colo. 1986).

License conditions and revocation authorized by law and constitution. The gaming commission was within its statutory authority in conditioning a key employee license on payment of back child support and taxes and revoking such license for failure to comply with such conditions. The gaming commission did not abuse its discretion or violate due process in so revoking the license where the licensee was given a reasonable opportunity to comply with such conditions, failed to provide requested income tax returns, and made false statements of material fact to the investigator regarding the filing of tax returns and where the gaming commission provided the licensee with substantial evidentiary leeway, allowed the licensee to cross-examine and impeach the investigator, and gave the licensee the opportunity to argue the proper standard for license revocation. Feeney v. Colo. Ltd. Gaming Control Comm'n, 890 P.2d 173 (Colo. App. 1994).

Liquor license is a property right entitled to the due process protections of notice and an opportunity to be heard. Price Haskel v. Denver Dept. of Excise & Licenses, 694 P.2d 364 (Colo. App. 1984).

Plaintiffs were constitutionally entitled to procedural due process because they had a property right, albeit not an unlimited one, in continued receipt of welfare benefits. Weston v. Cassata, 37 P.3d 469 (Colo. App. 2001).

Minimum procedural due process requirements to terminate property rights in continued employment is notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case. Univ. of S. Colo. v. State Pers. Bd., 759 P.2d 865 (Colo. App. 1988).

Dismissed public employee with a protected property interest in continued employment is entitled to due process protection, including notice of the charges against him and an opportunity to respond prior to termination. Ellis v. City of Lakewood, 789 P.2d 449 (Colo. App. 1989).

A court violates an attorney's due process rights if the court does not provide reasonable notice of the charges and an opportunity to be heard when it delays final adjudication and sentencing on a contempt charge until after the trial that created the contempt situation. People v. Jones, 262 P.3d 982 (Colo. App. 2011).

Formality and procedural requisites for pre-termination hearing can vary and need not definitively resolve the propriety of the discharge but should be essentially a determination of whether there are reasonable grounds to serve as a basis for the discharge. Univ. of S. Colo. v. State Pers. Bd., 759 P.2d 865 (Colo. App. 1988).

Postdeprivation remedies available to defendant are not sufficient to bar due process claim of terminated employee under federal civil rights statute where actions of supervisor are not random and unauthorized, but rather anticipated and authorized by the governmental entity. Price v. Boulder Valley Sch. D. R-2, 782 P.2d 821 (Colo. App. 1989), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 805 P.2d 1085 (Colo. 1991).

Employee given sufficient notice by letter that informed the employee that he would have to defend himself against incidents which occasioned corrective action, in addition to more recent conduct, at meeting to determine final disposition of corrective action taken against employee. McLaughlin v. Levine, 727 P.2d 410 (Colo. App. 1986).

A workers' compensation claimant has a property interest in receiving treatment and supplies that may reasonably be needed at the time of injury or occupational disease and thereafter during the disability to cure and relieve the employee from the effects of the injury. Procedural due process is required before the benefits may be terminated. Colo. Comp. Ins. Auth. v. Nofio, 886 P.2d 714 (Colo. 1994).

Where persons did not allege that the inclusion of their names on the registry prescribed by § 19-3-313, had in any manner interfered with their present occupations, asserting instead that such inclusion could jeopardize future efforts by them to obtain employment in day care centers or licensed care facilities, their anticipations of potential job situations did not constitute property interests for purposes of constitutional due process protections. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

Ex parte order changing custody of child without notice to a parent violates due process and is void. Ashlock v. District Court, 717 P.2d 483 (Colo. 1986).

Full and fair hearing denied where court, in the interest of administrative efficiency, limited both sides to six hours for the presentation of evidence and cross-examination, which resulted in wife only receiving 30 minutes to present her case-in-chief and precluded her from testifying. A court's interest in administrative efficiency may not be given precedence over a party's right to due process. In re Goellner, 770 P.2d 1387 (Colo. App. 1989).

Full and fair hearing not denied by clock trial and trial judge did not abuse discretion where the time limits imposed on the parties were not inadequate for the nature of the proceeding at the outset and did not become inadequate due to developments during the proceeding. Maloney v. Brassfield, 251 P.3d 1097 (Colo. App. 2010).

Due process does not require greater allocation of time during a clock trial for the party that bears the burden of proof. Maloney v. Brassfield, 251 P.3d 1097 (Colo. App. 2010).

Full and fair hearing not denied in dissolution proceeding where party's counsel, who had agreed at pretrial conference on length of case presentation, could not complete the presentation despite being given extra time. There was no due process violation because counsel's inability to complete case presentation was attributable to counsel's choices regarding the use of available time rather than any unwillingness of the court to allow each party adequate time. In re Yates, 148 P.3d 304 (Colo. App. 2006).

Confidential informant testimony in penal disciplinary hearings may remain confidential if allowing the accused access to the full statement would legitimately jeopardize the security of the institution. The code of penal discipline provides a sufficient basis to protect the rights of the accused to a fundamentally fair hearing by requiring an administrative law judge to make an independent determination that the confidential information is reliable and by requiring that the accused inmate receive an accurate summary of the confidential information. Mariani v. Colo. Dept. of Corr., 956 P.2d 625 (Colo. App. 1997).

Necessity for notice and hearing in matters involving property. Whenever it is sought to deprive a person of his property, or to create a charge against it, preliminary to, or which may be made the basis of taking it, the owner must have notice of the proceeding, and be afforded an opportunity to be heard as to the correctness of the assessment or charge. It matters not what the character of the proceeding may be, by virtue of which his property is to be taken, whether administrative, judicial, summary or otherwise; at some stage of it, and before the property is taken or the charge becomes absolute against either the owner or his property, an opportunity for the correction of wrongs and errors which may have been committed must be given. Brown v. City of Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 P. 455 (1884); Jenks v. Stump, 41 Colo. 281, 93 P. 17 (1907); Smith Bros. Cleaners & Dyers v. People ex rel. Rogers, 108 Colo. 449, 119 P.2d 623 (1941).

As in respect to process, the constitution places life, liberty, and property upon an equality, and a party cannot be deprived of his property without service of process in the manner provided by law. Du Bois v. Clark, 12 Colo. App. 220, 55 P. 750 (1898).

Due process of law affords to everyone the right to have the complaint, in any proceeding affecting his property, made in a court of competent jurisdiction, to have due notice thereof, and opportunity to defend. Brown v. City of Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 P. 455 (1884); Archuleta v. Archuleta, 52 Colo. 601, 123 P. 821 (1912).

When a property right is subject to direct and material infringement by an administrative action, the holder of the right is entitled to notice and hearing upon the matter as a matter of procedural due process. Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. DeLue, 175 Colo. 317, 486 P.2d 1050 (1971).

In eminent domain proceedings an order for immediate possession does not necessarily involve the title to the lands but it does affect possession so that the imperative requirement of the statute "shall determine" would imply some notice to the one in actual possession with some opportunity afforded him to testify or otherwise establish an amount sufficient to pay for the land taken and damages thereto when the same is ascertained by a commission or jury. Swift v. Smith, 119 Colo. 126, 201 P.2d 609 (1948).

Rights granted under a certificate of public convenience and necessity are property rights, and due process requires a full hearing if anything granted in the certificate is to be taken away. Pub. Serv. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 174 Colo. 470, 485 P.2d 123 (1971).

However, dangerous property may be destroyed without notice. So far as property is inoffensive or harmless, it can only be condemned or destroyed by legal proceedings, with due notice to the owner; but so far as it is dangerous to the safety or health of the community, due process of law may authorize its summary destruction. Thiele v. City & County of Denver, 135 Colo. 442, 312 P.2d 786 (1957).

And property may be taken without notice in emergency situation. Although notice and hearing must ordinarily be given before the property is taken, when an emergency situation exists and it is necessary for the protection of the public health, safety, or welfare for the state to take immediate action, due process is satisfied if the property owner is given the opportunity to challenge the act of the state after the taking. Srb v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 43 Colo. App. 14, 601 P.2d 1082 (1979).

Property owners waived issue of defective notice on appeal when they appeared at zoning board hearing and did not raise the issue. Zavala v. City & County of Denver, 759 P.2d 664 (Colo. 1988).

When a statute does not require or prohibit specific conduct, but merely adjusts a statutory benefit level, procedural due process does not require notice and an opportunity to avoid the impact of the new law; the legislative process provides all the process that is due. McInerney v. Pub. Employees' Retirement Ass'n, 976 P.2d 348 (Colo. App. 1998).

Due process does not require city council to provide notice or opportunity to be heard to owners of property located within proposed quasi-municipal corporation prior to city council's approval of initial petition to organize said special district. State Farm v. City of Lakewood, 788 P.2d 808 (Colo. 1990).

Setting water rate schedules is legislative and does not require notice and hearing. The setting of water rate schedules for future city-wide application clearly is legislative in nature. Cottrell v. City & County of Denver, 636 P.2d 703 (Colo. 1981).

Procedural due process requires that, in order to protect a bank customer's expectation of privacy in bank records, the customer must be given notice of the judicial or administrative subpoenas prior to their execution. People v. Lamb, 732 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1987).

Failure to provide individual defendant with notice prior to execution of administrative subpoenas for production of corporate bank records during investigation into securities law violations did not require suppression of such bank records because the defendant was not prejudiced as the subpoenas were issued in full compliance with statutory and constitutional requirements except for notice. People v. Lamb, 732 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1987).

Availability of a hearing subsequent to the production and disclosure of bank records pursuant to judicial or administrative subpoenas is inadequate to protect a customer's privacy right in the records since once the right has been violated there is no effective way to restore it. People v. Lamb, 732 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1987).

Making a hospital lien that was perfected by filing in personal injury litigation applicable to PIP benefits provided by the same carrier is not a denial of due process. While the means of notice may not be optimum, any deficiency does not rise to constitutional dimensions. Rose Med. Center v. State Farm, 903 P.2d 15 (Colo. App. 1994).

General tax may be imposed without notice. The general assembly has the power to provide for the payment of special improvements by general taxation without notice or hearing as to individual benefits resulting from the improvement and to authorize municipalities to incur a general primary indebtedness to create such an improvement. Bradfield v. Pueblo, 143 Colo. 559, 354 P.2d 612 (1960).

Taxpayer must have notice and opportunity to contest assessment. It is sufficient to satisfy due process if at some stage of the proceedings before a special tax assessment becomes irrevocably fixed, the taxpayer shall have an opportunity to be heard, of which he must have notice, either personal by publication or by a law fixing the time and place of the hearing. Oberst v. Mays, 148 Colo. 285, 365 P.2d 902 (1961).

If the law provides for notice to the owner of property to be affected, and gives him an opportunity to appear at a specified time and place, before a board or tribunal competent to administer proper relief in order that he may be heard concerning the correctness of a charge against his property before it is made conclusive, this section is satisfied. Brown v. City of Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 P. 455 (1884); Smith Bros. Cleaners & Dyers v. People ex rel. Rogers, 108 Colo. 449, 119 P.2d 623 (1941).

Sheriff's decision not to reissue concealed handgun permit was a quasi-judicial decision. Copley v. Robinson, 224 P.3d 431 (Colo. App. 2009).

Sheriff's refusal to reissue concealed handgun permit was based on proceedings and procedures that violated applicant's procedural due process rights. Copley v. Robinson, 224 P.3d 431 (Colo. App. 2009).

Applicant was denied due process because he was not apprised of or allowed to review adverse evidence or given the opportunity to confront adverse evidence and witnesses. Copley v. Robinson, 224 P.3d 431 (Colo. App. 2009).

Sheriff's findings of fact and conclusions of law, prepared on remand from the district court, did not satisfy statutory requirement for a written statement of the grounds for suspension or revocation. By the time case proceeded to district court, it was too late for sheriff to inform applicant of the evidence against him and the grounds for sheriff's decision in order to provide applicant with a reasonable opportunity to exercise his statutory rights to supplement the record or request a second review to confront such evidence. Copley v. Robinson, 224 P.3d 431 (Colo. App. 2009).

Right to drive automobile not absolute. While one's interest in maintaining a driver's license is an interest that requires a due process hearing before termination, the right to drive an automobile upon the public highways is not absolute. Heninger v. Charnes, 200 Colo. 194, 613 P.2d 884 (1980).

Hearing not required prior to immobilization of vehicle. A hearing is not constitutionally mandated prior to the immobilization of a motor vehicle for parking violations, so long as a prompt and adequate proceeding is available upon demand after the immobilization has occurred. Patterson v. Cronin, 650 P.2d 531 (Colo. 1982).

Personal service of parking summons not required. Fundamental principles of due process do not require personal service of parking summonses. Patterson v. Cronin, 650 P.2d 531 (Colo. 1982).

Commitment of intoxicated persons requires only neutral fact finder's independent determination. A judicial hearing as a prerequisite to commitment of a clearly dangerous intoxicated person would hinder the government's efforts in controlling alcohol abuse without providing additional procedural safeguards. Due process demands only that a neutral fact finder independently determine that the statutory requirements for commitment and release are satisfied. Due process does not dictate that the neutral and detached fact finder be law-trained or a judicial or administrative officer. Carberry v. Adams County Task Force on Alcoholism, 672 P.2d 206 (Colo. 1983).

Civil litigant may be excluded from hearings on matters of law. The rights of a civil litigant are not violated by the court's refusal to allow the client access to an in-chambers conference dealing only with matters of law. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Blecha, 697 P.2d 416 (Colo. App. 1985).

Forcible entry and detainer statute satisfies due process so long as continuances are permitted in cases requiring extensive trial preparation. Butler v. Farner, 704 P.2d 853 (Colo. 1985).

Failure of agency to give notice of noncompliance under prior law does not deprive billboard owner of due process where he receives adequate notice of noncompliance through application for a permit under the new law. Nat'l Advert. Co. v. Dept. of Hwys., 718 P.2d 1038 (Colo. 1986).

Arbitrator's award of punitive damages did not violate employer's due process rights. Employer sought order compelling arbitration and did not contend that arbitrator failed to assure the employer of procedural due process. Padilla v. D.E. Frey & Co., Inc., 939 P.2d 475 (Colo. App. 1997).

Procedural due process does not entitle a sex offender to a hearing on the sex offender's dangerousness before requiring the sex offender to register. Due process does not guarantee the right to a hearing to establish a fact that is not material under the statute. Dangerousness is not material under the registration statute, the duty to register is triggered by conviction of sex offense. The statute even states the crime for which the registrant was convicted may not reflect the current level of dangerousness. People ex rel. C.B.B., 75 P.3d 1148 (Colo. App. 2003).

State Dept. of Health Air Pollution Variance Bd., 191 Colo. 463, 553 P.2d 800 (1976); Boyles v. Lampert, 687 P.2d 468 (Colo. App. 1984); Ault v. Dept. of Rev., 697 P.2d 24 (Colo. 1985); People in Interest of D.G., 733 P.2d 1199 (Colo. 1987); Colo. State Bd. of Nursing v. Lang, 842 P.2d 1383 (Colo. App. 1992); Colo. Dept. of Pub. Health & Env't v. Bethell, 60 P.3d 779 (Colo. App. 2002); Maloney v. Brassfield, 251 P.3d 1097 (Colo. App. 2010).

D. Statutory Notice of Proscribed Conduct.

1. Standards for Vagueness.

Regulations and statutes are presumed to be constitutional until shown otherwise. Kuiper v. Well Owners Conservation Ass'n, 176 Colo. 119, 490 P.2d 268 (1971); Hartley v. City of Colo. Springs, 764 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1988); Sanderson v. People, 12 P.3d 851 (Colo. App. 2000).

Every statute is presumed constitutional unless proven beyond a reasonable doubt to be constitutionally invalid. Lujan v. Colo. State Bd. of Educ., 649 P.2d 1005 (Colo. 1982); Claim of Woloson, 796 P.2d 1 (Colo. App. 1989); Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

Under rational basis analysis, plaintiff has the burden of proving a statute constitutionally invalid beyond a reasonable doubt. Branson v. City & County of Denver, 707 P.2d 338 (Colo. 1985); City of Montrose v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 732 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1987); Dove v. Delgado, 808 P.2d 1270 (Colo. 1991); Scholz v. Metro. Pathologists, P.C., 81 P.2d 901 (Colo. 1993).

An ordinance or statute is presumed to be constitutional, and the burden is on the party attacking it to establish that it is unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt. People ex rel. Arvada v. Nissen, 650 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1982); Casados v. City & County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L.Ed.2d 48 (1994).

The same standard of review should be used for an executive order that is used for a statute or ordinance. Casados v. City & County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L.Ed.2d 48 (1994).

Courts must construe a statute so as to uphold its constitutionality whenever a reasonable and practical construction may be applied to it. People v. Tippett, 733 P.2d 1183, (Colo. 1987); Rickstrew v. People, 822 P.2d 505 (Colo. 1991).

Municipal ordinance is resumed to be constitutional, and, unless the ordinance adversely affects a fundamental constitutional right, the burden is upon the party challenging the ordinance to prove its constitutionality beyond a reasonable doubt. If the constitutionality of an assailed ordinance is debatable, the ordinance should be upheld. Bell & Pollock, P.C. v. City of Littleton, 910 P.2d 69 (Colo. App. 1995).

One who asserts statute's unconstitutionality carries burden of establishing it beyond reasonable doubt. People v. Taggart, 621 P.2d 1375 (Colo. 1981); People v. Beruman, 638 P.2d 789 (Colo. 1982); Kibler v. State, 718 P.2d 531 (Colo. 1986); Colo. Soc. of Comm. & Inst. Psychologists, Inc. v. Lamm, 741 P.2d 707 (Colo. 1987); Claim of Woloson, 796 P.2d 1 (Colo. App. 1989); Bloomer v. Boulder County Bd. of Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 942 (Colo. 1990); People ex rel. A.P.E., 988 P.2d 172 (Colo. App. 1999), rev'd on other grounds, 20 P.3d 1179 (Colo. 2001).

Party challenging constitutionality of statute for vagueness must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the statute is so vague or indefinite that it fails to provide fair notice of the prohibited conduct or that it fails to provide sufficiently definite standards for nonarbitrary, nondiscriminatory enforcement. High Gear and Toke Shop v. Beacom, 689 P.2d 624 (Colo. 1984); People v. Chastain, 733 P.2d 1206 (Colo. 1987); Hartley v. City of Colo. Springs, 764 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1988).

Due process satisfied by notice through publication of statutes. The requirements of due process are satisfied by the notice which is given through publication of the statutes. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Teachers are presumed to know the standards that govern their conduct. A teacher is not entitled to actual notice of the policy but is entitled to reasonable notice, which may be accomplished through publication. Due process principles are satisfied as long as the notice is reasonably calculated to reach the intended party. Bd. of Educ. of Jefferson County v. Wilder, 960 P.2d 695 (Colo. 1998).

Authoritative judicial construction of a statute provides sufficient notice to potential wrongdoers and guarantees against discriminatory enforcement so as to defeat a challenge of unconstitutional vagueness. People v. Taggart, 621 P.2d 1375 (Colo. 1981).

A statute or ordinance which is unconstitutionally vague constitutes a denial of due process of law under the United States and Colorado Constitutions. People v. Moyer, 670 P.2d 785 (Colo. 1983); Casados v. City & County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L.Ed.2d 48 (1994).

Test of unconstitutional vagueness. A statute which either requires or forbids an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law. Memorial Trusts, Inc. v. Beery, 144 Colo. 448, 356 P.2d 884 (1960); People v. Heckard, 164 Colo. 19, 431 P.2d 1014 (1967); Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

If a statute gives fair descriptions of the conduct forbidden and men of common intelligence can readily apprehend the statute's meaning and application, it will not be declared unconstitutional for vagueness. Howe v. People, 178 Colo. 248, 496 P.2d 1040 (1972); People v. District Court, 185 Colo. 78, 521 P.2d 1254 (1974).

Legislation which provides an adequate warning as to what conduct falls under its ban, and marks boundaries sufficiently distinct for judges and juries fairly to administer the law satisfies the constitutional requirements. Statutory language which gives sufficient notice to the person and furnishes guides for the adjudicative process meets the test of definiteness. Dominquez v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 233, 363 P.2d 661 (1961).

Statutory prohibitions must, therefore, contain language that provides fair notice of what conduct is prohibited and provides enforcement authorities with sufficiently definite standards to ensure uniform, non-discriminatory enforcement of those prohibitions. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

The controlling principle in a void for vagueness challenge is whether the questioned law either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of ordinary intelligence must necessarily guess as to its meaning and differ as to its application. People ex rel. City of Arvada v. Nissen, 650 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1982); People v. Riley, 708 P.2d 1359 (Colo. 1985); People v. Forgey, 770 P.2d 781 (Colo. 1989); Bell & Pollock, P.C. v. City of Littleton, 910 P.2d 69 (Colo. App. 1995).

The essence of a vagueness challenge is that the law fails to reasonably forewarn persons of ordinary intelligence of what is prohibited and lends itself to arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement because it fails to provide explicit standards for those who apply it. Englewood v. Hammes, 671 P.2d 947 (Colo. 1983); Casados v. City & County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L.Ed.2d 48 (1994).

The test for vagueness is commonly expressed as whether a statute describes prohibited conduct in terms such that men of ordinary intelligence must necessarily guess as to its meaning and differ as to its application. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980); Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981); People v. Beruman, 638 P.2d 789 (Colo. 1982); People v. Tippett, 733 P.2d 1183 (Colo. 1987); People ex rel. A.P.E., 988 P.2d 172 (Colo. App. 1999), rev'd on other grounds, 20 P.3d 1179 (Colo. 2001).

Test applied in Exotic Coins, Inc. v. Beacom, 699 P.2d 930 (Colo.), appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 892, 106 S. Ct. 214, 88 L.Ed.2d 214 (1985); People v. Batchelor, 800 P.2d 599 (Colo. 1990).

School district's controversial materials policy is not impermissibly vague. Teacher's actions in exposing students in a classroom setting to a significant amount of nudity, sexual content, and graphic violence was a controversial learning resource under any rational interpretation and required approval; therefore his claims that the existing controversial materials policy was impermissibly vague as applied to him were unsupportable where the policy was a comprehensible standard reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns. Bd. of Educ. of Jefferson County v. Wilder, 960 P.2d 695 (Colo. 1998).

When a statute is challenged as void for vagueness, the essential inquiry is whether the statute describes the forbidden conduct in terms so vague that persons of common intelligence cannot readily understand its meaning and application. People v. Gross, 830 P.2d 933 (Colo. 1992); People v. Longoria, 862 P.2d 266 (Colo. 1993).

Doctrine of vagueness has its roots in the due process clause requirement that there be adequate notice of what conduct is proscribed by a criminal statute. People v. District Court, 185 Colo. 78, 521 P.2d 1254 (1974).

The root of the vagueness doctrine is fairness and notice of the prohibited conduct. Casados v. City & County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L.Ed.2d 48 (1994).

An essential of due process is that statute state its mandate with reasonable clarity. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Civil as well as penal enactments are subject to constitutional challenge on grounds of vagueness. Sellon v. City of Manitou Springs, 745 P.2d 229 (Colo. 1987).

A void for vagueness challenge may be applied to a condition of probation. People v. Devorss, 277 P.3d 829 (Colo. App. 2011).

Statute must be sufficiently general for application under varied circumstances. A statute must be sufficiently specific in order to give fair notice of the standards for its implementation and, simultaneously, sufficiently general to address the essential problem under varied circumstances and during changing times. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State Fund, Inc. v. State, 648 P.2d 1072 (Colo. 1982).

While an ordinance must be sufficiently specific to give fair warning of the proscribed conduct, it also often must remain sufficiently general to be capable of application under varied circumstances. People ex rel. City of Arvada v. Nissen, 650 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1982).

Although the statute must define the criminal offense with sufficient definiteness to give fair warning of the prohibited conduct, it must also be general enough to address the problem under varied circumstances and during changing times. People v. Longoria, 862 P.2d 266 (Colo. 1993).

Statutes must give notice of proscribed conduct. To the extent that a statute places a penalty upon completed acts, concepts of fairness require that it be sufficiently definite to give notice as to what conduct is necessary to avoid those penalties. Memorial Trusts, Inc. v. Beery, 144 Colo. 448, 356 P.2d 884 (1960).

Inherent in due process is the concept of fairness which requires the general assembly to frame criminal statutes with sufficient clarity so as to inform persons subject to such laws of the standards of conduct imposed, i.e., give a fair warning of the forbidden acts. People v. Heckard, 164 Colo. 19, 431 P.2d 1014 (1967).

Due process and fundamental fairness require that a statute give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his contemplated conduct is unlawful. People v. Boyd, 642 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1982).

The due process clauses of the United States and Colorado Constitutions require that criminal laws be sufficiently specific to give fair warning of the proscribed conduct to persons of ordinary intelligence. People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983).

Due process requires penal statutes to provide fair warning of the conduct prohibited as well as to set forth definite and precise standards capable of fair application by judges, juries, police, and prosecutors. Rickstrew v. People, 822 P.2d 505 (Colo. 1991).

Constitutional due process requires that penal statutes be sufficiently definite to give fair warning of proscribed or required conduct so that persons may guide their actions accordingly, and must define an offense with sufficient clarity to prevent arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement. People v. Reed, 932 P.2d 842 (Colo. App. 1996).

And of punishment. In addition to a statement that an act is punishable, penal statutes must also clearly indicate the punishment applicable to a particular violation. People v. Boyd, 642 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1982).

The due process guarantee of fair warning applies only to conduct giving rise to criminal liability or punishment. Provision regarding legal possession of marihuana does not describe criminally culpable conduct, but rather describes legal conduct that excuses an otherwise criminal act. People v. Reed, 932 P.2d 842 (Colo. App. 1996).

A statute confronting first amendment freedoms must be specific enough not to inhibit the exercise of those freedoms. People v. Batchelor, 800 P.2d 599 (Colo. 1990).

Violators statute which subjects to criminal prosecution or to action for damages must give definite notice. Memorial Trusts, Inc. v. Beery, 144 Colo. 448, 356 P.2d 884 (1960).

The terms of a penal statute creating a new offense must be sufficiently explicit to inform those who are subject to its provisions of what conduct on their part will render them liable to its penalties. Memorial Trusts, Inc. v. Beery, 144 Colo. 448, 356 P.2d 884 (1960).

As should statute subjecting violators to injunction or to deprivation of prospective gain, where the secondary effect of such a sanction is to destroy the value of an existing investment of time or money. Memorial Trusts, Inc. v. Beery, 144 Colo. 448, 356 P.2d 884 (1960).

A provision is not void for vagueness if it fairly describes the conduct forbidden, and persons of common intelligence can readily understand its meaning and application. Eckley v. Colo. Real Estate Comm'n, 752 P.2d 68 (Colo. 1988); Casados v. City & County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L.Ed.2d 48 (1994); Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. Hoffner, 832 P.2d 1062 (Colo. App. 1992).

Colorado Constitution does not require explanation of every consequence of a state-conferred status. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Any criminal statute where vagueness is alleged must be closely scrutinized. People v. District Court, 185 Colo. 78, 521 P.2d 1254 (1974).

Criminal laws must be drafted to provide police and prosecution with clearly defined standards to lessen the effect of personal judgment and discrimination upon enforcement processes. People v. Heckard, 164 Colo. 19, 431 P.2d 1014 (1967).

Indefinite standards of enforcement violate due process. Indefiniteness which leaves to officer, court, or jury the determination of standards in a case-by-case process invalidates legislation as being violative of due process. Dominquez v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 233, 363 P.2d 661 (1961).

Criminal legislation is not invalidated simply because particular act may violate multiple provisions. People v. Taggart, 621 P.2d 1375 (Colo. 1981).

Statutory terms need not be defined with mathematical precision. Rather, the statutory language must be sufficiently specific to give fair warning of the prohibited conduct, but must also be sufficiently general to address the problem under varied circumstances and during changing times. Davis v. State Bd. of Psychologist Exam'rs, 791 P.2d 1198 (Colo. App. 1989); Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. Hoffner, 832 P.2d 1062 (Colo. App. 1992); Delta Sales Yard v. Patten, 870 P.2d 554 (Colo. App. 1993).

A high degree of exactitude in draftsmanship is not required for an ordinance to pass due process scrutiny. Price v. City of Lakewood, 818 P.2d 763 (Colo. 1991); Casados v. City & County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L.Ed.2d 48 (1994).

Due process has never required mathematical exactitude in legislative draftsmanship. People ex rel. City of Arvada v. Nissen, 650 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1982); People v. Castro, 657 P.2d 932 (Colo. 1983); People v. Ford, 773 P.2d 1059 (Colo. 1989); Casados v. City & County of Denver, 832 P.2d 1048 (Colo. App. 1992), rev'd on other grounds, 862 P.2d 908 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1005, 114 S. Ct. 1372, 128 L.Ed.2d 48 (1994).

Statutory terms need not be defined with mathematical precision. Rather, the statutory language must be sufficiently specific to give fair warning of the prohibited conduct, but must also be sufficiently general to address the problem under varied circumstances and during changing times. Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. Hoffner, 832 P.2d 1062 (Colo. App. 1992).

Neither scientific exactitude nor optimal lucidity of expression is required in statutory drafting. People v. Taggart, 621 P.2d 1375 (Colo. 1981).

Statute is not necessarily unconstitutional due to imprecision of terms as long as the legislative intent is clear. Rickstrew v. People, 822 P.2d 505 (Colo. 1991).

A criminal statute need not contain precise definitions of every word or phrase constituting an element of the offense. People v. Tippett, 733 P.2d 1183, (Colo. 1987).

Words and phrases used in statutes are to be considered in their generally accepted meaning, and the court has a duty to construe the statute so that it is not void for vagueness when a reasonable and practical construction can be given to its language. People v. Rosburg, 805 P.2d 432 (Colo. 1992); Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. Hoffner, 832 P.2d 1062 (Colo. App. 1992).

General assembly is not required to define readily comprehensible and everyday terms which it uses in statutes. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Use of two different words or phrases, each of which expresses the same common meaning, does not render a statute internally inconsistent. Howe v. People, 178 Colo. 248, 496 P.2d 1040 (1972).

Mere fact that a statute's broadest reach is as yet undetermined does not render that statute constitutionally infirm. People v. Alexander, 663 P.2d 1024 (Colo. 1983).

Inclusion of a specific intent requirement does not guarantee that an ordinance is not unconstitutionally vague. Longmont v. Gomez, 843 P.2d 1321 (Colo. 1993).

Due process guarantees protect an individual from the retroactive effect of a judicial decision only when that decision serves to deprive the individual of fair warning that his conduct will give rise to criminal liability or punishment. People v. Grenemyer, 827 P.2d 603 (Colo. App. 1992).

Two inquiries are critical to a determination of whether there has been a due process violation based on retrospective consequences of a judicial decision, namely: (1) Whether the judicial decision had the effect of enhancing punishment for a previously committed crime; and (2) whether the judicial decision was "unforeseeable". People v. Grenemyer, 827 P.2d 603 (Colo. App. 1992).

Overbreadth doctrine neither compels indiscriminate invalidation nor confers standing to challenge constitutionality. The doctrine of overbreadth does not compel indiscriminate facial invalidation of every statute which may chill protected expression, nor does it confer standing to challenge the facial constitutionality of a statute on every defendant whose conduct falls within its prohibitions. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981).

Term "overbreadth" refers to at least two types of constitutional infirmity. A statute suffers from overbreadth if it threatens the existence of a fundamental right by encompassing protected activities within its prohibition. A penal statute is also said to be overbroad if it prohibits activity that is legitimate in the sense that it cannot be proscribed by exercise of the state's police power, i.e., that such prohibition is not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental interest. People v. Gross, 830 P.2d 933 (Colo. 1992).

And person to whom statute constitutionally applied cannot challenge statute. A person to whom a statute may be constitutionally applied will not be heard to challenge that statute on the ground that it may be unconstitutionally applied to others in circumstances which are not before the court. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981).

Except in first amendment cases. The rules of standing are broadened in first amendment cases to permit a party to assert the facial overbreadth of statutes which may chill the protected expression of third parties, regardless of whether the statute could be constitutionally applied to the conduct of the party before the court. People v. Seven Thirty-five East Colfax, Inc., 697 P.2d 348 (Colo. 1985).

Applied in Colo. Racing Comm'n v. Smaldone, 177 Colo. 33, 492 P.2d 619 (1972); People v. Moore, 193 Colo. 81, 562 P.2d 749 (1977).

2. Application of Vagueness Standards.

Dram shop liability statute is not unconstitutionally vague, nor does it violate equal protection of the laws since the statute is rationally related to the legitimate state purpose of preventing negligence by consumers of alcohol. Sigman v. Seafood Ltd. P'ship I, 817 P.2d 527 (Colo. 1991).

The term "habitual intemperance" in § 12-36-117 (1)(i) is not unconstitutionally vague. The term refers to repeated, uncontrolled, excessive drinking and is sufficiently specific that persons licensed to practice medicine can distinguish between permissible and impermissible conduct. Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. Hoffner, 832 P.2d 1062 (Colo. App. 1992).

Definition of practice of medicine in § 12-36-106 not unconstitutionally vague. People v. Jeffers, 690 P.2d 194 (Colo. 1984).

Grounds for discipline in the Nurse Practice Act provide adequate notice of the proscribed conduct so as not to be unconstitutionally vague. Kibler v. State, 718 P.2d 531 (Colo. 1986).

Section 12-47-128 (5)(l), which prohibited any liquor licensee's employee from soliciting patrons to purchase "any alcoholic beverage or any other thing of value" for the soliciting employee or other employee, was not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad and was rationally related to a legitimate state interest. People v. Becker, 759 P.2d 26 (Colo. 1988) (decided under law in effect prior to 1986 amendment).

Statutory definition of "child abuse" furnishes adequate notice to wrongdoers. The term "negligently" as used in § 18-6-401 is not irreconcilably at odds with "tortured" and "cruelly punished", and the statutory definition of "child abuse" is sufficiently particular to furnish adequate notice to potential wrongdoers of the proscribed conduct and to protect against discriminatory enforcement. People v. Taggart, 621 P.2d 1375 (Colo. 1981) (decided under § 18-6-401 prior to 1980 amendment).

The term "pattern of sexual abuse" is clearly and unambiguously defined in § 18-3-401 (2.5) and, therefore, the sentencing enhancement provision of § 18-3-405 (2)(c) which incorporates that term is not unconstitutionally vague. People v. Longoria, 862 P.2d 266 (Colo. 1993).

Definition of "sexual contact" in § 18-3-401 (4) is not unconstitutionally vague. People v. West, 724 P.2d 623 (Colo. 1986); People in Interest of J.A., 733 P.2d 1197 (Colo. 1987); People v. Jensen, 747 P.2d 1247 (Colo. 1987).

Statute setting out and defining all elements of crime not vague. A first-degree sexual assault statute is not unconstitutionally vague where it sets out the act, the requisite mental state, and the content of the threat used to force the victim's submission, and each of these elements is defined. People v. Thatcher, 638 P.2d 760 (Colo. 1981).

Section 18-5-504 provides ample notice to the populace of the prohibited conduct and a sufficiently precise standard for those charged with its enforcement to satisfy constitutional standards of specificity and to withstand a void for vagueness challenge. People v. O'Cana, 725 P.2d 1139 (Colo. 1986).

Definition of "burglary tools" not unconstitutionally vague. People v. Chastain, 733 P.2d 1206 (Colo. 1987).

Definition of "knife" not unconstitutionally vague. People v. Gross, 830 P.2d 933 (Colo. 1992); People ex rel. A.P.E., 988 P.2d 172 (Colo. App. 1999), rev'd on other grounds, 20 P.3d 1179 (Colo. 2001).

Public nuisance statute, § 16-13-303 (1)(c), is not unconstitutionally vague. People v. One 1967 Pontiac (GTO), 678 P.2d 1016 (Colo. 1984).

Obscenity statute (§§ 18-7-101 and 18-7-102) provides sufficiently adequate standards to enable courts and juries to apply the law consistently and is not impermissibly vague. People v. Ford, 773 P.2d 1059 (Colo. 1989).

Riot provisions give clear warning that defined conduct forbidden. Sections 18-9-101 (2) and 18-9-104 give clear warning that knowing participation in the defined conduct is forbidden and provide explicit standards to guide persons charged with their enforcement. People v. Bridges, 620 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1980).

The term "metallic knuckles" as used in § 18-12-102 (2) is unambiguous and the prohibition against possession of metallic knuckles in § 18-12-102 (4) is neither facially void for vagueness as to the prohibition of possession of metallic knuckles nor unconstitutionally vague as applied to the defendant. People ex rel. A.P.E., 988 P.2d 172 (Colo. App. 1999), rev'd on other grounds, 20 P.3d 1179 (Colo. 2001).

Term "purporting" in § 38-35-109 (3) is not unconstitutionally vague. People v. Forgey, 770 P.2d 781 (Colo. 1989).

"Emergency" sufficiently understood to be applied without violating due process. "Emergency" has a sufficiently well understood common meaning within the context of § 42-2-206 to be applied by a judge or jury without violating the due process rights of the defendant. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

The phrase "proximate cause" is sufficiently intelligible to satisfy both federal and Colorado constitutional standards of due process of law and may be used in criminal statutes. People v. Baca, 668 P.2d 1370 (Colo. 1983); People v. Rostad, 669 P.2d 126 (Colo. 1983).

