Understanding family violence court proceedings: the impact of family violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria

Summary

Family violence can cause terrible physical and psychological harm, particularly to women and children. It destroys families and undermines communities. Sometimes children who have directly experienced family violence or have been exposed to it go on to become victims or perpetrators of violence later in life, so that the effect of family violence is passed to the next generation.

Recognition of the harm family violence causes, and of the need to invest in family violence reforms to assure the future wellbeing and prosperity of all Victorians, resulted in the establishment of this Royal Commission into Family Violence on 22 February 2015.

In announcing the Victorian Government's intention to establish the Royal Commission, the Premier declared that family violence was 'the most urgent law and order emergency occurring in our state and the most unspeakable crime unfolding across our nation'. The Premier also acknowledged that 'more of the same policies will only mean more of the same tragedies'.

The Commission was established in the wake of a series of family violence-related deaths in Victoria—most notably the death of 11-year-old Luke Batty, who was killed by his father on 12 February 2014 after years of abusive behaviour directed at Luke's mother, Ms Rosie Batty. Since then there have been other family violence-related deaths.

The establishment of the Royal Commission is an acknowledgement of the seriousness with which the Victorian community has come to regard family violence and its consequences for individuals and families—it reflects our growing awareness of its scale, a recognition that existing policy responses have been insufficient to reduce the prevalence and severity of the violence, and the priority the community is prepared to accord it in order to address the problem.

The Commission's task

As specified in its terms of reference, the Commission's task was to identify the most effective ways to:

- ▷ prevent family violence
- ▷ improve early intervention so as to identify and protect those at risk
- ▷ support victims—particularly women and children—and address the impacts of violence on them
- ▷ make perpetrators accountable
- ▷ develop and refine systemic responses to family violence—including in the legal system and by police, corrections, child protection, legal and family violence support services
- ▷ better coordinate community and government responses to family violence
- ▷ evaluate and measure the success of strategies, frameworks, policies, programs and services introduced to put a stop family violence.

The Commission was asked to make practical recommendations to achieve these outcomes.

What is family violence?

For the purpose of the Commission's inquiry, 'family violence' is defined in section 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic):

... family violence is—

- (a) behaviour by a person towards a family member of that person if that behaviour—
 - (ii) is physically or sexually abusive; or
 - (iii) is emotionally or psychologically abusive; or
 - (iv) is economically abusive; or
 - (v) is threatening; or
 - (vi) is coercive; or
 - (vii) in any other way controls or dominates the family member and causes that family member to feel fear for the safety or wellbeing of that family member or another person; or
- (b) behaviour by a person that causes a child to hear or witness, or otherwise be exposed to the effects of, behaviour referred to in paragraph (a).

The Family Violence Protection Act defines 'family member' broadly. Family violence can occur in any familial relationship—for example, between current or former intimate partners who are or were married or in de facto relationships, in heterosexual and same-sex relationships, between parents (or step-parents) and children, between siblings, and between grandparents, grandchildren, uncles, aunts, nephews, nieces and cousins. It can also occur in relationships that are considered to be 'family-like'—for example, in certain cultural traditions or between a person with a disability and their unrelated carer.

The most common manifestation of family violence is intimate partner violence committed by men against their current or former female partners. This violence can also affect children. It is the form of family violence that we know most about, and it is the key focus of most services and programs.

Family violence in the context of other relationships—including in extended families, by siblings, against men and in same-sex relationships—is also covered by the Family Violence Protection Act and falls within the scope of the Commission's inquiry.

Why does family violence occur?

The terms of reference do not require the Commission to determine why family violence occurs but, by way of background, they do set out important factors that are relevant:

The causes of family violence are complex and include gender inequality and community attitudes towards women. Contributing factors may include financial pressures, alcohol and drug abuse, mental illness and social and economic exclusion.

As part of our inquiry we studied much of the literature that discusses the social and individual factors that give rise to family violence. Understanding these factors provides a basis for making well-informed decisions about the measures that should be taken to prevent and respond to family violence.

There is no doubt that violence against women and children is deeply rooted in power imbalances that are reinforced by gender norms and stereotypes. Factors such as intergenerational abuse and trauma, exposure to violence as a child, social and economic exclusion, financial pressures, drug and alcohol misuse and mental illness can also be associated with family violence. These factors can combine in complex ways to influence the risk of an individual perpetrating family violence or becoming a victim of such violence.

There are, of course, debates about the extent to which these factors cause or exacerbate family violence, and part of this relates to the need to ensure that those who use violence take responsibility for their own behaviour and that victims are not blamed for the abuse they endure. The Commission did not seek to resolve these debates. Instead, it concluded that if we are to reduce the incidence, severity and impact of family violence in the short, medium and long-term, a multi-faceted strategy is needed to take account of the complex interactions between all relevant factors.

The challenge is to direct our attention to all the risk factors for all forms of family violence, while ensuring that people from particular communities are not stigmatised and that perpetrators are not absolved of responsibility for their conduct.

The Commission's work in context

This Commission did not operate in a vacuum. Our work comes on the back of decades of local and international research, activity and advocacy on the part of people who are experts in their fields and committed to preventing family violence and mitigating its effects. The Commission's work proceeded concurrently with other reviews and analyses covering the same and related subject matter and alongside a rapidly evolving evidence base and ongoing policy development and practice changes.

The Commission did not seek to comprehensively document or replicate the detail or breadth of all this other work or to substitute its own analysis for the work that has preceded its own. Our function was to provide advice to the Victorian Government, drawing on the literature reviewed, an examination of the current arrangements in Victoria for preventing and responding to family violence, and the views and experiences of people throughout the state. We used the existing evidence base to guide our deliberations, to document the foundational principles for a range of approaches and policies, and to explain the basis for our proposals.

This report describes the primary priorities for reform and the principles that must underpin future strategies, policies and programs aimed at dealing with family violence. The Commission also emphasises matters that require urgent attention and proposals that will take some time to implement. Detailed policy development, service design and implementation need to occur in partnership with those who work directly with individuals and families affected by family violence and those who have expertise in a range of relevant disciplines.

Active participation by all involved will be essential if we are to build a shared understanding of, and commitment to, the objectives of the reforms.

The Commission's process

The Commission informed itself in a variety of ways during the course of its inquiry—including through community consultations, written submissions, public hearings, data collection, literature reviews, commissioned research and discussions with experts.

In keeping with its terms of reference, the Commission had particular regard to the need to establish a culture of non-violence and gender equality and to shape appropriate attitudes towards women and children. Again in keeping with the terms of reference, it took account of the needs and experiences of children and young people, older people, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex people, people living in regional and rural communities, people with disabilities, and people with complex needs.

The Commission's involvement with individuals directly affected by family violence was especially influential. The majority of the personal accounts, in writing or in person, were from women who had experienced physical, sexual, emotional and/or financial abuse by their male partners, sometimes over years or decades. Many people also spoke of the abuse they had suffered from family members when they were children.

The Commission met with women in metropolitan, suburban and regional areas; we heard from women who were well educated and financially comfortable and from women who had struggled for their entire lives with poverty and disadvantage; we spoke with women from many cultural backgrounds and faith communities; and we met with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women who had endured family violence both as children and as adults and whose sons and daughters are now in violent relationships.

The Commission heard from women whose capacity to live full and productive lives has been shattered as a result of the sustained abuse they have experienced in their relationships and families. Women who, with the support of other family, friends, peers and support services, have become empowered to lead fulfilling, violence-free lives showed us there can be hope for the future.

The Commission also heard from men with a range of different perspectives on family violence. Some of them had experienced family violence, including as children, or were close to people who had; some had perpetrated family violence; and some spoke of their experience of court proceedings in which they had been accused of being violent.

Families whose loved ones have been killed by family members told us of their experiences. The Commission was impressed and moved by the dignity, insight and conviction of these families. It is extraordinary that, having suffered such loss, they had the courage and the generosity to help us in our work—to explain their sense of what happened and why, to point to gaps and failings in systems' responses, and to suggest possible ways of preventing further deaths. The Commission is grateful to these families for their heartfelt and considered contribution.

These personal accounts were fundamental to helping the Commission reflect on measures that are needed to reduce the risk of family violence and to respond to the needs of those affected. They also helped us to critically assess current approaches and practices.

In this report we try to reflect the force and diversity of the accounts and contributions received throughout the inquiry. Inevitably, it was impossible to do complete justice to the personal experiences contributed by people in written submissions or in consultations. Many people who told us their stories—often recounting in detail the abuse they have suffered—did so on the condition that we treat those stories as confidential. As a result, the report does not specifically mention these individuals, even though their experiences helped shape the Commission's views. We trust that the quotes and witness statements included in the report go some way to conveying the authenticity of the many voices we heard. Our recommendations are based on the expectation that services and systems will be attentive to, and respectful of, the diverse experiences and needs of each person affected by family violence.

During the inquiry the Commission also met with hundreds of people who come in contact with victims and perpetrators of family violence throughout Victoria—among them police members, specialist family violence workers, lawyers, magistrates, court-based support workers, people working in crisis accommodation facilities, youth workers, counsellors, people working on the front line in child protection and family services, doctors, maternal and child health nurses, and teachers. We were struck by the commitment, knowledge and expertise they brought to the consultation process—and quite obviously to their daily work. Despite the very great pressures they work under and the complexity of that work, all came with huge optimism and vigour and a commitment to the people they assist and to the task of ending family violence. The Commission was also enormously assisted by the input of those working in peak bodies, and in the areas of policy, research and advocacy throughout the family violence system. We learnt a great deal from them.

The Commission is indebted to the Aboriginal Elders and community members who shared their insights and suggestions with us. They told us about the creative and effective early intervention and response initiatives that are being implemented by and for their communities. These practices taught the Commission much about the types of community-based family violence strategies that are needed.

The Commission heard myriad and broad-ranging—and sometimes divergent—views about how best to prevent and respond to family violence. It was our task to listen to all perspectives, to find common ground, and to identify constructive ways of improving responses to family violence in the future.

The Commission's conclusions

There is no comparison between the response today and that of 2000. We can point to the failures today—and there are many. However, the failures of the system should not be confused with lack of progress. We have come a long way from women self-referring, women not reporting to police, from police not drawing the dots between family violence and crime and domestic murder. I acknowledge how far we have come since those dark days. The days of an isolated women's service response are gone.¹

Victoria has been at the forefront of family violence policy development and reform in Australia for the past 15 years and has been influential in propelling reforms in other Australian and international jurisdictions. This work has been driven by and has built on decades of grassroots work and advocacy by the women's movement. Significant elements of the Victorian response to family violence remain sound. However, there are serious limitations in the existing approach. We are not responding adequately to the scale and impact of the harm caused by family violence.

Strong foundations

Victoria has strong foundations on which to build its future response to family violence, including:

- ▶ the Family Violence Protection Act, which reflects sound objectives and principles, and provides a comprehensive definition of family violence and the relationships in which it can arise
- ▶ the seriousness with which Victoria Police now regards family violence—for example, through the development of the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence, the establishment of family violence teams, and the leadership it has shown in transforming the way police respond to family violence incidents
- ▶ the Victorian Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework, or Common Risk Assessment Framework (the CRAF), which has been influential in building a shared understanding of family violence and in helping people working with victims of family violence to understand their roles and responsibilities
- ▶ the development of Risk Assessment and Management Panels to proactively monitor perpetrators in family violence cases identified as high risk
- ▶ the approaches adopted by the Magistrates' Court in the Family Violence Court Division and specialist courts including the provision of services to applicants and respondents in relation to family violence intervention orders
- ▶ a network of dedicated specialist family violence services across the state, including those that respond to victims from diverse communities. These services provide a range of supports to women and children, and contribute unique skills and knowledge about family violence risk that guide the broader system response
- ▶ the development of the Indigenous Family Violence 10 Year Plan: Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families that is overseen by the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum
- ▶ expertise in primary prevention programs and initiatives that has been developed under the leadership of organisations such as VicHealth, women's health services and Our Watch
- ▶ the increased focus of key universal services, such as health services, and targeted services such as Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services, in working with vulnerable families
- ▶ family violence regional integration committees that bring together key services, including family violence services, Child Protection and Victoria Police to foster a more comprehensive response to victims and perpetrators of family violence
- ▶ the Victorian Government's contribution to the national research institute ANROWS to build the evidence base for effective responses to family violence
- ▶ significant research and legislative and policy reform relevant to sexual assault, which has expanded our understanding of and improved our response to family violence.

System limitations

Despite these strong foundations, the Commission identified gaps and obstacles that are limiting the effective implementation of laws, policies, and programs:

- ▶ All parts of the system—support services, police, courts—are overwhelmed by the number of family violence incidents now reported. Services are not currently equipped to meet this high level of demand, which undermines the safety of those experiencing family violence and their potential for recovery.
- ▶ The many different forms and manifestations of family violence are insufficiently recognised, and responses are not tailored to the particular circumstances and needs of diverse victims.
- ▶ There is a lack of targeted resources to meet the specific needs of children and young people who have experienced family violence.
- ▶ The current response to family violence largely assumes that women will leave their home when family violence occurs. For those who must leave, homelessness and housing systems cannot guarantee a safe place to stay or a permanent home that is affordable. For those who remain at home, monitoring of the perpetrator is inadequate.
- ▶ Key personnel in universal systems, such as health services and schools, are not adequately equipped to recognise that family violence may be occurring and often do not know what to do when it is identified.
- ▶ The range of services a victim might need at different times, including at points of crisis and beyond, are not as well coordinated as they should be, particularly when these services are located in different systems—for example, the health and justice systems. Gaining access to support can be difficult for victims, and service responses remain inconsistent and hard to navigate.
- ▶ Efforts to hold perpetrators to account are grossly inadequate. Victims are too often left to carry the burden of managing risk. Insufficient attention is given to addressing perpetrators' individual risk factors.
- ▶ The safety of victims is undermined by inadequate methods for sharing information between agencies about perpetrator risk. This is exacerbated by outdated information technology systems.
- ▶ Too little effort is devoted to preventing the occurrence of family violence in the first place, and to intervening at the earliest possible opportunity to reduce the risk of violence or its escalation. Similarly, there is not enough focus on helping victims recover from the effects of violence and rebuild their lives.
- ▶ The Victorian Government does not have a dedicated governance mechanism in place to coordinate the system's efforts to prevent and respond to family violence or to enable an assessment of the efficacy of current efforts.
- ▶ There is inadequate investment in measures designed to prevent and respond to family violence.

Some of these problems can be addressed through improving existing approaches so that they can be responsive to new circumstances and reflect best practice. But new approaches are also required.

Transforming our response

We have an opportunity to transform the way in which we address family violence in Victoria. This will require new ways of thinking and collaborating.

The advocates who have gone before have asked the public and policy makers to listen, and to understand the devastating prevalence and impacts of family violence.

I think, as a whole, we are now listening and understanding. We understand, to a much greater extent than ever before, that family violence exists, its prevalence and impacts are devastating and shame us all, and that family violence affects individuals, the community and, ultimately, our nation. The challenge is to move forward, from this point, into a time of making changes and finding solutions.

In my view, we are in the middle of a paradigm shift. To take us forward, we need to hear from voices with ideas for change and with ideas for solutions. These might be different voices from those that have gone before.²

The Victorian Government must strengthen innovation in the development and implementation of family violence policy and foster collaboration between different service systems. The sound foundations in Victoria's family violence system, and the numerous pockets of best practice in different settings around the state have evolved as a result of people working together in the face of significant demand. Their efforts, and the efforts of others in the community who are ready to play a greater role in addressing family violence, must be harnessed and supported.

In addition to working in partnership with family violence practitioners, the Victorian Government should facilitate input from victims, as well as from experts from a broad range of disciplines including related health and human services, risk assessment, criminology and forensic psychology, communications, information technology, program evaluation and workforce development, to ensure that family violence policy benefits from the best knowledge and expertise. Similarly, people working in other sectors and disciplines need to be supported to identify ways in which preventing family violence can be incorporated as a part of their own work.

Broadening responsibility for addressing family violence will require each sector or component part of the system to reinforce the work of others, to collaborate with and trust others, to understand the experience of family violence in all its forms, to look outwardly, and be open to new ideas and new solutions. Currently, different sectors and service systems operate according to distinct underlying principles, service delivery models and theoretical frameworks, which can create barriers to service integration, collaboration and innovation. However, just as women's services came together with police in the early 2000s to overcome scepticism about each other's roles and objectives and to forge a partnership that saw family violence become a priority for the justice system, there is great potential for progress to be made in building dialogue and partnership broadly across sectors.

New approaches to addressing family violence should be guided by and take into account the following.

Reflecting the experience of victims

The strategy to address family violence must continue to recognise that most family violence incidents occur in the context of intimate partner relationships. The significant majority of perpetrators are men, and the significant majority of victims are women and their children. This recognition has implications for prevention and response activities, which must focus on the ways in which gender inequality and community attitudes underpin family violence.

At the same time, the strategy must take into account the many other manifestations of family violence, such as violence against children, parents, siblings and older people, and violence in same-sex relationships. More work is needed to identify how best to meet the needs of these specific groups of victims.

Family violence policy and services must also take account of the particular experiences of people from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, which are compounded by discrimination and trauma associated with historical and ongoing injustices.

They must also respond to the fact that people from different cultures and backgrounds can find it even more difficult to report family violence and locate appropriate help and support than other Victorians. They must also address barriers, both physical and attitudinal, faced by women and children with disabilities who experience family violence.

Policy makers and others responsible for the design, responsiveness and efficacy of the family violence system should hear directly from victims who have recent experience of the system so that improvements can be made.

A more sustained focus on supporting children and young people

A child who lives with violence is forever changed, but not forever 'damaged'—and there is a lot we can do to improve their future prospects.³

Current policy does not pay sufficient attention to the effects of violence on children. Supporting children and young people must be central to family violence policies.

Family violence can have serious effects on children and young people but they do not always receive necessary support. There is insufficient focus on their needs and on the therapeutic and other interventions they may require to mitigate the effects of the violence. Although children are remarkably resilient, and many who experience violence and abuse go on to lead full and productive lives, there are many who will need counselling and/or other support to overcome the impacts of the abuse, which may otherwise render them vulnerable to becoming a victim of family violence as an adult, or using violence themselves. If we do not provide this support, the effects of family violence suffered by children may be carried on to the next generation.

All services must be responsive to victims' needs

Unless agencies and services are able to respond to the needs of victims in a timely and appropriate way, they can do more harm than good. This can dissuade victims from seeking help, or expose them to further risk.

When victims initially disclose family violence (or factors indicating its presence), many people do not know what to do. It is common for victims to receive advice or responses that fail to identify the level of risk they are facing or the types of expert assistance they might require, or that can be dismissive of or minimise their experience. As a first step, the experience of victims should be acknowledged. As Ms Batty remarked:

I'd like to hear 'you're not to blame for this' not 'why didn't you leave?' If someone has come from a hateful space then the first thing they need to have reinforced is that they're not to blame, and start lifting the stigma.⁴

At present, sources of expert advice and assistance for family violence victims are not readily visible:

I didn't know how to tell those close to me I needed help. I didn't have a language to describe what was wrong in my relationship. I didn't know who to call or who to see or which hotline to ring. I felt so stupid. It was all in my head. I wish there had been information campaigns on TV or on the radio, that told me what abuse is and what a healthy relationship isn't. I wish I had known that all of the services for women experiencing domestic violence looked after women experiencing all kinds of violence, not just physical violence. I wish my doctors and my psychologists and my psychiatrists and maternal and child health nurses had asked me about my relationship with my husband, if I had ever considered leaving, and if it was fear that prevented me from going. I wish someone had recognised the power divide between him and myself. I wish they'd recognised my depression and anxiety as a deep sense of worthlessness, and fear that had been instilled in me, by him, over years. I wish they'd said, the problem isn't you. It is his behaviour. I wish that I'd been able to protect my children from seeing what he did to me.⁵

Victims might want and need a range of different outcomes for themselves, their families and the perpetrator. Some victims might need support from services immediately after disclosing violence and will then be able to recover with the help of friends and family. Other victims will have been exposed to violence during childhood or to multiple forms of abuse over long periods. Some might have associated difficulties with alcohol or drug use, or physical and mental illness. Many victims will want to have no further contact with the perpetrator; some will continue to have contact with the perpetrator because of ongoing arrangements with children; some will want to remain in their relationship.

An individualised approach that provides tailored and specialised responses is required. This means that services need to embrace complexity and be equipped to respond nimbly to the diverse experiences of family violence. Agencies and services responding to family violence need to develop and incorporate the knowledge, skills and expertise to work with clients who experience family violence in all its forms, in a variety of relationships, and against the background of their individual circumstances.

Services must work better together

Getting help should not depend on the particular entry point chosen by the victim.

Victims of family violence might disclose the violence to family or friends or approach a range of different service providers. They might tell a teacher, a general practitioner, a dentist, a counsellor or a maternal and child health nurse about the violence. They might call the police when violence is occurring or report it later. They might approach a registrar at a local court, or a community legal service or a private legal practitioner. They might contact Child Protection, which might refer them to Child FIRST. People who make the decision to tell someone about the violence often find the responses of police, courts, government agencies and service providers inconsistent and may not receive the advice they need to obtain further support.

All services that come into contact with family violence victims should be equipped to identify, and in some cases, assess and manage risk, and to ensure that victims are supported. Mainstream services such as health services, must be able to identify risk and refer victims to services that can provide more comprehensive support, such as specialist family violence services.

Universal service systems that are available to all community members are ideally placed to play a much greater role in identifying family violence at the earliest possible stage. Associated systems such as Integrated Family Services, mental health and drug and alcohol services, aged care, and the health and education systems must play a more direct role in identifying and responding to family violence. In order to achieve this, mainstream services will need to boost their family violence capability. These workforces need to recognise signs that family violence may be occurring and know what to do next to ensure safety.

There must be clear entry points into, and pathways between, different parts of the system, to make the experience of seeking help as supportive and seamless as possible. The system should be structured to assist those with multiple and interdependent needs to navigate the services they need, and equip people with more straightforward needs to directly access the services they require.

Individual service elements needed by a victim during both the crisis and the recovery phases are often 'siloed', requiring victims to navigate complex systems by themselves at a time when they may be under acute stress. Those without access to a case manager are not guided or assisted in finding or using all of the services they need, for example, housing, counselling, legal services, and therapeutic programs for themselves and their children.

Siloing can reduce the effectiveness of each service or make some services totally ineffective. For example, it is unlikely that a woman can take full advantage of trauma counselling if she and her children are living in their car. Siloing also ignores the need for services to reinforce each other so that the victim has a line of sight to recovery. For example, the current approach seen in the provision of crisis, transitional and longer term housing often creates further dislocation and uncertainty for victims who are already in a state of extreme stress. This can exacerbate the effects of the violence itself and can sometimes result in victims returning to abusive relationships.

Closer relationships must be built between all the services that support victims of family violence. Agencies need to be active in co-locating and joining together with other agencies to provide services, and government should support them in doing so.

People in rural, regional and remote parts of the state must be able to have easy access to the services they need. This calls for flexibility and adaptability in the way services are delivered.

To have an effective system, all components need to be appropriately funded. Increasing funding on its own, though, without attention to operational changes and broader system design, will not sufficiently improve the situation.

A sustained focus on effective perpetrator interventions

I ask, why is it that we have [the] responsibility for safety on the victim's shoulders? Why are we constantly talking about victims rather than the perpetrator, and not questioning his behaviour? Why is it she has to hide or move or uproot herself or her family and he is able to have a beer with his mates and no one is challenging his behaviour?⁶

When police and other justice systems don't respond seriously and pro-actively it sends a powerful message to perpetrators that they are free to do as they wish and that there will be no consequences or accountability for their violence.⁷

Family violence policy must aim to stop violence at its source. It should never be regarded as the victim's responsibility to stop family violence: those who use violence should always be held responsible for their actions.

Efforts to keep victims safe must be strengthened through a consistent and rigorous approach to perpetrator accountability. Bringing perpetrators into view and assisting them to change behaviours is essential to reducing family violence.

The current response to perpetrators remains under-developed, despite the establishment of initiatives such as family violence teams within Victoria Police, and Risk Assessment and Management Panels, which aim to keep high-risk perpetrators in view.

Crime Statistics Agency analysis conducted for the Commission indicated that a relatively small number of recidivist perpetrators account for a disproportionate number of family violence incidents attended by Victoria Police. These perpetrators were more likely than others to be recorded by police as being unemployed, depressed or as having used drugs.

Many breaches of intervention orders are not prosecuted. Perpetrators are not deterred from continuing to abuse their victims if police and court responses are inconsistent, delayed and uncertain. As a consequence, victims remain responsible for managing their own safety—staying ever vigilant to breaches of intervention orders and navigating ongoing threats or contact by perpetrators—even after they have sought protection from the justice system.

Some perpetrators may be able to change their behaviour with an appropriate level of support or as a result of a particular style of behaviour change program; others will need more tailored and intensive assistance, including those with a mental illness or problems with drug and alcohol use. Other perpetrators will continue to pose unacceptable risks to their family members, requiring stricter justice system-based interventions.

A greater focus on perpetrators will require the collaboration of key agencies and experts such as Victoria Police, the courts, Corrections Victoria, Child Protection, men's behaviour change program providers, family violence services, drug and alcohol and mental health practitioners, criminologists and forensic psychologists. Key areas of attention must involve improving risk assessment and management; monitoring perpetrator behaviour; harnessing the authority of the courts; working with perpetrators in ways that help them take responsibility, change their behaviours and address any specific risk factors that contribute to their use of violence; exploring different program models; and delivering programs and other interventions that are proven to work. Exploring options for expanding perpetrator interventions must build on, and not detract from, the important work that has already been done to ensure that men take responsibility for their violence against women and their children.

Moving beyond a crisis response

The reforms introduced in the 2000s had a clear focus on improving the justice response and in connecting police, court and specialist family violence service responses in order to maximise victims' safety.

The existing focus on crisis response and justice system mechanisms must be matched by a similar focus on, and investment in, prevention, early intervention and recovery.

There are numerous examples of family violence prevention, early intervention and recovery programs around the state, but these are piecemeal and often left to small community organisations to develop and implement. Government must commit to supporting these measures on a larger scale if we are to create the conditions necessary to reduce the incidence and effects of family violence.

Family violence prevention, early intervention and recovery measures need to be reinforced by measures that support and build the capabilities and resilience of individuals, families and communities. Family violence occurs in all communities, but its incidence and severity can escalate when people do not have the social and economic conditions they need to thrive or they are deprived of the conditions that are protective against family violence risk. Family violence can result in individuals and families being stuck in cycles of trauma and dislocation, which undermines their capacity to live full lives and contribute to their communities.

Prevention

If we are to prevent family violence we must change the attitudes and social conditions that give rise to it. There is a need to implement primary prevention strategies that are designed to dismantle harmful attitudes towards women, promote gender equality and encourage respectful relationships. Because family violence takes many forms, a variety of approaches is required. Some programs should be addressed to the Victorian community as a whole, others to particular population groups and places. Educating young people about respectful relationships must be a core part of the Victorian Government's long-term prevention strategy.

Only a small amount of government funding goes to prevention. Prevention activities are often funded for short periods. But changing behaviours and attitudes is a complex and lengthy process, which requires long-term investment. Failure to give greater priority to prevention efforts risks condemning future generations to the plight of today's victims of family violence. Unless we pay serious and sustained attention to prevention initiatives, the service system will remain overwhelmed and under-resourced.

Victoria has contributed significantly to researching and testing interventions designed to prevent violence against women and children and has been recognised internationally for this work. Although research about what prevention strategies are the most effective is ongoing, there is a strong base on which Victoria can build.

Early intervention

There has also been little support for programs aimed at protecting victims before violence escalates and intervening to ensure someone does not go on to be violent. Our systems do not do enough to support individuals and families to live violence-free lives.

There has been insufficient emphasis on intervening at points where people may be willing to participate in programs that could contribute to a reduction in family violence across the community, for example programs that support new parents.

Universal service systems that are available to all community members are ideally placed to have a much greater role in identifying and effectively responding to family violence at the earliest possible stage. We also need to build the capacity of family services, housing, employment, mental health and drug and alcohol services to identify violence and provide support before the violence gets worse.

In Victoria a number of areas of good and promising practice in local communities and hospital and other health settings provide the basis for developing more widespread programs.

Recovery and resilience

Women who have experienced family violence demonstrate extraordinary resilience and strength; this is apparent in the way that they manage the risk presented by the perpetrator and in the lengths they go to protect the safety of their children and other family members.

At the same time as ensuring the safety of victims, the system should aim to promote their recovery and resilience, so that a previous experience of family violence does not shape their lives forever. Victims want to rebuild their lives, participate in economic and social life, see their children thrive and be confident about their future.

Some victims may be able to recover with the help of family and friends, while others will need additional support to achieve these goals. As is the case for most Victorians, stable housing and employment, and participation in community life, are central to the wellbeing of victims of family violence and to their ability to build a good life for themselves and their children or other family members. The Government must ensure there are individually tailored measures to support victims to recover from the effects of family violence. Depending on their circumstances, this may require support to attain economic security and independence, secure housing, and health and wellbeing.

Family violence must be a core area of responsibility for government

Government and its departments and agencies must treat family violence as a core area of responsibility, instead of a problem that can be addressed through programs that exist at the margins of portfolios or solely through small specialist units. This will require a genuine commitment to a whole-of-government approach to stop family violence, support victims and hold perpetrators accountable.

Stopping family violence requires a multi-faceted, sustained effort by government. This effort cannot be effective without strong leadership, bipartisan support and partnership with the community.

In the past, policy and funding responses to family violence have often reflected an assumption that family violence is something that affects only a relatively small number of people from certain demographic groups. The development and resourcing of responses have not kept pace with our understanding of the prevalence and pervasiveness of family violence in all sections of our community. Similarly, there has been little analysis of the impact that high rates of family violence have on the operations of, and inter-relationships between, associated systems such as Child Protection, family services, sexual assault services, and universal services such as health and education.

At present, the Victorian Government does not have a system which co-ordinates and oversees implementation of responses to family violence. There is a lack of clarity about the principles and objectives that guide our response to family violence, and around the roles, responsibilities and lines of accountability of each department, agency, organisation and sector involved in responding to family violence. We are not clear about what success looks like or how to measure it.

A whole-of-government response calls for the police, courts, human services and other relevant service providers to share information from different systems. Clear information-sharing arrangements are also vital to ensure that decision makers are fully informed about the circumstances of individual cases, so that victims' safety and wellbeing is protected.

Substantial investment

Addressing family violence requires a strategy that has short, medium, and long-term objectives. This effort will have substantial funding implications for government. Robust forecast modelling needs to be done. Although strategies aimed at preventing family violence should deliver returns on investment in the longer term, there is an immediate need to increase investment in key parts of the family violence system, both to meet current demand and to implement major reforms.

The Victorian Government does not know how much in total it spends on dealing with family violence. Nor does it collect the data necessary to understand how all parts of the system are responding to family violence. This has implications for the ways in which policies and services are developed, funded, implemented, coordinated and reviewed. It also makes it difficult to measure whether specific interventions and strategies are reducing the prevalence of family violence or its impact on victims.

The government must prioritise funding for family violence initiatives and reforms. This may require investigating options for redirecting existing revenue sources towards family violence expenditure, identifying new revenue sources, and exploring the possibility of entering into partnership agreements with the Commonwealth Government, in areas of overlapping responsibility. In the Commission's view, there is widespread support in the Victorian community for treating family violence reform as a problem that warrants an immediate and tangible response. We believe that a reconsideration of funding priorities or the identification of new revenue sources to meet this goal would be widely accepted, provided their impact is distributed broadly and equitably.

Development and use of technological solutions

Technology is becoming increasingly important in the area of family violence. Not only do we need swift solutions to combat the ways perpetrators use mobile phones, social media platforms and surveillance devices to stalk and harass their victims—we also need to identify ways in which emerging technologies and resources can be used, alongside other measures, to do the following:

- ▷ support and empower victims—for example, by increasing their personal security or by facilitating safe and secure access to advice and information, and to the courts
- ▷ deter perpetrators from further offending for example through devices that record contact with victims
- ▷ link people in remote locations to service providers
- ▷ streamline and standardise risk assessment processes
- ▷ facilitate information sharing about individual cases between police, the courts and other parts of the family violence system
- ▷ coordinate processes and share practice knowledge across different systems and sectors
- ▷ enable data collection
- ▷ educate and equip members of the community to identify and respond to family violence.

Harnessing community effort

There is an unprecedented level of commitment across the community to preventing family violence and supporting victims. This momentum to stop violence should be harnessed.

Ending family violence requires a shift in the attitudes of individuals and in community attitudes that allow violence to be excused, justified or condoned. All Victorians have a role to play in deciding what is acceptable and unacceptable in the communities we share. Together, we create the culture that has a powerful influence on the behaviour and practices of individuals.

I think changing the culture is about raising awareness in the public domain to such a level that what we learn can't be unlearned, and what we know can't be unknown. I think it is imperative to raise this issue to the point where everyone knows it's an issue, everyone knows the statistics and everyone understands the different forms of family violence.⁸

Leaders in the economic, social and civic spheres of the community, as well as those who have experienced family violence, need to be engaged in building community awareness and determining the initiatives that are going to work for their community and how they should be pursued. These strategies should be targeted to all the places where people live, learn, work and play.

Workplaces, sporting clubs, faith communities and other social networks need to be supported so that they know how to respond when they become aware that someone is experiencing family violence or being abusive towards their family members. These settings also need to be environments that combat violence-supporting attitudes and promote respectful relationships.

There is a growing understanding of the value of investing in education, and in our children and young people. Schools are central points of interaction between parents, educators and young people. Respectful relationships education programs offer enormous promise for transforming the attitudes and behaviours of future generations.

I understand that a lot is asked of schools; we expect schools to fix many social problems and address all kinds of issues in their curriculum. However, I think schools do play an enormous role in terms of creating cultural norms. Further, schools are extremely relevant as they form the basis of years of social interactions and development of relationship skills. Children practise their relationship skills from a very young age, as soon as they can communicate, and spend a large proportion of their time doing so in the school environment. As a result, it is very important for schools to take an active role in addressing not only the specific issue of family violence but the broader issues of gender equity and respectful relationships.⁹

Networks and partnerships at the regional level—such as family violence regional integration committees and Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups, and the work of women’s health centres—have played a particularly important role in building capacity and fostering collaborative networks in local areas.

Local councils offer a key platform for supporting community action. Local and state governments should foster collaboration and innovation in the development and implementation of community strategies designed to address family violence. Efforts already being made by communities that have been shown to be effective must be supported through the provision of guidance, resources and infrastructure support, as well as the dissemination of practice knowledge.

There is no quick fix to the prevention of family violence in our community. However, the right plan financed for the long term and supported by grass roots community campaigns and ownership will work.¹⁰

The way forward

The Commission makes a number of findings about the adequacy of current policies, systems and processes aimed at preventing and responding to family violence in Victoria. Drawing on all the evidence received, we outline a strategy for addressing family violence in the future and propose a set of practical recommendations—for the Victorian Government, other organisations and the community more broadly—to implement that strategy.

Our recommendations are directed at improving the foundations of the current system, seizing opportunities to transform the way that we respond to family violence, and building the structures that will guide and oversee a long-term reform program that deals with all aspects of family violence. Some of the recommendations focus on problems that can be resolved in the shorter term; others will require continued commitment and effort if they are to bring about change in the medium or longer term.

Many of the recommendations reflect an endorsement of important existing strategies that could be improved with renewed attention and oversight. The Commission also recommends a number of new approaches and structures. The full set of recommendations appears at the end of this summary. The recommendations also appear throughout the report in relevant chapters. The Commission’s strategy is not reliant on one central initiative: it depends on many initiatives. It is vital that these are coordinated and integrated rather than implemented in a piecemeal manner.

New approaches: a snapshot

The Commission's recommendations for new approaches cover the following:

- ▶ Support and Safety Hubs in local communities throughout Victoria, to make it easier for victims to find help and gain access to a greater range of services
- ▶ new laws to ensure that privacy considerations do not trump victims' safety—with a Central Information Point to funnel information about perpetrators to the Hubs
- ▶ an immediate funding boost to services that support victims and families, additional resources for Aboriginal community initiatives and a dedicated funding stream for preventing family violence
- ▶ a 'blitz' to rehouse women and children forced to leave their homes, supported by expanded individual funding packages
- ▶ an expanded investigative capacity for police and mobile technology for front-line police, including a trial of body-worn cameras
- ▶ more specialist family violence courts that can deal with criminal, civil and family law matters at the same time
- ▶ stronger perpetrator programs and increased monitoring and oversight by agencies
- ▶ family violence training for all key workforces—including in hospitals and schools
- ▶ investment in future generations through expanded respectful relationships education in schools
- ▶ an independent Family Violence Agency to hold government to account.

The terms of reference asked the Commission to consider the need to identify short, medium and long-term improvements to Victoria's current response to family violence. For this reason, we have sought to identify timeframes for implementation of most of our recommendations.

In several cases the Commission has recommended implementation by a specified date. We have done this for recommendations that lay the foundations for the future of the family violence system—for example, the establishment of Support and Safety Hubs, the Central Information Point and the Family Violence Agency, as well as completion of the review of the CRAF and implementation of the revised framework.

In most other recommendations we have sought to identify timeframes within which implementation would be desirable. In many cases we have specified timeframes of 12 months, two years or five years, with some other recommendations contemplating plans lasting 10 years. Generally, we have contemplated that amendments to Victorian legislation should be achieved within 12 months.

In setting the timeframes for this latter group of recommendations, the Commission has been mindful of the urgency of the need for reform, and sensitive to the practicalities of implementing a wide range of reforms which are inter-related. However, the timeframes are not intended to be rigid prescriptions, but rather to provide a guide to government about whether the recommendations should be implemented in the short, medium or longer term. Timeframes for implementation will inevitably be influenced by a range of factors, including the need to consult with stakeholders and the community and to stage various elements of the reforms.

In some cases no timeframe has been specified because the recommendation relates to something that should be ongoing (for example, annual reporting by Victoria Police about the prosecution of family violence offences) or because it relates to a process that already has its own timeframe (for example, those that relate to existing reviews or inquiries).

The Commission received a great many proposals for reform. Some of them related to the underlying frameworks in associated areas of policy, such as housing and homelessness, child protection, family law, liquor regulation and mental health. Others related to matters specific to a particular program or a particular geographic location. The Commission took all these proposals into account in its deliberations. Its efforts, however, have been primarily directed at formulating future directions for family violence reform and policy development. For this reason it has not been possible to reflect on or resolve every issue raised during the inquiry. The Commission hopes, though, that the outcomes of the inquiry will provide opportunities for the discussion and possible resolution of many of the matters people raised with us.

The Commission was allocated a budget of $36 million for its inquiry, and expended approximately $13.5 million. In conducting its inquiry the Commission was very conscious of the significant current demand on family violence services, and has sought to carry out its functions cost efficiently. The Commission has recommended an immediate increase in funding for a range of family violence services to respond to the current crisis in demand. Although the balance of the Commission's budget will only go a small way towards addressing the current crisis, we believe its direct allocation to family violence services would be a fitting first step in implementing the Commission's recommendations.

The future: a sustained effort to find solutions

The Commission is acutely aware of the complexities associated with preventing and responding to family violence. There is no simple solution; no single source of expertise; no guarantee that solutions advanced today will continue to be the most appropriate solutions in the future. At the core of the Commission's recommendations, therefore, is a call for a long-term approach—one that is bipartisan, requires all parts of government to work together, and involves the entire community. It must include people with experience of family violence and expertise in the responses needed; it must be reflective about policy and program successes and failures; and it must be able to adapt to new knowledge and circumstances.

Preventing and responding to family violence is difficult and demanding. The attitudes and behaviours that cause and contribute to such violence are deeply embedded in our society. So, too, are the attitudes and behaviours that implicitly or expressly tolerate it. Community attitudes that misconstrue or condone family violence have powerful impacts: they compound the shame that victims feel and dissuade them from making disclosures and seeking assistance, and they give licence to perpetrators to continue their abuse. The findings of the National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey and research commissioned by the Commonwealth Government to guide a future national campaign to prevent violence against women and their children, suggest that these attitudes are disturbingly common in our society—particularly among young people.

On the other hand, the surge of community interest in combatting family violence, the public discourse about acceptable attitudes towards women, continuing measures for preventing and responding to violence, and the confidence this gives to victims to come forward, make us optimistic that the community effort required to transform our collective attitudes to family violence can be harnessed.

Solving family violence is not a technical science. It calls for sustained human effort and a shared commitment to building a culture of non-violence and gender equality, in which all individuals are afforded dignity and respect. The Commission is confident that, through collaborative effort—on the part of government, non-government organisations and the community—the cultural change necessary to prevent family violence in the long term is possible.

Overview of the report

This section provides an overview of each of the chapters in this report. These chapters are the evidence base for the actions the Commission recommends to consolidate the foundations of our current response to family violence and to implement required changes.

Nature, dynamics and effects

Family violence can occur in a variety of contexts, the majority of which are intimate partner relationships, with the violence being perpetrated by a man against a woman. Family violence differs from other forms of violence: it is generally underpinned by a pattern of coercion, control and domination by one person over another. In the case of intimate partners, the coercion may begin immediately after a relationship begins; in others it creeps up, sometimes masked by flattery and charm. Family violence can involve emotional, psychological or financial abuse as well as physical abuse. Among the tactics used by perpetrators can be limiting access to money, isolating a woman from family and friends, threatening to publish private information, and exercising excessive control over a woman's activities or even her general appearance. These measures are designed to erode the victim's self-confidence and make them unduly dependent on the other person.

Pregnancy and separation (or attempted separation) are examples of times of heightened risk for the onset or exacerbation of intimate partner violence. Often the violence continues after separation: either directly, through continued stalking, assaults or harassment, or in more indirect ways—for example, by withholding child support, delaying a property settlement or dragging out legal proceedings. In recent times, technology-facilitated abuse—for example, surveillance and monitoring using phone apps and other software—has emerged as a new way of stalking victims even after the relationship has ended.

Children are also frequently victims of family violence, either directly or as a result of being exposed to violence against their mothers.

For most victims, family violence is part of a longer-term pattern, rather than a one-off event. The pattern often involves an escalation of the violence, so that unacceptable behaviour becomes 'normalised' over time or a person's mental wellbeing is eroded to the point that they come to believe they deserve the violence.

Family violence has long-lasting and serious effects. Physical injuries can be debilitating and lifelong. But the violence also takes an enormous toll on a person's mental health and wellbeing: it can be very difficult to recover and rebuild after being belittled, denigrated and made to feel worthless, sometimes for years.

The negative effects of family violence can be particularly profound for children, who can carry into adulthood the burden of being victimised themselves or witnessing violence in their home.

We know, of course, that some people do not have the opportunity to escape or recover from family violence: the number of family violence-related deaths is high. These victims are mourned by families, friends and communities, many of whom fight to raise awareness of the devastating impacts of family violence, to maintain the legacy of their loved ones.

We know, too, that family violence victims—including children—demonstrate enormous resilience in the face of great adversity. Many of these survivors go on to live full and happy lives, develop healthy relationships and use their experiences to help others.

Key family violence data

Although much has been done to improve our understanding of the extent to which family violence is occurring in our community, a great deal of the violence remains hidden. This is largely because many people, and some victims, do not recognise that what is happening is in fact family violence, others choose not to report it or are unable to, and sometimes incidents are not recorded as family violence or are not recorded at all.

The following are some of the main trends that emerge from existing family violence data:

- ▶ Family violence disproportionately affects women and children, and the majority of perpetrators are men.
- ▶ Female victims are more likely to be a current or former partner of the perpetrator, while men are more likely to experience violence in different familial relationships—for example, as a son or a sibling.
- ▶ Some groups are at greater risk of family violence or experience it at increased rates. This includes Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples and women with disabilities.
- ▶ These and other groups face particular barriers in seeking and obtaining help; they include people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and people living in rural, regional or remote areas.

Although it is not clear whether the prevalence of family violence (that is, the proportion of the population who have experienced such violence at least once) is increasing, we do know that there has been greater reporting of family violence, leading to an increase in incidents being recognised. In Victoria this has been evident in the increased number of reports to police and the number of family violence intervention orders being issued. The increase in incidents is also placing enormous pressure on family violence specialist services, family services, crisis accommodation and housing services, and legal and health services.

History of the family violence system

The family violence system in Victoria has developed during the past four decades, emerging from the efforts of women's groups in the 1970s to provide support to women and children experiencing family violence. Historically, family violence services have been closely linked with homelessness services, which began to emerge at about the time the first women's refuge was established. It was not until the late 1980s that measures to address family violence began to be reflected in legislation, and it took until the 2000s for there to be significant momentum in support of law and policy reform in Victoria. A key instigator of this wave of reform was Ms Christine Nixon APM, Chief Commissioner of Police, who initiated a review of all Victoria Police policies relevant to violence against women.

The decade that followed saw a range of policy reforms and initiatives aimed at developing understanding of and addressing family violence—including adult and child sexual assault. The 2005 report of the Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence, Reforming the Family Violence System, led to many important reforms, and in 2008 the Family Violence Protection Act, which reflected best-practice knowledge of the nature and dynamics of family violence, was enacted. This decade also saw comprehensive work performed by the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force and Aboriginal communities. The Task Force's 2003 report was a landmark in Victorian Aboriginal policy, vividly describing the scale and impact of family violence in Aboriginal communities and establishing sound principles for prevention and response grounded in community action.

Family violence has attracted a greater degree of government attention in recent years at both the federal and state and territory levels—often as a result of tireless efforts on the part of women's services and survivors of family violence. In 2011 the Commonwealth, in partnership with the states and territories, launched the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022. The National Plan continues to guide policy and service responses.

Overview of the family violence system

There is no single pathway into the family violence system. There are myriad entry points, and overlapping service systems at both the state and federal levels provide services to those experiencing family violence.

Police, justice and family violence services operate on the front line to respond to instances of violence. Specialist family violence services are integral to supporting women and children by providing crisis accommodation, casework, counselling, psychological support and dedicated family violence programs. Specialist programs and interventions designed to help perpetrators cease their violent behaviour are also provided through men's behaviour change programs.

Victoria Police is responsible for responding to family violence incidents and taking steps to ensure the safety of victims. This can extend to issuing family violence safety notices or seeking family violence intervention orders on behalf of victims, arresting perpetrators and investigating family violence-related crimes. Legal services play an important role in ensuring that all parties understand their rights and obligations. Courts are responsible for issuing intervention orders, and for sentencing family violence offenders.

Other services and systems also work with those affected by family violence. Among them are services designed to protect the welfare of children and support families at risk or in crisis—for example, Child Protection and Integrated Family Services. Many people experiencing homelessness have been victims of family violence, and in some circumstances perpetrators are required by court orders to leave the family home. In these situations housing and homelessness services might be engaged to provide crisis accommodation or support a person in their transition to long-term, stable housing. Services for victims—including specialised services for victims of sexual assault—also play a crucial role in providing support and helping people find their way through the justice and social services systems.

Over the years there have been system-wide improvements to the way family violence is dealt with. However, elements of the family violence system response remain 'siloes' and fragmented, leading to inaccessibility and complexity for people seeking help. Increased demand has placed enormous pressure on these services, limiting the scope to clarify and improve service pathways and develop collaborative efforts.

Risk assessment and management

A consistent approach to risk assessment and risk management is vital for protecting victims' safety. Risk assessment and management mechanisms help practitioners identify whether a person might be at risk of experiencing family violence, determine the risk of the violence recurring or escalating, and initiate a tailored response aimed at reducing or mitigating that risk. All parts of the service system have an important role in identifying and knowing how to respond to family violence. Because many victims do not seek support from police or family violence services, equipping health and other universal service systems to identify family violence risk and provide support to victims and their children, is essential.

The Victorian Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (referred to as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or the CRAF), introduced in 2007, was the first framework of its kind in Australia and was one of the foundational elements of the Victorian family violence reforms implemented in the mid-2000s. One of the strengths of the system to date has been that police must conduct the CRAF-based risk assessment at family violence incident scenes.

The CRAF provides a solid basis for assessing and managing the risk of family violence, but it needs to be revised in order to redress concerns about and barriers to its effective implementation. The Victorian Government has announced that the CRAF will be reviewed. This review should be completed by the end of 2017 to ensure that the foundations are laid for the introduction of the Commission's recommended Support and Safety Hubs. The next iteration of the CRAF should include weighted indicators to allow practitioners to determine whether the level of risk is low, medium or high, to help guide the risk management response. It should also include evidence-based risk indicators specific to children.

A number of factors are impeding a shared and coordinated approach to risk assessment and risk management. Among these factors are legislative and practice obstacles to information sharing, current demand levels, the need for greater guidance about identifying and managing perpetrator risk, and missed opportunities for using service agreements and standards to require CRAF implementation by service providers. The practice guidance material that forms part of the CRAF needs to be reviewed to support the assessment of risk for all victims, including children, and to place greater emphasis on monitoring perpetrator behaviour.

To support consistent and widespread use of the CRAF, or a CRAF-aligned mechanism, the Commission recommends that the Family Violence Protection Act be amended so that prescribed agencies—such as the police, Child Protection, community and health services and Integrated Family Services—are required to align their risk assessment policies and practices with the CRAF. The government will need to ensure that adequate funding is allocated to equip workforces to adopt the revised CRAF.

Among the risk management strategies adopted in Victoria has been the development of two Risk Assessment and Management Panels, or RAMPs, providing a coordinated multi-agency approach and dedicated case management to service women and children at imminent risk of serious injury or death from family violence. The proposed roll-out of the RAMPs across the state must be completed as a matter of priority. The Commission acknowledges that a major obstacle in the way of completing this process is the need for legislative change to permit and support information sharing: we make recommendations in order to overcome this obstacle.

Managing the dangers posed by perpetrators is also achieved through effective monitoring by the police, the courts and corrections agencies. A perpetrator register scheme is being considered by other jurisdictions in Australia but, because of concerns about the effectiveness of such schemes in ensuring victim safety, and pending the results of a trial in New South Wales, the Commission does not recommend the introduction of such a register.

Information sharing

Sharing information about risk within and between organisations, is crucial to keeping victims safe. It is necessary for assessing risks to a victim's safety, preventing or reducing the risk of further harm, and keeping perpetrators 'in view' and accountable.

Despite the importance of information sharing, agencies in the family violence system do not share information routinely or systematically. A number of barriers impede organisations from sharing information, among them the complex legislation that governs privacy and information sharing, current information-sharing practices, and outdated information technology systems.

The Commission recommends the introduction of a specific family violence information-sharing regime under the Family Violence Protection Act. The purpose of the regime, which would in part be based on a successful model in New South Wales and existing information-sharing provisions relating to Child Protection, would be to provide clear authority for relevant prescribed organisations to share information.

The Commission also recommends the establishment of a Central Information Point to facilitate sharing information. This will involve the co-location of relevant agencies (such as Victoria Police) that will be able to access their respective organisations' databases to obtain and collate crucial information for managing risk. The Central Information Point would provide information, primarily about perpetrators, to the proposed Support and Safety Hubs and other key agencies so that they can engage in safety planning with the victim.

It is also necessary to clarify ways of developing an information-sharing culture; this would include producing guidance material and developing an awareness campaign. Finally, there are outdated IT systems within Victoria Police, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Corrections Victoria and the Department of Health and Human Services. These need to be improved so that the systems can communicate with each other.

Specialist family violence services

Specialist family violence services focus on keeping women and children safe and helping them recover from violence. They are an integral part of Victoria's response to family violence. The specialist family violence services sector began as a network of community-based women's refuges established in the 1970s and has expanded to provide a range of support services for women and children. These include performing risk assessments, safety planning, case management, provision of information and referrals, and advocacy for complex matters such as legal and financial affairs and health and wellbeing needs.

Underpinning the work of specialist family violence services is an understanding of the characteristics, dynamics and impacts of family violence and expertise in risk assessment and risk management. Women told the Commission they valued the support of specialist family violence services—especially when there was continuity of contact and flexibility to adapt to needs that change with time. The Commission was also told, however, that many women found the service system difficult to navigate and did not know where to start or how to find the right service. This is partly because of the complexity of referral pathways.

Demand is one of the toughest challenges facing specialist family violence services in Victoria. The number of people reporting family violence incidents to police has grown substantially in recent years, and the consequent increase in demand has had a dramatic effect on specialist family violence services, as well as on the police and the courts. The level of funding for specialist family violence services has not kept pace with the increase in demand for these services. This has led to strained and ad hoc service responses and has had a number of effects on the way services are delivered. Services have had to divert resources from case-management support to process the increased number of police referrals. This risks referrals being heavily triaged, with only the most serious being attended to. In this way, opportunities to intervene early, before the violence escalates, are lost.

In addition to demand pressures, there are shortfalls in the provision of tailored responses to victims, after-hours support, working with families when the perpetrator remains in the home, and dealing with the longer term effects of family violence. A strong message in the evidence received by the Commission was that each person's experience of family violence differs, and that people need different services and supports to recover. The current system is, however, based on program requirements rather than having the flexibility to respond to women's and children's individual needs. People called for a broader range of options to support victims of family violence, as opposed to the current 'one-size-fits all' approach.

The capacity of specialist family violence services should be increased, so that they can move from managing demand to meeting demand. An immediate funding boost for specialist family violence services—including funding to expand after-hours responses—is required. Alleviating immediate demand pressures should allow services to focus on what they do best, which is helping women and children stay safe and rebuild their lives. At the same time it should allow services to concentrate on new and better methods of service delivery, enhancing staff capability and improving access to victims who face specific barriers.

Family members and friends are often the first to become aware of family violence. It is important that the community has ready access to information and resources about how to recognise and respond to family violence. The range of materials is currently inadequate, as information is not readily accessible or sufficiently detailed to equip people to take steps to safely address the violence. For this reason, the Commission recommends that additional information for friends and family be made available through a new or existing website.

A safe home

Family violence often disrupts victims' housing security—whether they stay in their own home or need to leave and find alternative accommodation. This exacerbates the effects of the violence, adversely affects children's education, health and wellbeing, and disrupts victims' social and economic participation. It also often results in homelessness. In many cases victims feel they have no alternative but to remain in, or return to, abusive relationships.

In the past the conventional response to family violence has been for women and their children to leave home and enter crisis accommodation. There has been a more recent move to try to keep victims safe at home (when it is their choice to stay there and it is safe to do so) and to remove the perpetrator from the home instead. This approach has been accompanied by a range of initiatives (referred to as 'safe at home measures') aimed at increasing the level of security and related supports to enable victims to stay at home safely. Evaluations of safe at home measures suggest that they are most successful when they combine technologies with case management and support services and are backed up by effective risk assessment and justice responses.

Despite the potential of these approaches, the reality is that a high proportion of victims are forced to leave their homes and seek alternative accommodation. The Commission heard consistent evidence about problems with the existing housing response to family violence. The availability of crisis accommodation is limited because of capacity restraints, eligibility requirements and other barriers to access, meaning victims end up in ad hoc emergency accommodation such as motels, caravans, rooming houses and, in some areas even tents. If they do gain access to a refuge, some older style communal refuges are not well suited to accommodating a wide range of families with varying needs.

Often victims need to leave their local communities and the things that are important to them—school, work, friends, and so on—in order to be safe and find housing. The remainder of the trajectory into transitional or longer term accommodation, or both, is beset by a range of systemic problems such as a one-size-fits-all approach, limited availability of social housing stock, long waiting lists, and discrimination and lack of affordability in the private rental market.

As a consequence, the system is clogged, and many victims become stuck at the crisis or transitional stage, with no pathways out. There is an urgent need to address the housing response to family violence. The Commission recommends a 'blitz' on rehousing family violence victims who are stuck in crisis and transitional housing, and the implementation of a substantial program of individualised packages to fund rental subsidies and other associated costs that will open up access to private rental properties for people fleeing violent relationships, and support them in sustaining ongoing tenancies. Such a process will build on existing Family Violence Flexible Support Packages to usher in a new approach—one that greatly expands the range of available housing and is tailored to victims' individual circumstances, choices and goals.

The Commission also recommends substantial expansion of 'safe at home' programs throughout Victoria, measures to improve crisis accommodation options—including moving towards 'core and cluster' style refuges, phasing out the use of ad hoc crisis accommodation, and improving responses for victims with diverse needs.

Children and young people

Children experience family violence as direct victims or through witnessing it in the home; as adolescents they can also experience violence in intimate relationships. Family violence has severe short and long-term effects on children and young people. It can sometimes result in behavioural and mental health problems, disrupted schooling, homelessness, poverty, and intergenerational family violence. However, many children and young people display resilience in the face of family violence, and a range of factors engender and support this strength.

Children and young people are often described as the 'silent victims' of family violence because family violence services have historically focused on the safety and wellbeing of women (or women and their children). The Commission was informed that, despite Victoria's legal framework recognising children's right to safety and wellbeing, and specific legislative protections for children who experience family violence, the specific needs of children and young people are often overlooked. They are rarely treated as victims in their own right.

Universal services that work with children and young people—for example, maternal and child health services, early childhood services, schools and health service providers—often lack the knowledge and expertise to identify and respond when children and young people are experiencing family violence. For Integrated Family Services (including its intake point, Child FIRST), escalating demand and lack of funding and resources, combined with difficulties with referral pathways, mean that these services are failing to provide the often intensive support required by families and children who have experienced family violence. The few child and youth-centred services that exist are at capacity and not supported in any systemic way. There is also a lack of suitable accommodation for young people who are forced to leave their home, and this includes young mothers.

The right of children and young people to live free from violence should be a fundamental element of family violence policy and practice. The current family violence system fails in responding to them despite many years of advocacy by family violence services and others. The Commission makes a series of recommendations aimed at increasing the availability of therapeutic interventions, counselling and early intervention programs for children and young people and of youth-appropriate accommodation for young people escaping family violence. Other recommendations relate to engaging and supporting young people, workforce training and development, and specifically addressing the rights and needs of children and young people in updating service standards for specialist family violence services.

Family violence and the child protection system

Doctors, nurses, teachers and some others are required to report serious concerns about a child's welfare to Child Protection, which has a statutory responsibility to take steps to protect children who have suffered or are likely to suffer significant harm. Children who are subjected to violence may not reach the threshold for protective intervention. Child Protection may refer some of these children and their parents to other services, including specialist family violence services, Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services, but this does not always occur.

Some parents approach Child Protection for help for family violence, while others do not report the violence because of fear that their children will be removed. Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children are over-represented in the child protection system. Policies of child removal in these communities have contributed to the mistrust that can make Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander victims of family violence reluctant to report family violence.

Past child protection practice often required women in violent relationships to separate from a violent partner to protect their children, even though this is a time when violence often escalates. Women have borne the burden of managing risks to themselves and their children, although doing so may be impossible. Current efforts to ensure that child protection practitioners have a better understanding of family violence so that risk can be assessed and managed, and women are given appropriate support, must be strengthened. Requiring victims to make non-statutory undertakings or take other steps to monitor the behaviour of the perpetrator is misguided and ineffective. There should be no onus on victims of family violence to manage risk; it is the unacceptable nature of perpetrators' behaviour that should be the focus of attention.

Greater collaboration between Child Protection and specialist family violence services and Integrated Family Services is necessary to ensure that families experiencing family violence do not fall between the cracks. The Commission's recommendations are intended to ensure that families affected by violence are kept safe and offered appropriate support, even if the statutory threshold for Child Protection intervention is not reached.

Sexual assault and family violence

Sexual assault is a common form of family violence, recognised in the CRAF as being an indicator of heightened family violence risk. As with other forms of family violence, intra-familial sexual assault is under-reported, and women and children are overwhelmingly the victims.

Despite the fact that family violence and sexual assault often coincide, workers in the health, criminal justice and specialist family violence services often fail to ask about sexual assault, treating it as different from, and somehow separate to, other forms of family violence. There is also a 'siloing' of family violence and sexual assault service sectors, which can lead to victims having to repeat their stories multiple times, and to confusion for referral agencies and service providers as well as victims. Sexual assault service providers are experiencing high demand for their services and are inadequately resourced to help victims of sexual assault and young people displaying sexually abusive behaviours, who often have multiple and complex needs.

The Commission recommends short-term measures for encouraging a more integrated response to intra-familial sexual assault. It also recommends a comprehensive review of the family violence and sexual assault—in the longer term to consider whether these services should be fully integrated. The family violence system must take account of the co-occurrence of family violence and sexual assault. Additionally, early intervention services for children and young people displaying sexually abusive or problematic behaviours should be adequately resourced for all age groups, and the therapeutic treatment orders regime in the Children's Court should be extended to include young people aged 15 to 17 years.

Pathways to services

Victims and perpetrators of family violence gain access to and use services in many ways. The main points of entry into the system are the police, specialist family violence services, Child Protection, Child FIRST, perpetrator programs, legal services, magistrates' courts, specialist services such as sexual assault and homelessness services, and universal services such as general practitioners, maternal and child health nurses and schools. The diversity of entry points can make it difficult for people to find the full range of services that they need.

Services for people affected by family violence are not always visible to the victims or to the services that need to refer victims. The situation is made more complex by the 'siloed' nature of services that work with people affected by family violence. Although the Commission learnt of admirable examples of service collaboration and local partnerships, these relied on local relationships and initiative, rather than strong statewide and system-level arrangements. In addition, separate formal police referral pathways for victims, perpetrators and children work against a whole-of-family approach and contribute to perpetrators' lack of visibility throughout the system.

The current arrangements need to be reformed. The different pathways that victims, children and perpetrators follow should be brought together, so that the system as a whole is characterised by a much stronger eye on the perpetrator, a clearer focus on the needs of children, greater attention to the needs of the adult victim, and a simpler means for families—in all their forms—to obtain the help they need, when they need it.

In order to achieve this, the Commission recommends introducing Support and Safety Hubs in each of the 17 Department of Health and Human Services local areas. A single, area-based and highly visible intake point will make it easier for victims of family violence to find help quickly. Intake should be built around one referral for each family, accompanied by individual assessments for the perpetrator, the victim and any children. This will give services and police the information they need about the risks to, and needs of, various family members.

The hubs will replace the current 23 Child FIRST intake points, the 19 L17 contact points for specialist family violence services, and the 20 L17 contact points for men's behaviour change programs. They will not, however, replace specialist services providing casework, support and accommodation; rather, they will provide intake and initial case coordination until people are placed with those services. Specialist family violence services, Integrated Family Services and perpetrator interventions will continue to be supported to operate and deliver services in a collaborative way. Safe Steps and the Men's Referral Service will continue to receive referrals out-of-hours, and the Victims Support Agency will continue to receive police referrals for male victims.

The proposed Support and Safety Hubs build on the reforms of the mid-2000s by bringing information about the entire family to one place, ensuring that services flow according to need and that each family member receives the appropriate specialist response. For the Support and Safety Hubs to be successful, however, other reforms are essential—in particular, amending the privacy regime, reforming the CRAF, establishing a Central Information Point, rolling out the RAMPs, and undertaking comprehensive workforce planning under the recommended industry plan.

Police: front-line operations and workforce

Police are an important part of the front-line response to family violence and are often the first point of contact for family violence victims. The Commission acknowledges the enormous improvements in the Victoria Police response in the past 15 years—moving from a situation in which family violence was largely viewed as a private matter to one in which the police response is governed by the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence.

However, the police response to family violence is inconsistent in relation to, for example, risk assessment and management, charging perpetrators for contraventions of intervention orders, and data-recording and data-sharing. Problems associated with cultural norms and attitudes among some police members are also apparent.

These inconsistencies and shortcomings must be remedied by improving training and processes in relation to L17 risk assessments, reviewing and strengthening police practice in identifying the primary aggressor, and establishing a Family Violence Centre of Learning with external academic governance. A revised approach to education and training, with an emphasis on well-trained supervisors, on-the-job learning and better access to specialist family violence teams for support, advice and quality assurance, will increase members' understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence and the importance of accurate risk assessment and risk management. It will also improve their ability to deal sensitively with family violence in the general population and among marginalised groups.

To improve compliance with the Code of Practice, Victoria Police must build capacity for pro-active, comprehensive quality assurance practices through station-level random file audits and case reviews. The Commission also recommends regular independent audits of organisation-wide compliance.

Victims will not have confidence in Victoria Police's capacity to respond to family violence if the organisation itself and individual members tolerate sexism and violence against women. For this reason, the Commission endorses Victoria Police's steps to encourage cultural change in keeping with the recommendations of the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission's Independent Review into Sex Discrimination, Sexual Harassment, including Predatory Behaviour, in Victoria Police. Complementary to this, Professional Standards Command should review Victoria Police policies and procedures relating to family violence affecting its members—as both victims and perpetrators.

Police: leadership, resourcing and organisational systems

Escalating demand is placing a heavy strain on general duties police, and this is having flow-on effects for the resourcing of Victoria Police's family violence response. Recidivist family violence offenders take up a disproportionate amount of police resources, and criminal investigations often fall to general duties police. Outdated administrative and IT systems burden police with time-intensive procedures—for example, the requirement for police to personally serve intervention orders on respondents—and limit their access to vital information in the field.

While ensuring that family violence is core business for all police members, there is also a need for increased family violence specialisation, and for investigative and intelligence units and tasking and coordination committees to have a stronger focus on family violence, so that it has higher priority in resourcing decisions.

The Violence against Women and Children Strategy should be revised so that it clearly expresses the vision, strategic objectives, key actions, roles and responsibilities in Victoria Police's response to family violence. Family Violence Command should also set performance measures for policing of family violence at the regional level. The Commission recommends a stronger focus on recidivist and high-risk offenders and on improving organisational capacity for criminal family violence investigations. It also makes recommendations to strengthen family violence specialisation, provide a clear career path for police members with an interest in family violence policing, and adopt a more consistent approach to resourcing family violence teams.

Additionally, recommendations are made to lift the administrative burden on front-line police, including through deployment of mobile technology in the field. Police should continue to be tasked with undertaking personal service of intervention orders, where possible, however there might be instances where alternatives methods are appropriate.

A number of potential new powers are discussed. The Commission proposes a trial of body-worn cameras for collecting statements and other evidence from family violence incident scenes. The Commission does not recommend that police be given power to issue family violence intervention orders in the field. Instead it considers that this proposal should be revisited after five years, provided the recommendations aimed at improving the police response to family violence have been implemented and have had the desired effect.

Court-based responses to family violence in Victoria

For many victims and perpetrators of family violence, courts are central to their experience of the family violence system. Despite some improvements in recent years in the responsiveness and expertise of Victoria's state courts in responding to family violence, increases in demand have led to chronic infrastructure deficiencies and unsustainable demand on court-based professionals and services—in particular, in many of Victoria's magistrates' courts.

Many court users and court-based professionals and services expressed concern about the complexity of applying for an intervention order, access to court-based services, court safety, delays before and between hearings (which sometimes lead to serious risks to the applicant's safety and wellbeing), unevenness in magistrates' understanding of family violence, and consistency of procedures and outcomes in the courts. Additionally, some of the procedural and jurisdictional features of the courts have the potential to produce adverse consequences in family violence proceedings.

The Commission recommends that the Magistrates' Court continue its move to a more therapeutic and specialised approach to family violence that supports victims and promotes perpetrators' compliance with court orders. It proposes that within five years family violence matters should be heard in specialised courts, which should also have the ability to hear related matters involving the same family.

The Commission's recommendations seek to build on what works, and to reduce the trauma, delay and complexity of court proceedings. This will involve initiatives such as streamlining the application process and improving list management strategies, improving court infrastructure to make the court experience safer and less traumatic, increasing the use of remote witness facilities, and improving information technology so that courts are more efficient and the court workforce can focus less on throughput and manual tasks and more on serving court users and the magistracy.

Offences and sentencing

Historically, responses to family violence have been marked by a tendency to dismiss, trivialise and misunderstand family violence. In the criminal justice system this view has sometimes been manifest in a reluctance to charge or prosecute family violence-related offences and in the imposition of inadequate, inconsistent or ineffective sentences. Apart from putting women and children at risk in particular cases, these attitudes and practices, particularly when publicised, can reinforce poor community attitudes towards violence against women. There are, however, some indications that attitudes and practices are evolving.

People hold differing views about the role of sentencing in family violence crimes: some favour greater reliance on longer custodial sentences; others do not consider this a desirable or effective means of protecting the community or of punishing, deterring and rehabilitating offenders.

In the absence of comprehensive sentencing data, we do not have a clear sense of whether sentences for family violence offences are more or less severe than sentences imposed for the same offences outside the family violence context. Sentencing Advisory Council data and commentary on sentencing for breach of family violence intervention orders suggests that, despite some reported improvements in the prosecution of general and aggravated contravention offences, the Magistrates' Court continues to rely on fines and other low-end orders, even for aggravated offences.

The Commission considered potential changes to offences (including creating a distinct offence of family violence) and sentencing laws (including mandatory minimum sentences for family violence offenders), suggestions for improving bail laws, and ways of improving the collection of data on family violence-related offending, as well as the way the criminal law deals with women who commit homicide in response to family violence.

Introducing new offences and sentencing provisions often has only a symbolic effect and does not result in changes in practice. Whatever laws we have will be only as effective as those who enforce, prosecute and apply them. Improving these practices—through education, training and embedding best practice and family violence expertise in the courts—is likely to be more effective than simply creating new offences. Of course, there will be cases when a substantial term of imprisonment is necessary and appropriate. Nonetheless, evidence on the limited effectiveness of imprisonment as a means of deterring offenders, rehabilitating offenders and reducing crime is sufficient to highlight the complexity of this subject.

There is, however, scope to improve current practices and processes in relation to bail hearings and sentencing in family violence matters. The Commission recommends implementing a means to ensure that offences committed in the context of family violence are appropriately 'flagged' to inform interventions for perpetrators as well as policy and research; amending current law and practice in bail matters; and commissioning research into the improved use of existing sentencing options. Consideration should be given to the Director of Public Prosecutions identifying a suitable case in which to seek a guideline judgment from the Court of Appeal on sentencing for family violence offences.

Perpetrators

Holding perpetrators to account is a basic objective of family violence laws, policies and services. A common conceptualisation of perpetrator accountability entails keeping the perpetrator in view and responding appropriately and consistently to their conduct. This can be achieved in several ways—through rigorous risk assessment and management, through attitudinal and behaviour change interventions, or through restrictive and punitive justice system interventions and community condemnation. At a more personal level, it can also be achieved by a perpetrator gaining insight into their conduct and acknowledging its impact on their family.

The most common programmatic intervention for perpetrators in Victoria is referral to a men's behaviour change program. We do not know the extent to which existing programs are successful in changing an individual's behaviour and attitudes or in keeping victims safe. What we do know is that there are insufficient programs to cater for all men who are referred to them; there is little or no follow-up to monitor completion of a program; and there is inadequate oversight of the quality of programs or for assessing the appropriateness of the methodologies used. Existing programs do not cater for different cohorts of perpetrators and are not designed to respond to the needs of perpetrators for whom group work is unsuitable.

Confronting the factors that make perpetrators violent, including attitudes to women and community tolerance for violence, is crucial. Factors such as childhood exposure to violence, mental illness and drug and alcohol misuse can also fuel or exacerbate family violence. The Commission was told there is emerging consensus among experts about the need for perpetrator interventions that deal with both gender-related issues and other risk factors. Closer working arrangements between men's behaviour change programs and forensic, mental health and drug and alcohol services are needed for perpetrator programs to have the best prospects for success.

The Commission has concluded that there is insufficient breadth and diversity in perpetrator interventions in Victoria. More work is needed to develop a suite of interventions and programs that are implemented according to the latest knowledge and evidence about their efficacy in managing risk, achieving behaviour and attitude change, reducing re-offending and meeting the needs of victims. The interventions and programs must also be subject to an effective compliance and oversight scheme.