Statute which requires jury to determine question of "reasonableness" is not too vague to afford a practical guide for accepted behavior. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Constitution does not require explanation of every possible penalty for violating administrative order revoking driver's license. Constitutional due process standards do not mandate that notice be given to persons adjudged habitual traffic offenders under § 42-2-203 as to the possible criminal penalty for driving in violation of an administrative order revoking the habitual traffic offender's driver's license. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Since "percent by weight" language in § 18-3-107 (2)(c) establishes sufficient standard by which to measure blood alcohol levels, such language is not vague and does not violate due process. Rickstrew v. People, 822 P.2d 505 (Colo. 1991) (decided under law in effect prior to 1989 amendment).

Term used in § 42-6-134 provides sufficient notice of proscribed conduct. The term "sold or otherwise disposed of as salvage". as used in § 42-6-134, is sufficiently definite so as to provide notice to potential wrongdoers of the proscribed conduct and to protect against discriminatory enforcement. Colo. Auto & Truck Wreckers Ass'n v. Dept. of Rev., 618 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1980).

Designating prominent landmarks as boundary of hunting area not arbitrary nor irrational. It is neither arbitrary nor irrational to designate as the boundary of a closed hunting area prominent landmarks which members of the hunting public can easily recognize and respect. Collopy v. Wildlife Comm'n, 625 P.2d 994 (Colo. 1981).

The term "any other conduct" used in ordinance proscribing harassment is unconstitutionally vague because it does not provide limits on executive discretion and a person of ordinary intelligence could not determine in advance whether a specific act would result in criminal prosecution. Longmont v. Gomez, 843 P.2d 1321 (Colo. 1993).

Definition of "window sign" contained in Denver revised municipal code is not vague. Williams v. City & County of Denver, 622 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1981).

Municipal police department standard requiring police officers to use the "highest standard of efficiency and safety" survives a vagueness challenge. Turney v. Civil Serv. Comm'n, 222 P.3d 343 (Colo App. 2009).

Definition of "religious institution" in zoning ordinance was not unconstitutionally vague. City of Colo. Springs v. Blanche, 761 P.2d 212 (Colo. 1988).

Section of ordinance which only generally describes assault weapons but does not prohibit or require the doing of anything is not unconstitutionally vague. Robertson v. City & County of Denver, 874 P. 2d 325 (Colo. 1994).

Section of ordinance is unconstitutionally vague if it does not provide adequate information to determine whether a pistol has the kind of "design history" that would make it covered by the ordinance. Robertson v. City & County of Denver, 874 P.2d 325 (Colo. 1994).

Term "intended" in § 12-22-502 is vague so is severed from the definition of "drug paraphernalia", but the terms "designed" and "primarily" are not vague. High Gear & Toke Shop v. Beacom, 689 P.2d 624 (Colo. 1984).

Fair warning held not given. A state agency regulation prohibiting activities "unduly designed to increase the consumption of alcoholic beverages" fails to give fair warning necessary to comply with due process. Citizens for Free Enter. v. Dept. of Rev., 649 P.2d 1054 (Colo. 1982).

Sufficient procedural safeguards. In determining if a specific code provision gives sufficient procedural safeguards, guidance may be obtained from other provisions of the code, but it cannot be assumed from the statutory scheme itself that, unless expressly so provided, the criteria for issuing an initial liquor license or for suspending or revoking a liquor license, necessarily apply to the renewal of a liquor license. Squire Restaurant & Lounge v. Denver, 890 P.2d 164 (Colo. App. 1994).

"Good cause" standard fails to give sufficient notice. Standard in liquor code of "good cause" as the criterion for determining if a liquor license is renewed, without any implementing rules, fails to give sufficient definiteness of what conduct and conditions are required to avoid nonrenewal, fails to insure rational and consistent administrative action and effective subsequent judicial review of that action, and therefore violates due process. Some limit must be provided by the department of excise and licenses to guide discretion in determining if "good cause" for refusing to renew a liquor license exists. Squire Restaurant & Lounge v. Denver, 890 P.2d 164 (Colo. App. 1994).

Municipal ordinance requiring taxes be paid "promptly" is not unconstitutionally vague. The ordinance read as a whole is not unconstitutionally vague and there is no need to determine whether the specific word "promptly" is unconstitutionally vague. Bell & Pollock, P.C. v. City of Littleton, 910 P.2d 69 (Colo. App. 1995).

The small business exemption in § 25-14-205 (1)(h) of the Colorado Clean Indoor Air Act is not unconstitutionally vague nor are the definitions in § 25-14-203 (5)(a) and (5)(b). Coal. for Equal Rights v. Owens, 458 F. Supp. 2d 1251 (D. Colo. 2006), aff'd sub nom. Coal. for Equal Rights, Inc. v. Ritter, 517 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2008).

Defendant's no contact with persons under age 18 order was not facially or as applied to defendant unconstitutionally vague. The language of the order was sufficiently clear to warn defendant to avoid the mere proximity of a child. Sitting in a restaurant booth next to a child even though defendant did not look at, speak to, or touch the child violated that order. People v. Devorss, 277 P.3d 829 (Colo. App. 2011).

IV. EQUAL PROTECTION.

A. Generally.

And guarantees like treatment for similarly situated parties. The right to equal protection of the laws guarantees that all parties who are similarly situated receive like treatment by the law. J.T. v. O'Rourke ex rel. Tenth Judicial Dist., 651 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1982); People in Interest of M.C., 750 P.2d 69 (Colo. App. 1987), aff'd, 774 P.2d 857 (Colo. 1989); People v. Garberding, 787 P.2d 154 (Colo. 1990); Bloomer v. Boulder County Bd. of Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 936 (Colo. 1990); Estate of Stevenson v. Hollywood Bar, 832 P.2d 718 (Colo. 1992); Mayo v. Nat'l Farmers Union, 833 P.2d 54 (Colo. 1992); State, Dept. of Health v. The Mill, 887 P.2d 993 (Colo. 1994); People v. Gardner, 919 P.2d 850 (Colo. App. 1995).

The general assembly may prescribe more severe penalties for conduct it perceives to have more severe consequences, even if the differences are only a matter of degree, so long as the classifications of criminal behavior are based on differences reasonably related to the general purpose of the legislation. Therefore §§ 18-8-706 and 18-8-704 are factually distinguishable and reasonable grounds exist to support differences in punishment provided for each. People v. Gardner, 919 P.2d 850 (Colo. App. 1995).

However, statutes that impose different penalties for what ostensibly might be different conduct, but offer no intelligible standard for distinguishing the proscribed conduct, violate equal protection. People v. Gardner, 919 P.2d 850 (Colo. App. 1995).

To withstand an equal protection challenge, a statutory classification must turn on reasonably intelligible standards and be sufficiently coherent and discrete so that persons of average intelligence can reasonable distinguish the conduct proscribed. People v. Gardner, 919 P.2d 850 (Colo. App. 1995).

The right to equal protection of the laws applies only where there is state action, rather than private individual action. Mayo v. Nat'l Farmers Union, 833 P.2d 54 (Colo. 1992).

The direct file statute does not discriminate against a juvenile in district court based on whether it was a direct file or transfer, so the statute does not violate the requirement of uniform operation of laws. Flakes v. People, 153 P.3d 427 (Colo. 2007).

B. Fundamental Rights/Interests/Liberties.

Nonresidents do not have fundamental right to vote in elections in this state. Millis v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 626 P.2d 652 (Colo. 1981).

The fundamental right of citizens to participate equally in the political process is guaranteed by the equal protection clause and any attempt to infringe on an independently identifiable group's ability to exercise that right is subject to strict judicial scrutiny. Evans v. Romer, 854 P.2d 1270 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 959, 114 S. Ct. 419, 126 L.Ed.2d 365 (1994); Evans v. Romer, 882 P.2d 1335 (Colo. 1994), aff'd, 517 U.S. 620, 116 S. Ct. 1620, 134 L. Ed. 2d 855 (1996).

A resident of a state has no constitutional right to sue the state or its political subdivisions. The right to maintain an action against a governmental entity is derived from statutes. Simon v. State Comp. Ins. Auth., 903 P.2d 1139 (Colo. App. 1994), rev'd on other grounds, 946 P.2d 1298 (Colo. 1997).

The right to recover damages in tort is not a fundamental right. Dove v. Delgado, 808 P.2d 1270 (Colo. 1991).

Constitutional privacy interest that of reproductive autonomy. The privacy interest implicated in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965), was that of reproductive autonomy. R. McG. v. J.W., 200 Colo. 345, 615 P.2d 666 (1980).

And interest belongs to individual. The privacy interest in reproductive autonomy belongs to the individual and not to the family as a unit. R. McG. v. J.W., 200 Colo. 345, 615 P.2d 666 (1980).

Plaintiffs' interests as parents responsible for maintaining the stability and autonomy of their family relationships are rights subject to the protection of procedural due process standards. Watso v. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 841 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1992).

A parent has a fundamental liberty interest in the care, custody, and management of a child. However, that parental right to due process is subject to the power of the state to act in the child's best interest. People in Interest of M.H., 855 P.2d 15 (Colo. App. 1993); People in Interest of E.I.C., 958 P.2d 511 (Colo. App. 1998).

And suit by unmarried natural father to establish paternity does not implicate interest. A suit by a natural father not married to a natural mother to establish his paternity of a child born to the natural mother while she was married to another did not implicate the privacy interest in reproductive autonomy of the natural mother and her spouse. R. McG. v. J.W., 200 Colo. 345, 615 P.2d 666 (1980).

Abortion and child support. There is no violation of equal protection in the statutory obligation of both parents to pay child support or in the denial to an unwed father of the right to demand the termination of pregnancy. People in Interest of S.P.B., 651 P.2d 1213 (Colo. 1982).

Child support. There is no violation of equal protection in the statutory obligation to pay child support retroactive to the date of the child's birth because it treats unmarried parents and married parents the same. People ex rel. B.W., 17 P.3d 199 (Colo. App. 2000).

Court's construction of Uniform Parentage Act violated section. Juvenile court's construction of the Uniform Parentage Act, denying a natural father not married to the natural mother the statutory capacity or standing to commence a paternity action in connection with a child born to the natural mother during her marriage to another in order to establish that he was the natural father of the child, violated equal protection of the laws under the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution, this section, and the equal rights amendment to the Colorado Constitution, § 29 of art. II, Colo. Const. R. McG. v. J.W., 200 Colo. 345, 615 P.2d 666 (1980).

Education not fundamental right. The Colorado Constitution does not establish education as a fundamental right, and it does not require that the general assembly establish a central public school finance system restricting each school district to equal expenditures per student. Lujan v. Colo. State Bd. of Educ., 649 P.2d 1005 (Colo. 1982).

Education is not a fundamental right under the United States Constitution. Lujan v. Colo. State Bd. of Educ., 649 P.2d 1005 (Colo. 1982).

Uniform taxation not fundamental right. The right to uniform state taxation is not fundamental and therefore does not require application of the strict scrutiny standard. Colo. Dept. of Soc. Servs. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 697 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1985).

Right to drive automobile not fundamental. The right to drive an automobile upon the public highways of Colorado does not enjoy the selective status of fundamentality. Heninger v. Charnes, 200 Colo. 194, 613 P.2d 884 (1980).

Freedom of movement of juvenile not fundamental right. Juvenile's liberty interest in freedom of movement is not a fundamental right and ordinance prohibiting loitering by juveniles does not unconstitutionally infringe upon liberty interest where ordinance was narrowly drawn and state interests justified juvenile curfew. People in Interest of J.M., 768 P.2d 219 (Colo. 1989).

Position as officer of state parole board not fundamental right. An officer of the state parole board has no property or vested interest in the public office and procedural protections of due process do not apply. Wilkerson v. State of Colo., 830 P.2d 1121 (Colo. App. 1992).

Involuntary commitment to a mental hospital is a deprivation of liberty which the state cannot accomplish without procedural safeguards. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

Commitment to a mental institution constitutes a severe infringement on the basic interest of an individual to be free from governmental restraint and thus requires due process protection. People v. Chavez, 629 P.2d 1040 (Colo. 1981).

And individual's and state's interests balanced in short-term certification hearing. Since certification under § 12-10-107 carries a possibility of confinement within a treatment facility for up to three months, the proper standard of proof in a short-term certification hearing is found by balancing the individual's interest in not being confined against the state's interest in providing care and treatment, while minimizing the risk of erroneous decisions. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

State has interest in providing treatment to one whose mental condition poses threat. The state's interest in certifying an individual for short-term treatment is to provide care to one whose mental condition poses a threat to society or to the person himself. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

Liberty interest and physical restraints attendant to psychiatric commitment. A minor has a protectible liberty interest in being free from the physical restraints attendant to commitment in a psychiatric hospital. In re P.F. v. Walsh, 648 P.2d 1067 (Colo. 1982).

Receipt of workers' compensation benefits is not a fundamental right. Pace Membership Warehouse v. Axelson, 938 P.2d 504 (Colo. 1997).

An interest in one's reputation is entitled to constitutional protection only if an injury to that reputation is accompanied by an impairment to some more tangible interest. Carlson v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 950 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1997).

A person has a protected property interest only if he or she has a legitimate claim of entitlement to it as opposed to a unilateral expectation. The fact that the general assembly created a right to a hearing in certain circumstances does not mean that the person granted that right is independently entitled to a hearing as a matter of constitutional law. Carlson v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 950 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1997).

A person is not deprived of a liberty interest if he or she is not rehired in one position but is free to seek another. Carlson v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 950 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1997).

The possibility of future harm to prospective employment is too intangible to comprise a constitutional deprivation of a protected liberty interest. Carlson v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 950 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1997).

C. Standard for Review of Equal Protection Claims.

First prerequisite to meritorious equal protection claim is showing that the state has adopted a classification that affects similarly situated groups in an unequal manner. People in Interest of M.C., 750 P.2d 69 (Colo. App. 1987), aff'd, 774 P.2d 857 (Colo. 1989); Western Metal v. Acoustical & Const., 851 P.2d 875 (Colo. 1993).

If persons are not situated similarly, their equal protection challenge must fail. Western Metal v. Acoustical & Const., 851 P.2d 875 (Colo. 1993); State, Dept. of Health v. The Mill, 887 P.2d 993 (Colo. 1994); Diamond Shamrock Ref. and Mktg. Co. v. Colo. Dept. of Labor & Employment, 976 P.2d 286 (Colo. App.

1998).

A threshold question in an equal protection challenge is whether the classes created by a statute are similarly situated but nonetheless are subjected to disparate treatment. Harris v. The Ark, 810 P.2d 226 (Colo. 1991); People v. Black, 915 P.2d 1257 (Colo. 1996).

Identical treatment not required. Equal protection does not require that all persons be dealt with identically, but it does require that a distinction have some relevance to the purpose for which the classification is made. People v. Fetty, 650 P.2d 541 (Colo. 1982).

Because there are differences between the respective disabilities and legal incapacities of mentally disabled persons and minors, there is no constitutional requirement that these categories of persons be treated exactly the same way. People in Interest of M.M., 726 P.2d 1108 (Colo. 1986).

But classifications based on impermissible criteria prohibited. The equal protection guarantee of this provision insures that all individuals be treated fairly in their exercise of fundamental rights and that suspect classifications based on impermissible criteria be eliminated. Lujan v. Colo. State Bd. of Educ., 649 P.2d 1005 (Colo. 1982).

Classification bearing reasonable relationship to legitimate purpose permitted. In the absence of a suspect class or the infringement upon a fundamental right, a statutory classification will be upheld if it bears a reasonable relationship to a legitimate governmental purpose. People v. Montoya, 647 P.2d 1203 (Colo. 1982).

The legislature is permitted to adopt any classification as long as the classification bears a reasonable relationship to a proper legislative purpose and is not arbitrary or discriminatory. People in Interest of D.G., 733 P.2d 1199 (Colo. 1987).

When the classification does not involve a fundamental right, suspect class, or classification based on gender, the court must use a rational basis test to determine whether the statute violates the person's right to equal protection of the laws. Charlton v. Kimata, 815 P.2d 946 (Colo. 1991); Rodriguez v. Schutt, 896 P.2d 881 (Colo. App. 1994), rev'd on other grounds, 914 P.2d 921 (Colo. 1996).

The test to be applied to determine whether equal protection standards have been violated is whether the classification is reasonable and bears a rational relationship to legitimate state objectives. J.T. v. O'Rourke ex rel. Tenth Judicial Dist., 651 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1982); Branson v. City & County of Denver, 707 P.2d 338 (Colo. 1985); Tassian v. People, 731 P.2d 672 (Colo. 1987).

Due process requires that legislation bear a rational relationship to a legitimate end of government. Colo. Soc. of Comm. & Inst. Psychologists, Inc. v. Lamm, 741 P.2d 707 (Colo. 1987); Bloomer v. Boulder County Bd. of Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 942 (Colo. 1990).

Equal protection and statutory classifications. Equal protection of the laws requires that statutory classifications be based on differences that are real in fact and are reasonably related to the general purposes of the enacted legislation. People v. Montoya, 647 P.2d 1203 (Colo. 1982); People v. Weller, 679 P.2d 1077 (Colo. 1984); People v. Finnessey, 747 P.2d 673 (Colo. 1987).

Where the statutory classification does not infringe on a fundamental right or adversely affect a suspect class--such as one based on race or national origin--or does not establish a classification triggering an intermediate level of scrutiny--such as classifications based on illegitimacy or gender--a rational basis standard of review is the controlling legal norm in resolving an equal protection challenge. Harris v. The Ark, 810 P.2d 226 (Colo.

1991); People v. Black, 915 P.2d 1257 (Colo. 1996).

Regulatory classification ordinarily upheld if distinctions reasonable and rational. A regulatory classification which neither impinges on fundamental rights nor affects suspect classes will be upheld if the distinctions made have a reasonable basis and are rationally related to a legitimate state interest. Collopy v. Wildlife Comm'n, 625 P.2d 994 (Colo. 1981); Tassian v. People, 731 P.2d 672 (Colo. 1987); City of Montrose v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 732 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1987).

There is no rational basis for a classification that provides greater benefits for less severe injuries, and so the definition of "employee" in the Workers' Compensation Act must be construed to entitle an unpaid student intern to an imputed wage for purposes of calculating medical impairment benefits for an unscheduled injury when the intern would be entitled to such benefits for a presumptively less severe scheduled injury. Kinder v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 976 P.2d 295 (Colo. App. 1998).

Administrative convenience, by itself, does not constitute a valid basis for the imposition of disparate treatment upon persons who, with respect to activity in question, are basically in same position as others who are not singled out for different treatment. Tassian v. People, 731 P.2d 672 (Colo. 1987).

Gender-based distinctions must serve important governmental objectives, and a discriminatory classification must be substantially related to the achievement of those objectives in order to withstand judicial scrutiny under the equal protection clause. People in Interest of S.P.B., 651 P.2d 1213 (Colo. 1982).

Wealth not suspect classification. Wealth alone is not a suspect classification in Colorado. The Colorado Constitution does not forbid disparities in wealth, nor does it forbid persons residing in one district from taxing themselves at a rate higher than persons in another district. Lujan v. Colo. State Bd. of Educ., 649 P.2d 1005 (Colo. 1982).

For the three standards of review within equal protection analysis, see Lujan v. Colo. State Bd. of Educ., 649 P.2d 1005 (Colo. 1982); 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990); Evans v. Romer, 854 P.2d 1270 (Colo. 1993), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 959, 114 S. Ct. 419, 126 L.Ed.2d 365 (1994).

Intermediate standard of review for equal protection claims. The legislative classification must be narrowly tailored to serve a substantial governmental interest. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

The intermediate standard of review should be applied where the activity arguably involves some degree of constitutionally protected expression, but where the expressive component of such activity is secondary to the conduct itself. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

The rational basis test requires a court to determine, first, whether the classification has some rational basis in fact and, second, whether it is rationally related to a legitimate interest. Rodriguez v. Schutt, 896 P.2d 881 (Colo. App. 1994), rev'd on other grounds, 914 P.2d 921 (Colo. 1996).

In the absence of a fundamental right, a suspect class, or a classification triggering an intermediate standard of scrutiny, a rational basis of review applies to equal protection claims. Ramseyer v. Colo. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 895 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1995).

Rational relationship standard, rather than intermediate standard of review, was proper standard to apply in determining whether classifications created under the Workers' Compensation Act of Colorado based upon age and degree of disability were valid under the state constitution. Romero v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 902 P.2d 896 (Colo. App. 1995), aff'd, 912 P.2d 62 (Colo. 1996).

Economic regulations are reviewed under "rational basis" test for purposes of equal protection to determine whether state action was rationally related to a legitimate state purpose. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 763 P.2d 1020 (Colo. 1988).

The classification made by § 34-60-118.5 is rationally related to a legitimate state purpose, and there is no equal protection violation where the statute vests the oil and gas commission with jurisdiction over parties with a dispute over only the timing of a payment but does not vest such jurisdiction if there is a dispute over whether a payment is owed. Grynberg v. Colo. Oil & Gas Comm'n, 7 P.3d 1060 (Colo. App. 1999).

Time, place, and manner restrictions upon conduct involving some expressive component is permitted as long as restrictions are content neutral, do not unreasonably limit alternative avenues of communication, and are tailored to effectuate a substantial governmental interest. Such restrictions need not eliminate all less restrictive alternatives. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

Standard for review of opportunity to recover attorney's fees. Equality of opportunity to recover attorney's fees is not a fundamental right, and therefore the rational relationship test, not the strict scrutiny test, is the appropriate standard for equal protection review. Torres v. Portillos, 638 P.2d 274 (Colo. 1981).

There is a rational basis in § 19-2-511 for distinguishing between out-of-state runaways and in-state runaways. The state has a legitimate state interest in conducting effective and timely police interrogation as part of the investigation process. People v. Blankenship, 119 P.3d 552 (Colo. App. 2005).

D. Application of Equal Protection Standards.

1. Driving Privileges.

Revocation of driver's license does implicate procedural due process protections. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Proceeding revoking habitual offender's driver's license deemed civil. The administrative proceeding to revoke a driver's license because of an habitual traffic offender status is a civil one. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Procedures for revocation of driver's license adequate to accord due process. The Colorado procedures for revocation of a driver's license, which require notice and administrative hearing in advance of revocation and which permit appeal of any order of revocation, are fully adequate to accord procedural due process to the licensee. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Procedures to determine habitual traffic offender status fundamentally fair. The procedures upon which prosecutions under § 42-2-206 are based are fundamentally fair, are adequate to assure an accurate determination of habitual traffic offender status, and accord due process of law to a licensee later accused of "driving after judgment prohibited". People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Equal protection was not violated by statutory scheme prohibiting issuance of probationary license to driver whose license was revoked administratively for operating a motor vehicle with an excessive alcoholic content but permitting issuance of such a license to a driver whose license was revoked following conviction of the criminal offense of DUI or DWAI. Bath v. State Dept. of Rev., 758 P.2d 1381 (Colo. 1988); Hancock v. State Dept. of Rev., 758 P.2d 1372 (Colo. 1988).

When disparate treatment is not violative of equal protection. Although under the implied consent law a person refusing to submit to a chemical test is subject to a mandatory revocation without any opportunity for a probationary license, while a person actually convicted of driving under the influence is subject to a mandatory revocation but nonetheless may apply for a probationary license, this disparity in treatment does not violate equal protection of the laws. Drake v. Colo. Dept. of Rev., 674 P.2d 359 (Colo. 1984).

Right to equal protection not violated where driver's license was revoked for failure to provide urine sample under § 42-4-1202 which does not provide for alternative types of drug testing in the event of physical impairment. Halter v. Dept. of Rev., 857 P.2d 535 (Colo. App. 1993).

Legislative choice affording certain class of traffic offenders opportunity to obtain license reasonable. The legislative choice to afford a certain class of traffic offenders manifesting a history of alcohol abuse an opportunity to obtain a probationary license under certain conditions, but prohibiting the issuance of any license to a habitual traffic offender, is not unreasonable. Heninger v. Charnes, 200 Colo. 194, 613 P.2d 884 (1980).

Use of hearsay evidence in license revocation hearing constitutional. If the hearsay evidence which is relied upon to establish an element for revocation of a driver's license is sufficiently reliable and trustworthy, evidence possesses probative value commonly accepted by reasonable and prudent persons in the conduct of their affairs and the licensee had the right to present evidence rebutting any element of the prima facie case, then the hearing officer may, without violating due process, rely on such hearsay evidence alone, in entering a finding for revocation. Colo. Dept. of Rev. v. Kirke, 743 P.2d 16 (Colo. 1987); Colo. Div. of Rev. v. Lounsbury, 743 P.2d 23 (Colo. 1987); Dawson v. State Dept. of Rev., 757 P.2d 1144 (Colo. App. 1988).

Where hearsay statements were made in the course and conduct of the officer's duties and where licensee had the statutory right to subpoena and cross-examine the officer regarding such statements, the hearsay evidence was sufficiently reliable and trustworthy and licensee's due process rights were not violated by the use of such evidence at the driver's license revocation hearing. Colo. Div. of Rev. v. Lunsbury, 734 P.2d 23 (Colo. 1987); Charnes v. Lobato, 743 P.2d 27 (Colo. 1987); Heller v. Velasquez, 743 P.2d 34 (Colo. 1987); Charnes v. Olona, 743 P.2d 36 (Colo. 1987).

DUI officer's testimony was sufficiently reliable and trustworthy when the statement that he conveyed was made by an investigating officer in the course of his law enforcement duties and after he had requested the assistance of the DUI officer to determine whether there was alcohol involvement. Colo. Dept. of Rev. v. Kirke, 743 P.2d 16 (Colo. 1987).

Failure to provide itemized accounting of prior traffic violations in notice not violative of due process. Ryan v. Charnes, 738 P.2d 1175 (Colo. 1987).

Penalty for driving while license denied, suspended, or revoked upheld. Section 42-2-130(3) furthers a legitimate governmental purpose by penalizing drivers under denial, suspension, or revocation who commit additional traffic offenses and does not violate equal-protection guarantees. Allen v. Charnes, 674 P.2d 378 (Colo. 1984).

Application of habitual offender provision to prior liquor offense conviction constitutional. In view of the pronounced legislative policy of providing maximum safety for highway travelers and users, the application of § 42-2-202 (2)(a)(I), referring to habitual offenders, to a prior conviction under prior § 13-5-30 (now § 42-4-1202) clearly comports with due process of law. Van Gerpen v. Peterson, 620 P.2d 714 (Colo. 1980).

Implied consent provision constitutional. In a revocation under the implied consent statute, there is no statutory discretion in the hearing officer to authorize dispositional alternatives upon a determination of a driver's unjustified refusal to submit to a chemical test. Therefore the section does not violate due process of law. Davis v. Colo. Dept. of Rev., 623 P.2d 874 (Colo. 1981).

Failure to warn a driver that evidence of his refusal to take blood or breath test may be used against him at trial coupled with the subsequent use of the evidence at trial does not violate due process under either the federal or the state constitution. Cox v. People, 735 P.2d 153 (Colo. 1987).

2. Juvenile Cases.

Juveniles adjudicated delinquent and adults convicted of crimes are not similarly situated. People in Interest of M.C., 750 P.2d 69 (Colo. App. 1987), aff'd, 774 P.2d 857 (Colo. 1989).

Where a person is adjudicated a delinquent child at age 17 and is 18 at the time of the dispositional order, equal protection is not violated where the juvenile court retains jurisdiction and proceeds with disposition, even though similar situated adults are subject to different sanctions contained in the criminal code. People in Interest of M.C., 774 P.2d 857 (Colo. 1989).

There is no error in the use of the rational basis test with regard to juvenile's commitment. While commitment of an adjudicated delinquent offender implicates a significant liberty interest, that interest is not so fundamental as to require the employment of a strict scrutiny analysis to resolve a challenge premised upon denial of equal protection of the laws. People v. T.S.R., 843 P.2d 105 (Colo. App. 1992).

Detention of juveniles possessing deadly weapons prior to the conclusion of formal adjudicatory proceedings serves a legitimate state objective in view of the relationship between possession of a deadly weapon by a juvenile and the risk of imminent and serious harm to the community or the juvenile. Trial court's findings that confinement of juveniles in certain secure detention facilities constituted punishment did not resolve the issue of the facial validity of statute creating presumption of dangerousness. A court must consider the legislative purposes giving rise to the statute, the relationship between the statutory provisions and the purposes, and the procedures authorized by the statute. People v. Juvenile Court, 893 P.2d 81 (Colo. 1995).

It is a valid exercise of prosecutorial discretion for prosecutors to select which of the juveniles who meet the statutory requirement for direct filing will be filed upon in district court. It is not unreasonable to treat certain offenders differently from others and no equal protection or substantive due process violation arises. People v. Hughes, 946 P.2d 509 (Colo. App. 1997).

3. Criminal Statutes - Sentencing.

General conspiracy statute and specific statute punishing marihuana conspiracies are not proscribing identical conduct; therefore, their imposition of different penalties does not violate equal protection. People v. Finnessey, 747 P.2d 673 (Colo. 1987).

When an offender who acts with a less culpable intent may receive a greater penalty than the offender who acts with a greater culpable intent, such a statutory scheme is unreasonably structured and does not meet the requirements of equal protection, even though the two offenses result in the same harm. People v. Blizzard, 852 P.2d 418 (Colo. 1993) (decided under law in effect prior to 1991 amendment); Smith v. People, 852 P.2d 420 (Colo. 1993).

Punishment reasonably related to legitimate governmental interest. The fixing of punishments for offenders, based upon the date on which their crimes were committed, is reasonably related to these legitimate governmental interests and is not violative of equal protection. People v. Montoya, 647 P.2d 1203 (Colo. 1982).

Defendant not denied equal protection where tried under general theft statute rather than specific theft of television service statute where specific statute was enacted after defendant's arrest and applied to offenses occurring after effective date. People v. Collyer, 736 P.2d 1267 (Colo. App. 1987).

Inmate classification decisions are within the discretion of department of corrections officials. As such, defendant's continued medium security classification violates neither the liberty interest protected under the due process clause nor the guarantee of equal protection so long as the classification bears a rational relationship to a legitimate state purpose. Milligan v. State Dept. of Corr., 751 P.2d 75 (Colo. App. 1988).

Subjecting parolees to the discretion of the parole board rather than the Code of Penal Discipline does not violate equal protection. Parolees are not similarly situated with inmates in this case. Although inmates and parolees are both technically under the custody of the department of corrections, they are supervised by different entities. Parolees are supervised by the parole board and the inmates are supervised by the department of corrections, each a separate entity in the executive branch. People v. Barber, 74 P.3d 444 (Colo. App. 2003).

Equal protection of the laws is not violated by sentencing in the aggravated range for a crime of violence based on the use of a deadly weapon during the commission of first degree assault. People v. Montoya, 736 P.2d 1208 (Colo. 1987).

No equal protection violation where conviction for child abuse resulting in death under § 18-1-105 and this section is interpreted to preclude a sentence reduction below the mandatory minimum as compared to a reduction or modification of a mandatory crime of violence sentence. People v. Smith, 992 P.2d 635 (Colo. App. 1999).

Equal protection is not violated when a defendant is charged for the same conduct with both unlawful use of a controlled substance and unlawful possession of a controlled substance because unlawful use and unlawful possession are distinct offenses that each require proof of at least one fact that the other does not. People v. District Ct. of 11th Jud. Dist., 964 P.2d 498 (Colo. 1998).

No equal protection violation where person convicted of class four felony theft is punished more severely than a class four felony sex offender. Felony classes do not themselves create "classes" for purposes of equal protection analysis; defendant is only "similarly situated" with defendants who commit the same or similar acts. People v. Friesen, 45 P.3d 784 (Colo. App. 2001); People v. Walker, 75 P.3d 722 (Colo. App. 2002).

No equal protection violation because nonviolent sex offense is not identical to a violent sex offense and the punishments for the different types of offenses are not the same. People v. Strean, 74 P.3d 387 (Colo. App. 2002).

While charges are similar, difference between attempted first degree extreme indifference murder and assault in the first degree is not so lacking in objective content as to render the penalty differential for the offenses violative of equal protection. People v. Ellis, 30 P.3d 774 (Colo. App. 2001).

No equal protection violation where defendant received more severe sentence as an accessory than he would have received for false reporting. The two offenses are distinguishable. A deliberate attempt to thwart law enforcement is more destructive than conduct not designed to do so. People v. Preciado-Flores, 66 P.3d 155 (Colo. App. 2002).

No equal protection violation where the mandatory parole scheme imposes a more severe sanction on non-sex offenders than on sex offenders whose crimes are in the same felony classification. People v. Harper, 111 P.3d 482 (Colo. App. 2004).

Defendant's claim that he was punished more harshly under subsection (2) than if he were sentenced under subsection (1) based on parole eligibility is not an equal protection violation. The general assembly could have rationally concluded to differ the sentences since subsection (1) is triggered by two previous convictions and subsection (2) is triggered by three previous convictions. People v. Dean, 2012 COA 106, 292 P.3d 1066.

Ordering restitution regardless of the defendant's ability to pay does not violate due process. However, due process does provide that probation may not be revoked if the defendant establishes that he or she is unable to make restitution payments. People v. Stafford, 93 P.3d 572 (Colo. App. 2004).

No equal protection violation where offender convicted of a nonsexual offense would receive mandatory parole, but an offender convicted of a comparable nonsexual offense in which there is an underlying factual basis of unlawful sexual behavior would receive discretionary parole under § 17-2-201 (5)(a). Offenders are not similarly situated because different behavior triggers the different parole requirements. People v. Fritschler, 87 P.3d 186 (Colo. App. 2003).

The terms "serious bodily injury" and "bodily injury" in § 18-1-901 do not suffer from an equal protection problem because they only overlap if serious bodily injury is given an unreasonably broad interpretation. People v. Summitt, 104 P.3d 232 (Colo. App. 2004), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 132 P.3d 320 (Colo. 2006).

No violation of equal protection because the Colorado Organized Crime Control Act (COCCA) punishes defendant with a class 2 felony when the two underlying predicate crimes are misdemeanors. The additional requirement that the offense be conducted as a part of an enterprise satisfies the related legislative purpose of deterring organized crime. People v. McGlotten, 166 P.3d 182 (Colo. App. 2007).

Defendant's claim that § 18-6-401 (1)(c) violated equal protection fails because subsections (1)(c) and (7)(a)(I) to (VI) do not affect persons who are similarly situated. People v. Laurent, 194 P.3d 1053 (Colo. App. 2008) (decided under law in effect prior to 2006 amendment to § 18-6-401 (1)(c)).

Defendant who pleads guilty may not bring an as-applied equal protection postconviction challenge. People v. Ford, 232 P.3d 260 (Colo. App. 2009).

4. Jury Selection.

Evaluating claims of racial discrimination in jury selection under the equal protection clause involves the following: (1) The defendant must show the prosecution has excluded potential jurors based on race; (2) if so shown, the prosecution must articulate a race-neutral explanation for removing the jurors in question; (3) if so articulated, the court must decide if the defendant carried the burden of proving purposeful discrimination. People v. Cerrone, 854 P.2d 178 (Colo. 1993).

Test applied in People v. Mendoza, 876 P.2d 98 (Colo. App. 1994); People v. Hughes, 946 P.2d 509 (Colo. App. 1997); People v. Collins, 187 P.3d 1178 (Colo. App. 2008).

Objection to allegedly improper exclusion of juror on account of race must be made before venire is dismissed and the trial begins. People v. Mendoza, 876 P.2d 98 (Colo. App. 1994).

Excluding a person from jury service because of the person's race is unconstitutional discrimination against the prospective juror as well as the defendant. Fields v. People, 732 P.2d 1145 (Colo. 1987).

Defendant must be allowed to rebut the prosecutor's explanation of why three Hispanic jurors were excused when there is a claim of racial discrimination in peremptory challenges. People v. Mendoza, 876 P.2d 98 (Colo. App. 1994).

Total exclusion of Spanish-surnamed persons from the group of prospective jurors brought to voir dire established a prima facie case of racial discrimination and a denial of equal protection. Prosecution could offer no specific explanation for excluding Spanish-surnamed persons and general assertions that there was no discrimination was insufficient to rebut the showing of discrimination. People v. Cerrone, 829 P.2d 468 (Colo. App. 1991).

Where defendant claimed racial discrimination in peremptory challenges, a systematic pattern of exclusions is neither necessary nor sufficient for making out a prima facie showing, but may be part of the totality of the circumstances. People v. Hughes, 946 P.2d 509 (Colo. App. 1997).

Great deference is given to the trial court's findings based largely on its ability to assess the demeanor and credibility of the prosecutor. People v. Hughes, 946 P.2d 509 (Colo. App. 1997).

Question of whether a party has established a prima facie case of racial discrimination during the jury selection process is a matter of law to which an appellate court should apply a de novo standard of review. Valdez v. People, 966 P.2d 587 (Colo. 1998).

Once proponent has articulated race-neutral reasons for exercising a peremptory challenge, trial court's determination of whether proponent has exercised purposeful racial discrimination is reviewed only for clear error. People v. Collins, 187 P.3d 1178 (Colo. App. 2008).

Striking a single potential juror for a discriminatory reason violates the equal protection clause even where jurors of the same race are seated. People v. Collins, 187 P.3d 1178 (Colo. App. 2008).