The Commission makes recommendations aimed at developing a more integrated approach to perpetrators of family violence; one that fosters collective responsibility among government and non-government agencies, the community and individuals for denouncing perpetrators' use of violence and expecting and helping them to cease being violent. All organisations and agencies that have contact with perpetrators need to work towards a set of common objectives and principles and need to understand and reinforce each other's roles and responsibilities in keeping victims safe.

The Commission recommends that the Victorian Government establish an expert committee to advise on perpetrator interventions. Based on that advice it should fund, trial and evaluate a range of perpetrator interventions including options that are suitable for perpetrators from diverse communities, take account of any related criminogenic factors, and focus on helping perpetrators understand the effects of violence on their children. The minimum standards for men's behaviour change programs also need to be updated; a compliance framework and accreditation process for program providers should be established; and processes for better monitoring compliance with court orders mandating attendance at behaviour change programs should be developed and implemented.

The role of the health system

Health professionals are in a unique position to identify and respond to family violence. Some victims of family violence will not contemplate engaging with a specialist family violence service but will interact with health professionals at times of heightened risk for family violence—for example, during pregnancy or following childbirth—or seek treatment for injuries or medical conditions arising from violence they have experienced. Failing to identify signs of family violence or minimising disclosures by patients can have a profound impact on victims and deter them from seeking help in the future.

A range of health services interact with people experiencing family violence, among them hospitals, general practitioners, maternal and child health services, mental health and drug and alcohol services, pharmacists and ambulance officers. There are many reasons for health professionals failing to inquire about family violence or lacking confidence in responding to disclosures: a lack of family violence training and awareness, inadequate referral options, and time pressures, for example, can all contribute to missed opportunities to intervene and offer support to victims.

A number of programs and initiatives recognise the links between family violence and health care—for example, partnerships between health and legal services, multi-disciplinary approaches and co-location of health and family violence services, research projects examining the impact of health interventions on women experiencing violence, and other tool kits and resources designed to support health-care workers. Despite these pockets of innovation and best practice, there is a lack of overall cohesion and consistency in the way health professionals respond to family violence. There is no health system-wide approach.

Most people place considerable trust in health professionals' advice. Such advice can help victims come to recognise family violence, make safety plans and gain access to the services they need. The Commission makes a range of recommendations to improve health sector responses, through strengthened screening and risk assessment procedures, greater workforce training and development, and better coordination and information sharing between different parts of the health-care system. This should be underpinned by clear political and professional leadership to ensure that awareness of, and the ability to respond to, family violence are central components of comprehensive patient care.

Recovery: health and wellbeing, financial security

The effects of family violence are severe—reducing victims' physical and mental health and wellbeing, their capacity for social and economic participation, and their ability to live free from fear. Whether the violence first occurs during the relationship, after separation or after the relationship has ended, or throughout all these stages, its effects can be long term and can damage victims' lives in many ways.

Current responses to family violence do not sufficiently emphasise recovery and restoration and may even impede it. This may be due to the historical focus on ensuring the immediate safety and security of victims of family violence and the demand pressures services are under. However, safety is only the start—the ultimate objective of the family violence system must be that victims, including children, can recover and thrive at their own pace.

Recovery requires a broad range of mutually reinforcing interventions and strategies. Whether it is bringing up children, pursuing further education, re-establishing a career or re-connecting socially, victims should be provided with the information, support and opportunities they need to rebuild their lives.

The Commission considers that three pillars of recovery—secure and affordable housing, financial security, and health and wellbeing—are essential.

The first pillar of recovery is housing. Safe and affordable housing is central to stabilising a victim's life. Without the certainty of knowing where they will live, a victim cannot plan for the future: if they are not returning home, they need to know where their children will go to school, how they themselves will get to work, or even where they might seek work. With stable accommodation they can turn their mind to rebuilding their own and their children's lives and (re)connecting with the community. The Commission recommends expanded housing assistance in the form of private rental assistance, rental subsidies and material assistance to establish a new home. Such support should be explicitly linked to consideration of education and employment assistance to build women's economic security and resilience.

The second pillar of recovery is financial security. Women who have lived with a violent partner are more likely than other women to experience financial difficulty, and many women experience poverty as a result of family violence. The associated abuse can be financial in nature (defined by law as economic abuse) or can be characterised by other forms of family violence that affect a victim's financial wellbeing. A range of factors can exacerbate victims' experience of financial insecurity—among them difficulty obtaining child support payments, tenancy problems, a lack of control over household finances, and credit, utility and car-related debt incurred by the perpetrator.

Securing paid employment can help victims of family violence become financially secure and recover from the economic and non-economic consequences of family violence. Victims should have access to education and employment assistance through the greater use and availability of individualised funding packages. The Commission also makes recommendations to improve the understanding of economic abuse, support financial literacy, address family violence-related debt, protect personal property, reform tenancy law and support long-term economic recovery.

The third pillar of recovery is health and wellbeing. The trauma of family violence can result in poor mental and physical health outcomes, increased risk of clinically-significant depression and anxiety disorders, post-traumatic stress disorder, loss of self-confidence, isolation and, for some, the misuse of alcohol and drugs. Support is crucial in allowing victims who experience family violence to begin to regain the health and wellbeing lost amidst the trauma and violence they have experienced. Evidence provided to the Commission highlighted the importance of trauma-sensitive therapeutic interventions in assisting in victims' recovery and the ability to make use of victim schemes such as the Victims Assistance Program and the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal.

The Commission recommends that the Victorian Government increase the number and range of counselling services available to victims in the state, and that the program of Flexible Family Violence Packages be expanded to facilitate greater access to counselling, psychological services and opportunities to strengthen social connections, as well as other appropriate health and wellbeing supports.

By focusing on these three pillars of recovery, the Commission's vision is for a system that responds flexibly to changing needs and diverse experiences of violence and ensures that family violence no longer defines victims or their futures.

Restorative justice

The Commission learnt that some victims of family violence are dissatisfied with current court processes or find them traumatic, often because the processes fail to adequately meet victims' needs for participation, having a voice, validation, offender accountability and restoration. A number of organisations working with family violence victims urged the Commission to consider whether a restorative justice approach to family violence should be introduced in Victoria, in addition to making essential reforms to the court system. Restorative justice processes can provide opportunities for a victim to confront the perpetrator in a safe environment to describe what impact the abuse has had on them; for the perpetrator to acknowledge the harm they have caused; and for the parties to decide what action might be taken to repair the harm.

There are a number of potential benefits associated with a restorative justice approach:

- ▶ its potential to deliver better outcomes for victims than the adversarial justice system because it is able to provide a forum for victims to be heard on their own terms and offers a process that is tailored to individual women's needs, and informed by their own choices
- ▶ its particular relevance in those cases where the victim does not wish to separate from the perpetrator but wants the abuse to stop, or where violence has been used by an adolescent against their parents
- ▶ the prospect of encouraging perpetrators to acknowledge the impacts of their behaviour and to recognise its effects on the victim.

The Commission examined this matter carefully, particularly in light of concerns that such an approach might be manipulated by perpetrators and could undermine the important gains that have been made in ensuring that family violence is treated as a public concern rather than simply a private matter between individuals.

The Commission is persuaded that, with robust safeguards in place and as an additional option for (not a substitute or precondition for) pursuing action through the courts, a restorative justice process should be made available to victims who wish to pursue such an option. Restorative justice processes have the potential to meet a broad range of victims' needs that might not always be met through the courts and to help victims recover from the impact of the abuse they have suffered.

The development of a restorative justice approach should proceed cautiously. In consultation with victims' representatives and experts in restorative justice, the Department of Justice and Regulation should develop a framework and pilot program for the delivery of restorative justice options for victims of family violence that are victim-driven, incorporate robust safeguards, are guided by international best practice, and are delivered by suitably skilled and qualified facilitators.

Adolescents who use family violence

Adolescent family violence is a distinct form of family violence; it can include child-on-parent violence, sibling violence, and problem sexual behaviour. Although the reporting of adolescent family violence has increased in recent years, it still accounts for a relatively small proportion of overall family violence incidents recorded by Victoria Police.

Adolescents' use of family violence can co-exist with family violence perpetrated by a parent or other family member and can also be a manifestation of disability, including adolescent mental ill-health.

Parents are often reluctant to report their children's behaviour to the police because of feelings of shame and self-blame or because they fear their child might get a criminal record. This can leave the parents feeling isolated and helpless.

Adolescent family violence differs from that perpetrated by adults and requires a specialist response; one that is far more comprehensive than the current patchwork of supports. At present there is no systemic response to the needs of these young people and their families, although there are a number of positive initiatives operating in local areas.

Priority should be given to early intervention therapeutic and diversionary responses. The Victorian Government is trialling a community Adolescent Family Violence Program in three locations. The program aims to increase the safety of all family members by preventing the escalation of violence, supporting parents and improving the adolescent's communication and problem-solving skills. The initial evaluation findings are positive. If the final evaluation shows success in improving victim safety and changing behaviour, this program should be made available throughout Victoria. The Victorian Government is also trialling a youth diversion program in the Children's Court: if successful, this program should also be expanded throughout Victoria.

Removal of the young person from the family home should be avoided as much as possible, but if there is no other option, the young person should be offered appropriate supported accommodation.

Family violence and the family law system

Family violence is often central to the work of the federal family law courts, which are responsible for adjudicating parenting and other disputes following partners' separation. The Commission was told of the difficulties faced by family violence victims who sometimes had to go to a magistrates' court to obtain a family violence intervention order and then go to a federal family court to resolve disputes about their children.

The fragmentation between state courts and the federal family law courts was a source of considerable concern: many people commented that their experience of family violence is given insufficient weight and consideration in the federal family law courts. Some people also feel conflicted by a desire to protect children from the harmful behaviour of the other parent, without wanting to appear unfavourable or obstructionist to a judicial decision maker. Others reported that perpetrators of violence used family court proceedings to maintain previous patterns of coercion and control.

Building on the findings of a number of previous inquiries examining the intersection of family violence and family law, the Commission makes recommendations aimed at encouraging and supporting state magistrates to exercise their family law jurisdiction and helping parties and their representatives understand the interaction between the state courts and the family law system. The Commission also recommends that the Victorian Government should pursue reforms to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) through the Council of Australian Governments.

Review of family violence-related deaths

Family violence-related deaths are the ultimate tragedy of family violence. They are not uncommon, and intimate partner homicide is the most common form.

Three principal mechanisms exist for investigating family violence-related deaths in Victoria: coronial investigations and inquests by the Coroners Court, the Systematic Review of Family Violence Deaths by the Coroners Court, and child death inquiries by the Commission for Children and Young People.

While there is scope to improve some aspects of the current approach to family violence-related death reviews, the Commission is of the view that the current framework is sound. We consider that the current criteria for requiring an inquest are sufficient to ensure that all family violence deaths are properly investigated and note that the Coroners Court recently published guidelines on this matter.

In the Commission's view the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths is a valuable way of reducing the risk of further deaths. It should be statutorily established, with funding that is sustained and adequate to ensure that the Coroners Court can expand the review.

Family violence and diversity

The Commission explored the experiences and needs of people from diverse backgrounds and communities who experience family violence. The circumstances of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, people living in rural, regional and remote communities, older people, people who are part of culturally and linguistically diverse communities, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people, people with disabilities, male victims, women prisoners and women who work in the sex industry, make their experience of family violence different to that of other members of the Victorian community. People within these communities can face multiple and intersecting barriers to reporting family violence as well as in finding appropriate help and support.

A comprehensive family violence policy must ensure better services and responses for all people who experience family violence, regardless of their background, identity or membership of a particular community.

The Commission makes a series of recommendations aimed at building and ensuring accessible, inclusive and non-discriminatory service delivery and expanding understanding of the complexity of family violence in a range of communities. In particular, we recommend that specialist bodies—Seniors Rights Victoria, InTouch Multicultural Centre against Family Violence and Women with Disabilities Victoria—be funded to provide training and advice to family violence service providers and universal services, to enable them to respond effectively to the needs of older Victorians, people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities and people with disabilities.

Practice standards should be reviewed and updated to specify providers' obligations to provide non-discriminatory services, and family violence community awareness and prevention programs should use language, imagery and messaging that reflect the diversity of the Victorian community. The industry plan for family violence prevention and response should require agencies and service providers to engage in learning and development to achieve inclusive and non-discriminatory practices and to develop the diversity of their own workforces.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples

Family violence rates among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples are higher than rates among non-Aboriginal Australians, with Aboriginal women and children at greatest risk. Not only are Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples disproportionately affected by family violence, they face unique barriers to obtaining support, whether from mainstream or from culturally appropriate services. Many Aboriginal people are apprehensive and reluctant to seek assistance from mainstream agencies, partly because of the discrimination, racism and lack of understanding some Indigenous people experience when doing so. The effects of trauma associated with dispossession, child removal and other practices also inform Aboriginal peoples' distrust of agencies such as police and Child Protection.

The Commission was informed that the family violence system—the police, the courts, specialist family violence services and men's behaviour change programs—requires a better understanding of the nature and forms of family violence in Aboriginal communities. One theme that came through strongly in the Commission's consultations was the importance of involving Aboriginal community controlled organisations and tailoring justice system responses that recognise the history and culture of Aboriginal peoples.

While progress has been made since publication of the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force in 2003 and the Indigenous Family Violence Ten Year Plan in 2008, the evidence before the Commission was that there should be more support for efforts to reduce the unacceptable levels of family violence and its devastating impacts in Aboriginal communities. Many Aboriginal people want to use Aboriginal service providers, but the full potential of Aboriginal community controlled organisations to prevent and respond to family violence has not been realised. The Commission was also told that there has been insufficient investment in culturally appropriate early intervention initiatives to strengthen families and reduce the number of Aboriginal children who are removed from their families.

Significant increased investment in these Aboriginal community controlled services—in particular, in targeted prevention and early intervention initiatives for Aboriginal communities, as well as culturally sensitive services to respond to Aboriginal families in crisis—is an urgent priority.

Older people

Older people experience various forms of family violence—intimate partner violence (which may be a continuation of earlier abuse or begin when the person is older); violence perpetrated by adult children or other family members; or violence at the hands of a carer who is in a 'family-like relationship' with them. As with people in other age groups, family violence against older people can be physical, psychological, emotional or sexual, and the majority of victims are women. Older people can, however, be at particular risk of economic or financial abuse.

Family violence against older people tends to be under-reported. Older people face particular barriers to obtaining the support they need when experiencing family violence—for example, a reluctance to report the violence because of shame, fear of not being believed, financial reliance on the perpetrator, a desire to preserve family relationships, fears about who will care for them, and problems obtaining crisis and other accommodation. Workers often have difficulty identifying and responding suitably to older people who are experiencing family violence, particularly if the person does not want to report the violence to police.

Just as prevention of family violence needs a focus on gender, prevention of family violence against older people needs to expose and respond to ageism. As long as older people are seen as less capable, dependent and not valued for their contribution to society, family violence against them will remain hidden. The Commission recommends building community and service providers' awareness about family violence against older people through targeted information campaigns and training, including consideration of risk and safety planning as part of the CRAF review, and ensuring that relevant workers complete certified training in identifying and responding to family violence. Options for a Victoria Police trial of a dedicated family violence and elder abuse response team in one local service area should also be examined.

Culturally and linguistically diverse communities

People from culturally and linguistically diverse communities are more likely than people of Anglo-Australian background to face barriers to obtaining help for family violence.

The effects of family violence experienced by people from CALD communities, including recent arrivals, are compounded by a range of factors associated with the experience of migration and resettlement, as well as systemic barriers to seeking and obtaining help. The impact of family violence on CALD victims who do not have permanent residency is particularly severe because they have very limited or no access to support and can be at greater risk of coercion and control by sponsoring spouses and other family members.

In addition to forms of family violence experienced in all communities, there are some specific forms of family violence experienced by women in some CALD communities—for example, forced marriage, female genital mutilation, and dowry-related violence. These forms of abuse are not readily recognised as constituting family violence.

Both mainstream universal services and specialist family violence services struggle to provide culturally appropriate, responsive services for CALD victims, and the services that are designed specifically for CALD victims are limited. There are also limited opportunities for men from CALD communities to participate in behaviour change programs that are culturally specific or in their own language.

The availability of professional and independent interpreting and translating services is inadequate. Professional accreditation standards for interpreters should be amended to incorporate minimum requirements relating to understanding the nature and dynamics of family violence.

The Commission makes recommendations to strengthen the capacity of mainstream and specialist services to identify and respond to the needs of family violence victims from CALD communities, to improve practices and policies relating to the use of interpreters in family violence-related cases, and to include forced marriage and dowry-related abuse as statutory examples of family violence in the Family Violence Protection Act.

Faith communities

Faith leaders and organisations have direct and influential contact with many members of the Victorian community, and their guidance and intervention are often sought when family violence is being experienced. Faith leaders can play an important role in educating communities about family violence, reinforcing community standards in relation to respect, dignity and non-violence, and providing practical advice and other assistance to people in need.

The faith leaders the Commission consulted demonstrated a strong commitment to responding to family violence that occurs in their communities. They also acknowledged, however, that they and their colleagues and communities require assistance in learning how to recognise and prevent family violence and respond appropriately. This lack of awareness and knowledge limits their ability to support those experiencing family violence.

The Commission heard that some attitudes and practices, and inadequate or ill-informed responses by faith leaders, risk exposing victims to further and sustained abuse by family members. Women experiencing family violence can face barriers to seeking help in their faith community because of particular religious beliefs—for example, about divorce or gender roles.

The Commission recommends that the Office of Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship's Multifaith Advisory Group and the Victorian Multicultural Commission, in partnership with women from faith communities and expert family violence practitioners, develop training packages on family violence and sexual assault for faith leaders and communities. This training should build on existing work, reflect leading practice in responding to family violence, and include information about referral pathways for victims and perpetrators. The Commission also acknowledges the importance of mainstream family violence services understanding and being sensitive to people's religious and cultural needs. It therefore proposes that the development of resources and revised practice standards for specialist family violence services and men's behaviour change programs be guided by advice from the Multifaith Advisory Group and from women from faith communities.

The Commission was informed about a number of initiatives led by different faith communities with the aim of preventing and responding to family violence. Building on this work, the Commission recommends that faith leaders and communities establish processes for examining the ways in which they currently respond to family violence in their communities and whether any of their practices operate as deterrents to the reporting or prevention of, or recovery from, family violence or are used by perpetrators to excuse or condone abusive behaviour.

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities

The family violence experiences of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people and the barriers they face in obtaining services are distinct from those of other victims of family violence. They also differ within these various communities. LGBTI people may also experience distinct forms of family violence, including threats to 'out' them.

Although there has been little research into family violence in LGBTI relationships, the existing research suggests that intimate partner violence may be as prevalent in LGBTI communities as it is in the general population. The level of violence against transgender and intersex people, including from parents and other family members, appears to be particularly high.

There are a variety of barriers to LGBTI people reporting and seeking help, including homophobia, transphobia and a fear of discrimination. The level of awareness of LGBTI experiences and needs is limited among police, in the courts, among service providers and in the community generally. As a result, LGBTI people can feel invisible in the family violence system.

The Commission recommends the development of LGBTI-specific resources, programs and targeted community education campaigns and identification of research priorities and effective prevention strategies. We also recommend measures to encourage service providers to adopt inclusive practices, through a review of the standards for family violence service providers. In the context of its commitment to review equal opportunity laws, the Victorian Government should also take into account concerns expressed about the potential for discrimination against LGBTI people seeking assistance in relation to family violence.

People with disabilities

Although there is no reliable data on the prevalence of family violence against people with disabilities, statistics and anecdotal evidence suggest there is a high level of violence against people with disabilities, particularly women. For some women, family violence is the direct cause of their disabilities.

People with disabilities can experience family violence from intimate partners and other family members and—as a result of the broad definition of ‘family member’ in the Family Violence Protection Act—non-related carers and co-residents in disability services in some circumstances. There are unique barriers to reporting family violence for people with disabilities, along with barriers to obtaining support (in particular access to crisis accommodation) and recovery. Disability workers are not always aware of the nature and dynamics of family violence and might not be in a position to identify it or respond effectively.

Effective responses to the unique experience of family violence for people with disabilities require family violence to feature in existing disability policy and practice frameworks, such as the State Disability Plan, the National Disability Insurance Scheme Quality and Safeguarding Framework, and disability service standards and protocols.

The Commission makes a number of recommendations about access to services for women and children with disabilities who are experiencing family violence—for example, that all refuge accommodation be made fully accessible within five years. The Commission supports the Ombudsman’s call for mandatory training for disability workers at all levels and recommends that family violence be specifically incorporated in this training. Other recommendations include: improving oversight of the disability services sector, redesigning the Victoria Police L17 form to ensure that disability information to guide service delivery is collected, improving support and accessibility for people with disabilities in courts, improving data collection at the federal and state levels, and supporting research into acquired brain injury and family violence.

Male victims

Men and women have different experiences as victims of family violence. Men are more likely to be the perpetrators of family violence in intimate partner relationships, but can also be victims of family violence. Men can also be victims of violence when they are children or as older people, and violence can be used against them by adolescent or adult children, siblings and other family members. The data suggests that responses seeking to address the highest risks to men (including homicide) should focus on the risk posed by parents, siblings and other family members, rather than by female intimate partners.

The Commission was informed about barriers to, and shortcomings in services for, male victims of family violence and heard that complaints by men about family violence are sometimes disbelieved, not taken seriously or treated with indifference. Like all victims of family violence, male victims should have their experiences acknowledged and have access to appropriate responses. There are opportunities to improve the understanding of male victims and services for them.

The Commission concluded that, although resources should not be diverted from women and children, who constitute the majority of victims, the family violence system needs to respond more supportively to male victims of family violence. The Commission recommends that in identifying and responding to the needs of family violence victims, the Victorian Government should take steps to identify and take account of the needs of male victims—including male children, older men who are victims of elder abuse by family members, and gay, bisexual and transgender men.

Rural, regional and remote communities

Family violence is more prevalent in some rural, regional and remote communities than in metropolitan areas. The problems it presents in metropolitan Melbourne are exacerbated in the state's rural, regional and remote communities as a result of isolation, cultural factors and service limitations. Victims can be reluctant to seek help when the police, court staff and the relevant services know the perpetrator. Intertwined with this can be a fear that the victim's (or the perpetrator's) circumstances will become more widely known in their community and could result in ostracism.

There is an increasing awareness of family violence in non-urban communities and a growing commitment to seeking to prevent and respond to it. Various plans and initiatives are in progress, many of them initiated and led by the local communities themselves. The social connectedness and resilience in rural, regional and remote communities offer great potential. At the same time, these communities face significant challenges in addressing family violence that demand an active and adequately resourced response.

The Commission heard that dispersed populations and the long distances between population centres in rural, regional and remote communities mean that in some areas specialist family violence services are available only on a part-time basis or if the victim has the ability to travel long distances. This can result in what is effectively a denial of service. No matter how desirable it might be, ensuring that there are stand-alone specialist family violence services in every non-metropolitan community would be financially prohibitive. For this reason the Commission recommends that universal services that already have good geographic coverage in these communities—such as health practitioners, maternal and child health services, hospitals, schools and other education providers—be supported to build their capacity to respond to family violence. Many of these universal services already have a broad reach across their communities and, with support from people with relevant specialist knowledge, they could build on their existing reputation and networks to improve outcomes in rural, regional and remote communities.

Effective and strategic use of technology has the potential to assist in disseminating information and providing services to victims of family violence and to communities. Government and service providers should consider funding technological solutions to better meet the specific needs of these communities, as well as ensuring that communications technology infrastructure is in place to support this.

The Statewide Family Violence Action Plan proposed by the Commission should take account of, and give priority to addressing, the particular difficulties and needs of those experiencing family violence in rural, regional and remote communities when formulating policies, planning, developing structures and allocating funding. The government should foster collaboration between services in rural, regional and remote communities through flexible contractual and funding arrangements.

Women in prison

Family violence is experienced in the childhood and early years of many women in prison and can disproportionately affect them in their adult life. Women can be imprisoned as a result of the direct and indirect effects of family violence: some women might commit crimes as a result of a history of childhood violence or other trauma or under duress or coercion from a violent partner. Their partner may pursue them while they are in prison or they may be at risk of violence when they leave. Women in these situations need support while they are in prison, to help them overcome the effects of trauma and avoid re-offending.

Understanding the circumstances that contribute to the incarceration of women who have experienced family violence is important, in part because it casts light on the specific difficulties they can face in prison. The Commission recommends that further efforts be made to identify women prisoners with a history of family violence, so that they can be offered support to deal with trauma and other effects of violence.

Serving time in prison can disrupt efforts to promote recovery from previous family violence. More therapeutic initiatives and support programs that can support victims' recovery from family violence are needed in prisons. The continued provision of a wide range of programs for female prisoners by Corrections Victoria in the prison environment requires both adequate funding and continued support.

On release from prison, victims of family violence often experience risks to their safety and recovery, in addition to the challenges experienced by all prisoners. The Commission recommends that Corrections Victoria refer women to relevant family violence services and inform post-release support services if a prisoner has a history of family violence, so that post-release accommodation arrangements do not place the prisoner at risk. Similarly, planning for the release of male perpetrators from prison should ensure that their family members are not placed at further risk of violence.

Women working in the sex industry

Women who work in the sex industry who have experienced family violence face particular challenges when seeking support, as a result of stigma and discrimination. Research and anecdotal evidence suggest that some women enter the sex industry as a consequence of experiencing family violence and are more likely to be exposed to violence while working in the industry.

The effect of family violence on sex workers' health and wellbeing can be particularly severe. These women require specific policy and practice interventions to give them access to the supports and services they need. It is important these services recognise the diversity of experience of women who work in the sex industry.

There are serious shortcomings in how police and the family violence system respond to the experience of women who work in the sex industry. In light of this, the Commission recommends that Victoria Police amend its Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to describe the additional challenges faced by women who work in the sex industry when reporting family violence to the police, and how to provide support when investigating family violence perpetrated against these women.

Prevention

Preventing family violence is essential for the health and wellbeing of our community and requires widespread cultural change. There are no 'quick fixes': a long-term perspective and sustained effort and investment are needed. This is one of the most complex and intractable problems confronting the Victorian Government and the Victorian community.

If we do not tackle the problem of family violence at its source and become better at preventing it from occurring in the first place, communities and the systems that support them—police, courts and other services—will continue to be overwhelmed. We need to give as much attention to prevention as we do to the other parts of the family violence system.

Leadership from the Victorian Government is essential, but action by the government alone will not be sufficient. To create a culture of non-violence and gender equality, ordinary Victorians must come together to change attitudes and behaviours. Everyone in the community has a role to play—individuals and all types of organisations.

One of the most consistent messages received by the Commission concerned the opportunity to use the education of children and young people to prevent family violence in the future. In all the community consultations with victims of family violence, specific communities and people who work in family violence-related fields, throughout metropolitan Melbourne and in rural, regional and remote Victoria, people stressed the value of teaching children and young people about respectful and healthy relationships.

Respectful Relationships Education in schools should be enhanced and be made a mandatory part of the curriculum in every school and at all year levels. This is a unique and important opportunity to help us move towards a family violence-free society. Done well, this will be a flagship component of the Victorian Government's family violence prevention strategy, but successful implementation will require careful phasing, substantial training and support for schools, and monitored implementation within a whole-of-school approach.

Involving communities in the task of preventing family violence is also essential. Whether communities are defined by a geographic place, a workplace, or a population group with a shared ethos and interests, the culture they establish can have a powerful influence on the behaviour of individuals. Cultural change will not happen without community-led prevention action.

Prevention strategies so far have focused mainly on dealing with addressing gender inequality by, among other things, challenging gender norms and attitudes towards women. Prevention programs also aim to develop and promote respectful relationships generally, to change broader social attitudes to the use of violence, and to create home environments that model for children non-violent and respectful behaviour. On this basis, measures that have been developed to prevent intimate partner violence against women provide the foundations for preventing other forms of family violence—such as abuse of children, older people, parents and siblings—but more work is needed to augment our understanding of how best to prevent these specific forms of violence.

Prevention programs are most effective when they form part of a coordinated approach. The Commission therefore recommends that the Victorian Government adopt a prevention strategy as a priority component of a Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. That strategy should be implemented in the 12 months following the delivery of this report. It should be aligned to the government's proposed Gender Equality Strategy. In addition, a mechanism for overseeing family violence prevention work in Victoria should be established, providing specialist advice and support to government and the community.

The workplace

Workplaces reflect the breadth and diversity of the community and offer an important opportunity to reach people who are affected by family violence, to provide support for them, and to help them take steps to secure their safety. They are also important sites for preventing and responding to family violence because the effects of violence reach into workplaces and because attitudes and cultures that prevail in workplaces can influence the level to which violence against women is supported or condoned.

The Commission supports workplace-based initiatives to prevent and respond to family violence. Much work has been done to harness workplaces' capacity to deal with such violence, including through the introduction in some workplaces of an entitlement to paid family violence leave and programs to help individual staff and managers recognise and respond to the signs that an employee might be experiencing violence at home. Such programs also offer an opportunity to build a respectful and gender-equitable workplace culture.

The Commission recommends that the Victorian Government model best-practice workplace policies. It should ensure that its plan to include family violence leave in all public sector enterprise agreements is accompanied by access to suitable support services and is supported by adequate training for managers and staff. The Victorian Government should implement policies and programs to equip staff to recognise and respond to signs of family violence and to build a respectful and equitable workplace culture. The Commission also identifies ways in which the government can encourage and support all non-government workplaces in taking action to prevent and respond to family violence. The Commission recommends that the government support moves to introduce a mandated entitlement to family violence leave in workplace relations laws, make relevant tools and resources available to workplaces through an online portal, and investigate options for using regulatory frameworks, such as those relating to occupational health and safety and equal opportunity, to support all Victorian employers in implementing best-practice family violence policies.

Sustainable and certain governance

Governance arrangements—the structures and processes designed to oversee system performance and policy development and implementation—take on particular importance in the family violence setting. Family violence is a complex problem, so there is no discrete, stand-alone system that can take responsibility for effectively preventing and responding to it. Instead, a number of overlapping systems, involving a broad range of government and non-government agencies working together in a coordinated manner, are required. If these overlapping systems are not underpinned by strong governance arrangements, family violence reforms will be ineffective. At the systemic level, family violence policy can ‘fall between the gaps’ and fail to attract the policy attention and investment it requires and deserves. Individuals seeking to engage with agencies or services can be confronted by unnecessary complexity, confusion, duplication, service gaps or inconsistent practices that might compromise their safety or compound the effects of the violence, or both.

In Victoria, governance arrangements underpinning the family violence system to encourage greater coordination and integration were established in the mid-2000s and have evolved both centrally and regionally since that time. Family violence is now a matter considered at various levels of government, including in Cabinet and at regular meetings of departmental secretaries. Family violence regional integration committees, consisting of people working in the broader service sector, police and others, have been established to support coordinated responses at the local level.

Despite these developments and the growing focus on family violence, the Commission was told that responsibility for family violence remains fragmented and diffused across different government departments and agencies. There is a lack of accountability, oversight and clear and shared goals for the system. The lack of collective ownership has contributed to family violence falling to the margins in policy making and investment decisions, without any means of measuring and evaluating the performance of the system as a whole. This has created uncertainty and dislocation in the service sector, which ultimately affects victims.

The Commission recommends a governance framework that makes family violence—particularly victims’ views and experiences—a central consideration for all levels of government, including local councils, provides strong leadership and supports effective and coordinated strategies to address family violence. The framework should be characterised by the following:

- ▶ a bi-partisan standing parliamentary committee on family violence
- ▶ a Cabinet standing sub-committee chaired by the Premier of Victoria
- ▶ a requirement for all ministers to report regularly on the risks and opportunities in their portfolio relevant to family violence
- ▶ Victorian Secretaries Board oversight of government administration arrangements for family violence policy
- ▶ a family violence unit located in the Department of Premier and Cabinet
- ▶ a Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee and Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum
- ▶ family violence regional integration committees supported by regional integration coordinators
- ▶ an independent Family Violence Agency established by statute
- ▶ mechanisms for ensuring that the voices of victims are heard and are used to guide policy development and service delivery.

The Commission recommends that the Victorian Government prepare a Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, to guide implementation of the Commission’s recommendations. A new Family Violence Agency should be established to monitor and report on implementation of the recommendations in this report and of the Action Plan. The Family Violence Agency would also have functions relating to the provision of expert advice on family violence, applied research, policy and evidence reviews, and the capacity to conduct own-motion inquiries into the operation of the family violence system.

Data, research and evaluation

There are serious gaps in our knowledge about the characteristics of victims and perpetrators of family violence and about how the systems that respond to such violence are working. These gaps restrict the government's ability to respond to family violence effectively and to plan for the future, and could well result in ineffective or wasteful expenditure on some responses and insufficient expenditure on others. They also inhibit attempts to direct prevention and early intervention initiatives to areas where action is needed most.

Some of the current data gaps and deficiencies relate to individuals. These include a failure to record experiences of family violence in different settings and difficulty tracing individual journeys through the system, poor recording of demographic information and limitations in survey data, a lack of focus on children, and limited data on perpetrators of family violence. Other deficiencies relate to the departments, agencies and services that deal with family violence—a focus on outputs rather than outcomes, inconsistencies in the quality and regularity of evaluation, and difficulties measuring change, unmet demand and prevention initiatives. Collectively, shortcomings in these areas make it difficult for government and service providers to assess how many people in Victoria are experiencing family violence, what the precise nature of their experiences are, and how they can best be assisted.

The Commission recommends improved governance of data collection practices and standards, and the development of shared outcomes—among other things, to facilitate implementation of the Victorian Government's proposed Family Violence Index. The Commission also recommends the improvement of existing resources (such as the Victorian Family Violence Database), introduction of better evaluation practices, and the continuation of support for national research into family violence.

Industry planning

Family violence touches the lives of tens of thousands of Victorians, yet there has never been a comprehensive assessment of the other workforce needs of the specialist family violence system or the implications for workforces such as the police and the legal, health, human services, Child Protection and education systems.

For too long family violence has been treated as marginal to human services and other systems. If the community is serious about addressing family violence, and if the recommendations of this Commission are to be implemented, there must be investment in the people who work directly with victims and perpetrators. They are fundamental to the success of our reforms.

There are problems associated with high demand and urgent need across the system, and the Commission particularly acknowledges the commitment, knowledge and expertise of the hundreds of practitioners who respond to these demands and this need each day. To build on their work, the Commission proposes that the Victorian Government develop and implement a 10-year industry plan to deal with ongoing shortcomings. For example, in the case of specialist services, the plan should address qualifications, remuneration, career paths, and vicarious trauma. The plan should also build practice that is sensitive to diversity and rewards collaboration across sectors.

The industry plan must take account of family violence capability in the justice, health, education and human services areas in recognition that all these professions have a role to play in addressing family violence. The Commission also makes a number of recommendations about important actions that can be taken in the short term to build capability throughout legal, family violence and universal services as well as non-family violence-specific services, and to improve service delivery for both victims and perpetrators.

Investment

Although we do not know the full cost of family violence to the Victorian Government's budget, it is clear that the economic and social costs of family violence are substantial. The government advised the Commission that it allocated $80.6 million for specialist family violence services and prevention programs in 2014–15. This figure does not take into account the costs incurred by other service systems that respond to family violence—such as the courts, police, Child Protection, child and family services, hospitals and Corrections. The government does not have a method for calculating those costs.

Funding for specialist family violence and other relevant services has not kept pace with the substantial growth in demand that has arisen as a result of greater awareness and reporting of family violence. This has resulted in a system that is under great pressure—with scarce resources diverted to managing referrals and reduced capacity to provide vital assistance to victims, their children and perpetrators.

This deficiency in funding partly reflects inadequate planning to guide investment decisions. There is no routine or robust forecasting of the extent of family violence services required. The bulk of specialist family violence funding focuses on incident response: prevention and recovery are poorly funded. Adequate investment in both these areas should be viewed as offering an opportunity to create savings in the longer term.

In addition to inadequate funding, the Commission found that budget processes render family violence expenditure invisible in the state budget: there are almost no performance measures to show how the government's investment is tracking. Additionally, at the contractual level, funding arrangements are complex and fail to meet the needs of the system they are designed to serve.

The Commission proposes changes to budget structures and departmental processes to make expenditure on family violence more transparent and to facilitate measurement of the efficacy of policies and programs across government, as well as in contractual arrangements with providers.

The Commission calls for an immediate increase in funding to prevent family violence, help victims recover, and help perpetrators change their behaviour. Longer term investment should be determined by a robust modelling of demand, service and funding requirements. The funding required to adequately meet demand and implement the Commission's proposed reforms will be substantial. This might require government to reconsider its funding priorities, to explore the possibility of entering into partnership agreements with the Commonwealth Government in areas of overlapping responsibility, or to identify new revenue sources to contribute towards funding the reforms. It is the Commission's view that there would be widespread support in the Victorian community for increasing the investment in immediate and tangible family violence reforms.

Recommendations

Risk assessment and management

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 1

The Victorian Government review and begin implementing the revised Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or the CRAF) [by 31 December 2017] in order to deliver a comprehensive framework that sets minimum standards and roles and responsibilities for screening, risk assessment, risk management, information sharing and referral throughout Victorian agencies. The revised framework should incorporate:

- ▷ a rating and/or weighting of risk factors to identify the risk of family violence as low, medium or high
- ▷ evidence-based risk indicators that are specific to children
- ▷ comprehensive practice guidance.

The framework should also reflect the needs of the diverse range of family violence victims and perpetrators, among them older people, people with disabilities, and people from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander, culturally and linguistically diverse and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities.

Recommendation 2

The Victorian Government amend the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) [within 12 months] so that it:

- ▷ empowers the relevant minister or secretary to approve a Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (and roles and responsibilities, standards and practices under it) for family violence risk assessment in Victoria
- ▷ sets out the principle that 'prescribed organisations' and agencies contracted by the Victorian Government to provide family violence services (if not otherwise prescribed organisations) are required to align their risk assessment policies, procedures, practices and tools with the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework as approved by the relevant minister or secretary.

Recommendation 3

The Victorian Government implement the revised Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework and develop a sustained workforce development and training strategy as part of the recommended family violence industry plan [from 1 January 2018]. The framework should provide for:

- ▷ minimum standards and core competencies to guide identifying, risk assessment and risk management practice in family violence specialist services, mainstream services and universal services
- ▷ whole-of-workforce training for priority sectors—including general practitioners and hospital, mental health, drug and alcohol, child protection, aged care and disability workers—that takes into account and aligns with their roles and standards of practice.

Recommendation 4

The Victorian Government facilitate the roll-out of the Risk Assessment and Management Panels, or RAMPs, as a priority [within 12 months], ensuring that this includes:

- ▷ adequate resourcing and support—case management and links to long-term support
- ▷ standardised referral guidance, to be used by all agencies, that is aligned to the revised Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework to identify high-risk cases for referral to RAMPs
- ▷ organisational and practice guidelines for effective RAMP operation, supported by a targeted workforce development and training program
- ▷ processes for supporting oversight by Regional Family Violence Integration Committees
- ▷ implementation oversight by the Cabinet Family Violence Sub-committee and the Victorian Secretaries Board Family Violence Sub-committee.

Information sharing

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 5

The Victorian Government amend the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to create a specific family violence information-sharing regime [within 12 months]. The new regime should be consistent with the guiding principles and design elements described in this report.

Recommendation 6

The Victorian Secretaries Board Family Violence Sub-committee oversee a working group consisting of representatives of 'prescribed organisations' covered by the recommended information-sharing regime and the Office of the Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner [within 12 months of the legislative amendments]. The working group should:

- ▶ identify priority areas for the development of an information-sharing culture throughout the family violence system
- ▶ develop an awareness campaign to explain the new information-sharing regime to prescribed organisations
- ▶ coordinate the production of any guidelines or guidance material created to support the new information-sharing regime and help prescribed organisations put their information-sharing arrangements into operation
- ▶ help prescribed organisations update information-sharing protocols and memorandums of understanding and deliver internal training on information sharing.

Recommendation 7

The Victorian Government establish a secure Central Information Point. Led by Victoria Police, it should consist of a co-located multi-disciplinary team with representatives from Victoria Police, the courts (registry staff), the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Justice and Regulation (Corrections Victoria) who are authorised to obtain information from their respective databases [by 1 July 2018]. A summary of this information should be available to the Risk Assessment and Management Panels, the recommended Support and Safety Hubs, the 24-hour crisis telephone service Safe Steps and the Men's Referral Service to permit effective assessment and management of risk in individual cases.

Recommendation 8

The Victorian Secretaries Board ensure that proposed upgrades to key Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Victoria Police, Corrections Victoria and Department of Health and Human Services information technology systems equip these systems [by 1 July 2018] to:

- ▶ share information for the purposes of risk assessment and management in individual cases of family violence
- ▶ permit the use of system data for the purpose of evaluating the effectiveness of outcomes from implementation of the Commission's recommendations and the recommended Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
- ▶ participate in the Central Information Point.

Recommendation 9

The Victorian Government examine options for the development of a single case-management data system to enable relevant agencies to view and share risk information in real time [within 12 months].

Specialist family violence services

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 10

The Victorian Government expand an existing website or create a new website [within two years], to provide information for:

- ▷ victims of all forms of family violence—including victims who face particular barriers to obtaining help—about where and how they can seek help
- ▷ families, friends and community networks, to help them recognise family violence, support victims and support perpetrators who are seeking help to change their behaviour.

This information should relate to both help during the crisis period and recovery in the longer term.

Recommendation 11

The Victorian Government provide additional funding for specialist family violence support services to deal with the current crisis in demand and to ensure that victims of family violence receive appropriate support [within 12 months].

Recommendation 12

Pending the establishment of the recommended Support and Safety Hubs, the Victorian Government expand funding for after-hours responses—including the capacity to activate a face-to-face crisis response when required—in each of the 17 Department of Health and Human Services regions [within 12 months].

A safe home

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 13

The Victorian Government give priority to supporting victims in safely remaining in, or returning to, their own homes and communities through the expansion of Safe at Home-type programs across Victoria [within two years]. These programs should incorporate rental and mortgage subsidies and any benefits offered by advances in safety devices, with suitable case management as well as monitoring of perpetrators by police and the justice system.

Recommendation 14

The Victorian Government increase the number and range of crisis and emergency accommodation that is available by using a wider range of service models—including head leasing of premises—with priority being given to rural, regional and remote areas [within 12 months].

Recommendation 15

The Victorian Government support service providers in phasing out the communal refuge model [by 31 December 2020] and replacing it with accommodation that promotes safety, is accessible to people with disabilities, provides private units and enables connections with the community, work and school (core and cluster model). To facilitate the transition, the Victorian Government should provide a capital fund to assist service providers with business case development, design options and implementation (including construction of redesigned accommodation) and fund interim arrangements to avoid loss in service delivery during refurbishment or redevelopment.

Recommendation 16

The Department of Health and Human Services review the contractual arrangements (including funding levels) for crisis supported accommodation to remove barriers for particular groups, such as women with no income and women and children with disabilities [within 12 months].

Recommendation 17

The Victorian Government expand the provision of Family Violence Flexible Support Packages [within 12 months]. These packages should provide to victims assistance beyond the crisis period and should include longer term rental and mortgage subsidies where required, along with assistance for costs associated with securing and maintaining counselling, wellbeing, education, employment, financial counselling and other services designed to assist housing stability and financial security.

Recommendation 18

The Victorian Government give priority to removing current blockages in refuge and crisis accommodation and transitional housing, so that victims of family violence can gain stable housing as quickly as possible and with a minimum number of relocations, are not accommodated in motels and other ad hoc accommodation, and spend on average no longer than six weeks in refuge and crisis accommodation [within two years].

Recommendation 19

The Victorian Government establish a Family Violence Housing Assistance Implementation Task Force consisting of senior representatives from the public and commercial housing sectors and family violence specialists [within 12 months]. The task force, which should report through the Minister for Housing to the Cabinet Family Violence Sub-committee, should:

- ▷ oversee a process designed to remove blockages in access to family violence crisis accommodation by rapidly rehousing family violence victims living in crisis and transitional accommodation
- ▷ design, oversee and monitor the first 18-month phase of the proposed expanded Family Violence Flexible Support Packages (including rental subsidies)
- ▷ quantify the number of additional social housing units required for family violence victims who are unable to gain access to and sustain private rental accommodation
- ▷ subject to evaluation of the proposed expanded Family Violence Flexible Support Packages, plan for the statewide roll-out of the packages (including rental subsidies) and the social housing required.

Recommendation 20

The Victorian Minister for Housing, Disability and Ageing report annually to the Parliamentary Committee on Family Violence [within two years] on:

- ▷ the extent of unmet housing demand among people affected by family violence—including the average and range of current stays by women and children in crisis and transitional accommodation
- ▷ progress in meeting the benchmark of six weeks in crisis accommodation
- ▷ proposed actions for meeting the continuing housing demand from people affected by family violence.

Children and young people’s experience of family violence

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 21

The Victorian Government ensure that all refuge and crisis accommodation services catering to families have adequate resources to meet the particular needs of the children they are accommodating, including access to expert advice and secondary consultations in supporting children [within 12 months].

Recommendation 22

The Victorian Government amend the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to establish a rebuttable presumption that, if an applicant for a family violence intervention order has a child who has experienced family violence, that child should be included in the applicant’s family violence intervention order or protected by their own order [within 12 months].

Recommendation 23

The Victorian Government give priority to funding therapeutic interventions and counselling—including age-appropriate group work—for children and young people who are victims of family violence [within two years]. In particular:

- ▶ The Homeless Children’s Specialist Support Service (or a program with similar features) should be extended beyond four service areas to be available statewide and be available to specialist family violence services.
- ▶ Eligibility for the Take Two program and similar intensive therapeutic programs should be introduced for children and young people affected by trauma associated with family violence who are not in the statutory child protection system.

Recommendation 24

The Victorian Government support and fund youth homelessness and other youth services providers in developing and implementing a broader range of supported accommodation options for young people experiencing family violence [within two years].

Family violence and the child protection system

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 25

The Department of Health and Human Services, together with Victoria Police, develop and strengthen its current practice guidelines to facilitate further engagement with perpetrators of family violence [within 12 months] with the aim of:

- ▷ exhausting all efforts to interview the alleged perpetrator of the violence
- ▷ protecting the safety of child protection practitioners who must work with alleged perpetrators of family violence
- ▷ developing 'feedback loops' with Victoria Police and other relevant agencies—including the recommended Support and Safety Hubs, once established—in order to obtain and share information about family violence perpetrators and so assist with risk assessment and risk management.

Recommendation 26

The Department of Health and Human Services develop and strengthen practice guidelines and if necessary propose legislative amendments to require Child Protection—in cases where family violence is indicated in reports to Child Protection and is investigated but the statutory threshold for protective intervention is not met—[within 12 months] to:

- ▷ ensure the preparation of a comprehensive and robust safety plan, either by Child Protection or by a specialist family violence service
- ▷ make formal referrals for families to relevant services—including specialist family violence services, family and child services, perpetrator interventions, and the recommended Support and Safety Hubs, once established
- ▷ make formal referrals for children and young people to specialist services—including counselling services—if children or young people are affected by family violence or use violence.

Recommendation 27

The Department of Health and Human Services revise and strengthen its risk management practice guidelines and procedures for circumstances when a report to Child Protection has indicated the presence of family violence [within 12 months]. Practice and procedural guidelines should be updated to require the child protection practitioner to:

- ▷ without delay, obtain from Victoria Police and any specialist family violence service all police referrals (L17 forms) and the results of any risk assessments that have been performed in relation to the child who is the subject of the report and their parents or other relevant family members
- ▷ ensure that the full text of any risk assessment is recorded in the Child Protection Service's Crisis Referral Information System notes
- ▷ without delay, provide to Victoria Police the results of any risk assessment completed by the department that indicates a risk of family violence to a child or young person, so as to support Victoria Police in bringing an application for a family violence intervention order in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria. The department should ask that police provide feedback on whether an application to the court has been made.

Recommendation 28

Pending finalisation of the recommended information-sharing regime, the Department of Health and Human Services liaise with the Magistrates' Court of Victoria to develop an information-sharing protocol to ensure that, when a parent seeks a new or amended family violence intervention order or Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) order in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, information held by the department in relation to family violence risk is provided to the court [within 12 months]. Where necessary, a child protection practitioner should be made available to give evidence.

Recommendation 29

The Department of Health and Human Services require child protection practitioners to participate in training and professional development about the nature and dynamics of family violence and the department's practice guidelines dealing with family violence.

Recommendation 30

The Victorian Government amend section 327 of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) to require the Director of Public Prosecutions to approve a prosecution for the offence in cases where the alleged offender is a victim of family violence and consider legislative amendments to reconcile section 327 of the Crimes Act and section 493 of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) [within 12 months].

Sexual assault and family violence

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 31

The Victorian Government ensure funding of specialist family violence and sexual assault services to facilitate their collaboration [within two years] by:

- ▷ promoting and, if necessary, resourcing shared casework models
- ▷ establishing secondary consultation pathways
- ▷ participating in the recommended Support and Safety Hubs
- ▷ developing guidelines and protocols for facilitating information sharing
- ▷ participating in joint education and training.

Recommendation 32

The Victorian Government review [within five years] family violence and sexual assault services to determine whether and, if so, how family violence and sexual assault responses should be unified.

Recommendation 33

The Victorian Government ensure that the Sexually Abusive Behaviours Treatment Service and other suitable treatment programs are available for all age groups up to and including 17-year-olds and resource enhanced delivery of the programs across Victoria [within two years].

Recommendation 34

The Victorian Government amend the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) to extend the therapeutic treatment order regime to young people aged 15 to 17 years, so that the Children's Court of Victoria can order attendance at appropriate programs [within two years].

Pathways to services

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 35

Pending the establishment of the recommended Support and Safety Hubs, the Victorian Government provide additional resources to ensure that the costs of processing and responding to police referrals (L17 forms) received by women's specialist family violence service L17 referral points are fully and discretely funded [within 12 months].

Recommendation 36

Pending the establishment of the recommended Support and Safety Hubs, the Victorian Government ensure that Integrated Family Services has sufficient resources to respond to families experiencing family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 37

The Victorian Government introduce Support and Safety Hubs in each of the state's 17 Department of Health and Human Services regions [by 1 July 2018]. These hubs should be accessible and safe locations that:

- ▷ receive police referrals (L17 forms) for victims and perpetrators, referrals from non-family violence services and self-referrals, including from family and friends
- ▷ provide a single, area-based entry point into local specialist family violence services, perpetrator programs and Integrated Family Services and link people to other support services
- ▷ perform risk and needs assessments and safety planning using information provided by the recommended statewide Central Information Point
- ▷ provide prompt access to the local Risk Assessment and Management Panel
- ▷ provide direct assistance until the victim, perpetrator and any children are linked with services for longer term support
- ▷ book victims into emergency accommodation and facilitate their placement in crisis accommodation
- ▷ provide secondary consultation services to universal or non-family violence services
- ▷ offer a basis for co-location of other services likely to be required by victims and any children.

Recommendation 38

The Victorian Government, in establishing the Support and Safety Hubs, provide additional funding [within three years] to allow for:

- ▷ co-design of the hubs with local providers
- ▷ appropriate infrastructure, including technology
- ▷ establishment of integrated intake teams with expertise in family violence, family and children's services, and perpetrator assessment
- ▷ appointment of an advanced family violence practitioner to provide practice leadership and secondary consultation
- ▷ capacity to activate an after-hours face-to-face crisis response where required
- ▷ provision of secondary consultation by other specialist organisations, including Aboriginal community controlled organisations, to the intake team.

Recommendation 39

The Victorian Government, on the basis of demand forecasting, provide sufficient funds to specialist family violence services and Integrated Family Services to allow them to support people referred by a Support and Safety Hub, maintain their safety and help them until their situation has stabilised and they have the support necessary to rebuild and recover from family violence [by 1 July 2018].

Recommendation 40

The Victorian Government revise relevant policy frameworks and service standards in the light of the new Support and Safety Hubs and the redesigned service system. This includes revising standards for family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs) and key health and human services that respond to family violence, as well as the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence [by 1 July 2018].

Police: front-line operations and workforce

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 41

Victoria Police amend the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to ensure that it provides suitable guidance on identifying family violence primary aggressors [within 12 months]. This includes:

- ▷ procedures for amending the Law Enforcement Assistance Program (LEAP) when a service provider or a Support and Safety Hub subsequently informs Victoria Police that a person is not the primary aggressor
- ▷ provision of details of specialist support available to assist in identifying the primary aggressor.

Victoria Police should provide training at all appropriate levels on the amended requirements relating to identifying primary aggressors.

Recommendation 42

Victoria Police establish a Family Violence Centre of Learning with external academic governance to improve family violence education at all levels in the organisation [within two years].

Recommendation 43

Victoria Police ensure that specialist family violence position holders perform regular random file and case reviews in order to monitor compliance with the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence and other important procedural requirements relating to family violence—for example, in relation to investigations of contraventions of family violence intervention orders. Victoria Police should set timing targets for these file and case reviews [within 12 months].

Recommendation 44

The Victorian Government and Victoria Police establish a regular cycle of comprehensive and independent audits of Victoria Police's compliance with the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence. The results of the audits should be published, and include, among other things, any divisional variation and the measures that will be taken to resolve any concerns.

Recommendation 45

Victoria Police's Professional Standards Command review Victoria Police policies and procedures relating to police employees and family violence [within 12 months]. The review should consider:

- ▷ the adequacy of and any necessary improvements to current policies and procedures
- ▷ best-practice approaches and model policies developed in other Australian jurisdictions and internationally
- ▷ potential synergies with Victoria Police's response to the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission's independent review of sex discrimination and sexual harassment in Victoria Police.

Police: leadership, resourcing and organisational systems

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 46

Victoria Police revise its Violence Against Women and Children Strategy and amend it to cover all forms of family violence, a diverse range of victims and all areas of operations and governance [within 12 months].

Recommendation 47

Victoria Police develop a new family violence performance management and reporting framework, with a broader range of quantitative and qualitative performance measures [within 12 months] against which it reports annually and publicly, on a statewide, regional and divisional basis.

Recommendation 48

Victoria Police's Family Violence Command set performance measures for policing of family violence at regional levels, taking into account demand for family violence policing at police service area and divisional levels. Regional assistant commissioners should report to the Chief Commissioner of Police and Executive Command through the Family Violence Command against these performance measures [within 12 months].

Recommendation 49

Victoria Police adapt its career structures to reflect family violence as core business [within two years] by:

- ▷ providing an organisational structure for specialist family violence positions
- ▷ providing a clear career progression path for members who have a continuing interest in family violence policing—including through gazetting additional positions
- ▷ having positions with appropriate ranks to represent family violence policing in key operational and strategic management forums and processes
- ▷ ensuring that resourcing models and processes enable police in specialist family violence roles to perform their functions
- ▷ considering involving non-sworn employees with relevant skills in incident response
- ▷ recruiting personnel from a broader range of disciplines—such as social work, psychology or specialist family violence services.

Recommendation 50

Victoria Police's Family Violence Command develop a core set of functions to be delivered by all family violence teams in Victoria. This should form the operating model for resourcing decisions from 1 July 2017. Thereafter, Victoria Police should move towards a centralised model of resource allocation for family violence, placing family violence on a footing similar to that of road policing.

Recommendation 51

Victoria Police's Family Violence Command evaluate current localised models for family violence teams and from 1 July 2017 roll out preferable operating models in areas with similar family violence incident patterns.

Recommendation 52

Victoria Police develop a model to strengthen the investigation of family violence offences and focus additional specialist investigative and intelligence resources on serious family violence offending [within 12 months]. Victoria Police should develop performance measures for the revised approach, against which it reports annually and publicly. To improve the investigation of family violence, Victoria Police should:

- ▷ embed investigators in family violence teams where appropriate
- ▷ ensure that investigation and response teams take on or actively oversee investigations
- ▷ give tactical and divisional intelligence support to family violence teams
- ▷ give family violence team members access to the field investigator's course
- ▷ equip first responders with technology that will facilitate timely on-site evidence capture
- ▷ ensure that family violence advisors are involved with divisional tasking and coordination committees and that advisors are of an appropriate rank to participate effectively.

Recommendation 53

The Chief Commissioner of Police report in the Victoria Police annual report on the revised model(s) for and progress in strengthening the investigation of family violence offences.

Recommendation 54

The Victorian Government and Victoria Police deploy mobile technology for police members, including capability to use the Law Enforcement Assistance Program (LEAP), complete and despatch police referrals (L17 forms), take victim and witness statements, and process and issue family violence safety notices in the field—recognising that this is contingent on the adequacy of Victoria Police's broader IT environment [within three years].

Recommendation 55

In order to improve the supervision of the service of family violence intervention orders, Victoria Police [within 12 months]:

- ▷ amend the Victoria Police Manual and Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to provide clearer guidance on and increased supervision of service of family violence intervention orders
- ▷ establish procedures for giving priority to the service of family violence intervention orders on high-risk perpetrators or those suspected of avoiding service—including tasking family violence teams to effect service or seeking relevant court orders, or both
- ▷ provide training at all appropriate levels on the amended requirements relating to service of orders
- ▷ regularly and publicly report on performance in the service of family violence intervention orders.

Recommendation 56

The Victorian Government—working with Victoria Police, the courts and other relevant stakeholders—trial and evaluate the use of agencies or service providers other than Victoria Police and court registrars to effect personal service of applications for family violence intervention orders [within two years].

Recommendation 57

The Victorian Government amend the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to extend the ability of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the Children's Court of Victoria to order service of applications for family violence intervention orders and orders in the first instance other than by personal service, if the court is satisfied that alternative service:

- ▷ is likely to be effective
- ▷ will not result in an unacceptable risk to the safety of the protected person or any other person
- ▷ is, in all the circumstances, appropriate [within 12 months].

Recommendation 58

Victoria Police conduct a trial in two divisions of the use of body-worn cameras to collect statements and other evidence from family violence incident scenes [within 12 months]. The trial should be supported by any necessary legislative amendment to ensure the admissibility of evidence collected in criminal and civil proceedings. It should also be subject to a legislative sunset period, evaluation and the use of any evidence only with the victim's consent.

Recommendation 59

The Victorian Government consider [after five years] whether Victoria Police should be given the power to issue family violence intervention orders in the field, subject to the recommended Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee and Family Violence Agency advising that Victoria Police has made significant improvements to its response to family violence, taking into account the Commission's recommendations.

Court-based responses to family violence in Victoria

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 60

The Victorian Government ensure that all Magistrates' Court of Victoria headquarter courts and specialist family violence courts have the functions of Family Violence Court Division courts [within two years]. These courts should therefore have:

- ▷ specialist magistrates, registrars, applicant and respondent workers to assist parties in applications for family violence intervention orders and any subsequent contravention proceedings
- ▷ dedicated police prosecutors and civil advocates
- ▷ facilities for access to specialist family violence service providers and legal representation for applicants and respondents
- ▷ power to make counselling orders under Part 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic)
- ▷ remote witness facilities for applicants
- ▷ the jurisdictional powers of the Family Violence Court Division under section 41 of the Magistrates' Court Act 1989 (Vic), including the power to make parenting and property orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

Recommendation 61

The Victorian Government legislate to ensure that, subject to exceptional circumstances and the interests of the parties, all family violence matters are heard and determined in specialist family violence courts [within five years].

Recommendation 62

The Victorian Government enact legislation and take other steps as necessary to support the capacity of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria (and, where relevant, the Children's Court of Victoria) to grant family violence intervention orders speedily and with due regard to the interests of justice and the safety of affected family members.

The Victorian Government consider [within two years]:

- ▷ transferring some of the jurisdiction of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria to another forum—for example, fines and traffic infringements
- ▷ expanding the range of matters that can be determined on the papers—that is, without an in-person hearing
- ▷ funding the appointment of a greater number of judicial registrars to deal with certain matters or classes of matters.

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria (and, where relevant, the Children's Court of Victoria) consider whether the caseload of magistrates could be better managed [within two years] by:

- ▷ re-assigning some family violence intervention order applications currently heard at the Melbourne Magistrates' Court to the Neighbourhood Justice Centre
- ▷ delegating authority to judicial registrars to deal with certain matters or classes of matters under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic)—for example, allowing them to grant adjournments or make interim orders and/or substituted service orders.

The Victorian Government should take any necessary action to implement these recommendations if the Magistrates' Court of Victoria advises this is desirable.

Recommendation 63

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria (and the Children's Court of Victoria) consider establishing an 'e-registry' as a central online file-management portal and an offsite contact centre for managing registry-related queries [within five years].

Recommendation 64

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria staff hold a daily coordination meeting before hearings begin in a family violence list [within 12 months]. The purpose of the meeting would be to give priority to high-risk cases, ensure that interpreters are available, liaise with legal representatives to manage conflicts, and liaise with applicant and respondent support workers.

Recommendation 65

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria develop and implement a process [within two years] of equipping court staff to actively manage the family violence list, having regard to risk assessment and management factors, and provide to magistrates the information the Commission recommends in this report.

Recommendation 66

Victoria Police ensure that before applying for a family violence intervention order the relevant magistrate receives an affidavit (prepared by the police prosecutor or civil advocate) [by 31 December 2017] specifying:

- ▷ any previous family violence intervention orders relevant to the affected family member and respondent
- ▷ whether the respondent is on bail for any offence and the conditions of any such bail
- ▷ whether any previous family violence intervention orders have been breached
- ▷ whether there are previous or forthcoming criminal proceedings, and the status of any such proceedings
- ▷ whether there have been previous family violence incident reports (L17 forms) relating to the same parties
- ▷ relevant risk factors relating to the current incident—including a status update on any risk factors described in the L17 relating to the application
- ▷ the family violence intervention orders sought by police and whether the affected family member consents to those orders.

A Victoria Police representative—for example, the police prosecutor, a civil advocate or the family violence court liaison officer—should discuss the particulars of the affidavit with the affected family member before the hearing.

Recommendation 67

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria registry, in all police-initiated applications for family violence intervention orders, provide to the magistrate a summary indicating the status of any related proceedings in the Children's Court of Victoria (or vice-versa), the Family Court of Australia and/or the Federal Circuit Court of Australia. If information is not available from other jurisdictions, this should be stated. In non-police initiated family violence intervention orders, the Magistrates' Court registry should also provide the information recommended to be provided by Victoria Police in an application initiated by it. The Magistrates' Court registry should also adopt a practice of providing risk assessments made by applicant and respondent support workers to magistrates as a matter of course [by 31 December 2017].

Recommendation 68

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria consider for each court [within 12 months]:

- ▷ capping lists of family violence matters at a level that allows magistrates sufficient time to hear each matter
- ▷ staggering family violence lists to provide greater guidance to parties as to when cases will be heard
- ▷ increasing the number of days dedicated to listing family violence matters
- ▷ introducing benchmarks for the maximum amount of time parties should wait for a listed family violence matter to be heard.

Recommendation 69

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments Law, Crime and Community Safety Council, pursue the expansion of resourcing for legal services, including Victoria Legal Aid and community legal centres, to resolve the current under-representation by and over-burdening of duty lawyer services in family violence matters [within 12 months].

Recommendation 70

The Victorian Government fund and complete works to ensure all Magistrates' Court of Victoria headquarter courts [within five years]:

- ▷ provide safe waiting areas and rooms for co-located service providers
- ▷ provide accessibility for people with disabilities
- ▷ provide proper security staffing and equipment
- ▷ provide separate entry and exit points for applicants and respondents
- ▷ provide private interview rooms for use by registrars and service providers
- ▷ provide remote witness facilities, to allow witnesses to give evidence off site and from court-based interview rooms
- ▷ provide adequate facilities for children and ensure that courts are 'child-friendly'
- ▷ use multi-lingual and multi-format signage
- ▷ use pre-existing local facilities and structures to accommodate proceedings or associated aspects of court business—for example, for use as safe waiting areas.

Prior to all family violence matters being heard and determined in specialist family violence courts, the Victorian Government should fund and complete works to ensure that those magistrates' courts (and children's courts) that deal with a high volume of family violence-related matters have similar capacity.

Recommendation 71

The Victorian Government amend section 69 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and section 363 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) [within three years] to provide that the court must permit a family violence victim to give evidence from a place other than the courtroom by means of remote technology that enables communication with the courtroom, unless the victim wishes to give evidence from the courtroom.

Recommendation 72

The Victorian Government consider legislative amendments to permit the use of video- and audio-recorded evidence in family violence-related criminal proceedings involving either adults or children [within 12 months].

Recommendation 73

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria (and the Children's Court of Victoria) produce multimedia information about the family violence intervention order process that can not only be viewed online but can also be shown in court waiting areas to complement the development of 'plain language' family violence intervention order forms and simplified order conditions [within 12 months].

Recommendation 74

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria roll out an online application form (based on the Neighbourhood Justice Centre's online application form) for all applicants for a family violence intervention order across Victoria [within two years].

Recommendation 75

The Victorian Government legislate to permit the County Court of Victoria to strike out an appeal in circumstances where the appellant does not appear at a pre-appeal mention, is served with notice that the appeal will be struck out if the appellant does not attend the next mention date, and the appellant does not attend the next mention date [within 12 months].

Recommendation 76

The Victorian Government amend section 31 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to stipulate that the first mention date for a family violence safety notice must be no later than 14 days after the notice, or form of notice, is served [within 12 months].

Recommendation 77

The Department of Justice and Regulation convene a committee, including representatives of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Victoria Legal Aid and Women's Legal Service Victoria, to investigate how family violence intervention orders by consent are currently negotiated and develop a safe, supported negotiation process for victims [within three years].

Recommendation 78

The Victorian Government repeal the unproclaimed provisions of the Family Violence Protection Amendment Act 2014 (Vic) providing for interim family violence intervention orders with an automatic finalisation condition (self-executing orders) [within 12 months].

Offences and sentencing

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 79

The Victorian Government legislate to empower courts to make interim family violence intervention orders on their own motion at any point during criminal processes—including bail proceedings and sentencing [within 12 months].

Recommendation 80

The Victorian Government [within 12 months] take the following action:

- ▷ encourage bail decision makers to seek, and prosecutors to provide, information on relevant risks of family violence in relation to a bail application
- ▷ whether by amendment to the Bail Act 1977 (Vic) or by other means, provide that before setting or amending bail conditions, a bail decision maker must take into account:
 - ▷ whether there is a family violence safety notice or family violence intervention order in place. If so, the decision maker should ensure that the bail conditions are compatible with the notice or order conditions, unless to do so would pose a risk to the victim and/or protected person
 - ▷ in matters relating to family violence, whether there is a risk of family violence that could be managed by appropriate bail conditions or a family violence intervention order, or both
- ▷ add an avoidance of doubt provision in section 4 of the Bail Act to state that an unacceptable risk of committing an offence or endangering the safety or welfare of the public may include an unacceptable risk of perpetrating family violence whilst on bail
- ▷ enact legislation to ensure that, if a warrant for the arrest of an accused is issued, bail conditions continue to operate until the arrest warrant is executed and the person is brought before the court.

Recommendation 81

The Victorian Government ensure that offences committed in the context of family violence are appropriately 'flagged' [within two years]—for example, by:

- ▷ enhancing current links between Victoria Police's, courts' and Corrections Victoria's databases
- ▷ amending the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to deem criminal offences committed in the context of family violence to be 'family violence offences' for the purposes of being recorded in relevant databases.

Recommendation 82

The Victorian Government review section 125A of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to determine whether the 28-day period within which contravention relating to the same person must occur to establish this offence should be extended [within 12 months].

Recommendation 83

The Sentencing Advisory Council report on the desirability of and methods for accommodating 'swift and certain justice' approaches to family violence offenders in Victoria's sentencing regime [within 12 months].

Recommendation 84

The Director of Public Prosecutions consider identifying a suitable case in which to seek a guideline judgment from the Court of Appeal on sentencing for family violence offences [within two years].

Perpetrators

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 85

The Victorian Government [within 12 months]:

- ▷ map the roles and responsibilities of all government and non-government agencies and service providers that have contact with perpetrators of family violence
- ▷ confirm the principles that should inform the programs, services and initiatives required to respond to perpetrators of family violence who pose a high, medium or low risk to victims.

Recommendation 86

The Victorian Government convene a committee of experts on perpetrator interventions and behaviour change programs [within 12 months] to advise the government on the spectrum of programs, services and initiatives that should be available in Victoria—in the justice system and in the community—to respond to all perpetrators across varying forms and risk levels of family violence. The committee should consider men’s behaviour change programs, clinical models such as cognitive behaviour therapy, strengths-based programs and fathering-specific models, online programs, and services for perpetrators from diverse communities. The expert advisory committee should consist of members with expertise in a variety of disciplines and practice approaches and with experience in working directly with perpetrators and victims of family violence, including those from diverse communities.

Recommendation 87

The Victorian Government, subject to advice from the recommended expert advisory committee and relevant ANROWS (Australia's National Organisation for Women's Safety) research, trial and evaluate interventions for perpetrators [within three years] that:

- ▷ provide individual case management where required
- ▷ deliver programs to perpetrators from diverse communities and to those with complex needs
- ▷ focus on helping perpetrators understand the effects of violence on their children and to become better fathers
- ▷ adopt practice models that build coordinated interventions, including cross-sector workforce development between the men's behaviour change, mental health, drug and alcohol and forensic sectors.

Recommendation 88

The Victorian Government provide dedicated funding for future perpetrator programs. These should include evaluation studies to establish longer term effectiveness and assist in improving program design in the long term [within three years].

Recommendation 89

The Secretary of the Department of Justice and Regulation approve a broader range of service providers to provide counselling services to perpetrators who are subject to a counselling order issued by the Magistrates' Court of Victoria under section 130 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). Such service providers should have expertise in the interplay between family violence and drug and alcohol misuse or mental illness, provided the purpose of the counselling remains within the scope of the statutory objectives of Part 5 of the Act [within three years].

Recommendation 90

The Victorian Government, working with the courts and providers of men's behaviour change programs, establish an improved process for monitoring the attendance of perpetrators who are ordered to participate in behaviour change programs and the outcomes of their participation in those programs [within 12 months].

Recommendation 91

The Victorian Government, in consultation with No To Violence [within 12 months]:

- ▷ review and update the Men's Behaviour Change Programs Minimum Standards to reflect research findings, national and international best practice, and the central importance of partner contact work
- ▷ develop a compliance framework, incorporating an accreditation process, for providers of men's behaviour change programs.

Recommendation 92

The Victorian Government ensure that, pending the implementation of an expanded range of perpetrator interventions, funding for men's behaviour change programs is sufficient to meet demand from those required to attend under a counselling order issued under Part 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and those who volunteer to attend such programs [within 12 months].

Recommendation 93

The Victorian Government ensure that the terms of reference of the current review of the Liquor Control Reform Act 1998 (Vic) consider family violence and alcohol-related harms. The review should involve consultation with people who have expertise in the inter-relationship between family violence and alcohol use.

The role of the health system

Recommendation 94

The Victorian Government amend section 26 of the Public Health and Wellbeing Act 2008 (Vic)—which requires that councils prepare a municipal public health and wellbeing plan—to require councils to report on the measures the council proposes to take to reduce family violence and respond to the needs of victims. Alternatively, the Victorian Government could amend section 125 of the Local Government Act 1989 (Vic)—which requires each council to prepare a council plan—to require councils to include these measures in their council plan (rather than their health and wellbeing plans) [within 12 months].

Recommendation 95

The Victorian Government resource public hospitals to implement a whole-of-hospital model for responding to family violence, drawing on evaluated approaches in Victoria and elsewhere [within three to five years].

Recommendation 96

The Department of Health and Human Services require routine screening for family violence in all public antenatal settings. The screening guidance should be aligned with the revised Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework. Implementation will require targeted and continued training, the development of specific guidelines, and clinical support [by 31 December 2017].

Recommendation 97

The Chief Psychiatrist issue a guideline relating to family violence—including that family violence risk should be assessed when considering discharging or transferring care of a person receiving mental health services and when consulting with families or carers in relation to treatment planning [within two years].