5. Elections.

Differing treatment of political organizations and political parties under § 1-4-801 serves the compelling state interest of protecting the integrity of the electoral process, therefore, such treatment does not deprive political organizations of equal protection under the law. Colo. Libertarian Party v. Sec'y of State, 817 P.2d 998 (Colo. 1991), cert. denied, 503 U.S. 985, 112 S. Ct. 1670, 118 L. Ed. 2d 390 (1992).

Nomination petition requirement does not violate equal protection. Requirement that nominating petitions circulated by individuals or political organizations contain the name of a single candidate only does not violate equal protection. Nat'l Prohibition Party v. State of Colo., 752 P.2d 80 (Colo. 1988).

General assembly has the power to determine the qualifications of voters in all public and quasi-municipal corporations, and all reasonable provisions with reference thereto will be upheld. Millis v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 626 P.2d 652 (Colo. 1981).

Charter provisions granting the right to vote to nonresident property owners does not violate plaintiff's right to equal protection. May v. Town of Mountain Vill., 969 P.2d 790 (Colo. App. 1998).

Plaintiffs were not denied access to the political process and charter provision that grants nonresident property owners the right to vote does not violate plaintiff's right to equal protection under this section. May v. Town of Mountain Vill., 969 P.2d 790 (Colo. 1998).

6. Miscellaneous.

Rational classifications do not violate equal protection. In implementing social programs designed to promote public health, safety, and welfare, the state is not required to treat all persons or entities equally for purposes of imposing a tax. Claim of Woloson, 796 P.2d 1 (Colo. App. 1989).

Where judge's directive prohibited pro se litigants from paying filing fees by personal checks, equal protection clause was violated absent rational basis for distinguishing between pro se litigants and litigants represented by attorneys. Tassian v. People, 731 P.2d 672 (Colo. 1987).

Act requiring sand and gravel pit owners and operators who excavate pits after 1980 to obtain well permits and augmentation plans while exempting other owners and operators of sand and gravel pits does not violate equal protection or due process requirements. Act represents a rational effort of the general assembly to achieve the legitimate governmental purpose of developing a program of administration of sand and gravel pits. Central Colo. Water v. Simpson, 877 P.2d 335 (Colo. 1994).

Due process and equal protection rights under the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution not violated by denying defendant a free transcript of prior proceedings where transcript would have offered relatively little value to defendant in the presentation of an effective defense. Matthews v. Price, 83 F.3d 328 (10th Cir. 1996).

Due process and equal protection rights under the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution not violated by denying defendant an investigator or a psychiatric expert at state expense where defendant did not demonstrate that such services were necessary to an adequate defense or that the court's refusal to appoint such experts substantially prejudiced his defense. Matthews v. Price, 83 F.3d 328 (10th Cir. 1996).

The statutory employer provisions of the Worker's Compensation Act do not violate the state constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the laws in terms of similarly situated employees. The classification is reasonably related to the legitimate governmental objective of providing monetary relief for injured employees, without regard to fault. Curtiss v. GSX Corp. of Colo., 774 P.2d 873 (Colo. 1989).

The industrial claim appeals panel's interpretation of worker's compensation exemption does not violate equal protection requirements. The owners of other real property are not similarly situated with owners or occupants of qualified residential real property. The exemption is compatible with the normal expectations of property owners who contract with craftsmen and artisans for work on residential properties. Brown v. Muto, 943 P.2d 38 (Colo. App. 1996).

Because fundamental rights are not implicated by the Workers' Compensation Act, the rational basis standard of review applies to claims that a part of the act violates equal protection. Waddell v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 964 P.2d 552 (Colo. App. 1998).

Section 8-42-104(2), which provides for apportionment of liability for workers' compensation claims does not deny equal protection to an employee who becomes permanently and totally disabled as the result of multiple industrial accidents even though such an employee may receive fewer benefits than an employee who is permanently and totally disabled as the result of a single industrial accident. Waddell v. Indus. Claim Appeals Office, 964 P.2d 552 (Colo. App. 1998).

Exclusion of fringe benefits of employment from definition of "wages" of employees in agricultural industry violates equal protection guarantees. Higgs v. Western Landscaping & Sprinkler Sys., Inc., 804 P.2d 161 (Colo. 1991).

Employment Security Act is constitutional exercise of police powers. The act assures a measure of security to citizens against the hazard of unemployment and in furtherance of that end the general assembly is authorized to levy a tax on employers to defray the cost thereof. Claim of Woloson, 796 P.2d 1 (Colo. App. 1989).

State personnel statutory section setting forth a monthly maximum salary level limitation for state employees does not violate equal protection standard. Section 24-50-104, which sets forth such limitation represents a reasonable exercise of the general assembly's responsibility for maintaining the fiscal integrity of the state personnel system and does not discriminate between members of specific classes or grades of employees. Dempsy v. Romer, 825 P.2d 44 (Colo. 1992).

A policy of not promoting state employees with ongoing administrative appeals is rationally related to the legitimate government purposes of maintaining workplace harmony and avoiding disruption. Teigen v. Renfrow, 511 F.3d 1072 (10th Cir. 2007).

For purposes of the equal protection clause, department of corrections defendants had a legitimate interest as a state employer in preventing employees who had invoked the administrative appeal process from moving into new positions within the agency or receiving other discretionary employment benefits. Teigen v. Renfrow, 511 F.3d 1072 (10th Cir. 2007).

A rational basis exists for using the federal criteria and for including garnished income in determining eligibility for old age pension benefits. Ramseyer v. Colo. Dept. of Soc. Servs., 895 P.2d 1188 (Colo. App. 1995).

Financing provisions of social services code not violative of equal protection because a rational relationship exists between the requirement that local entities must support a portion of the costs of programs serving the disadvantaged within their localities and the purposes of the code. Colo. Dept. of Soc. Servs. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 697 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1985).

Neither the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution nor the due process clause of this section requires that mathematical symmetry be attained between benefits received and payment for those benefits. City of Montrose v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 732 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1987).

Where the general assembly enacts legislation for a special purpose that is limited in its application and applied differently in various pilot districts, such legislation does not violate equal protection where there is a legitimate governmental interest and procedures created by the act are reasonably related to that interest. Firelock Inc. v. District Court, 776 P.2d 1090 (Colo. 1989).

Intentional discriminatory enforcement of regulations must be shown by persons asserting deprivation of equal protection through arbitrary and capricious enforcement. Zavala v. City & County of Denver, 759 P.2d 664 (Colo. 1988).

That some individuals escape prosecution under an ordinance is insufficient to establish intentional selective enforcement. Zavala v. City & County of Denver, 759 P.2d 664 (Colo. 1988).

The mere failure of a governmental regulation to allow all possible and reasonable exceptions to its application is not sufficient to render the regulation unconstitutional. Society of Comm. & Inst. Psychologists v. Lamm, 741 P.2d 707 (Colo. 1987).

Premises liability provision in § 13-21-115 is constitutional. Giebink v. Fischer, 709 F. Supp. 1012 (D. Colo. 1989).

Premises liability provision in § 13-21-115 is unconstitutional and violative of both the federal and state constitutional guarantees of equal protection of the laws. Gallegos v. Phipps, 779 P.2d 856 (Colo. 1989); Klausz v. Dillion Co., Inc., 779 P.2d 863 (Colo. 1989) (disagreeing with Giebink v. Fischer cited above).

Body execution statute does not offer equal opportunity for limiting confinement to indigent debtor and the debtor with means to satisfy monetary judgment, and is thus a violation of equal protection and unconstitutional. Kinsey v. Preeson, 746 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1987).

Body execution statute, under "rational basis" test, is unconstitutional. Even absent a determination by the court that imprisonment resulting from an execution against the body of a debtor affects a fundamental right or involves a suspect class, § 13-59-103 is unconstitutional. Kinsey v. Preeson, 746 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1987).

Release procedures of the Colorado Sex Offenders Act are not unconstitutional as being violative of due process or equal protection. People v. Kibel, 701 P.2d 37 (Colo. 1985); People v. Adrian, 701 P.2d 45 (Colo. 1985).

Governmental Immunity Act does not violate equal protection of the law. Lee v. Colo. Dept. of Health, 718 P.2d 221 (Colo. 1986).

Distinction made by the general assembly between persons injured as a result of inadequate design of a public facility for which there is governmental immunity and persons injured as a result of negligence in the construction or maintenance of a public facility for which there is no governmental immunity is reasonable under the rational basis test. Willer v. City of Thornton, 817 P.2d 514 (Colo. 1991); Simon v. State Comp. Ins. Auth., 903 P.2d 1139 (Colo. App. 1994), rev'd on other grounds, 946 P.2d 1298 (Colo. 1997).

Simple negligence as basis for 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claim. Where state law affords a plaintiff an adequate remedy to obtain redress for deprivation of his liberty interests, plaintiff's due process rights have not been violated and plaintiff consequently has no claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Collier v. Denver, 697 P.2d 396 (Colo. App. 1984), cert. dismissed, 716 P.2d 1124 (Colo. 1986).

The Colorado Clean Indoor Air Act's (CCIA) airport smoking concession exemption does not violate the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment to the U.S. constitution. The Colorado legislature, by exempting airport smoking concessions from the CCIA's operation, rationally distinguished those concessions from the majority of other indoor facilities in the state that are open to the public. Coal. for Equal Rights v. Ritter, 517 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2008).

Commission order directing utility to reacquire assets transferred without its prior approval was rationally related to the legitimate state interest of protecting ratepayers. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 763 P.2d 1020 (Colo. 1988).

Using rational basis analysis, the general assembly could have reasonably concluded that § 40-3-106 (4) would be a disincentive for municipalities to negotiate inflated franchise fees since such a fee will ultimately be paid for by the residents of the municipality. City of Montrose v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 732 P.2d 1181 (Colo. 1987). 1020 (Colo. 1988).

Plaintiffs have no standing to claim a denial of equal protection in the zoning of county owned as contrasted to commercial quarry operations. Cottonwood Farms v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 725 P.2d 57 (Colo. App. 1986), aff'd, 763 P.2d 551 (Colo. 1988).

And even if plaintiffs did have standing to claim denial of equal protection, such claim is without merit. A county's facilities and operations are exempted by § 30-28-110 (1) from zoning regulations, and ordinances or regulations which exempt public operated facilities from zoning requirements while maintaining regulation of private operations have been upheld repeatedly against constitutional attack. Cottonwood Farms v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 725 P.2d 57 (Colo. App. 1986), aff'd, 763 P.2d 551 (Colo. 1988).

Advertisers who purchase advertising space only are not similarly situated to advertisers who purchase preprinted inserts. Therefore the equal protection argument fails. Walgreen Co. v. Charnes, 911 P.2d 667 (Colo. App. 1995).

Retention of immunity of counties for dangerous conditions upon county roads is not violative of equal protection or due process. Failure to include county roads in statutory waiver of sovereign immunity bears a reasonable relationship to the legitimate governmental interest of protecting counties from being financially overburdened by liability for dangerous conditions that exist on county roads and that the county is financially unable to remedy. Bloomer v. Boulder County Bd. of Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 942 (Colo. 1990).

Rule adopted by high school athletic association, which generally prohibited student athletes who practiced with nonschool teams from competing in interscholastic athletics, does rationally further legitimate state purposes and was not enforced in an arbitrary, capricious, or haphazard manner so that plaintiff's right to equal protection of the laws was not violated. Zuments v. Colo. H.S. Activities Ass'n, 737 P.2d 1113 (Colo. App. 1987).

Rule adopted by school board that prohibited the employment of active school board members as teachers because of a conflicts of interest policy, but which did not prohibit the spouses of such members from teaching, did rationally further a legitimate governmental interest. Montrose County Sch. Dist. v. Lambert, 826 P.2d 349 (Colo. 1992).

Valedictorian who gave a speech at graduation that was different from the speech she submitted to the principal for review prior to graduation is not similarly situated to other valedictory speakers. Corder v. Lewis Palmer Sch. Dist. No. 38, 566 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 742, 175 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2009).

School district's unwritten policy of reviewing valedictory speeches prior to graduation ceremony was reasonably related to pedagogical concerns. Corder v. Lewis Palmer Sch. Dist. No. 38, 566 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 742, 175 L. Ed. 2d 515 (2009).

Receipt of workers' compensation benefits is not a fundamental right and strict and intermediate scrutiny do not apply to statutory classifications based on age. Accordingly the rational basis standard of review applies to an equal protection challenge to a workers' compensation statute. Culver v. Ace Elec., 971 P.2d 641 (Colo. 1999).

Constitutionality of social security benefit offset. Section 8-42-103(1)(c), providing for an offset of social security retirement benefits against worker's compensation benefits, does not violate equal protection under this constitutional provision. Stolworthy v. Clark, 952 P.2d 1198 (Colo. App. 1997), aff'd sub nom. Culver v. Ace Elec., 971 P.2d 641 (Colo. 1999); Culver v. Ace Elec., 952 P.2d 1200 (Colo. App. 1997), aff'd, 971 P.2d 641 (Colo. 1999).

Avoiding duplicative benefits serves a legitimate governmental interest, and imposing an offset is rationally related to that interest. Culver v. Ace Elec., 952 P.2d 1200 (Colo. App. 1997), aff'd, 971 P.2d 641 (Colo. 1999).

C.A.R. 3.4 does not violate plaintiff's constitutional right to equal protection because parents whose rights are terminated under article 5 of the Colorado Children's Code are not similarly situated to parents where rights are involuntarily terminated under article 3 of the code. C.A.R. 3.4 applies to parents subject to dependency and neglect proceedings under article 3 of the Colorado Children's Code. As such, the proceedings focus primarily on the protection and safety of the children, not on the custodial interests of the parent. Further, such a proceeding can be initiated only by the state. People ex rel. T.D., 140 P.3d 205 (Colo. App.), cert. denied, 549 U.S. 1020, 127 S. Ct. 564, 166 L. Ed. 2d 411, and 549 U.S. 1024, 127 S. Ct. 565, 166 L. Ed. 2d 419 (2006).

V. POLICE POWER.

A. Generally.

Condition on exercise of governmental regulation. The Colorado and federal constitutions condition the exercise of governmental regulation for public health, safety, and welfare by requiring that the intended goals shall be achieved through methods consistent with due process of law. Denver Cleanup Serv., Inc. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 192 Colo. 537, 561 P.2d 1252 (1977).

Police power is inherent attribute of sovereignty with which the state is endowed for the protection and general welfare of its citizens. The constitution presupposes the existence of the police power and is to be construed with reference to that fact. In re Interrogatories of Governor, 97 Colo. 587, 52 P.2d 663 (1935).

And, while very broad and far-reaching, police power is exercisable only within limits of constitution. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Constitutionally protected rights in property are subject to regulation by proper exercise of police power of state. Where utility customer was aware that construction of its system was attended with risk, it is not only the right but the duty of an appellate court to determine the issues, regardless of interim construction. Pub. Serv. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 765 P.2d 1015 (Colo. 1988).

Statutes must be narrowly drawn to effect legislative purpose and must not be overbroad. People ex rel. Losavio v. J.L., 195 Colo. 494, 580 P.2d 23 (1978).

Relationship to legitimate state goals required. An attack upon a statute on grounds that it violates due process by exceeding the authority under the police power can only be sustained where the statute is shown to have no relation to legitimate state goals. People v. Taylor, 189 Colo. 202, 540 P.2d 320 (1975).

A statute which bears no rational relationship to the legislative end sought to be achieved violates due process and is unconstitutional. People ex rel. Losavio v. J.L., 195 Colo. 494, 580 P.2d 23 (1978).

Governmental purpose cannot be pursued by means stifling fundamental personal liberties. Even though the governmental purpose may be legitimate and substantial, that purpose cannot be pursued by means that broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved. City of Lakewood v. Pillow, 180 Colo. 20, 501 P.2d 744 (1972); People v. Von Tersch, 180 Colo. 295, 505 P.2d 5 (1973).

Reasonable conditions imposed for exercise of police power valid as long as they are reasonably conceived. Bethlehem Evangelical Lutheran Church v. City of Lakewood, 626 P.2d 668 (Colo. 1981).

Act may not operate arbitrarily. Unless an act by its terms imports evil or is calculated to operate arbitrarily, oppressively, or unreasonably, it will not be held void, and the fact that in its operation as a police measure it may increase their labor, decrease the value of their property, or otherwise inconvenience individuals, does not render an act unconstitutional. In re Interrogatories of Governor, 97 Colo. 587, 52 P.2d 663 (1935); Cottrell Clothing Co. v. Teets, 139 Colo. 558, 342 P.2d 1016 (1959).

Courts determine reasonableness of police regulations. The general assembly is not the final judge of the limitations of the police power, and, because the legislative action must be reasonably necessary for the public benefit, the validity of all police regulations depends upon whether they can ultimately pass the judicial test of reasonableness. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

It is the duty and responsibility of the judiciary, through the decision of controversies before it, to safeguard constitutional guarantees of maximum free and unrestricted use of property by the citizen and to strike down enactments which unreasonably and unnecessarily impose new restraints upon freedom of action in the use and enjoyment thereof. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Whether an act of a legislative body adopted as a police regulation has any reasonable connection with public health, morals, safety, or welfare, is a question for the determination of the judiciary. City of Englewood v. Apostolic Christian Church, 146 Colo. 374, 362 P.2d 172 (1961).

It is the duty of the supreme court to examine a statute challenged on constitutional grounds to determine whether it has a substantial relation to the objects which the exercise of the police power is designed to secure and whether it is appropriate for the promotion of such objects. Western Power & Gas Co. v. Southeast Colo. Power Ass'n, 164 Colo. 344, 435 P.2d 219 (1967).

Statute may be held constitutionally invalid as applied when it operates to deprive one of a protected right, although its general validity as a measure enacted in the legitimate exercise of the state police power may be beyond question. People ex rel. Orcutt v. Instantwhip Denver, Inc., 176 Colo. 396, 490 P.2d 940 (1971).

Application of statute directly interfering with constitutional rights unconstitutional. The doctrine of unconstitutional application requires a demonstration that the application of a statute to a defendant under the circumstances of his case would directly interfere with his rights arising under the federal or state constitution. Heninger v. Charnes, 200 Colo. 194, 613 P.2d 884 (1980).

State has right through its general assembly to classify persons based upon reasonable and natural distinctions to accomplish the legitimate purposes of its police power. Vogts v. Guerrette, 142 Colo. 527, 351 P.2d 851 (1960); Vanderhoof v. People, 152 Colo. 147, 380 P.2d 903 (1963); People v. Trujillo, 178 Colo. 147, 497 P.2d 1 (1972).

A state may classify with reference to the evil to be prevented, and if the class discriminated against is or reasonably might be considered to define those from whom the evil mainly is to be feared, it properly may be picked out. A lack of abstract symmetry does not matter. People v. Trujillo, 178 Colo. 147, 497 P.2d 1 (1972).

If advantage sought by statute is personal as distinguished from general, the police powers may not be invoked. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Vested rights do not accrue to thwart reasonable exercise of police power for public good. Lakewood Pawnbrokers, Inc. v. City of Lakewood, 183 Colo. 370, 517 P.2d 834 (1973).

Power embraces public financial safety. The police power relates not merely to the public health and to public physical safety, but also to public financial safety. Laws may be passed within the police power to protect the public from financial loss. Ziegler v. People, 109 Colo. 252, 124 P.2d 593 (1942).

Defendant's right of due process was not violated by statute prohibiting possession of a "knife", defined so as to include a screwdriver, where an implicit element of the crime was the intent to possess, use, or carry such an instrument as a weapon. People v. Gross, 830 P.2d 933 (Colo. 1992).

Use of highways subject to police regulation. Right to use the highway of a state is not absolute but it may be limited by a proper exercise of the police power of the state based upon a reasonable relationship to the public health, safety, and welfare. Asphalt Paving Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 162 Colo. 254, 425 P.2d 289 (1967); Zaba v. Motor Vehicle Div., 183 Colo. 335, 516 P.2d 634 (1973).

Requirement that vehicle owners surrender titles upon disposition of vehicles reasonable. Any classification with respect to motor vehicle owners being required to surrender their certificate of title upon the sale or other disposition of their vehicles as salvage is reasonably related to a legitimate governmental purpose. Colo. Auto & Truck Wreckers Ass'n v. Dept. of Rev., 618 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1980).

Burden of establishing unreasonableness of regulation upon challenging party. Berg v. Colo. State Dept. of Soc. Servs., 694 P.2d 1291 (Colo. App. 1984).

Defendant's right of due process was not violated by fact that state board of accountancy initiated investigation of defendant as well as acted as the hearing board as the board is required by statute to initiate proceedings, hear evidence, and render decisions and there is no statutory provision authorizing a hearing officer for such proceedings. Mertsching v. Webb, 757 P.2d 1102 (Colo. App. 1988).

Applied in Thiele v. City & County of Denver, 135 Colo. 442, 312 P.2d 786 (1957); People v. Prante, 177 Colo. 243, 493 P.2d 1083 (1972); Carl Ainsworth, Inc. v. Town of Morrison, 189 Colo. 223, 539 P.2d 1267 (1975); City & County of Denver v. Nielson, 194 Colo. 407, 572 P.2d 484 (1977).

B. Business.

Right to carry on legitimate business is property right. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

And cannot be abridged unless public interest requires it and means are reasonable. The right to carry on a legitimate business cannot be taken away or abridged by an exercise of the police power, unless it appears first, that the interests of the public generally, as distinguised from those of a particular class, require such interference, and second, that the means are reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose and not unduly oppressive upon individuals. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Under the American constitutional concept of fundamental freedoms and liberties an individual has the right to engage in a lawful business which is harmless in itself and useful to the community, unhampered by unreasonable and arbitrary governmental interference or regulation. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

But unrestricted privilege to engage in business, or to conduct it as one pleases, is not guaranteed by the constitution. In re Interrogatories of Governor, 97 Colo. 587, 52 P.2d 663 (1935); Cottrell Clothing Co. v. Teets, 139 Colo. 558, 342 P.2d 1016 (1959).

Business activities are subject to reasonable regulation by the state in the exercise of the police power to preserve and enhance the public health, safety, and welfare. Colo. Auto & Truck Wreckers Ass'n v. State Dept. of Rev., 618 P.2d 646 (Colo. 1980).

Statute attempting to vest in officials unlimited power regarding lawful business void. A statute which attempts to vest in public officials arbitrary discretion and unlimited power with respect to a lawful business, without prescribing uniform rules and regulations, so that the officials as well as those affected thereby may govern themselves accordingly, is unconstitutional as violative of the provisions of this section. People v. Stanley, 90 Colo. 315, 9 P.2d 288 (1932); People v. Young, 139 Colo. 357, 339 P.2d 672 (1959).

Person has no absolute or constitutional property right to engage in practice of profession such as law, medicine, or dentistry. And if a natural person or a private corporation, an artificial person, is unable to meet or fulfil the reasonable conditions, he or it may not be heard to complain. He is deprived of no constitutional or statutory right whether the inability to comply with the regulations of the general assembly is due, as in the case of a corporation, to natural or inherent difficulties or in the case of a natural person, inability to bring himself within the requirements because of mental or moral unfitness. People v. Painless Parker Dentist, 85 Colo. 304, 275 P. 928, cert. denied, 280 U.S. 566, 50 S. Ct. 25, 74 L. Ed. 620 (1929).

But right to practice profession, once legally granted, is within rights protected by the constitutions of the United States and of the state of Colorado, which provide that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Prouty v. Heron, 127 Colo. 168, 255 P.2d 755 (1953); State Bd. of Registration for Prof'l Eng'rs v. Antonio, 159 Colo. 51, 409 P.2d 505 (1966).

Ordinances regulating activities which may imperil public safety valid. It is within the police power of the legislative body of a municipal corporation to enact ordinances dealing with activities which may imperil public safety, and such an ordinance vesting discretion in the licensing body to grant or withhold a license for a gasoline filling station is valid. Starkey v. City of Longmont, 91 Colo. 387, 15 P.2d 620 (1932).

Regulation of establishments with liquor licenses permitted. A state agency regulation governing activities in establishments with liquor licenses based on crime prevention considerations is directly related to the promotion of public safety and welfare and thus is within the scope of the police power. Citizens for Free Enter. v. State Dept. of Rev., 649 P.2d 1054 (Colo. 1982).

State may prescribe regulations to secure people against fraud. A state may prescribe all such regulations as, in its judgment, will secure or tend to secure the people against the consequences of fraud and may institute any reasonable preventive remedy required by the frequency of fraud, or the difficulty experienced by individuals in circumventing it, especially when other means have not proved to be efficacious. Zeigler v. People, 109 Colo. 252, 124 P.2d 593 (1942).

Fair trade laws subject to due process. Fair trade laws which have been given an exemption from antitrust statutes to validate them, remain subject to constitutional requirements of due process. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

To extent fair trade law is coercive it is lacking in due process, is confiscatory, and tends to establish a monopoly. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Price control unconstitutional only if arbitrary. The constitution does not secure to anyone liberty to conduct his business in such fashion as to inflict injury upon the public at large, or upon any substantial group of the people. Price control, like any other form of regulation, is unconstitutional only if arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to the policy the general assembly is free to adopt, and hence an unnecessary and unwarranted interference with individual liberty. Smith Bros. Cleaners & Dyers v. People ex rel. Rogers, 108 Colo. 449, 119 P.2d 623 (1941).

General assembly cannot fix prices unless business is affected with public interest. The general assembly is without constitutional power to fix prices at which commodities may be sold, unless the business or property involved is affected with a public interest. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

For price fixing statute to be upheld there must be some semblance of a public necessity for the act and it must have some relation to the public health, morals, and safety. Further, the price fixing agency must be duly constituted by law and due notice of its action given. The prices fixed must have some regard to reason besides having a public concern. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

General assembly cannot permit state agency to fix prices without hearing. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

And general assembly cannot delegate to private parties power to fix prices for profit, without hearing or standards, binding noncontracting parties without an agreement between the manufacturer and the seller. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

The general assembly cannot lawfully delegate authority to another, who may at his election, alter such resale price according to his personal whim or caprice and for his own benefit. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Sales which injure public alone may be prohibited. A statute attempting to prohibit all sales below cost would be unconstitutional, and only such sales may be prohibited which are intended to injure the public in a manner warranting the exercise of the police power. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Sunday closing ordinances do not violate this section. They are sustained as constitutional upon the theory that they promote the general welfare of the people. Their enactment is within the police power of municipalities. Rosenbaum v. City & County of Denver, 102 Colo. 530, 81 P.2d 760 (1938).

Public utilities subject to regulation. The activities of public utilities in rendering service to the public are subject to reasonable regulations in the exercise of the police power. Western Power & Gas Co. v. Southeast Colo. Power Ass'n, 164 Colo. 344, 435 P.2d 219 (1967).

Production or sale of food or clothing cannot be subjected to legislative regulation on the basis of a public use. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

The total prohibition of the manufacture, sale, or possession of a nutritious, wholesome, and healthful food product, clearly and distinctively labeled, with its ingredients fully and correctly disclosed, and where marketed in a manner free from misrepresentation, is in excess of the police power of the state and must be declared invalid under the due process clause of the constitution of Colorado. People ex rel. Orcutt v. Instantwhip Denver, Inc., 176 Colo. 396, 490 P.2d 940 (1971).

Jurisdiction over foreign manufacturer causing injury in state constitutional. The assertion of jurisdiction over a foreign manufacturer of a product allegedly causing an injury in the state does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice and is consistent with due process of law. Le Manufacture Francaise Des Pneumatiques Michelin v. District Court, 620 P.2d 1040 (Colo. 1980).

Applied in State Bd. of Dental Exam'rs v. Savelle, 90 Colo. 177, 8 P.2d 693, appeal dismissed, 287 U.S. 562, 53 S. Ct. 5, 77 L. Ed. 496 (1932); City & County of Denver v. Schmid, 98 Colo. 32, 52 P.2d 388 (1935); Cleere v. Bullock, 146 Colo. 284, 361 P.2d 616 (1961); Abdoo v. City & County of Denver, 156 Colo. 127, 397 P.2d 222 (1964); Dunbar v. Hoffman, 171 Colo. 481, 468 P.2d 742 (1970); Pub. Serv. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 174 Colo. 470, 485 P.2d 123 (1971); Harbour v. Colo. State Racing Comm'n, 32 Colo. App. 1, 505 P.2d 22 (1973); Moore v. District Court, 184 Colo. 63, 518 P.2d 948 (1974); Spero v. Bd. of Trustees, 35 Colo. App. 64, 529 P.2d 327 (1974).

C. Property.

1. In General.

Law reviews. For article, "Civil Rights", which discusses Tenth Circuit decisions dealing with due process and the deprivation of property, see 61 Den. L.J. 173 (1984).

Constitutionally protected rights in property are subject to regulation by proper exercise of police power of state. Western Power & Gas Co. v. Southeast Colo. Power Ass'n, 164 Colo. 344, 435 P.2d 219 (1967).

By exercise of inherent police power, the sovereign, purposing to promote public health, may fairly and reasonably restrict the use of property. In re Interrogatories of Governor, 97 Colo. 587, 52 P.2d 663 (1935); Cottrell Clothing Co. v. Teets, 139 Colo. 558, 342 P.2d 1016 (1959).

Where public health and safety will be best conserved reasonable restrictions may be imposed upon the use of property. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

An owner of property has the right to put his property to any legitimate use, unless the contemplated use is prohibited by the legislative arm of government through a proper exercise of the police power. City of Englewood v. Apostolic Christian Church, 146 Colo. 374, 362 P.2d 172 (1961); Western Income Props., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 174 Colo. 533, 485 P.2d 120 (1971).

Where there is a seeming conflict between an assertion that one is deprived of his property without due process of law on the one hand, and a reasonable exercise of the police power on the other, the latter takes precedence and a violation of due process cannot be asserted to stay the legitimate exercise of police power. Western Power & Gas Co. v. Southeast Colo. Power Ass'n, 164 Colo. 344, 435 P.2d 219 (1967); Aztec Minerals Corp. v. Romer, 940 P.2d 1025 (Colo. App. 1996).

But restraints must be reasonably necessary to public welfare. An exercise of the police power can never be justified unless it is reasonably necessary in the interests of the public order, health, safety, and welfare. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

One of the essential elements of property is the right to its unrestricted use and enjoyment; and that use cannot be interfered with beyond what is necessary to provide for the welfare and general security of the public. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959); Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

A citizen cannot be deprived of any of the essential attributes of property unless the restraint is reasonably necessary in the protection of the public morals, health, safety, or welfare. City of Englewood v. Apostolic Christian Church, 146 Colo. 374, 362 P.2d 172 (1961).

If a restriction upon the use of property is to be upheld as a valid exercise of the police power it must bear a fair relation to the public health, safety, morals, or welfare and have a definite tendency to promote or protect the same. City of Colo. Springs v. Grueskin, 161 Colo. 281, 422 P.2d 384 (1966).

Or they cannot be sustained. Any regulation or restriction upon the use of property which bears no relation to public safety, health, morals, or general welfare, cannot be sustained as a proper exercise of the police power of a municipality. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959); Western Income Props., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 174 Colo.

If a statute purporting to have been enacted under the police power to protect the public health, morals, safety, or common welfare has no real or substantial relation to these objects, and for that reason is a clear invasion of the constitutional freedom of the people to use, enjoy, or dispose of their property without unreasonable governmental interference, the courts will declare it void. Western Power & Gas Co. v. Southeast Colo. Power Ass'n, 164 Colo. 344, 435 P.2d 219 (1967).

General assembly may change law creating property rights. Although rights of property which have been created by the common law cannot be taken away without due process, the law itself, as a rule of conduct, may be changed at will by the general assembly, may create new rights or provide that rights which have previously existed shall no longer arise and it has full power to regulate and circumscribe the methods and means of enjoying those rights, so long as there is no interference with constitutional guarantees. O'Quinn v. Walt Disney Prods., Inc., 177 Colo. 190, 493 P.2d 344 (1972).

Necessity for notice and hearing in matters involving property. The essence of procedural due process is fundamental fairness. This embodies adequate advance notice and an opportunity to be heard prior to state action resulting in deprivation of a significant property interest. It likewise entitles a litigant to timely notice of decisions which have adjudicated his property interests, in relation to available appellate remedies. Brown v. City of Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 P. 455 (1884); Du Bois v. Clark, 12 Colo. App. 220, 55 P. 750 (1898); Jenks v. Stump, 41 Colo. 281, 93 P. 17 (1907); Archuleta v. Archuleta, 52 Colo. 601, 123 P. 821 (1912); Smith Bros. Cleaners & Dyers, Inc. v. People ex rel. Rogers, 108 Colo. 449, 119 P.2d 623 (1941); Swift v. Smith, 119 Colo. 126, 201 P.2d 609 (1948); Pub. Serv. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 174 Colo. 470, 485 P.2d 123 (1971); Pub. Utils. Comm'n v. DeLue, 175 Colo. 317, 486 P.2d 1050 (1971); Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Dept. of Labor and Emp., 184 Colo. 334, 520 P.2d 586 (1974).

Use of property is both liberty and property right. The privilege of a citizen to use his property according to his will is not only a liberty but a property right, subject only to such restraints as the common welfare may require. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959); City of Englewood v. Apostolic Christian Church, 146 Colo. 374, 362 P.2d 172 (1961).

The right to the use and enjoyment of property for lawful purposes is the very essence of the incentive to property ownership and is a property right fully protected by the due process clause of the federal and state constitutions. Western Income Props., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 174 Colo. 533, 485 P.2d 120 (1971).

The right of an owner of property to fix the price at which he will sell it is an inherent attribute of the property itself and is within the protection of the state and federal constitutions. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Privilege of contracting is both liberty and property right, and if A. is denied the right to contract and acquire property in a manner which he has hitherto enjoyed under the law, and which B., C., and D. are still allowed by the law to enjoy, it is clear that he is deprived of both liberty and property to the extent that he is thus denied the right to contract. In re House Bill No. 203, 21 Colo. 27, 39 P. 431 (1895).

The right to contract is a property right, protected by the due process clause of the constitution and cannot be abridged by legislative enactment. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956); In re Nichols, 38 Colo. App. 82, 553 P.2d 77 (1976).

No constitutional right to gain maximum profit from use of property. There is simply no constitutionally protected right under the federal or state constitutions to gain the maximum profit from the use of property. Nopro v. Town of Cherry Hills Vill., 180 Colo. 217, 504 P.2d 344 (1972).

The Colorado Clean Indoor Air Act does not violate due process by infringing bar and restaurant owners' use of their property. Coal. for Equal Rights v. Owens, 458 F. Supp. 2d 1251 (D. Colo. 2006), aff'd sub nom. Coal. for Equal Rights, Inc. v. Ritter, 517 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. 2008).

Due process applicable in quasi-judicial proceeding as to property. Principles of procedural due process apply no less to quasi-judicial proceedings where a property right is subject to a direct and material infringement. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Dept. of Labor & Emp., 184 Colo. 334, 520 P.2d 586 (1974).

Right to use water is property right. A priority of right to the use of water, being property, is protected by this section so that no person can be deprived of it without due process of law. Strickler v. City of Colo. Springs, 16 Colo. 61, 26 P. 313 (1891); Farmers Irrigation Co. v. Game & Fish Comm'n, 149 Colo. 318, 369 P.2d 557 (1962).

As is legal right to damage for injury. A legal right to damage for an injury is property and one cannot be deprived of his property without due process. Game & Fish Comm'n v. Farmers Irrigation Co., 162 Colo. 301, 426 P.2d 562 (1967).

Landowner not entitled to compensation for damage following hunting foreclosure on property. Losses of $250 per annum in crop damage due to geese choosing certain land as a flocking location after the state had foreclosed the hunting of geese on the landowner's property fell well within the ambit of what Justice Holmes once aptly described as "the petty larceny of the police power" and did not entitle the landowner to compensation. Collopy v. Wildlife Comm'n, 625 P.2d 994 (Colo. 1981).

Procedures for resolving airport construction contract dispute did not violate contractor's right to compensation under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment and this section. Kiewit Western Co. v. City & County of Denver, 902 P.2d 421 (Colo. App. 1994).

Applied in Taylor v. Hake, 92 Colo. 330, 20 P.2d 546 (1933); Capitol Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Smith, 136 Colo. 265, 316 P.2d 252 (1957); Sch. Dist. No. 23 v. Sch. Planning Comm'n, 146 Colo. 241, 361 P.2d 360 (1961); Mountain View Elec. Ass'n v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 167 Colo. 200, 446 P.2d 424 (1968); Thornton v. City of Colo. Springs, 173 Colo. 357, 478 P.2d 665 (1970); Univ. of Colo. v. Silverman, 192 Colo. 75, 555 P.2d 1155 (1976).

2. Taking Property for Public Use.

Taking private property for public use without compensation deemed denial of due process. If a state, by its laws, should authorize private property to be taken for public use without compensation (except to prevent its falling into the hands of an enemy, or to prevent the spread of a conflagration, or in virtue of some other imminent necessity where the property itself is the cause of the public detriment), it would be depriving a man of his property without due process of law. Jenks v. Stump, 41 Colo. 281, 93 P. 17 (1907).

Nothing can be more firmly established in our law than the principle that one may not be deprived of his property except by due process of law. Weber v. Williams, 137 Colo. 269, 324 P.2d 365 (1958).

Legislative action violating due process. Any legislative action which takes away any of the essential attributes of property, or imposes unreasonable restrictions thereon, or destroys property or its value, violates the due process clause of the constitutions of the United States and the state of Colorado and deprives the owner of his property. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Reasonableness standard applicable. Although, under its police power, there are situations in which a government may deprive the owner of a certain use of property and not be in violation of the prohibition against taking private property without just compensation, nevertheless, there must be a recognition that that exercise of the police power can be valid under--and only under--a standard of reasonableness. Combined Commc'ns Corp. v. City & County of Denver, 189 Colo. 462, 542 P.2d 79 (1975).

Respect must be had for cause and object of taking. In judging what is due process of law, respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking of private property, and if found to be suitable or admissible in the special case, it will be adjudged to be due process of law; but if found to be arbitrary, oppressive and unjust, it may be declared to be not due process of law. Jenks v. Stump, 41 Colo. 281, 93 P. 17 (1907).

Recognized distinction between eminent domain and police power. There is a recognized distinction between the exercise of the power of eminent domain and the exercise of the police power, which results in noncompensatory reasonable restrictions in respect to private interests which must yield to the public interest. Bethlehem Evangelical Lutheran Church v. City of Lakewood, 626 P.2d 668 (Colo. 1981).

And dedication encroaching on building impermissible exercise of police power. Insofar as a required dedication encroaches on a property owner's building, it is an impermissible exercise of the police power. Bethlehem Evangelical Lutheran Church v. City of Lakewood, 626 P.2d 668 (Colo. 1981).

Requirement of compensation applies to every exercise of governmental power. The constitutional requirement of due process of law, which embraces compensation for private property taken for public use, applies in every case of the exertion of governmental power. If, in the execution of any power, no matter what it is, the government, federal or state, finds it necessary to take private property for public use, it must obey the constitutional injunction to make or secure just compensation to the owner. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Goodwill and profits are not regarded as elements of just compensation under due process or just compensation clauses of the federal and state constitutions. Auraria Businessmen Against Confiscation, Inc. v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 183 Colo. 441, 517 P.2d 845 (1974).

So long as statute in abrogation of common law does not attempt to remove right which has already accrued, there is no taking. O'Quinn v. Walt Disney Prods., Inc., 177 Colo. 190, 493 P.2d 344 (1972).

Right of eminent domain recognizes due process provision of the constitution, provides for the legal and orderly acquisition of private property for public use, and for just compensation for the taking. Town of Sheridan v. Valley San. Dist., 137 Colo. 315, 324 P.2d 1038 (1958).

Interference with access to business. The fact that a municipality may under its police power interfere to a certain extent with access to and from premises does not mean necessarily that such interference constitutes a "taking" for which under amendments 5 and 14, U.S. Const., under § 15 of art. II, Colo. Const., and this section there must be compensation. Rather, to constitute such a taking there must be an unreasonable or substantial deprivation of access. City of Boulder v. Kahn's, Inc., 190 Colo. 90, 543 P.2d 711 (1975).

Supreme court on its own motion will take notice of invalidity of municipal ordinance enacted in support of exhorbitant demands which authorizes the taking of private property without due process of law. Town of Sheridan v. Valley San. Dist., 137 Colo. 315, 324 P.2d 1038 (1958).

Application of § 43-2-201 does not constitute a governmental taking for which compensation is required. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Flickinger, 687 P.2d 985 (Colo. 1984).

Redemption interest under § 39-12-103 (3) is a penalty, and when the government exacts a penalty, it may deduct the penalty from a money judgment without effecting a taking. Because the taxpayers had no reasonable expectation that they were exempt from this penalty, the redemption interest charged by the county implicates no property interest and there is no violation of the takings clauses. Dove Valley Bus. Park v. County Comm'rs, 945 P.2d 395 (Colo. 1997).

Enactment of § 34-1-305 did not deprive plaintiffs of reasonable use of property where plaintiffs were still entitled without limitation to all uses permitted under the zoning governing their land on effective date of act. Cottonwood Farms v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 725 P.2d 57 (Colo. App. 1986), aff'd, 763 P.2d 551 (Colo. 1988).

There is no denial of due process where a landowner is compelled to connect his sewer line to that of a sanitation district without personal notice or opportunity for a hearing. Alperstein v. Three Lakes Water & Sanitation, 710 P.2d 1186 (Colo. App. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1140, 106 S. Ct. 1791, 90 L.Ed.2d 336 (1986).

For purposes of calculating and modifying child support, trial court did not impermissibly interfere with husband's constitutional property rights by including in gross income an amount which a one-time post-decree inheritance could be expected to yield. In re Armstrong, 831 P.2d 501 (Colo. App. 1992).

Seizure of property under tax lien pursuant to § 39-26-117 or § 39-22-604 is not a taking nor an infringement upon due process. An exercise of the power to assess and collect taxes is distinguishable from the power to take private property for a public use, and the ability of a lessor to exempt property used by a lessee from the statutory liens all but forecloses a due process claim. Burtkin Assocs. v. Tipton, 845 P.2d 525 (Colo. 1993).

Applied in Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

3. Taxation.

Power of general taxation for public purposes does not infringe upon this section or the due process clause of the federal constitution. People ex rel. Rogers v. Letford, 102 Colo. 284, 79 P.2d 274 (1938).

General tax may be imposed without notice. Bradfield v. Pueblo, 143 Colo. 559, 354 P.2d 612 (1960).

Otherwise valid taxes may be imposed upon a group of people who will not necessarily benefit as long as the proceeds are devoted to public and governmental purposes. Friends of Cham. Music v. Denver, 696

P.2d 309 (Colo. 1985).

Taxpayer must have notice and opportunity to contest assessment. Brown v. City of Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 P. 455 (1884); Smith Bros. Cleaners & Dyers v. People ex rel. Rogers, 108 Colo. 449, 119 P.2d 623 (1941), overruled on another point, Shoenberg Farms, Inc. v. People ex rel. Swisher, 166 Colo. 199, 444 P.2d 277 (1968); Oberst v. May, 148 Colo. 285, 365 P.2d 902 (1961).

Rigid rule of equality of taxation not required. Neither due process nor equal protection imposes upon a state any rigid rule of equality of taxation. Tom's Tavern, Inc. v. City of Boulder, 186 Colo. 321, 526 P.2d 1328 (1974).

Validity of assessment depends on provisions of statute, not application. A valid assessment cannot be made under an invalid law or ordinance, and its constitutionality is to be tested, not by what has been done under it, but by what it authorizes to be done by virtue of its provisions. Brown v. City of Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 P. 455 (1884).

Special assessment without benefit violates due process. To enforce a special assessment for a purpose which does not confer a special benefit upon the property upon which it is levied would result in taking property without compensation, and without due process of law. Pomroy v. Bd. of Pub. Waterworks, Dist. No. 2, 55 Colo. 476, 136 P. 78 (1913); Santa Fe Land Imp. Co. v. City & County of Denver, 89 Colo. 309, 2 P.2d 238 (1931).

The right to assess and collect a special improvement tax exists only where a special benefit is conferred upon the property subjected thereto, and in the absence of such benefit, a levy amounts to confiscation without due process. City & County of Denver v. Greenspoon, 140 Colo. 402, 344 P.2d 679 (1959).

Difficulty in computing, assessing, and collecting tax does not affect validity thereof as against due process. People ex rel. Dunbar v. First Nat'l Bank, 144 Colo. 412, 356 P.2d 967 (1960).

Withdrawal of succession tax exemptions. Where exemptions are withdrawn by the state as to a tax imposed on the privilege of succession before the privilege is fully exercised, there is no invasion of the due process of law clauses of the federal and state constitutions. People ex rel. Rogers v. Waterman's Estate, 108 Colo. 263, 116 P.2d 204 (1941).

Ad valorem taxation. Except as to procedural questions, the due process of law clauses have no application to ad valorem taxation. City & County of Denver v. Lewin, 106 Colo. 331, 105 P.2d 854 (1940).

Taxation of property according to value, regardless of participation in water system, constitutional. The fact that property may be taxed according to its value, regardless of whether the owners choose to participate in a proposed water system, does not have any constitutional significance. Millis v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 626 P.2d 652 (Colo. 1981).

A decision of a water conservancy district to raise revenue for the district by the levy and collection of taxes upon all property within the district, collecting even from those who did not receive project water, was not an unconstitutional application of a statute in violation of the due process clauses of the Colorado and United States Constitutions. Pueblo West Metro. v. S.E. Colo. Water Cons., 721 P.2d 1220 (Colo. App. 1986), cert. denied, 748 P.2d 349 (Colo. 1988).

Denial of interest on overpayment of unemployment compensation tax does not violate due process where no statute provided for interest; only the legislature can direct the assessment of interest against the state. Martin Marietta v. Division of Emp. & Training, 784 P.2d 850 (Colo.

App. 1989).

Statute that creates a tax lien on an owner's property that such owner has leased and allowed lessee to use on the premises does not violate due process. Statute which constitutes valid exercise of power to assess and collect taxes will not be declared unconstitutional based on lessor's failure to satisfy the statutory exemptions to such statute. Burtkin Assocs. v. Tipton, 845 P.2d 525 (Colo. 1993).

Exemptions to tax liens are constitutional, as long as they are not arbitrary and unreasonable. Van Dorn Retail Mgt., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 902 P.2d 383 (Colo. App. 1994).

Subjecting newspaper advertising supplements to imposition of use tax while other forms of advertising not taxed may deny equal protection to advertisers using newspaper supplements. Walgreen Co. v. Charnes, 859 P.2d 235 (Colo. App. 1992).

Applied in Hildreth v. City of Longmont, 47 Colo. 79, 105 P. 107 (1909); Milheim v. Moffat Tunnel Imp. Dist., 72 Colo. 268, 211 P. 649 (1922); Bd. of Comm'rs v. Davis, 94 Colo. 330, 30 P.2d 266 (1934); Rinn v. Bedford, 102 Colo. 475, 84 P.2d 827 (1938); Potter v. Armstrong, 110 Colo. 198, 132 P.2d 788 (1942); Jackson v. City of Glenwood Springs, 122 Colo. 323, 221 P.2d 1083 (1950); Ping v. City of Cortez, 139 Colo. 575, 342 P.2d 657 (1959); City of Englewood v. Wright, 147 Colo. 537, 364 P.2d 569 (1961); People v. Cooke, 150 Colo. 52, 370 P.2d 896 (1962); Bishop v. Salida Hosp. Dist., 158 Colo. 315, 406 P.2d 329 (1965).

4. Zoning.

Zoning authorized by police power. Police power is the authority under which zoning ordinances have been universally upheld, which prevents one man from so using his property as to prevent others from making a corresponding full and free use of their property. City of Englewood v. Apostolic Christian Church, 146 Colo. 374, 362 P.2d 172 (1961); Western Income Props., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 174 Colo. 533, 485 P.2d 120 (1971).

Zoning is a proper exercise of state police power. Rademan v. City & County of Denver, 186 Colo. 250, 526 P.2d 1325 (1974).

Zoning constitutes partial taking of property. Zoning, since it restricts an owner's right to use his property, constitutes a partial taking. Serv. Oil Co. v. Rhodus, 179 Colo. 335, 500 P.2d 807 (1972).

Some rights yield to valid zoning. Even though the rights of freedom of association and of privacy are cherished rights, they must yield to valid zoning regulations. Rademan v. City & County of Denver, 186 Colo. 250, 526 P.2d 1325 (1974).

But if zoning ordinance impinges on fundamental rights, the ordinance may be sustained only upon a showing that the burden imposed is necessary to protect a compelling and substantial government interest. Rademan v. City & County of Denver, 186 Colo. 250, 526 P.2d 1325 (1974).

Zoning ordinances are subject to usual limitations applicable to the exercise of the police power. Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

Ordinances reasonably related to public welfare valid. Municipal zoning ordinances are constitutional in principle as a valid exercise of the police power when reasonably related to public health, safety, morals, or general welfare. Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971); Serv. Oil Co. v. Rhodus, 179 Colo. 335, 500 P.2d 807 (1972); Wilkinson v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 872 P.2d 1269 (Colo. App. 1993).

Under the police power, zoning ordinances are upheld imposing limitations upon the use of land, provided that the regulations are reasonable, and provided further that the restrictions in fact have a substantial relation to the public health, safety, or general welfare. City of Englewood v. Apostolic Christian Church, 146 Colo. 374, 362 P.2d 172 (1961); Western Income Props., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 174 Colo. 533, 485 P.2d 120 (1971).

The provisions of zoning ordinances which do not deprive a party of title to his lots, possession or the power to dispose of them, but would deprive him of the right to put them to a legitimate use which does not injure the public, without compensation would clearly deprive him of his property without due process of law. The federal and state constitutions not only inhibit this, but it would be repugnant to justice, independent of constitutional provisions on the subject. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

A zoning ordinance will be upheld by the courts only if it has some tendency reasonably to serve the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare, or that it was even fairly debatable that such restriction tended to promote or protect these objectives. Western Income Props., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 174 Colo. 533, 485 P.2d 120 (1971).

Zoning ordinance is unconstitutional if it can be shown that it is not substantially related to public health, safety, or welfare. Ford Leasing Dev. Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 186 Colo. 418, 528 P.2d 237 (1974).

Prohibition of most profitable use of land not unconstitutional. A zoning ordinance is not unconstitutional because it prohibits a landowner from using or developing his land in the most profitable manner. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961); Nirk v. City of Colo. Springs, 174 Colo. 273, 483 P.2d 371 (1971); Sellon v. City of Manitou Springs, 745 P.2d 229 (Colo. 1987).

Deprivation of the most profitable use of the property does not result in a due process violation where the governmental interest in the regulatory scheme is substantial and the property owner is given a reasonable period of time to relocate a business. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

Limitation of use is an essential and fundamental purpose of all zoning. The due process and just compensation clauses of the federal and state constitutions do not require that a landowner be permitted to make the best, maximum, or most profitable use of his property. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961).

The due process and just compensation clauses of the federal and state constitutions do not require that zoning ordinances permit a landowner to make the most profitable use of his property or be held to be unconstitutional in their operation. Madis v. Higginson, 164 Colo. 320, 434 P.2d 705 (1967); Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971); Bird v. City of Colo. Springs, 176 Colo. 32, 489 P.2d 324 (1971).

And disparity of values between restricted and unrestricted use of land is not controlling in an attack against the constitutionality of a zoning ordinance. Frankel v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 373, 363 P.2d 1063 (1961).

But prevention of reasonable use is unconstitutional. A zoning ordinance is unconstitutional as applied to a person's property if its enforcement would preclude the use of the property for any purpose to which it is reasonably adaptable. Trans-Robles Corp. v. City of Cherry Hills Vill., 30 Colo. App. 511, 497 P.2d 335 (1972), aff'd, 181 Colo. 356, 509 P.2d 797 (1973); Ford Leasing Dev. Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 186 Colo. 418, 528 P.2d 237 (1974).

Unless current use is prohibited under new ordinance, no vested rights are affected, and ordinance does not preclude use of property for any reasonable purpose. Landmark Land v. City and County of Denver, 728 P.2d 1281 (Colo. 1986), appeal dismissed for want of a substantial federal question, 483 U.S. 1001, 107 S. Ct. 3222, 97 L.Ed.2d 729 (1987).

When the zoning does not deny a landowner of all economically viable use of his property, there is no constitutional violation. Applebaugh v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 837 P.2d 304 (Colo. App. 1992).

To prevail in inverse condemnation claim, plaintiff must show that county's land use regulations preclude the use of the property for any reasonable purpose. The fundamental issue in a "takings" claim based upon land use regulation is whether an aggrieved landowner retains any use for which the property is reasonably suited. Wilkinson v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 872 P.2d 1269 (Colo. App. 1993).

Showing necessary to establish unconstitutionality of zoning ordinance. To establish the unconstitutionality of the existing zoning ordinance as applied to specific property, a landowner must show not only that the existing zone deprives him of the use of his property without due process of law, but also that all zone categories between the existing zone and the requested zone also do not afford any reasonable use of the property. Trans-Robles Corp. v. City of Cherry Hills Vill., 30 Colo. App. 511, 497 P.2d 335 (1972).

To successfully attack the validity of a zoning ordinance it is incumbent upon plaintiffs to establish that as applied to their property the ordinance is confiscatory and deprives them of the use of their land without due process of law. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961); City & County of Denver v. Chuck Ruwart Chevrolet, Inc., 32 Colo. App. 191, 508 P.2d 789 (1973).

A landowner must establish beyond a reasonable doubt that his property cannot be devoted to any reasonable lawful use under a zoning ordinance, before the courts can interfere with the discretion of zoning authorities in fixing zoning boundaries, or hold such ordinance to be unconstitutional as violative of due process. City & County of Denver v. Am. Oil Co., 150 Colo. 341, 374 P.2d 357 (1962).

Showing inapplicable if property owner only seeks to maintain original zone. The rule that to establish the unconstitutionality of the existing zoning ordinance as applied to specific property, a landowner must show not only that the existing zone deprives him of the use of his property without due process of law, but also that all zone categories between the existing zone and the requested zone do not afford any reasonable use of the property, is inapplicable where the property owner does not seek a zone change, but is attempting to maintain the original zone. Trans-Robles Corp. v. City of Cherry Hills Vill., 30 Colo. App. 511, 497 P.2d 335 (1972).

Ripeness of claim for unconstitutional taking. A claim for an unconstitutional taking by a zoning ordinance or regulation is not ripe unless the plaintiff has obtained a final definitive position from the local zoning authority regarding how it will apply the ordinance or regulation at issue to the particular land in question. Amwest Investments v. City of Aurora, 701 F.Supp. 1508 (D. Colo. 1988); Wilkinson v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 872 P.2d 1269 (Colo. App. 1993).

Restriction on property use need not be by formal rezoning. An ordinance may properly restrict land use if it is substantially related to a legitimate governmental concern. Landmark Land v. City & County of Denver, 728 P.2d 1281 (Colo. 1986).

Municipality's discretion to promulgate zoning regulations is not absolute but subject to constitutional limitations applicable to all governmental legislative decisions. Zavala v. City & County of Denver, 759 P.2d 664 (Colo. 1988).

Basis for argument that property taken without due process. In a zoning case, the constitutional argument that property was taken without due process must be predicated upon the acquisition and use of property under one zoning regulation and the unconstitutional deprivation of that property by a change of zoning. Bear Valley Drive-In Theater Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 173 Colo. 57, 476 P.2d 48 (1970).

Standard of review applicable to zoning ordinances depends upon whether a fundamental right is affected. If an ordinance restricts a fundamental right or creates a suspect class, its constitutionality is to be measured by a heightened standard of inquiry into its purposes and effects. Zavala v. City & County of Denver, 759 P.2d 664 (Colo. 1988).

Zoning ordinance is presumed to be valid. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961); Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971); Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Simmons, 177 Colo. 347, 494 P.2d 85 (1972); City & County of Denver v. Chuck Ruwart Chevrolet, Inc., 32 Colo. App. 191, 508 P.2d 789 (1973); Ford Leasing Dev. Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 186 Colo. 418, 528 P.2d 237 (1974); Tri-State Generation & Transmission Co. v. City of Thornton, 647 P.2d 670 (Colo. 1982); 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990); Wilkinson v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 872 P.2d 1269 (Colo. App. 1993).

Courts indulge every intendment in favor of validity of zoning ordinance. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961); City & County of Denver v. Chuck Ruwart Chevrolet, Inc., 32 Colo. App. 191, 508 P.2d 789 (1973).

One assailing validity of zoning ordinance has burden of proving it beyond a reasonable doubt. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961); Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971); Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Simmons, 177 Colo. 347, 494 P.2d 85 (1972); Ford Leasing Dev. Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 186 Colo. 418, 528 P.2d 237 (1974); Tri-State Generation & Transmission Co. v. City of Thornton, 647 P.2d 670 (Colo. 1982); Sellon v. City of Manitou Springs, 745 P.2d 229 (Colo. 1987); Wilkinson v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 872 P.2d 1269 (Colo. App. 1993).

In an attack against the constitutionality of a zoning ordinance, plaintiffs must sustain the burden of establishing the invalidity thereof beyond a reasonable doubt. Baum v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 104, 363 P.2d 688 (1961); Frankel v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 373, 363 P.2d 1063 (1961).

The burden is on the plaintiffs to show that they have been deprived of all reasonable use of their property by the operation of the zoning ordinance. Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

Where the plaintiffs are not challenging the constitutionality of the zoning ordinance as such, but rather its application to them, the burden of proof on this issue is upon the plaintiffs. Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

Proof required for determination that property unconstitutionally confiscated. Proof that property was not suitable for any use under immediate zoning categories must be had as a prerequisite to a determination that the property was being unconstitutionally confiscated. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Simmons, 177 Colo. 347, 494 P.2d 85 (1972).

Burden of proof not met. Where contentions regarding the actions of a zoning board were debatable and where there was no showing that the property was not suitable for use under intermediate zoning categories, the burden of proving the invalidity of a zoning ordinance beyond a reasonable doubt was not met. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Simmons, 177 Colo. 347, 494 P.2d 85 (1972).

Where the plaintiffs offered no evidence to prove that it was not possible to use and develop the property for any or all of the uses enumerated in the city's zoning ordinance, there was no showing that the city's zoning deprived the plaintiffs of their property without just compensation, nor without due process. Wright v. City of Littleton, 174 Colo. 318, 483 P.2d 953 (1971).

Where land users make no showing that other users within same zoning district are permitted to do what they have been denied the right to do, a court finds no denial of due process or equal protection. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Thompson, 177 Colo. 277, 493 P.2d 1358 (1972).

Zoning necessarily requires establishment of boundary lines between different districts. Nopro v. Town of Cherry Hills Vill., 180 Colo. 217, 504 P.2d 344 (1972).

Selection of boundary line is legislative function with which the courts should not interfere. Nopro v. Town of Cherry Hills Vill., 180 Colo. 217, 504 P.2d 344 (1972).

When courts will interfere. Only where the determination of the zoning authority is so unreasonable, arbitrary, capricious and unjustifiable as to amount to a violation of constitutional rights are the courts permitted to interfere. Nopro v. Town of Cherry Hills Vill., 180 Colo. 217, 504 P.2d 344 (1972).

Use permissible in one zone may be nonpermissible in another. In zoning there are lines which may be drawn between nonpermissible uses in one area as opposed to permissible uses in another. Complete prohibition in one zone and a permissible use or activity in another is not uncommon and such classifications, if reasonable, have been upheld. Western Income Props., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 174 Colo. 533, 485 P.2d 120 (1971).

The fact that, under zoning laws, adjoining properties in other districts may be put to different and possibly more advantageous uses does not afford a basis for concluding there is a denial of equal protection of the laws. Nopro v. Town of Cherry Hills Vill., 180 Colo. 217, 504 P.2d 344 (1972).

Existence of nonconforming uses within zoning district does not affect validity of classification, particularly where such uses are few in number. Frankel v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 373, 363 P.2d 1063 (1961).

A residential zoning ordinance is not discriminatory because it exempts from its operation similar uses existing in the district at the effective date of the ordinance. Frankel v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 373, 363 P.2d 1063 (1961).

Purpose for protection of nonconforming use. The constitutional protection afforded the owner of property on which a nonconforming use exists, exists only in order to permit the continuance of the use to the extent necessary to safeguard the investment of the property owner. Serv. Oil Co. v. Rhodus, 179 Colo. 335, 500 P.2d 807

(1972).

If owner of nonconforming use suffers destruction of improvements, he becomes the owner of unimproved property, which may be restricted as to use without a denial of due process. Serv. Oil Co. v. Rhodus, 179 Colo. 335, 500 P.2d 807 (1972); Hartley v. City of Colo. Springs, 764 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1988).

Nonconforming uses receive constitutional protection from unreasonable zoning regulations. Hartley v. City of Colo. Springs, 764 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1988).

Reasonableness of regulation prohibiting nonconforming use. A zoning ordinance prohibiting resumption of a discontinued nonconforming use is reasonable if it specifies a reasonable time period for terminating the nonconforming use. Hartley v. City of Colo. Springs, 764 P.2d 1216 (Colo. 1988).

Reasonableness of time period for terminating a nonconforming use. Reasonableness depends upon a balancing of the burden placed upon the property owner against the benefits gained by termination of the nonconforming use. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

Six-month period is reasonable where the governmental interest in nude entertainment ordinance is substantial. 7250 Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 799 P.2d 917 (Colo. 1990).

Unreasonable conditions on preexisting nonconforming use invalid. A zoning ordinance restricting the use of property in a district which has flourished as a business and commercial district for more than 50 years, which imposes onerous and unreasonable conditions and terms under which preexisting lawful uses of property may be continued as nonconforming uses, and describes numerous events and means by which a former lawful use may be terminated cannot be upheld as a valid exercise of the police power of a municipality. City & County of Denver v. Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Businesses may be excluded from residential districts. A zoning ordinance establishing restrictive residential districts from which are excluded all business or commercial uses, including apartment houses and other multiple-unit dwellings, bears a rational relation to the health, safety, morals, and general welfare of the community. Frankel v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 373, 363 P.2d 1063 (1961).

But zoning ordinances which wholly exclude churches in residential districts are unconstitutional. An absolute prohibition bears no substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the community. City of Englewood v. Apostolic Christian Church, 146 Colo. 374, 362 P.2d 172 (1961).

Zoning ordinance in which the right of church to locate in an area is permissive rather than absolute is constitutional. City of Colo. Springs v. Blanche, 761 P.2d 212 (Colo. 1988).

Ordinance commanding specific use of property to be strictly construed. At the common law an owner of property has a vested right to make the fullest legitimate use of such property. It follows that express legislative prohibition within the perimeter of constitutional permission is necessary in order to place restrictions upon the legitimate use of property. An ordinance purporting to command a specific use of property as a condition precedent to the right to do business is in derogation of the common law and must be strictly construed in favor of the person against whom its provisions are sought to be applied. City & County of Denver v.

Denver Buick, Inc., 141 Colo. 121, 347 P.2d 919 (1959).

Where zoning resolution was not validly adopted, the owner cannot use reliance on the resolution as basis for estoppel. Bear Valley Drive-In Theater Corp. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 173 Colo. 57, 476 P.2d 48 (1970).

Due process procedures to be followed when amending zoning map. City of Fort Collins v. Dooney, 178 Colo. 25, 496 P.2d 316 (1972).

City council must afford due process as delineated in zoning code. A city council, in the exercise of its police power, must afford procedural due process as it has been delineated in its zoning code. McArthur v. Zabka, 177 Colo. 337, 494 P.2d 89 (1972).

Assumption that as to zoning city council will follow dictates of charter and ordinances. From the standpoint of due process, property owners have the right to proceed upon the assumption that a city council will follow the dictates of its own charter and the ordinances enacted pursuant thereto in reference to zoning. McArthur v. Zabka, 177 Colo. 337, 494 P.2d 89 (1972).

Contract zoning is illegal as an ultra vires bargaining away of police power. Ford Leasing Dev. Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 186 Colo. 418, 528 P.2d 237 (1974).

Extensive public reliance on a zoning ordinance immunizes such ordinance from belated attack on various procedural grounds where the ordinance has been in effect for over ten years. Trainor v. City of Wheat Ridge, 697 P.2d 37 (Colo. App. 1984).

Federal preemption. Where the federal government has authorized a specific use of federal lands, a board of county commissioners cannot apply its zoning regulations to prohibit that use, because of the doctrine of preemption. Brubaker v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 652 P.2d 1050 (Colo. 1982).

Applied in Hale v. City & County of Denver, 159 Colo. 341, 411 P.2d 332 (1966); Famularo v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 180 Colo. 333, 505 P.2d 958 (1973).

VI. CRIMINAL TRIALS.

A. Right to Fair Trial.

Due process encompasses fair trial in criminal cases. Firmly embedded in both federal and state due process is the fair trial concept in criminal cases. Oaks v. People, 150 Colo. 64, 371 P.2d 443 (1962).

It is fundamental that a defendant is entitled to a fair trial by an impartial jury. Maes v. District Court, 180 Colo. 169, 503 P.2d 621 (1972).

Interest of accused, whose life and liberty are in jeopardy, to fair trial by impartial jury is paramount. Stapleton v. District Court, 179 Colo. 187, 499 P.2d 310 (1972).

A fair trial is necessary to satisfy due process requirements of the state constitution. Norman v. People, 178 Colo. 190, 496 P.2d 1029 (1972).

And due process may require limitations upon exercise of rights of free speech and of press, depending on the circumstances of the case. Stapleton v. District Court, 179 Colo. 187, 499 P.2d 310 (1972).

Right to due process not violated when certain witnesses not ordered to speak with defense counsel or submit to depositions. Fundamental fairness not affected by the ruling. There was no indication the prospective witnesses would be unavailable during trial. People v. Melanson, 937 P.2d 826 (Colo. App. 1996).

Defendant is entitled to fair trial but not perfect trial. People v. Barker, 180 Colo. 28, 501 P.2d 1041 (1972).

Test for fairness of trial applied in this state is whether the trial is free of any prejudicial error affecting the substantial rights of the accused. Lee v. People, 170 Colo. 268, 460 P.2d 796 (1969).

A defendant alleging a biased trial judge must establish that the judge had a substantial "bent of mind" against him. A judge's comments that disappoint, discomfort, or embarrass counsel in the presence of the jury, without more, are rarely enough. People v. Baenziger, 97 P.3d 271 (Colo. App. 2004).

Trial court's comments, either individually or cumulatively, did not establish that court was intolerant of defense counsel to the extent that the court displayed a negative bent toward him, warranting reversal. People v. Gibson, 203 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2008).

Judge did not show bias or partiality in sua sponte ruling when judge, without prompting from opposing counsel, barred defendant's expert from answering a question asked by the defense. The court record contains no evidence of an attitude of hostility or ill will, nor does a single ruling by the court, even if erroneous, indicate bias or partiality. People v. Walden, 224 P.3d 369 (Colo. App. 2009).

Due process of law means impartial trial and unanimous verdict by a jury on the issue of the penalty to be imposed. Wharton v. People, 104 Colo. 260, 90 P.2d 615 (1939).

Right to trial by jury, etc., are alienable rights. The right to trial by jury, the right to counsel, the right not to incriminate one's self, and related matters are known as alienable constitutional rights or as rights in the nature of personal privilege for the benefit of the person who may seek their protection. Geer v. Alaniz, 138 Colo. 177, 331 P.2d 260 (1958).

Such rights, whenever assertable, may be waived. Geer v. Alaniz, 138 Colo. 177, 331 P.2d 260 (1958).

When constitutionally unfair trial takes place. Apart from trials conducted in violation of express constitutional mandates, a constitutionally unfair trial takes place where the barriers and safeguards are so relaxed or forgotten that the proceeding is more a spectacle or trial by ordeal than a disciplined contest. Lee v. People, 170 Colo. 268, 460 P.2d 796 (1969).

Entire course of proceedings determines due process. Regard for the requirement of the due process clause inescapably imposes upon the supreme court an exercise of judgment upon the whole course of proceedings resulting in a conviction in order to ascertain whether they offend those canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of justice of English-speaking peoples even toward those charged with the most heinous offenses. Toland v. Strohl, 147 Colo. 577, 364 P.2d 588 (1961).

Right to fair trial does not depend upon degree of culpability disclosed by evidence; an accused whose guilt is evident is to be tried by the same norms as one whose guilt is not so evident. Oaks v. People, 150 Colo. 64, 371 P.2d 443 (1962).

Personal interpreter for defendant, in addition to official interpreter for court, is not necessary to assure due process. People v. Avila, 797 P.2d 805 (Colo. App. 1990).

Right to fair trial not violated where jurors were allowed to predeliberate in a criminal trial, but jurors were instructed to keep an open mind, the record does not show any predeliberation occurred, and the overwhelming evidence of defendant's guilt does not put into doubt the reliability of his judgment of conviction. People v. Preciado-Flores, 66 P.3d 155 (Colo. App. 2002).

Trial court did not violate defendant's due process rights in refusing to instruct the jury on two lesser included offenses the defendant requested in a subsequent trial when the defendant was convicted of the lesser included offenses in the previous trial. The trial court adequately instructed the jury on the defendant's theory of the case protecting the defendant's due process rights. Although the trial court did not instruct the jury on the lesser included offenses the defendant requested, the court did instruct the jury on different lesser included offenses that allowed the defendant to argue his theory of the case. People v. Trujillo, 83 P.3d 642 (Colo. 2004).

Jury instructions correctly described the four-step process for death penalty sentencing in Colorado. Contrary to defendant's argument, Colorado does not have a presumption of life imprisonment. The "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard at the third and fourth steps refers to a standard imposed on the jury, not a burden placed on either party. The phrase "beyond a reasonable doubt" as used in this context simply conveys the level of certainty the jury must possess before returning a death sentence. The instructions repeatedly stated that a death sentence could only be returned if the jury unanimously agreed beyond a reasonable doubt that death was the appropriate penalty. The instructions were not erroneous because they stated that the jury should impose a life sentence if convinced that life was the appropriate penalty. Dunlap v. People, 173 P.3d 1054 (Colo. 2007), cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1105, 128 S. Ct. 882, 169 L. Ed. 2d 740 (2008).

The court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's challenge for cause. The juror's responses, as a whole, reflect that, while serving as a juror may have been difficult, he or she would base his or her decision on the evidence and the law and would follow the court's instructions. People v. Montoya, 141 P.3d 916 (Colo. App. 2006).

Applied in City of Canon City v. Merris, 137 Colo. 169, 323 P.2d 614 (1958); Tinsley v. Crespin, 137 Colo. 302, 324 P.2d 1033 (1958); Davidson Chevrolet, Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 138 Colo. 171, 330 P.2d 1116 (1958); Thompson v. People, 139 Colo. 15, 336 P.2d 93 (1959), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 972, 80 S. Ct. 606, 4 L.Ed.2d 552 (1960); Leick v. People, 140 Colo. 564, 345 P.2d 1054 (1959); Penney v. People, 146 Colo. 95, 360 P.2d 671 (1961); Pacheco v. People, 146 Colo. 200, 360 P.2d 975 (1961); Herren v. People, 147 Colo. 442, 363 P.2d 1044 (1961); Carr v. District Court, 157 Colo. 226, 402 P.2d 182 (1965); Von Pickrell v. People, 163 Colo. 591, 431 P.2d 1003 (1967); Maciel v. People, 172 Colo. 8, 469 P.2d 135 (1970); Martinez v. People, 172 Colo. 82, 470 P.2d 26 (1970); Schwader v. District Court, 172 Colo. 474, 474 P.2d 607 (1970); Jorgenson v. People, 174 Colo. 144, 482 P.2d 962 (1971); People v. Fidler, 175 Colo. 90, 485 P.2d 725 (1971); Simms v. People, 175 Colo. 195, 486 P.2d 22 (1971); People v. Abrahamsen, 176 Colo. 52, 489 P.2d 206 (1971); People v. Jones, 176 Colo. 61, 489 P.2d 596 (1971); People v. Falgout, 176 Colo. 94, 489 P.2d 195 (1971); Edwards v. People, 176 Colo. 478, 491 P.2d 566 (1971); Brown v. People, 177 Colo. 397, 494 P.2d 587 (1972); People v. Vinnola, 177 Colo. 405, 494 P.2d 826 (1972); People v. Silcott, 177 Colo. 451, 494 P.2d 835 (1972); Maynes v. People, 178 Colo. 88, 495 P.2d 551 (1972); Harthun v. District Court, 178 Colo. 118, 495 P.2d 539 (1972); Meader v. People, 178 Colo. 383, 497 P.2d 1010 (1972); People v. Woll, 178 Colo. 443, 498 P.2d 935 (1972); White v. District Court, 180 Colo. 152, 503 P.2d 342 (1972); Massey v. District Court, 180 Colo. 359, 506 P.2d 128 (1973); Bryan v. Conn, 187 Colo. 275, 530 P.2d 1274 (1975); Byers v. Leach, 187 Colo. 312, 530 P.2d 1276 (1975); People v. Culp, 189 Colo. 76, 537 P.2d 746 (1975);

People v. Bastardo, 191 Colo. 521, 554 P.2d 297 (1976); People v. Wilkinson, 37 Colo. App. 531, 555 P.2d 1167 (1976); Les v. Meredith, 193 Colo. 3, 561 P.2d 1256 (1977); Garcia v. District Court, 197 Colo. 38, 589 P.2d 924 (1979); People v. Ortega, 198 Colo. 179, 597 P.2d 1034 (1979); People v. Archuleta, 43 Colo. App. 474, 607 P.2d 1032 (1979).

B. Pre-trial Proceedings and Rights.

Law enforcement officer's actions in the course of undercover activities did not constitute such outrageous governmental conduct as to deny the minor defendant his due process rights. People in Interest of M.N., 761 P.2d 1124 (Colo. 1988); People in Interest of J.A.L., 761 P.2d 1137 (Colo. 1988).

Placing defendant under undetermined criminal charges. Placing defendant under the cloud of undetermined criminal charges for an indeterminate and unreasonable period of time is violative of due process. People v. Aragon, 643 P.2d 43 (Colo. 1982).