Recommendation 98

The Victorian Government fund the establishment of specialist family violence advisor positions to be located in major mental health and drug and alcohol services. The advisors' expertise should be available to practitioners in these sectors across Victoria [within 12 months].

Recommendation 99

The Victorian Government encourage and facilitate mental health, drug and alcohol and family violence services to collaborate [within 12 months] by:

- ▷ resourcing and promoting shared casework models
- ▷ ensuring that mental health and drug and alcohol services are represented on Risk Assessment and Management Panels and other multi-agency risk management models at the local level.

Recommendation 100

The Royal Australian College of General Practitioners, the Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists, and psychologist and drug and alcohol service peak bodies collaborate to develop a database of psychiatrists, psychologists, drug and alcohol practitioners and any other professionals with expertise in family violence to help general practitioners when making referrals [within 12 months].

Recommendation 101

Victoria Police actively seek access to forensic medical examinations in family violence matters from the Victorian Institute of Forensic Medicine [within two years].

Recommendation 102

The Chief Psychiatrist—in consultation with the Royal Australian College of General Practitioners, the Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists and psychologists' peak bodies—coordinate the development of a family violence learning agenda [within two years] that includes:

- ▷ undergraduate and graduate training in relation to family violence
- ▷ continuing professional development in relation to family violence
- ▷ guidance on appropriate responses to people with mental illness who have also suffered family violence.

Recommendation 103

The Victorian Government, through its membership of the Australian Health Workforce Ministerial Council, encourage the Ministerial Council to approve standards that facilitate a mandatory requirement that general practitioners complete family violence training as part of their continuing professional development [within 12 months].

Recovery: health and wellbeing

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 104

The Victorian Government increase investment in programs to ensure that people who have been affected by family violence have timely access to group-based or individual counselling for as long as they need. The counselling should be delivered by practitioners with appropriate training [within 12 months].

Recommendation 105

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government to consider a Medicare item number for family violence counselling and therapeutic services distinct from a general practitioner mental health treatment plan. In the longer term consideration should be given to establishing a Medicare item number or a similar mechanism that will allow medical practitioners to record a family violence-related consultation or procedure and so more accurately ascertain the public cost of family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 106

The Victorian Law Reform Commission consider the matters the Commission raised in this report in relation to the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal and the Victim Assistance Program in its Victims of Crime in the Criminal Trial Process review. To the extent that these matters do not fall within the terms of reference for that review, the Attorney-General should amend the terms of reference or ensure that a separate review of these matters is carried out.

Recovery: Financial security

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 107

The Victorian Government encourage the Financial and Consumer Rights Council to require that its members receive family violence and economic abuse training as part of continuing professional development and in order to remain members. The council should also work with other financial counselling member organisations to encourage them to do the same [from 1 January 2017].

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ amend the National Credit Code to include family violence as a ground for financial hardship and develop an awareness campaign to ensure that both consumers and credit providers are aware of their rights and responsibilities
- ▷ work with the Australian Communications and Media Authority and its related representative bodies and associations to amend the Telecommunications Consumer Protections Code to:
 - ▷ list minimum eligibility criteria for access to hardship programs
 - ▷ make family violence an express eligibility criterion
 - ▷ incorporate a requirement for specific policies for customers experiencing family violence to clarify consent requirements for payment plans when an account is jointly held
 - ▷ include grounds for splitting jointly held debt and removing an account holder's name if family violence has occurred.

Recommendation 109

The Victorian Government work with the Essential Services Commission [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ amend the Energy Retail Code and Customer Service Code—Urban Water Businesses to:
 - ▷ list minimum eligibility criteria for access to hardship programs
 - ▷ include family violence as an explicit eligibility criterion
- ▷ develop industry guidelines for energy and water retailers to require comprehensive and ongoing training of customer service staff to help them identify customers experiencing family violence and financial hardship
- ▷ publicise the availability of dispute resolution mechanisms for people affected by family violence.

Recommendation 110

The Victorian Government encourage the Victorian Energy and Water Ombudsman and the Commonwealth Financial Services Ombudsman and Telecommunications Ombudsman to publicise the availability of their dispute-resolution processes to help victims of family violence resolve disputes with service providers in relation to debts and liabilities incurred in the context of family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 111

The Victorian Government encourage the Australian Bankers' Association, through its Financial Abuse Prevention Working Group, to develop a family violence-specific industry guideline [within 12 months]. This should be supported by training and education for relevant banking staff, to help them understand, identify and deal with economic abuse associated with family violence.

Recommendation 112

The Department of Justice and Regulation investigate whether the Road Safety Act 1986 (Vic) should be amended so that, if a perpetrator of family violence incurs traffic fines while driving a car registered in the name of the victim, the victim is able to have the fines revoked [within 12 months] by declaring:

- ▷ They were not the driver of the vehicle at the time of the offending.
- ▷ They are a victim of family violence—as evidenced by a statutory declaration, a copy of a family violence safety notice or family violence intervention order, or a support letter from a family violence worker, general practitioner or other appropriate professional.
- ▷ They are unable to identify the person in control of the vehicle at the time for safety reasons.

The Victorian Government amend the Infringements Act 2006 (Vic) to provide that the experience of family violence may be a special circumstance entitling a person to have a traffic infringement withdrawn or revoked [within 12 months].

Recommendation 114

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria consider [within 12 months]:

- ▷ issuing a practice direction to encourage the use of personal property conditions in family violence intervention orders
- ▷ including specific questions about personal property conditions in the information form that precedes the application for a family violence intervention order (FVIO1 form).

Recommendation 115

Victoria Police amend the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to provide guidance and examples in relation to when it is appropriate to seek personal property conditions in family violence intervention orders [within 12 months].

Recommendation 116

The Department of Justice and Regulation's review of the Residential Tenancies Act 2006 (Vic) consider amending the Act to:

- ▷ empower Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal members to make an order under section 233A of the Act if a member is satisfied that family violence has occurred after considering certain criteria—but without requiring a final family violence intervention order containing an exclusionary condition
- ▷ provide a clear mechanism for apportionment of liability arising out of the tenancy in situations of family violence, to ensure that victims of family violence are not held liable for rent (or other tenancy-related debts) that are properly attributable to perpetrators of family violence
- ▷ enable victims of family violence to prevent their personal details from being listed on residential tenancy databases, and to remove existing listings, where the breach of the Act or the tenancy agreement occurred in the context of family violence
- ▷ enable victims of family violence wishing to leave a tenancy to apply to the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal for an order terminating a co-tenancy if the co-tenant is the perpetrator of that violence—including, where relevant, an order dealing with apportionment of liability for rent (or other tenancy-related debts) between the co-tenants
- ▷ prevent a landlord from unreasonably withholding consent to a request from a tenant who is a victim of family violence for approval to reasonably modify the rental property in order to improve the security of that property.

Recommendation 117

The Victorian Government encourage the use of applications under section 233A of the Residential Tenancies Act 2006 (Vic) [within 12 months], including by means of training and education for family violence support workers, Victoria Police and other relevant support staff in relation to the existence and operation of the provision.

Recommendation 118

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria consider issuing a practice direction to encourage magistrates hearing family violence intervention order applications to inquire as early as possible about whether the applicant and respondent are in shared rental accommodation and, if so, ensure that the protected person is notified of the right to apply for a new tenancy agreement and receives information about how to do so [within 12 months].

Recommendation 119

The Victorian Government consider any legislative reform that would limit as far as possible the necessity for individuals affected by family violence with proceedings in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria to bring separate proceedings in the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal in connection with any tenancy related to the family violence [within two years].

Recommendation 120

The Victorian Government ensure that Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal members receive training and education to ensure that they have adequate expertise in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and family violence matters [within 12 months].

Recommendation 121

The Victorian Government support the expansion of initiatives that deliver financial literacy training and education for victims of family violence [within two years].

Restorative justice for victims of family violence

Recommendation 122

The Department of Justice and Regulation, in consultation with victims' representatives and experts in restorative justice, develop a framework and pilot program for the delivery of restorative justice options for victims of family violence. The framework and pilot program should have victims at their centre, incorporate strong safeguards, be based on international best practice, and be delivered by appropriately skilled and qualified facilitators [within two years].

Adolescents who use family violence

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 123

The Victorian Government, subject to successful evaluation of the Adolescent Family Violence Program, extend the program across Victoria [within two years].

Recommendation 124

The Victorian Government develop additional crisis and longer term supported accommodation options for adolescents who use violence in the home. This should be combined with therapeutic support provided to end the young person's use of violence in the family [within two years].

Recommendation 125

Victoria Police determine its baseline model for family violence teams and consider appointing dedicated youth resource officers to provide support to young people and their families following police attendance at an incident in which an adolescent has used violence in the home [within 12 months].

Recommendation 126

The Melbourne Children's Court establish family violence applicant and respondent worker positions to assist young people and families in situations where adolescents are using violence in the home [within 12 months].

Recommendation 127

The Victorian Government, subject to successful evaluation of the Youth Diversion Program Pilot, establish a statutory youth diversion scheme [within two years].

Recommendation 128

The Victorian Government trial and evaluate a model of linking Youth Justice Group Conferencing with an Adolescent Family Violence Program to provide an individual and family therapeutic intervention for young people who are using violence in the home and are at risk of entering the youth justice system [within two years].

Family violence and the family law system

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 129

The Secretary of the Department of Justice and Regulation liaise with the Secretary of the Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department on a continuing basis to advocate for the adoption of family law reforms that reduce fragmentation of jurisdictions in cases involving family violence.

Recommendation 130

Victoria Police amend the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to refer to the existence of the Victoria Police power to arrest for breach of an injunction for personal protection under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and to encourage police to exercise that power. Victoria Police should provide training in relation to the existence of that power [within 12 months].

Recommendation 131

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments Law, Crime and Community Safety Council, pursue amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ provide that a breach of an injunction for personal protection is a criminal offence
- ▷ increase the monetary limit on the jurisdiction of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria to divide the property of parties to a marriage or a de facto relationship (section 46)
- ▷ make it clear that the Children's Court of Victoria can make orders under Part VII of the Family Law Act in the same circumstances as the Magistrates' Court of Victoria (sections 69J and 69N).

Recommendation 132

The Victorian Government amend sections 57 and 96 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ require magistrates to give an applicant, and a respondent if the respondent appears before the court, an explanation of how a family violence intervention order interacts with any existing or new Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) order or an order under the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic). This explanation should be given on the making of both an interim family violence intervention order and a final family violence intervention order
- ▷ if the court has varied, suspended, revoked or revived a Family Law Act order, require magistrates to explain the purpose, terms and effect on the family violence intervention order
- ▷ permit the court to request that the legal practitioner provide the requisite explanations when a person to whom the family violence intervention order is directed is legally represented
- ▷ if the parties do not appear before a magistrate, require the relevant court registrar to provide information in writing on the interaction between either an interim or final family violence intervention order and any applicable orders under the Family Law Act or the Children, Youth and Families Act.

Recommendation 133

The Victorian Government amend the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) to clarify that the Children's Court of Victoria has the same jurisdiction to make Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) parenting orders as the Magistrates' Court of Victoria [within 12 months].

Recommendation 134

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments Law, Crime and Community Safety Council, pursue [within two years]:

- ▷ the creation of a single database for family violence, child protection and family law orders, judgments, transcripts and other relevant court documentation that is accessible to each of the relevant state, territory and Commonwealth courts and other agencies as necessary
- ▷ the development of a national family violence risk assessment framework and tool and consistent use of such a framework or tool by state, territory and Commonwealth courts, lawyers, government and non-government service providers.

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria consider revising the form and content of family violence intervention order court applications and documentation [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ ensure that when proceedings are filed with the court both the affected person and the respondent are informed of the Magistrates' Court's jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). Such information should be available to parties in self-initiated applications and in proceedings initiated by a police family violence safety notice
- ▷ inform the applicant that the court may revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order pursuant to section 68R of the Family Law Act.

Recommendation 136

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the Children's Court of Victoria consider pursuing a formal information-sharing arrangement or protocol with the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia that is consistent with the new information-sharing regime in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), as recommended by the Commission [within 18 months]. The protocol should clearly set out the purpose of and principles for information exchange and allow communication between the jurisdictions in relation to process. Among the information to be exchanged between courts should be relevant court documents such as court orders, judgments, court reports and transcripts. The protocol should be regularly reviewed.

Recommendation 137

The Department of Health and Human Services support on a continuing basis the co-located child protection practitioner initiative in the Victorian registries of the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Review of family violence-related deaths

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 138

The Victorian Government establish a legislative basis for the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths and provide adequate funding to enable the Coroners Court of Victoria to perform this function [within 12 months].

Family violence and diversity

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 139

The Victorian Government fund Seniors Rights Victoria, InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence and Women with Disabilities Victoria [within 12 months] to:

- ▶ provide training to equip specialist family violence service providers and providers of universal services to recognise and provide appropriate services to older Victorians, people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities and people with disabilities who experience family violence
- ▶ build partnerships with and provide advice to specialist family violence service providers and providers of universal services to enable them to respond effectively to the needs of people in these communities.

Recommendation 140

The Department of Health and Human Services review and update standards for family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs) [within two years]. The standards should specify providers' obligation to develop suitable services for diverse communities, consistent with their obligation to provide non-discriminatory services under the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) and the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic).

Recommendation 141

The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission issue a guideline under section 148 of the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) to guide service providers in meeting their obligation to act inclusively and avoid discrimination when delivering services to all people who are affected by family violence. The guideline should apply to family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs), as well as to universal and mainstream organisations [within 12 months].

Recommendation 142

The Victorian Government ensure that family violence community awareness and prevention programs and activities use language, imagery and messaging that reflect the diversity of the Victorian community [within two years]. Prevention work should be developed in consultation with relevant communities and be evaluated in order to refine future practice. Inclusiveness of diversity should also be an important consideration for corporate and philanthropic funders of such programs and activities.

Recommendation 143

The Victorian Government ensure that the proposed Victorian Family Violence Index measures, as far as possible, the extent of and response to family violence in different communities.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 144

The Victorian Government implement the recommendations of the mid-term evaluation of the Indigenous Family Violence Ten Year Plan [within two years].

Recommendation 145

The Victorian Government [within two years]:

- ▶ continue to work in partnership with Aboriginal communities to develop a statewide strategic response to improving the lives of vulnerable Aboriginal children and young people
- ▶ increase investment in programs that provide 'wrap-around' support to parents and children, especially in the first five years of life, so that the trajectory into child protection for these vulnerable families is interrupted and reversed
- ▶ expand the Aboriginal component of Child FIRST to reduce the high rates of removal of Aboriginal children and provide consistency across Victoria
- ▶ examine factors that influenced the decline in admissions into out-of-home care in Outer Gippsland, Mallee, Goulburn and North Eastern Melbourne so that lessons can be learnt and applied to future policy and practice.

Recommendation 146

The Victorian Government give priority to providing adequate funding to Aboriginal community controlled organisations [within 12 months] for:

- ▷ culturally appropriate family violence services for Aboriginal women and children
- ▷ family-centred services and programs—including programs that focus on cultural strengthening—therapeutic child-centred programs, and one-door integrated services where family members can obtain a range of supports
- ▷ culturally appropriate legal services for victims and perpetrators, to meet the increased demand for services and the need for statewide coverage
- ▷ crisis accommodation and support options for Aboriginal women and children based on core and cluster-style and best-practice models with access to longer term housing
- ▷ culturally appropriate services for Aboriginal men who perpetrate family violence—including access to suitable accommodation
- ▷ early intervention and prevention actions in Aboriginal communities—including whole-of-community activities and targeted programs.

Recommendation 147

The Victorian Government, on the basis of the advice of the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum, give priority to major service models for evaluation using culturally appropriate outcome measures, methodologies and providers [within three years]. The Victorian Government should also ensure that all Aboriginal family violence interventions are evaluated in a culturally appropriate manner and that this is adequately resourced to ensure that Aboriginal service providers have the capacity to support such an evaluation [within 12 months].

Recommendation 148

The Victorian Government ensure that funding agreements for mainstream family violence organisations incorporate a requirement for services to conduct cultural safety reviews and action plans in all areas of operations, governance, workforce and relationships with the community. Investment in Aboriginal service providers will be necessary to support this [within 12 months].

Recommendation 149

The Melbourne Magistrates' Court resume the Koori Family Violence and Victims Support Program [within 12 months].

Recommendation 150

The Victorian Government, subject to the approval of the Aboriginal Justice Forum and inclusion of any necessary safeguards, extend the jurisdiction of the Koori Magistrates and County Courts to include offences where it is alleged that the defendant has contravened a family violence intervention order [within 12 months].

Recommendation 151

The Victorian Government ensure that Koori Family Violence Police Protocols are implemented in the remaining identified sites, with adequate resources and support provided to Elders and other community members providing cultural education to police in all sites (including those where protocols currently operate) [within two years].

Recommendation 152

Victoria Police, the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Justice and Regulation and the Department of Education and Training improve the collection of Indigenous-specific data relating to family violence so that this can be shared with communities, organisations and governance forums to inform local, regional and statewide responses [within 12 months].

Older people

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 153

The Victorian Government resource the development and delivery of information on family violence using channels such as seniorsonline, information distributed with Victorian Seniors Cards, Seniors Week and the Seniors Information Centre [within 12 months].

Recommendation 154

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ ensure that the Human Resource Management Standard in the Community Care Common Standards Guide specifies that workers delivering services must have successfully completed certified training in identifying family violence and responding to it
- ▷ review the existing Community Services Training Package courses relevant to providing ageing support to ensure that each course has a core, rather than elective, unit that adequately covers all manifestations of family violence.

Victoria Police, with advice from the Priority Community Division, scope options for a trial of a dedicated family violence and elder abuse response team in one Victoria Police local service area. The team should have the capacity to investigate financial abuse [within two years].

People from culturally and linguistically diverse communities

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 156

The Victorian Government amend section 6 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to expand the statutory examples of family violence to include forced marriage and dowry-related abuse [within 12 months].

Recommendation 157

The Victorian Government update its guidelines on policy and procedures in using interpretative services to specifically deal with family violence—in particular, the risks of using perpetrators, children and other family members as interpreters, as well as using the same interpreter for both perpetrator and victim [within 12 months].

Recommendation 158

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria allocate specific funding for family violence interpreters and develop court guidelines for booking interpreters in family violence matters [within 12 months]. Among other things, the guidelines should take account of the following:

- ▷ an early process for checking whether parties require an interpreter
- ▷ a practice of booking two interpreters if both parties require an interpreter
- ▷ a presumption that wherever possible a female interpreter will be booked for a female party.

Victoria Police [within 12 months]:

- ▷ amend the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to emphasise the risks associated with using children as interpreters and using the same interpreter for both perpetrator and victim, as well as to provide practical guidance to officers on the use of interpreters
- ▷ provide training at all appropriate levels on the amended Code of Practice requirements relating to interpreters.

Recommendation 160

The Victorian Government, as a member of the National Accreditation Authority for Translators and Interpreters Ltd, work with the other members of the authority to ensure that accreditation and testing processes and approval of translator and interpreter courses require an understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence [within two years].

Recommendation 161

The Department of Health and Human Services, in collaboration with the Victorian Multicultural Commission, community organisations and other relevant bodies, develop a strategy for informing service providers, specialist family violence services and other community organisations about the health impacts of female genital mutilation, emphasising that it can be a form of family violence and a criminal offence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 162

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government to broaden the definition of family violence in the Migrations Regulations 1994 (Cth) so that it is consistent with the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and to ensure that people seeking to escape violence are entitled to crisis payments (regardless of their visa status) [within 12 months].

Faith communities

Recommendation 163

The Office of Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship Multifaith Advisory Group and the Victorian Multicultural Commission, in partnership with expert family violence practitioners, develop training packages on family violence and sexual assault for faith leaders and communities [within three years]. These packages should build on existing work, reflect leading practice in responding to family violence, and include information about referral pathways for victims and perpetrators. The training should be suitable for inclusion as part of the pre-service learning in various faith training institutes, as well as the ongoing professional development of faith leaders.

Recommendation 164

The Department of Health and Human Services consult with the Office of Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship Multifaith Advisory Group, the Victorian Multicultural Commission and women from faith communities as part of its review of standards for specialist family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs), to ensure that these standards and the associated services take account of the needs of people in faith communities who experience family violence [within two years].

Recommendation 165

Faith leaders and communities establish processes for examining the ways in which they currently respond to family violence in their communities and whether any of their practices operate as deterrents to the prevention or reporting of, or recovery from, family violence or are used by perpetrators to excuse or condone abusive behaviour.

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 166

The Victorian LGBTI Taskforce, supported by relevant experts, provide advice [within two years] on the following:

- ▷ research priorities relating to the nature and prevalence of and the most effective responses to family violence in LGBTI communities
- ▷ effective prevention strategies
- ▷ the review of the standards for family violence service providers—including men's behaviour change programs
- ▷ intersections between family violence and health and wellbeing initiatives.

Recommendation 167

The Victorian Government require all funded family violence services to achieve Rainbow Tick accreditation [by 31 December 2018]. This should be achieved by means of a staged approach, using workforce training and LGBTI equity auditing followed by full accreditation. An evaluation should be conducted to determine whether all family violence services are suitably responsive to and inclusive of LGBTI people [by 31 December 2019].

The Victorian Government provide funding [within 12 months] for the following:

- ▷ development and maintenance of legal and other resources for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities to support the identification and reporting of family violence, along with information about safe, accessible sources of support
- ▷ shared community education campaigns via LGBTI and family violence services to encourage LGBTI people who are experiencing family violence to seek help
- ▷ provision of training and advice to specialist family violence services
- ▷ for those LGBTI victims who cannot remain in their home, assistance with obtaining safe accommodation.

Recommendation 169

The Victorian Government, in the context of its commitment to review equal opportunity and birth certificate laws, examine the need to clarify relevant provisions of the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) to remove any capacity for family violence accommodation and service providers to discriminate against lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex Victorians [within 12 months].

People with disabilities

Recommendation 170

The Victorian Government adopt a consistent and comprehensive approach to the collection of data on people with disabilities who experience or perpetrate family violence. This should include collecting data from relevant services—for example, incident reports made to the Department of Health and Human Services by disability services when family violence has occurred [within two years].

Recommendation 171

The Victorian Government fund research into the prevalence of acquired brain injury among family violence victims and perpetrators [within two years].

Recommendation 172

The Victorian Government fund training and education programs for disability workers—including residential workers, home and community care workers, interpreters and communication assistants and attendant carers—to encourage identification and reporting of family violence among people with disabilities [within two years].

Recommendation 173

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments Disability Reform Council, encourage the Commonwealth Government and the National Disability Insurance Agency to ensure that all disability services workers involved in assessing needs and delivering services have successfully completed certified training in identifying family violence and responding to it. This could include further developing and mandating the units on family violence and responding to suspected abuse in the Community Service Training Package [within five years].

Recommendation 174

Victoria Police, in the redesign of the police referral (L17) form, ensure that disability data is collected, including on the type of disability and the support required. Training should be provided to help police members identify how and when to make adjustments for people with disabilities [within 12 months].

Recommendation 175

The Judicial College of Victoria provide training to judicial officers in order to raise awareness and encourage consistent application of section 31 of the Evidence Act 2008 (Vic), which allows courts to make adjustments to the way people with disabilities may be questioned and give evidence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 176

The Department of Health and Human Services review the funding model for crisis supported accommodation to remove barriers for women and children with disabilities [within 12 months].

Recommendation 177

The Victorian Government, in phasing out communal refuges, ensure that replacement accommodation contains disability-accessible units (universal design), where carers can be accommodated as needed and adaptations for children with disabilities are made [within five years].

Recommendation 178

The Victorian Government extend eligibility for the Victorian Disability Family Violence Crisis Response to assist people with disabilities who are victims of family violence and are not eligible for services under the Disability Act 2006 (Vic) but who nevertheless require assistance. Such eligibility should apply when these individuals do not have access to alternative supports [within 12 months].

Recommendation 179

The Victorian Government encourage the National Disability Insurance Agency, in the transition to the National Disability Insurance Scheme, to provide flexible packages that are responsive to people with disabilities experiencing family violence. These packages should incorporate crisis supports and assistance for rebuilding and recovering from family violence [within two years].

Male victims

Recommendation 180

The Victorian Government publicise and promote the Victims Support Agency in any information campaign relating to family violence as the primary source of assistance for male victims. The agency should also provide appropriate online resources for male victims [within 12 months].

Recommendation 181

The Victims Support Agency continue to receive all police referrals (L17 forms) relating to male victims, including after the establishment of the Support and Safety Hubs. The agency and all other relevant support services should develop joint arrangements to ensure that male victims of family violence are supported in obtaining the help they need [within two years].

Rural, regional and remote communities

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 182

The Victorian Government and other relevant parties, in designing the recommended Statewide Family Violence Action Plan and implementing the Commission's other recommendations:

- ▷ give priority to reducing family violence in rural, regional and remote communities
- ▷ improve access to services by victims and perpetrators of family violence in such communities
- ▷ investigate and fund the use of technological solutions to provide access to service providers—among them those with experience in safety planning and counselling
- ▷ when contracting for and funding services in these communities, recognise:
 - ▷ the importance of building the capacity of universal services to deliver family violence services in order to facilitate an effective, locally based response
 - ▷ the need for flexibility in contracting and funding arrangements in order to facilitate collaboration between different services and providers.

Women in prison

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 183

Corrections Victoria review the current processes for identifying female offenders at risk of or with a history of family violence and respond through therapeutic interventions and education programs [within 12 months].

Recommendation 184

Corrections Victoria ensure that therapeutic interventions such as individual counselling and group-based programs such as Out of the Dark are available for all women in prison who have experienced family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 185

Corrections Victoria [within 12 months]:

- ▶ inform post-release support services if a prisoner has a history of family violence victimisation to ensure that post-release accommodation arrangements do not place the prisoner at increased risk
- ▶ refer prisoners who have been victims of family violence to family violence services when they are being released.

Women working in the sex industry

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 186

Victoria Police amend the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to describe the difficulties women in the sex industry face in reporting family violence to police and how to take those difficulties into account when investigating family violence perpetrated against these victims [within 12 months].

Prevention

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 187

The Victorian Government ensure that the Commission's recommended Statewide Family Violence Action Plan includes a primary prevention strategy [within 12 months] that should:

- ▶ be implemented through a series of three-year action cycles
- ▶ refer to actions to be taken and be accompanied by performance measures
- ▶ guide and be guided by the Victorian Government's Gender Equality Strategy
- ▶ be supported by dedicated funding for family violence primary prevention.

Recommendation 188

The Victorian Government resource an initiative (either inside or outside government) [within 18 months] to:

- ▷ oversee prevention of family violence activities in Victoria
- ▷ provide policy and technical advice to policy makers—including government—on primary prevention
- ▷ provide to organisations technical advice and expertise on building primary prevention in their organisations and within communities
- ▷ coordinate research that builds evidence around the primary prevention of all forms of family violence
- ▷ ensure that accredited workforce development training in primary prevention is available through registered training organisations.

This Victorian initiative should be undertaken in close collaboration with Our Watch, ANROWS (Australia's National Organisation for Women's Safety) and other relevant bodies.

Recommendation 189

The Victorian Government mandate the introduction of respectful relationships education into every government school in Victoria from prep to year 12. Implementation should be staged to ensure school readiness and to allow for ongoing evaluation and adaptation. It should be delivered through a whole-of-school approach and be consistent with best practice, building on the evaluation of the model being tested by the Department of Education and Training through Our Watch [within five years].

The workplace

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 190

The Victorian Government ensure that the inclusion of family violence leave in all public sector enterprise agreements is accompanied by access to suitable support services and referrals, as well as adequate planning, training and resources to equip managers and human resources staff to communicate and implement the leave entitlements.

Recommendation 191

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government to amend the National Employment Standards in Part 2-2 of the Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) to include an entitlement to paid family violence leave for employees (other than casual employees) and an entitlement to unpaid family violence leave for casual employees [within 12 months].

Recommendation 192

On receipt of Our Watch's Workplace Equality and Respect Project final report, the Victorian Government should:

- ▷ begin implementing best-practice workplace programs in all public sector workplaces in order to:
 - ▷ enable them to build respectful and gender equitable cultures
 - ▷ ensure that they have suitable policies for family violence victims
 - ▷ provide adequate responses to and not allow for collusion with family violence perpetrators
 - ▷ build skills and support staff in taking bystander action
- ▷ support the maintenance of the project's proposed web-based portal or database of program models, tool kits, training resources and packages for application and use in all workplaces
- ▷ review and report on options for using existing regulatory frameworks and government procurement policies to support all Victorian employers in implementing best-practice family violence policies [within 12 months of receipt of the final report].

Sustainable and certain governance

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 193

The Victorian Government establish a governance structure for implementing the Commission's recommendations and overseeing systemic improvements in family violence policy [within two years]. The structure should consist of:

- ▷ a bipartisan standing parliamentary committee on family violence
- ▷ a Cabinet standing sub-committee chaired by the Premier of Victoria
- ▷ a family violence unit located in the Department of Premier and Cabinet
- ▷ a Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee
- ▷ Family Violence Regional Integration Committees, supported by Regional Integration Coordinators
- ▷ an independent Family Violence Agency established by statute.

Recommendation 194

The Cabinet Family Violence Sub-committee advise Cabinet on the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan based on the Commission's recommendations and be responsible for:

- ▷ specifying outcomes for achievement relating to prevention, early intervention and responses to family violence, supporting victims (including in their long-term recovery), and holding perpetrators to account
- ▷ proposing priorities for expenditure
- ▷ setting performance targets.

The sub-committee should report regularly to Cabinet on progress in implementing the plan [within 18 months].

Recommendation 195

The Victorian Government require all ministers to report regularly on the risks and opportunities in their portfolio relevant to family violence. The charter letters of all ministers should require them to consider the effect of proposed policies or legislation in their portfolios on the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan and family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 196

The Victorian Secretaries Board institute working arrangements—for example, the establishment of a sub-committee—to support effective oversight of family violence prevention and responses. Membership of the sub-committee should include the Secretaries of Treasury and Finance, Justice and Regulation, Health and Human Services, and Education and Training, the Chief Commissioner of Police and the Chief Executive Officer of Court Services Victoria. The sub-committee should be chaired by the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet [within 12 months].

Recommendation 197

The Victorian Secretaries Board advise the government [within 12 months] on all measures to be taken to develop, implement and coordinate the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan (including any adaptations that should be made to the plan in the future), among them:

- ▶ preparation of a 10-year industry plan for family violence prevention and response
- ▶ areas where joint budget bids should be made in order to give effect to new proposals
- ▶ collection, sharing and use of information to enhance system performance
- ▶ means of ensuring aligned policy development and implementation, as well as avoiding gaps and overlaps in departmental service provision
- ▶ oversight, development and adaptation of regional structures to give effect to the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
- ▶ development of processes for identifying Commonwealth and state and territory funding expended on matters relevant to family violence—including funding expended on universal services that are relevant to family violence and the cost of grants made for family violence-related projects
- ▶ a strategy for purchasing or modifying data collection systems relevant to family violence—including systems used by Victoria Police, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, the Children's Court of Victoria and the Department of Health and Human Services—to ensure there is capability to link information relevant to the safety of victims of family violence and their children.

Recommendation 198

The Victorian Government establish a family violence unit within the Department of Premier and Cabinet to support the work of the Cabinet Family Violence Sub-committee, the Victorian Secretaries Board, and the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee. The unit will lead whole-of-government work with other departments and policy units with family violence responsibilities (including the Office for Women) and should be responsible for ensuring that Victoria meets its obligations under the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children [within 12 months].

Recommendation 199

The Victorian Government establish an independent statutory Family Violence Agency [by 1 July 2017] to:

- ▷ monitor and report on implementation of the Commission's recommendations and of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
- ▷ provide expert policy advice on family violence at the request of Cabinet, the Premier or the Victorian Secretaries Board
- ▷ undertake and commission applied research, policy and evidence reviews and conduct own-motion inquiries into the operation of the family violence system
- ▷ liaise with relevant Commonwealth government and national agencies in developing policy and practice to enhance primary prevention efforts and improve responses to family violence
- ▷ establish a means by which service providers can share information about programs
- ▷ liaise with the Crime Statistics Agency and other agencies to coordinate data collection and sharing for the purposes of assessing the overall performance of systems that respond to family violence.

Recommendation 200

The Victorian Government re-establish the Violence against Women and Children Forum as the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee to advise the government on family violence policy and service provision [within 12 months]. The committee should include representation from experts, victims of family violence and system advocates with perspectives on both prevention of and support for victims of family violence. Consultation with the committee should inform the evolution and implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan.

Recommendation 201

The Victorian Government and agencies that respond to family violence identify and develop safe and constructive ways to ensure that the voices of victims are heard and inform policy development and service delivery [within two years].

Recommendation 202

With the advice of the Family Violence Agency, the Victorian Secretaries Board Family Violence Sub-committee consider how to ensure that local council performance measures are used to encourage local council activities designed to prevent family violence and to assess the outcomes of any services they provide to victims and perpetrators of family violence [by 1 July 2018].

Data, research and evaluation

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 203

The Victorian Government work with organisations it funds to provide family violence services, to improve evaluation standards [within 12 months] by, among other things:

- ▶ ensuring that where an evaluation is anticipated or expected, resources are provided to allow for the evaluation, including funding for the evaluation itself and for the design and/or implementation of processes and systems to support data collection
- ▶ ensuring that the initial period for which a program is funded contains a period of service delivery that is long enough to support a thorough evaluation of the program
- ▶ resourcing those delivering initiatives to conduct 'action research' during the life of the program, so that adaptations can be made to improve data collection and service delivery
- ▶ publishing evaluation outcomes where appropriate.

Recommendation 204

The Victorian Government work with the recommended Family Violence Agency and the Crime Statistics Agency to improve statewide family violence data collection and research [by 1 July 2018], including through:

- ▶ setting a strategic direction and addressing recurrent data gaps
- ▶ developing a statewide data framework, informed by relevant Commonwealth standards—for example, relevant Australian Bureau of Statistics frameworks such as the National Data Collection and Reporting Framework guidelines and ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) guidance. This should include shared data definitions and performance indicators, guidelines on the collection of demographic information—in particular, on older people, people with disabilities and people from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander, culturally and linguistically diverse and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities—and shared best-practice and auditing standards and procedures to foster consistency and quality among Victorian data sets
- ▶ exploring opportunities for data linkage between existing data sets and other enhancements to increase the relevance and accessibility of existing data
- ▶ holding regular stakeholder meetings to review the function and quality of the Victorian Family Violence Database.

Recommendation 205

The Crime Statistics Agency maintain and develop the Victorian Family Violence Database and consider what additional data sets should be incorporated in the database, how links between all relevant data sets can be created, and how the database can otherwise be developed [within 18 months].

Recommendation 206

The Victorian Government continue to fund ANROWS (Australia's National Organisation for Women's Safety) to do research in relation to preventing and responding to family violence.

Industry planning

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 207

The Victorian Government develop or commission the development of a 10-year industry plan for family violence prevention and response in Victoria, to be delivered by 31 December 2017, with commensurate funding for workforce transition and enhancement to begin from that date. The plan should cover:

- ▶ the workforce requirements of all government and non-government agencies and services that have or will have responsibility for preventing or responding to family violence—among them specialist family violence services, perpetrator interventions, police, legal and justice services, and universal and secondary service systems
- ▶ remuneration, capability and qualifications, workforce diversity, professional development needs, career development and workforce health.

Recommendation 208

The Australian Association of Social Workers amend the Australian Social Work Education and Accreditation Standards to require that a 'working with family violence' subject be required as a component of the core curriculum in all social work undergraduate degrees [within two years].

Recommendation 209

The Victorian Government include in the 10-year industry plan for family violence prevention and response a staged process for the introduction of mandatory qualifications for specialist family violence practitioners, so that no later than 31 December 2020 all funded services must require family violence practitioners to hold a social work or equivalent degree [within five years].

Recommendation 210

The Victorian Government encourage the Commonwealth Government to extend the HECS-HELP benefit scheme to graduates employed in specialist family violence services and associated services (such as community legal services that provide legal services to victims of family violence) [within 12 months].

Recommendation 211

The Victorian Government ensure that advanced family violence practitioner positions are established at each of the 17 recommended Support and Safety Hubs [by 1 July 2018]. As an immediate measure, additional resources should be provided to existing services, so that they can provide additional secondary consultation to universal services until the practitioner positions are established.

Recommendation 212

The Victorian Government determine the best means of delivering comprehensive workforce development and interdisciplinary learning about family violence across the health, human services and justice sectors. This should include consideration of the New South Wales Education Centre Against Violence model [within two years].

Recommendation 213

The Victorian Government establish family violence principal practitioner positions in the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Education and Training and the Department of Justice and Regulation [by 31 December 2016].

Recommendation 214

The Victorian Attorney-General consider, when recommending appointments to the magistracy, potential appointees' knowledge, experience, skills and aptitude for hearing cases involving family violence, including their knowledge of relevant aspects of federal family law [within 12 months].

Recommendation 215

The Judicial College of Victoria include material on the dynamics and complexities of family violence in other general programs offered to all judicial officers and Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal members, in addition to the specific family violence programs and resources provided to date [within 12 months].

Recommendation 216

The Victorian Government provide funding to continue the development of comprehensive family violence learning and development training covering family violence, family law and child protection for court staff and judicial officers [within 12 months].

Investment

The Royal Commission recommends that:

Recommendation 217

The Victorian Government introduce in the 2017–18 State Budget additional output performance measures relating to the prevention of family violence and the assistance provided to victims and perpetrators in order to increase the visibility of family violence in budgetary processes.

Recommendation 218

The Victorian Government, in preparing the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, consider whether further changes should be made to budget systems to better reflect the central role of government in preventing and responding to family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 219

The Victorian Government [within 12 months]:

- ▷ commission or itself perform rigorous and consistent measurement of the cost of family violence to government, the community and individuals
- ▷ require departments and agencies to establish consistent methods of collecting data—including data on costs incurred by generalist services—on activities relating to family violence prevention and response and include that information in their annual reports.

Recommendation 220

The Victorian Government ensure that the recommended Statewide Family Violence Action Plan emphasises prevention, early intervention and supporting the long-term recovery of victims. It should also identify the funding that will be required to pursue these goals [within 18 months].

Recommendation 221

In the 2016–17 State Budget the Victorian Government give priority to:

- ▶ providing an immediate funding boost to increase the capacity of specialist family violence services and Integrated Family Services to respond to existing demand
- ▶ implementation of the Commission's recommendations that relate to that budget period.

Recommendation 222

The Victorian Government treat the extension of the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness as a matter of urgency and pursue it immediately with the Commonwealth Government [within 12 months].

Recommendation 223

The Victorian Government develop a demand-modelling tool or set of indicators to be used for planning how government as a whole and relevant departments and agencies themselves (including those providing or funding universal services) respond to family violence [within two years]. Budget processes should take account of the cost of forecast demand.

Recommendation 224

The Victorian Secretaries Board develop and promulgate principles for purchasing services that will contribute to achieving the goals of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan [within 18 months]. These principles should include:

- ▶ measures to encourage service providers to collaborate in order to enable clients to receive a broader range of services
- ▶ ways of simplifying pathways of support
- ▶ ensuring victims and their children have access to a comprehensive range of services, regardless of where they live in Victoria
- ▶ allowing sufficient time for piloting, evaluation and adaptive management of new programs.

Recommendation 225

The Victorian Government require departments and agencies to introduce measures of contractual performance by service providers that more accurately reflect the objectives of ensuring victims' safety, preventing family violence and supporting those affected by it, and keeping perpetrators accountable [within 12 months].

Recommendation 226

Victorian government departments and agencies establish processes for regular overview and evaluation of funded services and programs, based on the recommended principles adopted by the Victorian Secretaries Board. The processes should involve independent experts as well as departmental staff [within 12 months].

Recommendation 227

The Victorian Government investigate options for increasing its capacity to invest in preventing and responding to family violence, including by:

- ▷ redirecting existing revenue sources towards family violence expenditure
- ▷ identifying new revenue sources
- ▷ exploring the possibility of entering into a partnership agreement with the Commonwealth Government in areas of overlapping responsibility.

Acknowledgements

Together with my fellow Commissioners, Patricia Faulkner AO and Tony Nicholson, we thank the many people who contributed to the work of the Commission. Some of these contributors have been personally affected by family violence, others came from organisations that provide support to victims of family violence and work with perpetrators. We are very grateful to all those who attended our community consultations, who made submissions to the Commission, who appeared at our public hearings, and who attended our roundtables.

In just over a year the Commission had to establish an office, appoint staff, absorb submissions, conduct consultations and public hearings and undertake research and analysis. Some staff members were with us for the whole of the Commission's term, others joined us for extended periods, and yet others contributed intensely over short periods. We could not have completed our final report without the extraordinary dedication, knowledge and hard work of all of these people. We thank them all.

The Commission's Chief Executive Officer, Mary Polis, provided exceptional leadership, advice and support. She managed Commission staff with calm and confidence, and her intellectual rigour and ideas contributed to all aspects of the report. As well as overseeing the operations of the Commission, she drafted a number of chapters and gave helpful guidance on the structure of others. She also liaised with government.

From the beginning the Commission was aware of the benefit of learning from the many dedicated people who have worked in the area of family violence over many years, as well as the importance of hearing from people affected by family violence. We also sought to inform the community about the prevalence and effects of family violence and to encourage individuals and organisations to become involved in its prevention. Our Director of Community Engagement, Annie Tinney, was responsible for overseeing our community consultation and submission processes. Annie brought a wealth of experience about policy development and community engagement processes. She oversaw the production of our final report, and managed our support team so that they were able to meet tight deadlines, despite their heavy workload. The work she did and her advice to the Commissioners was invaluable.

Lana Kolyunski took primary responsibility for arranging visits around Victoria and contacting local groups to identify the individuals and organisations with whom we should consult, as well as making sure this was a sensitively handled process. Annie and Lana were ably supported by Clare Cartledge, Emma Choy, Amy Shields and Lucy Larkins, who were unfailingly professional and adept in helping to organise our consultations, manage our submission process, assist with report production and respond to the many queries we received about the work of the Commission. Tracey Matters, our Media and Communications Manager, was vital in raising awareness of the problems of family violence with the public, and liaising with the press, especially during the public hearings. Tracey played a significant role in ensuring the quality of the design and printing the final report.

An effective response to family violence requires familiarity with a very wide range of subject areas. The Commission also had to understand and absorb the vast amount of information collected through our consultations, submissions, public hearings and roundtables. Our Research and Policy Team, headed by Michelle Burrell, rose to that challenge. Michelle challenged received wisdom and came up with original policy ideas. She inspired and supported the members of her team, oversaw the production of all drafts of the chapters in our report and wrote a number of chapters herself. Her ideas, enormous energy and leadership played a major role in shaping the final report.

Our researchers and writers included Rachael Green, Anthony Lawrie, John Maloney, Elda Colagrande, Hilary Little, Sally Finlay, Jacinth Pathmanathan, Becky Batagol, Alexia Staker, Amber Witcher and Dana Rechtman. We benefited greatly from their expertise, dedication and sheer hard work, which frequently involved them working late at night and over weekends. Tim McCarthy, our part-time librarian managed the large number of Commission resources. Our researchers were supported by a number of other contributors and a knowledgeable and skilled group of editors, led by Sam Horsfield, Kristie Dunn and Chris Pirie. Our thanks also go to the Crimes Statistics Agency for assistance with the statistics in the final report.

Our Principal Legal Advisor, Jared Heath, gave the Commission exemplary support on legal issues, and oversaw our hearing processes, the issuing of notices to produce and the legal review of the final report. Jared's advice and guidance was a valuable asset to the Commission. His legal team from Corrs Chambers Westgarth was responsible for taking witness statements and providing Commissioners and Counsel Assisting with support during the public hearings and were indefatigable and always helpful in reviewing the legal accuracy of the report. Jared and some members of his team, including Clare Parsons, Lucy Duggan, Alannah Hogan, Ben Russo and Anna Crowley also undertook research and drafted chapters or sections of the report. Evelyn Vagias also provided dedicated assistance as part of the Commission's legal team.

Our Counsel Assisting, Mark Moshinsky QC, now the Honourable Justice Moshinsky, Rachel Ellyard and Joanna Davidson, assisted the Commission during our public hearings in July/August and October 2015. Together with our legal and research teams, they identified the major issues to be explored and the witnesses who were called. The team was required to adapt hearing procedures to the policy nature of our terms of reference and did so superbly. The process of hearing witnesses concurrently to test differences of opinion enabled us to hear from a very large number of experts over a comparatively short period. The work of our legal team and Counsel Assisting helped us to refine our policy thinking in many ways.

Our thanks go to my Executive Associate, Joanna Rolfe, a former family lawyer who was well informed on the subject content and has magnificent organisational skills. Joanna performed many different functions, including providing high level support to all three Commissioners, drafting chapters for the final report, and assuming the lead on tipstaff duties during hearings. We are very grateful for her work.

We thank our corporate services team, headed by Kaye Fox, who managed all of the Commission's procurement and operational requirements. Kaye was ably supported by Pia Lindgren and Lisa Burke who together attended to the wellbeing of our team throughout the year. The Commission received considerable support from icourts, notably Kirsty Duncan and Ashley White, with our submission processes, public hearings and report compilation. The Commission received valuable IT support from Louis Carstens and Asanka Ranawaka from Dimension Data.

Finally, we thank the capable and dedicated interns, junior law graduates and other people who performed particular tasks for the Commission over short periods. We have not mentioned them by name, but acknowledge their substantial contribution.

Commissioner

1 The Royal Commission and its work

Establishment

Family violence is a pervasive social harm, which blights the lives of many Victorians. To build on past reforms and to propose new ways of preventing family violence and supporting victims, the Royal Commission into Family Violence was established by Letters Patent issued by the Governor of Victoria, on advice from the Premier, on 22 February 2015. The Letters Patent appointed The Hon. Marcia Neave AO as Commissioner and Chairperson and Ms Patricia Faulkner AO and Mr Tony Nicholson as Deputy Commissioners.

This was the first royal commission to be established and conducted under the Inquiries Act 2014 (Vic).

The terms of reference for the inquiry are set out in the Letters Patent (see Appendix A). The Commission was asked 'to inquire into and report on how Victoria's response to family violence can be improved by providing practical recommendations to stop family violence'. The terms of reference required the Commission to do the following:

- ▷ examine and evaluate strategies, frameworks, policies, programs and services and establish best practice for four areas—the prevention of family violence; early intervention to identify and protect those at risk of family violence and prevent the escalation of family violence; support for victims of family violence and measures to redress the impacts on victims, particularly on women and children; and accountability for perpetrators of family violence
- ▷ investigate means of ensuring systemic responses to family violence, particularly in the legal system and by police, corrections, child protection, legal and family violence support services—including reducing re-offending and changing violent and controlling behaviours
- ▷ investigate how government agencies and community organisations can better integrate and coordinate their efforts
- ▷ make recommendations on how best to evaluate and measure the success of strategies and programs put in place to stop family violence.

The Commission was also asked to consider the need to establish a culture of non-violence and gender equity and the needs and experiences of all those affected by family violence—among them children; older people; Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities; culturally and linguistically diverse communities; gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities; regional, rural and remote communities; and people with disabilities and complex needs. In addition, the Commission was asked to consider the necessity for short, medium and long-term solutions to the problem of family violence and the need for coordination across jurisdictions.

The Commission was originally asked to report its findings and recommendations to the Governor of Victoria by 29 February 2016. On 23 December 2015, following a request by the Commission, the Governor amended the Letters Patent to extend the reporting date to 29 March 2016. Appendix B is the amendment to the Letters Patent.

The Letters Patent authorised the Commission to incur expenses and financial obligations up to $36 million. The Commission's estimated total expenditure was $13.5 million. A statement of expenditure appears at Appendix C.

The Commission's processes

The Commission's processes reflected the distinctive nature of the terms of reference, which called for recommendations on matters of policy, rather than factual findings about particular past events. It was, therefore, important to consult victims of family violence and people and organisations with experience in assisting victims and perpetrators of family violence. The Commission also held expert roundtable discussions to canvass policy considerations relevant to such violence. This occurred alongside the formal processes of receiving evidence from witnesses during the public hearings that are more commonly associated with royal commissions.

The Commission was operating during a period of frequent changes to policy and practice and continuing community discussion about family violence. We adapted our program and lines of inquiry as new research findings were released and new initiatives were announced. Some changes closed off areas of inquiry; for example, we did not consider enforcement of interstate family violence intervention orders because this requires the involvement of all states and territories and is being pursued by the Council of Australian Governments.

The Commission also aimed to ensure that it raised awareness about the prevalence, incidence and effects of family violence and about the activities and deliberations of other organisations working to address it. The public hearings were broadcast live over the internet, and submissions, witness statements and hearing transcripts were published on our website.

Although the task was challenging, a number of positive factors contributed to the Commission's ability to conduct a detailed and thorough inquiry. First, we were able to build on an existing body of knowledge, research and analysis. Secondly, we learnt from people with expertise in and experience of current responses to family violence, both in Victoria and elsewhere, who came to us with an enormous optimism, vigour and commitment to the people they assist and to the task of ending family violence. We learnt a great deal from them. Thirdly, we worked in an environment in which the general community also shared a commitment to improving Victoria's response to family violence and a willingness to work towards this objective.

Because the Commission's task was to identify practical measures for improving the response to family violence, the public hearings, submissions and consultations focused on identifying good practices and on improving system-wide responses to family violence. Although the people we consulted had the shared goal of reducing and preventing family violence and reducing its damaging effects, they did not necessarily agree on how to achieve that goal. The Commission was committed to exploring competing views and contested ideas and to facilitating constructive debate. We hope, as a result, that people have found new areas of common ground and new opportunities for collaboration.

We were conscious that our processes placed demands on organisations that struggle daily to meet high demand for their services and have few or no resources to dedicate or divert to things such as writing submissions and attending consultations and hearings. Many services and individuals have been calling for reform of family violence policy for years—if not decades.

We were also aware that, by inviting individuals to share their experiences of family violence, there was a risk we would delay their recovery from its effects. Throughout the inquiry we aimed to deal supportively and respectfully with people affected by family violence and to make their experience of being heard as positive as possible.

Submissions

The Commission called for written submissions responding to its terms of reference and fixed a closing date of 29 May 2015. This date was chosen to give people as much time as possible to prepare their submissions, while ensuring that we were able to read and analyse the submissions before the public hearings began in July 2015.

On 31 March 2015 the Commission released an issues paper to guide organisations and individuals in the preparation of their submissions. The paper posed a series of questions arising from the terms of reference that people could use for guidance if they wished. No format was prescribed for the submissions: they could be typed or handwritten and lodged through the Commission's website or provided by email, post or hand delivery. We also provided an assisted submissions service for people who could not easily make written submissions; they were able to make their submission orally, and it was written up by a member of the Commission's staff.

The Commission was keen to receive submissions from a wide range of individuals and organisations—including people directly affected by family violence, those working in services that assist people experiencing violence, representatives of government agencies, business and the community, and experts working in relevant fields. In all, 968 submissions were received. Of these, 491 were from individuals and 477 were from organisations. Thirty-three people made assisted submissions. After the submissions had been read and analysed, and requests for confidentiality or anonymity taken into account, the majority of submissions were published on the Commission's website. This was done on a rolling basis.

The submissions covered a wide variety of topics, reflecting the breadth of the terms of reference, the complexity of the factors that affect family violence, and the diversity of experience, expertise and interest in family violence. They played a very important part in the work of the Commission, contributing directly to the questions examined during the public hearings and in roundtables, and are drawn on extensively in this report.

The Commission is indebted to all who prepared submissions and grateful for the efforts people made to bring relevant, thoughtful material to our attention. We are particularly grateful to the individuals who used their personal, often traumatic, experiences as a basis for proposing changes to policy and service responses to family violence. Some did so by writing their own submissions; others' stories were provided by organisations that compiled case studies. These accounts ensured we were constantly reminded of the personal toll of family violence and of what had or had not helped people affected by such violence.

Community consultations

The Commission held most of its community consultation sessions between 21 April and 7 July 2015. (Several sessions were held after this to accommodate sessions that could not be scheduled during the main consultation phase.) A four-week campaign plan to advertise the consultations began on 13 April 2015. For safety reasons, we did not disclose the locations, dates or venues of the consultations in advertisements, which appeared in Melbourne and regional newspapers; instead, people interested in attending were asked to call the Commission's inquiry line to register their interest. In addition to the public advertisements, the Commission liaised with the Regional Integration Coordinators funded by the Department of Health and Human Services to ensure that information about the consultations was circulated through local family violence services and networks.

Nearly 850 people attended the 44 consultation sessions, which were held in 21 locations in metropolitan Melbourne and regional Victoria. They included individuals who had experienced family violence as well as representatives of organisations working in the family violence system.

The people the Commission heard from who had directly experienced family violence included people from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, women from culturally and linguistically diverse communities, women with disabilities, older people abused by family members, women in prison, sex workers, and men who had been affected by family violence or who had themselves been violent. People attending the sessions were invited to speak of their experiences—where they had first sought help, what had worked well for them, what had not worked well, and what improvements might be made in future. The discussions were generally held in small groups, with the commissioners moving from table to table to listen and ask questions. Psychologists attended each of the sessions to provide support when necessary.

In the consultations with people who come in contact with family violence through their work, the Commission heard from representatives of specialist family violence services and mainstream organisations, judicial officers, child protection workers, police, academics, maternal and child health nurses and other health professionals, faith leaders, teachers, lawyers, court staff, people working with children and young people, and representatives of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities. Generally, people attending the sessions were invited to choose their preferred topic of discussion—prevention and early intervention or safety and accountability. The topics were then discussed in small groups, each group being asked to consider three or four questions. As with the other sessions, the commissioners moved from table to table to listen and ask questions. A plenary was held at the end of each session. A spokesperson from each table reported back to the whole group on the main three or four areas for improvement identified at their respective tables. At the end of the plenary Commissioner Neave summarised the feedback.

Professional facilitators were engaged to facilitate the majority of the consultation sessions, and Commission staff attended all sessions to act as scribes at each of the tables. Information from the consultations, along with that from written submissions, helped shape the public hearings program and witness list, and was also used in the development of this report and the Commission's recommendations.

The consultations afforded individuals and organisations an opportunity to express their views and offer their ideas in an open and informal way. Often the process also led to individuals affected by family violence, as well as people working in the area of family violence, meeting each other for the first time. After some of the meetings participants told us they intended to maintain these contacts. The Commission hopes that some of these relationships have continued: as well as eliciting valuable information, the consultations were intended to encourage informal contact and information sharing between service providers who might not otherwise have worked together.

The Commission thanks all those who attended the consultation sessions and shared their experiences and expertise.

Briefings and site visits

The Commission received informal briefings from experts and visited a range of organisations during the course of its inquiry. The following people provided briefings:

- ▷ judges and magistrates
- ▷ chief executives and other leaders of both specialist organisations in the family violence sector and mainstream services involved with family violence
- ▷ senior representatives of Victoria Police
- ▷ senior representatives of government and statutory bodies
- ▷ academics and researchers
- ▷ individuals directly affected by family violence-related homicides
- ▷ representatives with expertise in particular aspects of family violence systems in New South Wales, South Australia, Tasmania, the Australian Capital Territory (including Commonwealth government representatives), New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Commission conducted site visits at a number of locations:

- ▷ Dandenong, Frankston, Ballarat and Kyneton Magistrates' Courts
- ▷ specialist family violence services—including refuges
- ▷ the premises of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander organisations
- ▷ schools
- ▷ police stations
- ▷ sexual assault multi-disciplinary centres
- ▷ the premises of mainstream organisations providing family violence services
- ▷ a session of a men's behaviour change program
- ▷ classroom observation of family violence training at the Victoria Police Academy.

It also visited South Australia, New South Wales and the Australian Capital Territory.

The Commissioner spent an afternoon and evening following a police van and observing how Victoria Police members respond to family violence incidents. Both Deputy Commissioners also spent time speaking to police members at different stations and observing general police duties and police family violence teams. In addition, Commission staff and Counsel Assisting participated in a training session on the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF), conducted by Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria.

These visits and briefings were invaluable in bringing to life matters canvassed in the more formal processes. They alerted us to the practical problems that arise when supporting victims of family violence and allowed us to ask detailed questions of experts. This helped guide the development of our research agenda and the content of our public hearings. Everyone who spoke to the Commission in this informal way was generous with their time and insights.

Public hearings

As noted, the task of this Royal Commission was to set directions for future family violence policy, rather than carrying out a forensic investigation into the cause or occurrence of a particular event with a view to determining fault or liability. Public hearings were used to highlight policy debates about the best way forward, and witnesses were sometimes asked to give evidence alongside each other in order to explore differences in proposed policy approaches.

Although the primary purpose of all the Commission's processes was to identify how responses to family violence could be improved, we also sought to increase community awareness of the nature, dynamics, prevalence and effects of family violence. We took this into account in arranging the public hearings, issuing regular press releases describing the evidence given at the hearings and streaming the proceedings live on the internet—except for the evidence of lay witnesses, whose evidence was subject to restricted publication orders. Transcripts of proceedings and relevant witness statements were placed on our website on the working day following each day of hearings.

In March 2015 the Commission appointed Mr Mark Moshinsky QC (now the Hon. Justice Mark Moshinsky), Ms Rachel Ellyard and Ms Joanna Davidson as Counsel Assisting the Commission. Their primary role was to oversee the public hearing process, including developing topics for discussion, selecting and preparing witnesses, and examining witnesses. They also attended several community consultation sessions, and the Commission briefed them in detail about subjects raised throughout the consultations, in submissions and in the relevant literature. The Commission expresses its gratitude for the hard work, expertise and assistance of its Counsel.

The Commission invited applications for leave to appear. The only party granted leave to do so was the State of Victoria, which assisted in the selection of state witnesses, prepared the witness statements and attended the hearings but, by agreement, left the questioning of witnesses to Counsel Assisting and the commissioners. This contributed to the Commission operating in a non-adversarial manner, which was consistent with its function of making recommendations on policies and systems reform. We are most grateful for the cooperation of Ms Rowena Orr QC, Counsel for the State of Victoria, and her team, who helped us achieve this goal.

Twenty-five days of public hearings were held during a four-week period in July–August 2015 and a week in October 2015. Two-hundred and twenty individual witnesses gave evidence, sometimes on multiple occasions (see Appendix D). Many witnesses appeared as members of panels; 13 witnesses appeared via video link and two by telephone.

The hearings were organised around 23 modules that focused on specific topics (see Appendix E) but did not cover or purport to cover all the matters to be considered by the Commission. Some of the matters in this report were not covered in the public hearings. Where appropriate, such topics were discussed at roundtables or through other forms of consultation.

The Commission invited eight individuals who had direct experience of family violence, either as a victim or, in one instance, as someone who had used violence, to give evidence about their experiences of current responses to family violence. A ninth person provided a written statement. The Commission refers to these witnesses as 'lay witnesses', and they were all assigned pseudonyms. The purpose of their evidence was to highlight strengths and weaknesses in services' and agencies' responses to family violence. Eight of the nine lay witness statements are presented in Appendix F; for safety reasons, one of the statements remains unpublished.

The Commission is very grateful to all people who provided statements and appeared as witnesses. They contributed substantial amounts of time to the hearings process, both in the preparation of their witness statements in advance and on the day or days of their attendance. The Commission offers particular thanks to front-line staff in organisations and agencies, who candidly and generously explained their work and insights, and to the individuals who so bravely described private and traumatic experiences in the hope that this would help others in the future.

Roundtable discussions

The Commission held six roundtable discussions on specific topics in the period between the two blocks of public hearings. The aim was to delve more deeply into topics that had been touched on in the public hearings. A list of roundtable discussions and the individuals who attended is provided in Appendix G.

Each roundtable discussion was attended by between six and 11 participants, as well as commissioners and staff of the Commission. Among the participants were judges, magistrates, academics, current and former representatives of government agencies, policy-makers and service providers. The sessions were kept confidential in order to facilitate the candid exchange of views and ideas. The information gathered was, however, used in preparing this report and the Commission's recommendations. The contents of the sessions are referred to throughout the report, but comments are not attributed to individual participants.

Commissioned research

In addition to relying on the work of our research team, we commissioned two pieces of research—a report on family violence trends in Victoria from 2009–10 to 2013–14 and a report on the impact of family violence proceedings in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria.

The Victorian Family Violence Database trend report 2009–10 to 2013–14

The Victorian Family Violence Database operated between 1999 and 2010 and was the repository for data from a range of sources—Victoria Police, the Magistrates' and Children's Courts, the Magistrates' Court Family Violence Division Courts and specialist family violence courts,¹ the Victims of Crime Helpline and the Victims Assistance and Counselling Program, the Department of Health and Human Services Integrated Risk Information database, the Victorian Supported Accommodation Assistance Program (now the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection), Victorian public hospital emergency departments, the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, and Victoria Legal Aid.

The most recent publication from the database, covering the period 1999 to 2010, was released in 2012, which means there has been no publicly available compilation of trend data for a number of years. Although the database had many limitations, its cessation has been a major loss for effective policy making. During this time data has continued to be collated, but information has generally been reported separately by each department and agency. Even within the same department or agency there is often more than one database and limited capacity for linking the information held in each source. For example, the Magistrates' Court holds data in separate civil and criminal law databases that are not linked.

To overcome this problem, the Commission sought data from departments under notices to produce and from Victoria Police, agencies, and the Magistrates' and Children's Courts. We then engaged the Crime Statistics Agency to analyse the data and report on family violence trends for the five years from July 2009 to June 2014. This data appears throughout the Commission's report. The agency's report appears in full in Volume VII.

The Commission thanks the Crime Statistics Agency for performing this complex task in a very short time. We would also like to thank the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare for its contribution to the CSA's work.

We note that the Victims Support Agency is working towards the production of more regular and focused data reports from the Family Violence Database (collated by the CSA). This is a positive development.

Understanding family violence proceedings in magistrates' courts

In recent years there has been a big increase in the number and complexity of family violence-related matters initiated in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria. This has placed unprecedented pressure on the operations of the court and on court users. The Commission wanted to gain a better understanding of the substance and outcomes of particular hearings than could be understood from existing data, as well as of the daily impact of family violence cases on the court and its lists. As part of that, we sought to determine whether courts have sufficient capacity to give adequate time and attention to each matter, provide a considered and appropriate outcome, and ensure safety for victims. This information was used to inform many of the recommendations made in this report.

In collaboration with the Magistrates' Court, the Commission engaged Dr Karen Gelb, a researcher and criminologist, to conduct the research, which involved observation of a number of courts in metropolitan and regional locations and analysis of de-identified case data. Access to individuals' files was restricted to court personnel, so ethics approval was not required.

The courts were chosen on the basis of a 'typical' spread of family violence cases in each type of court. The locations chosen were as follows:

- ▷ Ballarat, Family Violence Division—a large regional court; the region's headquarter court; 1044 family violence intervention order applications finalised in 2014–15²
- ▷ Geelong—a large regional court; the region's headquarter court; neither a Family Violence Division nor a specialist court; 1879 FVIO applications finalised
- ▷ Wangaratta—a mid-size regional court; neither a Family Violence Division nor a specialist court; 334 FVIO applications finalised
- ▷ Maryborough—a small regional court; neither a Family Violence Division nor a specialist court; 142 FVIO applications finalised
- ▷ Melbourne—a large metropolitan court; the region's headquarter court, with specialist family violence services; 2656 FVIO applications finalised
- ▷ Sunshine—a busy suburban court, with specialist family violence services; 2907 FVIO applications finalised
- ▷ Dandenong—a large suburban court; neither a Family Violence Division nor a specialist court but does have community-based family violence service providers; the busiest court for finalised FVIO applications in 2014–15, with 3228 finalised applications.³

The research methodology included interviews with judicial officers, court staff, duty lawyers from Victoria Legal Aid and community legal services, police, representatives of specialist family violence services, Court Network volunteers and representatives of other services at each court. Applicant and respondent workers were also interviewed in locations where these services are provided. The Commission thanks participants—and, in particular, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria—for their cooperation and assistance.

Information gathered as a result of Dr Gelb's research appears throughout this report. Her full report is presented in Volume VII.

Interaction with government

The Victorian Government established the Royal Commission Engagement Secretariat within the Department of Premier and Cabinet to coordinate and oversee the government response to the Commission. The Commission's chief executive officer and other staff members met regularly with officers from the secretariat to facilitate access to data and documents. Additionally, the Commission was briefed by government representatives from time to time on work being done in the area of family violence while the Commission was operating.

The Commission also entered into protocols with the government and Victoria Police to define the processes for production of relevant documents. The protocols provided for preliminary discussions to be held with departmental and agency officers to identify the data sets and documents held across government. This was followed by formal requests (including the serving of notices to produce) for production of materials in accordance with the provisions of the Inquiries Act.

Liaison with courts

Along with other agencies and services, Victorian courts play a central role in responding to family violence, protecting those at risk of violence and holding perpetrators to account.

Section 123 of the Inquiries Act provides that a royal commission cannot inquire into or exercise any powers in relation to (among other persons or bodies) a Victorian court, a member of the staff of Court Services Victoria in connection with the performance of judicial or quasi-judicial functions of a Victorian court, and the Director of Public Prosecutions.

The Victorian courts and Court Services Victoria voluntarily made a substantial contribution to the Commission's inquiry through presenting written submissions, providing informal briefings, facilitating court visits, attending roundtable discussions, and providing data and documents. In addition, the President of the Children's Court and four magistrates participated in the Commission's public hearings.

The Commission also received valuable input from the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia through a joint submission and informal briefings. We also arranged a roundtable with judges of the Family Court and the Federal Circuit Court to discuss family violence issues that can arise in the interaction between Family Court, Magistrates' Court and Children's Court proceedings.

The Commission did not seek to inquire into any particular case or the performance of any particular judicial officer of a Victorian court. Similarly, although section 123 does not specifically refer to the Family Court of Australia or the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, the Commission did not seek to inquire into any particular case or the performance of any particular judicial officer of those courts.

Since potential legislative, policy and practice reforms might affect the role and function of the courts, the Commission considered matters relevant to the general operation of these courts without seeking to formally inquire into them. The voluntary contributions of these courts gave the Commission an understanding of their administrative structures, policies, practices and future plans. These are relevant to family violence and the current legal framework. The Commission took into account the perspectives of relevant judicial officers about possible areas for reform and their possible consequences for the courts.

Terminology

A glossary appears at the end of each volume of this report. It is useful, though, to discuss here some of the primary expressions the Commission uses in connection with family violence, affected communities, the police, the courts and service providers.

Language describing violence

'Family violence' is the term used throughout this report to refer to a wide range of behaviours, as defined in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). The definition is discussed in Chapter 2.

In submissions and evidence some people referred to 'violence against women', 'domestic violence' or 'intimate partner violence'. These terms also appear in the literature. When the Commission is quoting from primary materials it uses those terms as they appear; otherwise, 'family violence' is the expression of choice.

'Domestic violence' is sometimes used to refer to acts of violence between intimate partners and violence in the context of family relationships; it is used in legislation in other jurisdictions and in some parts of the service system in Victoria. 'Intimate partner violence' is commonly used to highlight the predominant manifestation of the violence, which is in the context of intimate partner relationships.

Language about victims and perpetrators

State and national policy and the non-government service sector primarily use the terms 'victim', 'victim/survivor' and 'women and their children who experience violence'.

In Victoria, the majority of applications for family violence intervention orders are now made by Victoria Police. In the case of a police-made application for a family violence intervention order, the term 'affected family member' is used to describe the person who is to be protected by the order, while the term 'other party' is used to describe the person against whom the order is sought. In applications not involving the police, the word 'applicant' is used to describe the person seeking the order and 'respondent' is used to describe the person against whom it is sought. The word 'defendant' is used to describe a person being prosecuted for a family violence offence; the word 'offender' is used to describe a person who has been found guilty of such an offence.

Apart from when legal proceedings are being described, the Commission generally uses the term 'victim' of family violence throughout its report, since this is the term most commonly used in the community. The Commission recognises that some people consider 'victim' problematic because it suggests that people who have experienced family violence are helpless or lack the capacity to make rational choices about how to respond to the violence. The Commission uses 'victim/survivor' to specifically describe people who have experienced sexual assault, which is consistent with the Centres Against Sexual Assault terminology and general terminology in this field.

A broad range of terminology is used in relation to people who use violence, including 'perpetrators' and 'men who use violence'. 'Perpetrator' is the term used in state and national policy. The phrase 'men who use violence' is sometimes used by the non-government sector in Victoria, including organisations that run men's behaviour change programs; this phrase recognises that the majority of family violence that occurs is violence perpetrated by men against women, and it places responsibility for the violence with the man who uses it.

For the purposes of this report, the Commission uses the terms 'people who use violence', 'men who use violence' and 'perpetrator' interchangeably—except when specifically referring to adolescents or women who use violence.

In using the terminology just described, the Commission recognises that family violence should not define victims and their futures. Nor should it define the perpetrator for life: the aim must be to end that individual's use of violence.

Language describing communities

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples

In this report the Commission is generally referring to family violence in Aboriginal, not Torres Strait Islander, communities. For this reason we usually refer to Aboriginal peoples and communities rather than to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples and communities. This also reflects the language of the majority of the submissions presented to the Commission. In using 'Aboriginal peoples and communities', the Commission does not intend to exclude Torres Strait Islander peoples and communities from its deliberations and recommendations.

When citing publicly available research or data, however, the Commission adopts the terminology used in the original document; this includes using 'Indigenous', 'Koori' and 'Koorie'. 'Koori' and 'Koorie' are also used if inquiry participants used those terms in submissions, consultations or evidence. South-eastern Victorian Aboriginal people use 'Koori' to define a collective Aboriginality. The Commission acknowledges, however, that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples from throughout Australia live in Victoria and the word 'Koori' does not accurately describe all these people.

Culturally and linguistically diverse communities

The term 'culturally and linguistically diverse communities', or 'CALD', is used throughout the report to reflect the fact that the Victorian population is diverse. The Commission recognises that in considering prevention and responses to family violence the distinct identity of each community needs to be considered.

If primary sources use the terms 'non-English speaking', 'ethnic', 'refugee and newly arrived communities' or 'religious communities', the Commission uses that terminology as it appears in the source.

Faith-based communities

'Faith-based communities' is used in recognition that people of various faiths might not come within the description 'culturally and linguistically diverse communities' and might have distinctive experiences of family violence. Some members of faith communities come from CALD backgrounds; others do not.

Disability

The term 'disability' is used in this report to reflect the language in the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

The term 'cognitive impairment' is used if the primary material uses that term; otherwise, the specific disability is referred to—for example, intellectual disability or acquired brain injury.

'Mental illness' is used throughout the report as this is the terminology generally used in the community, although the Commission acknowledges that some people prefer the term 'mental health disability' or 'mental ill-health'. The Commission recognises, too, that other terms, such as 'psychosocial disability', might be preferred by people with disabilities.

The Commission adopted a social definition of disability in the knowledge that, although a person might have a disability, it is often society's reaction to the disability that prevents the person's full participation in society and this is what has the disabling effect.

People who have experienced transphobia or homophobia

The term 'lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex', commonly abbreviated to LGBTI, is used in many submissions and other primary sources. The Commission recognises that transgender and intersex people have traditionally been aligned in the literature with gay, lesbian and bisexual people because of shared or similar experiences of discrimination. Sexuality, gender identity and (non-binary) physical sex characteristics are, however, fundamentally different, and people in these communities should not be treated as though they form a homogenous group who all have the same experiences.

'Sexual orientation' refers to sexual and emotional attraction to people of a particular sex or sexes. In this report the Commission uses the terms 'lesbian', 'gay' and 'bisexual', although we recognise that community members can use other terms to describe themselves. When we refer to lesbian, gay and bisexual young people we use the term 'same-sex attracted';⁴ for transgender and intersex young people we use the term 'gender diverse'.

'Transgender' is an umbrella term that is used to describe a person whose gender identity differs from their physical sex as recorded at birth. 'Transitioning' refers to the process whereby a transgender person embarks on the changes that will ultimately mean living as a member of another sex. This is sometimes referred to as the person 'affirming' their gender because transitioning means they start the process of living in what they identify as their true gender. The Commission recognises that, for people who are transitioning, or affirming their gender, having their identity fully recognised in all areas of life is a crucial part of the experience of living as an individual of their affirmed gender.

'Sex' refers to a person's physical sex characteristics. The Commission recognises that sex is not binary and includes people who are intersex, people who are a combination or are on a spectrum of being male and female, and people who identify as being physically indeterminate.

'Intersex' refers to people who are born with physical, hormonal or genetic features that are neither wholly female nor wholly male, are a combination of female and male, or are neither female nor male.

Although 'gender identity' has a specific meaning under the Equal Opportunity Act, more broadly the term refers to identifying as male or female as defined by social and cultural behaviours and assumptions about identity, roles and appearance.

Language describing ‘the system’

The Commission uses the term ‘family violence system’ to refer to the many different organisations and services that victims and perpetrators of family violence might encounter as a result of family violence. This includes the police, the courts, specialist family violence services including men’s family violence services; it can also include other services working with the victim or perpetrator as part of the response to family violence—for example, Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services, Child Protection; health, education, legal and housing services; and Corrections Victoria.

The term ‘response’ is used to refer to action taken after violence occurs—for example, provision of crisis accommodation, counselling and support; police and civil and criminal justice responses; and perpetrator interventions.

‘Perpetrator interventions’ incorporates a broad range of responses for perpetrators, among them responses ordered by a court and other programs that provide education and rehabilitation for perpetrators, such as men’s behaviour change programs.

‘Primary prevention’ is the term the Commission uses to describe action that seeks to prevent violence occurring. Such action can be aimed at the population as a whole or be tailored to particular groups or communities. ‘Early intervention’—sometimes referred to as ‘secondary prevention’—is directed at individuals and groups who display signs that they may use violence or of being subject to violence. Early intervention forms part of response.

Victoria Police uses the term ‘police member’. Most people who presented submissions or gave evidence to the Commission used ‘police officer’, and the two expressions are used interchangeably in the report.

Endnotes

- ¹ For more information about the Magistrates' Court Family Violence Divisions and specialist family violence courts see Chapter 16.
- ² Includes original and secondary applications (applications to vary, extend and revoke).
- ³ Note that there will generally be multiple court visits before a matter is finalised—this is explored further on Chapter 16. See Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, Attachment 2.
- ⁴ As reflected in 'Writing Themselves In: A National Report on the Sexuality, Health and Well-Being of Same Sex Attracted Young People', and the approach adopted in other publications addressing young people's sexuality, the Commission adopts the expression "same-sex attracted" so as not to make any assumptions that same-sex attraction, feelings and behaviours necessarily entail the adoption of a particular form of identity. This is not intended to suggest that young people do not have the right or capacity to identify themselves as gay, lesbian, bisexual or otherwise: Lynee Hillier et al, 'Writing Themselves In: A National Report on the Sexuality, Health and Well-Being of Same Sex Attracted Young People' (Monograph Series No 7, La Trobe University, 1998) 12.

2 The nature, dynamics and effects of family violence

Introduction

This chapter provides an introduction to the nature, dynamics and effects of family violence in order to provide some context for the remainder of the report. It begins with a brief review of the legal definition of family violence in Victoria, before exploring how such violence is frequently a manifestation of power and control over the victim.

The legal definition of family violence is not confined to violence by males against their female intimate partners. However, the majority of reported violence falls into that category and much of the research into family violence focuses on it. Indeed, many of the submissions the Royal Commission received were also about intimate partner violence. This is reflected in the discussion in this chapter.

This chapter also considers forms of family violence that are not well understood—for example, emotional abuse, financial abuse and sexual violence as well as perpetrators' increasing use of technology to dominate and control victims and as a form of stalking. Also discussed are times of heightened risk for family violence—in particular, post-separation and pregnancy.

This chapter also speaks of the impact of family violence. Words on a page do not, however, convey the deep terror and fear that victims expressed to the Commission. No words can capture the lengths to which some victims of family violence—especially women caring for children—have to go to keep themselves, their children and sometimes other family members safe and to re-establish their lives.

Defining family violence

As a consequence of the Victorian Law Reform Commission's Review of Family Violence Laws,¹ a new definition of family violence was included in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). This definition recognises that violence need not be physical to cause harm and to keep a victim living in fear. As well as including various forms of violence, the Act covers a wide range of relationships, reflecting the diversity of familial and kin relationships in our society.

1. For the purposes of the Family Violence Protection Act, family violence is:
 - (b) behaviour by a person towards a family member of that person if that behaviour—
 - (i) is physically or sexually abusive; or
 - (ii) is emotionally or psychologically abusive; or
 - (iii) is economically abusive; or
 - (iv) is threatening; or
 - (v) is coercive; or
 - (vi) in any other way controls or dominates the family member and causes that family member to feel fear for the safety and wellbeing of that family member or another person.
 - (b) behaviour by a person that causes a child to hear or witness, or otherwise be exposed to the effects of, behaviour referred to in paragraph (a).²

2. Family violence includes the following behaviours:
 - (a) assaulting or causing personal injury to a family member or threatening to do so;
 - (b) sexually assaulting a family member or engaging in another form of sexually coercive behaviour or threatening to engage in such behaviour;
 - (c) intentionally damaging a family member's property, or threatening to do so;
 - (d) unlawfully depriving a family member of the family member's liberty, or threatening to do so;
 - (e) causing or threatening to cause the death of, or injury to, an animal, whether or not the animal belongs to the family member to whom the behaviour is directed so as to control, dominate or coerce the family member.³
3. To remove doubt, it is declared that behaviour may constitute family violence even if the behaviour would not constitute a criminal offence.⁴

The meaning of 'family member' is broad. It covers both biological relationships and relationships arising from marriage, a de facto partnership or an 'intimate personal relationship'.⁵ It also includes a child who regularly resides with the other person or has previously done so (for example, a foster child) and a child of a person who has or has had an intimate family relationship with the relevant person.⁶ Further, it covers current and former relationships.⁷ An intimate relationship can exist regardless of whether the relationship involves or has involved a sexual relationship and regardless of the sex or gender identity of the people in the relationship.⁸

People living in the same house, people living in the same residential facility and people reliant on care can also be covered. The Act expands the definition of family member to include a person whom the victim regards or regarded as being 'like a family member' if it was reasonable for the victim to hold that view, given the circumstances of the relationship.⁹ For example, this could cover the carer of a person with a disability if the person regards the carer as a family member. It could also include the relationships between residents in aged care or disability accommodation where there are social or emotional ties between them.¹⁰

Additionally, the Act acknowledges that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities' definitions of the 'nature and forms of family violence are broader than those used in the mainstream'.¹¹ The definition of family member specifically includes a person who, 'under Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander tradition or contemporary social practice, is the person's relative'.¹²

A clear and comprehensive definition of family violence is important for both practical and symbolic purposes. To define conduct as family violence is to express the community's shared condemnation of that conduct. It also determines the circumstances in which police can seek an intervention order on behalf of a victim and when a magistrate can make an order to protect a victim. Chapter 16 discusses these remedies.

Overall, the Commission found solid support for the definition of family violence in the Family Violence Protection Act, as well as for legal recognition of the range of family and kin relationships that exist in modern communities. Nevertheless, many in the community still do not recognise emotional abuse and economic abuse as family violence. The same applies to violence other than between intimate partners—for example, adolescent violence against parents and those cases of elder abuse and abuse of people with disabilities not involving intimate partnerships. These situations are discussed throughout this report.

Why do people say family violence is gendered?

The Commission was not asked to inquire into the causes of family violence. The Commission's terms of reference state:

Family violence is the most pervasive form of violence perpetrated against women in Victoria. While both men and women can be perpetrators or victims of family violence, overwhelmingly the majority of perpetrators are men and victims are women and children.

The causes of family violence are complex, and include gender inequality and community attitudes towards women. Contributing factors may include financial pressures, alcohol and drug abuse, mental illness and social and economic exclusion.

In Victoria three-quarters of victims in family violence incidents attended by police are female and 77 per cent of perpetrators recorded by police are male.¹³

The Commission's terms of reference also reflect current research about population-level risk factors and individual risk factors for intimate partner violence, which is the most common form of family violence and the one we know most about. This evidence was recently reviewed for UN Women and Our Watch; the review found that violence-tolerant attitudes and gender inequality are underlying or 'root' causes of violence against women.¹⁴ This is unsurprising. We are social beings and we are influenced by the world around us and what society teaches us. This includes stereotypes and social norms that dictate 'appropriate' behaviour for men and women.

Stereotypes about men and women are reinforced through practices such as social tolerance of discrimination and the idea that violence against women is sometimes justified by women's behaviour—for example, if a woman has sex with another man. Gender inequality is itself influenced by other forms of inequality such as race, disability, socio-economic status, geography and the impacts of colonisation. For this reason prevention efforts need to focus on these population-level risks, or root causes, in order to address the conditions in which violence against women can thrive. This and the evidence relating to prevention are discussed in Chapter 36.

It is also important to distinguish between population-level risk factors and individual risk factors. Among the individual risk factors associated with the perpetration of family violence are alcohol and drug misuse, mental illness, and exposure to violence as a child. But not all people who have had these experiences perpetrate violence, and men who have not had these experiences can still be violent towards women. We must also consider perpetrators' attitudes and beliefs—which are reinforced by broader social norms in the community and institutional settings and their experiences with peers, colleagues and friends, all of which help to make them the people they are—if we are to understand how best to respond to family violence.

Responding to individual risk factors is an important way of working out how best to target interventions to tackle family violence. It does not excuse violence or allow people to avoid taking responsibility for their behaviour. Individual risk factors are discussed throughout this report—for example, in chapters dealing with risk assessment and management, perpetrator interventions, the health system, including mental health and drug and alcohol services, and specific population groups.

Because population-level and individual-level risk factors are interrelated, preventing family violence requires mutually reinforcing approaches at the population, community, institutional and individual levels.

The dynamics and nature of family violence

He set out to destroy me on every level possible. Physically, mentally, emotionally and spiritually. All of it was intentional and planned.¹⁵

Family violence is not about 'losing it', being nagged or having too many drinks. The Commission received hundreds of submissions from people who have lived with, and continue to live with, the terror of family violence. And those submissions have a common theme—that the violence is a tool used to gain control over them.

Coercion, control and domination

My husband was of the opinion that when he married me he owned me. I became part of his chattels and that is how I had to live my life, by his rules, and they were 'do as I say, not as I do'.¹⁶

Submissions argued that the abuser's need to maintain control and dominance lies at the core of every abusive relationship.¹⁷ The Commission heard that in the vast majority of family violence cases this is grounded in the false belief that the abuser is entitled to control the victim and to use violence to achieve this. The UK Home Office provides some useful guidance about understanding controlling or coercive behaviour:

Controlling or coercive behaviour does not relate to a single incident, it is a purposeful pattern of behaviour which takes place over time in order for one individual to exert power, control or coercion over another.¹⁸

Many women who participated in consultations or made submissions said they did not understand that what was happening to them was family violence, particularly when the violence had not yet escalated to the point of causing serious physical injury. Sometimes they did not realise it was family violence until service providers or others pointed out these patterns of control and coercion.

Other victims described how what first appeared as love and attention turned into violence:

It was a whirlwind romance, where he won me over with his charm and intelligence, putting me on a pedestal. We ... moved [in] together within a few weeks of dating. The abuse wasn't immediate but started to show around six months into the relationship. It was an insidious creep of abuse. So slow that I just thought it was a normal part of a relationship.¹⁹

Controlling strategies can be 'indirect, subtle and psychologically traumatic, involving threats of harm, humiliation and insults, and financial or legal abuse'.²⁰ Tactics in addition to those just discussed include the following:

- ▷ controlling access to money
- ▷ using debt to control the victim
- ▷ controlling what she wears, her make-up or physical appearance
- ▷ cutting off the phone
- ▷ forbidding contact with neighbours, colleagues or friends
- ▷ restricting access to transport or cars
- ▷ threatening to reveal or publish private information
- ▷ using the justice system against the victim by making false or vexatious allegations.²¹

Additional tactics involve making a person give up employment or education, forbidding them to attend English language classes, and generally isolating them from the world beyond the perpetrator.²²

Perpetrators often seek to reinforce isolation and, as family and friends become more distant, the violence escalates and the victim's identity and self-worth are eroded by the perpetrator:

... the reality of real family violence is that there are no friends—you've been systematically isolated from them—you can guarantee that your partner didn't like them for some reason or they could see what the perpetrator was really like. They are intimidated and afraid or overwhelmed by your disclosure of abuse, scared that they will be affected or their own children will be in danger by being associated with you. They are long gone.²³

The crime is not as simple as just the crime, there is so much more in play. The control over aspects of your life has such a wide reach. The control in the day to day isn't taken as seriously as physical violence. You lose friends, you're not able to maintain new friends and new partners. It gets to the point where not even your own parents will have you stay the night because they're scared for their own safety.²⁴

In some cases described to the Commission the perpetrator's need to dominate his family entailed physically imprisoning women and children in the home: 'I was put under "house-arrest" for a period of [removed] weeks for defying him. He took my mobile phone, home phone, computer, and car keys to keep me isolated for this time'.²⁵

These controlling behaviours can also imprison women emotionally:

The most distressing thing I lost was me, my [self-worth]. Couldn't think straight, even to the point I couldn't write out a shopping list: I couldn't concentrate. I was always worried that I may do or say the wrong thing. It is so hard to describe to you the mental torment, always questioning yourself. Never being able to comprehend that this person who is supposed to love me can hurt you so badly.²⁶

Violence and coercion in the relationship can also force women to assume culpability for their partner's offences: '[She] took a drug offence for [her partner] ... even the police said they knew she hadn't done it'.²⁷ Or it can strike at the heart of the woman's reproductive autonomy:

He forced her to have an abortion. Her sister-in-law made the appointment. He told the GPs that she was poorly educated and that he signed papers on her behalf. She tried to commit suicide a number of times.²⁸

In short, the perpetrator dictates what the victim does, whom they talk to and see, where they go and what they think:

Scapegoating, blaming me for everything, saying I deserved it (the abuse) and it was my fault, I was a bad mother, locking me and the children out of the house. There were a few occasions I had to sleep outside with the dogs. Walking on eggshells ... He would come in to work all the time, if I was 10 minutes late from work he would ask why. I had to eventually leave my employment; was sick all the time and mentally exhausted. [I] wasn't allowed to have my own opinion, everything I said was wrong or stupid. Would get very agitated when he saw me happy ...²⁹

Abusers of parents may also attempt to dominate and control them. At a consultation with older victims, a woman told the Commission that her son, who was physically aggressive to her, had told her friends and police that she had dementia. After she had paid his very considerable debts he arranged for her to come to his own doctor for an assessment, without speaking to her doctor. He did so in an attempt to force her to execute a power of attorney in order to gain access to her money.³⁰

A pattern, not an event

Although every experience is unique, family violence is not a one-off incident for many victims.³¹ It is a pattern of behaviour that involves an escalating spiral of violence. This can include physical and sexual abuse, as well as psychological, emotional and financial abuse—all designed to intimidate, undermine, isolate and control. It can also include violence or threats of violence against children, other family members and pets.³² Ultimately, it can be lethal:

It is the prevalence and the all-encompassing awareness that you are living with something that is dangerous—life threatening. That fact slowly and methodically eats away at your self-awareness and ability to make decisions. All your decisions are about self-preservation and how safe you are from day to day and hour to hour. That is why you stay. It is safer to stay than to leave.³³

Nationally, ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) has reported that the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey shows that, of those women who had experienced multiple incidents of physical assault by a male perpetrator since the age of 15 years, two-thirds reported that the assaults were all perpetrated by the same man. That suggests that one in nine of these women—that is, 961,500 women—in Australia had experienced multiple assaults by the same man.³⁴

Dr Karen Gelb, a researcher and criminologist, who conducted research for the Commission, found that, of the family violence cases she observed in magistrates' courts, on average more than half (53 per cent) involved people with a history of family violence, although it is not known whether that history involved the same perpetrator.³⁵ Dr Gelb's report, which was not limited to cases involving intimate partner violence, is presented in full in Volume VII. Data analysis by the Crime Statistics Authority (including police data on recidivism rates, discussed in Chapter 15) also does not delineate between the circumstances in which repeat offending occurred within a single relationship or occurred against multiple victims.

Times of heightened risk

It is well established that the risk of intimate partner violence escalates at specific times—for example, during pregnancy or on separation (or attempted separation). It can also occur at times of natural disaster, as discussed here. Further information on risk assessment and management is provided in Chapter 6.

Pregnancy

Pregnancy and the early post-natal period are times of adjustment and change, when the risk of violence is elevated.³⁶ Pregnancy can trigger the use of violence by a man against his partner or can exacerbate existing violence in the relationship, particularly if the pregnancy is unplanned or unwanted.³⁷ Family violence in this context has been linked to the perpetrator feeling that his primacy in the relationship is being undermined.³⁸ Studies of the correlation between pregnancy and family violence tend to measure the prevalence of physical violence during pregnancy, but sexual and emotional abuse can be equally damaging to both the woman's and the child's safety and wellbeing.³⁹

The ANROWS analysis of data from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey shows that, among women who had experienced intimate partner violence since the age of 15:

- ▶ More than 400,000 Australian women experienced partner violence during pregnancy.⁴⁰
- ▶ An estimated 180,600 women had experienced violence by a current cohabiting partner and were pregnant at some time in that relationship. Approximately one in five (21.7 per cent, $n=39,100$) of these women experienced violence during their pregnancy.⁴¹
- ▶ Of the 39,100 women who did experience violence by a current cohabiting partner during pregnancy, three out of five (61.4 per cent, $n=24,000$) experienced violence for the first time when they were pregnant.⁴²

An analysis of hospital data shows that at least 11 per cent of the women admitted to hospital for intimate partner violence-related assaults were pregnant, with some evidence suggesting that the abdomen-pelvic area of pregnant women was over-involved in these assaults compared with women who were not pregnant.⁴³ The Commission notes it is likely that the hospital data significantly under-reports family violence in this and other contexts.

Separation (or attempted separation)

Separation (or attempted separation) by a woman from her partner is also a time of heightened risk for family violence: 'Indeed, the period after separation can be a very dangerous time for a victim, because the perpetrator may perceive a loss of control over her and may become more unpredictable'.⁴⁴

For women who have not previously experienced physical violence in the relationship, physical violence often starts or escalates during the separation period.⁴⁵ '[U]ncharacteristic acts of violence' can occur in response to the separation or other traumatic post-separation events.⁴⁶ If the relationship is characterised by a history of violence, the violence can persist after separation and often escalates; it can culminate in the man killing his former partner and/or children.⁴⁷

Separation is therefore recognised in the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (often called the Common Risk Assessment Framework or CRAF) and similar risk assessment processes used internationally as a time of heightened risk for family violence against women and children, including the risk of death.⁴⁸

For women who are experiencing family violence, the high risk periods include immediately prior to taking action, and during the initial stages of or immediately after separation. Victims who stay with the perpetrator because they are afraid to leave often accurately anticipate that leaving would increase the risk of lethal assault. The data on time-since-separation suggests that women are particularly at risk within the first two months.⁴⁹

An Australian Institute of Family Studies investigation found that violence commonly occurs in separated (and separating) families. Of 4959 responding mothers:

- ▷ 26 per cent reported being physically hurt by their partner before separation
- ▷ 39 per cent reported that they had experienced emotional abuse alone from their partner before or during separation.⁵⁰

Of 4918 responding fathers:

- ▷ 16.8 per cent reported being physically hurt by their partner before separation
- ▷ 36.4 per cent reported that they had experienced emotional abuse alone from their partner before or during separation.⁵¹

Violence after separation can include financial abuse, which is 'a particularly common strategy used to control partners post-separation and has long-term implications for survivors' economic security'.⁵² The Commission heard that financial control and manipulation begin at separation for many women—particularly in relation to withholding child support payments and property settlement.⁵³ As discussed in Chapter 21, family violence is a significant contributor to women's poverty. Fear of the financial consequences for themselves and their children can lead women to stay in the relationship or to return to it.

Victims told the Commission that after the relationship has ended some perpetrators then use the legal system as a form of violence.⁵⁴ One woman described this to the Commission: 'I am still experiencing family violence but it comes on letterhead from his lawyer'.⁵⁵ Women's Legal Service Victoria described this as 'systems abuse':

Procedural fairness is a key component of the family violence jurisdiction. We recognise that appropriate mechanisms must be available in the intervention order process for perpetrators to challenge allegations of family violence, make cross-applications and seek review of judicial decisions. There is, however, a category of cases where court mechanisms are abused by the perpetrator for the purposes of continuing to exercise power and control over the victim ...

It is difficult to measure the impact this course of action has on victims who are forced to come back to court on multiple occasions to justify the need for an intervention order. It requires them to tell their story multiple times to multiple Magistrates, court staff and duty lawyers. The trauma and feelings of powerlessness to stop abuse perpetrated through the system have a profound effect on the physical and emotional well-being of victims as well as their ability to heal and recover from their experiences.⁵⁶

It has separately been reported that more than half of parenting matters in the family law system involve allegations of family violence.⁵⁷ Dissatisfaction with family law processes was one of the strongest messages the Commission received from the submissions and consultations. Both men and women criticised the system, although women more commonly described feeling re-victimised by being disbelieved or being cast in a negative light as a result of their former partner manipulating court processes to their own ends,⁵⁸ whereas men often cited gender bias as a problem.⁵⁹ Access to children was frequently nominated as a way of controlling victims after separation:

And I'm so glad I left him. But I am still scared when he threatens me at my door at handovers. I am still scared he won't return my children to me safe and well. I am still married to him because he won't sign the divorce papers. I still feel trapped by him. I can't afford legal fees to protect my rights in court. I am trapped by the system. It doesn't stop.⁶⁰

They know the game, they know the law, they take the children, they lie in court, and they take custody despite the violence. They make it their business and they thrive on the court process.⁶¹

The Council of Single Mothers and their Children echoed the sentiments of many:

Too often though children become the vehicle these men use to maintain an abusive presence in the mother's life. Children are used to monitor and control women's behaviour and sometimes become the device through which men inflict the violence ...⁶²

Women who share parental responsibilities with an abusive partner or ex-partner are particularly vulnerable to non-physical forms of violence and threats ... Perpetrators of violence often deliberately misuse the systems that have been set up to help families such as the Child Support system and Family Court to maintain control over women and children.⁶³

Access and control through children can take on a particular nature for some migrant women who are especially vulnerable because of the insecurity of their immigration status. The Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights told the Commission that perpetrators use children to manipulate their victims by:

- threatening to send children back to countries of origin marked by war, civil unrest or regular and unpunished acts of violence against women by community or family
- threatening to or actually abducting the children, perhaps returning them to the country of origin where women may have no legal entitlement to custody
- threatening to or actually harming the children
- taking money that she intended to support family members in her home country
- raising the immigration status of a woman in custody cases, to undermine the woman's case for custody and divert the court's attention away from family violence.⁶⁴

The Commission was also told that perpetrators can delay property settlement so as to financially exhaust victims through legal fees in family courts and that they use this tactic to force women to agree to an outcome that is not in their best interests:⁶⁵ 'He was also hindering the transfer of property to me. Assets were not transferred to me for some 2 years.'⁶⁶

The family law system and its intersections with family violence are discussed in depth in Chapter 24.

Natural disasters

Studies have shown increases in levels of family violence in communities affected by natural disasters, both in Australia and elsewhere.⁶⁷ A 2009 study reported a four-fold increase in intimate partner violence following Hurricane Katrina.⁶⁸ It has also been reported that New Zealand police had a 53 per cent increase in call-outs to domestic violence incidents over the weekend of the Canterbury earthquake in 2010.⁶⁹

A 2012 study interviewed 29 women who experienced the Victorian Black Saturday bushfires in 2009. In that study 16 women spoke about family violence—14 in reference to their own relationship and two in reference to the relationships of close relatives (a sister and a daughter). For nine women the violence was a new experience since the fires, while for six the violence had escalated or there had been an isolated incident many years earlier. One woman had left her violent partner before the fires, and when he returned after the fires he resumed his violent behaviour. All but one of the 16 women who experienced violence after the fires said they were afraid of their partner.⁷⁰

Forms of violence

Family violence can take many forms. The Commission heard in submissions, at community consultations and in the hearings of the varied experiences of family violence. This section explores some of these forms of violence, including emotional and psychological abuse; physical and sexual violence; financial abuse; technology-facilitated abuse and stalking. All these forms manifest as part of the perpetrators' desire to control the victim.

Emotional and psychological abuse

I am the victim of emotional and economic abuse. I have never had visible bruises yet the terror and alarm I experienced was no different to a victim with visible bruising.⁷¹

The ABS Personal Safety Survey shows that over 2.1 million women in Australia have experienced at least one incident of emotional abuse by a former or current cohabiting partner since the age of 15 years.⁷² This is one in four women in Australia. Approximately 1.8 million women reported that they had experienced emotional abuse from a partner they were no longer in a relationship with.⁷³ This is one in five women.

Emotional abuse is almost always an aspect of intimate terrorism, but is rarely part of uncontrolled violence. And it is most definitely not the same as hurting someone's feelings. People can be deeply hurt by their partners, through thoughtlessness, anger, even infidelity or the end of a relationship without suffering emotional abuse. [Emotional abuse] is a very specific and deliberate form of emotional damage, designed to destroy any feeling of independence or self-worth, and thereby make someone easy to control and manipulate.⁷⁴

The ABS Personal Safety Survey also notes that approximately 1.2 million men have experienced emotional abuse from a current or previous partner since the age of 15. This is about one in seven men in Australia.⁷⁵

Section 7 of the Family Violence Protection Act defines 'emotional or psychological abuse' as behaviour that 'torments, intimidates, harasses or is offensive to the other person'.⁷⁶ Emotional abuse often forms part of the pattern of controlling behaviours. This is reflected in some of the examples of emotional abuse given in section 7 of the Act—preventing a person from making or keeping connections with family, friends or culture (including cultural or spiritual ceremonies or practices); preventing a person from expressing their cultural identity; repeated derogatory taunts, including racial taunts; and so on.

Forms of emotional abuse can differ in different circumstances. For example, for women in culturally and linguistically diverse or faith communities, emotional abuse can include:

- ▷ calling her racist names
- ▷ accusing her of abandoning her culture
- ▷ threatening to harm someone in her family in Australia or in her country of origin
- ▷ hiding or destroying important legal papers, such as her passport or her children's passports or birth certificates
- ▷ destroying her personal belongings from her country of origin
- ▷ convincing her that in Australia family violence is not unlawful
- ▷ convincing her that if she seeks police, welfare or the courts' assistance he will automatically receive legal custody of the children
- ▷ accusing her of marrying him for migration purposes only and threatening to or actually reporting her to immigration authorities
- ▷ blaming her for breaking up their family and community if she leaves him
- ▷ threatening deportation
- ▷ refusing to file or withdrawing immigration papers.⁷⁷

Threatening to withhold medication is also recognised as emotional abuse⁷⁸ and is a form of abuse often reported by women with disabilities.⁷⁹ In some circumstances withholding of medication can be life threatening: 'The next day I only attended the police station because he dissolved my chemotherapy medication and I needed to get it'.⁸⁰

The Family Violence Protection Act provides an example specific to the lesbian, gay, and bisexual communities—namely, threatening to disclose a person's sexual orientation to family or friends against the person's wishes.⁸¹ The following are other examples:

- ▷ telling a partner they will lose custody of their children as a result of being 'outed'
- ▷ using homophobia as a tool for control—for example, telling a partner they will be unable to gain police assistance or support from services because the system is homophobic
- ▷ telling a partner they deserve the abuse because they are LGBTI
- ▷ telling a partner they are not a 'real' lesbian, gay or bisexual
- ▷ disclosing or threatening to disclose HIV status.⁸²

The psychological damage inflicted by emotional abuse of a partner can be very serious, and emotional abuse inflicted on children by a parent can have lasting effects. Yet many in the community still do not recognise it as family violence:

Media, authorities and even family violence campaigns sensationalise physical violence—as they should. Literature tells us there are other forms of abuse and most organisations are aware, but in all my time away from my ex-husband, I have yet to encounter any professional who truly understands the other types of family violence. These are no less significant or dangerous than physical violence. There is a vast level of education that needs to be conducted to ensure society understands there are other types of family violence and these have just as much of [a] lasting impact as physical violence.⁸³

On the surface there appears to be no crisis. There is no imminent danger. Except for the slow, mental torture which causes the constituent to believe that she really is useless and perhaps her husband is right, and that she is insane. The psychological abuse has been so oppressive that it has triggered suicidal ideation in one constituent.⁸⁴

Victims may not recognise such abuse as family violence or feel less deserving of help. This was a strong theme in community consultations and submissions:

I didn't know what I was experiencing was domestic violence—it was psychological, controlling. He would clean his guns in front of me. He killed my animals.⁸⁵

I didn't think I was in domestic violence. I didn't feel I was entitled to it because he did not bash me. I thought there were women out there who needed help more. It's the perception of domestic violence, it's the image of a woman beaten bloody. So I didn't feel like I deserved the help.⁸⁶

Others felt the abuse was less serious than physical violence.⁸⁷ Perpetrators can also think that, because they are not physically hitting their partner or child, their behaviour does not amount to violence:

I never actually hit my wife, there was a lot of yelling and screaming, threatening behaviour, hitting walls ... It took her a long time to figure out what was actually going on. Over that 18 years, the longer it went on, the more it occurred, the plainer she saw things.⁸⁸

The Commission was informed that the nature of the violence experienced often had an impact on the police response. Some women reported that abuse that was not visible, was minimised, or was not acted on by police.⁸⁹

Ignoring patterns of controlling behaviour and focusing only on physical violence trivialises the abuse victims endure and traps them in violence. It can also have lethal consequences. A UK study found that controlling behaviour is a particularly important feature in child homicides: 'It is the extent of control over the whole family rather than the frequency of physical violence that indicates that such fathers are at high risk of killing children'.⁹⁰

Thus, '[c]ritical gaps still exist in the lack of shared understandings of family violence as coercive control'.⁹¹ This can lead to victims being ignored, not taken seriously or not believed when they do seek help.

Physical and sexual violence

He would strangle me—take me to black-out and bring me back. He would put a knife to my throat and draw blood just because he could.⁹²

The Commission was told that physical violence often does not occur until the relationship is well established, and for many women, remains a terrifying threat.⁹³ Victims spoke of the repeated, horrific violence they had experienced. To protect victims' safety and privacy, much of this evidence was given in confidence and cannot be reproduced. Some women, however, felt able to provide insights into their experience anonymously:

During all this time he was physically abusing me I had black eyes, chipped bones in my arm he ripped clothes off me and belted me time and time again ... [on] one occasion he started to belt and drag me from one end of the house to the other I ran to get out he tore my clothes off and threw me into the garden in the mud then dragged me out by my hair, I begged him to stop I didn't want to die. I went to the shower and curled up on floor he came and dragged me out and kept beating me I ended up in the garden again covered in mud I crawled to the door he just kicked and punched me until I just [lay] there, all because I didn't stay and drink with him and his friends at a [removed] break up. The police attended many times. Every time I would go to charge him he begged me not to.⁹⁴

Cho[k]ing, spilling hot drinks on me, pushing, flicking cigarettes, spitting, pushing me off beds and chairs. Smashing my head against walls. Whilst going to the toilet he would push me off the seat. Push me over in the shower, Verbal threats: calling me names; slut ... arsehole, cunt, and many more. He said he would bury me in a hole and threaten to shoot me. Always threatening to hurt my children, family and animals. Throwing objects at me. Throwing me out of the house in the nude, locking the door and not letting me in for 3 hours ...⁹⁵

The majority of the victims of family violence who told their stories to the Commission were women, but we also heard from men who often described violence they experienced as children:

My childhood can be best characterised as one of violence; perpetrated daily. I cannot recall a time where I did not see violence, hear violence or feel anxious about the next violent episode. The violence was perpetrated by my mother towards my father, but also to us as children.⁹⁶

Sexual abuse by an intimate partner is a major form of family violence and is a risk factor for death, including homicide and suicide.⁹⁷ Sexual violence also occurs in disability or aged care relationships and in same-sex relationships.⁹⁸

Some of the victims who came forward to the Commission described the use of sexual violence, including rape in marriage, to degrade and humiliate them:

I would be woken up at 4 am to him trying to put his penis in my mouth. Scared, I didn't know where to go or where to run.⁹⁹

... when I wasn't able to give to him anymore (sex or whatever because I was in pain) he would get violent with me if I refused to give him sex. He said that it was a man's need/right. I would curl up on the edge of the bed terrified [he would ask for sex].¹⁰⁰

It was awful. I tried not to react. I hoped he had been satisfied. That it would buy me further safety.¹⁰¹

Victoria Police has noted that children are over-represented as the victims of family violence sex crimes, and it is highly likely that there is substantial under-reporting of family violence-related child sexual abuse.¹⁰²

Victims may find sexual violence particularly difficult to disclose. The Commission was reminded that 'often the sexual abuse is left under the table because of the additional layers of shame.'¹⁰³ Or it might not be recognised as family violence or a crime.¹⁰⁴

A lay witness explained that she did not know there could be rape in marriage:

I was then pregnant with the third child and I went to a different doctor and he said, 'Would you like me to file a report for the police?' I asked him 'What for?' He goes, 'These injuries, they look like they are from rape'. I said, 'It's not from rape, it's my husband'. He pressed further. He asked, 'What do you mean it's not rape it's your husband?' I said, 'Rape is from a stranger or an intruder'. And he said, 'No, rape is when you do not want sex and they force themselves'. I said, 'But it's my husband. What right do I have to say no?' ... The doctor said something that really resonated, it really sunk in and impacted me enough to make a massive change, in which he said, when I told him, 'I signed the dotted line that my body is his', and the doctor said, 'And he signed the dotted line to love and protect'. It was like a light globe just switched on ...¹⁰⁵

Even allowing for under-reporting, in at least two regions in Victoria more than half the clients who sought sexual assault counselling from Centres Against Sexual Assault were doing so for reasons associated with family violence.¹⁰⁶ Some clients were both survivors of child sexual abuse and people experiencing intimate partner violence.¹⁰⁷ For example, Northern Centre Against Sexual Assault submitted 'many CASA clients fall into the category of people who have experienced sexual assault and family violence on multiple occasions and throughout their lives'.¹⁰⁸

The stigma resulting from rape can be further entrenched if pregnancy follows. Research also suggests an association between family violence and termination of pregnancy and that there can be a repetitive cycle of termination.¹⁰⁹ Additionally, findings indicate that a woman concealing a pregnancy from her violent partner is also at risk of family violence and that this is linked to higher rates of murder and suicide.¹¹⁰

Mr Bernie Geary, OAM, the former Commissioner for Children and Young People noted:

It would be very difficult to assess how many pregnancies may occur as a result of sexual assault, when this is being used as a form of family violence within an intimate partner relationship, given the highly sensitive nature of such information and the strong likelihood that women would be too embarrassed and ashamed to make such a disclosure. The social assumption that any pregnancy occurring within a relationship is desired by both parties is also very strong. Furthermore, women may be very concerned to protect their unborn child from the stigma of being a product of sexual assault, regardless of what their own feelings about the pregnancy might be.¹¹¹

Financial abuse

Some perpetrators deny their partners economic freedom as a form of control. The Commission heard that this involves exercising control over finances during a relationship, and that this can continue, or frequently begin, after separation.

Many people do not realise that economic abuse is recognised as a form of family violence in Victorian legislation, and it can be used as grounds to apply for a family violence intervention order:¹¹²

In the approx. [removed] years we lived together I cannot remember a time that I did not have to ask for money to help pay the bills. At that stage I did not know there was such a thing as economic abuse.¹¹³

Perpetrators restrict women's access to funds by keeping bank accounts in their own name only or providing to their partner an allowance out of which she is expected to cover the costs of running a household, including buying groceries, paying bills and meeting expenses for children:

[He] would accuse me of spending his money, (even though I was working too). Got to the stage I couldn't even write a shopping list; was fearful if I would spend too much. Would say I was hopeless with the finances and would keep money from me. I wasn't allowed to buy essentials for myself or the children. Would not allow me to get food from the fridge and pantry because he bought it.¹¹⁴

One victim, described in a journal article on economic abuse, used her part-time salary as a nurse to meet the entire family's expenses while her partner spent his full-time salary on himself.¹¹⁵ Another stated that she was made to live frugally while her partner withdrew money from accounts and investments, including joint accounts, without her consent:

He wasted large amounts of money daily. I discovered a hidden spending pattern of daily withdrawals of money from ATMs and movement of large sums of money from our pension funds.¹¹⁶

Some perpetrators do not allow their partners to work and in that way achieve financial independence.¹¹⁷ Others harass victims at their workplace, making it difficult for them to stay employed.¹¹⁸ In addition to the immediate financial problems this causes, this can affect women in later life because they have inadequate superannuation after retirement.¹¹⁹

Economic abuse can be linked to car ownership, when perpetrators incur traffic and parking fines in vehicles registered in their partner's name.¹²⁰ The Commission also heard that perpetrators coerce their partner into taking out loans for cars, mortgages and credit cards in her own name or adding her name to or co-signing a loan to make her jointly liable for the debt:

[I was] responsible for all of the debt from our relationship. This included debt he had accrued in my name, and debt I accrued in my name as I was always encouraged to take out credit in my name as I had steady employment.¹²¹

Another form of economic abuse involves threatening to have essential services such as electricity, gas and water disconnected or leaving women with unpaid bills for these services.¹²² The Commission was also informed that perpetrators who kept accounts in their name alone would arrange for essential services to be cut off when they moved out and force their former partner to pay re-connection fees for the services.¹²³

Ms Jenny Blakey, Manager, Seniors Rights Victoria gave evidence to the Commission that financial abuse is the most common form of family violence against older people dealt with by her organisation. She estimated that about 61 per cent of calls to Seniors Rights Victoria relate to financial abuse.¹²⁴ Adult children with older parents can coerce their mothers, and their fathers, into entering financially dangerous arrangements such as using the family home as security for a loan.¹²⁵

I took out a reverse mortgage in 2006 to pay his debts. His friend at a bank helped him sort out his debt. But in 2009 he was in debt again and told me to take out another loan. I took out a reverse mortgage, had bills and rates issues from my son. I became concerned that I would not have a house.¹²⁶

Family violence against older people is discussed in Chapter 27. Chapter 21 further explores economic abuse.

Technology-facilitated abuse

SmartSafe project

Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria's SmartSafe project identified the following behaviours as examples of technology-facilitated stalking and abuse that can constitute family violence:

- ▶ threatening or abusive phone calls
- ▶ repetitive threatening or abusive text messages and emails
- ▶ checking or hacking email accounts
- ▶ monitoring internet use
- ▶ 'revenge porn', whereby a person distributes or posts false, humiliating, intimate or sexualised videos or photos without the other person's consent
- ▶ spreading rumours about the person or impersonating them online
- ▶ harassing or threatening the victim or the victim's friends and family on social networking sites such as Facebook and Twitter or dating, chat and games sites
- ▶ tracking the victim's location through apps and 'find my phone' services
- ▶ geotagging of photographs taken with smartphones
- ▶ smartphone spyware.¹²⁷

He installed a camera in our bedroom. I had purchased an emergency phone and he was able to locate it from seeing me hide it in my bedroom drawer, through the camera.¹²⁸

Perpetrators' use of technology to control, intimidate, stalk and harass victims is a 'rapidly growing problem' and was frequently raised as a concern in consultations and submissions.¹²⁹ Victoria Police submitted:

The widespread use of mobile phones has made it easier for perpetrators to harass, stalk and intimidate their victims. Over the past five years, intimate partner violence related harassment offences have increased more significantly than any other offence category. Although these offences predominantly relate to phone calls, text messages and emails, there were also several instances of tracking devices being used ... As technology becomes more affordable and readily used, family violence incidents involving these technologies will increase.¹³⁰

This is consistent with evidence given at the Senate Inquiry into Domestic Violence in Australia, where family violence workers stated that technology is increasingly being used 'to surveil, to harass, to stalk and to hurt women and children'.¹³¹ This form of family violence also extends to preventing, restricting or monitoring victims' use of technology:¹³²

I was isolated, he controlled all the money, tracked my phone calls, checked my mobile phone frequently and had a key-tracking program on my computer, banning me from going to certain websites.¹³³

Technology-facilitated abuse has particular implications for specific populations, such as Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, and women with disabilities.¹³⁴ Perpetrators exploit social isolation and language barriers and deliberately isolate culturally and linguistically diverse women further by 'restricting their access to technology, which women often relied on to stay in contact with friends and family'.¹³⁵

Indigenous women may need to use technology to keep connected to their mob, culture and community but this can place their whereabouts/situation known to the perpetrator if they also have the same connections.¹³⁶

It is difficult to obtain information about the extent of technology-facilitated abuse.¹³⁷ The SmartSafe project published a study of technology-facilitated stalking in family violence in 2013.¹³⁸ This study found that, of 44 women who responded to an online survey question about stalking experiences, 80 per cent reported receiving text messages that made them feel afraid, 65 per cent reported receiving calls that made them feel afraid, 63 per cent reported being made to feel they were being watched or tracked, and 51 per cent reported they were being followed. Of the 46 women who responded to the entire online survey, 20 per cent said their partner had downloaded apps to their phone.¹³⁹

A 2015 survey of family violence workers found as follows:

- ▷ Ninety-eight per cent of 546 workers surveyed had clients who had experienced technology-facilitated abuse.¹⁴⁰
- ▷ The most common technology was text messages—often large volumes of text messages sent in one day.¹⁴¹
- ▷ Thirty-four per cent of workers saw the use of GPS trackers on smartphone apps 'often' or 'all the time'; an additional 40 per cent stated that it happened 'sometimes'. These figures are higher than those for the 2013 study, when 29 per cent of workers identified the use of GPS-tracking technologies for stalking. This could mean workers are now more aware of this type of abuse and/or that the technology is increasingly being used by perpetrators of family violence.¹⁴²

As with other forms of family violence, technology-facilitated abuse occurs both within relationships and after separation, but it can escalate once the victim leaves the relationship.¹⁴³ One study found that technology-facilitated stalking is mostly used to stalk victims after separation¹⁴⁴:

He's been stalking me since October. A couple of times I went out at night and he'd follow me there and then break into the house and cause damage there. I don't go out. My phone was syncing with his and I didn't realise. One time when he broke in he stole my laptop and he'd set up my cloud so he had access to all things on my phone ...¹⁴⁵

My ex had also put an app on my iPhone called Find my iPhone. He had been tracking me without me knowing even after we separated. My [removed] found it about a month after he left.¹⁴⁶

As the Council of Australian Governments noted, 'Too often technology is being used to facilitate abuse against women. There is an opportunity to turn this around and use it instead to keep women and their children safe'.¹⁴⁷ In December 2015 COAG agreed to pursue 'actions to limit technology-facilitated abuse' and committed to a national summit in the final quarter of 2016 to profile best practice and review progress.¹⁴⁸

Stalking

Although stalking is a problem for many family violence victims, it is not well understood.

Submissions noted that many in the community perceive partner stalking as less serious than stranger stalking—particularly when victims try to report such behaviour as a contravention ('breach') of an intervention order.¹⁴⁹ One reason for this could be that technology-facilitated abuse has been normalised as a result of the increasing use of technology in relationships.¹⁵⁰

Citing findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey, Victoria Police submitted, 'Fewer Australians consider harassment by repeat phone contact as a form of intimate partner violence when compared to 2009'.¹⁵¹ The survey results show that 37 per cent of respondents reported it was acceptable ('always acceptable' or 'rarely or sometimes acceptable') to track a female partner by electronic means without their consent, and 14 per cent reported such behaviour was 'not serious'.¹⁵²

Studies show that partner stalking often lasts much longer than stalking done by strangers or acquaintances.¹⁵³ Stalking is also linked to other forms of family violence, including sexual abuse and emotionally abusive or controlling behaviour.¹⁵⁴ The Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science and Forensicare submitted:

... recent research with stalkers assessed at Forensicare and followed up via Victoria Police files showed that approximately one-third of ex-intimate stalkers have had contact with police for family violence during their prior relationship with the victim.¹⁵⁵

Stalking and other forms of technology-facilitated abuse have a major effect on women's mental and physical wellbeing and on their daily routines, parenting and workforce participation.¹⁵⁶ Eighty-four per cent of the 39 women who responded to this question in the 2012 SmartSafe project reported that stalking affected their mental health and wellbeing:¹⁵⁷

Women talked about the invasiveness of technology-facilitated abuse and stalking because of its spacelessness; they were confronted with it anytime they logged into social media or email accounts or used their phone, tablet or computer.¹⁵⁸

Fear can therefore be heightened by the use of mobile technologies. By stalking a person for 24 hours a day, perpetrators can create a sense of 'omnipresence' that 'erodes [spatial] boundaries' and makes the victim feel it is impossible to escape the perpetrator.¹⁵⁹ For example, perpetrators sometimes place GPS tracking units in cars, bags and prams:¹⁶⁰

During the course of our relationship he informed me it was easy to purchase surveillance equipment off the internet and he knew how to install it due to the training he'd received within his employment.¹⁶¹

Victims feel they no longer have access to a 'safe space' away from the perpetrator, even after separation and relocation.¹⁶² This is particularly dangerous when they seek safety at a secure refuge, and the tracking and stalking can pose a risk not only to the victim herself but to other women and workers at the refuge.¹⁶³

The SmartSafe project found that perpetrators commonly bombarded victims with text messages to ensure their 'continual presence' in victims' lives:¹⁶⁴

Some perpetrators text and phone repeatedly, creating dread and fear in the victim that the harassment will never end. Some women receive only one text or call daily or weekly, but this can be equally as terrifying in the context of their specific domestic-abuse history.¹⁶⁵

Women living in rural, regional and remote Victoria can be particularly affected by technology-facilitated violence. They may be easier to find than women in metropolitan areas, and thus they may experience increased danger and safety risks and might be under greater surveillance as a result of being tracked by the perpetrator.¹⁶⁶ They may also have less access to police and other support services.¹⁶⁷

The Centre for Regional Law and Justice submitted:

The degree and amount of abusive messages sent could be extreme and it was not uncommon for perpetrators to commission people in their network (friends and family members) to engage in technology-facilitated abuse and or stalking. Sometimes survivors had proof of the perpetrator's identity, sometimes this was concealed. Several women told us that they received calls from people they believed to be their abuser or in their abuser's network, impersonating police officers, trying to intimidate women who were pursuing formal responses to family violence.¹⁶⁸

In addition, perpetrators use isolation to dominate and control their victims, and a sense of this can be conveyed through the use of technology. SmartSafe found that perpetrators would isolate women from their support networks by harassing family and friends through social media or by causing women to change their phone numbers or close down their social networking accounts to stop the abuse.¹⁶⁹ Isolation and lack of social support after traumatic experiences are associated with increased levels of psychological distress.¹⁷⁰

The effects of family violence

Living with the terror of family violence can have devastating effects on the health and wellbeing of victims in both the immediate and the long term. The Commission examined the effects of this violence, focusing on the cumulative and long-term effects and the effects on children, while also acknowledging the resilience of victims. The Commission also considered family violence-related deaths.

The effects on adults

As well as the physical scars resulting from the violence, victims of family violence can also experience a range of mental health difficulties, among them post-traumatic stress symptoms, depression, anxiety, eating disorders, sleep problems and self-harming behaviour.¹⁷¹ For many victims, these have long-term consequences.

Psychological effects

Victims of family violence and their supporters told the Commission about their experiences of serious psychological harm, suicidal thoughts and, in some cases, the suicide of a person who had been a victim of family violence.¹⁷² In a community consultation session, one woman told the Commission:

I've been fortunate in that I haven't been successful in ending my life. I've used spirit and determination to come out of that. But the causation comes out of family violence—the abuse, and not being believed. Seeing the impact on my children.¹⁷³

In addition, Lifeline submitted:

An examination of several published studies finds that those who experience domestic violence are 4.5 times more likely to attempt suicide. The experience of traumatic stress itself can foster suicidal thoughts and ideation, in part due to the reduced coping capabilities, and because of the perceptions that there is 'no way out'.¹⁷⁴

Many victims described to the Commission the experience of psychological harm during and following family violence. These included emotional and psychological breakdowns, changes in eating and sleeping patterns, anxiety and depression:¹⁷⁵

I suffer from PTSD since I left him, I have trouble sleeping, and experience nightmares nearly every night. I have severe anxiety attacks, almost constant headaches, and tiredness. I have trouble concentrating and focusing.¹⁷⁶

The mental health effects of family violence are further examined in Chapter 20.

Victims can experience a range of other psychological and emotional harms, including lack of self-esteem and misplaced feelings of guilt:¹⁷⁷ 'My self-esteem became so small. I spent my life trying to work out what I was doing wrong'.¹⁷⁸ These feelings were commonly experienced by women who told the Commission they felt they had failed when they could not ensure the safety of their children from the violence of the perpetrator:

Obviously the children and I are extremely distressed and I feel like I am a failure as a mother and a human being as I am unable to protect my children from a violent, volatile, abusive, manipulating, threatening and controlling father.¹⁷⁹

Others told the Commission they frequently felt unsafe and had constant fears for their own safety and that of their children. To protect themselves, women explained that they became hyper-vigilant. Living for prolonged periods in this heightened state of vigilance and security can be an exhausting and isolating experience:

I felt like I slept with one eye open and one eye closed for this period. It was only recently that I could afford to put a security door on my place.¹⁸⁰

When someone calls up and asks your name and address, an overwhelming fear comes over you. Worried that you will be found and brings it all up.¹⁸¹

On one occasion he laughed and told me '200 Meters is a joke to a [removed] anyhow'. I still to this day 3 years on find myself looking all around me when I go outside ... even when I am at home near a window.¹⁸²

For victims who relocate for safety reasons, the experience of 'resettlement brings with it financial burden, emotional distress, physical upheaval and social disconnect[ion]'.¹⁸³ In its submission Domestic Violence Victoria identified additional barriers to recovery after relocation:

There is an assumption that once they are in a refuge that they are now 'safe', but often their experience of refuges mean[s] that they are in an unfamiliar location, children are restricted from attending their usual school and are out of contact with the support provided by their communities, friends and family as well as experiencing continuing disruptions to their daily family life.¹⁸⁴

Others described beginning to believe the negative comments voiced by the perpetrator.¹⁸⁵ One woman spoke of the effect of violence and trauma on her independence and confidence:

I don't know how to function anymore as I don't have someone making decisions for me because of the control he had over me. I was in a 15-year controlling relationship. Unless I have an appointment to go to I don't get out of the house.¹⁸⁶

As noted, perpetrators of family violence often isolate the victim, which can alter the victim's perspective on what is acceptable behaviour.¹⁸⁷ Some victims choose to withdraw to manage their own safety, but this can add to their sense of social isolation:

For 3 months I became totally compliant. Everything he asked for I said 'yes' to. I went to work but went into a shell and quietly had a nervous breakdown. Not once in the 3 months did he see me naked, I slept on the edge of the bed, I lived in fear of making him angry. He later told a friend that our marriage had never been better.¹⁸⁸

For some victims, the effects of family violence are amplified because of the disadvantages they experience as a result of their cultural and linguistic background, disability, age, race, sexuality, gender identity or socio-economic status. One woman told the Commission:

I was still in the house but people were throwing beer bottles at the house in the night and my family in India were being threatened. I moved to a friend's place and he started calling from a private number to my friend's house asking where I was. But because I didn't have an IO [intervention order] I couldn't go to court. The Department of Immigration said because an IO wasn't done, they needed doctors' reports. I gave them that and they took two years to decide whether I was a victim of DV. And I was interviewed by a psych from Department of Immigration ...¹⁸⁹

These social, psychological and cognitive harms are not experienced in isolation but are compounded by continuing exposure to family violence.

Physical effects

Many victims described physical forms of violence as having a long-term and often debilitating effect. In a joint submission, EDVOS; Safe Futures Foundation; Safe Steps; WISHIN; and the Victorian Women's Trust described their observations of the brutality of physical violence:

Men hit women, kick, punch and slap them and slam their heads into walls. Men throw women across the room, rape them after a beating or in front of other family members, pull out their hair, bite and scratch them, burn and brand them with hot implements, throw objects at them, tie them up and torture them with blades and cigarettes. Sometimes men use drugs and alcohol coercively or covertly to reduce the woman's capacity to resist. Men tie up women and lock them in car boots and drive them around 'for a bit of a scare'. For one woman, we learned that her husband had done this to her three times in a week.¹⁹⁰

The Commission heard that women often experience head, face and neck injuries as a consequence of repeated physical violence to this part of the body.¹⁹¹ Women attending the Commission's community consultations spoke about a range of effects of these head- and face-related injuries, including loss of eyesight and hearing.¹⁹²

... comes home and kicks me in the head – breaks my optic nerve – blood everywhere. He came back the next day – my eyes are closed – I can't see – he never said sorry. He sat me on the seat of the car – I had to wear an eye patch. Two weeks later - I got the keys, went to the hospital. They said the injury was like a high impact car accident – they said they could not have helped me (save my eye).¹⁹³

The retina detached in my left eye and I have had laser surgery. I have tinnitus in my left ear. I have lost a quadrant of sight in my left eye. I have a cataract in my left eye, to be operated on next year. In ongoing physiological terms I have a worsening semi facial tremor over the whole left side of my face that requires bi-monthly neurological intervention and caused me to take early retirement from my profession in 2013 as the twitches were too embarrassing to bear all day in public.¹⁹⁴

Broken noses, broken ribs and other breaks were frequently reported to the Commission.¹⁹⁵ Repeated head, face and neck trauma, as well as once-only incidents, can lead to acquired brain injury, and are increasingly being recognised as going undiagnosed in many family violence victims.¹⁹⁶ Chapter 20 discusses acquired brain injury.

The Commission heard about cases of calculated and cruel physical violence intended to debilitate the victim:¹⁹⁷

At first it was bending of my fingers so that they swelled – to the point I could often not use fingers for weeks on end because of the damage.¹⁹⁸

She was the one that used to beat me in to unconsciousness more times than I can recall. The beatings were mostly over the head, hands and feet as she was determined to cripple me.¹⁹⁹

For some victims, the effects of the physical violence have necessitated intensive rehabilitation over long periods.²⁰⁰ Many victims told us, however, that it is years later when the signs of physical violence on the body begin to show:

What I wanted to say was how much ongoing medical costs I now have all these years later. When a right-handed man repeatedly strikes you over many years you bear the damage on the left side. Your head snaps to the right. Again and again. Your spine tells the story.²⁰¹

Children and young people as victims

To my parents, I was a trouble maker who was nothing but an inconvenient and difficult child who was never satisfied. I felt horribly unloved. It was such a desultory, dank, fetid and oppressive atmosphere that I came to the conclusion that my sisters and I must have been products of rape. Many years later after I'd escaped, I remember cowering when I saw my father on a bus. After his death, I cowered again because I saw someone who looked like him.²⁰²

Children can be affected by family violence directly by being the target of the violence or indirectly through exposure to family violence or its effects in the home. Both circumstances can have a profound impact on the wellbeing of children and young people.²⁰³ The Commission was told about the effects of family violence and sexual violence on children and young people's wellbeing. It was said they often continue to be affected in their adult life:

My father was, and still is, an alcoholic. Throughout my childhood, he physically, verbally and emotionally abused my mother, my two siblings and me. At the time, I felt that the death of at least one of us was inevitable, rather than probable ... My father's behaviour has affected every aspect of my life. It negatively impacted my school attendance, results and participation in extracurricular activities, such as sport, debutante balls and formals. It prohibited me from making and maintaining friendships. It has limited my opportunities and crushed my self-confidence.²⁰⁴

My experiences as both a victim/survivor as well as being in a family where sexual violence and abuse has occurred has been difficult not only due to the impacts of the abuse itself but also because of the isolation myself and members of my family felt after the abuse. As victims of the abuse both directly and indirectly we have been made to feel ashamed, labelled and lost.²⁰⁵

For many adults with a traumatic history such as this, the long-term effects are debilitating:

To this day my anger is hard to control. It has got me in trouble with the law and courts. Because of this I isolate myself from everyone and I can't hold a relationship or trust anyone. I even try to end my life many many times.²⁰⁶

Incredibly sadly, the negative impact of my early life on my ability to understand boundaries in relationships came to a head two years ago when I was myself in an incredibly horrible abusive relationship.²⁰⁷

A victim of sexual abuse by her father said:

Even now at [removed] years of age I am distressed to write this. The sense of powerlessness and being different has never left me. I will often feel all wrong and have to leave. I cannot join in conversations as I do not have a shared experience with others. I am deeply ashamed and try so hard to remember how it started, perhaps I am somehow to blame. I can remember when I started to menstruate and he said we now had to be very careful. I still have this sense we were somehow in partnership.²⁰⁸

While many submissions described parents' use of violence, the Commission also heard from a number of people who experienced violence at the hands of a sibling. One submission described this as follows:

Although he never escalated (while still a child or teen) to serious violence, well not enough to put me in hospital and ... get the adults on his case, the constant and unpredictable attacks meant that I lived in a constant state of hyper-alert terror, with the attendant self-loathing, low self-esteem and depression that every victim of domestic violence knows far too well.²⁰⁹

The Commission heard many other stories of family violence perpetrated against children and young people and its often devastating impacts.

As noted, children can be affected by family violence as a result of being exposed to it or by indirectly experiencing its harmful impacts on the family. Although it is difficult to assess the full extent of children's exposure to family violence, it is apparent that a substantial number of children are affected. In Victoria in 2013–14 in 34 per cent ($n=22,376$) of family violence incidents recorded by police there was at least one child present,²¹⁰ and in the five years to 30 June 2014 the number of children listed as victims on family violence intervention order applications increased by 20.6 per cent to 23,332 children.²¹¹ The ANROWS analysis of the ABS Personal Safety Survey shows that since the age of 15, over half a million Australian women have children who saw or heard partner violence.²¹²

Victorian law recognises that, even when children are not the direct object of family violence, exposing them to it is itself a form of family violence.²¹³ Exposure can occur in many different ways—not only when children directly witness the violence. Among the examples given in the Family Violence Protection Act are when a child overhears threats of physical abuse of a family member, comforts or provides assistance to a family member who has been physically abused, cleans up a site after property has been intentionally damaged, or is present when police members attend an incident involving physical abuse.²¹⁴

Children can also be exposed by knowing or sensing that their mother is fearful.²¹⁵ The Commission for Children and Young People submitted:

Direct witnessing of incidents is not the only form of exposure that professionals should be concerned about, as there are a multitude of ways that children may experience family violence. Children may be just as traumatized, or even more, by incidents that they did not witness, but are aware have occurred due to physical injuries or threats to a family member or pet ... We know from horror films that when the imagination 'fills in the gaps', the experience may be more terrifying.²¹⁶

There is increasing recognition that children exposed to family violence are not passive 'witnesses' and that they suffer lasting effects even if they are not the direct object of the violence or do not directly witness it.²¹⁷ Children are highly sensitive to their environment and will register even subtle changes in their primary caregiver's emotional state or the atmosphere at home:²¹⁸

My children did not usually witness overt events (my husband would pick his moments and wait until we were alone to verbally and emotionally abuse me), however they were picking up on the 'atmosphere' in the home which was becoming increasingly hostile. To give an example, both of them approached me at different times, and totally out of the blue began asking me whether I wanted to be cremated or buried and telling me they didn't want to die ... I questioned them carefully thinking it may be part of the usual childhood fascination with death ... But they couldn't account for where their questions had come from. I knew in my heart it was to do with the more sinister atmosphere in our home ...²¹⁹

Children are exposed to emotional abuse when their mother is the target of violence:

Dad's controlling behaviour meant that I feared him much of the time. He only needed to look at me in a stern way and I would be shaking. Mum and Dad were often 'at war'—a very cold war so that the bulk of my childhood I would describe as tension-filled. I was well cared for with no doubts of my parents' love for me but Dad's controlling behaviour left me with soulscars I have been working with for a long time ... Some of the things I can look back at and can now identify as abuse are things like shouting at my Mum to 'just shut up' when she was expressing an opinion. This was reinforced by Dad when he demanded Mum to read stories that reinforced this idea that wives need to be happy with whatever their husbands say or do ... the scary stares, stonewalling with no response from Dad for weeks—Dad sleeping on the couch for all this time, carping at mum for going to work. Wives (this wife in particular) should be happy to be dependent on whatever Dad brought home, threatening mum with committing suicide if she ever left him and controlling mum's outings and getting snide remarks or cold treatment if she came home even a bit later than was expected.²²⁰

Exposure can begin from birth, or even in utero, and can have immediate and long-term psychological and behavioural impacts and health and socio-economic effects. The child's ability to trust and relate to others can be adversely affected, which in turn can affect future relationships.²²¹

There is some evidence that exposure to family violence as a child can lead to intergenerational transmission of violence: children exposed to family violence are more likely to hold attitudes that justify their own use of violence.²²² This does not, however, mean children exposed to violence will inevitably become perpetrators as adults or that they will necessarily suffer negative consequences in their lives: many children and young people demonstrate remarkable resilience in the face of family violence.²²³ Resilience is discussed below.

Cumulative effects

The Commission was informed that health and wellbeing effects are not experienced in isolation. They are complex and interrelated, can be experienced during a violent relationship, and can continue post-separation. One woman, who asked to keep her identity confidential, described having to leave the family home and the children's school, change names, and cease contact with friends for safety reasons. This was trauma additional to the experience of family violence.²²⁴

The Commission was told about a range of factors, particularly related to dealing with the legal and service systems, that compound women's experience of harm and delay or prevent the recovery process:

Women are moved out of their region for safety reasons but can then be far away from the court – resulting in many having transport issues, mobility issues, language issues, children to consider.²²⁵

I have to go to court every second week. I am trying to study, but I keep having to miss classes. I have spent the last three months in and out of court.²²⁶

I don't think the police station, when you have an IVO, the onus is on you to report every breach. It can take that person two minutes to breach and you have to sit there, sometimes up to two hours, reporting each breach and that's very taxing.²²⁷

I find having to retell this part of my life over and over with different organisations reimpacts and is adding to cumulative harm, so having the support from services I have known in [removed] to be of great assistance to me.²²⁸

It was said that the cumulative effect of these harms on health and wellbeing, in addition to economic insecurity and lack of employment and secure housing, contributes to poverty and homelessness. One person explained:

Depression is a really hard battle. But I don't need any more conflicting issues with psychologist people. Financially I can't afford to feed us. I can't afford to get our shower fixed. We didn't have a heater for 4 or 5 years. I just can't afford it. To me that's some sort of physical impact.²²⁹

Dr Rhonda Cumberland, Chief Executive Officer, Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, described the current system's failure to engage with victims and recognise the cumulative impact of multiple forms of harm:

I have been distressed as I've worked in this field to see how many women do become trapped in the system. Again it's an unintended consequence, but we do think about crisis and resolving a crisis situation, and professionals who work in this area, any practitioner will know that once you've stabilised the crisis, the more that you move into a hardship circumstance or something that's stable, the system soon tires of you and forgets about you. It's in that forgetting and in that fatigue that women's capacity to get out of the system, that genuine empowerment of women fails to take place, and it does mean for long periods of time. You often only have sort of small windows to get the re-engagement to happen, to get the reconnections to happen. Once those windows close, it's highly unlikely that women can re-engage to the extent that they could have if there were an earlier intervention.²³⁰

Long-term effects

As noted, the trauma and the health and wellbeing effects of family violence often remain long after the violence itself ends.²³¹ This impedes recovery. The Commission received submissions from victims who had suffered family violence a considerable time ago and were still suffering from its consequences decades later:

A heavy sadness continues to fill my soul, as how do you ever fully recover from such a cowardly, dangerous, intentional and reckless act? Words really fail me when attempting to describe how this crime has affected us. I constantly relive every word, every hurt, every moment. Arguably, the most damaging aspect of the assault is the ongoing trauma from being betrayed by the person that I thought I could love and trust. This inhumane attack turned my world upside down and all order completely disappeared. The wounds remain, in time the mind covers them with scar tissue and the pain [lessens]. But it is never gone. The nightmares remain, the fear stays and the words still go unspoken. The damage is irreversible and forever-lasting.²³²

On a final note, my poor choice in a partner has cost me my career, health, financial security, happiness, dreams and hope for the future. On a daily basis I deal with the impact on my ex's behavior on my children and fear the impact this will have on them in the long term.²³³

Several submissions and community consultation participants described intense physical reactions and/or aversions to particular objects that reminded them of experiencing violence:

I cannot wear anything around my neck at the moment. If it wasn't for me kicking him, I would be dead. If I put something on it feels like I'm choking. Plus the knives. I only have one knife in my house at the moment because my son tried to stab me.²³⁴

Constant anxiety inside me. On high alert every time the phone rang or I got mail. Hearing cars, smelling cigarette smoke etc. were triggers for me, my body would stop working and I would panic.²³⁵

The Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists submitted that 'the most profound and long lasting effects of FV are those related to mental ill health. Chronic stress such as that seen in FV leads to neuro-biological impacts which in turn produce mental illness and physical illness'.²³⁶ The Commission was informed that psychological trauma caused by family violence can lead to ongoing cognitive and behavioural problems, including post-traumatic stress disorder:²³⁷

My children and I have all been diagnosed with severe post-traumatic stress disorder. It manifests differently in all of us but includes depression and anxiety disorders. Our lives are tainted by what happened to us and that never goes away ... I look at my children and how they struggle with the mental health issues of growing up in a house where violence was routine and where verbal abuse was dished out constantly and I blame myself always. I live with the shame and the guilt of not being able to protect them or myself, and I live with the knowledge that the person who inflicted this damage will never answer for it.²³⁸

The Commission was also informed that many women with extensive histories of family violence are being diagnosed with a condition called 'complex trauma disorder', which has symptoms affecting cognition and emotional wellbeing.²³⁹ The importance of 'trauma-informed care' in responding to the needs of victims of family violence was highlighted to the Commission.²⁴⁰ This is discussed in Chapter 19.

Resilience

Although hundreds of women described their experiences and the trauma caused by family violence, the Commission was struck by the enormous resilience and strength victims displayed both during and after the violence:

I am stronger and [more] empowered than ever before, and I am now completing my dual diploma in Community Services and Case management to achieve my goal, (and passion) to work in the family violence sector to help women and children recover from family violence and rebuild their lives, it can be done, and I have done it.²⁴¹

The Commission heard about the positive health and wellbeing outcomes of victims who were supported, both personally and professionally. Often, strong support networks from family, friends and professionals were crucial and served to increase a victim's resilience and enhance their sense of wellbeing:

I experienced physical, emotional, and spiritual abuse in the relationship. I can testify that complete recovery is achievable and attainable but it requires a lot of hard work. You cannot handle the situation in isolation; you need friends, family and counsellors to pull you through. It takes a lot of courage and strength to walk through it. You will have setbacks along the way provided you keep heading in the right direction that is all that it counts.²⁴²

I thank you for giving me this opportunity to submit my personal experience with family violence, I would like to add that I am doing fantastic now, this was 3 years ago, and with the amazing support of my family, children and psychologist, and my wonderful new partner, I have been able to heal, and not be a victim but a survivor.²⁴³

The Commission's findings are supported by those of a number of studies that highlight the resilience of victims of family violence and their ability to 'recover' from experiences of violence. The Australian Longitudinal Study on Women's Health found that younger women who had previously experienced partner violence had better mental health than women who had experienced violence more recently.²⁴⁴ A South Australian study that assessed 59 women who had experienced family violence for post-traumatic stress disorder, anxiety and depression showed a significant reduction in symptoms at a 12-month follow-up.²⁴⁵

Although children and young people disproportionately experience the effects of family violence, they too display great resilience: research shows that many children who experience such violence do as well as children who have not experienced it.²⁴⁶

The lasting impacts of family violence and men's violence against women is life long, however women, children and families have the ability to survive this and even thrive after the violence has occurred. What is crippling for individuals and families is a lack of support which would otherwise enable them to return to work, continue to study, maintain relations and participate in everyday life again. We need to minimise the impact violence can have on the lives of those directly impacted by violence and the family and friends who support them ... I would like all women and their families who have experienced violence to feel like they have somewhere to go, someone to call and to feel that they have a bright future ahead of them after the abuse has occurred.²⁴⁷

The resilience of children and young people is discussed in more detail in Chapter 10.

Family violence–related deaths

I grabbed [the] children and hid them in the back bedroom as I thought this would be the safest place if he tried to get in the flat. I rang the Police, as I was on the phone I heard a large gunshot and a Scream. I quickly tried to explain to the Police and hung up the phone, At that moment my Daughter came running out of the back bedroom and tried to look through the venetian blinds. I grabbed hold of her and we all just sat together in the bedroom until the Police arrived. MY HUSBAND SHOT HIMSELF DEAD. I was told by the Police that there were [removed] bullets in the gun. They believed that he had planned one bullet for each of us.²⁴⁸

Fiona, a mother of four from Melton West, had been at the Sunshine Magistrates' Court for an intervention order hearing. She had attended a nearby women's refuge before she was tragically killed by her ex-partner outside Sunshine Shopping Centre.²⁴⁹

On Saturday he rang [removed] and told her he had been injured in a football accident and asked her to return to their apartment to help him. Unfortunately she agreed to stay overnight to make sure he was OK, but by the morning she was dead brutally murdered by him ... the memory of the loss of our beloved, gentle daughter and sister ... continues to haunt us to this day.²⁵⁰

My sister ... was in a number of abusive relationships. She ended up committing suicide about five years ago. My sister never sought any type of help in any way.²⁵¹

Nikita Chawla was a beautiful, kind-hearted, gentle, energetic and ambitious young woman with a passion for performing arts and dance. Her life was taken in a brutal act of domestic violence perpetrated on 9 January 2015. She was 23 years old. She had her whole life ahead of her.²⁵²

Kelly loved life and just living – that was taken away from her and us; her family.²⁵³

The Commission received several submissions from family members of people who had been killed by other family members, some in recent years and others some time ago. Most of these cases involved women who were killed by their male partners or ex partners. The Commission met privately a number of bereaved families who spoke of the devastating impact of their loved one's—and in one case loved ones'—death. In each case the course of events leading to the death had involved a history of family violence. In some cases the family violence was known to family members, police, the courts and specialist family violence services during the victim's lifetime; in others, the victim had not disclosed or had only partially disclosed the occurrence or extent of the violence they had suffered.

The Commission was moved and impressed by the insight and conviction of these families. The Commission is grateful for the detailed and considered contribution it received from these families. The stories they told illuminated the very grave consequences that gaps and failings in the system's response to family violence can have. Their courage in revisiting the circumstances that had led to the death of their daughter or son, sister or parents was remarkable, as was the clarity with which they were able to identify ways that system failings might be addressed to spare other individuals and families a similar fate.