Tainted fruit doctrine does not require the automatic suppression of later statements made by the defendant or by witnesses whose identity was derived from the defendant's initial, unwarned statement. Although the lack of a Miranda warning creates a presumption of compulsion, the presumption can be rebutted and the initial statement shown to be voluntary in light of the totality of the circumstances. People v. T.C., 898 P.2d 20 (Colo. 1995).

There must be sufficient attenuation between the involuntary statements and the statements sought to be introduced such that the taint of the illegality is removed. People v. T.C., 898 P.2d 20 (Colo. 1995); People v. Barnard, 12 P.3d 290 (Colo. App. 2000).

Assertion of right to cease interrogation and invoke right to counsel must be clear and unequivocal. When faced with an ambiguous or equivocal statement, the police have no duty to clarify the suspect's intent, but rather may proceed with the interrogation. People v. Gray, 975 P.2d 1124 (Colo. App. 1998).

Written confession was not coerced where detectives advised defendant that it "could help" to give the court a written account of his commission of the crime but did not promise leniency in exchange. People v. Gray, 975 P.2d 1124 (Colo. App. 1998).

Special interrogation techniques designed to induce a confession, such as withholding information from defendant, confronting him with inconsistencies in his stories, and using specialized knowledge to point out weaknesses in his explanations for the victim's injuries, do not constitute coercion. People v. Gray, 975 P.2d 1124 (Colo. App. 1998).

Evidence at sanity trial that defendant asserted his constitutional rights after being given Miranda warnings which was presented for the purpose of proving defendant's rationality constituted reversible error as a violation of his due process rights. People v. Galimanis, 765 P.2d 644 (Colo. App. 1988), cert. granted, 783 P.2d 838 (Colo. 1989), cert. denied, 805 P.2d 1116 (Colo. 1991), cert. denied, 501 U.S. 1238, 111 S. Ct. 2872, 115 L.Ed.2d 1037 (1991).

C. Right to Public Trial.

1. Open Proceedings.

Accused in criminal case has right to public trial. Anderson v. People, 176 Colo. 224, 490 P.2d 47 (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1042, 92 S. Ct. 1376, 31 L.Ed.2d 583 (1972).

The right to a public trial includes proceedings to select jury.

The right to a public trial includes that stage of the proceedings which is devoted to the selection of a jury. Anderson v. People, 176 Colo. 224, 490 P.2d 47 (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1042, 92 S. Ct. 1376, 31 L.Ed.2d 583 (1972).

Right to public trial is not absolute, for in some instances, the right to a public trial may be subordinated to the higher right and duty of the court to insure that the defendant receives a fair trial. Anderson v. People, 176 Colo. 224, 490 P.2d 47 (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1042, 92 S. Ct. 1376, 31 L.Ed.2d 583 (1972).

Limited exclusion of public held not reversible error. Where the defendant is not the victim of any unjust prosecution, the limited exclusion of the general public at his trial during the time that a jury is chosen cannot be elevated to the constitutional plateau of reversible error to escape the jury's verdict. Anderson v. People, 176 Colo. 224, 490 P.2d 47 (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1042, 92 S. Ct. 1376, 31 L.Ed.2d 583 (1972).

Defendant is not entitled to have motion for acquittal heard in open court in his presence rather than in chambers in his absence. Schott v. People, 174 Colo. 15, 482 P.2d 101 (1971).

Defendant was not denied the right to a public trial when the court conducted individual voir dire of prospective jurors outside the presence of the general public on pretrial publicity and allowed only one press representative when the suggestion to do so was a strategic decision made by defense counsel in a pretrial motion. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

2. Publicity.

Effect of prejudicial publicity. Publicity can be so "massive, pervasive and prejudicial" that the denial of a fair trial may be presumed. Walker v. People, 169 Colo. 467, 458 P.2d 238 (1969); People v. Simmons, 183 Colo. 253, 516 P.2d 117 (1973).

Fallible men and women can scarcely reach a disinterested verdict based exclusively on what they heard in court when, before they entered the jury box, their minds were saturated by press and radio for months preceding by matter designed to establish the guilt of the accused. A conviction so secured obviously constitutes a denial of due process of law. Walker v. People, 169 Colo. 467, 458 P.2d 238 (1969).

Defendant need not show specific prejudice. The trial court erred in holding that a showing must be made that the jurors were actually directly affected by the publicity. The defendant need not show specific prejudice against him from massive publicity through an examination of the voir dire proceedings. Walker v. People, 169 Colo. 467, 458 P.2d 238 (1969).

In order for reversal to be called for in absence of massive publicity that could be said to have contaminated the community, the defendant must establish a nexus between the publicity and the alleged denial of a fair trial. Sergent v. People, 177 Colo. 354, 497 P.2d 983 (1972).

Pretrial publicity. The mere existence of extensive pretrial publicity, by itself, does not trigger a due process entitlement to a change of venue. People v. Bartowsheski, 661 P.2d 235 (Colo. 1983); People v. Heller, 698 P.2d 1357 (Colo. App. 1984), rev'd on other grounds, 712 P.2d 1023 (Colo. 1986).

A defendant, in order to prevail on this argument, must show that the publicity was so "massive, pervasive, and prejudicial" as to create a presumption of an unfair trial or, alternatively, that the publicity created actual hostility on the part of the jurors. People v. Bartowsheski, 661 P.2d 235 (Colo. 1983); People v. Tafoya, 703

P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1985).

Defendant failed to meet this burden where the trial court allowed extensive in camera voir dire and gave cautionary remarks to the jury concerning avoidance of publicity and where the defendant failed to exhaust his peremptory challenges. People v. Tafoya, 703 P.2d 663 (Colo. App. 1985).

Denial of motion to appoint public opinion pollster at state expense to determine the extent of the pretrial publicity did not deny due process of law since there was no showing of the necessity for or right to a state financed pollster in the case. People v. McCrary, 190 Colo. 538, 549 P.2d 1320 (1976).

Television camera in courtroom did not prevent fair trial. Where there was no record of any unusual publicity or that any part of the courtroom proceedings was ever transmitted to any viewer by television or radio, the use of a single, concealed television camera in the courtroom, strictly regulated pursuant to the rule of the supreme court then in effect, did not prevent a fair trial. Gonzales v. People, 165 Colo. 322, 438 P.2d 686 (1968).

The mere presence of a camera in the courtroom does not in itself deny a defendant due process. People v. Wieghard, 727 P.2d 383 (Colo. App. 1986).

D. Timing of Trial.

Undue haste in administration of criminal law is as much to be condemned as unnecessary delay. The true course lies between these two extremes. Toland v. Strohl, 147 Colo. 577, 364 P.2d 588 (1961).

The supreme court cannot approve as meeting the standards of due process of law summary, hasty, middle-of-the-night justice. Toland v. Strohl, 147 Colo. 577, 364 P.2d 588 (1961).

Delay of arrest can reach a point where the delay is so long that the prejudice to the defendant caused by it becomes so great that due process and fundamental fairness require that the charges be dismissed. People v. Hutchinson, 192 Colo. 204, 557 P.2d 376 (1976); People v. Hall, 729 P.2d 373 (Colo. 1986).

Factors to be examined in determining if delay of arrest violates due process and fundamental fairness include: (1) Loss of defense witnesses; (2) whether the delay was purposeful and intended to prejudice the defendant; (3) the kind and quantum of evidence available to the prosecution; and (4) general considerations of justice and fair play. People ex rel. Coca v. District Court, 187 Colo. 280, 530 P.2d 958 (1975); People v. Hall, 729 P.2d 373 (Colo. 1986).

Delay of trial for criminal investigation. When the government takes time before seeking an indictment for purposes of conducting further criminal investigation, fundamental fairness is not violated unless this procedure shocks the community's sense of fair play and decency. People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1101, 102 S. Ct. 678, 70 L.Ed.2d 644 (1981).

To prosecute a defendant following investigative delay does not deprive him of due process, even if his defense might have been somewhat prejudiced by the lapse of time. People v. Small, 631 P.2d 148 (Colo. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1101, 102 S. Ct. 678, 70 L.Ed.2d 644 (1981).

Delay in prosecution did not deny the defendant due process. Five witnesses had died or could not be located, the delay was not purposeful, the victim's body was not located until four months after the defendant was charged, and the interests of justice and fair play did not warrant dismissal of charges. People v. Melanson, 937 P.2d 826 (Colo. App. 1996).

Decision to grant or deny motion for continuance is committed to sound discretion of the trial court and will be reversed on appeal only upon a showing of a clear abuse of discretion resulting in manifest injustice. People v. Garcia, 690 P.2d 869 (Colo. App. 1984).

Trial court was not obligated to continue trial because of defense team's strategic decision not to appear. People v. Thomas, 962 P.2d 263 (Colo. App. 1997).

Speedy trial. An accused's right to be treated with fundamental fairness is implicit in the concept of due process of law and is more expansive than the specific constitutional guarantee of the right to a speedy trial. Barela v. People, 826 P.2d 1249 (Colo. 1992).

E. Right to Counsel.

Right of indigents to presence of legal counsel. Due process requirements prohibit the denial of the right to the presence of legal counsel to indigents, when it has been made available to those able to afford counsel. Mora v. District Court, 177 Colo. 381, 494 P.2d 596 (1972).

Right to counsel encompasses a guarantee that defense counsel shall have sufficient time to prepare for scheduled proceedings and to protect his client's constitutional rights. People v. Meyers, 617 P.2d 808 (Colo. 1980); People v. Garcia, 690 P.2d 869 (Colo. App. 1984).

Late appointment of counsel per se does not violate constitutional right to counsel; rather, it should be considered with other attendant circumstances, such as the gravity of the charge, the complexity of the case, the experience and knowledge of the attorney, and the opportunity for consultation and preparation. People v. Meyers, 617 P.2d 808 (Colo. 1980).

Limitation on fees payable to appointed counsel is not itself a violation of defendant's equal protection right without a showing it caused ineffective assistance of counsel. People v. District Court, 761 P.2d 206 (Colo. 1988).

Inadequate preparation considered due process violation. If with the later discovered evidence the jury would not have convicted the defendant it can be said that the conviction can be laid at the door of inadequate preparation on the part of both sides, and this has the magnitude of a failure of due process and calls for a new trial. People v. Armstead, 179 Colo. 387, 501 P.2d 472 (1972).

Pro forma appearance without preparation or meaningful consultation infers ineffective assistance. Where a last-minute appointment of counsel results in a pro forma entry of appearance without preparation or meaningful consultation with the accused, such token representation raises a strong inference, if not an outright presumption, that the accused has been denied effective assistance of counsel. People v. Meyers, 617 P.2d 808 (Colo. 1980).

Defense team's election not to appear for commencement of trial did not "deprive" defendant of counsel in the constitutional sense. People v. Thomas, 962 P.2d 263 (Colo. App. 1997).

No constitutional right to postconviction counsel exists; however, a limited statutory right exists. The statutory right to postconviction counsel is neither automatic nor unlimited. It is limited to cases where a defendant's Crim. P. 35(c) petition is not wholly unfounded and has arguable merit, as determined by the court and the state public defender's office. Silva v. People, 156 P.3d 1164 (Colo. 2007).

If postconviction counsel is required according to the limited statutory right, that counsel must provide effective assistance as measured by the two-pronged Strickland v. Washington test. Silva v.

People, 156 P.3d 1164 (Colo. 2007).

When a defendant agrees to an extension of probation, the defendant does not have a sixth amendment right to be advised of or receive the right to counsel before signing the extension. A motion to extend probation is not a critical stage of the proceeding requiring the right to counsel because the defendant is not faced with consequential significant deprivation of liberty and is not entitled to a hearing in the absence of such a request. People v. Hotle, 216 P.3d 68 (Colo. App. 2008).

F. Pleas.

1. General.

Due process prerequisites of guilty plea. Vanderhoof v. People, 152 Colo. 147, 380 P.2d 903 (1963).

Due process of law mandates that a guilty plea must be voluntarily and understandingly made before a valid judgment can be entered thereon. People v. Chavez, 730 P.2d 321 (Colo. 1986); People v. Ball, 813 P.2d 759 (Colo. App. 1990).

Notice to defendant of charge. A plea cannot be either a voluntary or a knowing and intelligent admission of guilt unless the defendant receives real notice of the true nature of the charge against him. The degree of explanation required of a court depends on the nature and complexity of the crime. People v. Leonard, 673 P.2d 37 (Colo. 1983); Harshfield v. People, 697 P.2d 391 (Colo. 1985); People v. Cabral, 698 P.2d 234 (Colo. 1985); People v. Ball, 813 P.2d 759 (Colo. App. 1990).

To establish that due process has been satisfied, the record must show affirmatively that the defendant understood the critical elements of the crime to which his guilty plea was entered. Harshfield v. People, 697 P.2d 391 (Colo. 1985).

Due process requires that, in order to provide the basis for a judgment of conviction, a guilty plea must be made voluntarily. Lacy v. People, 775 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1989).

In order to meet the constitutional requirement of voluntariness, the record as a whole must affirmatively show that the defendant understood the constitutional rights he was waiving and the critical elements of the crime to which the plea was tendered. Lacy v. People, 775 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1989); People v. Ball, 813 P.2d 759 (Colo. App. 1990); People v. Chavez, 832 P.2d 1026 (Colo. App. 1991).

An information charging a defendant is sufficient if it informs the defendant of the charges against him so as to enable him to prepare a defense and plead the judgment in bar of any further prosecutions for the same offense. Thus an information informing the defendant that he was charged with felony-murder committed while he was in immediate flight from both a robbery and an attempted robbery was not unconstitutionally vague in failing to specify which felony was being relied upon. People v. Hickam, 684 P.2d 228 (Colo. 1984).

In order to satisfy the requirement that defendant understands the critical elements of the crime, the court should explain the critical elements in terms which are understandable to the defendant and the extent of such explanation is dependent upon the nature and complexity of the crime. Lacy v. People, 775 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1989).

Regardless of the complexity of the crime, the record must demonstrate that the defendant understood any mental state element of the crime to which he pled guilty in order to satisfy due process requirements. Lacy v. People, 775 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1989).

In regard to a guilty plea, due process does not require either a specific waiver of constitutional protections to establish the fact that the defendant understood the nature of the constitutional protections he was waiving or that the record demonstrate an adequate factual basis for the plea. Lacy v. People, 775 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1989).

No constitutional defect existed where defendant pleaded guilty after court informed defendant of possible penalty that was greater than presumptive range for crime. People v. Silva, 782 P.2d 846 (Colo. App. 1989).

Constitutional due process requirements regarding advisement of possible penalties do not apply to Crim. P. 11(b) in a hearing to revoke a deferred judgment. Defendant's admission that he violated the terms of the deferred judgment was valid. Due process does not require that defendant be readvised of the potential penalties after defendant was advised of the possible penalties when entering into the deferred judgment. People v. Finney, 2012 COA 38, __ P.3d __.

Denial of motion to withdraw guilty pleas was not an abuse of discretion by the trial court where the pleas were entered in accordance with due process of law. People v. Chavez, 730 P.2d 321 (Colo. 1986).

Trial court need not advise accused of any legal consequences of guilty plea, particularly those arising from the accused's own future misconduct. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

A defendant entering a guilty plea is afforded due process if the trial court advises the defendant of direct consequences of the conviction. People v. Jones, 957 P.2d 1046 (Colo. App. 1997).

2. Reliance on Promises.

Due process requires that defendant be given reasonable notice that he is subject to enhanced sentencing under § 18-1-105 (9)(a)(III). People v. Murphy, 722 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1986); People v. Lacey, 723 P.2d 111 (Colo. 1986).

This section guarantees that a promise by the government will be enforced in a manner which guarantees fundamental fairness to the defendant when the defendant has reasonably relied to his detriment on such promise. People v. McCormick, 839 P.2d 474 (Colo. App. 1992).

Suppression of statement under use-immunity principle. Where a police officer obtains a statement from a suspect in exchange for his implicit promise not to prosecute her for what she tells him and the suspect has reasonably and detrimentally relied upon the promise, a remedy that accords substantial justice is to treat the statement as if it has been obtained pursuant to a grant of use-immunity. The statement must be suppressed under the use-immunity principle, as well as any evidence derived directly or indirectly from the statement. People v. Manning, 672 P.2d 499 (Colo. 1983).

Enforcement of governmental promises in criminal proceeding. When a defendant has been charged with a crime and is represented by counsel, and a law enforcement officer involved in the investigation of the case requests a videotaped interview pertaining to the defendant's criminal activities and expressly promises not to use the videotape in any criminal proceeding against him, and thereafter the accused, in reasonable detrimental reliance upon the officer's promise, submits to the incriminating interview, the due process clauses of the United States and Colorado Constitutions entitle the accused to enforcement of the governmental promise where no other remedy is appropriate to effectuate the accused's legitimate expectation engendered by the governmental promise. People v. Fisher, 657 P.2d 922 (Colo. 1983); People v. Fanger, 748

When defendant agrees to government's plea offer that includes testimony against co-defendant and based on this, co-defendant pleads guilty, government cannot withdraw offer and use information obtained through the agreement to convict the defendant. People v. Fanger, 748 P.2d 1332 (Colo. App. 1987).

Due process requires that if defendant relies to his detriment on government's promise in plea agreement, specific performance of agreement is appropriate. People v. Macrander, 756 P.2d 356 (Colo. 1988).

Introduction of evidence obtained while defendant acted as a drug enforcement administration informant did not violate defendant's due process rights where agents made no promise not to prosecute but only that they would communicate her cooperation to the prosecution. Moreover, defendant's statements were admissible to impeach her when she took the stand and testified she was entrapped. People v. Ridley, 872 P.2d 1377 (Colo. App. 1994).

G. Jury.

Due process under this section does not guaranty right to trial by jury in favor of prosecution in cases where an accused is entitled to a jury trial but elects trial before the court. People v. District Court, 843 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1992).

Due process guaranty compels the conclusion that prosecution alone cannot compel trial by jury where defendant may not receive a fair trial. People v. District Court, 843 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1992).

Provisions of § 16-10-101, which require the people's consent as a prerequisite to defendant's waiver of trial by jury, held facially constitutional; however, as applied section may violate the right to due process afforded by this section. People v. District Court, 843 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1992).

Unqualified prosecution consent requirement to defendant's waiver of trial by jury may violate defendant's constitutional right to due process where defendant contends that such trial would constitute an unfair proceeding before a biased jury. People v. District Court, 843 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1992).

It is incumbent upon a criminal defendant, in seeking waiver of jury trial, to raise due process concerns with the trial court; trial court may evaluate whether a defendant's due process rights may be violated only after the defendant makes a showing that inability to waive trial by jury infringes on defendant's due process rights. People v. District Court, 843 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1992).

In determining whether defendant's due process rights to a fair trial would be violated by denying defendant's waiver of jury trial, trial court may consider the extent to which a change in venue may cure biases or prejudice against the defendant. People v. District Court, 843 P.2d 6 (Colo. 1992).

Retrial of defendant on kidnapping charge, after the first trial was declared a mistrial without objection from either party, did not violate statute requiring the verdict of the jury to be unanimous or the defendant's right to due process because the federal constitution does not guarantee a defendant a unanimous verdict of either guilty or not guilty. People v. Barton, 58 P.3d 1075 (Colo. App. 2002).

Voir dire inquiry is permissible into matters of racial prejudice in the interest of obtaining a fair and impartial jury. Maes v. District Court, 180 Colo. 169, 503 P.2d 621 (1972); People v. Baker, 924 P.2d 1186 (Colo. App. 1996).

Opinions concerning death penalty. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's challenges to jurors who expressed belief in the appropriateness of the death penalty when, based on the record, it appeared that the court had found that the personal beliefs of the jurors would not keep them from being fair and impartial and following the law as instructed. People v. Thomas, 962 P.2d 263 (Colo. App. 1997).

Failure to instruct on presumption of innocence constitutes denial of due process of law. People v. Hill, 182 Colo. 253, 512 P.2d 257 (1973).

However, use of disapproved instruction on presumption of innocence does not violate due process. Constantine v. People, 179 Colo. 202, 499 P.2d 309 (1972).

Jury instructions which fail to define all the elements of an offense charged are constitutionally deficient. People v. Mattas, 645 P.2d 254 (Colo. 1982); Evans v. People, 706 P.2d 795 (Colo. 1985).

The culpable mental state of an offense is an essential element, and the failure to include the applicable culpable mental state in the elemental instruction is a constitutional deficiency. People v. Pickering, 725 P.2d 5 (Colo. App. 1985).

An incorrect jury instruction in a criminal case is not a structural error; instead, such instruction is subject only to harmless or plain error review, following the U.S. supreme court precedent in Neder v. United States, 527 U.S. 1 (1999). Therefore, if a conviction is not attributable to the incorrect instruction, a conviction shall not be overturned and all contrary precedent is disapproved of. The test is "whether the guilty verdict actually rendered in the trial was surely unattainable to the error". Griego v. People, 19 P.3d 1 (Colo. 2001) (disapproving on this point Cooper v. People, 973 P.2d 1234 (Colo. 1999), Bogdanov v. People, 941 P.2d 247 (Colo. 1997), People v. Vance, 933 P.2d 576 (Colo. 1997), People v. Villa-Villa, 983 P.2d 181 (Colo. App. 1999)).

Plain error analysis should not apply when a sentencing court enters a conviction different from that provided for by a jury's finding of guilt based upon a jury instruction that correctly and completely describes all the elements of a less serious offense rather than misdescribing or omitting an element of an offense. Medina v. People, 163 P.3d 1136 (Colo. 2007).

Misdescribed or omitted element in jury instruction may give rise to different arguments on appeal. A defendant may seek a new trial, arguing that the error undermined the validity of the conviction. Defendant also may seek resentencing, arguing that the error led the court to impose sentence in violation of the Apprendi v. New Jersey decision. People v. Medina, 140 P.3d 64 (Colo. App. 2005), aff'd on other grounds, 163 P.3d 1136 (Colo. 2007).

Jury instructions and the prosecutor's comment that contradictorily indicated that the jury was not required to consider self-defense in deciding whether defendant committed felony menacing and reckless endangerment and could consider self-defense only as it related to charges of attempted first degree murder were erroneous. The finding did not warrant reversal, however, because the error did not undermine the fundamental fairness of the trial as to cast serious doubt on the reliability of the jury's verdict. People v. Bachofer, 192 P.3d 454 (Colo. App. 2008).

Constitutional harmless error analysis is reserved only for those cases in which the defendant preserved a claim for review by raising a contemporaneous objection. If the defendant fails to object at trial, plain error applies. People v. Miller, 113 P.3d 743 (Colo. 2005).

Trial court erred by giving a theft instruction that did not make clear that prosecution had to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant knew he did not have authorization to take the store's property. Because defendant did not object to the theft instruction at trial, however, the proper standard of review is plain error. People v. Gibson, 203 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2008).

Although the flawed instruction was error it was not plain error because there was not a reasonable possibility that the erroneous instruction contributed to the conviction in a manner that cast doubt on the reliability of the verdict. Neither the prosecution nor defendant presented any evidence to indicate defendant thought he was authorized to take property from the store, and defendant never argued that the evidence suggested he believed he was authorized to take property from the store. People v. Gibson, 203 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2008).

"After deliberation" is not a part of the "culpable mental state". However, where no part of the doctor's testimony subject to the instruction addressed the issue whether the defendant acted with deliberation, error was harmless. People v. Thomas, 962 P.2d 263 (Colo. App. 1997).

A jury may return a general verdict of guilty on a single count alleged to have occurred under alternative theories without depriving the defendant of the right to a unanimous verdict. However, each theory presented must be supported by sufficient evidence, and if there is insufficient evidence of any alternative theory, the general verdict will be set aside. People v. Hall, 60 P.3d 728 (Colo. App. 2002).

Permitting an instruction on an alternative theory of liability for the same charged offense not supported by sufficient evidence does not rise to the level of a constitutional error where the conviction for that offense is otherwise supported by sufficient proof. Additionally, where the evidence presented at trial against a criminal defendant is otherwise sufficient to support the determination of guilt, providing the jury with an instruction containing a factually insufficient theory of liability for the same charged offense does not alone violate the due process clause. People v. Dunaway, 88 P.3d 619 (Colo. 2004).

The court made a structural constitutional error in sentencing defendant for a class 4 felony when defendant was convicted of a class 5 felony. Although it was not clear from the charging documents whether defendant was charged with a class 4 felony or a class 5 felony, that confusion was cleared up when prosecution proffered a jury instruction for the class 5 felony and based its theory of the case on the class 5 felony elements. The court's error, therefore, was not the result of a mistake in the jury instructions. Medina v. People, 163 P.3d 1136 (Colo. 2007).

Structural error applies in this case because the court sentenced defendant for the class 4 felony and there was no jury verdict for that crime. In essence, the court judged defendant guilty of a new crime. The structural error in this case was confined to the sentencing proceedings, so the conviction is affirmed, but the sentence is vacated and the case remanded for resentencing. Medina v. People, 163 P.3d 1136 (Colo. 2007).

H. Insanity Defense.

Availability of defense of insanity. A statute providing that insanity shall be no defense to a criminal charge would be unconstitutional. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

One who is insane when he commits an act prohibited by law cannot be held guilty of a crime. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

Defendant who raises sanity issue is constitutionally entitled to separate hearing to determine competence to stand trial because a different standard determines competence to stand trial from that which determines the validity of a defense of not guilty by reason of insanity. Parks v. Denver District Court, 180 Colo. 202, 503 P.2d 1029 (1972); Leick v. People, 136 Colo. 535, 322 P.2d 674, cert. denied, 357 U.S. 922, 78 S. Ct. 1363, 2 L.Ed.2d 366 (1958).

Trial of an incompetent defendant constitutes structural error. The effect of erroneously allowing an incompetent defendant to stand trial is unquantifiable and indeterminate. Such an error is consistent with the types of errors that the U.S. supreme court has deemed "structural" and requires automatic reversal. People v. Mondragon, 217 P.3d 936 (Colo. App. 2009).

Statute allowing a court to order a competency evaluation of defendant on its own motion does not force a defendant to choose between the privilege against self-incrimination and the right to a competency determination. A defendant may remain silent during the court-ordered evaluation under § 16-8-107 and then be examined by a psychiatrist of his own choice under § 16-8-108. Therefore, under the statutory scheme, the defendant could obtain a competency evaluation and protect his privilege against self-incrimination unless and until he relied upon the lack of mental capacity to commit the charged crimes. People v. Thomas, 962 P.2d 263 (Colo. App. 1997).

I. Defendant's Rights at Trial.

1. To be Present.

Defendant may be excluded from hearing on matters of law. Where the question raised by a motion concerns only matters of law, the exclusion of the defendant from such a hearing does not violate the constitutional right to be present at every stage of the trial. Schott v. People, 174 Colo. 15, 482 P.2d 101 (1971).

While the defendant must be present at every critical stage of the proceeding in a criminal prosecution, the replaying of a tape of a disciplinary hearing involving one of the defendant's witnesses was not a critical stage. People v. Valdez, 725 P.2d 29 (Colo. App. 1986), aff'd, 789 P.2d 406 (Colo. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 871, 111 S. Ct. 193, 112 L.Ed.2d 156 (1990).

Commencing the suppression hearing before defendant's late arrival did not so undermine the fundamental fairness of the trial to cast serious doubt on the reliability of defendant's conviction. Defense counsel did not object to starting the hearing without defendant, defendant did not testify at the hearing, and defendant did not identify anything specific that would have been done differently if defendant had been present for the entire hearing. People v. Garcia, 251 P.3d 1152 (Colo. App. 2010).

Prison clothing. In absence of objection, fair trial was not denied by permitting defendant to stand trial in nonidentifiable prison clothing without informing him of right to wear civilian clothes. People v. Romero, 694 P.2d 1256 (Colo. 1985).

The court's failure to allow the defendant and the defendant's counsel the opportunity to appear and review the jury's request to review the trial transcript was harmless error. Since the court is vested with the discretion to allow the jury to review transcripts and the defendant cannot show that this case was prejudiced by allowing the jury to review the transcript, there is no reversible error. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

The defendant's right to be present was not violated when the defendant did not attend a general orientation session upon the recommendation of the defendant's defense counsel. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

2. To Testify.

Defendant's right to testify. A defendant has a due process right to testify in his own defense under this section. People v. Myrick, 638 P.2d 34 (Colo. 1981).

And this right is so fundamental that the authority to decide whether to testify must be allocated to the client. People v. Curtis, 657 P.2d 990 (Colo. App. 1982), aff'd, 681 P.2d 504 (Colo. 1984); People v. Ziglar, 45 P.3d 1266 (Colo. 2002).

The right to testify may not be impermissibly "chilled" by penalties imposed for exercising that right. People v. Myrick, 638 P.2d 34 (Colo. 1981); People v. Anderson, 954 P.2d 627 (Colo. App. 1997).

Where a defendant's mental disease or defect renders him incompetent to decide whether or not to exercise his right to testify in his own defense, he is incompetent to stand trial. People v. Mondragon, 217 P.3d 936 (Colo. App. 2009).

A defendant's right to testify may be found to be impermissibly burdened when there is an issue involving the constitutional admissibility of evidence or when the defendant is forced to choose between the right to testify and some other constitutional right. Defendant's decision not to testify was a strategic choice, not one that implicated his constitutional rights. Therefore, there was no merit to the claim that the prosecution may not introduce relevant, otherwise admissible evidence in its case-in-chief simply because defendant believed that its admission would compel him to give the jury a response if he took the stand. People v. Skufca, 176 P.3d 83 (Colo. 2008).

A defendant who testifies does not generally and automatically waive the privilege against self-incrimination as to pending collateral criminal charges. Allowing a defendant-witness's credibility to be assailed through cross-examination concerning related criminal charges does not necessarily compromise defendant's right to testify at trial or the right not to incriminate oneself in the pending matter. People v. Skufca, 176 P.3d 83 (Colo. 2008).

Waiver of the right must be voluntary, knowing, and intentional, and the existence of effective waiver should be ascertained by the trial court on the record. Palmer v. People, 680 P.2d 525 (Colo. 1984); People v. Curtis, 681 P.2d 504 (Colo. 1984); People v. Blecha, 940 P.2d 1070 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 962 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1998).

Trial court has a duty to determine whether the waiver of the right to testify by the defendant was in fact voluntary, knowing, and intentional. People v. Pietrantonio, 727 P.2d 407 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Chavez, 853 P.2d 1149 (Colo. 1993).

Not all burdens placed on a defendant's choice of whether to testify constitute impermissible impediments to the exercise of his or her constitutional right to testify. People v. Myrick, 638 P.2d 34 (Colo. 1981); People v. Anderson, 954 P.2d 627 (Colo. App. 1997).

It is required practice that every defendant be advised on the record and outside the presence of the jury that the defendant has the right to testify, that the ultimate decision whether to testify must be made by the defendant, that no one can prevent the defendant from doing so, that should the defendant choose to testify, the prosecutor will be permitted to cross-examine the defendant concerning prior felony convictions, and that if cross-examination discloses prior convictions, the jury can be instructed to consider them only as they bear upon the defendant's credibility. People v. Chavez, 832 P.2d 1026 (Colo. App. 1991), aff'd, 853 P.2d 1149 (Colo. 1993); People v. Blecha, 940 P.2d 1070 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 962 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1998).

If a defendant is facing habitual criminal counts, the defendant is entitled to be advised that any admissions made by him during the substantive phase of the trial cannot be used by the prosecution to prove the habitual offender charges. People v. Chavez, 832 P.2d 1026 (Colo. App. 1991), aff'd, 853 P.2d 1149 (Colo. 1993).

When a severed possession of weapon by a prior offender charge is pending and untried, trial court's Curtis advisement that a prior felony can only be used for impeachment is misleading. Whether defendant is entitled to a new trial on the weapon's charge requires defendant to establish that he or she detrimentally relied upon the misleading advisement. People v. Emert, 240 P.3d 514 (Colo. App. 2010).

The advisement by the trial court of the defendant's right to testify was inadequate when the court failed to inform defendant that the decision to testify was personal to the defendant and failed to advise defendant as to the limited evidentiary use of any admission by the defendant. People v. Chavez, 832 P.2d 1026 (Colo. App. 1991), aff'd, 853 P.2d 1149 (Colo. 1993).

The advisement by the trial court of the defendant's right to testify was inadequate when the court failed to inform the defendant of the consequences of testifying or not testifying including that if she testified that the prosecution could use her previous convictions to impeach her testimony and if she didn't that the jury would be instructed concerning her right against self-incrimination. People v. Milton, 864 P.2d 1097 (Colo. 1993).

Right to testify not improperly denied even though court did not advise defendant that his decision was his personal right. But the court did ask the defendant several times if his decision was his personal decision, which the defendant answered each time in the affirmative. People v. Howard, 886 P.2d 296 (Colo. App. 1994).

Absence of trial court's findings of defendant's waiver of right to testify cannot be bootstrapped into an implicit determination of the involuntariness of defendant's waiver. People v. Howard, 886 P.2d 296 (Colo. App. 1994).

Court's failure to tell defendant that if he chose to testify the jury would be instructed to consider knowledge of prior felony convictions only as they bore on his credibility, determined to be harmless because defendant had no prior felonies. People v. Howard, 886 P.2d 296 (Colo. App. 1994).

Trial court's advisement that the jury would be instructed to consider the defendant's felony conviction as it bears on the defendant's character was deficient. The evidentiary concept of character and the trait of credibility are substantively different terms when used by the trial court. By using character instead of credibility, the trial court incorrectly advised the defendant of the consequences of testifying at his or her trial. People v. Harding, 104 P.3d 881 (Colo. 2005).

No valid waiver of right to testify was made since although the defendant's statement that he did not want to testify was evidence of a voluntary waiver, without an adequate advisement of his right to testify, the defendant's statements did not demonstrate a knowing and intelligent waiver of his right to testify. People v. Chavez, 853 P.2d 1149 (Colo. 1993).

It is contrary to the Curtis advisement requirement to require the defendant to prove that he was prejudiced by the trial court's inadequate and misleading advisement regarding the right to testify. People v. Chavez, 853 P.2d 1149 (Colo. 1993).

For pre-Curtis cases, the right to effective assistance of counsel provides the appropriate legal norm for resolving defendant's claim that he was not adequately advised by counsel of his right to testify. People v. Naranjo, 840 P.2d 319 (Colo. 1992).

Advisement of the defendant's right to testify did not violate the constitution even though the defendant was not told that the same jury would hear the defendant's subsequent habitual criminal trial. Evidence fails to show the defendant did not voluntarily, knowingly, and intentionally waive the right to testify as reviewed under the same constitutional test applied to waiver of the right to counsel. People v. Boehmer, 872 P.2d 1320 (Colo. App. 1993).

Trial court did not commit reversible error by failing to explicitly advise defendant that the jury could be given a limiting instruction to consider evidence of prior felonies only as it related to defendant's credibility as a witness where the advisement was in every other respect sufficient under Curtis. People v. Blecha, 940 P.2d 1070 (Colo. App. 1996), aff'd, 962 P.2d 931 (Colo. 1998).

While trial court failed to use the word "credibility" in giving defendant Curtis advisement, trial court's remarks were sufficient to apprise defendant that his prior conviction would be admissible to impeach the credibility of his testimony where the trial court informed defendant that his prior conviction would "be presented" for the purpose of influencing whether "the jury chooses to believe you or not." People v. Whitley, 998 P.2d 31 (Colo. App. 1999).

Under the Strickland ineffective-assistance standard, a defendant will establish a violation of his right to testify when he proves by a preponderance that: defense counsel's action or inaction in counseling the defendant on his right to testify fell below the level of professional competence demanded of attorneys, depriving defendant of his ability to make an informed and voluntary decision; and there is a reasonable probability that, but for defense counsel's deficient performance, the result of the trial would have been different. People v. Naranjo, 840 P.2d 319 (Colo. 1992).

It is not reversible error per se when the defendant's waiver of the right to testify does not appear on the record. Tyler v. People, 847 P.2d 140 (Colo. 1993).

Initially, burden is on the prosecution to show a voluntary, knowing, and intentional waiver of the defendant's right to testify. Once this burden is met, however, burden shifts to the defendant to present evidence from which the court may reasonably infer otherwise. Tyler v. People, 847 P.2d 140 (Colo. 1993).

While counsel may not prevent a defendant from presenting an alibi during his own testimony without waiver of right to testify, where defendant's alibi is to be established by testimony of witnesses other than defendant, the decision whether to present such defense is a strategic and tactical decision within the exclusive province of defense counsel. People v.

Tackett, 742 P.2d 957 (Colo. App. 1987).

Where admissibility of prior felony conviction for impeachment of defendant's testimony is challenged on constitutional grounds, a defendant is not required to testify at trial to preserve issue for appeal. People v. Henderson, 745 P.2d 265 (Colo. App. 1987).

Defendant's fifth amendment right not to testify was not violated when the trial court was unwilling to limit the prosecution's cross-examination after defendant was going to testify regarding the involuntariness of his statements. The prosecution's proffered questions regarding how the alleged coercion could have caused the alleged involuntary statements were within the scope of the proposed direct examination of defendant. The court properly used its discretion in ruling it would allow the prosecution's proffered cross-examination if defendant testified regarding his alleged involuntary statements. People v. Gomez-Garcia, 224 P.3d 1019 (Colo. App. 2009).