As shocking as the statistics on family violence–related deaths are, the Commission would like to acknowledge that the statistics outlined in this section cannot convey the grief the families have felt for the loss of their loved ones. 'Domestic homicides'²⁵⁴ are recorded by the Australian Institute of Criminology's National Homicide Monitoring Program.²⁵⁵ Of the 96 homicide incidents in Victoria between 1 July 2010 and 30 June 2012, almost a third were domestic homicides.²⁵⁶ Nationally, women constituted 76 per cent of the victims of intimate partner homicides, 50 per cent of homicides by parents, 52 per cent of homicides by children, and 25 per cent of other family homicides.²⁵⁷

There is a demonstrable link between family violence, homicide and suicide:

- ▶ Each year in Victoria about 40 per cent of all deaths attributed to homicide occur between parties in an intimate relationship or familial relationship (this includes adults and children). That is about 25 deaths a year.²⁵⁸
- ▶ Between 2009 and 2012 almost 35 per cent of women who died through suicide had a reported history of family violence. That is about 50 deaths a year.²⁵⁹
- ▶ A large number of men who died from suicide in Victoria between 2009 and 2012 had a history of family violence. Many men had a history of perpetrating such violence. There were approximately 110 deaths annually of men with a history of family violence.²⁶⁰ The Commission was cautioned, however, that the relationship and mediating factors between perpetration of family violence and suicide are not well understood.²⁶¹

The Coroners Court of Victoria identified 288 family violence-related deaths in the state between 1 January 2000 and 31 December 2010—in total, 150 females and 138 males.²⁶² The Coroners Court submitted to the Commission:

Coronial investigations of family violence homicides have also identified that third parties and professionals are often aware of the occurrence of family violence, however for various reasons have not notified any authority. This finding is replicated amongst those exposed to family violence who subsequently die from suicide, with almost 85% of these women having discussed their exposure to violence with either professionals or family and friends.²⁶³

As might be expected, the coronial investigations of family violence homicide have revealed that many parties involved in fatal family violence incidents had previous contact with the justice system. Many had contact with the police, courts and/or community corrections within six months of the fatal event. In addition, in some incidents, the perpetrator of family violence had a current family violence intervention order against them at the time of the fatal event. There was evidence of perpetrators breaching the conditions of the order in close proximity to orders having been made, as well as further violence occurring that was not reported to police. While family violence intervention orders are an integral part to improving victim safety, for a proportion of cases, it is evident that an intervention order does not result in an end to violence. As demonstrated here, this can be to the extent that a fatal outcome occurs.²⁶⁴

Some deaths are also indirectly linked to family violence, and the impacts are not known or understood until some time later, if at all. These include

- ▶ premature deaths from chronic illness, disability or injury linked to childhood neglect or to serious or sustained violence in adulthood
- ▶ deaths linked to neurological or psychiatric conditions caused or exacerbated by violence
- ▶ deaths caused by substance misuse, which itself can be linked to experiences of family violence.

In Chapter 25, we consider the role of the Coroner and the value of systemic death reviews conducted by that office.

3 Key family violence data

Introduction

Family violence is a pervasive and pernicious problem in our society. Although it takes many forms, the most common type of family violence is intimate partner violence, which is mainly perpetrated by men against women. There has been more research done on this type of violence than on violence against other family members.

Chapter 2 provides an overview of the nature and dynamics of family violence, the different forms it can take, the times of heightened risk, and some of the effects of such violence.

This chapter explains some of the limitations of the data used throughout this report—the greatest problem being the widespread under-reporting of family violence. This is more fully explored in Chapter 39 but, for now, it is sufficient to say that our understanding of family violence is hindered by under-reporting, by a lack of capacity in various workforces to identify family violence, by gaps in recorded data on the impact of family violence for particular groups and communities, and by the ways in which people interact with different services and systems that aim to prevent or respond to family violence.

Acknowledging these limitations, it is important to explain some terms that can assist in the reading of the data used throughout this report—terms such as ‘prevalence’ and ‘incidence’. Efforts have been made in recent years to understand more about the prevalence of family violence. Although it is not clear whether its prevalence is increasing, there has been a marked increase in the reporting of it, and this is reflected in family violence incidence data for Victoria. This increased incidence puts extraordinary pressure on the systems and services that deal with family violence.

While we know that family violence can involve people of all ages and backgrounds, we share what we know about demographic trends of both perpetrators and victims of family violence.

Finally, this chapter also discusses some of the primary statistics that are often relied on throughout this report.

Terminology

- ▶ The terms ‘affected family member’ and ‘other party’, as used by the police, refer respectively to a person to be protected by a family violence intervention order (the victim) and a person against whom such an order is made (the perpetrator); the terms ‘applicant’ and ‘respondent’ are used by the courts.
- ▶ Throughout this chapter the terms ‘victim’ and ‘affected family member’ are used interchangeably. Similarly, the terms ‘respondent’ and ‘perpetrator’ are used interchangeably—recognising that there might not have been any findings of guilt in respect of the ‘perpetrator’, who could therefore be called an ‘alleged perpetrator’.
- ▶ The formal term for breaching a family violence intervention order is a ‘contravention’; it is, however, commonly described simply as a ‘breach’. These terms are used interchangeably in this chapter and throughout the report.

Data limitations

A great deal of family violence is hidden. People might not report their experience of it or it might be reported in a way that obscures its nature or extent, for example by reporting an injury, but not attributing it to violence (sometimes called ‘hidden reporting’). When people do report family violence, the services and organisations that collect the information might not record it properly or consistently (sometimes called ‘under-recording’).¹

Many varied and complex factors lie beneath hidden reporting and under-recording, among them the following:

- ▷ shame, fear and stigma
- ▷ practical or technical barriers—such as the way surveys and service providers pose questions and the language and setting in which the questions are asked
- ▷ factors that create additional barriers—such as linguistic and cultural barriers, geographical isolation, disability or homelessness—making people less visible in data collection
- ▷ not recognising certain behaviours—particularly emotional or economic abuse—as constituting family violence
- ▷ a lack of capacity among multiple systems and services to identify family violence.

Population survey data does, however, reveal the extent to which people might not report family violence. For example, the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey (ABS Personal Safety Survey) shows that, of people who had experienced violence by a current partner (estimated to be 66 per cent [$n=237,100$] women and 34 per cent [$n=119,600$] men), 25.6 per cent of women and 54.1 per cent of men said they had never told anyone about violence by a current partner, and 39 per cent of women and 70.3 per cent of men said they had never sought advice or support in connection with a current partner's violence.²

The ABS Personal Safety Survey also found that, of those people who had experienced violence by a previous partner (estimated to be 1,267,200 women and 336,300 men), 6.7 per cent of women and 20.9 per cent of men said they had never told anyone about previous partner violence, and 23.9 per cent of women and 47.6 per cent of men said they had never sought advice or support in connection with previous partner violence.³

Even when people do report family violence, information about them can be incompletely or inaccurately recorded. For example, some data sets might not record particular demographic characteristics or might record them unreliably or inconsistently.⁴ In addition, organisations and service providers can collect data differently, so it can sometimes be difficult to draw robust conclusions about trends or patterns.

Further, information about services and organisations themselves is often limited, which makes it hard to measure performance, forecast demand, and determine effective measures to reduce or prevent family violence.

The prevalence of family violence

In the context of this inquiry, the term 'prevalence' refers to the proportion of people in a population who have experienced family violence, or a particular manifestation of it, at least once. Prevalence data is usually derived from examining the proportion of family violence at a particular time—much like a data snapshot. This is different from 'incidence', which is a more dynamic measure that examines the rate and pattern of incidents, often expressed per 100,000 people. Incidence is discussed further shortly, under the heading 'The incidence of family violence'.

The Personal Safety Survey

The Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey is arguably the most comprehensive source of data on the prevalence of interpersonal violence in Australia.⁵ It does have limitations, though; for example, it includes only adults, and it does not include people such as those living in residential care settings and people experiencing homelessness.

The survey focuses on men's and women's experiences of physical and sexual violence, emotional abuse, stalking and sexual harassment. The ABS conducted the survey in 2012 and 2005; a precursor survey, the Women's Safety Survey, was conducted in 1996. In 2012, 17,050 respondents completed the survey, 2,404 of them being in Victoria.⁶

The ABS Personal Safety Survey asked about respondents' experiences of physical, sexual and emotional violence in the preceding 12 months and since the respondents were 15 years old. For physical and sexual violence, the survey records the respondent's relationship with the perpetrator, thus producing an estimate of the prevalence of violence perpetrated by parents, children, siblings, partners and other relations. The survey uses the term 'partner' to describe a person with whom the respondent was living or with whom they lived at some point in a married or de facto relationship; 'partner violence' excludes violence perpetrated by a 'boyfriend/girlfriend or date'.⁷

The survey defines 'physical violence' and 'sexual violence' to include physical and sexual 'assaults' and 'threats'. Physical assault involves the use of physical force intended to harm or frighten. This includes being pushed, grabbed, punched, shoved, slapped, kicked, bitten, choked, dragged, stabbed, shot, or struck with a vehicle; it excludes contact during sport. Physical threat involves an attempt, threat or suggestion of intent to inflict physical harm made face-to-face and where the victim believed it was able and likely to be carried out. It includes threats to carry out the listed examples of physical violence.⁸

Sexual assault is defined to involve acts of a sexual nature carried out against the victim's will through force, intimidation or coercion or any attempt to do this. It includes rape, attempted rape, aggravated sexual assault and indecent assault. Unwanted sexual touching was separately considered under 'sexual harassment'. Sexual threat includes face-to-face threats of a sexual nature where the victim believed the threats able and likely to be carried out.⁹

Emotional abuse is defined as follows:

... when a person is subjected to certain behaviours or actions that are aimed at preventing or controlling their behaviour with the intent to cause them emotional harm or fear. These behaviours are characterised in nature by their intent to manipulate, control, isolate or intimidate the person they are aimed at. They are generally repeated behaviours and include psychological, social, economic and verbal abuse.¹⁰

What the survey tells us

Figure 3.1 show some statistics from the ABS Personal Safety Survey. The figures reported are estimates of the proportion of the total adult male and female population of Australia (as opposed to the proportions of survey respondents). The data demonstrates that the Victorian and national prevalence of women's experience of partner violence in the 12 months preceding the survey are comparable, at 1.5 per cent of the female population.¹¹

The 'violence' figure and the subsets of 'physical violence' and 'sexual violence' include violence perpetrated by both strangers and family members. These figures place family violence in context and demonstrate that, while men experience overall higher rates of physical violence, women are more likely to experience both physical and sexual violence at the hands of a partner or ex-partner, parents, children, siblings and other relatives or in-laws. They also show that intimate partner violence is markedly more common than other forms of family violence. The next most prevalent form of family violence is that perpetrated by parents against children.

Figure 3.1 shows the estimated proportions of men and women who had experienced family violence (emotional, physical and sexual) since the age of 15 years and the relationship they had with the person committing the violence.¹² It demonstrates that the majority of family violence occurs in the context of an intimate partner relationship and that women are more likely to experience it than men.

Figure 3.1 Experience of emotional, physical or sexual family violence by a partner or ex-partner since the age of 15: Australia, 2012

Source: Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Personal Safety Survey, Australia, 2012' (Catalogue No 4906.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, December 2013), Table 4.

Measuring change over time can be difficult, partly because of changing approaches to asking questions and defining concepts between different surveys. ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) has reported, however, that the proportion of women experiencing violence perpetrated by a cohabiting partner in the 12 months preceding both the 2005 and 2012 ABS Personal Safety Surveys did not change, remaining at 1.5 per cent.¹³

To gain a sense of how the data compares internationally one can refer to the World Health Organization (WHO), which in 2010 estimated rates of intimate partner violence against women who have been in a relationship by region.¹⁴ The World Health Organization uses a narrower definition of physical and sexual violence than the ABS Personal Safety Survey by excluding threats of violence other than those involving a weapon but a broader definition of intimate partner, by including dating and informal partnerships. Like the ABS Personal Safety Survey, it measures experiences of intimate partner violence from the age of 15 years. The high-income region, which includes Australia, has a 23.2 per cent prevalence rate; this compares with the 23.6 per cent found in the ABS Personal Safety Survey.¹⁵ The average of all regions is about 30 per cent.¹⁶

The ANROWS analysis

In October 2015 ANROWS produced an additional analysis of the ABS Personal Safety Survey, including several hundred new statistical items related to violence against women.¹⁷ Among the main findings from its analysis are the following.

Characteristics of partner violence

- ▷ Prevalence. When the definition of 'intimate partner' is broadened to include non-cohabiting partners (boyfriend, girlfriend or date), one in four women—an estimated 2,194,200 women in Australia—had experienced violence by a male intimate partner since the age of 15 years. This is three-quarters of the total estimate for women who have experienced violence by a known male: family violence against women is overwhelmingly perpetrated by partners. An estimated 0.3 per cent of women have experienced violence by a female intimate partner. Rates of cohabiting partner violence in the 12 months preceding the survey were highest among women aged 25 to 34 years.
- ▷ Pregnancy and children. Since the age of 15 an estimated 400,000 women experienced violence by a cohabiting partner during pregnancy, and over half a million reported that their child had seen or heard partner violence.
- ▷ Employment and financial impacts. One in four employed women who experienced physical assault by a male cohabiting partner took time away from work as a result of their most recent incident of assault, and over half a million (seven out of 10 women who experienced violence in a previous relationship) abandoned property or assets when they moved away after a violent relationship ended.¹⁸

If the analysis is broadened to capture data on violence more generally, it becomes apparent that gender is a significant variable when considering different patterns of violence.¹⁹ For example, while we know that men are more likely to be victims of general (non-family) physical violence—one in two men have experienced physical violence since the age of 15, compared with one in three women—this type of violence is more likely to occur at the hands of men and outside the family home.²⁰ By contrast, violence against women is more likely to be perpetrated by an intimate partner.

Characteristics of general (non-family) violence

- ▷ Perpetrators. Both women and men are over three times more likely to be physically assaulted by a man than by a woman.
- ▷ Place. A man is most likely to experience violence in a place of entertainment; a woman is more likely to experience it in her home.
- ▷ Multiple episodes. An estimated 1.7 million women had experienced multiple incidents of physical violence by a male perpetrator since the age of 15. Two-thirds of these reported that the violence was perpetrated by the same man. In the 12 months preceding the survey women with disabilities were more likely than women without disabilities to experience multiple incidents of violence by a male perpetrator.²¹

The incidence of family violence

As noted, the term ‘incidence’ is used to capture the rate at which family violence occurs over time. Examining incidence helps us identify trends or patterns that might help to guide service responses. It is distinct from a consideration of ‘incidents,’ which is the number of separate and individual occurrences of an event—for example, police attending a house to respond to an incident of family violence. In this case, incidence is the rate at which the number of police attendances is increasing or decreasing.

In addition to the prevalence data provided by the ABS Personal Safety Survey, agencies, departments and services collect statistics that provide measures of the incidence of reported family violence.

Incidence has been calculated differently in some of the data sets discussed in this section. Victoria Police data measures incidence as the number of family violence incidents (police attendances for family violence) recorded in a specific period, so each time a victim (or another person) reports an incident of family violence it will be counted. Victoria Police also extrapolates these figures to gain a prevalence rate per 100,000.

The high-level data from the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court reports all applications (original, extension, variation and revocation) for family violence intervention orders. The sections that report on the demographic characteristics of affected family members and respondents are based only on original family violence intervention order applications, so there is no double-counting of affected family members and respondents. This latter approach aligns with an alternative definition of incidence—the number of new cases of family violence in a particular period—that has been used in some studies.²²

Recent years have seen a marked increase in recorded cases of or cases related to family violence in many data sets. This does not necessarily mean, however, that family violence has become more prevalent. Increases in recorded cases might reflect higher reporting rates or improved skill or effort in identifying family violence. It is important to remember that many incidents of family violence go unreported. Nevertheless, the figures in this section show that extraordinary pressure is being placed on our systems and services.

As noted in Chapter 1, Victoria’s Family Violence Database collected incidence data from a range of sources between 1999 and 2010. It produced major reports in 2002, 2005, 2008, 2009 and most recently in 2012. This database was, however, not operational in the following years, resulting in an absence of publicly available compiled trend data.

To resolve this problem, and to advance our understanding of the nature and extent of family violence, the Commission engaged the Crime Statistics Agency to produce an updated set of family violence statistics for the five years from 1 July 2009 to 30 June 2014, based on analysis of all the data sources contained in the Family Violence Database.²³ The agency’s findings are included throughout this report. These and related matters are discussed in more detail in Chapter 39.

The following section looks at some primary indicators of incidence, beginning with the law enforcement and justice system and moving to other systems and services such as health, accommodation and specialist family violence services.

Legal and law enforcement indicators

Family violence incidents recorded by police

Many people affected by family violence in Victoria come into contact with police as a result of the violence. About 30 per cent of family violence intervention order applications are, however, made by victims directly to the courts, and these applications therefore do not appear in police statistics.²⁴

When police respond to a family violence incident, they complete a risk assessment and risk management report, known as an L17 form. The number of family incidents—incidents for which an L17 is completed—is therefore a valuable measure of the incidence of reported family violence. The number of ‘family incidents’ increased by about 83 per cent between 2009–10 and 2013–14 (see Figure 3.2).²⁷ There has been a 71 per cent increase in the rate per 100,000 population of police family violence reports over this five-year period, from 653.1 to 1115.3.²⁵ A further increase was seen in 2014–15, when there were 70,906 family incidents recorded by police, which equates to a rate of 1191.5 per 100,000 population.²⁶ The data is discussed further in Chapter 15.

Recidivist perpetrators

As part of its work in response to the Commission’s request, the Crime Statistics Agency analysed 10 years of Victoria Police data relating to recidivist (alleged) perpetrators of family violence.

- ▶ From 1 July 2004 to 30 June 2014 police recorded 403,991 L17 forms involving 197,822 perpetrators. The majority (63 per cent, $n=125,044$) of these perpetrators were recorded on only one L17 form.
- ▶ Recidivist perpetrators had a disproportionate impact on the volume of family incidents recorded by police: 13 per cent ($n=25,092$) of perpetrators were recorded in more than four incidents each and seven perpetrators were recorded in more than 50 incidents each.
- ▶ Overall, despite accounting for nine per cent ($n=16,914$) of all unique perpetrators, those involved in five or more incidents accounted for 34 per cent ($n=136,349$) of all family incidents. The Crime Statistics Agency did not consider the extent to which individual perpetrators repeat violence against one or multiple victims.²⁸

Chapters 15, 18 and 39 provide more detailed information about the problem and incidence of family violence recidivism.

Family violence intervention orders

The number of family violence intervention order applications heard by the Magistrates' and Children's Courts of Victoria is one measure of family violence.

Between 2009–10 and 2013–14 the number of FVIO applications finalised by the Magistrates' Court increased by 34.5 per cent, from 26,124 to 35,147.²⁹ Figure 3.3 shows the increase in FVIO applications finalised in the Magistrates' Court and the proportion that were original matters, applications for extension, applications for revocation and applications for variation, between 2009–10 and 2013–14.

Focusing on original applications, the Crime Statistics Agency found that there were some 42,333 affected family members listed on original applications in 2009–10 and 52,777 in 2013–14, an increase of almost a quarter. There were 29,987 respondents in 2013–14, a 30.2 per cent increase on 2009–10.³⁰

Figure 3.4 shows an increase in the number of finalised FVIO applications made to magistrates' courts by police. Police-initiated applications now account for 66 per cent ($n=23,216$) of FVIO applications, up from 52 per cent ($n=13,670$) in 2009–10.³¹

The number of finalised FVIO applications in the Children's Court of Victoria increased by 33 per cent between 2009–10 and 2013–14, from 1407 to 1872.³³

If a person contravenes (breaches) a family violence intervention order—for example, by perpetrating further family violence—this is a criminal offence which can result in prosecution in the Magistrates' Court.³⁴ In their joint submission, the Magistrates' and Children's Courts of Victoria noted that since 2004–05 the number of contravention proceedings heard in magistrates' courts has more than trebled, reaching 6331 in 2013–14.³⁵ This does not necessarily reflect an increase in people breaching intervention orders or the fact that the intervention order system is failing. It could be that police are increasingly acknowledging the seriousness of breaches and acting on them or that women are more likely to call police if a breach occurs, or both.

Breaches of family violence intervention orders, even if they do not involve behaviours that are considered criminal, can cause profound fear and distress to victims. Further, prosecuting breaches adds to the burden of family violence on our criminal justice system. Breaches are discussed in Chapters 14 and 17.

Family violence-related crimes and the higher courts

The Director of Public Prosecutions submitted that in the last three reporting years approximately 1200 matters prosecuted by the Victorian Public Prosecution Service in the higher courts were nominated as family violence matters. The offences included homicide, assault, sexual offences and substantive breaches of intervention orders. About 10 per cent ($n=23$) of the 250 murder cases prosecuted in this period were related to family violence.³⁶ Family violence-related deaths and the Coroners Court are discussed in Chapter 25.

The demand for health, accommodation, legal and specialist services

Many other systems and services deal with victims and perpetrators of family violence. They are discussed throughout this report; this section outlines the main findings from the Crime Statistics Agency data and other sources relating to various services.

Homelessness assistance

The Specialist Homelessness Services Collection collates state-based data on the provision of services to people who are homeless or at risk of homelessness, including women escaping family violence and their children. These sources include the majority of the women's specialist family violence services. The SHSC replaced a different data set that was compiled for the Supported Accommodation Assistance Program, in July 2011. Since that time the number of support periods provided to all clients in Victoria has increased by 46.7 per cent, from 128,694 in 2011–12 to 188,775 in 2013–14, and the number of those seeking assistance for family violence reasons has increased from 50,586 to 74,292.³⁷

The proportion of those support periods given to clients seeking assistance for family violence has remained relatively stable: in 2013–14, 39 per cent ($n=74,292$) of all people seeking assistance from specialist homelessness services did so for family violence reasons.³⁸

From July 2011 to June 2014 an average of 83 per cent of clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons were women.³⁹

These figures could be affected by under-reporting: for example, a person might tell the service provider the cause of their immediate need for assistance (such as financial hardship) but might not disclose the relationship between that immediate need and family violence (or even if it has been disclosed, it may not be recorded).

Family violence services funded by the Department of Health and Human Services

The Department of Health and Human Services uses a platform called the Integrated Reporting Information System, or IRIS, for its service providers funded for family violence counselling (that is, women's and children's services and men's behaviour change programs).

In 2013–14 men's behaviour change programs and women's and children's family violence counselling⁴⁰ agencies in Victoria recorded 25,786 individual clients, generating 26,168 cases. (Cases can be closed for a number of reasons, so there can be more than one case per client.)⁴¹

Overall case numbers have increased by 218 per cent since 2009–10, from 8229 to 26,168. Of the 26,168 cases in 2013–14, 97 per cent recorded at least one family violence issue (two per cent did not record an issue and one per cent recorded no family violence issue).⁴²

More specifically, from 2009–10 to 2013–14 IRIS recorded a 446.9 per cent increase, from 3771 to 20,624, in the number of clients 'accessing' men's behaviour change programs and an 11.7 per cent increase, from 3963 to 4425, in clients accessing women's and children's family violence counselling.⁴³ It should be noted in the case of men's behaviour change programs, 'accessing' may be anything from a phone call through to the completion of a men's behaviour change program. Demand associated with women's family violence services is discussed in Chapter 8; demand for men's behaviour change programs is discussed in Chapter 18.

Legal services

The Crime Statistics Agency reports that in the five years from July 2009 there has been an 8.5 per cent increase in services provided by Victoria Legal Aid where the primary matter was related to family violence. VLA provided 21,172 such services in 2013–14.⁴⁴ VLA told the Commission its duty lawyer services are at saturation point, have not kept pace with the number of applications for intervention orders, and cannot meet the increase in demand for such services without additional resource investment.⁴⁵

In addition to Victoria Legal Aid, community legal centres and private practitioners (who might be funded by VLA) also provide legal services. The Federation of Community Legal Centres' submission reported that '[t]he number of new family violence cases opened by community legal centres increased by 85% between 2008/09 and 2013/14'.⁴⁶

Health

The impact of family violence on the health system can be obscured by under-recording, misdiagnosis, lack of identification or confidentiality requirements. This is discussed further in Chapters 19 and 39.

Demographic characteristics of perpetrators and victims

Family violence occurs in many different settings and is associated with people of all ages, genders, physical and intellectual abilities, socio-economic status, race, cultures and sexualities. Different groups and individuals have different experiences of family violence, however, and not everyone is affected in the same way or to the same extent. This section highlights some of what the data shows about the demographic characteristics of perpetrators and victims, noting the major limitations shared by all data sets, when it comes to capturing diversity.

Gender

Family violence disproportionately affects women and children, and a disproportionate number of men are perpetrators. The Crime Statistics Agency report provides statistics on this.⁴⁷

During the five years from July 2009 to June 2014 the proportion of male to female other parties (respondents) and male to female victims has remained relatively stable throughout agencies that contribute to the Victorian Family Violence Database. It continues to demonstrate an over-representation of women as victims of family violence:

- ▷ In family incidents for which an L17 was completed, three-quarters of affected family members (victims) were female and one-quarter were male.
- ▷ In family incidents for which an L17 was completed, 77 per cent of other parties (perpetrators) were male and 23 per cent female.
- ▷ Of the total finalised applications for family violence intervention orders in the Magistrates' Court, 78 per cent of respondents were male and 22 per cent female.

The following applies for 2013–14:

- ▷ Two-thirds ($n=323$) of patients presenting to emergency departments for family violence reasons were female and a third ($n=162$) were male; similarly, 69 per cent ($n=11,141$) of family violence victims making use of the Victims Assistance Program were female and 31 per cent ($n=5052$) were male.⁴⁸ As outlined in Chapter 19, emergency department figures are likely to under-report family violence involvement in patient presentations.
- ▷ In applications for family violence intervention orders in the Magistrates' Court, 64 per cent ($n=33,951$) of affected family members were female and 36 per cent ($n=18,826$) were male.⁴⁹
- ▷ In applications for family violence intervention orders in the Children's Court, 65 per cent ($n=1683$) of affected family members were female and 35 per cent male ($n=910$).⁵⁰

In connection with relationships between victims and perpetrators, Crime Statistics Agency data shows that in each of the relevant data sets during the five years from July 2009 to June 2014 the relationship of the victim to the perpetrator varied depending on the gender of the victim, women being more likely to be a current or former partner of a male perpetrator:

- ▶ In family incidents recorded by police, female affected family members were more likely to be a current or former partner of the other party, as opposed to male affected family members, who were more likely to have a different familial relationship to the other party (for example, as a son or a sibling). In 2013–14, 68 per cent ($n=33,766$) of female affected family members were a current or former partner of the other party, whereas only 48 per cent ($n=7545$) of male affected family members were a current or former partner of the other party.⁵¹
- ▶ Similarly, in applications for family violence intervention orders in the Magistrates' Court female victims were more likely to be in a current or former partner relationship with the respondent than male victims. In 2013–14, 73 per cent ($n=16,465$) of female affected family members were in a current or former partner relationship and 10 per cent ($n=2155$) were a parent of the respondent. Fifty-two per cent ($n=3819$) of male affected family members were in a current or former partner relationship, 14 per cent ($n=1051$) were the parent or step-parent of the respondent, and 10 per cent ($n=769$) were a sibling.⁵²

The ANROWS analysis of the 2012 ABS Personal Safety Survey confirms that since the age of 15, over 400,000 women have experienced partner violence during pregnancy.⁵³ The survey also revealed that most women who had children in their care during a violent relationship said that children were exposed to the violence.⁵⁴

Child victims

While the proportion of family violence incidents in which a child was present has remained relatively steady, there has been an increase in the number of children listed as affected family members on family violence intervention order applications. This could be because Victoria Police is now likely to list children as affected family members when it seeks an intervention order

- ▶ In 34 per cent ($n=22,376$) of all family incidents recorded by Victoria Police in 2013–14 there was at least one child present. This proportion remained relatively stable in the period 2009–10 to 2013–14.⁵⁵
- ▶ In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014 the number of affected family members aged 17 and under listed on FVIO applications in the Magistrates' Court increased by just over 20 per cent—from 19,353 in 2009–10 to 23,332 in 2013–14. Of these 23,332, 50 per cent were male and 50 per cent female.⁵⁶

Child and young people other parties

- ▶ In 2013–14 approximately two-thirds (65 per cent; $n=780$) of male respondents on family violence intervention order applications in the Children's Court were aged between 15 and 19 years; 13 per cent ($n=153$) were aged from 10 to 14 years.⁵⁷
- ▶ From July 2009 to June 2014, 11,861 child other parties with adult parent affected family members were recorded on police L17 forms (a relatively small proportion of overall numbers).⁵⁸
- ▶ Department of Health and Human Services data shows that in 2013–14 there were 82,073 reports to Child Protection, of which 37,492 had family violence indicated at the time of reporting.⁵⁹

Children and young people as victims of family violence are discussed in Chapter 10. Matters relating to adolescents using family violence are discussed in Chapter 23.

Groups and communities

Particular population groups tend to experience higher levels of family violence or particular manifestations of family violence, are more vulnerable to the impacts of family violence, and face greater barriers to obtaining support.

Situations pertaining to specific groups and communities are discussed in Chapters 26 to 35. Here, it is worth noting the following:

- ▶ Some groups and communities experience family violence at increased rates. For example, there is evidence that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples might be at least 6.5 times more likely to report being a victim of family violence-related offending than non-Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples,⁶⁰ and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women are 34.2 times more likely to be hospitalised as a result of family violence.⁶¹ We also know that under-reporting of family violence is common in these communities.
- ▶ In the 2008 Coming Forward survey of 390 lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender Victorians, 35 per cent of women and 29 per cent of men reported experiencing partner violence or abuse and more than half of these respondents reported being physically attacked.⁶²
- ▶ Some groups and communities can be more vulnerable to particular manifestations of family violence. For example, up to one in 20 older people can experience elder abuse, and for about half of them that abuse might be in the form of financial abuse.⁶³
- ▶ Women with disabilities are at greater risk of family violence.⁶⁴ In the report of its Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths, the Victorian Coroners Court notes that people with disabilities can face specific barriers because of:

... communication and language barriers; a lack of appropriate transport and accommodation options for victims immediately fleeing violence; reliance on family members to provide care who may also be the perpetrators of violence; and in some instances, an absence of recognition as to their victimisation status.⁶⁵

- ▶ Victims from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds can face language and cultural barriers when seeking to engage with services. This can lead to the continuation of or an escalation in violence.
- ▶ Victims living in rural, regional and remote areas can have limited access to services and more limited means of leaving a violent relationship. This too can lead to the continuation of or an escalation in violence.

The data has its deficits and gaps in relation to these and other groups and communities; these can arise from under-reporting, from biases or omissions in data sets, or from assumptions or misapprehensions on the part of those collecting the data.

More broadly, statistics rarely capture the complexities that mediate people's contact or involvement with the family violence system—their lack of familiarity with or trust in the system; the inability of mainstream services and systems to respond flexibly and appropriately to their needs; and discrimination they might face in daily life and in multiple circumstances or organisations. These complexities are considered elsewhere in this report. The Commission is mindful of the implications they have in understanding the incidence and prevalence of family violence in our community.

4 Family violence policies and service responses: a brief history

Introduction

Women's groups and services have been providing a response for women and children affected by family violence since at least 1974, when Victoria's first women's refuge was established. Mechanisms for responding have been evolving ever since, reflecting an extraordinary period of activity at community and government levels. This is largely a consequence of women's services' persistent efforts to raise the profile of family violence in Victoria.

The first main round of reforms occurred in the early and mid-2000s. Since then, improvements have included legislative reform, changes to policy and government strategy, and practice and operational developments. Further reforms, including legislation and policy changes at the state and territory and federal levels, continued to progress even during the time of the Royal Commission.

The recommendations of this Commission will build on all this work.

Policies and responses until 2015 in Victoria

Government policies and service responses to family violence in Victoria have been shaped by history and the efforts of women to bring this problem into the open to gain the recognition it deserves. Today many of the individuals and organisations that originally put family violence on the government policy agenda still play a leading role in providing services to women and children affected by such violence.

After the introduction of the Commonwealth's Homeless Persons Assistance Act 1974 (Cth) government funds began to be applied to homelessness services providing food and shelter.¹ In 1974 Women's Liberation Halfway House was established as Victoria's first women's refuge; it was a donated house and relied on rostered volunteer staffing. Several other Victorian refuges were established during the next few years.² In 1977 full government funding from both state and Commonwealth governments was provided for these refuges³ after a period of some funding from various philanthropic trusts and government departments. By the end of 1979 there were 16 funded refuges in Victoria.⁴

Throughout the 1980s women's services and the refuge movement continued to work to keep women safe in the face of community silence and little interest from the justice system. The Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic) was a response to women's efforts to bring the problem of family violence into the open:

As women began challenging traditional stereotypes, they also began raising awareness about the impact and prevalence of domestic violence. Government acknowledges that long before family violence received widespread media attention and community outrage, women's-based family violence services were among the first advocates of the need to respond to violence in the home.⁵

The period from 2000 to 2005 saw an important change in family violence policy in the state. The appointment of Ms Christine Nixon APM as Chief Commissioner of Police in 2001 led to a Victoria Police review of all the organisation's policies dealing with violence against women and children. The resultant report, Violence Against Women Strategy—A Way Forward, noted:

There was persuasive evidence to indicate that police response did not meet community and victim expectations and that significant gaps exist. Although the review identified instances where police were achieving a form of best practice, the preponderance of evidence related to the negative or below-standard response by police to family violence and, in some cases, sexual assault.⁶

This accords with Domestic Violence Victoria's statement in its submission to the Commission:

Historically, police responded to family violence as a private matter, ignoring or minimising it – largely mirroring mainstream community views. It was commonplace for women seeking crisis support to report unhelpful, dismissive and uninformed responses from police.⁷

At around the time of the appointment of Chief Commissioner Nixon, the Women's Safety Strategy 2002–2007 was launched. This was the first comprehensive strategy on violence against women issued by any Victorian government since the early 1980s, and it brought 11 ministers and their government departments together, working within a single policy framework.⁸ As recommended in the Women's Safety Strategy, a Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence, co-chaired by Victoria Police and the Office of Women's Policy in the Department of Premier and Cabinet, was established.⁹ The committee's membership included departmental and peak body representatives, family violence and sexual assault service providers, and other representatives of the justice system;¹⁰ their task was to decide 'what an integrated system means and the components that are necessary to ensure that an integrated response by the justice system and the victim support services can be achieved'.¹¹

With Chief Commissioner Nixon setting a new agenda for Victoria Police, major policy and operational changes to Victoria Police's responses to family violence followed.¹² Police engaged in discussions with family violence services about how to respond to family violence, and this provided a platform for a wider policy conversation within both government and the broader community. At that time the primary focus was on violence against women and children. Figure 4.1 shows a time line of some of the important government, including Victoria Police, reforms in response to family violence. Victoria Police also greatly improved its response to sexual assault and child abuse during this period, bringing reforms relating to family violence and sexual assault together in its Violence Against Women Strategy, which was adopted in 2002.¹³

The 2004 Victorian Law Reform Commission report Sexual Offences: Law and Procedure Final Report resulted in a number of key policy developments during this period:

- ▶ Victoria Police established sexual offence and child abuse investigation teams, with specialist detectives and a specific training program.
- ▶ The establishment of multi-disciplinary centres involving Victoria Police, the Department of Health and Human Services, the Centres Against Sexual Assault and the Victorian Institute of Forensic Medicine as 'a 'one-stop shop' for victims of sexual offences which combine service providers in one physical location'.¹⁴

In 2006 the Sexual Assault Reform Strategy was introduced to improve the investigation of sexual assault and child abuse.¹⁵ The model has since been expanded and evaluated (see Chapter 12 for further information). Many other family violence-specific (and sexual assault) policy and legislative changes were also introduced by successive Victorian governments during this period, among them the following:

- ▶ In 2002 the peak body for family violence services, Domestic Violence Victoria, was established.¹⁶
- ▶ Following the appointment of the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force in 2001, the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Strategy was developed in 2002. The strategy involved a community-led partnership with government, with the aim of reducing family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. The taskforce delivered its report to government in 2003.¹⁷
- ▶ In 2002 the Victorian Law Reform Commission was assigned the task of reviewing the state's family violence laws.
- ▶ In 2004 Victoria Police launched the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence and introduced the risk assessment and risk management report (the L17) for all reported incidents of family violence. In 2004 Victoria Police also created two specialist family violence roles: family violence advisors and family violence liaison officers.¹⁸
- ▶ The Victorian Government established the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum in 2005.¹⁹ Aboriginal family violence regional action groups, known as IFRAGs, were also set up throughout the state to support action against family violence in Aboriginal communities.²⁰
- ▶ In 2005 the defence of provocation as a partial defence to murder was abolished in Victoria.²¹

- ▷ The Family Violence Court Division was created in the Magistrates' Court and began sitting at Heidelberg and Ballarat in 2005.²² Since that time, the magistrates' courts at Melbourne, Sunshine, Werribee, Frankston and Moorabbin have become specialist family violence services courts.²³
- ▷ Also in 2005, the Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence released its Reforming the Family Violence System report. This landmark document outlined an intention to build an 'integrated family violence system' that would bring together all the major services to ensure that 'women receive an appropriate response, regardless of the pathway through which they choose to receive assistance'.²⁴ Following the report's release, a funding reform package was developed, with the aim of strengthening and integrating approximately 70 agencies dealing with family violence in Victoria.²⁵ Domestic Violence Victoria described the report in the following terms:

This document paved the way for the reforms. Key elements included: a guiding set of principles; a focus on integration across the three main systems—police, justice and the family violence service system, and developing common practices and processes to ensure consistent responses by individual agencies.²⁶
- ▷ Domestic Violence Victoria established the Code of Practice for Specialist Family Violence Services for Women and Children in 2006.²⁷
- ▷ In 2006 the Victorian Law Reform Commission handed down its report identifying a number of deficiencies in the system of family violence intervention orders under the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic) and recommended the introduction of a new Family Violence Act, which ultimately became the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).²⁸ The Act covered all forms of family violence and was not confined to protecting women and children. In his Second Reading Speech for the Family Violence Protection Bill, Attorney-General The Hon. Rob Hulls MP stated that the Bill 'makes it crystal clear that family violence is not just a private issue—it is a public problem and requires a strong legislative response'.²⁹
- ▷ In response to the Reforming the Family Violence System report, new arrangements were made to encourage a more integrated approach to family violence, focusing on violence against women and children. This included the following:
 - ▷ a lead minister charged with coordinating the whole-of-government response to family violence³⁰
 - ▷ a Family Violence Ministers Group of relevant portfolio ministers³¹
 - ▷ a cross-government interdepartmental committee reporting to the relevant ministers³²
 - ▷ a whole-of-government unit supporting the interdepartmental committee, the Minister and the ministerial structures³³
 - ▷ family violence regional integration committees that included representatives from family violence services, family services, police, corrections, court services, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander services, community legal services, homelessness services and local government³⁴
 - ▷ regional integration coordinators to support these regional structures³⁵
 - ▷ a Family Violence Statewide Advisory Committee chaired by Victoria Police and the primary department overseeing the family violence reforms.³⁶

Some of these structures remain; others no longer operate as originally intended.

- ▷ In the Reforming the Family Violence System report the need for consistent risk assessment, information sharing and cooperation between agencies had been emphasised.³⁷ This led to the development of a multi-sector, cross-government Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework—referred to as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or CRAF—which was launched in 2007.³⁸ The CRAF provided the basis for extensive training and practice reform in the mainstream and specialist family violence sectors. It and other protocols aimed at supporting consistent responses to family violence became an important part of the new system.
- ▷ In 2007 VicHealth (the Victorian Health Promotion Foundation), published Preventing Violence before It Occurs: A Framework and Background Paper to Guide the Primary Prevention of Violence against Women in Victoria, which had been commissioned by government.³⁹ VicHealth's work in primary prevention of violence against women has since been internationally recognised.

- ▶ In June 2008 the Indigenous Family Violence Ten Year Plan: Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families was launched.⁴⁰ The plan, the first of its kind in Australia, built on the reform process that had begun in 2002. The Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum continues to play an important role in providing a link between the community and government:

The partnership forum is a forum for ongoing, high level dialogue between government departments and Aboriginal communities about the needs of Aboriginal communities in confronting issues of family violence. It is attended by senior representatives from government and Aboriginal Community members, to ensure that Aboriginal voices are heard at senior levels of government where programs to address Aboriginal family violence are developed.⁴¹

- ▶ Also in 2008, the Commonwealth Government's White Paper on homelessness was released. It recognised that homelessness could be reduced by improving support for women and children to stay in their own homes when it is safe to do so.⁴² This led to the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness which commenced in 2009 (and has been subsequently renewed, most recently in 2015) which Victoria was a signatory to and which gave priority to women and children experiencing family violence.⁴³ The agreement also funded some family violence services to deliver Safe at Home programs, which are designed to help victims of family violence remain in their homes where possible.⁴⁴
- ▶ A Right to Respect: Victoria's Plan to Prevent Violence against Women 2010–2020 was released in 2009.⁴⁵ Its purpose was to implement a recommendation in a VicHealth report for a whole-of-government primary prevention plan that was both cross-government and whole-of-community in scope.⁴⁶ A Right to Respect recognised that primary prevention was an essential step in eliminating violence against women and had a particular focus on family violence and sexual assault.
- ▶ Also in 2009, the Victoria Police strategy Living Free from Violence—Upholding the Right: Victoria Police Strategy to Reduce Violence against Women and Children 2009–2014 was released.⁴⁷
- ▶ In 2010 the government released A Right to Safety and Justice: A Strategic Framework to Guide Continuing Family Violence Reform in Victoria 2010–2020. This document highlighted the need to strengthen reform efforts and improve perpetrator accountability, risk assessment, risk management, data, workforce capacity and the system's response to children.⁴⁸ The framework was designed to consolidate and build on the 2005 reforms.
- ▶ After a change of government in 2010, Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence against Women and Children, Everyone Has a Responsibility to Act 2012–2015, was published.⁴⁹ It proposed a single work plan to consolidate the three previously separate policy areas of family violence, sexual assault and the prevention of violence against women, as well as addressing other forms of violence against women, such as sex trafficking.
- ▶ In 2013, following some years of development, Koori Family Violence Police Protocols for Mildura, Darebin and Ballarat were launched.⁵⁰ The protocols aimed to strengthen the police response to incidents of family violence in Aboriginal communities.⁵¹
- ▶ In October 2014, the Victorian Government introduced Ending Violence Against Women and Children: Further Initiatives for Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence Against Women and Children 2012–2015.⁵² This strategy outlined a range of initiatives to 'prevent violence against women and children before it occurs, keep victims of violence safe and hold perpetrators to account', and was supported by $150m government funding.⁵³ The new government, elected in November 2014, deferred spending the majority of this investment⁵⁴ in line with its election commitment to establish a Royal Commission to inform future decisions.⁵⁵ The 2015–16 Budget allocated additional funding over five years for a range of family violence services and programs, including this Commission.⁵⁶ Much of the funding was for one year only pending this Royal Commission's report (see Chapter 41 for more information).
- ▶ After the election in November 2014 the State Government appointed a Minister for the Prevention of Family Violence.⁵⁷ It also announced the establishment of the Royal Commission into Family Violence.⁵⁸

The history of the family violence system for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities

In its submission to the Commission, the Koori Caucus outlined a number of strategic policies and initiatives that have been established through the commitment between Victorian Aboriginal communities and the Victorian Government. The following provides an excerpt of some of those initiatives:

- In June 2000, the Aboriginal Justice Agreement was established to reduce the over-representation of Aboriginal people in the youth justice and criminal justice system.
- In October 2001, the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force was established to raise community awareness of Aboriginal family violence and engage communities in the development in local responses.
- In 2002, the Victorian Government released the Framework for the Development of the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Strategy: a partnership approach between the Indigenous community and government to support the development of the community-led Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Strategy.
- In 2002, as part of the strategy 10 Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups were established across the state, each with an Indigenous Family Violence Support Worker employed to provide ongoing support.
- In 2003, the Indigenous Family Violence Community Initiative Fund (CIF) was established. The fund provides annual grants amounting to $650,000 to support Aboriginal community-based projects that aim to prevent, reduce and respond to family violence.
- In December 2003, the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force Final Report was delivered to the Victorian Government, highlighting 28 recommendations for immediate action.
- In October 2004, the government released the Victorian Government response to the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force Final Report which outlined the Victorian Government's commitment to support and build on the recommendations of the task force.
- In April 2005, The Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum (IFVPF) was established to enable Aboriginal communities to address Aboriginal family violence in partnership with the Victorian Government. A key goal of the forum was to oversee the development and implementation of a 10-year plan to reduce family violence.

The IFVPP has resulted in the partnership that exists today, which is strengthened by the following government strategies that directly respond to issues relating to Aboriginal family violence within the current policy context including:

- Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families: towards a safer future for Indigenous families and communities 10 year plan 2008–2018 outlines a 10-year vision to make Victoria a safer place for Aboriginal families. It is a living document that will guide, inform and direct joint efforts of the Aboriginal community and the Victorian Government to reduce Aboriginal family violence. It provides a strategic framework to assist services that address Aboriginal family violence in the short, medium and long term and led to the development of the Indigenous Family Violence Primary Prevention Framework in 2012.
- Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework: the Aboriginal contextualisation of the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework, which involved the development of training materials to better equip professionals and practitioners to identify risk factors associated with family violence and respond appropriately to Aboriginal people experiencing family violence. The materials were piloted in Dandenong, Geelong and Mildura during 2013–14.

Other related policies were the Victorian Aboriginal Affairs Framework 2013–2018, Aboriginal Justice Agreement Phase 3 and the Cultural Competency Guidelines for Family Violence Services.⁵⁹

Changes occurring during the Royal Commission

The Victorian Government and its agencies continued to make important policy announcements about family violence during the term of this Royal Commission. Among the milestones and announcements were the following:

- ▷ In March 2015 Victoria Police announced the establishment of the first Family Violence Command in an Australian police jurisdiction, headed by Assistant Commissioner Dean McWhirter.⁶⁰
- ▷ In May 2015 the government announced the plan to develop the Family Violence Index, designed to bring together data from a range of areas to measure how well family violence is being addressed.⁶¹
- ▷ In August 2015 the government announced that in 2016 respectful relationships education would be introduced into the school curriculum from foundation to year 10.⁶²
- ▷ Also in August 2015 the government announced that a best-practice model clause for family violence leave would be developed for inclusion in all Victorian public sector enterprise agreements.⁶³
- ▷ In October 2015 the government announced $50,000 in funding for the Women's Health Association of Victoria to help prevent family violence and launched a new online guide developed by Women's Health Victoria to support regional prevention planning.⁶⁴

Between November and December 2015 the government made the following announcements:

- ▶ In November 2015 it announced it would provide to Our Watch $900,000 to manage a Workplace Equality and Respect Project to help Victorian workplaces build the policies and practices they need to prevent violence.⁶⁵
- ▶ Also in November 2015, the government launched a consultation paper for Victoria's gender equality strategy recognising the links between gender inequality and women's safety.⁶⁶
- ▶ Still in November 2015, the government announced the allocation of $12 million over four years to fund Family Violence Flexible Support Packages to assist with expenses faced by people escaping family violence. Packages of up to $7000 were to pay for things such as rental or relocation costs, furnishings, clothing and books for children, and security measures to improve safety at home.⁶⁷
- ▶ Grant funding of $365,000 was allocated for the roll-out of an online family violence intervention order application to the busiest magistrates' courts in Victoria. An online form has been piloted since mid-2015 by the Neighbourhood Justice Centre.⁶⁸
- ▶ In December 2015 the government announced the development of a new module for school year 10—focusing on gender, power and media—that will build on the two respectful relationships modules for years 8 and 9.⁶⁹ It also announced continued funding for the Partners in Prevention program (through Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria), which aims to build the capacity of staff to support schools delivering respectful relationships education.⁷⁰
- ▶ Also in December 2015, the government announced the development of a new memorial to honour the lives of victims and survivors of family violence in the City of Melbourne as a joint Victorian Government and City of Melbourne project.⁷¹
- ▶ Still in December, the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission released the report of its independent review of sexual harassment and discrimination in Victoria Police.⁷² This report reflects on the importance of redressing gender inequality within Victoria Police to ensure community confidence in the policing of family violence.⁷³
- ▶ In late December 2015 the government provided its response to the former State Coroner, Judge Gray's findings in relation to the death of Luke Batty.⁷⁴

The national response

The Commonwealth Government directly provides a range of universal programs and initiatives, that are relevant to people affected by family violence. These include social security, Medicare, the Pharmaceutical Benefits Scheme, and the family law system, including the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia.⁷⁵ It also directly funds a range of programs and activities that are specifically related to family violence. For example, it has committed about $200 million to the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and Children 2010–2022 between 1 July 2009 and 30 June 2017.⁷⁶

Additionally, the Commonwealth provides funding to the states and territories for the delivery of a variety of services. This can include funding contributions towards universal services such as education and health. In the case of family violence, the Commonwealth's role is largely through funding contributions under the following arrangements:

- ▶ The National Affordable Housing Agreement Specific Purpose Payment contributes towards the cost of Victoria's social housing (including public housing) and homelessness assistance.⁷⁷ The majority of specialist family violence services are funded through the homelessness stream⁷⁸ including women's refuges and specialist family violence support services (also referred to as 'outreach' and 'case management'). In 2015–16 the Commonwealth funding to Victoria under the agreement is $329.9 million.⁷⁹
- ▶ The National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness provides funding for measures designed to reduce homelessness, including family violence-related homelessness. Victoria's contribution in 2015–16 is $30.4 million;⁸⁰ the Commonwealth contribution is $22.8 million.⁸¹ The two-year extension of the agreement, until 30 June 2017, gives priority to front-line services focusing on women and children experiencing family violence and on homeless youth.
- ▶ The National Partnership Agreement on Legal Assistance Services provides funding to legal aid commissions in each jurisdiction, including for responses to family violence-related matters. In 2015–16 funding to Victoria under the agreement was $47.9 million.⁸²

In the past four years there has been increased national recognition of the need to develop policies for preventing and responding to family violence. In 2011 the Commonwealth Government, in partnership with the states and territories, announced the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and Children 2010–2022.⁸³ Endorsed by the Council of Australian Governments, the plan consists of four three-year action plans and is supported by all states and territories, which will develop their own implementation plans.⁸⁴ The Commonwealth and the states and territories have nominated a number of areas to focus on as part of the second action plan. These include prevention, responses for people who have diverse experiences, supporting innovative services and integration, improving perpetrator interventions, and continuing to build the evidence base for future family violence reform.⁸⁵

Two national bodies were established as a result of the national plan:

- ▶ Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, ANROWS, a national research body with contributions from all jurisdictions⁸⁶
- ▶ Our Watch, a national foundation to prevent violence against women and their children. Our Watch was established by Victoria and the Commonwealth in 2013 and now includes contributory funding from the Northern Territory, South Australia and Tasmania.⁸⁷

In January 2015, Ms Rosie Batty was appointed 2015 Australian of the Year in recognition of her efforts in campaigning against family violence following the death of her son, Luke, at the hands of his father.⁸⁸

In the same month the former Prime Minister announced that the question of violence against women and their children would be discussed as part of the Council of Australian Governments' agenda, and a new COAG advisory panel would be formed; the panel was to be chaired by former Victoria Police Chief Commissioner Mr Ken Lay APM, and Ms Batty was appointed a founding member.⁸⁹ At the April 2015 COAG meeting the following milestones were announced for 2015:

- ▶ A national domestic violence order scheme would be agreed, under which domestic violence orders will be automatically recognised and enforceable in any state or territory of Australia.
- ▶ COAG would consider national standards to ensure that perpetrators of violence against women are held to account at the same standard throughout Australia.
- ▶ Progress would be reported on a national information system that will enable courts and police in different states and territories to share information on active domestic violence orders (called family violence intervention orders in Victoria). New South Wales, Queensland and Tasmania were to trial the system.
- ▶ COAG would consider strategies for tackling the increased use of technology to facilitate abuse of women and for ensuring that women have adequate legal protections against this form of abuse.
- ▶ All governments would jointly contribute to a $30 million national campaign to reduce violence against women and their children and potentially for associated increases in services.⁹⁰

At its December 2015 meeting the Council of Australian Governments agreed to the following:

- ▶ standards to ensure that interventions with perpetrators are effective throughout Australia
- ▶ actions to limit technology-facilitated abuse
- ▶ introduction of a national domestic violence order scheme so that DVOs issued in one state are recognised in all others, with every jurisdiction committing to introduce laws to give effect to this in the first half of 2016
- ▶ development of a comprehensive national DVO information-sharing system that police and the courts will be able to use for evidentiary purposes or to enforce DVOs, noting this will take several years to implement fully
- ▶ in the short term, establishment of an interim information-sharing system that will provide to police and the courts information on all DVOs that have been issued but will not have the same evidentiary or enforcement capacity as the proposed permanent system
- ▶ the holding of a national summit on preventing violence against women and their children in the final quarter of 2016 to profile best practice and review progress.⁹¹

5 Systems overview

Introduction

There is no single pathway into the family violence system. There are myriad entry points and overlapping service systems with whom victims and perpetrators have contact and receive services. The 2005 Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence report on reforming the family violence system acknowledged that it was important for all service systems to respond to the needs of women seeking help.¹ In practice, the main focus of reforms to date has been on the police, justice and family violence service systems, which are often the first line of response to family violence. One of the arguments put forward in the Commission's report, however, is that family violence requires a whole-of-government approach and that reforms are needed in all the service systems that work with victims and perpetrators.

The systems that are briefly outlined in this chapter (and covered in more detail elsewhere in the report) include Victoria Police; specialist services that cater primarily but not exclusively for the needs of women (and their children) who are victims of family violence; the courts and legal services; the child protection system, which protects children at risk of abuse (including as a result of family violence); and Integrated Family Services that have been established to support families and divert people who might otherwise enter the statutory child protection system. Also briefly described are housing and homelessness services, sexual assault services, and victim support services. Other relevant services, such as drug and alcohol, mental health and other health services, are described in Chapter 19, while relevant aspects of the corrections system are discussed in Chapter 18. Governance arrangements are outlined in Chapter 38.

Points of entry

The process of seeking assistance for family violence is not linear: there are many entry points into the systems which assist those affected by family violence.² The following are examples of how victims can enter the system:

- ▶ They can disclose the violence they have experienced to a person or organisation that comes into contact with them for other reasons. Many of these are generalist service providers—for example, hospitals, general practitioners or other health practitioners, maternal and child health nurses, or teachers or school counsellors. This can result in the victim and her children being referred to another service or services.
- ▶ They can seek legal advice from a lawyer.
- ▶ They can seek help from the police, who might respond by issuing a family violence safety notice or seeking an intervention order on behalf of the victim(s) and/or charging the perpetrator with a criminal offence.
- ▶ They can contact a specialist family violence service for advice and assistance, either directly or via a referral from another service.
- ▶ They might be contacted by a specialist family violence service after police have made a family violence risk assessment and management report and referral (known as an L17).
- ▶ They can go directly to a magistrates' court to seek a family violence intervention order.
- ▶ They might seek entry to a refuge through a specialist family violence service or through a homelessness access point.
- ▶ They might tell a friend or family member or someone from whom they are receiving pastoral care.

Children can connect with family violence services in several ways:

- ▶ Through their parents—for example, if their mother has entered the system as described above.
- ▶ They could seek help directly—for example by telling a teacher or doctor about the violence or if they are adolescents, by approaching a refuge.
- ▶ An adult, friend or family member might alert police, Child Protection or Child FIRST.
- ▶ Their school or early childhood service might recognise signs of violence and contact a parent or notify Child Protection or Child FIRST.
- ▶ The evidence of violence might be noticed by a maternal child health nurse or health practitioner.

Perpetrators—that is, people who use violence—can connect with family violence services in some of the following ways:

- ▶ They might seek assistance, either of their own volition or at the urging of a friend or family member.
- ▶ They might be a respondent on a family violence intervention order and be required to attend a magistrates' court.
- ▶ They might be contacted by a specialist family violence service after police have made an L17 referral.

Perpetrators might be required to participate in a men's behaviour change program as part of a magistrate court order, a community correction order or as a parole condition.

The systems just noted are complex and difficult to navigate—for people working in the field, for victims, for family members trying to help someone affected by violence, and for perpetrators who are seeking help to change their behaviour or ordered to attend a program by a court. This complexity means that people can be referred from one organisation, government department or non-government agency to another in order to address all of their needs, often at a time of crisis.

Victoria Police

Victoria Police members can be the first point of contact for people experiencing family violence. The quality of the police response influences victims' confidence in reporting family violence and seeking help.³

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence lists the main functions of police in responding to family violence:

- ▶ maximise the safety and support to those involved
- ▶ identify and investigate incidents of family violence and prosecute individuals accused of criminal offences arising from family violence
- ▶ assist in the prevention and deterrence of family violence in the community by responding to family violence appropriately.⁴

Victoria Police has developed a series of specialist roles dedicated to family violence work, although all front-line officers do a considerable amount of this work.⁵ Among the specialist positions are 17 family violence advisors and a family violence liaison officer at every 24-hour police station.⁶ The Family Violence Command, established in March 2015, has overall responsibility for monitoring Victoria Police's organisational response to family violence, maintaining accountability, and improving police responses to family violence, sexual assault and child abuse.⁷

Victoria Police attended more than 65,000 family violence incidents in 2013–2014.⁸

The Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence and the Victoria Police Manual⁹ set out how Victoria Police members are required to fulfil their functions with respect to family violence.¹⁰ Under the Code, police must perform a risk assessment.¹¹ They can then adopt one or more of the following approaches.

Family violence safety notices and intervention orders

The Code of Practice states that police should pursue civil options—that is, apply for a family violence safety notice or a family violence intervention order—whenever the safety, welfare or property of a family member appears to be endangered by another family member (even without the agreement of the victim).¹²

- ▷ A family violence safety notice enables police to place immediate restrictions on a perpetrator—with similar effect to that of an intervention order—for up to five working days.¹³ The FVSN also serves as an application for a family violence intervention order and as a summons for the alleged perpetrator to appear in court.¹⁴ Police make the application on behalf of the victim, but victims are often told they need to attend the court to give evidence in support of the order.¹⁵
- ▷ Most safety notices result in the issuing of a final family violence intervention order by a court.¹⁶ An FVIO is a civil order, and it can include a range of conditions designed to protect the safety of the affected person and prohibit a person from engaging in family violence.¹⁷ If police intend to apply for an FVIO against a person or to vary an existing order, they can exercise certain powers to ensure the safety of a person or to preserve their property: they can direct the alleged perpetrator to go to or remain at a particular place (for example, a police station) or to remain in the company of a police member or another person. If a person refuses or fails to comply with a direction, they can be apprehended and detained for up to six hours or for a longer period if this is authorised by the court.¹⁸ In addition, if a person breaches an FVIO—for example, by visiting a place from which they have been excluded—this is a criminal offence that can result in prosecution in the Magistrates' Court.¹⁹ Formally, this is called a contravention order, although the term often used is 'breach'.

Police members must assess the interests of children independently from those of their parents since the best interests of the child are paramount and children might have different needs.²⁰ Children can be included on FVIO applications for the victim if their needs are similar. In some cases a separate application might be required for a child.²¹

In 2013–14 police issued 8288 family violence safety notices and applied for 11,091 family violence intervention orders;²² they took such action in about one-quarter of all family violence incidents they attended.²³ In the same year about two-thirds of total family violence intervention order applications were made by Victoria Police, the remaining one-third being made by affected individuals.²⁴

Criminal prosecution

The police are responsible for investigating and prosecuting criminal offences arising from a family violence incident (including breaches of FVIOs) in the Magistrates' Court. In 2013–14 Victoria Police laid charges in respect of 27,701 family violence incidents—43 per cent of all incidents²⁵ (including breaches of existing FVIOs).²⁶

The Code of Practice highlights the importance of prosecuting breaches of family violence safety notices and family violence intervention orders: failure to do so could convey the idea that the notice or order is not taken seriously, potentially leading to further offending, abuse and possible harm. The code states:

FVIOs and FVSNs must be strictly interpreted and enforced. There is no such lawful term as a 'technical' contravention and police must lay charges for any contravention ...²⁷

Decisions to prosecute are based on the evidence gathered and should not be a subjective assessment by the responding police as to the seriousness of the contravention.²⁸

In some cases the perpetrator might be charged with an offence (such as rape or attempted murder) that must be prosecuted in the County or Supreme Court rather than the Magistrates' Court. The Director of Public Prosecutions authorises the laying of the charge, and there will be committal proceedings in the Magistrates' Court to decide whether the alleged perpetrator should go to trial. This is discussed further in Chapter 16.

Police referrals

Formal referrals: L17s

Police must make a formal referral via a risk assessment and risk management report (known as an L17) if they consider that assistance is required. The Code of Practice notes that formal referrals are appropriate where, for example, police intend to pursue criminal or civil options or where there is a future risk of violence or to address recidivism.²⁹

The services receiving the L17 will then make contact with the victim or, in the case of men's services, the perpetrator. L17s for male victims are sent to the Victims Support Agency.³⁰ Typically, multiple L17s will be sent in relation to the same incident, to accommodate the needs of victims, perpetrators and any children.

Referrals occur in accordance with the Family Violence Referral Protocol between the Department of Health and Human Services and Victoria Police.³¹ The Code of Practice stresses that referrals are in addition to, and do not replace, the pursuit of criminal charges or seeking of civil protection in response to family violence.³²

When children are present

The Code of Practice and the Referral Protocol stipulate multiple referral pathways when children are affected by family violence:

- ▷ Police may make a report to Child Protection if they believe a child or young person is otherwise in need of protection within the meaning of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) (there are circumstances when they must do this).³³
- ▷ If a child is included on a victim's referral to a family violence service, the service will conduct a risk assessment in relation to the child (and refer the child to Child FIRST, if required).
- ▷ Police may make a referral to Child FIRST if they are concerned about the welfare of a child but have not otherwise made a referral to Child Protection or a family violence service.³⁴

Child Protection, Child FIRST and family services play an important part in protecting children who are the direct targets of family violence and children who are affected by violence directed at a parent (usually the mother). The majority of referrals are directed to Child Protection rather than Child FIRST: in 2013–14 there were 11,042 referrals to Child Protection compared with 1901 referrals to Child FIRST.³⁵ However, referrals to Child FIRST have grown significantly since the introduction of a protocol between Victoria Police and Child FIRST.³⁶ Child FIRST is discussed later in this chapter.

Informal referrals

Informal referrals occur when police attending an incident give parties the contact details of services they might want to contact. The Code of Practice states that informal referrals can be appropriate if no evidence is available to pursue a criminal or civil option and there are no immediate concerns for the victim's or a child's safety or welfare.³⁷ Informal referrals are being used less and less frequently by police, with the majority of all incidents now resulting in formal referrals.³⁸

Specialist family violence services

Most specialist family violence services respond to the needs of women and children experiencing family violence committed in the context of an intimate partner relationship. This is largely attributable to family violence services responding to where the demand is greatest. There are relatively few services specifically for people who experience other kinds of family violence—for example, older people who are subjected to violence by their children. There are no specific services for people from lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities who are subjected to family violence. These groups are discussed in Chapters 8, 27 and 30.

Specialist family violence services (both men's and women's services) are funded by the Victorian Government, usually through the Department of Health and Human Services, to provide specific services.³⁹ The services are generally provided by a broad range of non-government community service organisations.

Men's behaviour change programs, men's case-management services, programs for adolescents who use violence and treatment services for sexually abusive behaviours could also be regarded as family violence services. These are discussed in Chapters 18 and 23.

Specialist family violence services for women and their children

Women and their children's specialist family violence services consist of the following:

- ▷ a statewide 24-hour telephone service—called Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre
- ▷ specialist family violence support services—also referred to as 'case-management services', 'outreach services' and 'women's services'
- ▷ crisis and emergency accommodation
- ▷ family violence counselling for women and children.

Key frameworks governing family violence services

The work of specialist family violence services is informed by various policy frameworks:

- ▷ the Code of Practice for Specialist Family Violence Services for Women and Children (September 2006)
- ▷ the Homelessness Services Guidelines and Conditions of Funding (May 2015)
- ▷ the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework, also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or the CRAF.

The Code of Practice states that the role of specialist family violence services includes the following:

- ▷ supporting women in making informed choices for themselves and their children in relation to their circumstances
- ▷ helping women and children improve the safety of their accommodation or establish safe accommodation while maintaining connections with friends, family and community supports
- ▷ minimising disruption to children's lives by ensuring they are linked to communities and schools.⁴⁰

The Code and the Homelessness Services Guidelines state that family violence services are principally provided to women and children who are experiencing an immediate crisis, recovering from experiences of violence and abuse, or at risk of being unsafe in the family environment.⁴¹

The homelessness services objectives are to increase safety and wellbeing for women and children and acknowledge and support women in their efforts to gain control over their lives.⁴² The principles that underpin the practice are giving priority to the safety of women and children, supporting their choices, and holding perpetrators accountable for their actions.⁴³

The CRAF provides the overarching policy guidance relating to risk assessment and management.

Statewide 24-hour information and referral service

In Victoria Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre operates a 24-hour a day telephone information and support service for women and children who have experienced or are experiencing family violence. Workers complete risk assessments, help women develop safety plans, and refer them to support options in the community—including specialist family violence support services and generalist services, such as community health centres. The crisis line receives about 55,000 telephone calls a year.⁴⁴ We do not know how many different women this number covers.

In addition to the statewide telephone information and referral service, Safe Steps also provides:

- ▷ a referral point for receiving L17 forms from Victoria Police for women who require immediate support and accommodation
- ▷ a main entry point into women's refuge accommodation
- ▷ emergency accommodation—a three-bedroom crisis accommodation unit provided in partnership with three local services and access to other emergency housing—for people unable to gain access to a refuge
- ▷ for women and children awaiting suitable accommodation, accommodation in motels. The Housing Establishment Fund is used for this.

In addition, the Commonwealth Government funds 1800 RESPECT, a 24-hour crisis and trauma counselling service offered by telephone and online for people who are currently experiencing or have experienced sexual assault, domestic or family violence.⁴⁵ This service can also refer people to Safe Steps or to specialist family violence support services in their area.

Specialist family violence support services

Specialist family violence support services provide support and assistance for women and their children in order to keep them safe. There are 28 of these services in Victoria. They range from single stand-alone services to medium-sized services offering a suite of family violence responses and other services located in large community support agencies.

Receipt of L17s and other referrals

All 28 regional specialist family violence services receive referrals from a range of sources, among them Victoria Police, Child Protection, family services, health care service providers (including general practitioners and maternal and child health nurses), schools, legal services and individuals who have experienced violence.

Nineteen services (18 services plus Safe Steps) act as contact points for Victoria Police L17 referrals in their area. Most services triage all referrals on the basis of a risk assessment using the information available at the time of referral (such as the L17 form), although the way in which various services perform this task can differ. The service then tries to make contact with the woman to offer help.

Case management

Case management (also referred to as 'outreach') is the core function of specialist family violence support services, involving risk and safety planning based on a woman's needs over time. This is performed by workers who have been trained in the dynamics, nature and impacts of family violence. These staff work with women to identify their specific needs, which can include the following:

- ▷ access to therapeutic or counselling programs—for women or their children
- ▷ housing—including referral to refuges or other accommodation options
- ▷ follow-up with police—including arranging retrieval of items from a woman's house
- ▷ referral to legal assistance
- ▷ support to attend court in order to obtain a family violence intervention order
- ▷ liaising with services including Child FIRST/family services and Child Protection.

Depending on a woman's needs, workers also liaise with community health services; maternal and child health services; schools; mental health, alcohol and other drugs services; and accommodation providers—particularly homelessness services, Centrelink and others. They will also help women find employment, education and training.

Some specialist family violence support services are funded to provide intensive case-management support for women at high-risk. This is, however, a relatively small component of the system.⁴⁶

High-risk family violence response

Risk Assessment and Management Panels (RAMPs) are part of the Victorian Government's commitment to responding to women at high risk of family violence. Pilot projects were established in 2012, and RAMPs are currently being rolled out across the state.

RAMPs aim to manage risk for women and children at serious and imminent risk of death or injury from family violence. They bring together agencies such as Victoria Police, corrections, health, Child Protection and housing and specialist family violence services to share information and plan for safety.⁴⁷ The high-risk response service includes additional case-management capacity in existing specialist family violence services to support women and children at high risk.

There are a range of different brokerage funds—discretionary funds that can be applied to goods and services—that are available to women. There are also a number of other local initiatives that aim to help women and children at high risk. This is discussed in Chapter 6.

Safe at Home programs

The Department of Health and Human Services funds some specialist family violence support services to deliver Safe at Home programs using National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness funding. The funding covers specialist workers to assess the safety needs and level of support required for women and children to stay in their own homes, as well as brokerage funds that can be used to stabilise housing or increase home security by, for example, installing deadlocks, screen doors, security lighting and home alarms.⁴⁸

There has been an increasing focus in recent years on programs designed to keep women and children safe at home. The availability and delivery of Safe at Home programs is discussed in Chapter 9.

Crisis and emergency accommodation

Refuges

Refuges are intended to provide short-term accommodation for women and children in the immediate crisis period after they leave a violent partner. The expected length of stay is six weeks, although this is frequently exceeded because there is nowhere else for the women to go.

The 24-hour access point for entry into refuges is Safe Steps, although individual refuges often have local arrangements. Usually, women can be admitted to refuges only during business hours. If a refuge does not accept a referral, Safe Steps will refer the woman to another refuge, until a suitable placement is found. It is not known how long this process takes, but it is uncommon for women to go directly from home to a refuge. Women either remain at home, or in other arrangements such as with friends, pending a vacancy or are placed in ad hoc emergency accommodation, as discussed shortly.

In Victoria there are 31 refuge sites, consisting of 54 individual properties⁴⁹ that can accommodate about 105 families, depending on family size:⁵⁰

- ▷ Eighteen of these refuges are 'communal' facilities, with communal kitchens and living areas,⁵¹ and can accommodate 69 families.⁵²
- ▷ Thirteen are known as 'dispersed', or 'cluster', refuges—co-located self-contained properties supported by one community service organisation⁵³ and able to accommodate at least 36 families.⁵⁴
- ▷ Three are specifically for Aboriginal women and their children—one located in metropolitan Melbourne and two in regional, rural and remote Victoria.⁵⁵

The Victorian Government advised the Commission that 20 of the 31 refuges are 'high security', meaning that their addresses are not disclosed on the Department of Health and Human Services housing database.⁵⁶

Women's experiences of refuge accommodation are discussed in Chapter 9.

Emergency accommodation properties

There are currently 57 Crisis Accommodation Program properties in Victoria dedicated to accommodating women and children who have experienced or are experiencing family violence.⁵⁷ The properties are generally administered by refuges and form part of the suite of emergency accommodation options; refuge staff provide support to families using these properties.

The Victorian Government informed the Commission that intake to Crisis Accommodation Program properties is determined by the individual organisation.⁵⁸ In some instances a community service organisation that operates both a refuge and a CAP property will transfer a family from a high-security refuge to a CAP property as a 'step down' until alternative safe housing can be arranged.⁵⁹ Women experiencing family violence can also gain access to emergency accommodation through the homelessness service system (discussed further below). This is often the pathway for women who do not want to disclose family violence and/or for whom family violence is not the current crisis issue.

Ad hoc accommodation

Because the demand for refuge accommodation usually exceeds capacity, women unable to remain safely at home or who do not have other options (such as staying with family or friends) are often placed in ad hoc accommodation such as hotels, motels, boarding or rooming houses or caravans until a refuge vacancy or other suitable accommodation becomes available.

In 2014–15 only about 19 out of 455 women (and their accompanying children) who were referred to Safe Steps were accommodated directly in a refuge.⁶⁰ It is estimated that 97 to 100 per cent of people need to spend at least one night in a motel awaiting supported accommodation.⁶¹ This data does not include women who are experiencing family violence but who might have gained access to ad hoc emergency accommodation through a homelessness Initial Access and Planning service. Ad hoc accommodation is funded through the Housing Establishment Fund.⁶²

Family violence counselling

Family violence counselling—both individual and group counselling—offers support to women and children experiencing or recovering from family violence. Women can refer themselves to counselling or be referred by a service provider.

Among the services provided are assessment, information, education, support and other help for women seeking intervention orders through the courts. The services are provided by community service organisations, some of which may also be providers of specialist family violence support services.