Court did not deny defendant due process by requiring defendant to testify on the first day of trial. The order of proof at trial is a matter within the court's discretion. Court required defendant to testify in order to make use of jury's time. Defendant had previously expressed his intent to testify, and court permitted defendant to testify again, following the testimony of his expert witness. People v. Walden, 224 P.3d 369 (Colo. App. 2009).

Trial court abused its discretion in finding defendant competent to stand trial, because it applied incorrect legal standards in several respects. First, the court did not consider whether defendant met his burden of proof by a preponderance of the evidence. Instead, the court examined the evidence in the light most favorable to defendant. Second, the court did not properly assess defendant's competency according to whether defendant possessed a sufficient present ability to consult with counsel with a reasonable degree of rational understanding, and a present rational and factual understanding of the proceedings against him. Instead, the court appears to have based its competency determination exclusively on whether defendant factually understood the proceedings and whether he had the cognitive ability to assist in his defense or cooperate with his counsel, regardless of whether his perceptions and understandings were grounded in reality. People v. Mondragon, 217 P.3d 936 (Colo. App. 2009).

J. Evidence.

1. Duty to Preserve and Provide Access to Evidence.

Defendant's right to discovery. Where the defense has made a specific request for certain information in the possession or control of the prosecution, discovery of that information is constitutionally compelled, not only when it is exculpatory, but when it is of material importance to the defense. People v. Thatcher, 638 P.2d 760 (Colo. 1981).

The use of discovery material for impeachment purposes implicates the due process rights of the defendant and is of material importance to the defense. People v. Thatcher, 638 P.2d 760 (Colo. 1981).

Generally, defendant has no constitutional right to compel disclosure of a confidential informant, but consideration of fundamental fairness sometimes requires that identity of such informant be revealed. People v. Dailey, 639 P.2d 1068 (Colo. 1982); People v. Vigil, 729 P.2d 360 (Colo. 1986).

Suppression of evidence denies due process. Evidence which might be helpful to a defendant and which is suppressed by the police or the prosecution before or during trial or which is ignored by a trial court when presented to it, results in a denial of due process of law just as surely as would the knowing use of perjured testimony. Cheatwood v. People, 164 Colo. 334, 435 P.2d 402 (1967).

Evidence which is suppressed by the police or prosecution results in a denial of due process. People v. Scheidt, 187 Colo. 20, 528 P.2d 232 (1974).

A failure of the prosecution to produce evidence favorable to the accused, relating to the issue of either guilt or punishment, amounts to a denial of due process. Sandoval v. People, 180 Colo. 180, 503 P.2d 1020 (1972).

The suppression of evidence favorable to the defendant, coupled with the district attorney's unfair and misleading closing argument, constituted a deprivation of due process. People v. Walker, 180 Colo. 184, 504 P.2d 1098 (1972).

The suppression of material evidence relative to guilt or innocence upon request is a denial of due process. People v. Angelini, 649 P.2d 341 (Colo. App. 1982); People v. Greathouse, 742 P.2d 334 (Colo. 1987).

Reversal on the basis of failure to disclose material information in the prosecution's possession is only mandated if the information might have affected the outcome of the trial. People v. Armstrong, 664 P.2d 716 (Colo. App. 1982).

Nondisclosure of evidence affecting credibility. When the reliability of a witness may well be determinative of guilt or innocence, nondisclosure of evidence affecting credibility falls within this general rule. People v. Angelini, 649 P.2d 341 (Colo. App. 1982).

Capital cases carry strong presumption that possible exculpatory evidence should be disclosed and information that became available after the defendant was sentenced to death is to be evaluated by the trial judge. In a capital case in which the death sentence is imposed, even if information is determined not to be material, the prosecution must make an extraordinary showing of a compelling interest in withholding such information. People v. Rodriguez, 786 P.2d 1079 (Colo. 1989).

Demand for evidence which is unknown to defendant is not a prerequisite to the right to the production of favorable evidence. People v. Walker, 180 Colo. 184, 504 P.2d 1098 (1972).

No suppression of evidence by prosecution for failure of police to obtain a rape test once defendant rejected the examination and when there was no showing that the evidence would have been material. People v. Wagner, 725 P.2d 51 (Colo. App. 1986).

Failure to make evidence available for independent testing. The failure of the prosecution to make available to the defendant an opportunity for independent trace metal testing may deprive the defendant of due process of law. People ex rel. Gallagher v. District Court, 656 P.2d 1287 (Colo. 1983).

Prosecution cannot discharge its duty to provide exculpatory evidence through an open records policy when such evidence cannot be ascertained by reviewing the defendant's file; however, evidence that crime victim failed to identify defendant's fellow burglar in a lineup would not have raised a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury, and failure to provide defendant's counsel with such evidence is not reversible error. People v. Hernandez, 686 P.2d 1325 (Colo. 1984).

Duty to preserve evidence known to be material is part of the duty to disclose. The principle underlying this rule is the constitutional requirement that a criminal defendant be afforded due process. People v. Harmes, 38 Colo. App. 378, 560 P.2d 470 (1976).

Although the state is required to preserve evidence which might be favorable to the accused, the defendant must make some showing that the evidence is exculpatory in order to establish a due process violation. People v. Loggins, 709 P.2d 25 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Erickson, 883 P.2d 511 (Colo. App. 1994).

The state is required to employ regular procedures to preserve evidence when it is reasonably foreseeable that such evidence might be favorable to the accused. People v. Greathouse, 742 P.2d 334 (Colo. 1987); People v. Erickson, 883 P.2d 511 (Colo. App. 1994).

When the police conduct scientific tests, they must preserve samples to permit the defendant to accomplish independent testing, permit the defendant's experts to monitor the police testing, or provide some other suitable means to allow the defendant to verify independently the appropriateness of the procedures and the accuracy of the results of the testing. People v. Greathouse, 742 P.2d 334 (Colo. 1987).

Failure of the prosecution to prevent destruction of a motor vehicle which was the subject of a vehicular homicide charge violated the due process rights of defendant since it not only left the defendant without physical evidence of the cause of the accident but also removed the opportunity for the defendant's expert to examine the vehicle. People v. Sheppard, 701 P.2d 49 (Colo. 1985).

But the negligence of police in failing to prevent damage to defendant's motor vehicle by thieves in police lot did not violate the defendant's due process rights. Trial court properly found that the damage was not the result of police bad faith conduct, the evidence sought by defendant had no apparent exculpatory value, and other admissible evidence was at least as reliable as the evidence defendant sought. People v. Scarlett, 985 P.2d 36 (Colo. App. 1998).

Inadvertent destruction of videotape did not preclude admission of testimony of persons who had viewed it, where still photos had been generated from the tape prior to its destruction and were available for purposes of cross-examining witnesses. People v. Braunthal, 31 P.3d 167 (Colo. 2001).

Failure to preserve evidence is tantamount to suppression. When evidence can be collected and preserved in the performance of routine procedures by state agents, failure to do so is tantamount to suppression of the evidence, and the state must employ regular procedures to preserve evidence which a state agent, in the regular performance of his duties, could reasonably foresee might be favorable to the accused. People ex rel. Gallagher v. District Court, 656 P.2d 1287 (Colo. 1983); People v. Greathouse, 742 P.2d 334 (Colo. 1987).

Test for violation when evidence lost or destroyed. The three-pronged test for determining whether a defendant's due process rights have been violated when evidence has been lost or destroyed is: (1) Whether the evidence was suppressed or destroyed by the prosecution; (2) whether the evidence is exculpatory; and (3) whether the evidence is material to the defendant's case. People v. Holloway, 649 P.2d 318 (Colo. 1982).

The destruction of an officer's handwritten notes and the admission into evidence of a typewritten copy that the officer testified was identical to the original notes did not deny defendant's right to due process. People v. Nunez, 698 P.2d 1376 (Colo. App. 1984), aff'd on other grounds, 737 P.2d 422 (Colo. 1987).

Compliance with the test for materiality of evidence under People v. Greathouse (742 P.2d 334) is sufficient to satisfy the second and third parts of this test. People v. Enriquez, 763 P.2d 1033 (Colo. 1988).

Test applied in People v. Sams, 685 P.2d 157 (Colo. 1984); People v. Marquiz, 685 P.2d 242 (Colo. App. 1984), aff'd, 726 P.2d 1105 (Colo. 1986); People v. Nave, 689 P.2d 645 (Colo. App. 1984); People v. Viduya, 703 P.2d 1281 (Colo. 1985); People v. Moore, 701 P.2d 1249 (Colo. App.), cert. denied, 706 P.2d 802 (Colo. 1985); People v. Wagner, 725 P.2d 51 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Ford, 736 P.2d 1249 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Silva, 782 P.2d 846 (Colo. App. 1989); Longmont v. Gomez, 843 P.2d 1321 (Colo. 1993).

Test for materiality of evidence. To satisfy the test of constitutional materiality, the evidence must possess both an exculputory value that was apparent before the evidence was destroyed, and be of such a nature that the defendant would be unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means. People v. Greathouse, 742 P.2d 334 (Colo. 1987); People v. Humes, 762 P.2d 665 (Colo. 1988); People v. Erickson, 883 P.2d 511 (Colo. App. 1994); People v. Trujillo, 62 P.3d 1034 (Colo. App. 2002), rev'd on other grounds, 83 P.3d 642 (Colo. 2004).

It is the defendant's burden to establish that the evidence was lost or destroyed by state action. People v. Greathouse, 742 P.2d 334 (Colo. 1987).

Accused who establishes that destroyed evidence is material is not required to make additional showing of favorable character of evidence to show that failure to preserve such potentially exculpatory evidence violated due process. People v. Enriquez, 763 P.2d 1033 (Colo. 1988).

In the context of a completed trial, material evidence is that which, when evaluated in light of the entire record, likely would have affected the outcome of the trial. People v. Morgan, 681 P.2d 970 (Colo. App. 1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 881, 105 S. Ct. 248, 83 L.Ed.2d 185 (1984).

Defendant failed to establish that his trial would have culminated in a different result if he had known the victim was contemplating a tort action against him. Therefore, prosecution's failure to reveal such fact did not violate defendant's due process rights. People v. Deninger, 772 P.2d 674 (Colo. App. 1989).

Character of evidence destroyed, not the prosecution's culpability, determines whether there has been a violation of due process. People v. Collins, 730 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1986).

Failure of defendant to show the exculpatory value of evidence or bad faith on the part of police meant that failure to preserve evidence did not violate due process. People v. Franklin, 782 P.2d 1202 (Colo. App. 1989); People v. Bachofer, 192 P.3d 454 (Colo. App. 2008).

No due process violation found where investigator failed to videotape or audiotape initial interview with defendant. People v. Raibon, 843 P.2d 46 (Colo. App. 1992).

No suppression of evidence by prosecution for failure of police to retain officer's handwritten notes of interrogation, where notes formed basis for report that accurately reflected defendant's statements and that was given to defense counsel. People v. Erickson, 883 P.2d 511 (Colo. App. 1994).

No due process violation where police fail to require defendant to undergo rape examination since the fact of sexual intercourse was not a fact in issue. People v. Wagner, 725 P.2d 51 (Colo. App. 1986).

No due process violation where prosecution destroys recording of defendant's statement because a certified transcript of the statement was retained, and the defendant did not allege that the destroyed recording contained evidence material to his case that was not in the transcript. Banks v. People, 696 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1985).

Faulty recording of defendant's statements was not destruction of evidence. When tape recording of defendant's statement was unintelligible, there was no evidence to be destroyed. To suppress statements made when recording failed would have a chilling effect on whether statements would be recorded, and the court wants to encourage the police to record their interviews. People v. Casias, 59 P.3d 853 (Colo. 2002).

There is no bad faith for failing to preserve a videotape of the incident when the videotape automatically records over itself every 24 hours. People v. Abdu, 215 P.3d 1265 (Colo. App. 2009).

Failure to preserve a second sample of the defendant's blood for independent testing did not violate his due process rights because the test for materiality was not met. People v. Humes, 762 P.2d 665 (Colo. 1988).

Unintentional failure to maintain integrity of second sample not violative of due process when test results of second sample were not exculpatory. Havens v. Charnes, 738 P.2d 1202 (Colo. App. 1987).

Negligent destruction of evidence is tantamount to suppression. People v. Harmes, 38 Colo. App. 378, 560 P.2d 470 (1976).

Negligent destruction of victim's blood sample prior to testing violated due process as it denied evidence to the defendant which might have assisted the defendant's self-defense claim. People v. Collins, 730 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1986).

No duty to gather exculpatory evidence. There is no duty for criminal investigators to gather possible exculpatory evidence or, having gathered it, to preserve it for possible use by the defendant, where there is no indication that the police acted in bad faith in allowing the evidence to become unusable without accomplishing tests for possibly relevant information. People v. Roark, 643 P.2d 756 (Colo. 1982); People v. Braxton, 807 P.2d 1214 (Colo. App. 1990).

The right to due process of law does not include the right to be afforded scientific testing in all circumstances. The state may not suppress evidence, but it need not gather evidence for the accused. People v. Wagner, 725 P.2d 51 (Colo. App. 1986).

Police investigators have no duty to search out exculpatory evidence unless there is a reasonable possibility that the evidence could have been of assistance to the defense. People v. Vigil, 718 P.2d 496 (Colo. 1986).

Incriminating evidence is not exculpatory because it is not alone conclusive of criminal conduct. People v. Braunthal, 31 P.3d 167 (Colo. 2001).

Loss of evidence resulting from police officers' failure to record a monitored conversation between defendant and informant did not constitute a violation of defendant's due process rights. People v. Rivera, 765 P.2d 624 (Colo. App. 1988).

Failure to investigate does not constitute the suppression of evidence, nor may the defendant compel the state to search out and gather evidence that could be exculpatory. The police do not have a duty to procure all evidence from a crime scene that might be favorable to the defendant. People v. Moore, 701 P.2d 1249 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Apodaca, 998 P.2d 25 (Colo. App. 1999).

Nor to preserve explosives or bombs. The prosecution does not have the duty to preserve high explosives, homemade bombs, or dangerous materials if that requirement would endanger lives and the public safety. People v. Clements, 661 P.2d 267 (Colo. 1983).

Failure to preserve hazardous substances which cannot be stored safely. The "destruction of evidence" rule cannot be applied mechanically in a way that endangers the lives of public safety officers or forces the police to preserve hazardous substances which cannot be stored safely. People v. Clements, 661 P.2d 267 (Colo. 1983).

Perjured testimony and suppressed evidence constitute due process violations. The rights of the accused were violated when the prosecution offered perjured testimony and withheld evidence favorable to the accused. DeLuzio v. People, 177 Colo. 389, 494 P.2d 589 (1972).

A due process violation occurred when the district attorney permitted a witness to testify that no deal had been made, when, in fact, sentence concessions had been made, and no effort was made by the prosecution to correct the error. DeLuzio v. People, 177 Colo. 389, 494 P.2d 589 (1972).

But failure by prosecution to correct false testimony does not. When a witness testifies that he was unable to make an identification in a lineup while a police officer's notes show that the witness stated, when questioned by the officer, that a person other than the defendant could have been a participant in the crime, there is no failure on the part of the prosecution to correct false testimony which would rise to the level of denial of due process. Sandoval v. People, 180 Colo. 180, 503 P.2d 1020 (1972).

The primary concerns in selecting a remedy for the governmental destruction of evidence are the preservation of the integrity of the truth-finding process and the deterrence of the destruction of material evidence by the police or prosecutor. People v. Collins, 730 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1986).

The conduct of the prosecution may be taken into account when fashioning a remedy for the governmental destruction of evidence. People v. Collins, 730 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1986).

Sanction as to lost evidence. Suppression of reference to the lost evidence by the prosecution held to be a proper sanction. People v. Reese, 670 P.2d 11 (Colo. App. 1983).

Failure to dismiss charges held not to deprive defendant of due process. People v. Morgan, 681 P.2d 970 (Colo. App. 1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 881, 105 S. Ct. 248, 83 L.Ed.2d 185 (1984).

Dismissal of criminal case for loss of exculpatory evidence by prosecution is an unduly disproportionate sanction and an abuse of discretion. People v. Sams, 685 P.2d 157 (Colo. 1984).

Dismissal of charges is an appropriate sanction to the governmental destruction of evidence when no other remedy would produce a fair result; however, a less drastic solution can often be adopted. People v. Collins, 730 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1986).

Reduction of charge as sanction was more severe than necessary to protect due process rights of defendant. People v. Roan, 685 P.2d 1369 (Colo. 1984).

Remedy fashioned by the trial court was appropriate to deal with accidental governmental destruction of victim's blood sample as the defendant was allowed to present evidence concerning what the blood sample might have proved and to present testimony, previously excluded, concerning specific violent conduct by the victim on a prior occasion. People v. Collins, 730 P.2d 293 (Colo. 1986).

2. Admissibility of Evidence.

Ruling on defendant's motion to suppress prior conviction evidence. A timely judicial ruling on a defendant's motion to suppress prior conviction evidence for the purpose of impeachment serves the vital function of providing the defendant with the meaningful opportunity to make the type of informed decisions contemplated by the fundamental nature of the right to testify in one's own defense. Apodaca v. People, 712 P.2d 467 (Colo. 1985).

The trial court's refusal to rule on the defendant's motion to prohibit prosecutorial use of defendant's 1976 military conviction until such time as the prosecution actually sought to impeach the defendant constituted an impermissible burden on the defendant's constitutional right to testify in his own defense. Apodaca v. People, 712 P.2d 467 (Colo. 1985).

Admission of previous convictions as evidence of habitual criminality is violative. The use of defendant's testimonial admissions to prior felony convictions as substantive evidence of his habitual criminality violates due process of law, by unduly burdening defendant's constitutional right to testify in his own defense. People v. Chavez, 632 P.2d 574 (Colo. 1981); People v. Hernandez, 686 P.2d 1325 (Colo. 1984).

A foreign felony conviction is admissible for impeachment purposes in a Colorado proceeding if it complies with constitutional due process requirements with respect to making a plea knowingly and voluntarily. People v. Henderson, 745 P.2d 265 (Colo. App. 1987).

Admission of prior act evidence when defendant had been acquitted of the prior act does not violate due process or double jeopardy. Kinney v. People, 187 P.3d 548 (Colo. 2008).

Informing jury of defendant's acquittal of a prior act is up to the discretion of the trial court on a case-by-case basis as long as the information's probative value substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. Kinney v. People, 187 P.3d 548 (Colo. 2008).

An acquittal instruction is appropriate when the testimony or evidence presented at trial about the prior act indicates that the jury has likely learned or concluded that the defendant was tried for the prior act and may be speculating as to the defendant's guilt or innocence in that prior trial. Kinney v. People, 187 P.3d 548 (Colo. 2008).

Appellate court will review trial court's decision for an abuse of discretion. Kinney v. People, 187 P.3d 548 (Colo. 2008).

Conviction obtained unconstitutionally cannot be subsequently used. A prior conviction obtained in violation of a constitutional right of the accused cannot be used in a subsequent criminal proceeding to support guilt or to enhance punishment. Watkins v. People, 655 P.2d 834 (Colo. 1982); People v. Quintana, 707 P.2d 355 (Colo. 1985).

Due process not violated where trial court denied defendant permission to test, drill, or sample the victims' property to rebut charges of theft and conspiracy to commit theft. A violation occurs only when the defendant can make a plausible showing that the excluded evidence was relevant and material to his defense and not merely a showing that the evidence might have had some possible benefit. People v. Collie, 995 P.2d 765 (Colo. App. 1999).

Trial court's ruling that defendant's suppression hearing testimony was admissible to impeach sister's character testimony did not violate constitutional protections. The fourth amendment right to suppress inadmissible testimony, the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination, and the sixth amendment right to present evidence in a defense are all at play in the question of whether the prosecution could use defendant's suppression testimony that he had sexual contact with the victim to impeach the defendant's sister's character testimony that the defendant would not commit sexual assault. The following factors supported the court's ruling to admit the testimony: The evidence was not offered on the issue of guilt; the defendant still has an obligation to present truthful testimony; the defendant's statement was made under oath, not based on a hypothetical assumption that defendant was guilty of the crime; and the trial court's willingness to allow the defendant to use leading questions when presenting defendant's sister's testimony. Thus, each of defendant's constitutional rights were protected. People v. Dembry, 91 P.3d 431 (Colo. App. 2003).

Evidence offered for impeachment purposes of a defendant's refusal to consent to a search does not impermissibly burden the fourth amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. If defendant testifies at trial, evidence of the refusal to consent may be admitted to impeach defendant's testimony, and the prosecution may comment on the refusal in closing argument. People v. Chavez, 190 P.3d 760 (Colo. App. 2007).

Defendant's right to remain silent was not violated when defendant volunteered that he had invoked his right to remain silent when being questioned about his refusal to consent to search. Since the information was volunteered by defendant and prosecution did not comment on it in the presence of the jury, there was no error. People v. Chavez, 190 P.3d 760 (Colo. App. 2007).

No violation of due process where court granted defendant wide latitude to present evidence regarding the safety and effectiveness of rebirthing therapy, and defendant, the child's mother, and an expert witness were all allowed to testify as to both the safety and the effectiveness of holding therapy. People v. Watkins, 83 P.3d 1182 (Colo. App. 2003).

Due process prohibits the admission of involuntary statements into evidence. The prosecution must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the statements were made voluntarily under the totality of the circumstances. People v. Humphrey, 132 P.3d 352 (Colo. 2006).

A trial court's findings related to the voluntariness of the statements are subject to due deference if supported by the evidence in the record. The suspect's limited physical, emotional, and psychological state at the time of the interrogation coupled with the officer's psychological coercion questioning after informing the suspect that the victim died made the defendant's statements involuntary. People v. Humphrey, 132 P.3d 352 (Colo. 2006).

3. Witnesses.

Right to adduce evidence may not be limited by statute. A statute which creates exclusive procedures for examining the accused and for the giving of expert testimony interferes with the constitutional right of the parties to adduce such evidence as they think useful. Early v. People, 142 Colo. 462, 352 P.2d 112, cert. denied, 364 U.S. 847, 81 S. Ct. 90, 5 L.Ed.2d 70 (1960).

Even though court finds that disclosure to defendant might endanger confidential informant, court has duty to examine in camera the complete tapes supporting search warrant in connection with a veracity challenge. People v. Cook, 722 P.2d 432 (Colo. App. 1986).

Excuse by court of defense witness on basis that the witness would exercise his fifth amendment privilege not to testify during cross-examination by the prosecution was not a denial of due process. People v. Maestas, 685 P.2d 791 (Colo. App. 1984).

When the answers sought from the witness asserting the privilege relate to the reliability of the witness's observation of the charged offense, in the absence of other opportunities for impeachment, the witness's entire testimony must be disallowed. People v. Brown, 119 P.3d 486 (Colo. App. 2004).

Defendant's due process rights not denied when subpoenaed witness did not testify where there is no suggestion that a subpoenaed witness' unavailability was due to any action or omission by the prosecution or court, defendant's due process rights were not violated. People v. Chastain, 733 P.2d 1206 (Colo. 1987).

Deportation of alien witness does not violate due process. Where there is no showing that the evidence lost through deportation of alien witness would be both material and favorable to the defense in ways not merely cumulative to the testimony of available witnesses, no violation of defendant's due process rights has occurred. People v. Garcia, 735 P.2d 897 (Colo. App. 1986).

Trial judge's action of personally escorting a child victim to and from the witness stand could have been perceived by the jury as an endorsement of the child's credibility, thus impinging upon the defendant's right to a fair trial. People v. Rogers, 800 P.2d 1327 (Colo. App. 1990).

K. Pre-trial and In-court Identification.

Photographic identification while case is in investigatory stage must be approved. Brown v. People, 177 Colo. 397, 494 P.2d 587 (1972); People v. Moreno, 181 Colo. 106, 507 P.2d 857 (1973).

If procedures used are not suggestive and do not coerce identification. Brown v. People, 177 Colo. 397, 494 P.2d 587 (1972); People v. Moreno, 181 Colo. 106, 507 P.2d 857 (1973).

When photographic displays are not suggestive and line-ups are fairly conducted, the defendant is not deprived of due process of law. Maynes v. People, 178 Colo. 88, 495 P.2d 551 (1972); People v. Borghesi, 40 P.3d 15 (Colo. App. 2001), aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 66 P.3d 93 (Colo. 2003).

In-court identification of defendant at trial is touchstone of due process. People v. Renfrow, 172 Colo. 399, 473 P.2d 957 (1970).

Test as to constitutionality of out-of-court identification of defendant. An out-of-court identification of the defendant is measured against due process of law by asking whether the confrontation was so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identification that the defendant was denied due process of law. Whitman v. People, 170 Colo. 189, 460 P.2d 767 (1969); Phillips v. People, 170 Colo. 520, 462 P.2d 594 (1969); Constantine v. People, 178 Colo. 16, 495 P.2d 208 (1972); People v. Ross, 179 Colo. 293, 500 P.2d 127 (1972); People v. Beasley, 43 Colo. App. 488, 608 P.2d 835 (1979).

Pretrial identification procedures which, given the totality of the circumstances, are so unnecessarily suggestive as to render the identification unreliable violate due process. People v. Weller, 679 P.2d 1077 (Colo. 1984).

The test applied to determine the validity of a one-on-one showup is whether the procedure was likely to result in an unreliable identification, based upon the totality of the circumstances, after consideration of the relevant factors. People v. Weller, 679 P.2d 1077 (Colo. 1984).

Due process is denied when an in-court identification is based on an out-of-court identification which is so unnecessarily suggestive as to render the in-court identification unreliable. People v. Tivis, 727 P.2d 392 (Colo. App. 1986).

A witness' observations at the scene of the crime alone does not constitute an independent source for an out-of-court identification. People v. Lewis, 975 P.2d 160 (Colo. 1999).

Answer to this question depends on totality of circumstances surrounding the confrontation. Phillips v. People, 170 Colo. 520, 462 P.2d 594 (1969); Constantine v. People, 178 Colo. 16, 495 P.2d 208 (1972); People v. Ross, 179 Colo. 293, 500 P.2d 127 (1972); People v. Montanez, 944 P.2d 529 (Colo. App. 1996).

Cases with respect to whether line-up procedures are violative of due process must necessarily be decided on a case-by-case basis, so in every case, the trial judge must determine the identification issue based upon the totality of the circumstances. People v. Knapp, 180 Colo. 280, 505 P.2d 7 (1973).

A claimed violation of due process of law in the conduct of a confrontation depends on the totality of the circumstances surrounding it. Fresquez v. People, 178 Colo. 220, 497 P.2d 1246 (1972).

An out-of-court identification made as a result of an unnecessarily suggestive identification procedure is inadmissible as violative of due process unless the identification can be shown under the totality of circumstances to be reliable, despite the suggestiveness of the procedure used. People v. Mattas, 645 P.2d 254 (Colo. 1982); Gimmy v. People, 645 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1982).

Factors to be considered in evaluating these circumstances are: (1) The witness' opportunity to view the criminal; (2) the witness' degree of attention; (3) the accuracy of any prior description; (4) the witness' level of certainty; and (5) the time elapsed since the crime. People v. Smith, 620 P.2d 232 (Colo. 1980); People v. Walker, 666 P.2d 113 (Colo. 1983); People v. Tivis, 727 P.2d 392 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Montanez, 944 P.2d 529 (Colo. App. 1996).

Factors applied in People v. Daniels, 973 P.2d 641 (Colo. App. 1998).

In-court identification permitted unless pretrial procedure impermissibly suggestive. Where there is a pretrial identification by photograph, an in-court identification is permitted unless there is a showing that the pretrial procedure is so impermissibly suggestive as to give rise to a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. People v. Bowen, 176 Colo. 302, 490 P.2d 295 (1971).

Due process is violated when an in-court identification is based on an out-of-court identification that is so unnecessarily suggestive as to render the in-court identification unreliable. People v. Dunlap, 124 P.3d 780 (Colo. App. 2004).

One-on-one showups do not violate due process. One-on-one showups are not favored and tend to be suggestive but are not per se violative of due process. People v. Smith, 620 P.2d 232 (Colo. 1980); People v. Trujillo, 75 P.3d 1133 (Colo. App. 2003).

Plainclothes officer's one-on-one showup identification following the pursuit and capture of a just-apprehended suspect did not violate defendant's due process right because police officer is a trained observer, has a primary interest in capturing the right person, can be expected to be relatively calm, deliberate, and less suggestible, and is familiar with the identification process. People v. Howard, 215 P.3d 1134 (Colo. App. 2008).

Unnecessarily suggestive line-up denies due process. Where the circumstances of a line-up are so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identity, the line-up constitutes a denial of due process of law. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

It is the substantial chance that a suggestive identification procedure has resulted in a misidentification of the defendant at trial that raises the due process question. People v. Renfrow, 172 Colo. 399, 473 P.2d 957 (1970).

Prosecution does not have a per se burden to show that in-court identification testimony is not the product of an unduly suggestive procedure. People v. Montanez, 944 P.2d 529 (Colo. App. 1996).

Complete judicial determination can only be made at time of in-court identification. People v. Renfrow, 172 Colo. 399, 473 P.2d 957 (1970).

Trial court must hold hearing to determine if taint exists. Where there is a question of whether an in-court identification would be tainted by a prior out-of-court identification, the trial court must hold a hearing to determine if there is a taint or whether there is an idependent source upon which the eyewitness can base his in-court identification. People v. Bowen, 176 Colo. 302, 490 P.2d 295 (1971).

Where there is a suggestion of an illegal line-up it is the duty of the trial court to first determine at an in camera hearing whether the in-court identification has been tainted by the illegal line-up, before permitting the in-court identification to be made. Espinoza v. People, 178 Colo. 391, 497 P.2d 994 (1972).

At an in camera hearing on line-up identification, the court must determine in the first instance whether a witness' in-court identification testimony bears an unconstitutional taint. Sandoval v. People, 180 Colo. 180, 503 P.2d 1020 (1972).

Test of suggestibility best left for resolution in trial court. Unless the record establishes taint of mistaken identity, the test of suggestibility is best left for resolution in the trial court. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

Admission of in-court identification without determination may be constitutional error. The admission of an in-court identification without first determining that it was not tainted by an illegal line-up but was of independent origin may be constitutional error. Espinoza v. People, 178 Colo. 391, 497 P.2d 994 (1972).

But such error may be considered harmless, even if there has been an illegal line-up confrontation, if the identification witness makes an in-court identification based on sufficient independent observations of the defendant, disassociated from the pretrial line-up. Espinoza v. People, 178 Colo. 391, 497 P.2d 994 (1972).

Where the trial court refused to permit defense counsel to present testimony at the in camera hearing bearing upon the legality of the pretrial line-up but the record supported an informed judgment, based on clear and convincing evidence, that the in-court identification had an independent source separate and apart from the questioned line-up and the defendant does not contend that the in-court identification was tainted for any reason other than the possible absence of counsel at the line-up, the error of the trial court in denying the in camera inquiry will be held to be harmless. Espinoza v. People, 178 Colo. 391, 497 P.2d 994 (1972).

In-court identification allowed if based on independent source. Even where there has been an illegal confrontation, a witness may make an in-court identification if there is an independent source upon which to base such an identification apart from the illegal confrontation. Glass v. People, 177 Colo. 267, 493 P.2d 1347 (1972).

If an in-court identification has an independent source other than an unconstitutional line-up or its admission is harmless error, a conviction will be upheld. Brady v. People, 175 Colo. 252, 486 P.2d 436 (1971).

Assuming absence of counsel at line-up, unfair suggestiveness that might lead to irreparable in-court misidentification, does not result where the record supports an informed judgment that the in-court identifications have an independent source, separate and apart from the line-up. People v. Duncan, 179 Colo. 253, 500 P.2d 137 (1972).

An in-court identification by a witness is permissible only if the prosecution can show by clear and convincing evidence that the in-court identification is not the product of an unconstitutional pretrial identification but, rather, is based upon an independent source such as the witness' observations of the accused during the commission of the offense. People v. Mattas, 645 P.2d 254 (Colo. 1982); Gimmy v. People, 645 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1982); People v. Madonna, 651 P.2d 378 (Colo. 1982); People v. Holden, 703 P.2d 603 (Colo. App. 1985); People v. Tivis, 727 P.2d 392 (Colo. App. 1986).

"Per se exclusionary rule", as defined in Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 87 S. Ct. 1951, 18 L.Ed.2d 1178 (1967), is not intended to be imposable in all cases where there can be an independent source for an in-court identification in the case of an illegal line-up of a defendant in a criminal case. People v. Bowen, 176 Colo. 302, 490 P.2d 295 (1971).

State can purge any improper line-up identification of any "primary taint", by showing that there was other evidence in the record which would satisfy the independent origin test and the requirements of due process. Stewart v. People, 175 Colo. 304, 487 P.2d 371 (1971).

State must establish independence by clear and convincing proof. Courtroom identification is not admissible at all unless the state can establish by clear or convincing proof that the testimony is not the fruit of the earlier identification. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

But in-court identification to be suppressed if without sufficient independent origin. Any in-court identification of a defendant, whether it is based on an unconstitutional line-up or not, should be suppressed because it is tainted by the unconstitutional line-up resulting in identification without sufficient independent origin. Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

In-court identification held supported by independent source. A victim's in-court identification of the defendant, based on her observation of him during the assault, is permissible as being supported by an independent source. People v. Martinez, 652 P.2d 174 (Colo. App. 1981).

In-court identifications held proper as having independent basis. Martinez v. People, 174 Colo. 125, 482 P.2d 375 (1971); Stewart v. People, 175 Colo. 304, 487 P.2d 371 (1971); Gallegos v. People, 176 Colo. 191, 489 P.2d 1301 (1971); Brown v. People, 177 Colo. 397, 494 P.2d 587 (1972); People v. Duncan, 179 Colo. 253, 500 P. 2d 137 (1972); People v. Nunez 684 P.2d 945 (Colo. 1984); People v. Tivis, 727 P.2d 392 (Colo. App. 1986).

In-court identification not tainted by pretrial procedure. Black v. People, 174 Colo. 410, 484 P.2d 787 (1971); Candelaria v. People, 177 Colo. 136, 493 P.2d 355 (1972); Lablanc v. People, 177 Colo. 250, 493 P.2d 1089 (1972); Massey v. People, 178 Colo. 141, 498 P.2d 953 (1972); Fresquez v.

People, 178 Colo. 220, 497 P.2d 1246 (1972); People v. Barker, 180 Colo. 28, 501 P.2d 1041 (1972); People v. York, 189 Colo. 16, 537 P.2d 294 (1975).

In-court identification allowed despite inability to make photographic identification. While a witness' inability to identify the defendant from the books of photographs is relevant, it does not preclude her from making an identification upon seeing the defendant in court. Gimmy v. People, 645 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1982).

In-court identification violating due process. People v. Palmer, 194 Colo. 186, 570 P.2d 251 (1977).

Suggestibility in identification also concerns weight of evidence. The matter of suggestibility in identification concerns not the admissibility but only the weight of the evidence. Schott v. People, 174 Colo. 15, 482 P.2d 101 (1971); Jaggers v. People, 174 Colo. 430, 484 P.2d 796 (1971); Edmisten v. People, 176 Colo. 262, 490 P.2d 58 (1971).

Although the trial court erred in precluding the defendant from presenting another person in court for purposes of comparing his appearance with that of the defendant, such error was harmless since other available evidence of identification was overwhelming. People v. Bell, 809 P.2d 1026 (Colo. App. 1990).

The standard for photographic displays involves a two-part test. First, the court must determine whether the photo array was impermissibly suggestive. The defendant has the burden of proving the first prong. If defendant meets his burden, the burden shifts to the people to show that, despite the improper suggestiveness, the identification was nevertheless reliable under the totality of the circumstances. Bernal v. People, 44 P.3d 184 (Colo. 2002); People v. Hogan, 114 P.3d 42 (Colo. App. 2004).

To determine whether a photo identification procedure is impermissibly suggestive, the following factors may be considered: The size of the array; the manner of its presentation by the officers; and the details of the photographs themselves. Bernal v. People, 44 P.3d 184 (Colo. 2002); People v. Hogan, 114 P.3d 42 (Colo. App. 2004).

The factors to consider in determining whether, despite a suggestive display, the identification was nonetheless reliable are: The opportunity of the witness to view the criminal at the time of the crime; the witness's degree of attention; the accuracy of the witness's prior description of the criminal; the level of certainty demonstrated by the witness at the confrontation; and the length of time between the crime and the confrontation. Bernal v. People, 44 P.3d 184 (Colo. 2002).

When determining whether an array of photos is impermissibly suggestive, a disparity in facial hair is a factor to be considered. However, such a disparity does not necessarily make an array of photos impermissibly suggestive. People v. Plancarte, 232 P.3d 186 (Colo. App. 2009).

Photographic lineup held not impermissibly suggestive. People v. Weller, 679 P.2d 1077 (Colo. 1984); People v. Hogan, 114 P.3d 42 (Colo. App. 2004).

Objection to in-court identification waived when defendant did not object until after he had cross-examined the witness and elicited more testimony on the identification. People v. Willis, 708 P.2d 125 (Colo. App. 1985).

Out-of-court identification for photographic array held unduly suggestive. People v. Stevens, 643 P.2d 39 (Colo. App. 1981).

When an out-of-court identification procedure violates due process. An out-of-court identification procedure violates due process when the totality of the circumstances shows that the confrontation was so impermissibly suggested as to give rise to a substantial likelihood of misidentification. Factors to be considered in evaluating the surrounding circumstances include the opportunity of the witness to review the accused at the time of the crime, the witness' degree of attention, the accuracy of the witnesses' prior description of the accused, the level of certainty demonstrated by the witness at the confrontation, and the length of time between the crime and the confrontation. People v. Borrego, 668 P.2d 21 (Colo. App. 1983); People v. Schruder, 735 P.2d 905 (Colo. App. 1986).

Notwithstanding the fact that the trial court made no findings regarding the totality of the circumstances and applied an improper standard in admitting the identification testimony, other events and evidence at trial rendered the court's erroneous treatment of the identification harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Schruder, 735 P.2d 905 (Colo. App. 1986).

The state cannot be required to provide exact replicas of the defendant for a line-up; a line-up is proper if the persons are reasonably matched by race, approximate age, and other physical characteristics. People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 311 (Colo. App. 1993).

If defendant "fairly leaps out" of the line-up, identification may be tainted. People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 311 (Colo. App. 1993).

Pretrial identification held not unconstitutionally suggestive. People v. Mack, 638 P.2d 257 (Colo. 1981); People v. Martinez, 734 P.2d 126 (Colo. App. 1986); People v. Bolton, 859 P.2d 311 (Colo. App. 1993); People v. Martinez, 32 P.3d 520 (Colo. App. 2001).

Applied in People v. Lovato, 180 Colo. 445, 506 P.2d 361 (1973); People v. Williams, 183 Colo. 241, 516 P.2d 114 (1973); People v. Montanez, 944 P.2d 529 (Colo. App. 1996).

L. Prosecutorial Misconduct.

Law reviews. For note, "Using Poor Form as a Proxy for Poor Substance: A Look at Wend v. People and its Categorical Rule Prohibiting Prosecutors From Using the Word 'Lie'", see 83 U. Colo. L. Rev. 633 (2012).

The actions of a prosecutor, although procedurally within the law, may result in a violation of the defendant's rights to due process and fundamental fairness. People v. Aragon, 643 P.2d 43 (Colo. 1982).

Prosecutorial misconduct. While certain prosecutorial misconduct may result in a denial of a fair trial, the nature of the misconduct must have affected the trial process itself. People v. McKay, 191 Colo. 381, 553 P.2d 380 (1976).

Since defendant was warned that failure to accept plea agreement would result in filing of additional habitual criminal charges and defendant rejected agreement, there was no due process violation when prosecutor filed additional charges upon which defendant was convicted. People v. Talley, 677 P.2d 394 (Colo. App. 1983).

Prosecution's closing arguments were so flagrantly improper as to constitute plain error that should have prompted corrective action by the trial court even absent timely objection. People v. McBride, 228 P.3d 216 (Colo. App. 2009).

Prosecutor's repeated accusations that defense had "lied" were plainly improper under settled Colorado law. The arguments were more flagrantly wrong than those condemned in prior Colorado cases because the prosecutor based the "liar" accusations not just on defendant's own statements but also on legitimate opening statements and cross-examinations by the defense attorney. People v. McBride, 228 P.3d 216 (Colo. App. 2009).

Prosecutor made a blatantly improper character attack when prosecutor grossly misused evidence admitted for the limited purpose of helping the jury evaluate defendant's intent and called defendant "a coward". People v. McBride, 228 P.3d 216 (Colo. App. 2009).

Prosecution's repeated personal attacks on defense expert who relied on crime scene evidence to opine that the shooting had occurred differently than the victim had testified went so far beyond accepted limits as to constitute obvious error. People v. McBride, 228 P.3d 216 (Colo. App. 2009).

Prosecutorial misconduct deprived defendant of fair trial. Improper reference to defendant's prior criminal record, improper questions asked on cross-examination of defendant, and improper rebuttal to defendant's closing arguments were so prejudicial as to deny defendant a fair trial. People v. Adams, 708 P.2d 813 (Colo. App. 1985).

Prosecutor's closing argument discussing the "stages of a trauma victim" amounted to expert testimony, and it was error to permit such argument without expert witness testimony. The prosecutor's argument improperly bolstered the victim's testimony, which was critical to defendant's conviction. This conduct was highly improper and, thus, requires reversal. People v. Davis, 280 P.3d 51 (Colo. App. 2011).

In determining whether prosecutorial misconduct mandates a new trial, an appellate court must evaluate the severity and frequency of misconduct, any curative measures taken by the trial court to alleviate the misconduct, and the likelihood that the misconduct constituted a material factor leading to the defendant's conviction. The misconduct did not rise to a level requiring a new trial. People v. Hogan, 114 P.3d 42 (Colo. App. 2004).

Prosecutor's pervasive use of the word "lie" during both opening and closing arguments constituted prosecutorial misconduct. Even under the plain error standard applicable in the absence of a contemporaneous objection, the court found that such misconduct affected the basic fairness of the trial requiring reversal. Wend v. People, 235 P.3d 1089 (Colo. 2010).

Prosecutor's objections, which were overruled by the trial court, had no legal basis, and appear on their face to be intended to comment on the credibility of witnesses, while inappropriate and unprofessional, did not deny defendant a fair trial considering the length of the trial, the number of witnesses, and the length of the jury's deliberations. People v. Reali, 895 P.2d 161 (Colo. App. 1994).

The prosecutor's remarks as a whole during closing and rebuttal arguments did not rise to the level of plain error. The prosecutor relied on the evidence presented and argued reasonable inferences from those facts presented. People v. Rivas, 77 P.3d 882 (Colo. App. 2003).

Prosecutor's reference in closing argument to evidence or lack of evidence and inferences that could be drawn from it were not improper, and prosecutor did not attempt to alter the burden of proof. People v. Gibson, 203 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2008).

Prosecutor's statements during closing argument, although in error, did not constitute plain error and warrant reversal. The statements were isolated and did not appear to be made in bad faith. People v. Al-Yousif, 206 P.3d 824 (Colo. App. 2006).

Prosecutor's remarks in rebuttal closing did not rise to the level of denigration of the defense or "character assassination" when viewed in light of defense counsel's closing. To the extent the remarks could be viewed as going beyond the bounds of proper rebuttal argument, trial court's actions in sustaining the objections and striking the latter remarks were sufficient to cure any prejudice to defendant. People v. Rojas, 181 P.3d 1216 (Colo. App. 2008).

Prosecutor's statement that defense theory of case was "garbage" and "trash" in closing arguments was harmless error. People v. Sandoval-Candelaria, __ P.3d __ (Colo. App. 2011).

The prosecution's impeachment of defendant's expert by questioning the expert about his fee and arguing it could present a bias was proper and did not denigrate the expert witness. People v. Sommers, 200 P.3d 1089 (Colo. App. 2008).

The prosecution's statement that he represents the state was not prejudicial. The prosecutor's statement factually states his role in the process and was brief and isolated so as to not affect the verdict. People v. Sommers, 200 P.3d 1089 (Colo. App. 2008).

Prosecution's comments regarding reasonable doubt did not create a reasonable likelihood that the jury could have incorrectly applied the reasonable doubt standard. Prosecution's comment was the unremarkable proposition that the jury can deliberate as long as it wanted before determining reasonable doubt. People v. Gomez-Garcia, 224 P.3d 1019 (Colo. App. 2009).

Deputy district attorney's statement to police officers that defendant was not entitled to an attorney was only an opinion regarding an undecided question of law, thus, it does not rise to the level of outrageous government conduct. Effland v. People, 240 P.3d 868 (Colo. 2010).

Prosecutor's characterization of photographs as "child pornography", use of rhetorical device during opening statement, and use of the term "grooming" during closing argument do not amount to prosecutorial misconduct. People v. Douglas, 2012 COA 57, __ P.3d __.

M. Standards and Burden of Proof.

Proof beyond reasonable doubt and presumption of innocence components of due process. Proof beyond a reasonable doubt and presumption of innocence are principles of law applicable to criminal cases which have been so universally accepted and applied as to have become component parts of the term "due process of law". People v. Hill, 182 Colo. 253, 512 P.2d 257 (1973).

Issues essential to guilt require proof beyond reasonable doubt. A fundamental principle of law applicable to criminal cases which has become part of due process of law is the doctrine that, at the outset of the trial, an accused person is presumed to be innocent of the offense charged against him, that the state must satisfy the jury of the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, and that if upon any material issue of fact essential to guilt the jury has a reasonable doubt, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of that reasonable doubt and a verdict of not guilty. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

Where the sufficiency of the evidence is challenged on appeal, a reviewing court must determine whether the evidence, viewed as a whole and in the light most favorable to the prosecution, is sufficient to support a conclusion by a reasonable person that the defendant is guilty of the crimes charged beyond a reasonable doubt. The evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, must be both substantial and sufficient to support the determination of guilt. People v. Valdez, 56 P.3d 1148 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. Gibson, 203 P.3d 571 (Colo. App. 2008).

Due process guarantees to the criminal defendant that the prosecution must prove every factual element necessary to constitute the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt before the defendant may be convicted and subjected to punishment. Vega v. People, 893 P.2d 107 (Colo. 1995).

Jury instruction in trial for fraud by check violated due process by shifting the burden of producing evidence or the burden of persuasion on an essential element of the crime, where instruction created a mandatory presumption that defendant knew he had insufficient funds to pay the check. People v. Felgar, 58 P.3d 1122 (Colo. App. 2002).

And accused need not prove any defense by preponderance of evidence. The due process clause of the state constitution includes the doctrine that the state must prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and that the accused cannot be required by legislative enactment to prove insanity or any other defense by a preponderance of the evidence. People ex rel. Juhan v. District Court, 165 Colo. 253, 439 P.2d 741 (1968).

In light of the entire record, prosecutor's cross-examination and closing argument did not shift the burden of proof. Prosecutor's actions only weakly implied defendant had the burden of proof, more likely the prosecutor's actions were intended to highlight the strength of the case and dispel negative implications raised by defense counsel's questions of its own expert. Also, the court instructed the jury on the burden of proof, thus there was no abuse of discretion by the trial court in failing to declare a mistrial. People v. Santana, 255 P.3d 1126 (Colo. 2011).

Requiring defendant to prove "emergency" in habitual offender provision constitutional. To require the defendant to prove the "emergency" referred to in § 42-2-206 does not shift the burden of proof with respect to any fact essential to the offense charged contrary to the dictates of due process of law. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

Defendant has burden to show prior conviction unconstitutional. In seeking suppression of a conviction used for impeachment purposes, the defendant has the burden of making a prima facie showing that the prior conviction violated his constitutional right to counsel. People v. Meyers, 617 P.2d 808 (Colo. 1980); Watkins v. People, 655 P.2d 834 (Colo. 1982).

In determining whether a conviction is constitutionally flawed, the defendant must make a prima facie showing that the prior conviction was obtained in violation of his constitutional rights. People v. Valdez, 725 P.2d 29 (Colo. App. 1986), aff'd, 789 P.2d 406 (Colo. 1990).

And a prima facie showing means evidence which, when considered in a light most favorable to the defendant with all reasonable inferences drawn in his favor, will permit the court to conclude that the defendant's plea of guilty was not obtained in accordance with his constitutional rights to due process. People v. Valdez, 725 P.2d 29 (Colo. App. 1986), aff'd, 789 P.2d 406 (Colo. 1990).

Upon which showing, burden shifts to prosecution. Where the defendant makes a prima facie showing of constitutional invalidity, the prosecution's burden is to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the constitutional validity of a prior felony conviction before that conviction may be used for impeachment purposes. People v. Meyers, 617 P.2d 808 (Colo. 1980); Watkins v. People, 655 P.2d 834 (Colo. 1982); People v. Valdez, 725 P.2d 29 (Colo. App. 1986), aff'd, 789 P.2d 406 (Colo. 1990).

A defendant attacking the constitutionality of a prior conviction in habitual criminal proceedings must make a prima facie showing that the guilty plea was unconstitutionally obtained, and having done so, the conviction is not admissible unless the prosecution establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that the conviction was obtained in accordance with the defendant's constitutional rights. People v. Chavez, 832 P.2d 1026 (Colo. App. 1991).

Willful concealment of goods under this section that results in prima facie evidence of intent to commit theft does not violate due process standards. The statute does not eliminate the prosecution's burden of proving intent to commit crime beyond a reasonable doubt. "Prima facie" does not require the fact finder to conclude that the prosecution has met such burden, but establishes a permissible inference. People in re R.M.D., 829 P.2d 852 (Colo. 1992).

N. Sentencing.

Unitary trial with single verdict does not offend defendant's various constitutional rights: There is no constitutionally protected right to allocution; the single verdict procedure does not necessarily chill the exercise of basic constitutional rights; the federal constitution does not compel a two-part trial, and for a state to permit a jury to fix the penalty in a first degree murder case when in all other instances the penalty is imposed by a judge, after presentencing hearings, is not an unreasonable or arbitrary classification. People ex rel. McKevitt v. District Court, 167 Colo. 221, 447 P.2d 205 (1968).

No constitutional right to evidentiary hearing. Failure to provide an evidentiary hearing on the validity of a prior conviction during a discretionary sentencing proceeding does not violate either amendment XIV of the U.S. Constitution or this section. People v. Padilla, 907 P.2d 601 (Colo. 1995).

Double sentencing for single transaction unjust. When the burglary and the larceny involve one transaction, typical of many burglary-larceny situations, double sentencing for the same transaction is inherently wrong and basically unjust and evades the legislative intent. These offenses should be merged by concurrent sentencing. Maynes v. People, 169 Colo. 186, 454 P.2d 797 (1969).

Section 18-1-105 (9)(a)(IV) does not violate equal protection. Sentence beyond presumptive range based in part on fact that defendant was on bond at the time he committed felony was valid. People v. Walters, 796 P.2d 13 (Colo. App. 1990).

Imposition of least drastic means of punishment is not required to provide defendant due process. People v. Davis, 794 P.2d 159 (Colo. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1018, 111 S. Ct. 662, 112 L.Ed.2d 656 (1991).

There is no constitutional right to credit for presentence confinement. Godbold v. District Court, 623 P.2d 862 (Colo. 1981).

Due process does not prohibit the sentencing authority from increasing a sentence upon retrial when conduct or events, such as a conviction, are affirmatively identified as the justification for the increased sentence and such identification rebuts any presumption of vindictive retaliation by the sentencing authority. People v. Wieghard, 742 P.2d 977 (Colo. App. 1987).

Due process generally prohibits imposition of an enhanced sentence on retrial unless such sentence is based upon objective, identifiable conduct of the defendant occurring after imposition of the original sentence. This rule is designed to avoid any vindicativeness in resentencing or retaliation predicated upon defendant's exercise of his right of appeal. People v. Walters, 802 P.2d 1155 (Colo. App. 1990).

No equal protection violation where general assembly chose to punish with the same severity all cases where kidnapping was accompanied by sexual assault, making no distinction between misdemeanor and felony sexual assault. People v. Williams, 89 P.3d 492 (Colo. App. 2003).

Indeterminate sentencing for sex offenders does not violate various constitutional rights. Indeterminate sentencing for sex offenders does not violate procedural due process. A defendant is given an opportunity to be heard at sentencing, and, since the statute does not require any further findings by a court to impose indeterminate sentencing, the defendant is not entitled to any further opportunity to be heard. People v. Oglethorpe, 87 P.3d 129 (Colo. App. 2003).

Indeterminate sentencing for sex offenders does not violate procedural due process. The opportunities in § 18-1.3-1006 (1) satisfy continuing due process requirements by providing an adequate continuing opportunity to be heard on the issue of release after a sentence has been imposed. People v. Oglethorpe, 87 P.3d 129 (Colo. App. 2003).

Substantive due process is not infringed by sex offender indeterminate sentencing. Indeterminate sentencing does implicate a fundamental right; therefore, it is subject to the rational basis test. The sentencing scheme is rationally related to the government's legitimate interest in shielding the public from untreated sex offenders and rehabilitating and treating those offenders. People v. Oglethorpe, 87 P.3d 129 (Colo. App. 2003).

Indeterminate sentencing for sex offenders does not violate equal protection. The threshold question in any equal protection challenge is whether the person allegedly subject to the disparate treatment is in fact similarly situated. In this case, the defendant is similarly situated with other offenders convicted of the same or similar crimes and subject to the same law, so there is no disparate treatment. People v. Oglethorpe, 87 P.3d 129 (Colo. App. 2003).

Consideration of victim character evidence did not render sentencing proceedings fundamentally unfair and did not violate defendant's due process rights. People v. Lassek, 122 P.3d 1029 (Colo. App. 2005).

O. Appeal.

Indigent defendants entitled to appellate review. The constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection assure a defendant the right to appellate review without invidious discrimination on account of his indigency. His right to appeal from his conviction is the same as that of a person with financial means. Haines v. People, 169 Colo. 136, 454 P.2d 595 (1969).

Constitutional harmless error review applies only if the defendant preserves a claim for review by tending a contemporaneous objection. If the defendant fails to object at trial, plain error applies. People v. Miller, 113 P.3d 743 (Colo. 2005).

P. Postconviction Treatment.

Due process clause does not subject inmate's treatment by prison authorities to judicial oversight as long as the conditions or degree of confinement to which the prisoner is subjected is within the sentence imposed and does not otherwise violate the constitution. White v. People, 866 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1994).

The constitutional protections of due process apply to disciplinary hearings imposed upon inmates when (1) the deprivation suffered by the inmate is a truly serious one of real substance and (2) relevant state policies condition the imposition of the deprivation on the occurrence of certain well-defined events or facts. Lawson v. Zavaras, 966 P.2d 581 (Colo. 1998).

However, an inmate in a disciplinary hearing enjoys only the most basic due process rights, including, at a minimum, notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing before an impartial tribunal. Because of the special characteristics of the prison environment, it is permissible for the impartiality of prison officials serving as hearing officers to be encumbered by various conflicts of interest that, in other contexts, would be adjudged of sufficient magnitude to violate due process. Washington v. Atherton, 6 P.3d 346 (Colo. App. 2000).

Inmate's due process rights not violated by hearing officer who justifiably refused to let two witnesses testify at disciplinary hearing and who allowed inmate to designate witnesses, attempted to contact inmate's witnesses, afforded inmate extensive time and leeway to testify, and continued the hearing twice to allow inmate additional time to identify a guard as a potential witness. Woolsey v. Dept. of Corr., 66 P.3d 151 (Colo. App. 2002).

When a defendant agrees to an extension of probation, the defendant does not have a due process right to be advised of or receive the right to counsel before signing the extension. People v. Hotle, 216 P.3d 68 (Colo. App. 2008).

The deprivation suffered as a result of return to prison from a work release jail environment is not of sufficient substance to create a liberty interest requiring the application of the constitutional protections of due process. Lawson v. Zavaras, 966 P.2d 581 (Colo. 1998).

Equal protection rights not violated by requiring defendant to enter sex offender treatment program before granting parole, even if participation in the program requires longer period of imprisonment than other non-sex offender inmates who have violated the conditions of their parole. White v. People, 866 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1994).

Regulations that cause sex offenders to be treated differently than other offenders are not violative of the equal protection clause. White v. People, 866 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1994).

Defendant's liberty interest not violated by requirement in § 16-8-115 (4)(a) that he register as a sex offender as a condition of his conditional release since the requirement was in place prior to his conditional release. People v. Durapau, 12 COA 67, 280 P.3d 42.

Failure to allow defendant opportunity to present evidence at hearing concerning revocation of probation did not violate due process or equal protection. People v. McCarty, 851 P.2d 181 (Colo. App. 1992).

Due process rights under the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution not denied by exclusion of hearsay evidence sought to be introduced that was not relevant in time or place to the charges against the defendant and therefore was not material to the defendant's defense. Matthews v. Price, 83 F.3d 328 (10th Cir. 1996).

Section 18-1-105 (9)(a)(III) does not violate equal protection for lack of express provisions concerning the rights to reasonable notice and to have the prosecution prove the asserted probationary status where those rights exist independently of the statute. People v. Murphy, 722 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1986); People v. Lacey, 723 P.2d 111 (Colo. 1986).

Key test in determining if due process precludes the retrospective application of a judicial decision in a criminal case is whether the judicial decision is sufficiently foreseeable to afford a defendant fair warning that the judicial interpretation given the relevant statute would be applied in defendant's case. Aue v. Diesslin, 798 P. 2d 436 (Colo. 1990); People v. Vanrees, 80 P.3d 840 (Colo. App. 2003), rev'd on other grounds, 125 P.3d 403 (Colo. 2005); People v. White, 179 P.3d 58 (Colo. App. 2007).

The fact that some inmates benefitted from parole board's erroneous interpretation that § 17-2-201 (5)(a) required mandatory rather than discretionary parole for sex offenders not sentenced under the Sex Offenders Act does not require that the board continue to misinterpret said section in order to afford equal protection to inmates who have not reached their parole date. Aue v. Diesslin, 798 P.2d 436 (Colo. 1990).

Defendant is not entitled to same type of hearing as original sentencing hearing upon revocation of probation and resentencing. People v. McCarty, 851 P.2d 181 (Colo. App. 1992), aff'd, 874 P.2d 394 (Colo. 1994).

No due process violation where district court prohibited a defendant from having unsupervised contact with her children as a condition of probation. People v. Forsythe, 43 P.3d 652 (Colo. App. 2001).

Q. Juvenile Delinquency.

Juvenile cases conducted according to due process, not criminal law. There is no constitutional requirement that proceedings in juvenile cases shall be conducted according to the criminal law, or that proceedings need take any particular form, so long as the essentials of due process and fair treatment are accorded. In re People in Interest of J.A.M., 174 Colo. 245, 483 P.2d 362 (1971).

In a delinquency proceeding the quantum of proof required by the due process and equal protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment is proof beyond a reasonable doubt and not just a preponderance of evidence; this does not justify the conclusion that a juvenile delinquency proceeding is now deemed to be a criminal proceeding. People ex rel. Rodello v. District Court, 164 Colo. 530, 436 P.2d 672 (1968).

The warnings incorporated in a Miranda advisement have been codified in the juvenile context by § 19-2-210, together with the requirement that the juvenile be accompanied by a parent, guardian, or custodian during the advisement and interrogation. People v. T.C., 898 P.2d 20 (Colo. 1995).

The remedy for a violation of the requirement of an advisement of rights under Miranda or § 19-2-210 is suppression of the statements obtained. However, that remedy only applies to statements made as a result of custodial interrogation. People v. T.C., 898 P.2d 20 (Colo. 1995).

When juvenile entitled to preliminary hearing. A juvenile who is detained is entitled to a preliminary hearing by constitutional mandate. Juveniles charged in delinquency proceedings with crimes subject to Crim. P. 5 and 7 (felonies and class 1 misdemeanors) are entitled to a preliminary hearing. Juveniles held on lesser charges are not granted a right to a preliminary hearing by statute or by rule. J.T. v. O'Rourke ex rel. Tenth Judicial Dist., 651 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1982).

If a juvenile is entitled to pretrial detention credit, it must be authorized by statute. The Colorado supreme court has expressly refused to recognize any constitutional right to presentence confinement credit against an adult sentence. People v. T.S.R., 843 P.2d 105 (Colo. App. 1992).

There is nothing unfair or shocking to the conscience either in the trial court's imposition of a two-year commitment for juvenile as provided by § 19-2-704 (3) or in its refusal to grant credit for pre-dispositional detention. People v. T.S.R., 843 P.2d 105 (Colo. App. 1992).

Standards of proof in hearings on juvenile probation violations. Minimal due process guarantees of fundamentally fair procedures require no less than proof beyond a reasonable doubt of juvenile probation violations based upon alleged acts which would constitute crimes if done by adults. People in Interest of C.B., 196 Colo. 362, 585 P.2d 281 (1978).

VII. CRIMINAL STATUTES.

No equal protection violation. Statute that sets a maximum period of incarceration for probation and a work release statute permitting a maximum period of incarceration establish general statutory probation dispositions for all defendants who are eligible for probation and do not create classifications that disparately affect the defendant. People v. Garberding, 787 P.2d 154 (Colo. 1990).

Minimum and maximum sentences. Equal protection requires that the minimum and maximum sentences imposed by the statute and not those by the judge are the same for all persons charged with the same or similar offense; the sentencing judge has discretion in the individual treatment of each defendant within those limits. People v. Garberding, 787 P.2d 154 (Colo. 1990); People v. McCarty, 851 P.2d 181 (Colo. App. 1992).

A state's ability to define the elements of criminal offenses and specify aggravating and mitigating circumstances for sentencing purposes is limited when it attempts to evade the level of proof constitutionally required to establish criminal offenses by restructuring existing crimes to make some essential elements of the crime into sentencing factors instead. A court evaluating such an attempt should consider: (1) The degree to which the existence of the fact in question determines the sentence imposed; (2) the authority given to the court to make findings that greatly affect the possible sentence without notice to the defendant or a hearing; and (3) whether it appears that the legislature altered the elements of the underlying offense at the time the sentencing provision was enacted in order to evade the constitutionally mandated burden of proof. Vega v. People, 893 P.2d 107 (Colo. 1995).

Equal protection demands that statutory classifications of crimes be premised on distinctions that are real in fact and reasonably related to the general purposes of criminal legislation. People v. Rickstrew, 775 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1989); People v. Czemerynski, 786 P.2d 1100 (Colo. 1990); People v. Suazo, 867 P.2d 161 (Colo. App. 1993).

Different provisions proscribing same conduct with disparate sanctions unconstitutional. Equal protection of the laws is violated if different statutes proscribe the same criminal conduct with disparate criminal sanctions. People v. Marcy, 628 P.2d 69 (Colo. 1981); Crespin v. People, 721 P.2d 688 (Colo. 1986); People v. Young, 758 P.2d 667 (Colo. 1988).

Different statutory provisions, proscribing with different penalties what ostensibly might be different acts, but offering no intelligent standard for distinguishing the proscribed conduct, violate equal protection. People v. Mumaugh, 644 P.2d 299 (Colo. 1982).

Equal protection of the laws under the Colorado constitution is violated when criminal statutes proscribe identical conduct but impose different criminal sanctions for that conduct. People v. Dunoyair, 660 P.2d 890 (Colo. 1983).

Subjecting a defendant to a more severe sanction for criminal conduct identical to that proscribed by another statute is a violation of equal protection. People v. Owens, 670 P.2d 1233 (Colo. 1983); People v. Weller, 679 P.2d 1077 (Colo. 1984).

Whether conviction and imposition of different penalties for resisting arrest and for second degree assault would constitute imposition of different penalties for the same criminal conduct, in violation of the equal protection clause, depends upon an inquiry into the point at which the defendant was arrested and the point at which he was "in custody". People v. Armstrong, 720 P.2d 165 (Colo. 1986).

Different provisions proscribing same conduct with disparate sanctions constitutional when one provision is a "strict liability" offense and other provision creates an offense of "mental culpability". People v. Wilhelm, 676 P.2d 702 (Colo. 1984).

The federal and state constitutional guarantees of equal protection and due process as well as guarantees against double jeopardy are not violated even though one course of conduct is proscribed by two different statutes since the legislature unmistakably intended to authorize cumulative punishment under the two statutes. People v. Haymaker, 716 P.2d 110 (Colo. 1986); People v. Powell, 716 P.2d 1096 (Colo. 1986); People v. Reger, 731 P.2d 752 (Colo. App. 1986).

A sentence imposed beyond the presumptive range for a defendant convicted of both first degree sexual assault with a deadly weapon and a crime of violence does not deny equal protection of law since it cannot be said that the sentencing statutes permit different degrees of punishment for persons in the defendant's situation. People v. Haymaker, 716 P.2d 110 (Colo. 1986).

Equal protection clause violated only where two statutes proscribe identical conduct while applying different criminal penalties, i.e., a felony and a misdemeanor. Where felony election statute and misdemeanor election statute are sufficiently distinguishable, no violation of equal protection exists. People v. Onesimo Romero, 746 P.2d 534 (Colo. 1987).

Where there is a rational basis for different sanctions in two criminal offense statutes, there is no equal protection violation. People v. Wheatley, 805 P.2d 1148 (Colo. App. 1990).

Where a reasonable difference or distinction can be drawn between conduct prohibited by two statutes, the imposition of different criminal penalties for such conduct does not violate equal protection of the laws. Leaving the scene of an accident resulting in death (a felony offense) is conduct distinguishable from failing to report an accident (a class 2 traffic offense); therefore, there is no implication of equal protection. People v. Rickstrew, 775 P.2d 570 (Colo. 1989).

Vehicular homicide and driving under influence provisions proscribe different conduct. Because the death of another is an essential element of vehicular homicide, but not of driving under the influence, the offenses proscribe dissimilar conduct, and a person prosecuted under the vehicular homicide statute is not situated similarly to a person charged with driving under the influence.

People v. Duemig, 620 P.2d 240 (Colo. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 971, 101 S. Ct. 2048, 68 L.Ed.2d 350 (1981).

Felony criminal extortion statute consists of elements distinctive from elements of misdemeanor harassment statute and there is rational basis for classifying such crimes differently. People v. Czemerynski, 786 P.2d 1100 (Colo. 1990).

General criminal attempt statute and specific attempt provision. There was no violation of equal protection in defendant's conviction under specific attempt provision of second degree assault statute, despite defendant's contention that the general criminal attempt statute, § 18-2-101, proscribes the same conduct. People v. Weller, 679 P.2d 1077 (Colo. 1984).

First degree assault and crime of violence different from second degree assault and crime of violence. To prove first degree assault and crime of violence, an additional element must be proven -- that the use of the deadly weapon actually caused the serious bodily injury. People v. Mozee, 723 P.2d 117 (Colo. 1986).

The actus reus of felony menacing is more specific than that of disorderly conduct with a deadly weapon. Therefore, the equal protection clause is not violated by subjecting defendants to potential criminal liability for both. People v. Torres, 848 P.2d 911 (Colo. 1993).

Statutory definition of extreme indifference murder violates equal protection of the laws because that crime is not sufficiently distinguishable from second-degree murder to warrant the substantial differential in penalty authorized by the statutory scheme. People v. Curtis, 627 P.2d 734 (Colo. 1981); People v. Gurule, 628 P.2d 99 (Colo. 1981).

Statutory prohibition of extreme indifference murder in § 18-3-102 (1)(d) violates equal protection of the laws because it cannot reasonably be distinguished from the lesser offense of second-degree murder as defined in § 18-3-103 (1)(a). People v. Marcy, 628 P.2d 69 (Colo. 1981); Crespin v. People, 721 P.2d 688 (Colo. 1986).

Statutory definition of extreme indifference murder in 1981 amendment is not violative of equal protection of the laws because it is sufficiently distinguishable from second degree murder to warrant difference in penalty. People v. Jefferson, 748 P.2d 1223 (Colo. 1988).

Section 18-3-206 (felony menancing) does not violate equal protection, despite the defendant's claim that the conduct proscribed by § 18-3-206, a class 5 felony, was indistinguishable from the conduct proscibed in § 18-9-106 (1)(f) (disorderly conduct with a deadly weapon), a class 2 misdemeanor, in which the actus reus is less specific than the actus reus in § 18-3-206. People v. Ibarra, 849 P.2d 33 (Colo. 1993).

It is only when the same conduct is proscribed in two statutes and different criminal sanctions apply, that problems arise under equal protection. People v. Ibarra, 849 P.2d 33 (Colo. 1993).

Classification of child abuse as more serious than negligent homicide constitutional. The legislative classification of child abuse as a crime more serious in penalty than the offense of criminally negligent homicide is neither arbitrary nor unreasonable and does not violate equal protection of the laws. People v. Taggart, 621 P.2d 1375 (Colo. 1981).

Classification of possession of marijuana concentrate as more serious than possession of marijuana is constitutional. The legislative classification of possession of marijuana concentrate as a crime more serious in penalty than possession of marijuana is based upon a reasonable legislative classification and does not deny equal protection. People v. Siwierka, 683 P.2d 356 (Colo. 1984).

The distinction between marihuana and marihuana concentrate as set forth in § 12-22-303 (17) and (18) and complies with both the equal protection and due process requirements of the Colorado and United States Constitutions. People v. Rickstrew, 712 P.2d 1008 (Colo. 1986).

Classification of possession of cocaine as more serious than possession of cocaine by "practitioners" constitutional. Felony conviction for cocaine possession constitutional despite existence of statute which punishes cocaine possession by practitioners as misdemeanor since practitioners regularly deal with controlled substances. People v. Unruh, 713 P.2d 370 (Colo. 1986), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1171, 106 S. Ct. 2894, 90 L.Ed.2d 981 (1986).

Statute prohibiting possession of controlled substances does not violate equal protection when compared with statute which punishes use of the same controlled substances less harshly, because punishing possession more harshly than use is justified to control distribution of controlled substances. People v. Cagle, 751 P.2d 614 (Colo. 1988), appeal dismissed for want of a substantial federal question, 486 U.S. 1028, 108 S. Ct. 2009, 100 L.Ed.2d 597 (1988); People v. Warren, 55 P.3d 809 (Colo. App. 2002); People v. Campbell, 58 P.3d 1080 (Colo. App. 2002), aff'd, 73 P.3d 11 (Colo. 2003).

Possession and use of a controlled substance are not identical conduct for equal protection purposes, even when the drugs possessed and used are the same. Campbell v. People, 73 P.3d 11 (Colo. 2003).

Charging a defendant with two crimes did not violate equal protection where the offenses were the unlawful use (§ 18-18-404) and the unlawful possession (§ 18-18-405) of a controlled substance; the two offenses are distinct and not identical. People v. Villapando, 984 P.2d 51 (Colo. 1999).

Similar treatment accorded prior convictions for impaired driving and driving under influence constitutional. The similarity in treatment accorded by the habitual traffic offender act to prior convictions for driving while one's ability is impaired and driving while under the influence is reasonably related to the public-safety goals of the statute and comports with equal protection of the laws. Van Gerpen v. Peterson, 620 P.2d 714 (Colo. 1980).

Driver licenses' provisions do not create statutory classification of alcoholics and problem drinkers with respect to traffic offenses. Heninger v. Charnes, 200 Colo. 194, 613 P.2d 884 (1980).

Section 18-3-405.5 eliminating consent defense in cases of sexual penetration by means other than therapeutic deception does not expose psychotherapist to unequal protection of laws since consent defense does not apply in therapeutic deception cases either. Other provisions of criminal code make specific reference to sexual penetration by means of therapeutic deception unnecessary in § 18-3-405.5. Ferguson v. People, 824 P.2d 803 (Colo. 1992).

Statute making sexual contact between patient and psychotherapist illegal even if patient consents does not violate this section. Ferguson v. People, 824 P.2d 803 (Colo. 1992).

Mitigating factors established under § 16-11-103 (5) not unconstitutionally vague. Mitigators meet the certainty and clarity requirements of due process and provide the jury with sufficiently precise guidelines to determine whether or not to impose the death penalty. People v. Davis, 794 P.2d 159 (Colo.

1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1018, 111 S. Ct. 662, 112 L.Ed.2d 656 (1991).

Death penalty statute provision under § 16-11-103 (2)(b)(III) held to deprive defendants of due process of law when such statute required jury to return sentence of death for conviction of first degree murder if mitigating and aggravating factors are in equipose without the requirement that the jury make a separate deliberation to determine whether death is the appropriate penalty beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Young, 814 P.2d 834 (Colo. 1991) (decided under law in effect prior to 1991 repeal and reenactment of § 16-11-103).

The capital sentencing scheme under § 16-11-103 which affords discretion to the prosecutor, who determines against whom to seek a death sentence, to the jury, which determines who is to receive a sentence of death, and to the governor, who determines who shall be granted clemency, does not deny a defendant due process. People v. Davis, 794 P.2d 159 (Colo. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1018, 111 S. Ct. 662, 112 L.Ed.2d 656 (1991).

Section 16-5-402 does not violate equal protection of the laws as persons convicted of class 1 felonies are not similarly situated with those convicted of other felonies and the distinction made between these groups is reasonable and bears a rational relationship to the state's legitimate interest in preserving the finality of criminal convictions. People v. Wiedemer, 852 P.2d 424 (Colo. 1993).

Section 16-5-402 violates due process of law under amendment XIV of the U.S. Constitution and this section because it precludes collateral challenges to prior convictions solely on the basis of a time bar, without providing the defendant an opportunity to show that the failure to assert a timely constitutional challenge resulted from circumstances amounting to justifiable excuse or excusable neglect. People v. Dugger, 673 P.2d 351 (Colo. 1983); People v. Germany, 674 P.2d 345 (Colo. 1983) (decided under prior law).

Time limitations of § 16-5-402, with the exceptions contained in subsection (2) of that section, on their face are consistent with due process of law. People v. Wiedemer, 852 P.2d 424 (Colo. 1993); People v. Wiedemer, 852 P.2d 449 (Colo. 1993).

The justifiable excuse or excusable neglect exceptions to the bar of the time limits in § 16-5-402 (2)(d) give the court a sufficient means to ensure the statute is applied pursuant with due process. People v. Wiedemer, 852 P.2d 424 (Colo. 1993); People v. Wiedemer, 852 P.2d 449 (Colo. 1993).