At the statewide level a minimum of 30 per cent of family violence counselling services are intended to be provided for children and young people affected by family violence.⁶³

In 2014–15, $5.8m was allocated for around 4200 clients, with help for a further 7500 occasions of assistance for services delivered by Court Network.⁶⁴

Services for perpetrators and adolescents who use violence

The main program-based intervention available to men who use violence comes in the form of men's behaviour change programs, which are specialist group-based counselling sessions of a 'psycho-educational' nature run over a minimum of 12 weeks.⁶⁵ Men attend voluntarily (although this can be as a result of referral by a court) or a court might order them to attend. Places for voluntary participants are limited, and waiting times range from one to seven months: about 700 men in Victoria were on waiting lists as at March 2015.⁶⁶

In the criminal context, a perpetrator can be ordered to attend a behaviour change program through the sentencing process, as a condition of either a community correction order⁶⁷ or parole.⁶⁸ Perpetrators in custody can also participate in prison-based programs.

Chapter 18 discusses perpetrator programs in the community and correctional settings.

The Adolescent Family Violence Service, which operates at three sites, provides family-based case-management and group-based support to young people aged between 12 and 17 years who use violence at home.⁶⁹ These services are discussed in Chapter 23.

Services for specific populations

Some programs for victims of family violence focus on specific population groups. In other cases organisations that provide general services for a specific population group assist people in relation to family violence, for example Seniors Rights Victoria.

There are specific family violence services for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, including three refuges, case-management services, and a specialist prevention and legal service,⁷⁰ the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria. Many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander service providers receive funding for services for both victims and perpetrators.⁷¹

InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence provides multilingual and culturally sensitive assistance, information, and legal and migration services to victims of family violence from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.⁷²

Women with Disabilities Victoria, the peak body for women with disabilities in the state, provides advocacy and information services for women experiencing family violence.⁷³

Chapters 26, 28 and 31 provide more information about services available for specific populations.

Courts and legal services

For many victims and perpetrators of family violence the court process is a central part of their involvement with the family violence system. Different courts have different roles in responding to family violence and have developed specialised responses in recent years as a consequence of the increase in the volume and complexity of family violence-related matters.

The jurisdictional framework

A number of areas of the law can address matters that directly or indirectly relate to family violence. For present purposes, the following broad areas are relevant:

- ▷ family violence intervention orders
- ▷ criminal matters arising both from FVIO breaches and from criminalised forms of family violence such as physical and sexual violence
- ▷ civil matters such as tenancy, guardianship, employment, and debt disputes where family violence is a factor
- ▷ applications for financial assistance by victims of family violence.⁷⁴

In Victoria, jurisdictional responsibility for these areas is divided among a range of courts and tribunals, including the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, the Children's Court of Victoria, the County Court of Victoria, the Supreme Court of Victoria, the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, and the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal.

Family violence intervention orders

The Magistrates' Court Act 1989 (Vic) and the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) provide that family violence intervention order applications—including applications for interim and final orders and applications for extensions, variations and revocations of FVIOs—must be made in the Magistrates' Court or the Children's Court.

Either the Magistrates' Court or the Children's Court may hear FVIO applications involving a child.⁷⁵ Where practicable, however, applications involving a child respondent are heard in the Children's Court.⁷⁶

Appeals against intervention orders are usually heard in the County Court.⁷⁷

Criminal matters

Each of the Magistrates', Children's, County and Supreme Courts hears some family violence-related criminal matters.

Criminal offences in Victoria are divided into summary and indictable offences.⁷⁸ Magistrates' courts have jurisdiction to hear less serious summary offences and some indictable offences (with the consent of the parties and if considered appropriate by the court).⁷⁹ Other more serious indictable offences can be heard only in the County or Supreme Courts (see Chapter 17).

The Children's Court's Criminal Division has wide jurisdiction to hear and determine criminal matters involving children aged 10 to 17 years at the time of offending (and under 19 when proceedings begin), including committal proceedings and charges on summary offences. It may hear and determine summarily any indictable offences except death-related offences, which are usually heard through the adult court system.⁸⁰

FVIO proceedings can be heard and determined by the Children's Court when they are related to proceedings before it. The maximum penalty that may be imposed in the Children's Court is two years' detention in a youth justice centre, even when the legislation creating the offence allows for the imposition of a higher maximum penalty. The maximum total effective sentence that may be imposed for multiple offences determined at the same hearing by the court is three years' detention.⁸¹ Further sentencing options in the Children's Court are fines, dismissal of charge without conviction, good behaviour bonds, and probation.

Other civil matters

The following are examples of other courts and tribunals that may hear civil matters:

- ▶ The Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal considers applications for financial assistance made by victims of crime. An estimated quarter of such applications were from family violence victims in 2014–15.⁸²
- ▶ In the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal family violence issues can arise in tenancy matters or in allegations of financial abuse, exploitation or neglect of people with disabilities, or older people.⁸³
- ▶ The Coroners Court has jurisdiction in connection with fatalities, including those relating to family violence.⁸⁴

Chapters 16 and 25 provide further information about these issues.

Court-based programs, services and systems

The Magistrates' Court

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria is the busiest court in the state, handling about 90 per cent of all cases that come before Victorian courts. There are 53 magistrates' courts in 12 regions in the state. Each region has a headquarter court, and some have multiple satellite courts.⁸⁵

The centrepieces of the Magistrates' Court's response to family violence are the Family Violence Court Division courts at Ballarat and Heidelberg⁸⁶ and the Specialist Family Violence Services courts at Melbourne, Frankston, Sunshine and Werribee,⁸⁷ which were established in 2005–06. The capacity to mandate participation in men's behaviour change programs has now been extended to Frankston and Moorabbin courts, which have been allocated applicant and respondent workers.⁸⁸

The Family Violence Court Division and Specialist Family Violence Services courts have a range of similar features including trained family violence registrars, applicant (and in most cases respondent) support workers, co-located legal and non-legal support services, dedicated police prosecutors for police-initiated applications and family violence training for magistrates and staff. They were designed to deal specifically with the problems raised by family violence but, in view of the number of such courts in the state and the prevalence of family violence, the majority of family violence matters are dealt with in the mainstream magistrates' courts.

The Magistrates' Court is in the process of rolling out applicant and respondent support workers to all headquarter courts and has allocated specialist family violence registrars to all headquarter courts.⁸⁹

Beyond the Family Violence Court Division and Specialist Family Violence Services courts, most magistrates' courts and all headquarter courts set aside specific days each week for family violence matters. The Magistrates' Court also provides a 24-hour after-hours service for urgent FVIO matters.

A variety of services are available—either statewide or in a limited subset of magistrates' courts—that are not specific to family violence but are commonly used by parties in such proceedings. Examples are:

- ▷ The Court Integrated Services Program and the CREDIT/Bail Support Program⁹⁰—these are case management and referral services for people who are on bail or summons and are accused of criminal offences. Both seek to address underlying issues experienced by the accused (such as drug and alcohol misuse, homelessness and health issues).
- ▷ Court Network—a volunteer service which provides onsite support, information and referrals to individuals in some 18 Magistrates' Courts in Victoria. Court network volunteers 'walk the floor', assisting people in Court where a need is recognised. They also see clients referred from services outside court.
- ▷ The Youth Justice Court Advice Service (which is also offered in the higher courts)—assists people aged 18 to 20 in the courts for criminal matters.
- ▷ The Child Witness Service—which seeks to ameliorate the trauma experienced by children who are providing evidence. The service is staffed by social workers and psychologists and also provides remote witness facilities so that the child does not have to give evidence in front of the accused.⁹¹ CWS is located in Melbourne, but also supports children in rural regions via outreach and visits to witnesses at local court locations.⁹² Although the program is not family violence-specific, 275 of the 615 new referrals to the service in 2014–15 involved a family violence incident.⁹³

The Children's Court

The Children's Court of Victoria is a specialist court with two divisions. The Family Division hears applications relating to the protection and care of children who are at risk as well as applications for family violence intervention orders; the Criminal Division hears matters pertaining to criminal offending.⁹⁴

No court-funded family violence-specific services operate in the Children's Court.⁹⁵ With the exception of the Melbourne Children's Court, however, the Children's Court sits in Magistrates' Court venues.

Within the Children's Court several services and programs are offered that people involved in family violence-related Children's Court matters may use. Examples include a specialist list at Melbourne Children's Court that facilitates the intensive management of certain cases involving child sexual abuse (the 'D List'),⁹⁶ the Children's Court Clinic,⁹⁷ and child protection conciliation conferences.⁹⁸

Issues specific to the Children's Court are considered in Chapter 11.

The Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal

Depending on where the proceedings take place, parties to VCAT proceedings can also have some access to Magistrates' Court facilities and services. VCAT employs a family violence support worker in the Residential Tenancies Division who is able to help clients in all tribunal lists with family violence-related matters. The worker can explain VCAT procedures, offer practical assistance during a person's attendance at the tribunal, and provide referrals to community-based services.

VCAT's Melbourne venue has a dedicated client office and remote witness room, along with security staff and closed-circuit surveillance. Security is more limited at suburban and regional venues, although the option exists to attend a hearing via telephone.⁹⁹

The Neighbourhood Justice Centre

The Neighbourhood Justice Centre is a multi-jurisdictional court that opened in 2007 in Collingwood, Melbourne. It sits as a magistrates' court, a children's court, the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal and the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal and has a wide range of co-located legal and non-legal services, among the latter being services for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples and people of culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, support for people with disabilities (including physical, intellectual and mental health disabilities), and employment and training, drug and alcohol and other specialist support services.

The higher courts

The County and Supreme Courts have limited specific services for dealing with family violence. Security staff and screening can be used and can be increased or modified to suit the needs of specific individuals or matters. There might, however, be no advanced indication that a case involves family violence, which makes it difficult to suitably manage such cases.

Of note is the Supreme Court's role in administering 'funds in court', which are ordered by courts and tribunals to be paid to beneficiaries who are either children or people with disabilities or injuries that give rise to a need for assistance in managing their affairs. A significant proportion of beneficiaries are successful Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal applicants—the court reported that '[a]pproximately half of all beneficiaries at any one time are children who have received money from VOCAT'¹⁰⁰—and some will be victims of family violence. Others might have become beneficiaries for other reasons but have subsequently experienced family violence.

Legal services

Both applicants and respondents are able to obtain free information and advice on family violence matters through Victoria Legal Aid's free information and advice telephone service, Legal Help, which in 2013–14 provided assistance in 8432 family violence matters and made 4247 referrals.¹⁰¹

VLA also provides (or provides for) free duty lawyer services at all major metropolitan magistrates' courts and most rural and regional courts.¹⁰² Services range from providing information—for example, explaining the type of matter being heard and the potential outcomes—to providing advice, negotiating with the other party to a dispute, making referrals, and representing parties in court.

These services are provided under a 'mixed model', with services provided by lawyers from VLA, community legal centres¹⁰³ and the private profession. The aim of this is to ensure fewer conflicts of interest and greater coverage of the courts. In many cases VLA lawyers will act for respondents and community legal centres for applicants, subject to any conflicts of interest.¹⁰⁴

Defendants in criminal proceedings arising out of family violence can also receive means-tested legal assistance. VLA can also be ordered to provide legal assistance in certain circumstances so that a protected witness can avoid being cross-examined by a respondent.¹⁰⁵ VLA also provides some advice and representation (including for children) in family law and child protection matters and offers community legal education services.¹⁰⁶ In 2013–14 it provided 14,796 family violence legal services to 11,269 clients.¹⁰⁷

Other organisations and services—such as Women's Legal Service Victoria, the Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, and InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence—provide legal services to clients in particular population groups.¹⁰⁸

Further information about the courts and legal services is in Chapter 16.

Child Protection

Child Protection is part of the Victorian Department of Health and Human Services. Child Protection receives and may investigate reports about children and young people where there are significant concerns for their wellbeing, or where Child Protection believes that a child or young person is in need of protection.¹⁰⁹ Where reports are investigated and substantiated, Child Protection may work with a family and/or other services to address concerns identified to keep children safe.¹¹⁰ In some cases, Child Protection may seek protective orders in the Children's Court of Victoria.

In 2013–14 family violence was indicated in 37,492 reports to Child Protection.¹¹¹ Out of the total number of reports from police to Child Protection for that year (24,139), family violence was indicated in 17,481 reports; 14,032 of the 17,481 reports came from police via the L17 process.¹¹² As at 30 June 2014 there were 7,070 children or young people in out-of-home care placements (the placement system for children and young people removed from the care of their family) in Victoria. Of these children and young people, family violence was indicated in 3400 cases.¹¹³ Chapter 11 discusses the child protection system.

Integrated Family Services

The Victorian Government funds Integrated Family Services as the major program responsible for helping vulnerable families experiencing difficulties that adversely affect their parenting and family life, which in turn can affect a child's safety, stability or development. Family violence is one of these difficulties along with significant parenting problems, pressure due to mental ill-health, substance abuse or lack of support.

In 2013–14 there were 96 community-based child and family services funded by the Department of Health and Human Services to provide Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services in Victoria.¹¹⁴ The programs had a combined budget of $93.7 million in 2013–14.¹¹⁵

Child FIRST

Child FIRST—the FIRST standing for Family Information, Referral and Support Teams—is a central referral point to a range of community-based family services and other programs within each of the 23 catchment areas across Victoria. Child FIRST is the intake point for family services; that is, there is no eligibility re-assessment for referred families.¹¹⁶

Child FIRST can be directly approached by families, as well as receiving referrals from concerned third parties on behalf of families. It provides information about relevant services, assessments of children and families' needs and risks to help determine what services are required and referrals to relevant services.

Child FIRST teams each have a child protection worker co-located there to help provide consultation on specific cases, and work in partnership with IFS to engage families as appropriate, including joint visits where appropriate.¹¹⁷

Family Services

Family services are for those vulnerable children and young people whose development has been affected and/or in respect of whom concerns are escalating which, unaddressed, may lead to a referral to Child Protection.¹¹⁸

Family services work with families to enhance parenting capacity and skills, parent-child relationships, child development, and social connectedness. This assistance can include counselling, as well as in-home support and group work, and can also include secondary consultations with other services. Case workers provide assistance in accordance with a child and family action plan, which is largely based on the assessment carried out by Child FIRST. The aim is to improve parenting capacity and skills and strengthen parent-child relationships, child development and social connectedness through a range of means, including working with individuals and groups. Assistance is delivered both in the home and by outreach to wherever is appropriate. It can be provided directly or through brokerage funds.¹¹⁹

Housing and homelessness services

The specialist homelessness service system was designed to 'secure housing for people at risk of or experiencing homelessness, through meeting immediate material needs and working with people within a case management model to address any issues that have contributed to their homelessness.'¹²⁰

Homelessness services (other than the specialist family violence services discussed above, even though most of these services are also funded through homelessness funding) play an important role in responding to family violence.¹²¹

They include homelessness access points (also known as Initial Assessment and Planning services) which provide an assessment and referral to relevant homelessness services in the area. These can be important entry points for women who may not wish to seek assistance through specialist family violence services as they may not be willing to disclose family violence or the risks of violence may not be immediate or current.

Homelessness services assist people in a number of ways. They may provide an immediate crisis response by arranging crisis accommodation in a refuge, or emergency accommodation in a motel, rooming house or caravan park. They may also assist people to access transitional housing, which is subsidised housing for up to 12 months for people who are homeless or at risk of homelessness. A person needs to be linked into a support service in order to be eligible for a transitional property.¹²²

Homelessness services also assist people to secure longer term housing, including applications for social housing. Social housing provides subsidised rental housing for people on low incomes who meet income and asset eligibility criteria, including women who have left family violence. The two main forms are public housing (through the Department of Health and Human Services with rent capped at 25 per cent of combined eligible household income),¹²³ and community housing (provided by non government organisations with income and asset limits that are generally higher than public housing and tenants generally pay no more than 30 per cent of their combined household income).¹²⁴ As at June 2015 there were 85,199 social housing dwellings (64,866 of which were public housing).¹²⁵

Homelessness services are also available to perpetrators requiring alternative accommodation in order to comply with a family violence intervention order or safety notice excluding them from the home.

These services are discussed in Chapter 9.

Services for sexual assault

In Victoria the specialist sexual assault sector consists largely of government-funded Centres Against Sexual Assault, along with multi-disciplinary centres that were introduced as part of the 2006 Sexual Assault Reform Strategy. There are also therapeutic treatment programs for children and young people exhibiting sexually abusive behaviours.

CASAs have been operating since 1979, assisting children, young people and adults who have experienced sexual assault.¹²⁶ This includes sexual assault that happens within a family violence context. The Victorian Government told the Commission that sexual assault services include crisis care, casework, advocacy and group work.¹²⁷ Crisis care includes an after-hours telephone service (the Victorian Sexual Assault Crisis Line), crisis intervention, counselling and advocacy as well as liaising and coordinating support with other services such as police. Counselling, advocacy and support is also provided to adult survivors of childhood sexual assault. CASAs can provide community education, training and specialist consultation to other services. Some CASAs are also funded as providers of family violence counselling for women and children.

There are currently six MDCs in Victoria.¹²⁸ These are essentially 'one-stop shops' for victims of sexual assault, with co-located Victoria Police Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation teams, Department of Health and Human Services Child Protection practitioners and CASA counsellors/advocates.¹²⁹ MDCs also have links to forensic medical staff, and from 2014–15, MDCs have been extended to include community health nurses who will support victims/survivors and refer them to appropriate community services.

In addition to these services, the Sexually Abusive Behaviours Treatment Services program funded by the Department of Health and Human Services, provides voluntary therapeutic services for children and adolescents who exhibit problem sexual behaviour and sexually abusive behaviour.¹³⁰ The Victorian Government advised that it funds 11 agencies to provide these services in Victoria.¹³¹ SABTS may be accessed in a number of ways, including self referral, and referral from a community agency, school or Child Protection.¹³² The Children's Court can make referrals to the program for 10 to 14 year-olds, after making a Therapeutic Treatment Order.¹³³ If convicted of a sexual offence, young offenders can be ordered to participate in therapeutic treatment with the Male Adolescent Program for Positive Sexuality.¹³⁴

Chapter 12 provides more detail about sexual assault services.

Victim support services

The Victorian Government's Victims of Crime Helpline, provided by the Victims Support Agency, offers information, advice and support for victims and their families. The line operates from 8.00 am to 11.00 pm seven days a week and is the access point to a range of free services aimed at helping to manage the impact of crime on victims.¹³⁵ Male victims of family violence are referred to this service.¹³⁶ The Victims Support Agency also funds and coordinates the Victims Assistance Program, which provides case-management support to victims of crime¹³⁷ and is delivered by community agencies throughout Victoria.¹³⁸

The Witness Assistance Service in the Office of Public Prosecutions provides support to adult witnesses in criminal trials; the Child Witness Service provides support to children who are witnesses in criminal trials.

Commonwealth agencies

Although family violence and associated services are generally provided at the state and territory level, a range of Commonwealth agencies are relevant to family violence systems. As noted, the Commonwealth provides funding for a variety of state services; Chapter 4 provides details of the Commonwealth's role in this regard.

The Family Court and the Federal Circuit Court seek to resolve legal disputes flowing from family separations, such as disputes relating to parenting and financial circumstances (including child support). The Federal Circuit Court hears the bulk of family law matters; more complex cases and appeals are heard by the Family Court.¹³⁹

In addition to providing parenting and other benefits and entitlements, Centrelink offers one-off crisis payments for people experiencing difficult or extreme circumstances. This can include victims of family violence.¹⁴⁰

The way forward

A royal commission necessarily invites consideration of how existing services and systems might work more effectively. There has been considerable progress in meeting the needs of victims of family violence over the past 16 years, though further improvements are needed. This sentiment was captured by Dr Rhonda Cumberland, Chief Executive Officer of Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, who noted:

There is no comparison between the response today and that of 2000. We can point to the failures today – and there are many. However, the failures of the system should not be confused with a lack of progress. We have come a long way from women self-referring, women not reporting to police, from police not drawing the dots between family violence and crime and domestic murder. I acknowledge how far we have come since those dark days. The days of an isolated women's service response are gone.¹⁴¹

Some submissions noted that, while the foundational policies and legislation underpinning the family violence response in Victoria are sound, the potential of the initiatives has not been fully realised. For example, the Federation of Community Legal Centres observed:

The [Family Violence Protection Act] is widely regarded as a best practice model in terms of the legal protections offered and its purpose, which is to prevent and reduce family violence, prioritise the safety of victims, and hold perpetrators accountable for their use of violence. Seven years on provides opportunity to reflect on how the legislation is working in practice.¹⁴²

Court Network also highlighted concerns about implementation of the reforms—specifically, that this has occurred in an ad hoc way and has lacked the resources to effectively respond to demand.¹⁴³

Fragmentation and ‘silos’ among service providers were often raised as a concern in connection with the existing systems’ response to family violence. Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria remarked:

Despite efforts at integration over the past decade, the system has continued to fail many women. The system still operates in separate ‘silos’, women are unable to smoothly navigate the system, women with diverse needs are being left behind by this system, and significant barriers to integration remain.¹⁴⁴

The Commission heard that, although the various elements of the family violence system response have worked together to accommodate burgeoning demand, the increased volume of reported family violence has made it difficult to provide effective responses. Further reform is necessary to prevent family violence in all its forms and to ensure that all the systems that come into contact with family violence victims respond to their needs. System reform is also required to ensure that those who are violent are held responsible and accountable for their behaviour and helped to change.

6 Risk assessment and management

Introduction

Assessing the risk that a person will be subjected to family violence and then appropriately managing that risk, underpins all efforts to uphold safety for victims of family violence and to hold perpetrators of family violence to account.

Risk assessment and management tools provide a way of thinking and talking about family violence risk with a person. These tools are a lens through which practitioners gain a clearer picture of the victim's experience and what action is required. They can help a practitioner to understand why a victim may stay with a perpetrator, how what at first may have seemed loving attention has become control and domination, and why a victim may be scared to disclose the violence.

Before 2007 there was no common risk assessment and management approach for the family violence system in Victoria. In 2007, the Victorian Government introduced the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or the CRAF) to enable risk assessments to be conducted whenever a person at risk of or experiencing family violence makes contact with a service. The government is currently reviewing the CRAF.

This chapter considers the extent to which the CRAF has met its aims and where improvements might be required. It also looks at how we can better support risk assessment and management practices for those at all levels of risk.

The first section of this chapter explores current risk assessment and management practices in Victoria, including the application of the CRAF and multi-agency risk management practices to date. This includes the Risk Assessment and Management Panels, or RAMPs, currently being rolled out across the state to respond to women and children at highest risk of family violence. It also provides an overview of risk assessment and management practices in other Australian jurisdictions and internationally, which could help guide the Victorian Government's review of the CRAF.

The second section of this chapter identifies some of the matters commonly raised before the Commission in connection with gaps in Victoria's approach to family violence risk. The Commission was informed that the CRAF provides essential guidance on risk assessment but that its consistent application has been hindered by a lack of strong leadership from government. The Commission also heard that the CRAF does not do enough to support risk assessment for children and victims of non-intimate partner violence and that risk management strategies do not place enough focus on perpetrators.

In the final section of the chapter, after considering all the evidence before it, the Commission proposes a way forward. It recommends a number of changes to enhance the CRAF as a best-practice framework and to support its use. The Commission proposes a means for ensuring that risk assessments in important locations such as health services and courts are aligned with the CRAF, and that training in risk assessment and management be provided to the various service providers that frequently come into contact with victims and perpetrators of family violence. It further recommends a number of measures to support the effective statewide roll-out of RAMPs.

During the Commission's deliberations, Victoria Police advised that it is trialling a new triage tool to assess levels of risk and better respond to family violence in parts of western Melbourne. Victoria Police has a unique role in risk assessment and management. Police are often the first responders to family violence incidents. Because of their investigative functions, they also have a central role in monitoring and managing perpetrators. The Commission provides its view on the proposed model, recognising that the trial is yet to commence.

Context and current practice

'Risk assessment' refers to the process of identifying whether a person is at risk of family violence and then determining the likelihood that they will be affected by violence or, if violence is already occurring, that it will escalate.¹ Although risk assessment cannot eliminate the possibility that unpredicted events will occur, it does allow for informed and tailored responses that can reduce the risk that the person will be harmed.

Various service providers perform family violence risk assessments when they come into contact with women, children and families; these include specialist family violence services, mainstream services such as health and family services, and police and justice services. Some might detect the risk of family violence and make a referral to a service provider who is better equipped to perform a full risk assessment. The tools used to identify and respond to risk can therefore differ according to the role and function of the practitioner assessing the risk and the service context.

Although risk assessment is a central part of the work of service providers who come into contact with families, victims constantly assess and manage their own risks. Many women take steps to anticipate and manage a perpetrator's behaviour over a long period before seeking support. Victims' assessment of their own level of risk has been found to be an accurate predictor of the recurrence of family violence, with a predictive value similar to that of more formal risk assessment approaches.² A multi-site, four-year follow-up evaluation of US perpetrator treatment programs found that:

Women's perceptions of safety and the likelihood of re-assault [emerged as the] most consistent and strongest risk marker. In fact, the women's predictions were as useful as all the batterer characteristics combined.³

This finding was reinforced by former State Coroner, Judge Ian Gray, quoting from Mr Rodney Vlasis of No To Violence during the inquest into the death of Luke Batty: 'sound risk assessment practice requires that where there is ambiguity or inconsistency [in verbal reports of fear] [a] risk assessment should err on the side of caution when the victim is significantly afraid'.⁴

Sometimes, however, it is not advisable to depend solely on a victim's assessment of her risk. Some women might not disclose or might minimise the extent of violence in an effort to manage the perpetrator. For example, a woman might fear that if she discloses the violence, the risk to herself or her children will escalate.⁵ Service providers must therefore also use professional judgment and consider identified risk factors for family violence in order to make an effective risk assessment.⁶

The risk assessment process can also give a victim the chance to recognise her situation as violent, acknowledge her experience and position, prevent her from blaming herself for the situation, and take action to achieve her own safety. By describing the perpetrator's behaviour during a risk assessment, a woman can 'obtain some clarity about the abuse she is experiencing and shrug off some of the blame the abuser has levelled at her':

It may be the first time that a woman has had an opportunity to think about her situation objectively, in terms of the risk the abuser poses to her, and her children. Because she is fearful of the abuser, the notion of 'risk' makes sense to her, however it is often the first time she has heard that kind of objective terminology. In this way, risk assessment can also serve as a therapeutic exercise for women.⁷

Risk assessment is not a 'one-off' exercise.⁸ The risk of family violence can fluctuate over time, and it can escalate rapidly. New risk assessments are required whenever circumstances change for victims or perpetrators—for example, when the victim is planning to leave the violent relationship or when she separates from her partner, when the perpetrator is about to be released from custody, when Family Court proceedings have begun, when the perpetrator becomes aware that the victim has sought support, or when the victim is pregnant or gives birth.

Given the dynamic nature of risk, a risk assessment requires regular review. Each time a service provider makes contact with a woman, they should be doing a risk assessment. Service providers can ask 'last time we spoke, I asked you how scared you were on a scale of one to five and you said three. How are you feeling now?' If she responds with 'four', a service provider will want to know what has happened in the interim. And when the level of risk is reviewed or revised, there is also a need to revisit the woman's safety plan.⁹

Approaches to risk assessment

There is no definitive method of assessing the risk of family violence. As the Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children noted, 'risk assessment is an art rather than a science and should be considered preventative rather than predictive'.¹⁰

Within the human services field, approaches to risk assessment have included the following:

- ▷ a clinical approach—exercising professional judgment
- ▷ an actuarial approach—using scales or matrices based on a retrospective analysis of risk
- ▷ a structured professional judgment approach—in which clinical and actuarial approaches are used in combination.¹¹

The actuarial method relies primarily on predictive risk factors taken from empirical research. These risk factors are assigned a numerical value and a total risk score is generated. This score provides an indication of the probability that an individual will re-offend in the foreseeable future. While training is recommended before a person uses any risk assessment tool, the literature stresses the particular importance of training in the proper use of actuarial tools.¹²

One strength of the actuarial approach is that the tools use consistent criteria; this means findings can be replicated easily, which supports consistent data collection.¹³ An actuarial approach can, however, also limit the assessor to a fixed set of factors, which could lead them to ignore other information or potentially minimise factors that professional judgment would identify as critical.

A structured professional judgment approach is accepted as more accurate than the other approaches on their own, since it is more flexible than the actuarial approach, is more consistent and transparent than unstructured clinical judgments, and allows for the use of professional judgment.¹⁴ Most current frameworks for assessing family violence, including the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework, also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or CRAF, promote a structured judgment approach.¹⁵

Given the complexity and dynamic nature of risk, and the fact that many service providers, beyond specialist family violence services, might be required to identify and assess a risk of family violence, the Commission heard that different risk assessment approaches should be available:

The structured professional judgment tool ... on balance has more utility, but it requires a higher level of training and expertise and of course all of these tools are only as good as the information they are based on ... in an ideal situation you would be able to use an actuarial tool for people who are unable to train their expertise to make in-depth decisions, but then you would have the opportunity to have a more comprehensive assessment, say when a particular matter is referred to a risk assessment panel or other body, where a multi-disciplinary team can actually look at a range of factors to make decisions and then use that information to help manage change.¹⁶

The important role of risk assessment tools in guiding the professional judgement of even very experienced practitioners, was also stressed to the Commission:

... if you have a really good assessor, they have that checklist in their head of 20 factors that are on the danger assessment tool and are asking the woman about those factors and therefore she comes through with roughly the same information, but in a way it's because there is a very good assessment done on the basis of some quite detailed questioning, which is different from someone coming in and just going, 'Tick the box, have you experienced domestic violence'.¹⁷

As noted by Professor Cathy Humphreys, Professor of Social Work at the University of Melbourne, the lack of certainty in risk assessment means that the information gathered through a risk assessment tool constitutes only one information source:

... you will have a lot of people that look very high risk that in fact may have stopped themselves for a range of reasons from continuing their violence. Similarly, you will have people that look pretty low risk who then do atrocious things. You can't necessarily use the tools or even professional judgment to predict some of that. So when we are thinking about what's the role of risk assessment and risk management it's a very helpful guide, but it's not the whole story.¹⁸

The Commission is also aware of caveats in relation to the use of risk assessment tools:

Firstly, the priority on the most dangerous perpetrators may leave many women and children without an adequate and safe intervention. Secondly, the risk factors are indicative not predictive and serious cases may be left out of a system which only prioritises intervention to high risk cases. Thirdly, risk assessment may be seen as an end in itself, rather than a mechanism through which to inform the management of risk. Finally, the risk assessment and risk management needs to actively enhance the policing response and not overwhelm police with administrative paperwork ...¹⁹

Risk assessment tools can be targeted to victims (for example, the CRAF), perpetrators, or both. Importantly, the CRAF sets out risks associated with both victimisation from family violence and perpetration of family violence. Most of the risk factors for victims and perpetrators are similar, although in relation to actuarial tools the way risk factors are weighted can be different.²⁰

The Commission was also told about the role of 'self-assessment' tools for women that could operate as an adjunct to formal risk assessment. For example, the University of Melbourne is testing an interactive web-based health relationship tool and safety decision aid called 'I-DECIDE'.²¹ The tool is for women who are not able to seek help or disclose violence to their health practitioner. It is being tested through a randomised controlled trial to determine whether it is accessible and useful.²² This tool is discussed in Chapter 19. Examples of risk assessment approaches used in other jurisdictions are outlined in Table 6.2.

Risk management

Effective risk management is complex and requires familiarity with and cooperation between a number of different professionals working in different agencies, each with a different skill set and mandate.²³ It requires formal partnerships between agencies, and other mechanisms for supporting coordinated responses to the risk or occurrence of family violence.²⁴

Risk management (for both victims and perpetrators) is also most likely to be effective when 'operating in the context of coordinated community responses', where entire communities are responsible for responding to family violence, not just individual practitioners or agencies.²⁵

Risk management for victims

Use of a risk assessment tool alone cannot guarantee a victim's safety. Risk assessment must lead to effectively managing risk, 'otherwise it is a useless exercise in sharing information to no effect'.²⁶ Risk management requires 'a system, not just a tool, and highly skilled people to identify and manage those risks'.²⁷

Risk management strategies for victims of family violence include developing safety plans; putting ongoing risk assessment mechanisms in place; arranging accommodation for victims; ensuring that victims have access to support services, such as counselling and legal advice; taking legal action against the perpetrator; developing protocols between services working with the victim and with the perpetrator, so that perpetrators can be monitored;²⁸ and referring high-risk cases (where victims are at risk of serious injury or death) to multi-agency case-management panels such as Risk Assessment and Management Panels (RAMPs).

Technology is increasingly being used alongside other supports to assist risk management. Such technology includes safety cards and watches, CCTV and use of alarms.²⁹ The BSafe program is a personal alarm system with an in-built GPS that can connect the user to an operator by pressing a button. It allows for a victim to be easily located.³⁰ The Safe-T-Card has an alarm button, an in-built GPS and audio and/or video streaming capacity.³¹ Chapter 9 discusses these devices and provides details of the Victorian Government's recent announcement of a $900,000 pilot to trial the implementation of safety devices and casework support in a number of regions.³²

Risk management for children is also important. The Department of Health and Human Services guide Working with Families where an Adult is Violent provides useful information for practitioners working with families where family violence is occurring. The guide acknowledges the gender-based nature of family violence and provides evidence about the effects of family violence on children and parenting.³³ The guide provides some contextual information about family violence against children, namely that mothers are the most common perpetrators of child abuse, which is defined to include neglect.³⁴ The guide notes that where women have a history of violence, they are more likely to physically abuse their children than women who do not have this history; depression is also a risk factor.³⁵

Risk management of perpetrators

Although the 'perpetrator ultimately controls the risks of family violence',³⁶ risk management of perpetrators is a relatively new field.³⁷ Among current risk management strategies for perpetrators are referral to men's behaviour change programs, legal responses, and monitoring perpetrator activity through information sharing between agencies.

Greater monitoring of perpetrators was a recommendation of Judge Gray in the report of his inquest into the death of Luke Batty. The Commission was told that risk management of perpetrators with a high level of offending is best left to police, the courts and Corrections Victoria.³⁸ Recent research conducted with family violence perpetrators in correctional settings suggests that the following are effective strategies for managing perpetrators with a high level of offending:

- (1) quick and judicious adjudication of cases;
- (2) careful monitoring of correctional outcomes via regular court reviews or specialized probation/parole programs;
- (3) continued safety planning for victims and risk management for perpetrators;
- and (4) vigilant supervision involving consequences for those who fail to complete mandated batterer intervention programs.³⁹

Managing perpetrator risk can involve the following:

- ▶ monitoring or supervising known perpetrators to provide current information on their whereabouts, intentions and vicinity to victims. This can be done through CCTV, GPS monitoring or partner contact via men's behaviour change programs. Supervision could include restricted activity, such as attendance at programs, or communications restrictions⁴⁰
- ▶ interventions that require physical separation from victims—for example, justice responses such as exclusion from the home, intervention orders or being remanded—and service responses such as crisis accommodation or support from respondent workers
- ▶ interventions to minimise and eliminate risks—including men's behaviour change programs and programs aimed at responding to other individual risk factors such as alcohol and drug misuse.

Risk management of perpetrators has increasingly become part of the role of Victoria Police family violence teams, which have evolved to focus on recidivist and high-risk perpetrators.⁴¹ Risk management of perpetrators by police is described further in Chapter 15, but in summary it includes:

- ▶ passive or overt monitoring such as Law Enforcement Assistance Program (LEAP) alerts and enforcement tools respectively
- ▶ family violence 'person of interest' flags in the LEAP database to alert police, who come into contact with the person, of their status
- ▶ management plans tailored to individual circumstances and implemented by a family violence team.⁴²

Police family violence teams have also implemented a number of local, multi-agency initiatives (see the section 'Multi-agency risk management').

These initiatives draw on the expertise of other services to manage recidivist and high-risk perpetrators. The Commission was told that the development of RAMPs has enabled a more targeted focus on perpetrator interventions, including through information exchange with community-based agencies:

The reality is that we spend the majority of the time at the RAMP talking about accountability. The data we have indicates that the more we are able to make a perpetrator accountable and visible, whether through compliance with an order, active treatment or imprisonment, the more the woman's experience of safety increases.⁴³

The RAMP acts as a kind of spotlight on the perpetrator. It sends a really clear message to him and to the broader community, that 'we are watching you.' No matter where you go across these sectors, we know about you. The RAMP creates a web of accountability. If we are serious about increasing accountability for men, then losing the information gap, as the RAMP does, is critical.⁴⁴

Recidivist and high-risk perpetrators

Recidivist and high-risk perpetrators require ongoing risk assessment and risk management. Recidivist perpetrators are those who frequently commit family violence or breach family violence intervention orders. High-risk perpetrators are those who commit severe family violence or whose use of violence has or is escalating.⁴⁵ This group is distinct from recidivists because high-risk perpetrators might not necessarily use frequent violence. For example, a sizable minority of family violence homicides are not preceded by other violence.⁴⁶

Analysis of police data shows that between July 2004 and March 2015 police assessed repeat violence as 'unlikely' for 45 per cent ($n=4599$) of perpetrators who went on to repeat violence and as 'likely' for 55 per cent ($n=5532$). Police predictions using the L17 form are therefore 'slightly better than chance' at predicting recidivism.⁴⁷

Victoria's Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework

The Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (often referred to as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF) was introduced in 2007 as part of the Victorian Government's ongoing investment 'in the development of an integrated family violence system ... that incorporates both specialist family violence and mainstream service providers'.⁴⁸ It was developed after consultation with more than 500 stakeholders, among them the police, the courts, family violence specialist services, and a diverse range of other service providers.⁴⁹

The Commission heard that the CRAF was designed so that professionals across a wide range of organisations could consistently identify and assess the risk of family violence and manage family violence through the provision of appropriate and timely responses to victims and holding perpetrators to account for their actions.

More than a practice tool, the CRAF was initially intended also as a tool for integration across the various sectors of the family violence system in Victoria. The use of CRAF was intended to establish a shared understanding and approach, not only to risk assessment and risk management, but also to responses to family violence in general. It is a key driver of an effective family violence system, supporting women and children's safety and violent men to be held accountable.⁵⁰

The CRAF was the first statewide risk assessment and management model to be used in Australia.⁵¹ Dr Rhonda Cumberland, Chief Executive Officer of Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, described to the Commission how the family violence sector assessed risk before the CRAF was introduced:

As workers, it was frightening to know the risks women faced and to know at the same time how little was available to assist them. We did not have the knowledge, the systems, the tools, and the skills to respond effectively. We made many mistakes. We removed women not just from their homes but from their communities. The system required that women leave their jobs. We took children out of school for long periods of time and often required them to change schools. We did not know then how to assess women's risk.⁵²

The CRAF is used by police and other services to assess the level and nature of risk in family violence incidents. It guides the identification of risk, through determining vulnerabilities and other factors (for example, pregnancy, access to weapons) that could contribute to determining the level of risk in a particular context.

It was developed to provide guidance to practitioners from a range of sectors working with victims of family violence and while it includes the risk factors for perpetrators, it was designed to use with victims. The CRAF employs the definition of family violence in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).⁵³ Whilst acknowledging that both men and women can be perpetrators and victims of family violence, the CRAF uses gendered terminology and refers to victims as women and children and perpetrators as men, reflecting that the most prevalent form of family violence is intimate partner violence perpetrated by men against women.⁵⁴

The CRAF principles

The CRAF is built around six principles or components:

A shared understanding of risk and family violence among all service providers. An integrated service response to family violence depends on all agencies speaking a common language in terms of risk assessment and family violence, and having a common understanding of what underpins family violence—including what constitutes family violence, the ways family violence can affect women and children, and factors affecting the likelihood and severity of family violence.

A standardised approach to recognising and assessing risk. All victims of family violence in Victoria should receive a consistent level and quality of service from the range of family violence service providers, regardless of where they enter the system.

Appropriate referral pathways and information sharing. The various services that work with and help protect women and children must engage effectively with each other as well as with services that work with men who use violence. Inter-agency communication, referral and information sharing are essential to responding to risk and to continuing case management.

Risk management strategies. Victims are linked with support services and case managed where appropriate, and the service system works together to respond to and reduce violence.

Consistent data collection and analysis. Data is collected and analysed to determine the prevalence of family violence, identify common entry points into the family violence system, identify under-represented groups, and guide future service delivery.

Quality assurance. Organisations using the CRAF should monitor its application and supervise staff and ensure that new staff are trained to use the CRAF and that ongoing staff receive regular professional development relating to understanding family violence and effectively using the framework.⁵⁵

The CRAF includes three practice guides to support different practitioners to identify and manage risk, depending on their role:⁵⁶

- ▶ Practice Guide 1: Identifying Family Violence. This is for use by professionals working in mainstream settings, including health care providers, teachers and Centrelink officers, who encounter people they think might be victims of family violence. The guide contains a set of possible indicators of family violence, questions to identify family violence, advice on how to ask these questions, and steps to take if family violence is identified—for example, referring the victim to a specialist family violence service or arranging ongoing opportunities to monitor and discuss the violence.
- ▶ Practice Guide 2: Preliminary Assessment. This is for use by professionals who work with victims of family violence but for whom responses to family violence are not their primary business—for example, Victoria Police, professionals in court and legal settings, and Child Protection officers. The guide helps these professionals perform a preliminary risk assessment to determine the level of risk to and the safety requirements for the victim.
- ▶ Practice Guide 3: Comprehensive Family Violence. This is for use by specialist family violence professionals, among them specialist family violence services, men's behaviour change programs, family violence counsellors, refuge services, and specialist family violence courts. The guide helps these professionals perform a comprehensive risk assessment to determine the level of risk to the victim and to make provision for securing the victim's safety and meeting their recovery needs.⁵⁷

In summary, the practice guides set out what is expected of various professionals in relation to risk assessment and management, depending on their role and responsibility. Practitioners using practice guides 2 and 3 are directed to determine the level of risk to an individual by:

- ▷ supporting the victim to assess her own level of risk
- ▷ considering evidence-based risk factors
- ▷ exercising professional judgment.⁵⁸

Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria told the Commission:

[The] CRAF uses a Structured Professional Judgment Approach that strikes a balance between actuarial methods and clinical decision-making. It draws on evidence-based frameworks while also taking account of case-specific situations and contexts that are not considered using a strictly actuarial tool. This approach promotes consistency through an evidence-based framework, but allows the flexibility to encompass the unique characteristics of each case, including the perspective of the victim.⁵⁹

Evidence-based risk factors

The development of the CRAF was based on research and evidence about factors associated with the likelihood of violence recurring and a victim being injured or killed by a perpetrator of family violence.⁶⁰ Nationally and internationally, current family violence risk assessment tools are largely based on an analysis of adult family violence homicides and serious assault cases.⁶¹ Given that the majority of victims of family violence homicides are women and perpetrators a male partner or ex-partner, the majority of risk assessment tools have been designed to assess male violence against female intimate partners.⁶² Table 6.1 identifies the risk factors for family violence adopted by the CRAF.

Table 6.1 Risk factors affecting the likelihood and severity of family violence

Risk factors for victims
Pregnancy and new birth Family violence often begins or intensifies during pregnancy and is associated with increased rates of miscarriage, low birthweight, premature birth, foetal injury and foetal death. Family violence during pregnancy is regarded as a significant indicator of future harm to the woman and her child.
Depression and mental ill-health Victims with a mental illness may be more vulnerable to family violence.
Drug and/or alcohol misuse or abuse Victims may use alcohol or other drugs to cope with the physical, emotional or psychological effects of family violence; this can lead to increased vulnerability.
Has ever verbalised or had suicidal ideas or tried to commit suicide Suicidal thoughts or attempts indicate that the victim is extremely vulnerable and the situation has become critical.
Isolation A victim is more vulnerable if she is isolated from family, friends and other social networks. Isolation also increases the likelihood of violence and is not simply geographical. Other examples of isolation are systemic factors that limit social interaction or support and the perpetrator not allowing the victim to have social interaction.
Risk factors for perpetrators
Use of weapon in most recent event Use of a weapon indicates a high level of risk because previous behaviour is a likely predictor of future behaviour. A weapon is defined as any tool used by the perpetrator that could injure, kill or destroy property.
Access to weapons Perpetrators who have access to weapons, particularly guns, are much more likely to seriously injure or kill a victim than perpetrators without access to weapons.
Has ever tried to choke the victim Strangulation or choking is a common method used by male perpetrators to kill female victims.

Risk factors for perpetrators

Has ever threatened to kill the victim

Evidence suggests that a perpetrator's threat to kill a victim is often genuine.

Has ever harmed or threatened to harm or kill children

Evidence suggests that where family violence is occurring, there is a likelihood of increased risk of direct abuse of children in the family. Children are adversely affected through experiencing violence directly and by the effects of violence, including hearing and (or) witnessing violence or through living in fear due to a violent environment.

Has ever harmed or threatened to harm or kill pets or other animals

A correlation between cruelty to animals and family violence is increasingly being recognised. Because there is a direct link between family violence and pets being abused or killed, abuse or threats of abuse against pets may be used by perpetrators to control family members.

Has ever threatened or tried to commit suicide

Threats or attempts to commit suicide have been found to be a risk factor for murder–suicide.

Stalking of the victim

Stalkers are more likely to be violent if they have had an intimate relationship with the victim. Stalking, when coupled with physical assault, is strongly connected to murder or attempted murder. Stalking behaviour and obsessive thinking are highly related behaviours.

Sexual assault of the victim (including rape, coerced sexual activity or unwanted sexual touching)

Men who sexually assault their partners are more likely to use other forms of violence against them.

Drug and/or alcohol misuse or abuse

A serious problem with illicit drugs, alcohol, prescription drugs or inhalants leads to impairment in social functioning and creates a risk of family violence. This includes temporary drug-induced psychosis.

Obsession/jealous behaviour towards victim

Obsessive and/or excessive jealous behaviour is often related to controlling behaviours and has been linked with violent attacks.

Controlling behaviours—for example, the perpetrator telling the victim how to dress and who they can be friends with, controlling how much money they can have, and determining when they can see friends and family or use the car

Men who think they 'should be in charge' are more likely to use various forms of violence against their partner.

Unemployment

Unemployment is associated with an increased risk of lethal assault, and a sudden change in employment status—such as being terminated—might be associated with increased risk

Has ever harmed or threaten to harm the victim

Psychological and emotional abuse has been found to be a good predictor of continued abuse, including physical abuse. Previous physical assaults also predict future assaults.

Has ever harmed or threatened to harm or kill other family members

Threats by the perpetrator to hurt or cause actual harm to family members can be a way of controlling the victim through fear.

Previous or current breach of an intervention order

Breaching intervention order conditions indicates the defendant is not willing to abide by the orders of a court. Such behaviour should be considered a serious indicator of increased risk of future violence.

Depression/mental health

Murder–suicide outcomes in family violence have been associated with perpetrators who have mental health problems, particularly depression.

History of violent behaviour

Perpetrators with a history of violence are more likely to use violence against family members. This can occur even if the violence has not previously been directed towards family members. Other victims may have included strangers, acquaintances and/or police officers. The nature of the violence may include credible threats or use of weapons, and attempted or actual assaults. Violent men generally engage in more frequent and severe family violence than perpetrators who do not have a violent past.

Relationship factors

Recent separation

For women who are experiencing family violence, the high-risk periods include immediately before taking action, and during the initial stages of or immediately after separation. Victims who stay with the perpetrator because they are afraid to leave often accurately anticipate that leaving would increase the risk of lethal assault. The data on time since separation suggests that women are particularly at risk within the first two months

Escalation—an increase in severity and/or frequency of violence

Violence occurring more often or becoming worse has been found to be associated with lethal outcomes for victims.

Financial difficulties

Low income (less than that required to provide for basic needs) and financial stress, including a gambling addiction, are risk factors for family violence.

Note: Blue denotes higher risk.

The CRAF emphasises that risk factors should not be used as a 'checklist' for ascertaining the level of risk; instead, they should provide the basis for a discussion with the victim. The CRAF also states that these factors might interact in varied and complex ways and that, 'despite the co-occurrence of certain factors with family violence, none is causal'.⁶³ Professional judgment should be exercised in relation to whether a factor is relevant to risk in the victim's context. For example, if the perpetrator has a diagnosed mental health problem but is currently treated and well, this risk factor 'should not add significant weight to the assessment'.⁶⁴ The assessor should, however, 'enquire about what helps the man to stay well, and the likelihood of this wellness continuing'.⁶⁵

Assessing risks to children

The current version of the CRAF stresses that exposure to family violence can have a serious impact on children's current and future physical, psychological and emotional wellbeing⁶⁶ and that practitioners must consider children as victims to be assessed in their own right, separate from their mother.⁶⁷ The CRAF includes some discussion of and reference to specific indicators of family violence, sexual abuse and neglect of children,⁶⁸ as well as prompting questions and service pathways for children.⁶⁹ It does not include any specific risk factors for children.⁷⁰

The CRAF notes that all interventions with children and families across the child and family services sector (which includes Child Protection, out-of-home care and Integrated Family Services) are guided by the Department of Health and Human Services' Best Interests Framework for Vulnerable Children and Youth, and emphasises practitioners' mandatory obligations to report to Child Protection when a child is deemed to be at risk.⁷¹ The 2014 Department of Health and Human Services child protection practice guide, Working with Families Where an Adult is Violent: Best Interests Case Practice Model, also provides advice to practitioners in relation to assessing risks to children.⁷² This guide emphasises the link between family violence and child abuse and that effective interventions require collaboration between family violence services and Child Protection.⁷³

Assessing perpetrator risk

At the time of its development, the CRAF provided a new focus on perpetrator behaviour as central to guiding risk assessment.⁷⁴ An underpinning principle of the CRAF is that 'perpetrators should be held accountable for their use of violence and challenged to take responsibility for their actions'.⁷⁵ The CRAF states that 'collecting information on perpetrators—and especially any indicators of future or continuing risk—is a responsibility shared by all professionals'.⁷⁶

The CRAF provides a structured assessment guide intended to capture relevant information about perpetrator behaviours reported by victims that can be shared across the family violence system to support risk management.⁷⁷ The CRAF refers to other guides for assessing and responding to perpetrator risk, such as standards developed by men's behaviour change programs and the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence.⁷⁸

In 2009 the then Department of Human Services developed a Framework for Comprehensive Assessment in Men's Behaviour Change Programs to align with the CRAF.⁷⁹ This more recent framework provides guidance about interviewing and working with men, assessment for group programs, risk management practice, and interviewing victims.⁸⁰ It includes risk factors for perpetrators but does not provide a specific perpetrator risk assessment tool. The Commission was unable to determine the level of uptake and use of this framework.

When entering prison, Corrections Victoria's intake and screening for both 'General Offenders' and 'Serious Violent Offenders' also screens for family violence-related offending.⁸¹ Those eligible for offending behaviour intervention and who are identified as having committed a family violence-related offence have the Spousal Assault Risk Assessment tool administered as part of their clinical assessment.⁸² The Risk-Need-Responsivity model, which is discussed in more detail in Chapter 18 underlies the use of the SARA tool.

Implementing the CRAF across the family violence system

Since 2007, funding of $4.7 million has been provided to implement the CRAF, and in 2014-15 the Victorian Government committed $800,000 a year ongoing to develop and further implement the CRAF.⁸³ Originally developed and managed by the Office of Women's Policy, the CRAF is currently managed by the Department of Health and Human Services. It was updated in 2012 and is available in both hard-copy and digital formats, as well as online on The Lookout family violence practitioner website and the department's website.⁸⁴

The Commission was informed that the CRAF was originally developed as one of the foundational initiatives to progress an integrated family violence system.⁸⁵ An essential aspect of ensuring this integration has been described as an effective 'whole of government authorising environment' for the use of the CRAF.⁸⁶ This included commitment and leadership at a ministerial level, oversight from senior government executives, a central family violence policy unit, and strong partnership and advisory structures with the non-government sector to ensure the CRAF's broad use.⁸⁷

Training for people who use the CRAF

Statewide workforce development and training in using the CRAF was rolled out from 2008. From 2008 to 2010 and from 2011 to 2013, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Swinburne University and No To Violence delivered this training.⁸⁸

The Commission was told that over 6500 professionals have attended CRAF training since 2008.⁸⁹ These workers have come from a wide range of sectors—including sexual assault services, Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services, Child Protection, homelessness services, disability services, counselling and mediation services, Aboriginal family violence services, the Magistrates' Court and Corrections Victoria.⁹⁰ Training has been delivered to mixed groups of practitioners from various sectors, to foster shared understanding, inform the group of other sectors' roles, and encourage the building of regional networks.⁹¹

Victoria Police advised the Commission that police attendance at CRAF training is arranged by region. There is no central record of the numbers of police who have attended training.⁹² Victoria Police indicated that family violence training was provided from 2008-09 to support implementation of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). The training included risk assessment information congruent with the CRAF and was provided to 6013 police members between 2008-09 and 2010-11.⁹³ Corrections Victoria also advised the Commission that approximately 560 of its community correctional services staff were trained between 2009-10 and 2013-14.⁹⁴

Evaluation of the training program

The CRAF training program was evaluated in 2009⁹⁵ and then again in 2012.⁹⁶ The 2009 evaluation found that effective training coverage was achieved for specialist family violence services and that sector-wide training coverage was achieved for magistrates' court registrars and maternal and child health nurses.⁹⁷ Both evaluations found that the training was effective in increasing participants' understanding of risk assessment, risk management, safety planning, questioning and overall competence in responding to family violence.⁹⁸

The integrated cross-sector training approach was also seen as beneficial:

Participants and other stakeholders valued a cross-sectoral and regional approach to training and recognised the positive role it plays in developing an integrated and coordinated family violence service system.⁹⁹

The evaluations recommended targeting training to additional sectors including mental health, drug and alcohol, primary health services, and legal and education services.¹⁰⁰ The evaluation noted there had been 'low engagement of culturally and linguistically diverse services and Indigenous services statewide in training'.¹⁰¹ The Commission heard that CRAF training should also be reviewed to more effectively respond to diverse populations.¹⁰²

Further developments

A project to support the development of Aboriginal-specific training materials to supplement the existing CRAF materials was piloted in three locations in 2013–14.¹⁰³ Overseen by the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum, development of an Aboriginal contextualised CRAF was reported as one of the specific achievements in the mid-term evaluation of the Indigenous Family Violence 10 Year Plan.¹⁰⁴

The Commission was advised that additional resources have been developed to make the CRAF more relevant to professionals working with culturally and linguistically diverse communities.¹⁰⁵ A project was also funded to improve the guidance within the CRAF for effectively working with culturally and linguistically diverse communities.¹⁰⁶

A CRAF Professional Development Strategy, first developed in 2009 and managed as part of the broader CRAF project in the Department of Health and Human Services, has focused on incorporating the CRAF into the tertiary education curriculum. The Commission was told that curriculum materials are currently being trialled by Swinburne University of Technology for a number of its community work areas and courses.¹⁰⁷

Another CRAF implementation project has involved training and workshops for general practitioners.¹⁰⁸

The Victorian Government has further advised the Commission that in 2015–16, it will:

- ▷ deliver 59 training sessions in cross-sectoral risk assessment and risk management and up to 480 sessions in Identifying Family Violence regional sessions (in 2015–16 and 2016–17)
- ▷ develop risk assessment and risk management e-learning modules to supplement face-to-face training
- ▷ expand The Lookout website¹⁰⁹ to increase technical capacity and support communities of practice.¹¹⁰

The Commission understands that the first e-CRAF training module, 'Understanding family violence', is now online at The Lookout and that three further modules are in development.¹¹¹

Aligning risk assessment practices across agencies

One of the aims of the CRAF is to establish a shared understanding of the risks associated with family violence in order to facilitate information sharing between agencies and government departments and to 'enable uniform risk assessment processes and appropriate referrals to take place anywhere in the system'.¹¹² The Victorian Government told the Commission that this aim is 'far from complete', although there have been a number of efforts to improve the consistency of risk assessment practice across sectors.¹¹³

Victoria Police currently uses a risk assessment approach, as recorded in a family violence risk assessment and risk management report (referred to as an L17 form), that was developed before the CRAF but that aligns with the framework.¹¹⁴ The Commission heard that this alignment has served the Victorian system well.¹¹⁵

I think one of the strengths of the Victorian system to date has been that we have kept the police and the wider family violence service system roughly on the same page in terms of risk assessment, that the risks that are outlined in the L17 parallel the risks outlined in the Common Risk Assessment Framework.¹¹⁶

Other service providers that have aligned their practices and tools with the CRAF include the following:

- ▷ Maternal and child health nurses. These practitioners use CRAF-based family violence identification and referral processes in their Key Age and Stage Framework.
- ▷ Primary care partnerships. The partnerships have incorporated family violence screening and referral tools, based on the CRAF, in their practice manual and service coordination tool templates.
- ▷ Alcohol and drug treatment services. Services have included family violence identification and assessment and CRAF recording templates in their 'Adult Alcohol and Other Drug Screening and Assessment Instrument: Clinician Guide' and the supporting module.
- ▷ Magistrates' Court registrars. Elements of the CRAF are reflected in the forms used by all registrars and applicant support workers to help parties with applications for family violence intervention orders.¹¹⁷

Victoria Legal Aid told the Commission that it is currently working on the implementation of a 'safety and risk identification tool' as part of its Family Violence Service Delivery and Education Framework,¹¹⁸ which aligns with the CRAF and will be implemented across the organisation. The Family Dispute Resolution Service has a separate family violence risk assessment and management process.¹¹⁹

The CRAF has also been used as part of Strengthening Hospitals' Responses to Family Violence, discussed in Chapter 19.¹²⁰

Review of the CRAF

During the period of the Commission's deliberations, the Victorian Government announced a review of the CRAF. The tender request for the first stage of the review was released in January 2016. The objective of the first-stage review is '[to] provide an evidence base to inform the redevelopment of a best practice framework and suite of dynamic risk and need identification, assessment and management tools through the lens of family violence'.¹²¹

The tender document states that this will include an assessment of the use of the CRAF in a range of workforces, perceptions of its usability, and perceptions of victims of family violence in relation to risk assessment and management in different settings.¹²² This first-stage review component is to be completed by May 2016.

The broader review will also consider redeveloping the CRAF in order to provide a ‘best practice framework and suite of tools for family violence risk assessment and management and a corresponding implementation strategy’.¹²³ The government noted that the scope of this will include:

- ▷ effective risk assessment in the emerging area of technology-facilitated family violence
- ▷ risk management
- ▷ improving training in the use of the CRAF
- ▷ responding to the needs of diverse communities—including culturally and linguistically diverse and Aboriginal communities
- ▷ responding to other forms of family violence
- ▷ assessing risk for children and young people
- ▷ assessing risk for perpetrators
- ▷ information sharing, particularly in relation to the perpetrator.¹²⁴

The Victorian Government’s response to Judge Gray’s report on his inquest into the death of Luke Batty emphasised that the CRAF review will include strategies for embedding use of the CRAF in organisational practice—for example, its inclusion in service agreements as a requirement of funding.¹²⁵

Trial of police triage tool

As discussed in Chapter 14, Victoria Police members are at the front line of the response to family violence in Victoria, and they routinely perform risk assessments using the L17 form. In advance of the Department of Health and Human Services review of the CRAF, Victoria Police will trial a series of actuarial risk assessment and triage tools for use by police members attending family violence incidents. The trial will begin by June 2016.¹²⁶

These tools, developed by the Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science at Swinburne University of Technology, will be used by police members attending family violence incidents and by police family violence teams to determine the level of specialist police response required for an incident.¹²⁷

Two tools have been developed using L17 data for 2013–14. The data was analysed to identify the most significant factors in predicting a subsequent police call-out to a family violence incident between the same two people within 12 months.¹²⁸ Prior history of family violence was also included in the analysis, using LEAP data.¹²⁹

The first tool is called the Victoria Police Screen and Assessment of Family Violence Risk: Screening Version, or VP-SAFvR:SV. It is a ‘front-line’ triage instrument that allows responding police members to ‘categorise family violence cases as low, moderate or high concern’. This will be used by all police in Altona, Footscray, Williamstown and Werribee when they attend a family violence incident. It requires police to answer 13 questions, each worth one point.¹³⁰

If an incident scores three or less, police members will not proceed to conduct a full risk assessment, will not make a formal referral, and will not refer the incident to the family violence team.¹³¹ If an incident scores four or more, a full risk assessment will be carried out using a (revised) L17.¹³² The police member will also make a formal referral by sending the L17 to the appropriate contact point, in keeping with the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence.¹³³ The incident will be escalated to the family violence team in that police division for further triage and assessment using other instruments (described below).

By adopting a threshold score of four, the Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science estimates that 50 per cent of all police incidents will be referred to the family violence team for further assessment.¹³⁴

There is an option for police members to override the point assessment if the incident has not scored the requisite four points but, using their professional judgment, the police consider the matter requires escalation to the family violence team.¹³⁵ Further, 'these categories will not influence the criminal prosecution response'.¹³⁶ The Code of Practice must be followed.

The second tool is called the Victoria Police Screen and Assessment of Family Violence Risk, or VP-SAFvR, which will be used by the family violence team to determine which incidents require a 'standard preventative follow-up' or 'a more intensive level of assessment and management'.¹³⁷

This tool will identify cases that are more likely to experience severe family violence involving the same two people over 12 months. 'Severe family violence' is defined as either frequent or physical violence. Frequent is defined as at least three further family violence incidents involving the same two people in succeeding 12 months.¹³⁸ Physical family violence is defined by the presence of any charge for a violent offence involving both the two people in the original incident in the succeeding 12 months.¹³⁹

Incidents scoring below a threshold of four will be followed up by the station family violence liaison officer in consultation with the family violence team.¹⁴⁰ Those scoring above the threshold will receive another assessment using a structured professional judgment risk assessment instrument, the B-SAFER.¹⁴¹ Each of these cases will receive a 'priority case management plan'.¹⁴²

Using four as the threshold will result in approximately 25 per cent of all family violence incidents—that is, half of those referred to the family violence team for further screening—receiving a 'comprehensive risk assessment and management plan from the Family Violence Team'.¹⁴³

The Commission understands that the Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science will deliver training modules to family violence team members before the trial begins. These initial training modules will be evaluated and refined into a 'combined online and offline suite of training that can be used to train future FVT members across Victoria'.¹⁴⁴ The documentation provided to the Commission does not mention training for front-line police members in the trial area, although development of online training is identified for 2017.¹⁴⁵

This is a three-year project; the final report and evaluation are to be completed by December 2018. An initial evaluation of the 'frontline triage instrument' will be completed by December 2016.¹⁴⁶

The Commission discusses this trial further in 'The way forward' section of this chapter.

Multi-agency risk management in Victoria

At the time the CRAF was developed, thinking about what was required across the system to effectively manage risk was in its very early stages. The CRAF therefore provides limited guidance in relation to strategies for continuing risk management.¹⁴⁷ 'Victoria has been stronger on agreeing the process for risk assessment rather than necessarily agreeing the process for escalated risk management'.¹⁴⁸

Some legislative and policy developments since the introduction of the CRAF that have supported risk management include the following:

- ▷ increased investment by government and the non-government sector to enable women and children to stay safely at home if they choose, with legislative changes¹⁴⁹ and funding for targeted programs—for example, Safe at Home-type programs
- ▷ greater understanding of how the current privacy laws can assist or inhibit risk management
- ▷ reports from the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths—particularly highlighting situations where relevant information was available before the death but was not shared, sometimes because of legislative restrictions on the exchange of information or incompatible data systems.

In addition, a number of practical initiatives have been introduced in response to gaps in effectively managing risk. These responses have to date focused primarily on high-risk family violence cases. They include the introduction of case-management triage models involving Child Protection, family violence and family services and the inclusion of family violence workers at police stations and in police family violence teams.¹⁵⁰ These responses are discussed in Chapter 13.

Since 2007, Victoria Police has employed specialist family violence teams in areas particularly affected by family violence. The Enhanced Family Violence Service Delivery Model, announced in 2011, provided for the statewide roll-out of family violence teams, and there are now 32 teams in the state.¹⁵¹

The primary responsibilities of family violence teams are to provide an immediate specialist response to a family violence incident; to provide a secondary response unit to support primary police units; to proactively investigate and case-manage recidivist offenders, affected family members of recidivist offenders and high-risk clients; and to investigate criminal offences, including breaches of family violence intervention orders.¹⁵²

The Commission learnt that there is considerable variation in how Victoria Police family violence teams operate on the ground—including in their approaches, staffing and reporting structures.¹⁵³ Family violence teams are discussed in detail in Chapter 15.

Other important developments in multi-agency risk management have been the creation of RAMPs and local multi-agency partnerships to manage high-risk cases.

Risk Assessment and Management Panels

The pilot programs

Multi-agency, coordinated responses to women and children at imminent risk of family violence were formally introduced in 2011 with the introduction of two Strengthening Risk Management pilot projects, one in the City of Hume and the other in the City of Greater Geelong.¹⁵⁴

Drawing from models in similar jurisdictions—in particular, South Australia and the United Kingdom¹⁵⁵—the pilot projects aimed to:

- ▷ test the implementation and delivery of coordinated multi-agency approaches to strengthen family violence risk assessment and management
- ▷ trial new integrated governance arrangements, roles and responsibilities and new ways of working collaboratively
- ▷ increase the accountability of men who use violence and engage with them to change their behaviour.¹⁵⁶

Each pilot had two main components—early identification of women and children at highest risk and referral of high-risk cases to a specialist Risk Assessment and Management Panel. One RAMP coordinator, Ms Bernadette McCartney, Executive Manager, Community Support, Bethany Community Support, described the task thus:

... essentially what the RAMP do is upon the identification of a woman and her accompanying children, if that's the case, [as being] at the highest risk of being seriously injured and/or killed, they are referred into a multi-agency, multi-sector panel, which comprises ... a number of different sectors which include specialist family violence services for men and for women. Victoria Police, Corrections Victoria, in our instance, the Magistrates' Court, Child Protection, Child FIRST, Barwon Community Legal Service, Barwon Health's clinical drug and alcohol, clinical mental health and drug and alcohol services, and homelessness services and the Office of Housing.¹⁵⁷

The RAMPs involved in the pilots met monthly and as required, to share information, assess the level of risk of referred cases, and coordinate risk management action plans. Data shows that during 17 months, 55 cases involving about 90 children, were referred to 26 RAMP meetings.¹⁵⁸

The two pilots were evaluated in 2012 and 2013. The evaluation found that the pilots had achieved the primary aim of reducing risk and improving safety for women and children at highest risk, with comparatively better outcomes achieved for those women supported by RAMPs than for those supported by case management alone.¹⁵⁹ The evaluation also showed that use of RAMPs allowed for more comprehensive risk assessment and management plans, extended knowledge among important sector partners of the family violence risks, and greater coordination compared with the 'traditional' response of the family violence service system.¹⁶⁰ RAMPs led to numbers of intervention orders more than doubling and to improvements in processes aimed at keeping victims safe.¹⁶¹

The evaluation further noted that the allocation of additional case-management resources to the pilot agencies enabled higher rates of engagement with high-risk households because workers had more time to persist in making contact and engaging with women.¹⁶² The evaluation concluded that strengthened risk management was needed throughout Victoria to further protect victims at imminent risk of serious injury or death and to reduce the incidence of severe and repeated family violence. Among other things, the evaluation recommended:

- ▷ a strong authorising environment and whole-of-government commitment to risk management—including high-level multi-departmental endorsement and support, and formalised guidelines
- ▷ the establishment of RAMPs at regional and sub-regional levels across the state
- ▷ RAMPs to be constituted by members who are senior in their organisations to ensure that decision making is streamlined
- ▷ police either chairing or co-chairing RAMPs with specialist family violence services
- ▷ for each RAMP, a coordinator role that is located in specialist family violence services
- ▷ a greater focus on managing perpetrators.¹⁶³

The evaluation found that the traditional case management response for men was inappropriate for this high-risk dangerous target group,¹⁶⁴ with monitoring of the perpetrator, information sharing and collaboration with the justice system, being required areas of focus.¹⁶⁵

It pointed out that the development of memorandums of understanding and formal agreements covering the sharing of confidential information between RAMP members was challenging for both pilots.¹⁶⁶ Difficulties in developing shared understanding about which cases were 'eligible' for a RAMP were also noted. As a result, it took more than a year for the two RAMPs to reach a consensus on the definition of 'risk of serious harm or lethality'.¹⁶⁷ The evaluation cautioned that in relation to a statewide roll-out of the RAMPs:

... without clearer guidelines to differentiate high risk of serious harm or lethality, [this] would likely result in different interpretations due to the influence of individual (strong) views, time spent debating risk levels and eligibility, and possible adverse impacts on working relationships.¹⁶⁸

The evaluation recommended that an actuarial tool and framework be developed to assist with differentiating level and type of risk—not only for the purposes of the RAMP but also in a broader effort to build understanding of risk management beyond the family violence sector.¹⁶⁹ It also emphasised that the collaborative practices built within the RAMP had positive effects on communication and working relationships outside the immediate RAMP membership.¹⁷⁰

Expansion of the RAMPS

On the basis of the success of the pilot programs, in October 2014 the Department of Health and Human Services allocated $17.3 million over four years for the statewide expansion of the initiative so that there would be a RAMP in each of the 17 departmental local areas.¹⁷¹ The Commission was told that the dedicated annual funding for RAMPS amounts to between $177,500 and $285,000 per site in the statewide roll-out.¹⁷²

RAMP funding is expected to provide case-management support to approximately 816 women and their children, on the basis of one case management worker supporting 48 high-risk clients a year and each RAMP coordinator convening 12 RAMP meetings a year.¹⁷³

The Commission heard that the Department of Health and Human Services has developed a number of mechanisms for supporting the implementation of the RAMPS, among them the following:

- ▶ a memorandum of understanding across key government agencies to implement multi-agency RAMPS throughout Victoria
- ▶ local agreements between the Department of Health and Human Services (a 'RAMP Local Deed') and the lead family violence agency
- ▶ development of the Strengthening Risk Management program and operational guidelines
- ▶ operational oversight and reporting through the Department of Health and Human Services at the divisional and local area level
- ▶ oversight by the whole-of-government Family Violence Interdepartmental Committee.¹⁷⁴

The Commission understands that progress on the roll-out to date has included selecting providers, recruitment of the RAMP coordinators, developing guidelines and a memorandum of understanding between the Departments of Health and Human Services, Justice and Regulation (through Corrections Victoria) and Education and Training and Victoria Police.¹⁷⁵

The Commission also understands that the RAMP program has developed a more detailed RAMP referral tool.¹⁷⁶ The tool lists CRAF indicators, as well as other perpetrator risk factors known to affect the seriousness of risk.¹⁷⁷ Specialist training support is being provided to all RAMPS through Domestic Violence Victoria, No To Violence and Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria.¹⁷⁸

Other local multiagency partnerships for managing high-risk

In addition to RAMPS, a number of other models and approaches have been developed for dealing with victims and their children at high-risk of family violence.

The High-Risk Response Conference, Melbourne northern region¹⁷⁹

The conference is a twice-monthly police-led multi-agency information-sharing meeting to review high-risk cases.¹⁸⁰ It has reviewed 600 cases since 2013. The meetings provide 'opportunities for strong relationship building, networking and collaboration across Family Violence service delivery agencies, where there hasn't been previously'.¹⁸¹

The Repeat Police Attendance and High-Risk Program, Melbourne eastern region

Since March 2014 the Repeat Police Attendance and High-risk Program has brought together the Eastern Domestic Violence Service and Victoria Police to engage with high-risk victims of family violence via dedicated EDVOS domestic violence advocates.¹⁸² Police and EDVOS staff make joint visits to women identified as at high risk and jointly develop safety and response strategies.¹⁸³

The High-Risk Client Strategy, Melbourne western region

The High-Risk Client Strategy is a coordinated multi-agency response to managing the immediate safety and welfare needs of women identified as being at high risk of serious injury or death as a consequence of family violence.¹⁸⁴ In contrast with RAMPs, the woman concerned is always included in High-Risk Client meetings at which her situation is discussed. An evaluation of the strategy found this is a successful feature of the model.¹⁸⁵ Under the strategy, case-management services were provided for 16 women during the two-year pilot.¹⁸⁶

Risk assessment and management in other jurisdictions

In order to put the evidence it received about risk assessment and management into a broader context, the Commission reviewed risk assessment and management responses in a number of jurisdictions in Australia and internationally.