Section 13-90-101 does not deprive the defendant of due process of law under amendment XIV to the United States Constitution and this section, in that it precludes the exercise of any judicial discretion in admitting prior felony convictions for purposes of impeachment. People v. Meyers, 617 P.2d 808 (Colo. 1980).

Prescription of inflexible sentence for habitual criminals does not deny equal protection. In prescribing a specific inflexible sentence of life imprisonment for persons found to be habitual criminals on the basis of three prior felony convictions, while allowing various degrees of flexibility in sentencing other offenders, the general assembly has not denied such habitual criminals the equal protection of the laws. People v. Gutierrez, 622 P.2d 547 (Colo. 1981); People v. Hernandez, 686 P.2d 1325 (Colo. 1984).

Due process limits resentencing only on two conditions: (1) The subsequent sentence is more severe than the prior sentence; and (2) there is a realistic likelihood that the harsher sentence was motivated by vindictiveness against the offender for successfully appealing or collaterally attacking the prior conviction. People v. Woellhaf, 199 P.3d 27 (Colo. App. 2007).

Under a due process analysis, where the aggregate period of incarceration on resentencing is no greater than the original aggregate sentence, there is no presumption of vindictiveness. Although the trial court doubled the length of the original sentence for a single count on resentencing, the aggregate sentence for all counts was lower and, thus, did not violate due process. People v. Woellhaf, 199 P.3d 27 (Colo. App. 2007).

Reformation from alcoholism cannot exempt prior conviction from habitual offender provisions. Reformation from alcoholism, commendable though it may be, is not a constitutionally significant fact that serves to exempt prior convictions from the operation of the habitual traffic offender law. Heninger v. Charnes, 200 Colo. 194, 613 P.2d 884 (1980).

Sections 16-8-103.6, 16-8-106, and 16-8-107 are not void for vagueness. People v. Bondurant, 2012 COA 50, __ P.3d __.

VIII. NONCRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS.

Constitutional protections afforded criminal defendants not necessary in administrative proceeding. The constitutional protections afforded criminal defendants need not be provided to licenses in an administrative proceeding to revoke a driver's license. People v. McKnight, 200 Colo. 486, 617 P.2d 1178 (1980).

But due process requires that defendant be given separate samples of breath for purposes of determining blood alcohol content. Garcia v. District Court, 197 Colo. 38, 589 P.2d 924 (1979).

And hearing officer, in proceeding concerning revocation of driver's license, cannot refuse to accept into evidence the result of an independently tested breath test sample. Mameda v. Colo. Dept. of Rev., 698 P.2d 277 (Colo. App. 1985).

Due process may require similar procedural safeguards in criminal and mental health proceedings. The deprivation of liberty that may be the consequence of a mental health commitment proceedings is similar to the deprivation of liberty in criminal proceedings; constitutional due process may therefore require the imposition of similar procedural safeguards for the individual. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

But privilege against self-incrimination not extended to commitment proceedings. Due process does not require that the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination be extended to Colorado's civil commitment proceedings. People v. Taylor, 618 P.2d 1127 (Colo. 1980).

Due process does not require clear and convincing evidence to support the award of custody to a non-parent with standing to seek custody of a child, but, rather, a showing by a preponderance of the evidence that it is in the best interests of the child. In re Custody of A.D.C., 969 P.2d 708 (Colo. App. 1998).

Findings of fact made by probate court to determine parenting time in guardianship proceeding under the preponderance of the evidence standard do not violate parent's due process rights. The preponderance standard is constitutional even though an adverse finding may be the basis for a subsequent termination of the parent-child relationship. People ex rel. A.R.D., 43 P.3d 632 (Colo. App. 2001).

Due process does not require a showing of unfitness before custody may be awarded to a non-parent. In re Custody of A.D.C., 969 P.2d 708 (Colo. App. 1998).

Exemption from an award of costs for governmental entities in C.R.C.P. 54(d) does not violate due process of law. The classification between governmental and non-governmental entities is rationally related to the goal of protecting the public treasury. County of Broomfield v. Farmers Reservoir, 239 P.3d 1270 (Colo. 2010).

Section 26. Slavery prohibited. There shall never be in this state either slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

Source: Entire article added, effective August 1, 1876, see L. 1877, p. 32.

ANNOTATION

This section was intended primarily to echo language of amendment 13, U.S. Const., and to ensure that the practice of African slavery as it existed in portions of this country until the middle of the last century would never find root in Colorado. In re Franks, 189 Colo. 499, 542 P.2d 845 (1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1043, 96 S. Ct. 766, 46 L. Ed. 2d 632 (1976).

State is not foreclosed from requiring that patient perform certain chores without compensation if they are reasonably related to a therapeutic program, even though the state may incidentally receive financial benefits from the performance of such work, and such requirement does not violate the constitutional prohibition against involuntary servitude. In re Estate of Buzzelle v. Colo. State Hosp., 176 Colo. 554, 491 P.2d 1369 (1971).

Attorney fees in divorce settlement does not constitute it involuntary servitude. The assertion in a divorce that one may be forced to work for the benefit of the other spouse's attorney, despite the fact that the burdened party is without "fault", cannot be equated with slavery or involuntary servitude within the meaning of this section. In re Franks, 189 Colo. 499, 542 P.2d 845 (1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1043, 96 S. Ct. 766, 46 L. Ed. 2d 632 (1976).

The prohibition against involuntary servitude does not prevent a court from ordering a former court reporter to complete transcripts. People v. McGlotten, 134 P.3d 487 (Colo. App. 2005).

Section 27. Property rights of aliens. Aliens, who are or may hereafter become bona fide residents of this state, may acquire, inherit, possess, enjoy and dispose of property, real and personal, as native born citizens.

Rights of aliens may not be abridged. The rights guaranteed by this section cannot be taken away, but other rights may be given to the same or to other persons. The general assembly may go further in the conferring of these rights upon aliens, but they cannot do less than that which the constitution requires. McConville v. Howell, 17 F. 104 (D. Colo. 1883).

Applied in McConville v. Howell, 17 F. 104 (D. Colo. 1883); Billings v. Aspen Mining & Smelting Co., 51 F. 338 (8th Cir. 1892); People v. Blue, 190 Colo. 95, 544 P.2d 385 (1975).

Section 28. Rights reserved not disparaged. The enumeration in this constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny, impair or disparage others retained by the people.

ANNOTATION

Individual liberty and rights are inherent, and such unenumerated rights are not derived from the constitution, but belong to the individual by natural endowment. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

Every one of the people of the United States owns a residue of individual rights and liberties which have never been, and which are never to be surrendered to the state, but which are still to be recognized, protected and secured from infringement or diminution by any person as well as any department of government. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

Government derives from surrender of individual rights. Government exists through the surrender by the individual of a portion of his naturally endowed and inherent rights. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

As sovereignty resides in individuals. The individual, and not the state, is the source and basis of our social compact and that sovereignty now resides and has always resided in the individual. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

Neither property rights nor contract rights are absolute, for government cannot exist if the citizen may at will use his property to the detriment of his fellows, or exercise his freedom of contract to work them harm. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

Public may regulate property under police power. Equally fundamental with the private property or contract right is that of the public to regulate property in the common interest and constitutionally - protected rights in property are subject to regulation by a proper exercise of the police power of the state. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

But there are certain "essential attributes of property" which cannot be unreasonably infringed upon by legislative action. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

And statutes unrelated to public welfare are void. If a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, morals, safety, or common welfare has no real or substantial relation to these objects, and for that reason is a clear invasion of the constitutional freedom of the people to use, enjoy or dispose of their property without unreasonable governmental interference, the courts will declare it void. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

Judiciary to provide remedy for violation of right not provided for by legislature. It is the responsibility of the judiciary to fashion a remedy for the violation of an "inalienable" right in the event that no remedy has been provided by legislative enactment. An inherent human right will be upheld by the supreme court against action by any person or department of government which would destroy such a right, such as the right to fair housing, or result in discrimination in the manner in which enjoyment thereof is to be permitted as between persons of different races, creeds, or color. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).

Right to comment on courts and judges. The growth of constitutional liberty has abolished arbitrary power of courts to inflict punishment and penalties upon persons commenting upon courts and judges or upon the character thereof, through contempt proceedings, and the right to make any such comment upon courts and judges in any respect, and as fully and freely as may be desired, is a right of every person, and is a right reserved to the people without any express reservation, as provided in this section. People ex rel. Attorney Gen. v. News-Times Publishing Co., 35 Colo. 253, 84 P. 912 (1906), appeal dismissed, 205 U.S. 454, 27 S. Ct. 556, 51 L. Ed. 879 (1907).

Right to acquire home and necessities free of discrimination. As an unenumerated inalienable right a man has the right to acquire one of the necessities of life, a home for himself and those dependent upon him, unfettered by discrimination against him on account of his race, creed or color. For a differentiation based on gender to be reasonable, it must serve an important government objective and be substantially related to that objective. In re Estate of Musso, 932 P.2d 853 (Colo. App. 1997).

Common law rebuttable presumption that husband owns all household goods violates this section. To the extent that the presumption differentiates between men and women exclusively on the basis of gender, it is impermissible. In re Estate of Musso, 932 P.2d 853 (Colo. App. 1997).

Separateness of spouses is clearly established by this provision and by the married women act, § 14-2-201 et seq. Commercial Union Ins. Co. v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 546 F. Supp. 543 (D. Colo. 1982).

Court's construction of uniform parentage act violated equal protection. The juvenile court's construction of the uniform parentage act, denying a natural father not married to the natural mother statutory capacity or standing to commence a paternity action in connection with a child born to the natural mother during her marriage to another in order to establish that he was the natural father of the child, violated equal protection of the laws under the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution, § 25 of this article, and this section. R. McG. v. J.W., 200 Colo. 345, 615 P.2d 666 (1980).

Court not required to order child support from mother. It is not always violative of this section for a trial court to refuse to order a mother to work so that she might be required to contribute to the support of her child on a parity with a father who has legal and physical custody of the child. In re Trask, 40 Colo. App. 556, 580 P.2d 825 (1978).

Insurance policy provision excluding disability coverage for normal pregnancies where policy was provided by employer as part of total compensation package constitutes discrimination on the basis of sex. Civil Rights Comm'n v. Travelers Ins., 759 P.2d 1358 (Colo. 1988) (decided prior to enactment of §§ 10-8-122.2, 10-16-114.6, and 10-17-131.6).

Retrospective operation not intended. There is no language in the equal rights amendment from which an intention appears to make the amendment retrospective in its operation. People v. Elliott, 186 Colo. 65, 525 P.2d 457 (1974).

Although this section does not apply retroactively, a presumption in violation of this section that was recognized in Colorado as early as 1871 does not survive. All relevant factual issues in the case occurred well after the passage of this section and thus there is no improper retroactive effect. In re Estate of Musso, 932 P.2d 853 (Colo. App. 1997).

There was no violation of the right guaranteed by this section due to the murder of a woman by her husband in a county justice center. Duong v. Arapahoe County Comm'rs, 837 P.2d 226 (Colo. App. 1992).

Section 30. Right to vote or petition on annexation - enclaves. (1) No unincorporated area may be annexed to a municipality unless one of the following conditions first has been met:

(a) The question of annexation has been submitted to the vote of the landowners and the registered electors in the area proposed to be annexed, and the majority of such persons voting on the question have voted for the annexation; or

(b) The annexing municipality has received a petition for the annexation of such area signed by persons comprising more than fifty percent of the landowners in the area and owning more than fifty percent of the area, excluding public streets, and alleys and any land owned by the annexing municipality; or

(c) The area is entirely surrounded by or is solely owned by the annexing municipality.

(2) The provisions of this section shall not apply to annexations to the city and county of Denver, to the extent that such annexations are governed by other provisions of the constitution.

(3) The general assembly may provide by law for procedures necessary to implement this section. This section shall take effect upon completion of the canvass of votes taken thereon.

Exclusion clause in subsection (1)(b) applies to both the requirement that a petition with the appropriate number of signatures be signed by persons comprising more than 50% of the landowners in the area and to the requirement that a petition with the appropriate number of signatures be signed by persons owning more than 50% of the area. Here, there is no reason to exclude public streets from the calculation of the size of the area, but then to include public streets when determining the percentage of landowners whose signatures are required. The repetition of the word "area" in connection with both the area requirement and the number requirement reveals an intent to apply the exclusion clause to both requirements. Accordingly, the district court correctly determined that the owners of roads located within the area to be annexed did not need to sign the petition for annexation. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. City of Aurora, 62 P.3d 1049 (Colo. App. 2002).

Applied in Slack v. City of Colo. Springs, 655 P.2d 376 (Colo. 1982).

This section is self executing; however, the General Assembly may enact laws to implement this section.

Section 30b. No Protected Status Based on Homosexual, Lesbian or Bisexual Orientation. Neither the State of Colorado, through any of its branches or departments, nor any of its agencies, political subdivisions, municipalities or school districts, shall enact, adopt or enforce any statute, regulation, ordinance or policy whereby homosexual, lesbian or bisexual orientation, conduct, practices or relationships shall constitute or otherwise be the basis of or entitle any person or class of persons to have or claim any minority status, quota preferences, protected status or claim of discrimination.

This Section of the Constitution shall be in all respects self-executing.

The right to participate equally in the political process is affected by this section because it bars gay men, lesbians, and bisexuals from having an effective voice in governmental affairs insofar as those persons deem it beneficial to seek legislation that would protect them from discrimination based on their sexual orientation; it alters the political process so that a targeted class is prohibited from obtaining legislative, executive, and judicial protection or redress from discrimination absent the consent of a majority of the electorate through the adoption of a constitutional amendment. Evans v. Romer, 854 P.2d 1270 (Colo. 1993).

In upholding preliminary injunction entered by trial court enjoining state officials from enforcing voter-initiated amendment to constitution, court determined that such amendment must be subject to strict judicial scrutiny in determining whether it is constitutionally valid under the equal protection clause. This section is not necessary to serve any compelling governmental interest in a narrowly tailored way. It is not narrowly tailored to serve the compelling governmental interest of ensuring the free exercise of religion or preserving associational privacy, nor are the preservation of fiscal resources, the promotion of public social and moral norms, the prevention of governmental support of political objectives of a special interest group, or the deterrence of factionalism compelling governmental interests served by this section. ARTICLE III
Distribution of Powers

The powers of the government of this state are divided into three distinct departments,--the legislative, executive and judicial; and no person or collection of persons charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except as in this constitution expressly directed or permitted.

Object of article. The plain object of this article is to inhibit one department of government exercising any power that by the constitution is vested in another. The constitution defines the powers and duties of each department, and should one department venture to substitute its judgment for that of the other in any case where the constitution has vested power over the subject, it would enter upon a field where it is impossible to set limits to authority, and where discretion alone would measure the extent of the interference. Van Kleeck v. Ramer, 62 Colo. 4, 156 P. 1108 (1916); Watrous v. Golden Chamber of Commerce, 121 Colo. 521, 218 P.2d 498 (1950); People v. Davis, 186 Colo. 186, 526 P.2d 312 (1974).

The concept of separation of powers requires that the coequal branches of government, the executive, legislative, and judicial, exercise only their own powers and not usurp the powers of another coequal branch of government. People v. Hollis, 670 P.2d 441 (Colo. App. 1983).

Departments derive authority from constitution. By the constitution of the state the government is divided into three coordinate branches -- legislative, executive, and judicial. The constitution is the paramount law. Each department derives its authority from that source. Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. District Court, 138 Colo. 227, 331 P.2d 502 (1958).

Final authority to construe the constitution and the laws of the state lies with the judiciary. Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Indus. Comm'n, 650 P.2d 1297 (Colo. App. 1982).

But separation of powers not guaranteed by federal constitution. It is true that the doctrine of the separation of powers is extremely important and fundamental to both the federal and state governments, but the doctrine is not guaranteed to the states by § 4, art. IV, U.S. Const. In re Interrogatories Propounded by Senate Concerning House Bill 1078, 189 Colo. 1, 536 P.2d 308 (1975).

Concept of republican form of government does not embody within it doctrine of separation of powers. In re Interrogatories Propounded by Senate Concerning House Bill 1078, 189 Colo. 1, 536 P.2d 308 (1975).

Premise of tripartite system of government is an independent and separate legislative, executive, and judicial division of government. People v. Davis, 186 Colo. 186, 526 P.2d 312 (1974).

System of checks and balances. It is an ingrained principle in government that the three departments of government are coordinate and shall cooperate with and complement, while acting as checks and balances against, one another but shall not interfere with or encroach on the authority or within the province of the other. Smith v. Miller, 153 Colo. 35, 384 P.2d 738 (1963).

And department stands on equal plane. All departments of government stand on an equal plane, and are of equal constitutional dignity. The constitution defines the duties of each. Neither can call the others directly to account for actions within their province. In re Senate Resolution No. 4, 54 Colo. 262, 130 P. 333 (1913); Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. District Court, 138 Colo. 227, 331 P.2d 502 (1958).

With exclusive powers and functions. The legislative and executive departments have their functions and their exclusive powers, including the "purse" and the "sword". The judiciary has its exclusive powers and functions, to-wit: It has judgment and the power to enforce its judgments and orders. Smith v. Miller, 153 Colo. 35, 384 P.2d 738 (1963).

Each superior in its respective sphere. The departments are distinct from each other, and, so far as any direct control or interference is concerned, are independent of each other. More, they are superior in their respective spheres. Greenwood Cem.

Land Co. v. Routt, 17 Colo. 156, 28 P. 1125 (1892); City & County of Denver v. Lynch, 92 Colo. 102, 18 P.2d 907, 86 A.L.R. 907 (1932); Smith v. Miller, 153 Colo. 35, 384 P.2d 738 (1963).

The power of each department is limited and defined. Each is clothed with specific powers. The result of this distribution of power is that no department is superior to the other, and each acting within its proper sphere is supreme. One cannot directly interfere with the other in the performance of functions delegated by the constitution. Colo. State Bd. of Med. Exam'rs v. District Court, 138 Colo. 227, 331 P.2d 502 (1958).

Each to perform its duties but to refrain from asserting power belonging to another department. It is incumbent upon each department to assert and exercise all its powers whenever public necessity requires it to do so; otherwise, it is recreant to the trust reposed in it by the people. It is equally incumbent upon it to refrain from asserting a power that does not belong to it, for this is equally a violation of the people's confidence. Indeed, the distinction goes so far as to require each department to refrain from in any way impeding the exercise of the proper functions belonging to either of the other departments. City & County of Denver v. Lynch, 92 Colo. 102, 18 P.2d 907 (1932); Smith v. Miller, 153 Colo. 35, 384 P.2d 738 (1963).

In our scheme of government, the responsibilites thereof are presumably equally divided, and each department must perform its own tasks, and accept the responsibilities therefor. Kolkman v. People, 89 Colo. 8, 300 P. 575 (1931).

The power of the legislature is plenary with respect to appropriations, subject only to constitutional limitations. Colo. Gen. Assembly v. Lamm, 704 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1985).

General assembly has power to enact legislation by majority vote, and to require that it summon a two-thirds majority to override an invalid veto would upset the delicate constitutional balance between the executive and legislative branches. Colo. Gen. Assembly v. Lamm, 704 P.2d 1371 (Colo. 1985).

With respect to sentencing, the general assembly has the inherent power to prescribe punishment for crimes and to limit the court's sentencing authority. The imposition of a sentence is a judicial function. Once a sentence is imposed, the executive branch is responsible for carrying out the court's mandate. People v. Barth, 981 P.2d 1102 (Colo. App. 1999); People v. Oglethorpe, 87 P.3d 129 (Colo. App. 2003).

Separation of powers not violated where court was simply interpreting the provisions of an act, determining the requirements of the act, and directing the executive agency defendant to spend moneys appropriated by the legislature in accordance with those requirements. Goebel v. Colo. Dept. of Institutions, 764 P.2d 785 (Colo. 1988).

Separation of powers not violated by juvenile deferred sentencing statute requiring prosecutor's consent prior to entry of deferral order. Such a requirement is analogous to the authority of the prosecution to enter into plea bargains and does not impermissibly interfere with the judiciary's sentencing authority. People in Interest of R.W.V., 942 P.2d 1317 (Colo. App. 1997).

Separation of powers not violated where the general assembly has enacted a statutory scheme that requires the sentencing court to impose a particular term of mandatory parole and the parole board adds a period of parole not included in the sentence imposed by the sentencing court. People v. Barth, 981 P.2d 1102 (Colo. App. 1999).

Section 17-27.5-104 does not violate the separation of powers and nondelegation doctrines. The statute provides sufficient statutory standards and safeguards. People v. Sa'ra, 117 P.3d 51 (Colo. App. 2004).

The direct file statute does not violate separation of powers. Prosecutorial discretion balanced by the district court's sentencing discretion is not unconstitutional. Flakes v. People, 153 P.3d 427 (Colo. 2007).

No violation of separation of powers existed where secretary of state's assessment of 1% of all gross revenues for games of chance suppliers and manufacturers constituted a fee and not an illegal tax under this article. Bingo Games Supply Co., Inc. v. Meyer, 895 P.2d 1125 (Colo. App. 1995).

Section 16-8-107 (3)(b) does not violate the separation of powers doctrine. The statute is mixed in nature between substantive law and procedural rules. People v. Bondurant, 2012 COA 50, __ P.3d __.

Although affecting the procedure of the courts, § 16-8-107 (3)(b) also concerns the public policy of full disclosure in criminal cases involving a defense based on a defendant's mental condition. People v. Bondurant, 2012 COA 50, __ P.3d __.

Section 16-8-107 (3)(b) does not conflict with Crim. P. 11(e) or 16, part II, in violation of the separation of powers doctrine. People v. Bondurant, 2012 COA 50, __ P.3d __.

Unless under constitutional compulsion by people. The separation of powers concept is extremely important and fundamental to a free system of government. The supreme court is unalterably opposed to any attempt by one branch of the government to assume the power of another. But when the people speak through the amendment of their constitution and assign one branch or the other some duties which are not normally considered to be that of the branch assigned, then because of its devotion to the republican scheme of government, the supreme court is compelled to accept their decision. In re Interrogatories Propounded by Senate Concerning House Bill 1078, 189 Colo. 1, 536 P.2d 308 (1975).

And any exception to distribution of powers must appear in express terms in the constitution; implied exceptions are not sanctioned. Denver Bar Ass'n v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 154 Colo. 273, 391 P.2d 467, 13 A.L.R. 3d 799 (1964).

To determine what is constitutional is not committed exclusively to judicial department; the views of officials of coordinate branches of the government are entitled to consideration. Hudson v. Annear, 101 Colo. 551, 75 P.2d 587 (1938).

And this article applies not less to judicial department than to other departments. Hudson v. Annear, 101 Colo. 551, 75 P.2d 587 (1938).

Doctrine of separation of powers applies with equal force to all three branches of government. People v. Herrera, 183 Colo. 155, 516 P.2d 626 (1973).

Delineation of powers on case-by-case basis. Delineation of the powers of the legislative, judicial, and executive branches usually should be on a case-by-case basis. MacManus v. Love, 179 Colo. 218, 499 P.2d 609 (1972); C.C.C. v. District Court, 188 Colo. 437, 535 P.2d 1117 (1975).

This provision relates to state government and is not to be applied in matters of purely local concern such as the matters pertaining to license of a business within a city and county. Peterson v. McNichols, 128 Colo. 137, 260 P.2d 938 (1953).

Classification includes all public officers of the state. This article divides the powers of the state government into three distinct departments, the legislative, executive and judicial. This classification includes all public officers of the state, without regard to their rank or duties. And as the officers composing the legislative and judicial departments are well understood not to include the warden of the penitentiary, or of the reformatory, the commissioner of mines, or of insurance and the like, these must of necessity be classed as executive officers, unless some other provision of the constitution changes or modifies the effect of the language of this article. Parks v. Comm'rs of Soldiers' & Sailors' Home, 22 Colo. 86, 43 P. 542 (1896).

Parole revocation reincarceration is not a new sentence. Since the sentencing power of the judiciary is not implicated, there is no separation of powers violation. People v. Barber, 74 P.3d 444 (Colo. App. 2003).

Applied in Gillette v. Peabody, 19 Colo. App. 356, 75 P. 18 (1904); People ex rel. Attorney Gen. v. News-Times Publ'g Co., 35 Colo. 253, 84 P. 912 (1906); People ex rel. Smith v. II. LEGISLATIVE POWERS.

Constitution is limitation on plenary power of general assembly. The constitution is not a grant of power to the general assembly, but the general assembly is invested with plenary power for all the purposes of civil government, and the constitution is but a limitation upon that power. People ex rel. Rhodes v. Fleming, 10 Colo. 553, 16 P. 298 (1887); Colo. State Civil Serv. Employees Ass'n v. Love, 167 Colo. 436, 448 P.2d 624 (1968).

General assembly determines its constitutional duties. The judicial cannot say to the legislative department that it has, or has not, performed its constitutional duties.

That the legislative department must determine for itself, independent of either of the other departments of government, by passing such legislation as, in its judgment, the constitution requires. In re Senate Resolution No. 4, 54 Colo. 262, 130 P. 333 (1913).

And general assembly is free to choose any method which is appropriate to reach a proper governmental end. Pillar of Fire v. Denver Urban Renewal Auth., 181 Colo. 411, 509 P.2d 1250 (1973).

Legislative power is authority to make laws and to appropriate state funds. MacManus v. Love, 179 Colo. 218, 499 P.2d 609 (1972).

And sovereign power may not be delegated to private citizen to be used for a private purpose, especially where there is no state supervision. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

Taxation is indisputably legislative prerogative. Gates Rubber Co. v. South Sub. Metro. Recreation & Park Dist., 183 Colo. 222, 516 P.2d 436 (1973).

If a change in the state sales and use tax law is desired, it must be accomplished by the general assembly, for neither the director of revenue nor the supreme court is empowered with taxing authority. Weed v. Occhiato, 175 Colo. 509, 488 P.2d 877 (1971).

Only the general assembly has the power to amend laws and enact taxing statutes. Miller Int'l, Inc. v. State Dept. of Rev., 646 P.2d 341 (Colo. 1982).

But legislative limitation on use of executive funds violative of separation of powers. The governor's veto of footnote 5 of section 2 of the 1971 senate appropriation bill no. 436, which read "5/ Group Health Insurance - These funds shall not be allocated to individual agencies. The Controller shall make payments directly to the insurance carriers on a quarterly or less frequent basis", was proper in that the footnote constituted substantive legislation contrary to § 32 of art. V, Colo. Const., and further constituted an invasion of the separation of powers required by this article. The provision was thus void and unenforceable. MacManus v. Love, C.A. no. C-24520 (D.C. Denver, Colo., filed Nov. 24, 1971).

As is limitation in conflict with state personnel system. The governor's veto of footnote 21a of section 2 of the 1971 senate appropriation bill no. 436, which read "21a/ These moneys are to be used only for contract services and no single recipient is to receive more than $5,000", was proper inasmuch as the provisions of the footnote invaded the separation of powers required by this article in that it attempted to control the salaries of the staff of the council on arts and humanities contrary to the provisions of existing law in which salaries of persons within the classified personnel system of the state depend upon their grade as determined by the state personnel board. The footnote is thus void and unenforceable. MacManus v. Love, C.A. no. C-24520 (D.C. Denver, Colo., filed Nov. 24, 1971).

And federal contributions are not subject of appropriative power of legislature. MacManus v. Love, 179 Colo. 218, 499 P.2d 609 (1972).

A portion of a bill providing that any federal or cash funds received by any agency in excess of the appropriation shall not be expended without additional legislative appropriation violates the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers by attempting to limit the executive branch in its administration of federal funds to be received by it directly from agencies of the federal government and unconnected with any state appropriations. MacManus v. Love,

179 Colo. 218, 499 P.2d 609 (1972).

The governor's veto of the second sentence of footnote 24 of section 2 of the 1971 senate appropriation bill no. 436, which read "Prior to the establishment of additional Community Mental Health Centers the state authority shall submit to the Joint Budget Committee, for approval, any federal applications which shall require either state matching or state replacement of federal funds", was proper inasmuch as the sentence contained substantive legislation and constituted a violation of the separation of powers required by this article. The sentence was thus void and unenforceable. MacManus v. Love, C.A. no. C-24520 (D.C. Denver, Colo., filed Nov. 24, 1971).

Long bill headnotes violate the separation of powers. Headnotes defining full-time equivalent; health, life, and dental; personal services; short-term disability; lease purchase; leased space; legal services; operating expenses; vehicle lease payments; multiuse network payments; utilities; capital outlay; and purchase of services from computer center violate the separation of powers by intruding on the authority of the executive branch to administer the laws. Colo. Gen. Assembly v. Owens, 136 P.3d 262 (Colo. 2006).

Determination of legislative facts nonreviewable. During the process of the enactment of a law the general assembly is required to pass upon all questions of necessity and expediency connected therewith. The existence of such necessity is a question of fact, which the general assembly in the exercise of its legislative functions must determine; under this article that fact cannot be reviewed, called in question, nor determined by the courts. It is a question of which the general assembly alone is the judge, and, when it determines the fact to exist, its action is final. Van Kleeck v. Ramer, 62 Colo. 4, 156 P. 1108 (1916).

But legislative fact-finding delegable. The power to make a law may not be delegated, but the power to determine a state of facts upon which a law depends may be delegated. Casey v. People, 139 Colo. 89, 336 P.2d 308 (1959); Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962); People v. Lepik, 629 P.2d 1080 (Colo. 1981); People v. Gallegos, 644 P.2d 920 (Colo. 1982).

A legislative body may not delegate the power to make a law or define a law, but it may delegate the power to determine some fact or state of things to effectuate the purpose of the law. People ex rel. Dunbar v. Giordano, 173 Colo. 567, 481 P.2d 415 (1971); People v. Willson, 187 Colo. 141, 528 P.2d 1315 (1974).

Power to make law vs. authority to execute. The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law; the first cannot be done, but to the latter no valid objection can be made. People ex rel. Dunbar v. Giordano, 173 Colo. 567, 481 P.2d 415 (1971); Dixon v. Zick, 179 Colo. 278, 500 P.2d 130 (1972).

Delegation of power must provide standard. Any delegation of power by the general assembly, to be valid, must provide a primary standard or general rule to be followed in discharging the delegated power. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

The general assembly may not vest executive officers or bodies with uncontrolled discretion in making rules and regulations and must establish sufficient standards for their guidance. Casey v. People, 139 Colo. 89, 336 P.2d 308 (1959).

Indefiniteness which leaves to officer, court, or jury the determination of standards in a case-by-case process invalidates legislation as being violative of due process, as contravening the mandate that an accused be advised of the nature and cause of the accusation, and as constituting an unlawful delegation of legislative power to courts or enforcement agencies. Dominquez v. City & County of Denver, 147 Colo. 233, 363 P.2d 661 (1961).

The general assembly must prescribe sufficient standards by which the power delegated is to be exercised; otherwise, the delegation of power is invalid as being violative of the separation of powers doctrine. People v. Lepik, 629 P.2d 1080 (Colo. 1981).

Due process of law requires that the general assembly provide sufficiently precise standards to guide a judge and jury in deciding whether a crime has been committed. Failure to do so may well constitute an unlawful delegation of legislative power. People v. Smith, 638 P.2d 1 (Colo. 1981).

When delegation of power sufficiently detailed. The general assembly does not abdicate its function of making a law by establishing a definite plan or framework for the law's operation when it describes what job must be done, who must do it, and the scope of his authority. People ex rel. Dunbar v. Giordano, 173 Colo. 567, 481 P.2d 415 (1971).

Necessity fixes a point beyond which it is unreasonable and impracticable to compel the general assembly to prescribe detailed rules for the purpose of avoiding an unconstitutional delegation of authority. Colo. Polytechnic Coll. v. State Bd. for Cmty. Colls., 173 Colo. 39, 476 P.2d 38 (1970).

Prosecutorial discretion not unlawful delegation. When a single transaction may violate more than one statutory provision, and perpetrate separate offenses, the fact that a prosecutor has the discretion to prosecute under one or both of two distinct offenses which arise from the single transaction does not constitute an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority. People v. McKenzie, 169 Colo. 521, 458 P.2d 232 (1969).

To allow the exercise of prosecutorial discretion to be subject to judicial oversight would erode the doctrine of the separation of powers. People v. District Court, 632 P.2d 1022 (Colo. 1981).

Criminal prosecutors may exercise uniquely broad discretion in charging offenders, and this broad discretion does not exceed the permissible delegated power of the executive. People v. Gallegos, 644 P.2d 920 (Colo. 1982).

General assembly has plenary power over school districts. The general assembly has plenary powers to determine the number, nature and powers of school districts and their territory; further, that the general assembly may modify or withdraw all such powers as it pleases. Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Sch. Planning Comm., 164 Colo. 541, 437 P.2d 787 (1968).

Only general assembly may declare act to be a crime. That precious power cannot be delegated to others not elected by or responsible to the people. Casey v. People, 139 Colo. 89, 336 P.2d 308 (1959).

It is fundamental that the general assembly has the inherent authority to define crimes and to prescribe punishment for criminal violations. People v. Arellano, 185 Colo. 280, 524 P.2d 305 (1974); People v. Lepik, 629 P.2d 1080 (Colo. 1981).

Although the general assembly may not delegate to an administrative agency the power to define criminal conduct, it may authorize the agency to adopt rules carrying criminal sanctions as long as the statutory scheme provides sufficient standards and safeguards to protect against the unreasonable exercise of discretionary power and offers adequate notice of the penalties applicable to a violator. People v. Lowrie, 761 P. 2d 778 (Colo. 1988).

And power not delegable. The general assembly cannot constitutionally delegate the power to define crimes to any branch of another state's government, to the federal congress, or to another branch of the state government. People v. Tenorio, 197 Colo. 137, 590 P.2d 952 (1979).

Although the modern tendency may often permit liberal grants of discretion to administrative bodies, the power delegated cannot be expanded to the point where an administrative officer is possessed of unbridled authority to declare conduct criminal. People v. Lepik, 629 P.2d 1080 (Colo. 1981).

Commercial bribery statute, § 18-5-401, does not unconstitutionally delegate legislative power to private persons to define duty of fidelity. People v. Lee, 717 P.2d 493 (Colo. 1986).

Contraband statute, § 18-8-204, does not unconstitutionally delegate legislative power. The statute imposes adequate standards and procedural safeguards because it requires the administrative head of a detention facility to determine whether an item poses or may pose a risk prior to categorizing it as contraband, to find that there is a reasonable probability that an item would pose a threat, and to give notice of what is contraband. Allowing each detention facility to determine what is contraband based on the specific conditions present at each facility does not result in an unlawful delegation of legislative authority. People v. Holmes, 959 P.2d 406 (Colo. 1998).

Just as the general assembly may initially prescribe a penalty for a criminal violation, it may also, in its wisdom, from time to time change and adjust penalties as social necessities may mandate. People v. Arellano, 185 Colo. 280, 524 P.2d 305 (1974).

For the general assembly to legislate on right to jury trial is not violation of this article, since the right to a jury is substantive and not procedural. Hardamon v. Municipal Court, 178 Colo. 271, 497 P.2d 1000 (1972).

Section 17-22.5-403 (9) does not violate separation of powers. The constitution does not provide that sentencing is within the sole province of the judiciary. The general assembly has the power to prescribe punishment and limit the court's sentencing authority. In this case, the general assembly, by enacting subsection (9), simply extended Colorado's parole supervision scheme to provide additional means for successfully reintegrating offenders into the community consistent with public safety. People v. Jackson, 109 P.3d 1017 (Colo. App. 2004).

Power to make evidentiary rules. The general assembly has the power to prescribe new rules, or to revise or alter existing rules of substantive evidence, so long as they do not violate constitutional requirements or deprive any person of constitutional rights. People v. Smith, 182 Colo. 228, 512 P.2d 269 (1973).

And designation of place of confinement of those found guilty of crime is legislative function, and sentence must be pronounced in conformity with the legislative mandate. Tinsley v. Crespin, 137 Colo. 302, 324 P.2d 1033 (1958).

General assembly is powerless to confer executive powers upon judiciary. People v. Herrera, 183 Colo. 155, 516 P.2d 626 (1973).

On legislative powers. This article prohibits the general assembly from delegating a legislative power to the judiciary, and the judiciary in turn from thereafter delegating the judicial power to fix and determine a sentence to the executive department. Specht v. Tinsley, 153 Colo. 235, 385 P.2d 423 (1963).

On judicial duties on other departments. The legislative department is powerless to confer judicial duties upon the officials of other departments. City & County of Denver v. Lynch, 92 Colo. 102, 18 P.2d 907 (1932); Bd. of County Comm'rs v. Indus. Comm'n, 650 P.2d 1297 (Colo. App. 1982).

Delegation to private person. Under no circumstances is the general assembly empowered to delegate to a private person for private benefit the power to fix minimum resale prices binding upon parties with no direct contractural relationship; in some cases where the public health, safety, and welfare demands, it might lawfully delegate such power to a public administrative body, provided proper standards to guide and control the actions of such agency are provided in the law. Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis, 134 Colo. 160, 301 P.2d 139 (1956).

General assembly cannot delegate to any administrative agency "carte blanche" authority to impose sanctions or penalties for violation of the substantive portion of a statute. Colo. Anti-Discrimination Comm'n v. Case, 151 Colo. 235, 380 P.2d 34 (1962).