Australian initiatives

All Australian jurisdictions have some degree of integrated response to family violence (and sexual assault) and have assigned priority to and focused on different elements of risk assessment and risk management practice. Table 6.2 provides a brief overview of some of these practices.

The Commission notes that South Australia and Western Australia have common risk assessment frameworks that have been developed at the government level and that New South Wales has adopted the Domestic Violence Standard Assessment tool, which is used by police. It further notes that the Tasmanian model entails an integrated IT platform that provides for information sharing between police and family violence services and that the South Australian model is supported by a central information portal whereby all police reports of family violence incidents can be accessed and assessed for risk by multi-agency teams (MAPs) led by South Australia Police. South Australia and New South Wales also have multi-agency panels or safety meetings similar to the Victorian RAMPs.

The New South Wales trial of the family violence disclosure scheme

In 2012, following the murder of Clare Wood by her former partner who had previous convictions for family violence, the United Kingdom introduced what is referred to as 'Clare's Law'. Clare's Law allows the police to disclose information to certain members of the public about a history of violent offending by a new or existing partner if that disclosure might help protect a person from criminal abuse or harm. The scheme establishes conditions under which police may disclose this information, either on application by a person's intimate partner or a third party (such as a potential victim's parent) or unilaterally (without an application having been made). The former is characterised as a 'right to ask' and the latter as a 'right to know'.

On 6 March 2015, the New South Wales Government announced that a scheme based on Clare's Law would be implemented in NSW; on 14 October of that year, following public consultations, a model for piloting the scheme was announced.

Under the scheme:

- ▷ The 'primary person' is a person who is in or was formerly in an intimate relationship with the 'subject' and is concerned about the subject's safety.
- ▷ A 'third party' is a person who is concerned about the 'primary person'; for example, they could be a family member, a friend, a guardian or a professional working with the family.
- ▷ The 'subject' is the person in an intimate relationship with the 'primary person'. It is this person whose history of family violence and related offences may be disclosed.¹⁸⁷

The scheme will be piloted in four New South Wales Police Force local area commands from early 2016.¹⁸⁸ Either a primary person or a relevant third party can make an application at a police station in one of the four pilot areas. New South Wales Police reviews applications and conducts criminal record checks to determine whether a relevant conviction that requires a disclosure exists. A conviction will be disclosed if the subject has a relevant offence¹⁸⁹ in their criminal history.

New South Wales Police will perform a risk assessment of the primary person using the Domestic Violence Safety Assessment Tool in order to identify any threats or serious threats. If a serious threat to the life, health or safety of any person is identified as a result of the assessment, a 'fast-tracked disclosure' will be made.¹⁹⁰ If there is no relevant conviction to disclose, the primary person will be informed of the outcome. The New South Wales documentation states '[T]his should not create a false assurance and applicants will be advised that they should remain vigilant and report any future concerns'.¹⁹¹

Victoria Police supports the development of a similar register in Victoria, noting:

As a person enters into a new relationship, they are generally only aware of their partner's history based on what that person tells them. Recognising that a person may have concerns about certain attitudes or behaviours that their partner starts to display, or what they might start to hear from other sources, the Royal Commission may consider a legislative regime based on the English 'Clare's Law' ... such an initiative could break the all too common pattern of perpetrators harming successive partners and avoid exposing unwitting adults and children to known perpetrators of family violence.¹⁹²

Table 6.2 Risk assessment and management in Australian jurisdictions: a sample

System elements	South Australia	New South Wales	Tasmania	Western Australia
Common risk assessment	A domestic violence risk assessment form is used to assess high risk of serious injury or death. The form includes weightings that allow workers to calculate a risk score. Police and all government services and specialist domestic violence and homelessness services use the same form. The form was introduced as part of the state's response to high-risk cases (the Family Safety Framework).	The Domestic Violence Safety Assessment Tool. At this stage police must use the tool. Other services have the option to use their own tools or professional judgment.	Police members use a risk assessment screening tool, which was developed in 2004 and evaluated in 2009.	The Family and Domestic Violence Common Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework is a standardised approach to identifying, assessing and responding to family violence. Used by a range of government agencies and community sector services, including family and domestic violence specialist services, it was originally adapted from the Victorian CRAF and uses a structured professional judgment approach.
Type of risk assessment	The domestic violence risk assessment form is an evidence-based, actuarially scored tool; it includes victim narratives about severity, and the assessor also applies professional judgment.	The Domestic Violence Safety Assessment Tool is actuarially scored.	The risk assessment screening tool is actuarially scored.	The framework combines three elements to determine the level of risk—the victim's assessment of risk, evidence-based risk factors, and a practitioner's professional judgment. It is not an actuarial approach.
Formal referral pathway (police)	The primary entry point to domestic violence support services is the Domestic Violence Gateway, which conducts an assessment and refers to regional services. If referred by another agency such as police, information including risk level is shared.	All police Domestic Violence Safety Assessment Tool forms go electronically to a central referral point run by Victims Services. This database does an automatic sort and referral by gender and postcode every morning and diverts these referrals to the appropriate regional intake points.	Operational police use the risk assessment screen tool on attending all family violence incidents. A report is generated within the Family Violence Management System report.	Family and Domestic Violence Response Teams are a partnership between police, child protection and family support and domestic violence services. The teams aim to improve victim safety by triaging cases for prompt and early intervention following a police-call out to a domestic violence incident.
Response to high-risk (meetings)	Women and children assessed to be at high risk are referred to a local family safety meeting attended by a range of agencies and services such as police, Child Protection, victim support, health, mental health, education, drug and alcohol services, housing and women's domestic violence services. Nineteen Family Safety Meetings operate across the state and are regionalised to each Police local service area. SA Police chairs the meetings, which aim to share information under a specially developed information sharing protocol and to implement an action plan for each referral.	NSW has local Safety Action Meetings. Currently, six meetings cover nine local area commands. A further six sites will be rolled out in the first quarter of 2016. The Local Coordination Points contact clients, conduct a secondary risk assessment, provide case coordination for the client and provide secretariat support for Safety Action Meetings.	Police refer all matters to a multi-agency Integrated Case Coordination group, which provides ongoing case management. Weekly ICC meetings occur in each of the four police districts and are attended by all Safe at Home Services. All Safe at Home services have access to the Family Violence Management Systems reports, as well as the shared platform Safe at Home Management System.	Multi-agency case management is an integrated, interagency approach to supporting people at risk of injury, harm or death due to family violence. The approach involves information sharing between agencies and the development of a multi-agency safety plan to reduce identified risks. Multi-agency case management provides a platform for agencies to share information, develop comprehensive risk assessments, plan strategies to mitigate risks, and work towards child and adult victim safety and perpetrator accountability. Multi-agency case management is also important for creating transparency and accountability between agencies in relation to their roles and responsibilities in responding to family and domestic violence.

IT systems and/or platforms	South Australia has a co-located model called MAPS. All police family violence incident reports (both criminal and the 'domestic abuse' reports) are automatically uploaded overnight into MAPS. These are reviewed and assessed by the MAPS multi-agency team (police, education, child protection, corrections, housing and health). Follow-up is referred back to the regional services. Note that this is not a shared platform; rather, it is one into which other parts of the system can have input.	Police, central and local coordination points can log into a database and see all the referrals and entries that are relevant to them.	Shared information platform between police, Child Protection and family violence services. All Safe at Home services can view and input into this platform (note that these are government services). The common IT platform is accessible by all ICC members, and includes the initial Family Violence Management System report and other information on victims, children and perpetrators provided by services.	A shared database known as the Triage Application has been developed to support the operations of the Family and Domestic Violence Response Teams, including recording outcomes.
Privacy and information sharing	South Australia does not have information privacy legislation. Instead, the South Australian Cabinet has issued an administrative instruction requiring government agencies and contracted service providers to comply with a set of Information Privacy Principles. Consistent with the administrative instruction, the South Australian Ombudsman has issued Information Sharing Guidelines for Promoting Safety and Wellbeing to provide a consistent approach to information sharing where there are threats to safety and wellbeing.	The Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 was amended to insert a new part (Part 13A) to allow information sharing and improve integrated responses to domestic violence. Service providers must adopt the provisions and standards set out in a protocol to share information under Part 13A and the protocol.	Section 37 of the Family Violence Act 2004 provides that an information custodian within the meaning of the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 , acting in good faith, does not commit a breach of that Act by reason only of collecting, using, disclosing or otherwise dealing with personal information for the purpose of furthering the objects of the Family Violence Act . (Section 3 deals with the Act's objects, stating that in the administration of the Act the safety, psychological wellbeing and interests of people affected by family violence are the paramount considerations.)	Section 70A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 and regulation 15 of the Restraining Orders Regulations 1997 . Other governing documents include a bilateral schedule in place between the Department for Child Protection and Family Support, Western Australia Police and not-for-profit organisations; a memorandum of understanding on information sharing between agencies with responsibilities for preventing and responding to family and domestic violence in Western Australia; and a tripartite schedule between the Department for Child Protection and Family Support, the Department of Corrective Services and Western Australia Police—Collaboration and Exchange of Information on serious domestic violence offenders.
Feedback loops	Both the Family Safety Framework meetings and the MAPS process have follow-up and accountability mechanisms to assess if actions have been taken.	Timed alerts in the shared database send reminders if action is not taken.	Occurs via Integrated Case Coordination meetings, and cross-agency information is accessible on the shared IT platform. Feedback can and will be elevated through the multi-agency governance structure when required.

System elements	South Australia	New South Wales	Tasmania	Western Australia
Other matters	The SA model involves a standard risk assessment format with high-risk matters being referred to a Family Safety Meeting and all agencies contributing agency information to form a collaborative safety action plan to mitigate risk. The MAPs model is being reviewed by the SA Office for Women. The Domestic Violence Gateway hosts the Domestic Violence Serial Offender Database, which collates information from the regional domestic violence service to assist in identifying serial offenders to ensure accuracy of risk levels.		Integrated case coordination occurs under Safe at Home in relation to all 'active' family violence 'cases'—not just those that are high risk. Police laptops allow members to remotely generate Family Violence Management System reports and process and issue police family violence orders. Safe Families Tasmania is led by Tasmania Police, and will co-locate officers from multiple government agencies—including the Departments of Police and Emergency Management, Justice, Health and Human Services, and Education—in a single unit providing timely responses to family violence. Safe Families Tasmania will collect evidence across government to aid prosecution of offenders and support people experiencing family violence. It will also perform interagency case assessment for families experiencing family violence.	The second edition of the Common Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework was released in November 2015. It extends the original framework and includes: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ an updated policy context ▷ new information and resources to strengthen information sharing, referral pathways and collaborative case management ▷ strengthened practice guidance about engaging with and responding to perpetrators for the purpose of assessing and managing risk ▷ a modified risk assessment tool to better align with the risk assessment process, with provision made for recording of the victim's assessment of the level of risk and professional judgment.

National developments

Developing national frameworks for supporting common risk assessment practice is a recommendation in the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022.¹⁹³ It is also a recommendation of the 2010 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission report, Family Violence—A National Legal Response, particularly for the family law system.¹⁹⁴

The Royal Commission understands that recent risk assessment frameworks developed at the national level for the Federal Circuit Court were not developed in consultation with the states and make limited reference to state family violence risk assessment frameworks. The Commission received submissions that highlighted the importance of risk assessment in the family law system.¹⁹⁵ Research shows that professionals in the federal family law system do not always assess family violence risk and that lawyers do not routinely ask clients about family violence, yet they nonetheless feel confident in their ability to identify violence, as do practitioners of family dispute resolution.¹⁹⁶

There has been a significant increase in the number of reports to child protection authorities by the federal family courts—both the Federal Circuit Court of Australia and the Family Court of Australia—in the past five years (see Chapter 11). In particular, there has been a dramatic increase in the number of reports to child protection authorities from the Federal Circuit Court, which hears the majority of family law matters, since the introduction of a new ‘Notice of Risk’ form in early 2015. This is discussed in Chapter 24.

The risk assessment tool developed for use in family law systems is called DOORS—the Detection of Overall Risk Screen.¹⁹⁷ The Commission learnt that DOORS has a broad definition of ‘risk’. An evaluation of 2012 Family Law amendments found that DOORS has received a ‘mixed reception and limited take up’.¹⁹⁸ DOORS is discussed further in Chapter 24.

International risk assessment methods

The United States, Canada and the United Kingdom have developed a number of family violence risk assessment tools.¹⁹⁹ Four of them have been tested for ‘predictive validity’ in multiple research studies (see Table 6.3). Most of the risk factors used are similar for all the tools, although the way the factors are weighted to inform actuarial assessments varies.

Table 6.3 Family violence risk assessment tools and their existing strengths and limitations²⁰⁰

Tool	Description	Evaluation
Danger Assessment	Developed in the United States, the danger assessment was designed to specifically address the likelihood of death or life-threatening injury occurring in the context of intimate partner violence. It is a weighted scoring system, but the developer does not recommend cut-off scores for decision making.	One of the oldest measures still commonly used. One of the better tested tools, with acceptable internal consistency and good test-retest reliability. Further independent testing is needed, including of the measure's applicability to different cultural groups. ²⁰¹ Recommended as a good tool to use with victims since it allows them to understand their own levels of risk.
Domestic Violence Screening Inventory (DVSI and DVSI-R)	Developed and used in the United States, the DVSI was designed to be a brief risk assessment tool, to be completed alongside a criminal history review. Produces an overall score indicating likelihood of imminent risk of violence.	Uses 12 social and behavioural factors found to be statistically related to domestic violence recidivism. No independent validity studies to date. Authors have reported statistically significant predictive validity of DVSI and concurrent and predictive validity of the DVSI-R.
Ontario Domestic Assault Risk Assessment	13-item tool derived empirically from a list of potential risk factors from over 500 police files. Uses actuarial scores of risk of repeated domestic violence. Used with perpetrators, not victims. Male offenders are placed in one of seven categories of risk.	Correlated with Danger Assessment and Spousal Assault Risk Assessment. Distinguishes between recidivists and non-recidivists of wife assault. Authors caution against use for predicting lethal family violence.
Spousal Assault Risk Assessment	Developed in Canada, this is a widely used structured judgment tool, used to guide professional judgment rather than as a test in itself.	Twenty items were developed after a review of the empirical literature on wife assault and clinician's evaluations of male wife abusers. One of the few tools for which validity is supported by independent studies. Uses an inclusive definition of spousal assault. It is not limited to acts that involve injury or death, nor particular legal status of relationships or gender of victim or perpetrator. A Brief Spousal Assault Form for the Evaluation of Risk contains 10 items, designed for use within the criminal justice system.

In addition to the tools shown in Table 6.3, the Commission notes one tool specific to highlighting risks for children. In the United Kingdom, the Barnardo's Risk Matrix supplements risk assessment in cases where families are known to be experiencing family violence.²⁰² It is not an actuarial tool; it is designed to inform clinical practice and decision making, with the child as its focus. It has not been subjected to rigorous testing.²⁰³

International multi-agency approaches

The Commission reviewed developments in coordinated approaches to identifying and responding to family violence risk in other jurisdictions. In particular, developments in the United States and the United Kingdom have had a significant influence on developments in Australia. Most jurisdictions are advancing coordinated multi-agency approaches to some degree, and drawing from the lessons from coordinated community responses, such as domestic violence coordinating councils, the Duluth model in the United States, and the multi-agency risk assessment conferences in the United Kingdom.

Although many of the principles and elements of these responses are similar, a recent ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) review of multi-agency risk approaches to violence against women highlighted that the main differences between approaches relate to the formality of governance frameworks, whether the approach is supported by legislation, whether the model is supported by standard protocols, and the nature of the relationship between statutory and non-government agencies.²⁰⁴ The review also found that a challenge common to all approaches was that marginalised communities have difficulties gaining access to service systems.²⁰⁵

Multi-agency Risk Assessment Conferences

Victoria's RAMPs are broadly based on the multi-agency risk assessment conferences introduced in the United Kingdom in 2003.²⁰⁶ There are currently 250 MARACs in operation across England and Wales.²⁰⁷

MARACs comprise representatives of key organisations who meet regularly to respond to high-risk victims of family violence through the development of multi-agency safety plans. These core agencies are generally police, family violence services, health, corrections, probation, housing and children's services.²⁰⁸

Three principal roles support the operation of MARACs—the chairperson (93 per cent of MARAC chairs are police); the MARAC coordinator (providing coordination and administrative support); and independent domestic violence advocates.²⁰⁹ Advocates act as representatives for victims at meetings, and are the victims' primary point of contact.²¹⁰ Domestic Violence Victoria has called for the funding of advocate roles in Victoria.²¹¹ Family violence advocates are discussed in Chapter 8.

The MARAC uses a standardised assessment referral form (the CAADA DASH). A referral is triggered by the number of ticks on the form combined with professional judgment. The majority of MARACs meet monthly, although more frequently if required.²¹² Evaluations suggest that areas core to the MARACs' effectiveness were enhanced information sharing, appropriate agency representation and strong partnership links; and the role of the independent advisor in representing and engaging the victim in the process.²¹³ In addition, leadership through the MARAC chair and effective coordination through a MARAC coordinator were also key to effective practice.²¹⁴

Evaluations have indicated the potential of MARACs to improve victims' safety and reduce re-victimisation, noting that the findings are constrained given the evaluations have not included a control group.²¹⁵

Multi-agency Safeguarding Hubs

The Commission was also informed about multi-agency safeguarding hubs.²¹⁶ The MASH model was developed in the United Kingdom in 2011 to respond more effectively to children at risk of abuse and violence. While there are a number of different MASH models in operation, some include permanently co-located multi-disciplinary teams, with staff from child protection services, police, health, housing, and youth offending services.²¹⁷

Team members collate information from their respective agencies in order to guide the screening of all referrals of children and families. This intake system replaces intake by child protection services.²¹⁸ MASH involves an agreed process of risk assessment and dissemination of information to the appropriate agency for necessary action.²¹⁹

Information technology systems are streamlined under the MASH model. For example, in Devon a MASH partnership with a software provider led to pioneering technology, called MASHProtect, which has played a crucial role in facilitating the identification of vulnerable children.²²⁰

The confidentiality of information is maintained by designating MASH teams 'sealed intelligence hubs', with protocols applied to disseminating information outside the hub.²²¹

The Commission learnt that, although the MASH model is a screening mechanism for all child protection referrals, triage approaches that aim to filter and direct family violence referrals—particularly the large volume of notifications received from the police—are developing simultaneously in some local authorities. Stanley and Humphreys note that these triage approaches are consistent with models being trialled in the northern region of Melbourne.²²²

Challenges and opportunities

This section provides an overview of the issues commonly raised before the Commission in relation to risk assessment and management. Among the challenges identified are inconsistencies in implementation of the CRAF; gaps in the current risk assessment and management frameworks, including discussions of proposals for a new actuarial or tiered tool and whether the CRAF should be validated; and obstacles to sharing information.

Inconsistencies in applying the CRAF

The Commission was advised that the CRAF is an invaluable framework and that it has been enthusiastically adopted and applied by a range of service providers. Berry Street submitted:

It has been invaluable to have a common risk assessment framework of practice and a common risk assessment form with common evidence-based risk factors to assess risk and safety and as a tool to aid discussion with clients and other service systems. The CRAF framework provides a very clear directive that risk assessment is not implemented as a 'checklist form' but rather, a gender aware, culturally sensitive, trauma-informed engagement is necessary. When assessing a client's risk and protective factors, we need to ask questions and collaboratively find solutions. The expertise of the women experiencing violence is central to the CRAF; however, the risk factors and professional judgement of the practitioner making the assessment are all equally weighted elements. It is stressed that risk assessment is an ongoing process. The CRAF document cannot be underestimated for its significance and effectiveness.²²³

However, a number of submissions noted problems with the implementation and application of the CRAF.²²⁴

In the absence of a strong authorising and monitoring environment, some services and sectors have developed their own versions of the CRAF, which means that women who have similar risk levels can encounter different service responses according to where they live.²²⁵ Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria submitted:

... there has been a noticeable 'CRAF drift' in Victoria, where some key agencies are adapting and adopting CRAF in their own tools or procedures. DVRCV understands from training participants that some family violence services are using shortened or 'rapid risk assessment' processes and tools. This could be seen to be the result of a highly pressured system, but the potential danger is that the core features of CRAF are being watered down or used in an ad hoc way by a variety of agencies.²²⁶

The Commission heard that a further consequence of the lack of a strong authorising environment is that services' differing levels of understanding of family violence and differing approaches to assigning priority to risk assessment (which the CRAF aimed to correct), have persisted:

... for example, forensic drug and alcohol services where a male client may be referred because of involvement with the criminal justice system and may also be a perpetrator of family violence, but the training and the mandate of that drug and alcohol worker may be to be an advocate for that man as a client. So the drug and alcohol worker will seek to address the drug and alcohol issue, but not see it as relevant to address the man's use of family violence, and may actually, for example, support the man in court to contest an intervention order or may actually give a very positive report about the drug and alcohol use and ignore the fact that he is aware that there is still active family violence going on.²²⁷

As outlined, the CRAF was designed to provide risk assessment and management guidance to suit a range of professionals according to their level of engagement with victims of family violence.²²⁸ The Department of Health and Human Services advised the Commission that at present all government-funded service providers are required to use the CRAF under their service agreements.²²⁹ However, the Commission heard that there are variations in CRAF competency throughout the family violence system and that increased training for the range of professionals that may use the CRAF is needed to develop core skills and competencies relevant to their particular role.²³⁰

Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre acknowledged that there have been some efforts to 'increase competency among general practitioners, maternal and child health nurses and other professionals', but an effective response from these service providers 'relies on individual practitioners going out of their way to access this information'.²³¹ Similarly, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria submitted that applying the CRAF consistently depends 'on the retention of each trained individual and their level of motivation and skills'.²³²

The Eastern Metropolitan Region Regional Integration Committee informed the Commission:

In recent years, the CRAF's strategic intent has been squandered, with it being moved into the then Department of Human Services, which did not provide strategic whole of government leadership in the family violence area. Moreover, recent government initiatives such as the Children and Youth Area Partnerships and Services Connect not having been required to incorporate CRAF into their design and implementation, the CRAF has been vastly underutilised and is now poorly maintained and promulgated. Both initiatives lacked credible policy linkages with the family violence reform, or had any requirement for CRAF to form part of their platforms, notwithstanding the prevalence of family violence amongst the intended beneficiaries.²³³

The Commission learnt that mechanisms to ensure that the full range of services use the CRAF are insufficient²³⁴ and are not mandated.²³⁵

While awareness of CRAF has been notably effective in improving the response to family violence in many non-specialist services that formally had a haphazard approach, the use of CRAF and its application within and across sectors is inconsistent. Clear direction and operational advice is required to ensure that CRAF is truly a tool for integration.²³⁶

Managing all levels of family violence risk

Responding to high-risk family violence cases is an essential part of the risk management response, however the vast majority of women and children will not be assessed as being at high risk, will not be referred to a RAMP and will not receive intensive case management. The Commission heard that there is therefore a gap in responding to victims at lower levels of risk. This is a concern for three primary reasons:

- ▷ Risk assessment is an imprecise science and it is impossible to always predict levels of risk.
- ▷ Focusing solely on high-risk cases can create a perverse incentive to wait until risk escalates to that threshold before the required strategies are put in place.²³⁷
- ▷ Living with any level of family violence has significant cumulative negative impacts on the health and wellbeing of individuals and families.

The Commission heard that the elements of good risk management are the same at all levels of risk, and comprehensive guidelines, policies and resources to support effective risk management strategies are required.²³⁸ The need for an integrated and effective system response for all was a common theme, 'as the vast majority of those experiencing family violence will never be referred to a RAMP or receive intensive case management'.²³⁹ The Victorian Government submitted:

While it is important to strengthen the identification of family violence in a range of universal and secondary services, we also need to provide interventions that aim to prevent violence from escalating. This will include improving the capacity of professionals in a range of sectors (such as maternal and child health, family services, health services and homelessness services) to work with people experiencing family violence in a way that maintains safety and minimises the impact of violence.²⁴⁰

In the report on his inquest into the death of Luke Batty, Judge Gray emphasised that ensuring the level of risk is appropriately assessed requires clarity about organisational roles and responsibilities for risk management—in particular, the role of Victoria Police:

... reform in this area must recognise the various roles each organisation has within the system. Police officers as frontline responders are called upon to make an assessment, largely based on their operational and their practical policing experience and their training. Consequently, the risk assessment tool Victoria Police use needs to have the focus on rendering the parties safe, and ensuring that there are some effective police interventions at first instance which secure a safe outcome for all concerned, and allows Victoria Police [to be] in a position to both notify and engage its partners to ensure a more considered response.²⁴¹

Determining the level of risk with an actuarial or tiered tool

The Commission was informed that the absence of an actuarial or tiered tool to identify the level of risk makes it more difficult to achieve a consistent approach about the threshold for referral to a RAMP²⁴² and to ensure that all women and children are responded to in a consistent and timely way.²⁴³

The Commission was also told that, while the CRAF provides a summary of risk factors for victims and perpetrators, it does not present this information in a usable format that can be applied easily by a practitioner.²⁴⁴ Mr Scott Widmer, Executive Director, Service Design and Operations Division, Department of Health and Human Services, noted:

... a validated tool that weights risk to produce a risk score or otherwise inform an assessment of risk ... has the potential to be particularly useful for professionals using Practice Guide 1 or 2 who may not feel sufficiently confident to analyse risk without further guidance.²⁴⁵

The need for an actuarial tool was raised in the 2013 evaluation report of the Strengthening Risk Management project that led to the RAMP model. The evaluation supported the development of an actuarial tool within the CRAF for use by specialist family violence services:

Development of an actuarial tool, to be used in conjunction with the CRAF, could assist workers to assess (or quantify) 'highest risk' and imminence, and would support the effective roll out of the RAMPs. This approach would need to be supported by eligibility guidelines and training.²⁴⁶

The absence of such a tool in Victoria makes it more difficult to achieve a consistent approach within RAMPs, and across all RAMPs, about the threshold for referral. There are concerns that a more rigorous assessment approach, is required to support sharing of confidential information at RAMPs.²⁴⁷

As discussed, Victoria Police is about to commence a trial of an actuarial tool. The Commission was advised that actuarial tools for police could be appropriate, given that the level of demand on the system for assessing and managing family violence risks is currently overwhelming the response: 'A validated tool could assist front line police to ask appropriate questions at the FV incident and provide greater guidance for risk assessment and management'.²⁴⁸

Ms Catherine Plunkett, RAMP Development Officer from Domestic Violence Victoria, told the Commission that she was concerned about Victoria Police using an actuarial tool without a significant boost to the quality and quantity of their training in family violence risk assessment and management.²⁴⁹

While there was cautious support from agencies in relation to Victoria adopting an actuarial tool or tiered approach, the Commission also heard the need for clear safeguards if this were to be implemented, such as the need for:

- ▷ formal guidance and extensive training
- ▷ clarity about the role of the first responder's use of the tool when these responders are not specialist family violence services
- ▷ effective monitoring to manage the risk of inaccurate assessments
- ▷ oversight to ensure that the tool is not used only to identify high-risk cases or as a de facto demand management tool.²⁵⁰

Others told the Commission that the three pillars of risk assessment within the CRAF—using professional judgment, evidence-based risk indicators, and the victim's own assessment of risk—are important to maintain.²⁵¹

Gaps in the CRAF

The Commission was advised that the CRAF needs to be updated to reflect current best practice in assessing and managing risk.²⁵² Among the concerns commonly raised in the evidence presented to the Commission were the need for a greater focus on risk assessment for children and victims of family violence where the violence does not occur in an intimate partner relationship; and the need for a renewed focus on risk assessment of perpetrators.

Risk factors for children

Many inquiry participants noted the need to strengthen current practice in relation to risk assessment for children.²⁵³ The Commission heard that many service providers find it difficult to assess the risk of family violence to children and that this is inadequately accommodated in the CRAF. One reason for this difficulty is that perpetrators who are violent towards their partner often have no history of violence towards their children, and often women themselves do not believe that their children are at direct risk from the perpetrator.²⁵⁴

Domestic Violence Victoria emphasised the importance of accurately assessing the risk to children—particularly by first responders such as police:

A lack of understanding of the impact on children of family violence [victims] along with limited capacity and opportunity can lead to inadequate or inappropriate risk assessments being conducted. As a consequence the information communicated to family violence services and child protection or Child FIRST agencies [by police] may not accurately or adequately convey the full extent of a child's experience.²⁵⁵

The Australian Childhood Foundation noted in its submission that assessing risk for children should reflect the cumulative nature of harm associated with family violence, but that this is not currently the case: '[T]he service system is geared towards treating violence and abuse which occurs in the family as discrete incidents that are not cumulatively harmful to children and young people'.²⁵⁶ Ms Catherine Plunkett from Domestic Violence Victoria told the Commission that in her experience as a trainer,

... most Child Protection workers find it difficult to understand that assessing the risk to a woman is essential to understanding the risk to her children. Yet, we know that because children are dependent upon their mother, that if she is being harmed, then they are being harmed as well.²⁵⁷

Stanley and Humphreys argued that child-focused risk assessment needs to engage with mothers as partners and with men as fathers in a way that avoids collusion in claims that the violence is mutual or minimal.²⁵⁸ They further stated that risk assessment for children is an area where professional judgment is needed, rather than a validated risk assessment tool:

... the safety of children is dependent upon risks associated with the perpetrator, risk factors associated with their primary carer (usually their mothers), and the effectiveness of protective factors which surround the child.²⁵⁹

Berry Street advised the Commission that, although it routinely uses the CRAF, it had amended the aide-memoire to fill gaps to do with both children and perpetrator behaviour.²⁶⁰ In relation to children, it recommended the CRAF include additional risk indicators:

... perpetrator behaviours towards children such as physical assault of child, sexual assault of child, child injury due to attempt to intervene, threats to kill child, threat to abduct child, references to murder/suicide, sexual grooming of child, child exposed to pornography, child present during a violent incident.²⁶¹

Filicide risk

Filicide, or the killing of a child by a parent or guardian, is a form of family violence and the risk factors associated with it are pertinent to this discussion.²⁶² As noted in Chapter 25, about 27 children are killed by their parents each year in Australia.²⁶³ Research suggests that there are gendered patterns to filicide. Mothers kill their children at similar rates to fathers, however they do so in different circumstances and for different reasons.²⁶⁴ Neonaticides (the killing of a baby within the first 24 hours of life) are almost always perpetrated by mothers; retaliatory killings to punish an intimate partner are predominately perpetrated by men.²⁶⁵

Since prior family violence against the mother is a feature in most killing of children by men,²⁶⁶ knowing a woman's level of family violence risk provides important information about the potential risk of lethal harm to her children.²⁶⁷ Filicide is more likely to occur when women try to leave the relationship.²⁶⁸ A retrospective case analysis of family violence homicides showed the following:

- ▶ Paternal filicide is a rare event that is often hard to predict and prevent.
- ▶ Current research with domestic homicide review committees suggests that warning signs can be overlooked by some professionals and agencies.
- ▶ Child homicides in the context of domestic violence are often motivated by revenge against the mother for leaving the abusive relationship.
- ▶ There is a need for close coordination between family and criminal court professionals to ensure that the safety plan for a parent in these circumstances extends to the children as well.²⁶⁹

The Department of Health and Human Services stated that men with a history of intimate partner violence need to be carefully assessed during and after separation in relation to the risk of filicide, even when there has been no previous violence towards the child. Where there have been threats to kill, stalking and breaches of family violence intervention orders or Family Court orders, contact with the child should be stopped and urgent safety plans put in place. The department has also cautioned that 'a thorough assessment of the history and pattern of the violence needs to be undertaken, rather than relying on separation as a safety mechanism in itself'.²⁷⁰

As Judge Gray noted, although there is no validated risk assessment tool capable of reliably identifying whether a parent will commit filicide, there are validated tools that can predict with reasonable certainty when mothers are likely to be at risk.²⁷¹ Judge Gray recommended that children be considered at potential risk of harm if their mother is at risk:

Filicide should be considered as part of the broader phenomenon of family violence, rather than existing in a separate category. Steps taken in response to family violence are likely to reduce the frequency of its various manifestations, including filicide, however, it is by no means clear that steps taken in response to family violence generally, will necessarily reduce the incidence of filicide.²⁷²

Risk assessment of children in other jurisdictions

It is the Commission's understanding that there is no current validated risk assessment tool in Australia or internationally that specifically measures the risk to children of family violence:

This is a complex area. While all child protection departments throughout the Western world struggle with the inundation of referrals of children living with domestic violence largely, though not exclusively from police, there has not been an actuarial tool developed to regularise or create a consistent practice in this area.²⁷³

The Commission notes that the Western Australian Common Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework provides guidance in relation to the assessment of risk for children, as well as additional specific risk indicators such as the following:

- ▷ Is the adult victim pregnant or is there a new birth?
- ▷ Has the child ever been in the adult victim's arms when she/he has been attacked?
- ▷ Has the child ever tried to intervene in the violence?
- ▷ Are there child contact or residency issues and/or current Family Court proceedings?
- ▷ Are there children from a previous relationship present in the household?²⁷⁴

The first two listed risk factors were said to be indicative of an increased likelihood of an adult victim being killed.

In the United Kingdom, work done alongside the Multi-Agency Risk Assessment Conference high-risk initiative produced a checklist for identifying risks children may be living with. This is accompanied by the following caveat:

[It is not a] full risk assessment for children. The presence of children increases the wider risks of domestic violence and stepchildren are particularly at risk. If risk towards children is highlighted you should consider what referral you need to make to obtain a full assessment of the children's situation.²⁷⁵

Better risk assessment for children is also a central concern for the Family Court because of the implications for orders with unsupervised access to children and of the risk of filicide. This issue is considered in Chapter 24.

Risk factors relevant to all victims

The Commission heard that the CRAF needs to be reviewed in order to take into account the breadth of different experiences of family violence. For example, Women with Disabilities Victoria reported that the CRAF does not reflect all the risk factors experienced by women with disabilities:

Women we interviewed explained that perpetrators have tactics to use impairment-based-violence to gain power. This can be by discrediting women with cognitive impairments, tampering with medication, withholding aids, and for women with no speech it is very easy to limit what are already rare communication opportunities.²⁷⁶

Women with Disabilities Victoria reported that the lack of risk indicators specific to women with a disability in the CRAF meant that, when the Department of Health and Human Services was developing the family violence disability crisis fund, it needed to create an informal supplementary disability template for the CRAF.²⁷⁷ A further example provided to the Commission was that within disability and mental health services family violence can be perceived as 'carer burnout' and thus escape detection.²⁷⁸

Victoria has separate guidelines to prevent and respond to elder abuse, developed in 2012.²⁷⁹ These guidelines aim to facilitate closer links between the family violence and aged care sectors and to 'raise awareness of the needs of older women experiencing elder abuse as a form of family violence and to ensure appropriate service responses are available'.²⁸⁰

The Commission received evidence expressing different views about the need for a separate mechanism for assessing elder abuse:

People experiencing elder abuse and FV may display a number of similar risk factors – including dependency, social isolation, poor health and disability. There are, however, other risk factors of elder abuse – such as the accumulation of assets, reduced capacity and death of a partner – that would not necessarily be identified by the established common risk assessment framework (CRAF) for FV. The identification of accumulated assets as a risk factor of elder abuse is particularly important as it can increase vulnerability to elder financial abuse even in the absence of other risk factors.²⁸¹

Seniors Rights Victoria submitted that the existing guidance is adequate but that connections between policy and practice could be strengthened:

In Victoria, SRV believes that elder abuse can be effectively combated through existing frameworks but because of the intersection between family violence and ageing, policy making around elder abuse needs to be situated in the broader discussion about ageing and creating a society that respects the rights and needs of older people. As such, the Victorian Government must continue to take a whole-of-government approach to elder abuse.²⁸²

Research indicates that adolescent violence in the home often begins after the mother and father have separated.²⁸³ An adolescent interviewed as part of research conducted in Victoria and who was being violent towards his mother, reported that he experienced violence 'all the time ... when I was living with my dad'. When asked if he was violent in the home when his dad lived there he said, 'No, because my dad would beat me up'. It was after his mother re-partnered that he started using violence against her.²⁸⁴ This was seen to be an area in which many sectors are seeking clearer guidance and more resources:

There are no standards of practice nor practice frameworks in working with adolescent family violence. Whilst a Common Risk Assessment Framework (CRAF) exists in relation to safety in heterosexual adult family violence, there is no guidance in relation to risk assessment and safety planning with adolescent violence in the home.²⁸⁵

This issue is discussed in Chapter 23.

Victoria Police recommended that the CRAF also be amended to incorporate risk assessment indicators for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people.²⁸⁶

Validating the CRAF

The Commission heard that, although CRAF training has been evaluated, the CRAF itself has not. Further, the CRAF does not contain a validated risk assessment tool. Professor Jim Ogloff AM, Director of Psychological Services at Forensicare and Director of the Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science at Swinburne University, told the Commission that if the CRAF is to be retained:

... further work needs to be done to validate the framework. It must be evaluated and further developed so that it does what is required – provide an indication of the likelihood that family violence will be repeated and that the severity of family violence will escalate.²⁸⁷

Judge Gray also noted that the CRAF is not validated in his report on the inquest into the death of Luke Batty.²⁸⁸

Validation involves comparing and reviewing risk assessment and management processes and tools and the outcomes of assessment and management decisions over time and determining whether the processes and tools support effective decisions.²⁸⁹ Professor Ogloff said that at present only a small number of risk assessment tools have actually been validated.²⁹⁰ These are discussed in the section entitled 'International risk assessment tools'.

It can take up to 10 years to validate an assessment tool,²⁹¹ since the most reliable evaluations monitor assessments over a number of years.²⁹² The alternative is to use retrospective evaluation, which involves assessing family violence incidents that have already occurred against the indicators in a particular tool.²⁹³ There is substantially less research available about the effectiveness of family violence risk assessment tools and frameworks compared with non-family violence and sexually violent offending.²⁹⁴ A 2009 meta-analysis of sexual assault re-offending found 95 rigorous prospective studies while, in comparison, the field of intimate partner violence research had nine comparable investigations.²⁹⁵

In relation to the small number of studies and other issues relating to validation, Professor Humphreys explained that most risk assessment tools focus on male violence against female intimate partners because this form of violence is most common in homicide data and serious crime reviews.²⁹⁶ She also cited this as the reason for there being a lack of validated risk assessment tools for children: the capacity to measure predictive factors for filicide is limited because filicide is statistically rare.²⁹⁷ As noted, Judge Gray emphasised that validated tools can predict with reasonable certainty the families in which there is likely to be a recurrence of family violence and that a risk of lethality for a mother can also indicate a risk for her children.²⁹⁸

The Commission was informed that the current CRAF indicators associated with escalating risk of family violence are 'recognisable and aligned with other domestic violence [risk assessment and management] frameworks'.²⁹⁹

The inquest into the death of Luke Batty

Judge Gray released his report on the inquest into the death of Luke Batty on 28 September 2015. Judge Gray made a number of findings and recommendations relevant to risk assessment, risk management and the CRAF. In summary, he recommended ensuring that risk assessments are:

- undertaken upon notification of risk to a child;
- in writing;
- refer to previous risk assessments;
- routinely shared with relevant agencies and persons, such as protected persons named in an FVIO;
- uniform in approach while acknowledging the different legislative mandates of agencies;
- coordinated with respect to risk management and safety planning, such as RAMPs; and
- remove the practice of asking women at risk of family violence to enter into undertakings which require them to supervise or manage the behaviour of the perpetrator.³⁰⁰

Judge Gray also made findings in relation to confusion about privacy legislation and sharing information in risk assessments, flaws in the L17 system, lack of clarity about the roles of different professions assessing risk, lack of practice guidance, and the need for a comprehensive workforce development and training strategy in relation to risk assessments.³⁰¹

The Victorian Government responded to Judge Gray's report in December 2015, committed to implementing all his recommendations, and referred the report to this Royal Commission.³⁰²

Workforce training

Domestic Violence Victoria submitted that expertise in risk assessment and risk management is essential to securing the safety of women and children:

It cannot be left to the 'best efforts' of non-specialist agencies. High risk and crisis situations are not the same but can easily be confused. Women may seek housing or financial support, as symptoms of their undisclosed family violence. Though their exposure to family violence may be detected through an initial needs assessment, women at high risk are unlikely to be identified at this point as most are reluctant or unable to disclose the extent of their risk to a service provider who lacks the specialist skills and knowledge to recognise and respond to the complexity of their situation.³⁰³

The Commission was also told that a person experiencing family violence is more likely to disclose the full extent of the violence if they feel safe and supported and trust the process:

When risk assessment is conducted by interview with the woman, it should be a collaborative process done with the woman, not on the woman. This requires a relatively high level of skill and is an approach you would expect to find in specialist women's family violence services ... However, if risk assessment is conducted with a perfunctory, question and answer approach, a woman who is at high risk and has adopted a strategy of minimising the abuse in order to cope emotionally and psychologically, will often maintain that minimisation and either not disclose the most harmful abuse or decline offers of assistance. This potentially makes any intervention or risk management ineffective.³⁰⁴

Berry Street and others submitted that fully realising the benefits of the CRAF requires a comprehensive training strategy and investment to ensure that all relevant workforces are properly trained and supported in applying the framework to their decision making and action:³⁰⁵

[The CRAF] is an excellent tool. However, the funding to sustain the training on a long term basis wasn't maintained and therefore it became problematic to access. This training needs to be sustained and delivered to key professional groups annually.³⁰⁶

The Commission was informed that in the past CRAF workforce training had a positive impact and had significantly improved how professionals identified and responded to family violence.³⁰⁷ Since 2013, CRAF training has been delivered on a more ad hoc basis. The need for more training, and the lack of a specific plan for continued delivery was raised in a number of submissions.³⁰⁸ Ms McCartney told the Commission that there is a risk in high-demand sectors that, without continued training, workers will view the CRAF as something that is done once and placed in a woman's file.³⁰⁹

Noting that the CRAF's effectiveness depends on organisations developing processes, policies and procedures associated with it, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria submitted:

The delivery of CRAF training to Community Corrections staff was well received ... because trainers were able to reference the organisation's policy and procedural directions, which effectively operationalise the use of CRAF.³¹⁰

The Commission also heard that, because the CRAF 'has been the only free of charge and broadly accessible professional development in family violence issues that is available in Victoria', organisations often send workers with no previous family violence training to CRAF training.³¹¹ Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria advised the Commission that current CRAF training is an inadequate introduction to family violence, with very little information being provided about the causes, dynamics, misconceptions and impacts associated with family violence.³¹²

The Commission was also told that the CRAF should include capability benchmarks targeted at different levels of practice, roles and workforce functions.³¹³ Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria identified consistent elements needed for all professionals—for example, an understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence, knowledge of risk indicators, and knowledge and confidence to ask direct questions. It submitted that there will also be additional skills and competencies required to match different roles and functions.³¹⁴

Judge Gray made a number of recommendations relating to workforce knowledge and implementation of the CRAF. Among them he recommended that the State of Victoria:

[E]nsure all agencies operating within the integrated family violence system are sufficiently supported to provide their respective training and professional development to undertake CRAF based family violence risk assessments. Such training and professional development should include, but not be limited to, recognising, understanding; and responding to family violence. Each agency's staff should be educated in the dynamics of family violence, with specialist training provided to those employees whose primary role is to have contact with victims and perpetrators of family violence.³¹⁵

In its response to this recommendation the Victorian Government stated that it will consider training in its evaluation of the CRAF, 'including a review of implementation initiatives to ensure that these reflect best practice'. The response further states that the government 'anticipates that professional development and training, including training materials and delivery, will be revised'.³¹⁶

Risk management for perpetrators

The Commission heard that there are limited interventions available to manage the risks posed by perpetrators and that where community-based men's behaviour change programs do exist, they are insufficient or inappropriate for the risk profiles of all perpetrators. Submissions emphasised that the perpetrators who pose the highest risk of serious harm to women and children might not be suitable for these programs:

The currently offered Men's Behaviour Change programs are widely regarded as ineffective for high risk men who are treatment-resistant and show high levels of non-compliance. This problem is further complicated by the linkages between high risk family violence [and] drug and alcohol abuse, mental illness or mental disorder, and a personal history of neglect and abuse.³¹⁷

Mr Andrew Reaper, Deputy Commissioner of Corrections Victoria, gave evidence that:

[Men's behaviour change programs] can be effective in engaging low risk offenders with family violence related offences who are not eligible for a clinical intervention ... [E]vidence suggests that offence specific clinical interventions for low risk offenders can in fact increase their risk of reoffending, and as such, psych-educational/skills based programs are more suitable for this cohort.³¹⁸

The Commission was informed that 'connecting the accountability and consequences for men on MBC programs to the broader intervention system (police, courts, child protection, corrections and women's services) so that they are "held" within the broader system' is crucial to the effectiveness of these programs.³¹⁹

No To Violence submitted that there is an ongoing and urgent need to resource the community sector, share information and develop better practice in identifying and managing perpetrator risk:

... what the [men's behaviour change programs] will do with all those other 15,000, 20,000, 30,000 men is support the child protection practitioners to better engage with them or to work alongside our colleagues in community corrections to improve supervision practices which at the same time will improve facilitator practices.³²⁰

The Commission was also advised that when men's behaviour programs are used they should be funded to engage with the partners of perpetrators, to identify and respond to safety needs and to increase the likelihood that a victim's feedback about their partner's behaviour will assist with monitoring.³²¹

The Commission received a number of proposals for improving management of high-risk perpetrators. These suggestions emphasise the importance of matching perpetrator interventions to specific needs and levels of risk.³²² Among the proposals were:

- ▶ supporting information sharing with a centralised database³²³
- ▶ recognising that community-based men's case-management programs have limited effectiveness for high-risk perpetrators³²⁴
- ▶ strengthening responses from Corrections Victoria—for example, more specialist supervision on probation or parole³²⁵
- ▶ strengthening court and justice responses—for example, court-mandated perpetrator programs with appropriate penalties for non-compliance³²⁶
- ▶ linking perpetrators to programs dealing with factors that increase the likelihood they will use violence (such as substance abuse and mental ill-health)³²⁷ and integrating substance abuse programs with family violence programs.³²⁸

These proposals share the common theme that agencies need to work together to effectively manage perpetrator risk. Research shows that:

coordination and communication among agencies is ideal when possible because, in many [domestic homicide] cases, separate agencies each possessed unique and significant information with respect to lethality risk that taken together, would have painted an alarming picture with respect to the need for formal risk assessment, and safety planning.³²⁹

This is consistent with the findings and recommendations of the Victorian Coroner's Systematic Review into Family Violence-related Deaths and, more recently, the coroner's findings in relation to the death of Luke Batty.³³⁰

The Commission discusses information sharing to improve risk management, including that of high-risk perpetrators, in Chapter 7; perpetrator programs and responses are discussed in Chapter 18.

Progress of the RAMP roll-out

Concern was expressed to the Commission that the new RAMP model for assessing and managing high-risk family violence cases has been modified from its pilot form, 'which will in all likelihood diminish its impact':

Pathways for ongoing case management for women and children beyond RAMP have not been clearly articulated in the new guidelines, despite this issue being raised in evaluation reports ... RAMP funding announced in 2014 only allows for a single caseworker to manage a caseload solely of women and children who have experienced potentially lethal risk, with no clearly articulated exit plan to ongoing support. This is a significant dilution of the model.³³¹

The lack of consideration of governance arrangements in relation to RAMPs at the regional and statewide levels, was also raised with the Commission.³³² Domestic Violence Victoria submitted:

[I]t would be strategically sound to use these existing structures to build consistency of risk management across the state. We can leverage off the current governance bodies to strengthen place based service provision and provide the right platforms to consider the next steps for the state-wide high risk models under development, or indeed any initiative that has implications for any aspect of risk management.³³³

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children submitted that memorandums of understanding, agreement about databases and adequate resourcing are needed to ensure that the model meets its objective of strengthening accountability and enhancing safety for high-risk victims of family violence:

A RAMP on 'a shoe-string' is potentially dangerous as the model is designed to work with the most high-risk perpetrators where homicide, serious assault and stalking are real possibilities. Poor practice may have serious consequences.³³⁴

The Commission notes that the government has progressed work in a number of these areas.

Obstacles to sharing information about risk

It was noted in a number of submissions that improved data collection, data sharing and adequate IT systems, supported by clear information-sharing legislation, were essential to supporting coordinated, multi-agency risk management.³³⁵

The Commission was informed that sharing information increases victim safety, improves case management and coordination, reduces the need for victims to re-tell their stories, and increases the accountability of perpetrators.³³⁶

The Commission heard from the government and non-government sectors, that there have been major difficulties in relation to the capacity of current privacy legislation to support effective information-sharing arrangements.³³⁷ As the Coroners Court has consistently noted in reports on family violence deaths, information sharing is an essential strategy for comprehensive system-wide risk management.³³⁸ The Victorian Government has also advised that the current privacy legislation creates limits to information sharing by RAMPs, and that it has been working with the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection to resolve the situation and to ensure that RAMP participants can confidently share information.³³⁹

The barriers to effective information sharing in the context of the RAMPs are discussed in Chapter 7. As noted there, in view of the current legislative barriers, the Department of Health and Human Services has applied for an information-use arrangement that will permit departures from relevant privacy legislation. The approval process requires that the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection consider the agreement and prepare a report for the relevant minister or ministers. The agreement must then be approved by the relevant minister or ministers.³⁴⁰

Gaps in information required to manage perpetrator risk can have dire consequences. The Commission discusses privacy law in Chapter 7, where it makes recommendations designed to remove legislative impediments and to establish infrastructure to streamline the sharing of information.

The way forward

Family violence risk assessment and risk management is complex, and assessing the family violence risks for victims and perpetrators is a profound and significant responsibility. Too many women and children are bearing and managing the risks of family violence on their own. This is not acceptable.

The risk perpetrators pose should be assessed and managed, and services that support victims or work with perpetrators should not operate in isolation from each other. We need to take a systems approach to keeping the victims of family violence safe. This means that all agencies inside and outside the family violence system must have a shared understanding about risk assessment and management, as well as about family violence itself. They must understand that risk is dynamic and ongoing, keep the focus on the perpetrator and privilege the victim's experience and knowledge of their own levels of risk. These are core principles. A systems approach also demands that agencies share information in a timely and pro-active way and have a common approach to multi-agency risk management.

The CRAF has provided a strong basis for Victorian services to assess the risk of family violence. The initial intent of the framework was to improve understanding of the dynamics of family violence and to ensure that different sectors and services had a shared understanding of how to identify and assess risk. In recent years, however, a lack of whole-of-government guidance has diminished the CRAF's usefulness as a means of integrating service responses to family violence. The CRAF is now seen primarily as a practice tool, rather than the definitive mechanism for identifying and managing safety risks in Victoria.

There are pockets of excellence in risk assessment and risk management practice. However, we need consistency, resourcing and infrastructure statewide to support risk assessment and risk management. All victims—regardless of their level of risk or where they live—deserve a timely response that prioritises their safety and focuses on perpetrator accountability.

The CRAF should continue to provide the overarching framework for ensuring that risk assessment and management are coordinated throughout the system. In view of this, the CRAF must be improved, understood by all relevant service providers, and applied consistently. Its original intent as a framework for the entire system needs to be re-established and embedded in practice.

All service providers need to be confident about using the CRAF. This does not, however, mean that all service providers will use the same tool or ask the same questions. Instead, there needs to be a shared understanding about the nature and dynamics of family violence, what the risk factors are, how to have a conversation with a victim or a perpetrator about the risks, and what to do next—this is what the CRAF provides. For example, child protection workers will always use the Best Interests Framework, but that framework should be guided by what the CRAF tells us about family violence risk.

The message that all services—not just the family violence system—have a role in identifying and responding to family violence should be reinforced through policy, service agreements, and investment in workforce capacity and competency. Minimum standards and practice requirements for risk assessment and management, information sharing and referral are all needed to support standard practice. Accountability and monitoring of implementation of these practices will need to be included in responsibilities at each level of governance of the family violence system.

A next-generation CRAF

The Commission considers the following to be essential elements of an improved risk assessment and management framework:

- ▷ a revised CRAF that allows for risk assessment for a broader range of victims, including children, and places greater emphasis on monitoring perpetrator behaviour
- ▷ a governance process that requires and supports consistent risk assessment and management throughout government and government-funded services
- ▷ the roll-out of RAMPS as a matter of urgency
- ▷ removal of legislative impediments to information sharing and the establishment of a Central Information Point to consolidate information about perpetrators, relevant to risk.

The first three of these elements are discussed here; matters relating to the new Central Information Point and improved information sharing are discussed in Chapter 7.

The Victorian Government is currently engaged in the first stage of a comprehensive review of the CRAF in response to Judge Gray's recommendations in his report on the inquest into the death of Luke Batty.³⁴¹ The Commission welcomes this review as one of the first steps towards reforming and strengthening the family violence system. We are heartened that the review will consider the evidence that was put before the Commission and will take account of its recommendations, along with those of Judge Gray.³⁴²

The Commission considers that the CRAF is an important framework for risk assessment and risk management that incorporates overarching principles, risk assessment and screening tools, and practical guidance; much of the information included in it is consistent with the literature and evidence about effective risk assessment and management. The CRAF should be maintained and strengthened.

A review of how the information is presented, the clarity of practice guides and further information about minimum standards of assessment, may be necessary. Helpful tools such as 'ready reckoners' and fact sheets, covering areas such as information sharing, responding to perpetrators and identifying the primary aggressor, will be beneficial for many practitioners who do not specialise in family violence and who need these resources.

Further, it is essential that this review clarifies the organisational responsibilities for different sectors' use of the CRAF—for example, who should be using it and when, who should be trained in its use, and which non-family violence specific providers should be using it.

The Commission also considers the CRAF should be reviewed every three to five years to reflect the latest evidence about risk.

In relation to the 2016 review, the Commission proposes that a number of new elements be incorporated in the CRAF, as follows.

A new actuarial or tiered risk tool within the CRAF

An actuarial or tiered risk assessment tool should be developed for the CRAF as a priority. The tool will support shared understanding of family violence and consistent referral.

The Commission notes concerns about the use of actuarial tools. All practitioners using such tools should be required to participate in regular training, and their use of the tool should be monitored so that the risk of inaccurate assessments or a default to responding only to women at the highest risk, can be managed and mitigated. Fundamentally, we must not allow an actuarial tool to become a rationing device for services, including police responses. To do so would leave victims in danger and defeat the purpose of having a risk assessment process at all.

Alongside the use of empirically tested risk indicators, all risk assessments must take into account the victim's assessment of her level of risk and the practitioner's professional judgment.³⁴³ The Commission agrees with Judge Gray's recommendation that the CRAF review will need to examine whether greater weight should be given to a victim's level of fear.³⁴⁴

In addition to risk assessment tools, the CRAF needs to incorporate further practice guidance for screening family violence. Other new developments, such as online self-assessment tools that women can use to assess their own risk, should also be considered. One example of an online tool is I-DECIDE which is currently being tested by the University of Melbourne.

Consistent and aligned approaches to risk assessment for all levels of risk should also be supported by whole-of-government governance processes, as set out in Chapter 38.

Recognition of specific risks for children

The separate and unique effects of family violence on children, as well as the links between risks to women and risks to their children, are well documented. They are not, however, being translated into risk assessment and management practice.

Relationship breakdown and separation constitute a time of increased risk of filicide (killing of a child by a parent), as well as intimate partner homicide. Reviews of intimate partner and filicide deaths reveal that the risk indicators are very similar. System attention must be focused on the time of separation as a crucial point of risk for family violence. This warrants increased resourcing and a shared understanding and coordinated action throughout the family law, Child Protection, Integrated Family Services and family violence systems.

The Commission agrees with the Australian Childhood Foundation that there is 'still inadequate understanding of the impact of trauma arising from such abuse and violence on the development and functioning of children and young people.'³⁴⁵ Tools, guidance and practice responses should reflect the risk of cumulative harm of family violence for children, while also taking into account their age and developmental stage.

Resources developed by the Department of Health and Human Services, including Working with Families Where an Adult is Violent: Best Interests Case Practice Model (2014), and Assessing Children and Young People Experiencing Family Violence: A Practice Guide for Family Violence Practitioners (2013) should be supported by ongoing training and practice guidance, supervision and coaching to support their application. These resources should also provide clear links to, and align with, the revised CRAF.

The Commission is of the view that, rather than a specific risk assessment tool for children, we need a common and consistent approach to identifying and assessing the risks to children. It agrees with Professor Humphreys that this is an area where professional judgment is central: the 'problem is that the safety of children is dependent upon risks associated with the perpetrator, risk factors associated with their primary carer (usually their mothers), and the effectiveness of protective factors which surround the child'.³⁴⁶

The review of the CRAF provides an important opportunity to highlight risks to children and to incorporate evidence-based risk indicators specific to children. The Western Australian approach, reflected in its revised common risk assessment and risk management framework, appears to be an effective example.³⁴⁷

Perpetrator assessment

More comprehensive risk assessment tools and guidance for practitioners working in men's behaviour change programs are required, as well as advice on the ways in which men's behaviour change programs should engage with the family violence system in order to improve risk management.

As part of the CRAF review, the Victorian Government should review and incorporate risk assessment and management principles and guidance set out in the Framework for Comprehensive Assessment in Men's Behaviour Change Programs, developed by the (then) Department of Human Services to align with the CRAF, alongside other perpetrator risk assessment tools in use by Corrections Victoria. This should include articulation of the expected responses from different service providers, noting that these responses will vary according to service providers' roles and responsibilities. It is important to recognise that assessment of perpetrator risk requires information that goes beyond that gathered at an incident to include continuing risk assessment that captures a broader pattern of coercive and controlling behaviour.

There is also an opportunity, alongside the review of the CRAF, to develop guidelines for these programs that align with the Risk Needs Responsivity model and the Spousal Assault Risk Assessment tool used by Corrections Victoria. The evaluation of the Victoria Police actuarial tool trial, which will include Victoria Police family violence teams in the trial area also using the B-SAFER tool will also provide important information.

Non-intimate partner forms of family violence

The CRAF review should also consider the needs of different population groups and the specific barriers these groups can face.

For example, young people can be both victims of family violence and themselves use violence. The review of the CRAF should include a specific focus on young people and the risk factors associated with their victimisation or use of violence, or both. Guidance for those working with adolescents who use or experience violence should also be included as a new element of the CRAF. The evaluation of the Adolescent Violence in the Home program may inform this aspect of the CRAF review (see Chapter 23).

The CRAF review should also consider family violence risk assessment tools and guidance relevant to older people at risk of or experiencing family violence. Older people can have specific barriers to escaping family violence—for example, they can be reliant on family members or carers who use violence. Service providers as well as police and the courts need to be aware the many women have experienced continued violence from their partner for years, while others might experience it only later in life. The high rate of family violence perpetrated against older people by their children should also be taken into account.

People with disabilities can experience unique forms of violence at the hands of family members or carers—among them threats to withdraw care and controlling access to medication, mobility and transport. The CRAF review should take these factors into account, as well as perpetrators who might present a risk to people with disabilities (including paid and unpaid carers).

The Commission notes work that has already been done to contextualise the CRAF for use with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, and that this should be reviewed as part of the broader CRAF review. Early work to improve risk assessment and management approaches to working with people in culturally and linguistically diverse communities should also be considered as part of the review.

The CRAF review will need to consider the experience of different groups, as well as the practice guidance and training that will need to be developed and delivered. This is part of the broader workforce development the Commission recommends in Chapter 40.

Recommendation 1

The Victorian Government review and begin implementing the revised Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or the CRAF) [by 31 December 2017] in order to deliver a comprehensive framework that sets minimum standards and roles and responsibilities for screening, risk assessment, risk management, information sharing and referral throughout Victorian agencies. The revised framework should incorporate:

- ▷ a rating and/or weighting of risk factors to identify the risk of family violence as low, medium or high
- ▷ evidence-based risk indicators that are specific to children
- ▷ comprehensive practice guidance.

The framework should also reflect the needs of the diverse range of family violence victims and perpetrators, among them older people, people with disabilities, and people from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander, culturally and linguistically diverse and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities.

The authorising environment

The CRAF is a vital mechanism for facilitating consistent practice throughout the family violence system. It is relevant to all departments' policies and practice and their interoperability.

The Commission agrees with Judge Gray that the Victorian Government needs to ensure that all agencies operating in the system use the CRAF (or a CRAF-aligned risk assessment tool) when dealing with family violence matters.³⁴⁸ Since victims, children and perpetrators might come into contact with multiple services, all relevant agencies—including, for example, health services—should align their risk assessment practices with the CRAF.

The Commission considered mechanisms whereby government departments, police and other agencies might be supported to do this. In our view, legislative change is required to support this intent.

The Commission's proposal is that the primary legislation—the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic)—set out the relevant principles, including the use of a common risk assessment framework. The content of that framework, such as relevant roles and responsibilities, standards and practices, would then be approved by the relevant minister (or ministers) or secretary (or secretaries).³⁴⁹ This approach has the advantage that it is flexible, since the approved content (such as the CRAF) can be amended easily if there are any changes in practice.

It is also consistent with the concept, set out in Chapter 7, that 'prescribed organisations'³⁵⁰ share information when it is necessary to manage a risk to safety but when the method of determining whether this test is satisfied is not specified—although it is expected that this would be done through the CRAF or a CRAF-aligned risk assessment tool.

Even if an organisation is not formally required to use the CRAF, such organisations should be encouraged to use it because it will reflect best practice. This will contribute to the overall objective of greater alignment and consistency of practice. Further, the approved CRAF should be made publicly available—for example, on the Department of Premier and Cabinet or the Department of Health and Human Services website—so that all are able to adopt and use it.

In addition to the amendments just discussed, the Family Violence Protection Act could be amended to require departments to ensure that any service provider contracts or funding arrangements relevant to family violence oblige those providers to align their risk assessment policies, procedures, practices and tools with the CRAF as approved by the relevant minister (ministers) or secretary (secretaries). This will establish a clear expectation for the service providers and assist in ensuring consistent practice. It would not, however, capture providers who do not have a contract with or are not funded by the Victorian Government.

The Victorian Government amend the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) [within 12 months] so that it:

- ▶ empowers the relevant minister or secretary to approve a Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (and roles and responsibilities, standards and practices under it) for family violence risk assessment in Victoria
- ▶ sets out the principle that 'prescribed organisations' and agencies contracted by the Victorian Government to provide family violence services (if not otherwise prescribed organisations) are required to align their risk assessment policies, procedures, practices and tools with the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework as approved by the relevant minister or secretary.

Responsibility for the CRAF in government

At present the CRAF is the responsibility of the Department of Health and Human Services. Although the Commission recognises that placing responsibility for the CRAF with the department has enabled strong operational links with the family violence services sector, there is a need to better link the CRAF with police and justice operational practice. This will require a concerted whole-of-government effort.

Concerted effort is also needed to extend the CRAF to link to the practice of other health and human services sectors. The Statewide Family Violence Action Plan recommended in Chapter 38 will ensure strategic engagement with the CRAF at the policy and practice levels. This calls for management through whole-of-government processes and consultation.

The Commission's view is that placing the ongoing management of the CRAF with the Family Violence Unit in the Department of Premier and Cabinet will more effectively achieve this aim. It will support a whole-of-government view on the process for departments to monitor their broader responsibilities in relation to family violence risk management, as well their relevant agencies' use of the CRAF.

However, operational decisions regarding responsibility for the CRAF within the public sector are a matter for government. If the CRAF is to remain with the Department of Health and Human Services, increased resourcing and further governance arrangements will be required to ensure that it is implemented as a whole-of-government framework, as part of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan.

Investing in the workforce

The Commission was informed that to date the CRAF workforce development process has substantially contributed to understanding and capacity in relation to risk assessment and management in many sectors. But the current 'stop-start' approach to workforce development in this area is not tenable. The government's commitment of $800,000 a year for CRAF training should be increased to support the substantial demand for training and to ensure that a broad range of practitioners can receive appropriately targeted training on a continuing basis. All sectors will need to be trained in the revised CRAF and current funding levels are not sufficient for this to be done well.

A workforce development strategy should accompany the revised CRAF, targeted to different sectors and relevant to their specific roles. This should form part of and complement the industry plan the Commission recommends in Chapter 40. Many different services and people are involved in identifying and responding to the risk of family violence, each with a different role and skill set. Investing in the capacity, capability and competence of each requires a clear focus on who does what, how and when. It will be necessary to develop clear and defined competencies and skills to support practitioners. The tiered approach of Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria could be a useful framework in this regard.³⁵¹

It was stressed in evidence that training is limited in its provision of guidance on how managers should consistently implement the CRAF, as the training is more directed to front-line staff.³⁵² The Commission is of the firm view that implementing the CRAF at the organisational level cannot be left to individual workers' skill level and commitment. Organisations need to provide clear guidance in relation to organisational responsibilities, such as developing policies to respond to disclosures, and developing protocols to support referral. The Commission welcomes the Victorian Government's recognition of this in its response to Judge Gray's report into the death of Luke Batty: it has committed to building the CRAF into service agreements as a requirement of funding.³⁵³

In addition, effort, incentives and requirements for organisations to create work processes that enable practitioners to 'exercise' the CRAF as it is intended, and support them in doing so, will be important. Supervision and the availability of specialist practitioners for secondary consultation are essential to ongoing practice development.

As the Commission reiterates throughout this report, an overarching approach to building general knowledge of family violence throughout the workforce is required. At present the CRAF represents the bulk of the family violence training available in Victoria. In view of the fact that the inclusion of family violence training in pre- and in-service training will be a long-term goal, the CRAF training will need to include general information about the nature and dynamics of family violence. After the CRAF training delivery review, the CRAF workforce strategy will continue to be one of the central planks of future system reform.

Recommendation 3

The Victorian Government implement the revised Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework and develop a sustained workforce development and training strategy as part of the recommended family violence industry plan [from 1 January 2018]. The framework should provide for:

- ▷ minimum standards and core competencies to guide identifying, risk assessment and risk management practice in family violence specialist services, mainstream services and universal services
- ▷ whole-of-workforce training for priority sectors—including general practitioners and hospital, mental health, drug and alcohol, child protection, aged care and disability workers—that takes into account and aligns with their roles and standards of practice.

The Victoria Police actuarial triage trial

As noted, Victoria Police is about to begin a trial of actuarial triage and risk assessment tools in western Melbourne. The trial presents an opportunity to test how an actuarial approach can be applied to police decision making in relation to the level of specialist response required. It also offers an opportunity to test how front-line police are best equipped to accurately assess family violence risk and use the options available to them, including formal referrals and civil and criminal options.

The timing is significant here, since the trial will be under way at the same time as the CRAF review. The lessons learnt from the trial will be important considerations for the review—not least because the trial will provide an opportunity to test how the tension between the desire to manage demand related to a high-volume crime can be reconciled with the paramount requirement for victim safety. The value of the trial will lie in developing an unambiguous pathway for escalation of matters to a specialist police response. This is a sound policy aim.

The Commission notes the emphasis on the actuarial tool being used to predict the likelihood of another police call-out to the same two people—as opposed to the assessment of family violence risk per se. Although there will be many commonalities between these two events, conceptually and practically they are distinct.

This emphasis on predicting future police demand reflects the very real challenge Victoria Police faces in treating family violence as core business while also seeking a differentiated response to guide allocation of specialist family violence team resources. The Commission understands this dilemma, but it is concerned that it might lead to some unintended consequences.

Reducing the number of formal referrals

The Commission was informed that having a threshold score of four on the initial screening tool used by police members will mean that 50 per cent of all police family violence incidents will be categorised as of 'low concern'.³⁵⁴ Among other things, these cases will no longer have a full L17 assessment completed. Nor will police make a formal referral to a specialist family violence service (or Child FIRST or Child Protection) or, in the case of perpetrators, to a men's service.

It has been a central principle of the Victorian system that the police can rely on comprehensive specialist risk assessment and safety planning by a family violence service being conducted for all police referrals. This relieves the burden on police and has been a practical means of developing a more integrated and consistent response, by transferring the onus to the service system to make contact with the victim and perpetrator, rather than hoping they might do so themselves.

The past five years have seen the ratio between informal and formal referrals change for the better. There has been a much stronger emphasis on police making formal referrals. This reflects the important role police play as first responder and as a gateway to other supports.

In 2009–10 about 62 per cent of referrals for victims were informal—that is, where information is provided to the victim about services but the L17 form is not sent to a specialist service for follow-up. In 2013–14 the proportion of such referrals had dropped to about 13 per cent.³⁵⁵ The ratio between informal and formal referrals for perpetrators has also changed considerably. In 2009–10 about 65 per cent of referrals for perpetrators were informal; in 2013–14 this had dropped to about 17 per cent.³⁵⁶

Of course, this trial is taking place in only one area, and the assumption that the threshold score of four is appropriate needs to be tested. The Commission is concerned, however, that effectively reducing formal referrals to 50 per cent of cases will dramatically affect how people gain access to the family violence service system: it would reverse the intention of previous reforms to have as many victims and perpetrators as possible connected to services, with police acting as a conduit to support.

The Commission considers this a retrograde step. Managing demand should not be privileged over a comprehensive and integrated response to the full range of needs of victims. Adoption of the reforms the Commission recommends will mean the need to manage demand should be less urgent.

Quality assurance

It will also be important to monitor any unintended effects on quality assurance processes associated with the trial. As noted in Chapter 15, at present most family violence teams monitor and triage all divisional L17s. If L17s are only forwarded in 50 per cent of cases this could mean that supervisors and family violence liaison officers, who are already busy, end up having a greater quality assurance role in relation to cases that are 'screened out' of the family violence teams' remit by the triage tool—without the benefit of the information collected through a full L17 risk assessment.

Absence of administrative 'overrides'

An associated question concerns how police members will ensure that they comply with all aspects of the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence when using the triage tool. The draft tool provides an option for police attending an incident to override the score using their professional judgment in order to conduct a CRAF-consistent risk assessment, escalate the matter to the family violence team, and by inference make a formal referral.³⁵⁷

This is most welcome. Current best practice suggests that, given the changing and complex nature of family violence risk, professional judgment should always be able to override tools. It is essential to retain police discretion in this area. Since the initial screening tool is a simple one and lacks detail, the danger is that it misses family violence risk that will not score over the threshold and might diminish the required nuanced response. This could put victims and their children at further risk.

In conducting the trial Victoria Police will also need to consider whether any administrative overrides should be built in, for example a directive that when a child is present, criminal charges are contemplated, a family violence safety notice or a police-initiated family violence intervention order is required, and a full risk assessment and formal referral are made, regardless of the triage score.

In such circumstances it is likely that the attending officer would need to collect the information required to complete the amended L17 risk assessment in any case to use in the police application for a family violence intervention order or the brief of evidence for a criminal charge, or both.

Somewhat counter-intuitively, an incident for which a criminal charge or a family violence safety notice or intervention order is contemplated would not necessarily score the requisite four points using the triage tool in its current form. The Centre for Behavioural and Forensic Science, which designed the tool, has recommended against an administrative override in all cases with a criminal charge, noting that this would result in an increase of 18 per cent in referrals to the family violence team each year—‘without much improvement in the overall predictive validity of the instrument’.³⁵⁸

This gives rise to the potential for another possible unintended consequence—namely, that the scoring system is used as a shorthand way of determining which options are used under the Code of Practice. In many ways this is the aim of the tool (to guide and create priorities for action), but it also poses the risk that inexperienced police members will assume that if an incident fails to score the requisite four points that they should not pursue criminal or civil options, even when otherwise these would be available. While the requirement of Victoria Police is that the Code of Practice must be followed, the Commission is concerned that in practice, front-line police might default to not pursuing all options if the incident does not reach the threshold for a full risk assessment. Much will depend on the skill and experience of the police member attending the incident.

The Commission is confident that Family Violence Command is aware of these considerations and will sensibly examine the administrative overrides needed to comply with the Code of Practice and ensure a comprehensive and pro-active approach to policing family violence incidents throughout the trial.

An emphasis on physical violence

As noted, the definition of ‘serious family violence’ being used for the trial is frequent or physical violence.³⁵⁹ Physical family violence is equated with having a charge for a violent offence within the next 12 months.³⁶⁰ The Commission recognises that criminal charges are likely to eventuate when the violence is physical, but it also seeks to maintain and increase police members’ awareness that family violence manifests in many ways—including as emotional and financial abuse. Similarly, in regard to the threshold of ‘severe family violence’ the effect of cumulative harm—which may or may not be physical—needs to be considered. This will probably be of less concern for specialist police in family violence teams who will conduct second-tier risk assessments to determine ‘seriousness’; it will, however, be important that communications with and training of front-line police members make it very clear that non-physical family violence such as threats of physical violence, is also a priority. This goes to the broader point of the importance of training for all police members who will be using the tools in the trial.

The Commission considers it will be particularly important to train police members in identification of the primary aggressor, which as noted in Chapter 14 remains a challenge for police members who attend incidents. The triage tool requires police to check LEAP for all prior incidents, so it may assist in this regard. However, the absence of a formal referral for those who score less than four again comes into sharp relief, because the true primary aggressor is often only identified through these referrals.³⁶¹

Alignment with the CRAF review

The project summary provided to the Commission by Victoria Police notes that if the evaluation of the front-line triage tool is positive ‘new processes will be rolled out across Victoria through a change management process beginning in 2017’.³⁶² It will be important that the timing and completion of the CRAF review and any decision making by Victoria Police in relation to future L17 practices are aligned and that the implications for the family violence system as a whole are fully considered.

The trial evaluation will need to test the concerns expressed above. The capacity to audit across police stations will provide an indication of the extent of unintended consequences—including the risk of failing to pursue civil and criminal options and not exercising professional judgment when faced with a low triage score. As mentioned, the introduction of an administrative override may allay some of these concerns.

More challenging will be managing the system risks associated with not making formal referrals. This will be a highly important test for the trial and will be of great significance to the CRAF review if we are to avoid a return to a police culture in which connecting people to services was the exception rather than the rule.

The Commission suggests that consultation with and feedback be sought from specialist family violence services, expert stakeholders and victims, in connection with all elements of the trial design, testing and evaluation.

A new approach to managing perpetrators

The Commission notes that different perpetrator interventions have different objectives. Some monitor perpetrators, some support men in ceasing their use of violence, some focus on individual accountability, and some impose criminal sanctions. As a basic principle, the family violence system should be able to offer interventions tailored to the needs of each perpetrator over time. These interventions may include:

- ▷ risk assessment, access to and sharing of current and pertinent information about the danger posed by the perpetrator
- ▷ monitoring the perpetrator by using technologies such as CCTV and men’s behaviour change programs, coupled with information provided by the victim
- ▷ managing risks through civil court orders, mandatory men’s behaviour change programs, exclusion conditions, and specialist respondent workers at magistrates’ courts
- ▷ managing high-risk perpetrators by using strategies such as correctional orders including appropriate conditions, responding to accompanying risk factors (for example, through drug and alcohol and mental health programs), using RAMPs and appropriate sentencing.

All services need to strengthen their response to perpetrators in Victoria in order to keep them ‘in view’ and address the risk factors associated with their use of violence. One way this can be done is through improved information sharing between the justice, health and human services systems—as the Commission recommends.

As discussed in Chapter 18, the efficacy of interventions in managing the risks associated with an individual’s perpetration of family violence remains an area that warrants further study. The research ANROWS is doing in relation to perpetrator interventions will make an important contribution to the evidence.³⁶³

At present police and the justice system have the primary role in managing perpetrator risk. If perpetrator interventions are to be effective, strong justice responses are needed to ensure that perpetrators who continue to use violence are subject to consistent and appropriate penalties and consequences. The Commission’s recommendations in this regard are outlined in Chapters 17 and 18.

Other types of intervention that focus on monitoring and supervision—such as specialist supervision on probation or parole—also warrant consideration. Research has found that ‘monitoring and supervision appear to be of particular importance for high-risk [family violence] perpetrators’.³⁶⁴ This is discussed in Chapter 7. The Commission also proposes that the health and human services system develop stronger capacity and competencies for working with perpetrators.

Both specialist and non-specialist sectors need training and support in order to do this better. Universal community and health services should be resourced to work effectively with perpetrators, keep them in view, and to respond to specific risk factors that perpetrators may present with. Organisations that work with dangerous and often frightening men, will need to manage the risk of occupational violence as well as risks to the perpetrator’s family members.

A perpetrator register?

A register for perpetrators is being considered by other jurisdictions in Australia. The Commission is of the view that a perpetrator register scheme should not proceed in Victoria at this time for a number of reasons:

- ▷ The effect of such a scheme on increasing women’s safety has not been demonstrated.
- ▷ There has been very limited evaluation of similar schemes, although the UK scheme is being evaluated.
- ▷ Under such a scheme the onus remains on the victim to keep herself safe.
- ▷ A scheme is potentially costly.
- ▷ A scheme is usually limited to those perpetrators who have a criminal history, although this could be changed.³⁶⁵

The Commission’s main concern, however, is that having such a scheme could give women a false sense of security if a perpetrator’s name does not appear on the register, simply because he has never had contact with the police.

The Commission proposes that if there is any future consideration of such a scheme for Victoria it should take these concerns into account. The results of the New South Wales trial will be instructive.

Setting the tone for the entire response

The Commission considers that RAMPs have the potential to provide an effective mechanism for managing risks posed by perpetrators and setting the tone for the entire system’s response. It also considers that improving information sharing and shared risk management responsibility for high-risk cases should guide practice for all cases. High-risk cases should not divert attention from lower risk perpetrators whose use of violence could escalate in the absence of intervention. We should be learning from what works collectively to keep more people safe, regardless of their defined ‘level of risk’.

Strengthening Risk Assessment and Management Panels

Obstacles to roll-out

The statewide roll-out of Risk Assessment and Management Panels is an immediate priority.

A number of elements have been introduced or progressed during the Commission's term that respond to concerns and recommendations arising from the Strengthening Risk Management evaluation. Among these are a memorandum of understanding between key government agencies, local agreements, the development of formal program and operational guidelines, and oversight by the Family Violence Interdepartmental Committee. One of the main challenges the RAMP pilot programs faced was in sharing information. These challenges have continued and have greatly delayed the statewide RAMP roll-out. Removing obstacles to information sharing is an important aspect of the infrastructure required to ensure RAMP success.

Targeted workforce development is now being provided to the different sectors directly responsible for RAMP implementation. This is an essential development and, although these sectors are the priority, this training should be extended to other sectors for whom knowledge of the RAMP process is a required part of practice. Shared knowledge about required responses to high-risk family violence must be understood and implemented consistently throughout the state, with a clear relationship to broader risk management practices. This is particularly important as different regions currently have different approaches to high-risk cases as a result of having developed over time to meet urgent local needs. Throughout the training and educating in relation to the RAMPs, a central message of focus on the perpetrator, rather than the victim, will be essential.

The safety implications of changes to funding arrangements will need to be a priority focus of the RAMP evaluation. It is not clear whether the additional case-management funding provided to directly support the RAMP model is adequate. The Commission understands that the original Strengthening Risk Management evaluation found that pilot agencies' access to additional case-management resources did enable higher rates of engagement with high-risk households.

Oversight of implementation

The establishment of the two RAMP pilots was protracted and inefficient, largely as a consequence of the lack of a clear authorising environment. The Commission welcomes the fact that the current Family Violence Interdepartmental Committee has oversight of the RAMPs: ensuring efficient engagement with government agencies to resolve difficulties as they arise will be a priority. The Commission was told that the South Australian model—in which the high-risk initiative is overseen by the whole-of-government executive chaired by the lead minister—works effectively. The level of whole-of-government agency leadership and shared commitment among government and non-government agencies to implementation was highlighted to the Commission as one of the key elements of the South Australian model's success.

Ongoing high-level multi-department commitment to the implementation of risk management will be central to an effective authorising environment. RAMPs cannot be conceived as a stand-alone reform and must be related to other initiatives the Commission recommends—for example, the revised CRAF, the strengthening of risk management practice for all levels of risk, developments within the police in relation to specialisation of family violence teams, and the development of the new Support and Safety Hubs the Commission recommends in Chapter 13.

The Commission further proposes that RAMPs have clear regional governance arrangements and a clear mandate, that regional integration committees develop a regional platform for information sharing and share their experiences, and that high-level endorsement from the ministerial and departmental secretary level be secured to ensure support within divisional, regional and local contexts.³⁶⁶

The Commission considers that RAMPs will highlight the practicalities underpinning effective risk management. Ensuring strong engagement and consultation with statewide and regional governance and advisory structures throughout this process will be crucial to ensuring consistent good practice and systems fixes, rather than leaving these things to be dealt with individually (and inefficiently) by RAMPs around the state. State and regional governance arrangements will also support systems responses for all levels of risk and for all stages of people's engagement with the family violence system. Arrangements for this are set out in Chapter 38; there is a clear role for the Victorian Secretaries Board in this area.

Recommendation 4

The Victorian Government facilitate the roll-out of the Risk Assessment and Management Panels, or RAMPs, as a priority [within 12 months], ensuring that this includes:

- ▷ adequate resourcing and support—case management and links to long-term support
- ▷ standardised referral guidance, to be used by all agencies, that is aligned to the revised Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework to identify high-risk cases for referral to RAMPs
- ▷ organisational and practice guidelines for effective RAMP operation, supported by a targeted workforce development and training program
- ▷ processes for supporting oversight by Regional Family Violence Integration Committees
- ▷ implementation oversight by the Cabinet Family Violence Sub-committee and the Victorian Secretaries Board Family Violence Sub-committee.

Information sharing

The requirement that agencies collaborate and exchange information—particularly within and between health, human and justice services—is a necessary part of a coordinated family violence response and is essential for risk management at all levels of risk. The current onus is on workers to navigate systems that do not talk to each other, to share information with other individual workers with whom they are already connected, and to work within and around complex and often misunderstood privacy requirements. These shortcomings put women and children at greater risk. This is a complex area of law, and agencies need to have a clear understanding of their function and the reasons for the collection of the information.³⁶⁷

Providing greater certainty to the family violence response system in relation to its capacity to share required information is an immediate priority. The Commission recommends for legislative reform and system infrastructure—including a Central Information Point for risk information—in Chapter 7.

- 128 'Victoria Police Corporate Statistics Unit provided the CFBS researchers with data on all Family Violence Incidents (FVIs) in the 2013/14 financial year that involved a unique dyad (n=44,443). For each incident they provided data from the L17 completed at the time of the FVI in addition to historical data about the perpetrator's history of violence and family violence, and the history of family violence within the dyad. They also provided 12 months of follow-up data on any subsequent FVIs involving the same dyad': ibid 3-4.
- 129 'Additional family violence variables were created based on information held in Victoria Police databases. History of family violence was coded based on the presence of prior FVIs involving the same dyad, in addition to information about each index perpetrator's history of FVIs as either a perpetrator or AFM outside of the current dyad. Family violence recidivism was defined as any subsequent FVIs within 12 months that involved the same dyad, regardless of the identity //f the role of the two parties in the FVI': ibid 4-5.

- 172 The pilot sites were funded at $387,188. While a coordinator is funded under both models, the key difference is that the original pilots had 2.6 FTE case management resources attached to the RAMP program, while the statewide rollout reduced this to between 0.5 and 1.5 FTE but expanded the overall capacity of specialist family violence support services with an additional $2 million in 2015–16, consistent with the RAMPS evaluation: Department of Health and Human Services, 'Question 1. 349 The Commission considered the option of setting out the roles and responsibilities, standards and practices in subordinate legislation but, because this remains subject to a range of requirements and processes, empowering the relevant minister/s or secretary/s to approve this content is more flexible and efficient.

350 As discussed in Chapter 7 the particular organisations to be prescribed will need be determined by thorough analysis. The Commission's view, however, is that they should be similar to the bodies currently able to share information under Part 3.2 of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic). These bodies must be registered 'community services' and cover a wide range of social services including homelessness, health, disability, drug and alcohol and mental health services.

7 Information sharing

Introduction

Organisations within the family violence system and organisations that otherwise provide services to victims or perpetrators of family violence collect and use a wide range of personal information for a variety of purposes. Effective and appropriate sharing of that information is crucial, playing a significant role in keeping victims safe and holding perpetrators to account. The consequences when information is not shared can be catastrophic.

Despite the significant role of information sharing in responding to family violence, there are a number of barriers that mean information is not shared as effectively as it could be. Improving information-sharing practices is a vital next step in the development of Victoria's family violence system.

In this chapter the term 'information sharing' describes not only a situation in which an organisation or individual provides information to another organisation or individual. It also describes the exchange of information within organisations—for example, between different business units in a large government department. In each instance of information sharing, organisations will collect, use and disclose information.

The first section of this chapter outlines the legislation and policies that govern information sharing in Victoria. It discusses the complex legislative environment that family violence professionals must navigate and the enormous volume of legislation relevant to information sharing, including both general privacy legislation and other, subject-specific Acts that contain relevant confidentiality and secrecy provisions. Some pieces of Victorian legislation establish specific information-sharing regimes, while Commonwealth legislation is also relevant in some instances. This section then goes on to discuss obligations that fall outside legislation, such as policies and formal information-sharing arrangements (such as memorandums of understanding or protocols).

The next section of the chapter looks at the evidence heard by the Commission in relation to current information-sharing practices. The Commission received evidence that information is not, at present, routinely or systematically shared within the family violence system. This includes different agencies sharing information about perpetrator risk, men's and women's services sharing information, and sharing information with victims. Even where legislation or policy facilitates information sharing, the complexity of the legislative environment means organisations do not fully understand their obligations and are consequently reluctant to share information.

Barriers to information sharing are then examined, with the Commission identifying three key themes which affect agencies' ability, or willingness, to share information: the fact that legislation and policy governing information sharing are complex, confusing and restrictive; the lack of an information-sharing culture and leadership in regards to sharing family violence risk information; and reliance on outdated IT systems.

Finally, the Commission outlines a way forward. In relation to legislative reform, it assesses several possible options before outlining its preferred approach: to create a specific family violence information-sharing regime under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). This regime is intended to provide clear authority for prescribed organisations to share information. It outlines a number of guiding principles and design elements for the new regime. Noting that legislative change alone will not create a culture of information sharing throughout the family violence system, the Commission then recommends a means to develop an information-sharing culture, including producing guidance materials and developing an awareness campaign. The Commission also recommends the establishment of a Central Information Point, to provide up-to-date information to assist risk assessment and risk management. In relation to IT systems, the Commission recommends measures for improving outdated IT systems to enhance agencies' abilities to share information.

These recommendations support the Commission's recommendations relating to keeping the perpetrators of family violence in view and accountable. There should be a rebalancing of the way in which organisations view information sharing, to ensure that concerns about privacy do not outweigh concerns about safety. The current barriers to sharing information about perpetrators of family violence must be removed so that risks to the safety of victims can be managed.

Context

Types of information and organisations

Organisations within the family violence system and organisations that provide other services to victims or perpetrators of family violence collect and use a wide variety of personal information for a variety of purposes. This information can be about victims of family violence (including children) or perpetrators or both.¹

For example, Victoria Police provides copies of the L17 form (the family violence risk assessment and management report) to specialist family violence services after attending a family violence incident.² Victoria Police, the Department of Education and Training, the Department of Health and Human Services, and many other organisations may disclose information to Child Protection, Child FIRST or Integrated Family Services for the purpose of identifying and responding to children at risk of harm. Table 7.1 shows examples of some of the information different organisations might collect and use in the context of family violence.

Table 7.1 Information collected and used in the context of family violence³

Organisation		Information
Department of Health and Human Services (including through contracted service providers) ⁴	Specialist family violence services	Women's services	Identifying information about victims, children and perpetrators, including names, dates of birth, genograms, places of residence, employment status, cultural identities, visa status and disabilities. In addition to identifying information, services will have information about risk factors recorded on risk assessments and safety plans (including behaviour of the perpetrator and other information communicated by the victim), and current and previous case management services provided to the victim or referrals made.
		Men's services	Identifying information and risk assessments. Information about perpetrators' participation, attendance and progress in behaviour change programs, previous partners and children from other relationships, parenting status and risk factors will be more detailed.
	Child protection, Child FIRST or Integrated Family Services	Identifying information and current and previous involvement of children in care of victims or perpetrators, including age, living arrangements, contact information, and schools children attend. Details about reported concerns for safety and wellbeing of children, including in relation to family violence. Information collected during consultations and investigations. Current and previous involvement with victims or perpetrators as children or young people. Information about child protection orders.
	Mental health services	Identifying information and current and previous mental health problems of victims (including children) and perpetrators and any treatment services provided.
	Alcohol and drug treatment services	Identifying information and current and previous information about alcohol or drug use and treatment services provided to victims or perpetrators, or both.
	Housing and homelessness services	Identifying information and residency information about victims (including children) and perpetrators. Current and previous housing services responses provided.
	Health-care services (community health or hospitals)	Identifying information and health information about victims (including children) and perpetrators—for example, medical conditions, injuries, and hospital and emergency department admissions.
	Sexual assault support services	Identifying information and information about previous and current sexual assaults, investigations, support services provided and referrals made.
	Disability services	Identifying information and information about disability and current and previous disability services provided to victims (including children) or perpetrators.
Private health service providers (such as GPs)		Identifying information and health information about victims (including children) and perpetrators.
Victoria Police		Identifying information about victims, perpetrators and witnesses (including children); health information such as information about a person's mental health or use of drugs and alcohol; criminal record information, including existing commitments such as bail conditions or intervention order conditions; other information about perpetrators, including their propensity for violence, apparent drug or alcohol misuse or access to weapons, which can affect the level of risk posed by them; and information relating to court orders. ⁵
Corrections Victoria		Identifying information and what behaviour-management programs the offender has participated in while in prison or while subject to a community correction order; information relating to criminogenic risk factors for the offender, such as whether there has been an increase in substance use, unstable mental health, unemployment or homelessness, and the identity of people with whom the offender is associating. ⁶
Department of Education and Training		Identifying information and information about children and their parents, including early childhood and school enrolment and attendance data, participation in school-based programs, incident reports and referrals to other services (such as Victoria Police or Child Protection) and information collected by the Victorian Maternal and Child Health Service. ⁷

Magistrates' Court of Victoria	Identifying information, intervention orders, information contained in evidence and court documents, transcripts and audio recordings of court proceedings, ⁸ reports drafted for court proceedings, records of interactions with court staff, including risk assessments—for example, applicant and respondent support workers.
Children's Court	Identifying information and information from the Department of Health and Human Services in relation to protection applications, child protection orders, information contained in evidence and court documents, audio recordings of court proceedings, ⁹ reports drafted for court proceedings, records of interactions with court staff.
Family Court or Federal Circuit Court	Identifying information and information related to family law proceedings, including parenting and financial orders, injunctions, transcripts and audio recordings of court proceedings, expert reports drafted for court proceedings, including by family consultants, and notice of risk forms.

It appears no comprehensive assessment has been conducted to date of the types of information collected, used and disclosed by organisations responding to family violence or of important information flows within the family violence system.¹⁰ This situation is complicated by a lack of coherence about the respective roles and responsibilities of different organisations and practitioners.¹¹

The importance of sharing information

Maximising responses to family violence

Many submissions and witnesses stressed how important information sharing is to keeping victims safe.¹² Mr Scott Widmer, Executive Director, Service Design and Operations Division of the Department of Health and Human Services, gave evidence to the Commission that information sharing serves two central purposes in this context:

First, it is necessary to assess and manage the risk to a victim's safety and, in particular, to prevent or reduce the risk of further harm. This includes sharing information about perpetrators to hold them accountable for their behaviour. Secondly, information sharing through case management and the co-ordination of services assists victims to recover from family violence and perpetrators to change their behaviour.¹³

The Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (referred to as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or CRAF), provides an explanation of why information sharing is important:

Sharing information helps to ensure that victims of family violence receive support and assistance in a timely and effective manner; increases the safety of victims; and promotes accountability of perpetrators.

Sharing information between services helps to enhance protection for women and children when they are vulnerable. It also enables earlier intervention and prevention strategies to be implemented, by enhancing case management and coordination, and providing services with clearer roles and expectations for service provision.

Importantly, sharing information helps people to feel confident that their situation is understood and is being managed across a range of service providers; it also means they do not have to repeat personal and sensitive information and possibly be subjected to further trauma.¹⁴

Speaking from the perspective of a specialist family violence service, Ms Bernadette McCartney, Executive Manager of Bethany Community Support, emphasised that obtaining information about a perpetrator 'has real importance in terms of safety planning'.¹⁵

In its written submission, the Coroners Court of Victoria identified the potentially catastrophic consequences that can result when information sharing does not occur:

Assisting persons exposed to family violence (as perpetrators and/or victims) relies on detection by appropriately skilled professionals with a mandate to respond. In conducting in-depth reviews of service contacts amongst persons involved in family violence homicides, the [Coroners Court of Victoria] has identified family violence-related contacts with a number of government and non-government entities across the legal, health and community setting. In many instances important information about the occurrence of family violence was not sought and/or shared between these entities. Had the pattern and nature of contacts amongst both parties to the homicide been available to all services involved, the level and nature of risk may have been assessed differently and points of intervention may have been more clearly identified, which may have changed the outcome.¹⁶

This view was reiterated in the coronial inquest into the death of Luke Batty. In response to Ms Rosie Batty's submission that there were many 'red flags' indicating that the level of risk posed by Mr Anderson was escalating, The former State Coroner, Judge Ian Gray stated:

The point of the submission is that the system—the agencies assisting or working with Ms Batty—did not collectively, in real time, know and share and consolidate the [discrete] pieces of information applicable to her situation. This is a fundamental point. Real time updated information sharing between agencies (including Victoria Police) is a key element in a fully integrated system, and in my view, is a necessary precursor to interventions which can be taken to promote safety and save lives ...¹⁷

Judge Gray added:

Despite Ms Batty's numerous contact with the Courts, the police, the DHS, various counsellors, and her various treating medical practitioners her evidence was that she felt alone. Ms Batty's experience was that:

There seemed to be no sharing of information I had supplied or police had gathered across from Victoria Police, the Family Court, the Magistrates' Court and DHS. As all these agencies have responsibilities including protecting women and children, I would have thought they would be capable of sharing relevant information to save time, improve responses and protection.

I agree with Ms Batty that there was an absence of effective information sharing between services and there was no comprehensive family violence risk assessment undertaken and shared.¹⁸

The Victorian Government has accepted all of the recommendations made by Judge Gray, including those about information sharing.¹⁹ The Commission notes that, in response to the coroner's recommendations, the Department of Premier and Cabinet has started a review of legislative and policy impediments to sharing relevant information between agencies in relation to a person at risk of family violence. The department opened a tender process in January 2016 to select a provider to undertake the review. The selected reviewer will be required to recommend options that can be implemented by the Victorian Government to remove these impediments, but will not be required to implement any of these recommendations.²⁰

Appropriate information sharing

The Commission heard that, although information sharing is important, it must also be done appropriately because victims have a right to privacy, especially at a time when they are vulnerable.²¹ The Commissioner for Privacy and Data, Mr David Watts, submitted:

The need to identify, reduce and prevent family violence, and ensure the safety of individuals affected by family violence requires integration and coordination between various organisations. This will regularly involve the sharing of sensitive personal information. Having the ability to share the right information with the right people at the right time for the right purpose will significantly supports [sic] better outcomes by protecting those at risk.²²

In addition to infringing privacy rights, inappropriate information sharing can have negative practical consequences for victims of family violence. For example, if victims feel their information is being shared inappropriately, they might lose confidence in the family violence system. A loss of confidence or trust can limit a victim's willingness to report family violence in the first place or to seek help in the future.²³ The Commission was told that, additionally, a failure to share information properly or to protect the security of information can actually increase the risk of family violence—for example, if information is inappropriately disclosed to a perpetrator or to someone who might tell the perpetrator.²⁴

It was also noted that there is a need to strike a suitable balance between the information sharing necessary to respond to family violence and the privacy rights of both victims and perpetrators.²⁵

Current law and policy

This section outlines what the Commission was told about current legislation and policy, organisational factors and technological capacities that affect information sharing in the family violence system.

Victorian legislation

Broadly, two types of legislation govern information sharing in Victoria—default information privacy laws and subject-specific legislation that contains confidentiality or secrecy provisions or provides for specific information-sharing regimes. There are also a number of formal information-sharing arrangements and policies of relevance to family violence.

The Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) protects rights to privacy, although there is no general right to privacy at common law.²⁶ If an organisation proposes to share information about a specific individual, privacy rights must be considered. As the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection noted, however, it is clear that:

... the right to privacy does not trump the right to personal safety. Victoria's privacy laws are written to reflect that. Tragedies should not occur as a result of a misunderstanding of privacy legislation.²⁷

Information privacy

The Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection informed the Commission that 'information privacy' refers to 'the right of individuals to determine for themselves when, how, and to what extent their personal information is shared with others'.²⁸ The Privacy and Data Protection Act 2014 (Vic) and the Health Records Act 2001 (Vic) govern information privacy and are 'default legislation'; that is, they apply unless they are inconsistent with any other Act.²⁹

The Privacy and Data Protection Act applies to ‘personal information’,³⁰ whereas the Health Records Act applies to ‘health information’.³¹ The legislation does not regulate the handling of information that is already publicly available—for example, information in a telephone directory or newspaper or on a website or the published reasons of a court.³²

Despite applying to different types of information, each Act regulates the handling of information by establishing a number of privacy principles, known as Information Privacy Principles under the Privacy and Data Protection Act, and Health Privacy Principles under the Health Records Act. An organisation subject to the IPPs or HPPs must not do an act or engage in a practice that contravenes these principles.³³ The Privacy and Data Protection Act and the Health Records Act apply to ‘public sector organisations’, which includes ministers, government departments, local councils, statutory authorities, courts and tribunals (except in relation to their judicial or quasi-judicial functions), Victoria Police, hospitals, and contracted service providers.³⁴ The Health Records Act also applies to any private sector organisation that provides a health service in Victoria or collects, holds or uses health information.³⁵

Organisations subject to either or both Acts have important roles in the family violence system and in responding to family violence. With the exception of the federal courts, each organisation listed in Table 7.1 is subject to either the Privacy and Data Protection Act, or the Health Records Act, or both Acts (either directly or as a contracted service provider).³⁶

The first principle of both the IPPs and HPPs relates to collection of information, and provides that an organisation must not collect personal information unless the information is necessary for its functions or activities.³⁷ It also deals with how information can be collected, including that it must be done in a fair and lawful way and where possible, collected directly from the individual to whom the information relates.³⁸

A further key feature of appropriate information sharing is the IPP and HPP prohibition on using or disclosing information for a purpose other than the one for which the information was collected—known as the ‘primary purpose rule’.³⁹ The primary purpose for collecting the information is determined by an organisation’s overall legislated purposes and functions.⁴⁰ Mr Widmer told the Commission that an organisation’s enabling legislation will determine what information it can collect and use in order to fulfil its functions and whether disclosure of such information would be for a purpose other than the primary purpose.⁴¹

The primary purpose rule is not absolute, however. Both the Privacy and Data Protection Act and the Health Records Act permit information to be shared for a secondary purpose in a number of circumstances, including, for example, where:

- ▷ The secondary purpose is related to the primary purpose (or directly related in the case of sensitive or health information) and the individual would reasonably expect the organisation to use or disclose the information for the secondary purpose.⁴²
- ▷ The individual has consented to the use or disclosure of the information.⁴³
- ▷ The use or disclosure of the information is required or authorised by or under law.⁴⁴
- ▷ An organisation has reason to suspect that unlawful activity has been, is being or may be engaged in and uses or discloses the personal information as a necessary part of its investigation of the matter or in reporting its concerns to relevant individuals or authorities.⁴⁵
- ▷ An organisation reasonably believes that the use or disclosure of the information is reasonably necessary for specified law enforcement purposes.⁴⁶

In evidence before the Commission, the exemption to the primary purpose rule that was the subject of most comment is known as the ‘serious and imminent threat exemption’. This exemption permits an organisation to use or disclose information for a secondary purpose if ‘the organisation reasonably believes that the use or disclosure is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious and imminent threat to an individual’s life, health, safety or welfare’.⁴⁷

Under the Privacy and Data Protection Act there are also multiple exemptions from compliance with the IPPs for ‘law enforcement agencies’.⁴⁸ This means that Victoria Police, other state and territory police and federal police (and other agencies responsible for the performance of functions or activities directed at the prevention, detection, investigation, prosecution or punishment of criminal offences or breaches of a law imposing a penalty or sanction) are not required to comply with the IPPs if the law enforcement agency believes on reasonable grounds that non-compliance is necessary:

- ▶ for the purposes of one or more of its or any other law enforcement agency’s law enforcement functions or activities; or
- ▶ in connection with the conduct of proceedings commenced or about to be commenced in any court or tribunal.⁴⁹

Additionally, the Privacy and Data Protection Act contains several flexibility mechanisms that allow for departures from the IPPs if this would be in the public interest.⁵⁰ This includes the following:

- ▶ temporary public interest determinations
- ▶ public interest determinations
- ▶ information usage arrangements.⁵¹

Similarly, other mechanisms—namely, codes of practice and certification—can clarify the application of the IPPs in certain circumstances.⁵² The procedures required for organisations to take advantage of these mechanisms vary, but each involves applying to or coordinating with the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection. The Health Records Act does not contain the flexibility mechanisms included in the Privacy and Data Protection Act.

Data security

The Privacy and Data Protection Act also governs data security. Under Part 4 of the Act the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection is obliged to develop the Victorian protective data security framework for monitoring and assuring the security of ‘public sector data’.⁵³ The Commissioner may issue standards, consistent with the framework, known as ‘protective data security standards’.⁵⁴ Draft Victorian Protective Data Security Standards have been developed and are expected to come into effect in July 2016.⁵⁵ Under Standard 15, which relates to information sharing, public sector organisations are required to develop secure information-sharing practices to prevent the unauthorised sharing of public sector data.⁵⁶

The Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection has also issued standards for law enforcement data security, or SLEDS, pursuant to Part 5 of the Privacy and Data Protection Act.⁵⁷ The SLEDS apply only to Victoria Police and the Chief Statistician, along with his or her employees or consultants.⁵⁸ The Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection told the Commission:

Chapter 4 of the SLEDS applies to the release, or disclosure, of law enforcement data. Standard 11 provides that release of law enforcement data must only occur if that disclosure is authorised and Victoria Police must ensure that agreements with approved third parties include the requirement that release of law enforcement data must only occur if it is authorised. Underneath this standard, there are several protocols which represent the minimum mandatory requirements to be addressed, in order to meet each standard. Protocol 11.1 provides that users must not release any information except where the release or communication of that information is authorised by law and/or Victoria Police policy.⁵⁹

Assistant Commissioner Wendy Steendam, Information, Systems and Security Command (now Deputy Commissioner) and Senior Sergeant Ailsa Howard, Senior Supervisor, Security Incident Register, explained to the Commission that the SLEDS requirements directly affect information sharing by Victoria Police.⁶⁰

Secrecy and confidentiality provisions

Privacy legislation is only one part of the complex legislative environment family violence professionals must navigate when seeking to share information.⁶¹ In addition to information privacy and data protection legislation:

... individual pieces of legislation contain provisions that limit, restrict or prohibit the use or disclosure of information, including personal information. By virtue of section 6(1) of the [Privacy and Data Protection Act], these provisions operate to the exclusion of the [Privacy and Data Protection Act]. Typically these provisions take the form of confidentiality or secrecy provisions.⁶²

The Commission heard evidence from Mr Widmer about several of these subject-specific Acts that apply to the Department of Health and Human Services—among them are the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic); the Disability Act 2006 (Vic); the Mental Health Act 2014 (Vic); the Public Health and Wellbeing Act 2008 (Vic); the Health Services Act 1988 (Vic); and the Housing Act 1983 (Vic).⁶³

Mr Andrew Reaper, Deputy Commissioner, Offender Management, at Corrections Victoria, outlined the specific provisions of the Corrections Act 1986 (Vic) that govern the disclosure of personal or confidential information held by corrections organisations.⁶⁴ He noted that a range of other Victorian legislation—such as the Serious Sex Offender (Detention and Supervision) Act 2009 (Vic) and the Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic)—is also relevant to the disclosure of information by Corrections Victoria.⁶⁵

Assistant Commissioner Steendam and Senior Sergeant Howard explained that ‘at State level there are a number of statutes governing the way Victoria Police engages in information sharing’.⁶⁶ These include, in addition to the information privacy legislation and the Children, Youth and Families Act, the Victoria Police Act 2013 (Vic) and the Sex Offenders Registration Act 2004 (Vic).⁶⁷ Victoria Police also provided the Commission with an extensive list of those pieces of legislation that affect specific or specialised information-sharing activities undertaken by Victoria Police, or apply to discrete forms or types of law enforcement data, including among others the Coroners Act 2008 (Vic), the Crimes (Assumed Identities) Act 2004 (Vic) and the Surveillance Devices Act 1999 (Vic).⁶⁸

The Magistrates’ Court noted that it is subject to provisions governing sharing of information in the Family Violence Protection Act, while the Children’s Court is subject to similar provisions under the Children, Youth and Families Act.⁶⁹ These provisions are discussed in Chapter 16.

In addition to setting out the statutory and other functions of parts of the Department of Health and Human Services, Corrections Victoria and Victoria Police, these pieces of legislation contain specific confidentiality and secrecy provisions, that can override the IPPs and HPPs. Table 7.2 provides examples of such provisions.

Table 7.2 Victorian secrecy and confidentiality provisions relevant to family violence: some examples

Legislation	Section	Description
Mental Health Act 2014 (Vic)	346	A mental health service provider and their staff (including past and present contractors, volunteers and board members) must not disclose health information about a consumer, subject to certain exemptions. A penalty is imposed for unauthorised disclosure.
Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic)	36(5)	A community-based child and family service may consult with a number of organisations for the purpose of assessing a risk to a child or making a referral. If a service receives information through consultation, it must not disclose that information to any other person (unless it is permitted to do so under the Act). A penalty is imposed for unauthorised disclosure.
	205(2)(b)	A protective intervener (Child Protection or police officer) who is investigating the subject matter of a report must not disclose any information arising from the investigation to anyone (other than certain people listed in the Act—for example, a court). No penalty is imposed for unauthorised disclosure.
Corrections Act 1986 (Vic)	104ZZA	It is an offence for a relevant person ⁷⁰ (or someone who has previously been a relevant person) to use or disclose personal or confidential information about a prisoner unless the use or disclosure is reasonably necessary for listed reasons, including: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▶ the administration of corrections legislation ▶ law enforcement ▶ to lessen or prevent a serious and imminent risk to a person's life, health, safety or welfare or to public health ▶ with the authorisation or at the request of the relevant individual ▶ to ensure the proper care or housing of a person who is or is likely to be provided with services by or on behalf of the Department of Health and Human Services ▶ to a person included on the Victims Register in certain circumstances ▶ if the use or disclosure is specifically authorised or required by or under the Corrections Act or any other Act.⁷¹
Victoria Police Act 2013 (Vic)	227	It is a summary offence to, without reasonable excuse, gain access to, use or disclose 'police information' if it is the member's duty not to gain access to, use or disclose that information. 'Police information' is broadly defined in section 225 to mean any information that has come to the knowledge or into the possession of the member in the performance of functions or duties or the exercise of powers as a member of Victoria Police personnel or otherwise as a result of being a member of Victoria Police personnel. The maximum penalty for the offence is imprisonment for two years. A contravention of this section is also a breach of discipline. ⁷²

Information-sharing regimes

Some pieces of Victorian legislation establish specific information-sharing regimes to achieve particular purposes. For example, Part 3.2 of the Children, Youth and Families Act contains an information-sharing regime that provides for referrals, intake and assessment, family engagement and service provision where there is 'a significant concern for the wellbeing of the child'.⁷³ The legislation provides that child protection, Child FIRST and family services workers can consult a wide range of organisations for the purposes of assessing a risk to a child or determining which service should be used to assist the child or the family.⁷⁴ The Children, Youth and Families Act provides clear authorisation for collection and disclosure of information for these purposes.⁷⁵ Family violence services funded by the Department of Health and Human Services are included in the information-sharing regime.⁷⁶

Another example is the Human Services (Complex Needs) Act 2009 (Vic), which makes provision for the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to obtain personal information and health information about a person with multiple and complex needs for the purpose of developing a care plan for that person.⁷⁷ The individuals and entities authorised to disclose this information to the Secretary are set out in the Act.⁷⁸

Commonwealth legislation

Although the Privacy Act 1998 (Cth) was not the subject of extensive evidence, the Commission notes that the Privacy Act applies to information sharing in the context of family violence. The Privacy Act requires Commonwealth public sector agencies (such as Centrelink) and some private sector entities to comply with the Australian Privacy Principles, which are similar to the Information Privacy Principles under the Privacy and Data Protection Act.⁷⁹

Among the private sector organisations to which the APPs apply are individuals, bodies corporate, partnerships, and any other unincorporated associations or trusts, with an annual turnover of $3 million or more, or that provide a health service and hold health information other than in an employee record.⁸⁰ This means that many large non-government organisations working to respond to family violence, or social disadvantage more broadly, must comply with the APPs. For example, the websites of Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre and Berry Street and organisations providing a health service (such as St Vincent's Health Australia) explain that these organisations must comply with the APPs.⁸¹

Additionally, the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), the Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) and the Federal Circuit Court Rules 2001 (Cth) contain provisions governing access to court records and the disclosure of information by the Family Court and the Federal Circuit Court in relation to child protection and family violence.⁸² These provisions are discussed in Chapters 11 and 24.

In summary, the Commission heard there are a number of pieces of legislation that are potentially relevant to information sharing in the context of family violence. Restrictions on information sharing are contained in the 'default' information privacy legislation or in subject-specific legislation. Specific information-sharing regimes may also apply. As a result, organisations involved in responding to family violence (such as Victoria Police) can be subject to multiple layers of legislation, sometimes in relation to the same information.

Formal information-sharing arrangements and policies

In addition to legislation governing information sharing, organisations must take account of the requirements of various policies and formal information-sharing arrangements (such as memorandums of understanding or protocols) that apply to them. The Commission heard there are multiple information-sharing protocols and memorandums of understanding that can apply directly or indirectly in the context of family violence.⁸³

The Department of Health and Human Services has entered into at least 18 protocols or memorandums of understanding relating to information sharing in connection with family violence; it has 13 protocols with Victoria Police alone.⁸⁴ Corrections Victoria has nine memorandums of understanding and protocols in operation to facilitate relevant information sharing, including with Victoria Police and DHHS.⁸⁵

The Department of Justice and Regulation produced to the Commission a number of memorandums of understanding and protocols which govern information sharing between it and other bodies, while the Department of Education and Training identified several different protocols and guidelines that applied to it.⁸⁶

Victoria Police nominated the Family Violence Referral Protocol between the Department of Health and Human Services and Victoria Police 2015⁸⁷ (which sets out the approach to informal and formal referral pathways between police and DHHS-funded family violence services) and the Protecting Children: Protocol between Department of Human Services—Child Protection and Victoria Police⁸⁸ (which outlines permitted information exchange between Victoria Police, Child FIRST and Child Protection) as the primary documents governing the relationship between Victoria Police and other government agencies in relation to family violence.⁸⁹

Mr Widmer explained to the Commission that these types of documents, known by a variety of names, contain commitments given by agencies at the most senior level.⁹⁰ He noted that the Department of Health and Human Services has:

... set up a range of protocols that guide how that information sharing should occur and seek to explain what that mandate is and how that works in practice, but even those protocols can be challenging because at its core the legislative basis is complicated.⁹¹

The Commission understands that below these high-level protocols and memorandums of understanding sit specific policies and guidelines, which provide operational guidance for front-line workers. One family violence-related example is an information sharing fact sheet produced by the Office of Women's Policy in 2010.⁹²

Additionally, Mr Widmer told the Commission that practice in relation to information sharing is also influenced by the CRAF and the Code of Practice for Specialist Family Violence Services for Women and Children.⁹³ There appears, however, to be little explicit guidance on information sharing in the code, with only one short section dealing with 'Exchange of information'.⁹⁴ The code also advises specialist family violence workers to ask the person requesting information (for example, an employee of a government department) for the legislation that supports their request and expects these workers to be familiar with the various pieces of legislation just outlined.⁹⁵

The Commission was also referred to the No To Violence minimum standards, and extensive Victoria Police guidance material as examples of policies relevant to information management and information sharing.⁹⁶ The Commission received, however, little evidence about how such agreements operate or how policies are actually applied, both within organisations and throughout the entire family violence system.

Current information-sharing practices

The Commission heard evidence that at present, information is not routinely or systematically shared within the family violence system.⁹⁷

Information about perpetrators

A consistent theme in evidence was the lack of information sharing about perpetrators of family violence, which is said to leave victims vulnerable. Domestic Violence Victoria stated:

Family violence workers report that detailed information about perpetrators is not routinely shared between the relevant agencies. Family violence agencies often know more about the perpetrator than the police based on what the woman has told them; effective information sharing can be contingent upon personal relationships with police who will share info if there is an established positive working relationship.⁹⁸

No To Violence and the Men's Referral Service submitted:

Information related to perpetrator dangerousness is shared inconsistently between agencies responsible for managing risk, due to the lack of a strengthening risk management framework, inadequate database investment, and the siloed nature of service delivery.⁹⁹

Mr Widmer told the Commission that the sharing of information about perpetrators is likely to be limited because the primary basis for information collection under the CRAF is consent and 'in most cases seeking consent from the perpetrator is either unsafe or unfeasible, given that it may result in the escalation of risk to the victim'.¹⁰⁰ He added that this means a family violence agency would not routinely obtain the following:

- the perpetrator's criminal record and whether there are any outstanding warrants for his arrest;
- details of any prior contact the perpetrator has had with police in relation to family violence (eg previous L17 referrals);
- details of any contact the perpetrator has had with child protection or Child FIRST/ family services, including whether he had been determined to be a person responsible for harm;

- any history of drug and alcohol or mental health conditions that the perpetrator may have that is relevant to his risk of violence;
- details of any relevant court orders (such as intervention orders) that the perpetrator may be subject to or have breached in the past;
- advice from Corrections Victoria about the perpetrator if he is receiving a corrections service; and
- details of previous family violence risk assessments that have been conducted by other agencies in respect of the perpetrator.¹⁰¹

Victoria Police explained that it 'does not provide women's referral services with the perpetrator's information, nor does it provide perpetrator referral services with the victim's information'.¹⁰²

As Assistant Commissioner Steendam and Senior Sergeant Howard noted:

We are aware that victims' referral agencies are concerned that they do not receive the parts of the L17 regarding the perpetrator, which they regard as relevant for risk assessment purposes. In Victoria Police's view, this information, especially that relating to prior criminal convictions or investigations, is sensitive personal information. The disclosure of this information to referral agencies not capable of complying with the SLEDS would be a breach of the SLEDS.

Police members are adept at assessing risk arising out of criminal histories and will provide general information regarding a perpetrator's criminal history to victims' referral agencies; for example, that the perpetrator has a history of using violence. In Victoria Police's view, referral agencies can rely on Victoria Police's assessment, so far as it relates to history of violence or other relevant issues, and do not need to know the details of a perpetrator's prior criminal offending in order to conduct an effective risk assessment. The disclosure of detailed criminal histories, beyond this generalised type of information, may also be a breach of the [Privacy and Data Protection] Act.¹⁰³

Victoria Police submitted that there is a need for further exploration of the minimum information required to adequately respond to family violence:

Victoria Police recommends breaking down what is actually meant under the banner of 'information sharing' and clarifying what capabilities are required to support the effective use of information ... For us, the first step is for each agency to articulate the minimum information they require and they could contribute for the purpose of responding to family violence. It is our experience in other areas, such as responding to incidents involving people with mental health issues, that a lack of clarity about minimum information requirements can result in misperceptions about the level and type of information sought, and consequently, misapprehensions about whether that information can be released.¹⁰⁴

Victoria Police also noted that, once information is disclosed to other services, no suitable feedback loop exists and Victoria Police does not receive information about what services are being provided to victims following referral, whether those services have been accepted, and how effective those services have proved in dealing with the risk of harm.¹⁰⁵

Information sharing between men's and women's services

Bethany Community Support told the Commission that information sharing between men's and women's specialist family violence services is lacking.¹⁰⁶ Plenty Valley Community Health Service expanded on this:

... we believe that privacy regulations that prevent suitable exchange of background information between agencies should be provided with exemptions where sufficient cause exists. We believe that the same exemption should be applied so that providers of services to the perpetrator on one side, can exchange information with providers of services to victims. The present structural separation of information available from both parties can create a risk of dangerous gaps occurring in risk management.¹⁰⁷

Sharing information with victims

Information held by agencies in the family violence system may not be shared with victims unless the serious and imminent threat exemption applies.¹⁰⁸ For example, in relation to information held by Corrections Victoria:

If a victim or victim's support service seeks information from Corrections about where an offender resides, what programs they have undertaken whilst in prison or whilst subject to a community correction order, or risk related information ... Corrections is unable to disclose this information unless specifically authorised to disclose the information under the provisions of the Corrections Act ... In my experience, it is not for a victim or victim's support service to seek such information. I am not aware of any recent occasions where information of this nature has been provided to a victim. This may be due to the difficulty of the requesting party providing Corrections with information sufficient to establish a serious and imminent threat to a person's life, health, safety or welfare.¹⁰⁹

Nexus Primary Health put forward a different view:

Safety for women and children must override legislation around privacy. For example: Victoria Police are unable to inform a woman that her current partner has a history of family violence against previous partners. This is important information for women to ensure she can assess her level of safety and for her children. High risk cases (especially involving drug or alcohol addiction/mental illness) must be flagged as high risk for women and children. They must be protected from the wrath of perpetrators who fall into these categories.¹¹⁰

The evidence before the Commission suggests that the family violence system expects victims to play an active role in managing risks to their own safety and that of any children in their care.¹¹¹ It was noted, however, that a victim is unable to do this if they do not have all the information relevant to managing the risk. Several individual submissions highlighted the fact that because of privacy laws, women were not told or were unable to find out particular information (for example, about the perpetrator's visa status, conditions of parole and participation in behaviour change programs while in prison) they considered relevant to their safety.¹¹²

The need for better sharing of information with victims of family violence was a central finding arising from the inquest into the death of Luke Batty. Judge Gray said:

... Ms Batty sought to obtain information from Victoria Police about the child pornography charges [brought against Mr Anderson] and was advised they could not release any details to her. Ms Batty's evidence on this issue was:

I couldn't understand that when I wanted to protect Luke fully that I was not allowed to have access to information that enabled me to understand the risks.

I note the evidence in relation to the reasons why Ms Batty was not told about the child pornography charges by Victoria Police. I do not intend to comment on the respective police officer's reasons for not telling Ms Batty, save to say that clearer guidance should be given to police officers by Victoria Police in relation to such matters. In my view, such information should be shared. In any event, by 22 July 2013, Ms Batty knew of the child pornography charges and she acted on that information appropriately by contacting the DHS.¹¹³

Luke Batty's father (Mr Anderson) was also the respondent in an interim intervention order, which named a person he was living with, XYZ, as the protected person. XYZ sought the interim intervention order after an incident involving knife threats by Mr Anderson to XYZ. The coroner said that in his view Ms Batty 'should have been informed of that intervention order, so she could assess the risks Mr Anderson posed to her and Luke.'¹¹⁴

Victims Register

There was some evidence before the Commission that information sharing with victims of family violence can occur under the Victims Register.¹¹⁵ The Victims Support Agency administers the register, which was established under regulation 6 of the Corrections (Victims Register) Regulations 2014 (Vic) for the purpose of recording persons entitled to receive prescribed information under section 30A of the Corrections Act.¹¹⁶ The prescribed information includes the following:

- ▷ the length of an offender's prison sentence
- ▷ any changes to an offender's prison sentence
- ▷ whether an offender has escaped or died
- ▷ an offender's parole status.¹¹⁷

Victims Support Agency staff may share this information with registered victims, for example, where an offender is close to his or her release date (whether on parole or at the end of sentence).¹¹⁸ A person must, however, apply to be listed on the Victims Register: there is no automatic process of registration following the commission of a criminal act against a person.¹¹⁹

Prisoner release information

The Commission was also told that Corrections Victoria and Victoria Police share information about prisoner releases in order to develop policing responses¹²⁰ and that the Department of Health and Human Services collects information about people receiving treatment under the Mental Health Act if that information demonstrates there is a serious and imminent threat to a victim's life, safety, health or welfare.¹²¹ Such information sharing occurs on a limited, case-by-case basis, rather than systematically or proactively.¹²²

Dr Melisa Wood, Senior Clinical & Forensic Psychologist at the Victorian Institute of Forensic Mental Health (Forensicare), told the Commission that when information is shared it is not always accurate:

Information sharing between police and corrections also requires improvement, as there is a limitation on the amount of accurate information the police or the family violence teams can obtain from corrections in terms of when a perpetrator is released from prison. A list is circulated by corrections listing which perpetrators will be released per week or per month, but a specific release date is not provided. This can cause unnecessary stress and anxiety for the victim of the prisoner who is due to be released. There must be improvement in the provision of information from corrections to family violence services regarding when the associated offender is released, so that appropriate victim safety planning can occur.¹²³

Information sharing with the Magistrates' Court

The Commission heard evidence that information sharing within the Magistrates' Court and between the Magistrates' Court and other organisations in the family violence system is limited, and that information is not shared routinely or systematically.¹²⁴ Particular issues relating to information-sharing practices and courts are discussed in greater detail in Chapter 16.

Challenges around information sharing

The University of New South Wales Social Policy Research Centre notes in a recent report:

There are a number of interrelated factors that affect information sharing between organisations, including: individual agency interpretations of policy documents and legislation; governance structures; technical factors such as compatibility of computer systems; training and support; organisational structure and culture; trust, rewards, incentives and other social factors; and individuals' beliefs about information sharing.¹²⁵

Evidence before the Commission showed that the reasons for the lack of information sharing are complex and overlapping, but three important themes did emerge:

- ▶ the fact that legislation and policy governing information sharing are complex, confusing and restrictive
- ▶ the lack of an information-sharing culture and leadership
- ▶ reliance on outdated IT systems, which impedes information sharing.

Complex, confusing and restrictive legislation and policy

At present, there is no legislation that specifically authorises information sharing in the context of family violence.¹²⁶ As a result, organisations must navigate the various pieces of legislation and policy described in this chapter each time they wish to or are asked to share information.¹²⁷ The Commission received evidence from a range of sources that Victoria's legislative framework creates serious barriers to information sharing in the context of family violence.¹²⁸

The complexity of the legislative and policy framework can result in confusion and a risk-averse approach to sharing information. The Commission heard that members of Victoria Police are required to unpack issues and navigate their way through a complex set of statutory provisions, standards and guidelines that apply differently to different requests for information. The Commission was told that while members of Victoria Police receive training on information sharing, it is unnecessarily onerous to require police members to have this level of expertise and is not conducive to effective and timely information sharing. It may also lead to unnecessary caution:

Coupled with the extremely complex system of governance in relation to information sharing, this may lead to an overly cautious approach being taken to information sharing by police members.¹²⁹

Women's Health West Inc submitted that specialist family violence workers struggle when deciding whether information sharing is appropriate.¹³⁰ Domestic Violence Victoria also noted, 'There is currently some confusion and misunderstanding among the sector about what information can be shared between police, family violence agencies, child protection and Child FIRST.'¹³¹

The multiple and varying memorandums of understanding, policy documents and guidance materials (as discussed) add to the complexity when determining whether to share information between organisations. One organisation might be able to disclose the information, but the other might not be able to collect it, or vice versa. The Code of Practice for Specialist Family Violence Services for Women and Children, an example of such guidance material, expects front-line workers to have copies of various pieces of legislation accessible to them, something that directly conflicts with the view that 'service delivery workers should not have to be lawyers'.¹³²

The Commission heard that in the context of family violence, obtaining consent to share information does not present a simple answer to this complexity since seeking consent from a perpetrator is often unsafe or not feasible.¹³³ Obtaining a victim's express or implied consent or obtaining accurate and complete information from them can also be difficult because their contact with organisations often occurs at a time of acute stress.¹³⁴ Further, consent must be free, informed and tailored to the particular disclosure: it might not be appropriate, for example, to have a client sign one consent form for all services. Additionally, ensuring that consent remains current can be difficult to manage.¹³⁵

The Commission was told that the legislative context creates a barrier to information sharing because it is ill-suited to family violence risk assessment and risk management across the spectrum of risk, from the highest risk cases to those of low risk.¹³⁶ It was said that cases meeting the serious and imminent threat threshold are more straightforward in terms of information sharing, yet information privacy and confidentiality and secrecy legislation still creates complications.¹³⁷ These complications are apparent in the roll-out of the risk assessment and management panels (RAMPs). Risk assessment and management panels are discussed in detail in Chapter 6.

Case study: legislative barriers to the roll-out of RAMPs

RAMPs provide a coordinated, multi-agency risk approach and case management service to women and children at imminent risk of serious injury or death from family violence. Key agencies are brought together through monthly, or extraordinary, meetings of senior staff from the partner agencies involved. RAMP members share information, assess the level of risk for referred cases, and coordinate risk management action plans.

As noted in Chapter 6, expansion of the RAMPs beyond the initial pilot sites was announced in the May 2014 State Budget and the statewide roll-out of the program was announced in October 2014.¹³⁸ Ms Bernadette McCartney, chairperson of the Geelong RAMP, told the Commission about the benefits and importance of information sharing at RAMP meetings during the pilot phase.¹³⁹

During the public hearings the Commission heard evidence that privacy concerns had delayed the roll-out of RAMPs across the state. Professor Cathy Humphreys, Professor of Social Work at the University of Melbourne, said:

I think that in Victoria at the moment we have a situation that's highly dangerous because, whereas we were making progress in the two demonstration site risk assessment panels, now that the Privacy Commissioner has got in there to have a look at this they have decided that that level of information sharing is problematic. It may be because we are trying to bring in different people as core partners to the risk assessment panel; I'm not sure. But certainly the messages that have gone out to the sector at the moment are that, where there was sharing of information, they are now stopping it. That's highly dangerous. I think it's very problematic, the situation we are in at the moment, and it's also stopped the development of the RAMPs at the moment.¹⁴⁰

The Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection denied that his office was the source of any delay and said he had not taken any action to inhibit information sharing in such programs.¹⁴¹

It is evident that the Department of Health and Human Services has concerns about the RAMP program breaching the information privacy legislation and other confidentiality and secrecy provisions. Mr Widmer explained that, although information sharing at a RAMP is based on consent (where possible) and the serious and imminent threat exemption, the model does have limits.¹⁴²

A significant restriction on the operation of RAMPs is that agencies at RAMP meetings are currently unable to record information about a perpetrator's criminal history without the perpetrator's consent. The Commission notes that in some cases, Information Privacy Principle 10 permits the collection of 'sensitive information' (including criminal records) without consent, including where the collection is necessary to prevent or lessen a serious and imminent threat to life or health in circumstances where the individual concerned is incapable of giving consent.

Given that RAMPS rely on the serious and imminent threat exemption, information that is not strictly relevant to preventing or lessening the threat but that could nonetheless be relevant for appropriate responses would not fall within the exemption and cannot be shared. Further, if the RAMP meeting actually achieves its objective of mitigating the risk, the information might not be within the exemption threshold such that information sharing must cease. As a result, once a case is referred, RAMP partners must constantly monitor risk levels in relation to information privacy and other legislation.

While all RAMP meetings involve multilateral information sharing, the information privacy legislation is drafted with a focus on bilateral information sharing. Further, restrictions can differ depending on who is disclosing the information to whom, as the agencies may be subject to different IPPs, HPPs and secrecy and confidentiality provisions in different pieces of legislation, depending on their function and purpose. This adds to confusion about what can be discussed and recorded at a RAMP meeting.¹⁴³

Other barriers identified by the Department of Health and Human Services and the Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner include:

- ▶ Organisations that collect personal information from individuals are required to inform them of certain things, including to whom the organisation usually discloses such information.¹⁴⁴ This would include disclosure at a RAMP meeting. Victims of family violence may be deterred from seeking out services in circumstances where they fear that the information could become known to the perpetrator.
- ▶ Organisations that collect personal information about an individual from someone else must take reasonable steps to inform the individual, among other things, of the purpose for which the information is collected, other than in circumstances when this would pose a serious threat to the health or safety of any individual.¹⁴⁵ There is a risk that representatives of organisations attending a RAMP meeting could rely on this serious threat exception in error. There might also be concerns associated with collecting third-party information tied to a RAMP case—for example, information about a victim's parents, neighbours or new partner, who would not be given notice about such collection.
- ▶ People attending RAMP meetings might also rely on the serious and imminent threat exemption in error, which would make information sharing unlawful.
- ▶ Organisations may use or disclose personal information in circumstances where the organisation reasonably believes that this is necessary to lessen or prevent a serious and imminent threat to an individual's health or safety.¹⁴⁶ However, more stringent requirements are imposed on certain specified groups of people, including Corrections Victoria staff, as information can only be used or disclosed where there is an actual imminent threat, rather than a reasonable belief that there is a threat.¹⁴⁷

In view of these barriers, the Department of Health and Human Services informed the Commission during the hearings that it had undertaken to apply for an information usage arrangement, or IUA, from the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection, that will permit departures from the IPPs and other 'information handling' provisions.¹⁴⁸

Information usage arrangements

An IUA is an arrangement that allows for a modification of, or exemption from, an Information Privacy Principle (other than IPP 4 or 6). The IUA may also permit handling of personal information as permitted or required by law or under another Act.¹⁴⁹ An IUA must include detailed information about, among other things, the parties to the arrangement, the information to be handled under the arrangement, how the arrangement will facilitate the public purpose, and the actions a party or organisation may take under the arrangement.¹⁵⁰

Seeking approval for an IUA is a two-stage process. First, a lead party (which, in the case of RAMPs, is the Department of Health and Human Services) must submit the IUA to the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection. The commissioner must consider the public interest in the proposal and prepare a report for the relevant minister or ministers against defined public interest tests (set out in the Privacy and Data Protection Act) and, where appropriate, certify that those tests are met.¹⁵¹ Second, the relevant minister or ministers may approve the IUA after receiving the commissioner's certificate.¹⁵²

On 24 December 2015, the Department of Health and Human Services submitted an IUA to the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection for approval.¹⁵³ Although there is no formally established procedure for applying for an IUA, the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection required the department to complete a privacy impact assessment and a human rights impact assessment of the RAMP program as part of the application.¹⁵⁴ The Commission notes that the IUA application process for RAMPs has entailed extensive legal advice and correspondence with the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection. Further advice, consultation and reporting will also be needed in order to receive ministerial approval.

If executed, the RAMP IUA will be the first of its kind in Victoria.¹⁵⁵

Beyond the highest risk cases, such as those dealt with by RAMPs, the difficulties posed by the legislative framework for information sharing become even more complex. In these cases it is almost always unclear whether decision makers can rely on the serious and imminent threat exemption. In relation to the exemption, Mr Widmer explained:

... many family violence cases will not meet this threshold. This is because requiring the threat to be both 'serious' and 'imminent' sets a high bar. In particular, whether a threat is 'imminent' can be uncertain and difficult to establish in the dynamic context of family violence. In addition, while the evidence of 'imminence' may be unclear, the threat can nevertheless be serious and a victim placed at real risk.

Mr Widmer told the Commission that this high bar may prevent information sharing that would facilitate early intervention in family violence situations, as risks cannot be identified and appropriate service responses implemented until the threat becomes imminent. It is also difficult for practitioners to establish whether there is a 'serious and imminent threat' without relevant information about the perpetrator.¹⁵⁶

Assistant Commissioner Steendam and Senior Sergeant Howard also highlighted the problem:

Outside of high risk cases ... a grey area arises regarding risk assessment and risk management. The initial assessment of risk may require information sharing before a serious or imminent threat can be established; effective risk management may require information sharing in cases where the risk to a person does not constitute a serious or imminent threat on the basis of the available information; and the degree and imminence of a person's risk of family violence is also dynamic.¹⁵⁷

Assistant Commissioner Steendam elaborated on this during the Commission's public hearings, noting that in circumstances of ambiguity many members of the police will not disclose information, including because of requirements in the Victoria Police Act relating to information sharing and the disciplinary consequences that can be imposed for breaches of this Act.¹⁵⁸

The Commission notes that the interplay between the serious and imminent threat exemption and subject-specific confidentiality or secrecy provisions poses difficulties for a number of agencies and individuals, among them corrections, mental health practitioners, and child protection.¹⁵⁹ In relation to Child Protection, the Commission heard that 'the complexity of information sharing provisions in the [Children, Youth and Families Act] can lead to confusion and difficulty for practitioners in complying with the legislation'.¹⁶⁰ Specifically, the Commission heard that secrecy and confidentiality provisions, including relating to the content of protective intervener reports,¹⁶¹ may mean that Child Protection does not disclose information which may be relevant for risk assessment to specialist family violence agencies or other relevant organisations.¹⁶²

In summary, the Commission heard that the current legislative and policy framework in Victoria presents serious challenges for the efficient, effective and timely sharing of information in connection with family violence.

Lack of proactive information sharing

The Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection advised the Commission that merely removing perceived barriers will not ensure that information will be shared:

In short, my experience is that there are many reasons why individuals refrain from sharing information. These include:

- a general reluctance to share information;
- an overly legalistic approach to information sharing;
- professional or ethical obligations of confidentiality; and
- concerns about sharing information in breach of their legislative obligations.

A culture of information sharing requires a willingness by public sector organisations to engage for a common purpose.¹⁶³

He went on to say:

One of the things that I have noticed as a privacy adviser, as a lawyer in departments, but also as Commissioner, is how different perspectives of risk within the public sector can just simply stop information sharing taking place and positions become entrenched, incredibly difficult to unravel.¹⁶⁴

The University of New South Wales Social Policy Research Centre's recent literature review identified a number of organisational factors that can inhibit or enable information sharing.¹⁶⁵ These are summarised in Table 7.3.

Table 7.3 Organisational barriers to and enablers of information sharing

Enablers	Barriers
Agreement on aims and agendas between organisations	Differing aims, values, agendas and goals
Senior leadership actively promoting organisational coordination and information sharing	Lack of clarity about decision-making authority within agencies for information sharing
Workforce development that includes training in when to share information, that redresses barriers and concerns, and that develops shared understanding of basic assumptions, expectations, terms and concepts	Lack of clear policies or protocols for sharing information with others
Efforts to develop the trust and knowledge of other organisations	Mistrust between organisational groups or organisations
Adequate protections for personal data, leading to increased trust	Lack of knowledge and understanding about the interventions provided by other agencies (and thus with whom information should be shared)
Staff having a clear understanding of the benefits of information sharing	Perceptions that information sharing is difficult and time-consuming because of unfamiliarity with legislation and protocols for information exchange
Organisational structures where responsibilities for information exchange are clear and where there are structured links with other organisations	Organisational self-interest, resulting in an aversion to information sharing

Source: Based on Michael Keeley et al, 'Opportunities for Information Sharing: Case Studies' (Social Policy Research Centre, 2015).

The Commission heard that there is a general culture of risk aversion rather than proactive and coordinated information sharing, throughout the family violence system. Pockets of good practice, based on local relationships, do occur, but no overall authorising environment exists and there is a lack of leadership specifically related to information sharing. For example, Mr Widmer stated:

... anecdotally this Commission has heard lots of evidence of people acting in a risk averse way where they are unsure of whether they should or can share information, [and] may choose not to, in order to be risk averse ...¹⁶⁶

The Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner submitted:

... our experience is that many Victorian public sector organisations have failed to properly operationalise their privacy, or other information obligations, including record-keeping obligations. Sometimes, this is attributable to them taking an excessively legalistic and risk-averse approach to information obligations. High quality service responses to family violence issues need to be supported by high quality information sharing process and procedure, training and support so that front line workers can make decisions confidently and consistently.¹⁶⁷

Assistant Commissioner Steendam and Senior Sergeant Howard informed the Commission that major practical and cultural barriers to information sharing exist throughout the entire family violence system.¹⁶⁸ Similarly, the Maternal Child Health Nurse Network identified cultural barriers, stating there is a reluctance to share information between agencies that could help prevent violence, something that is a source of increasing frustration for MCH nurses.¹⁶⁹

Quantum Support Services Inc. submitted that:

... the implementation of privacy legislation has resulted in some organisations and government departments not appropriately sharing information and coordinating with others in the sector through fear of breaching their obligations.¹⁷⁰

Bethany Community Support highlighted the need for greater guidance on permitted information sharing, along with the potential for legislative change to prompt practice changes:

One of the key barriers that Bethany sees in relation to information sharing is a general lack of understanding about what information can or cannot be shared. There is a sense that people working across agencies may be afraid of crossing boundaries when it comes to the sharing of information. There is a need for all those working across the family violence system to have clear guidelines around when, how and why information should be shared and the importance of confidentiality and privacy ...¹⁷¹

With the exception of the statewide roll-out of RAMPs (which is yet to occur), the Commission is not aware of the existence of any formal whole-of-government leadership or governance arrangements focusing on improving information sharing in the family violence context.

The Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner explained some of his recent efforts to provide leadership in connection with information sharing more generally, targeting senior levels of the public sector:

I have jointly convened with deputy secretary levels an information sharing forum to address at a senior level what the information sharing barriers are across government. So that consists of DPC ... DJR, DHHS, Education, and that's the core group at the moment ...¹⁷²

I found it surprising in Victoria the extent to which at senior levels people actually don't really know what the right approach is, how to go about doing it. So we have written to Secretaries saying, 'Would you support us developing a curriculum and delivering an executive series of master classes on information sharing?'¹⁷³

The Commissioner is in the process of developing guidelines for sharing personal information that provide guidance on 'how to work with privacy to achieve good information outcomes'.¹⁷⁴ He also commented on information sharing at the point of service delivery:

... much needs to be done to ensure that the information sharing needs of frontline service delivery workers are clarified and simplified. This needs to occur before an emergency arises through the operationalisation of information sharing procedures—through, for example, training and standard operating procedures. Service delivery workers should not have to be lawyers.¹⁷⁵

Outdated and ineffective information technology systems

In addition to legislation, policy and organisational factors, IT systems have an important role in enabling or inhibiting information sharing. Almost all submissions and witnesses who gave evidence about IT in the context of family violence acknowledged that the current arrangements present major barriers to information sharing.

The current landscape

The University of New South Wales Social Policy Research Centre states in its recent report:

Within the literature a number of technological barriers to information sharing were identified. It should be noted that information technology is rapidly evolving and recent developments such as 'cloud computing' have greatly improved the ability to transfer information across systems and to ensure the safety of information. Nevertheless, the literature indicates that factors such as incompatibility of databases and mismatched data structures can create practical barriers, which make information sharing cumbersome and challenging in some circumstances.¹⁷⁶

There is no single family violence database or information systems interface in Victoria. Instead, multiple platforms are used by various organisations in the family violence system—for example, Victoria Police,¹⁷⁷ the Magistrates' Court of Victoria,¹⁷⁸ and Corrections Victoria¹⁷⁹ use separate systems. The Department of Health and Human Services also uses multiple systems and databases.¹⁸⁰

Mr Widmer explained:

Information technology systems and databases in health and human services have largely developed over time to support particular services, in line with the way departmental structures have developed to mirror the programmatic focus of enabling legislation. This has resulted in the development of numerous and separate client information systems. There are currently at least 14 discrete systems that record and store client information, collate data or provide information on targets and services across the human services output groups. In addition, relevant records may be kept in at least 12 related health information systems ... For example, child protection, Child FIRST/Family services, family violence, housing, homelessness, mental health, alcohol and drug, disability, hospitals each have separate databases. Additional systems operate in the funded non-government sector, often as case management systems.¹⁸¹

The Commission was told that the use of multiple systems means it is not possible or practicable to track a particular victim or perpetrator throughout the family violence system since the IT systems are incapable of 'talking' to each other:

... there is limited transferability of information between [Department of Health and Human Services IT systems]. As previously discussed, workers need to navigate systems that do not talk to each other by transmitting information to support clients via manual arrangements. This inhibits information sharing across services that can assist in assessing and managing the risk of family violence to women and children.

These limitations also affect case management to assist women and children to recover from family violence, and to rehabilitate men who use violence. This can:

- prevent workers from identifying and addressing the full range of an individual's or family's needs;
- inhibit the development of complete, accurate, and timely plans and service responses for individuals or families; and
- mean that the onus is on clients to navigate from service to service, sometimes telling their stories multiple times. This places further pressure on individuals and families, and time is wasted gathering information that already exists in separate client information systems. Individuals can have records in multiple systems, as well as multiple records within ... one system.¹⁸²

Specialist family violence services Bethany Community Support and Women's Health West Inc. explained that this situation forces them to double-handle information and prevents them from collating and sharing information effectively:

... Bethany currently uses two different client data management systems (IRIS and SHIP) in its work with men, women and children experiencing family violence. These systems do not link with other data management systems in use by other agencies, such as Victoria Police's LEAP database or the Courtlink case management system used by Victorian Courts. Without linkages or communication between these systems, we rely solely on the expressed communication between systems and [this] is highly subject to human error.¹⁸³

Effective integration and coordination 'on the ground' is supported by data systems that can hold the information needed for a family violence response in readily accessible places. Currently, specialist family violence services such as those provided by WHW are required to report against multiple data systems, which means information is often stored in different places and/or double handled. Basic collation of data is challenging; for example, police referrals must be counted by hand as the SHIP system does not allow collation. This runs counter to effective integration and coordination.¹⁸⁴

Mr Widmer noted that, 'in light of the disparate information technology systems, information sharing currently occurs through manual arrangements, with limited information sharing electronically'.¹⁸⁵ The Commission was also told of multiple examples of entering, retrieving and sharing information in or from different systems manually or inefficiently.

For example, organisations funded by the Department of Health and Human Services under the housing assistance output group use the SHIP (Specialist Homelessness Information Platform) system, whereas services funded by the child protection and family services output group use IRIS (Integrated Report and Information System). Where funding is provided under both streams, specialist family violence services are required to manually enter information into both databases; for example, a specialist family violence service may be required to use SHIP for its refuge service and IRIS for its family violence counselling services.¹⁸⁶

The Commission was also told that courts are unable to share information automatically. Magistrates Toohey and Hawkins provided evidence about the manual processes required in order to obtain information during intervention order hearings. Unless registrars or bench clerks search different databases and then physically hand the magistrate copies of related court documents, magistrates are unable to see whether there are concurrent criminal proceedings, previous family violence intervention orders, child protection orders or family law orders.¹⁸⁷ Such difficulties are discussed in Chapters 11 and 16.

The Commission also heard that '... there are currently no automated systems for the sharing of family violence information between Corrections and other agencies'.¹⁸⁸ As a result, Corrections Victoria has come to an arrangement with Victoria Police whereby Corrections Intelligence Unit staff manually examine individual prisoner or offender records in LEAP (the Victoria Police database) and conduct searches to determine whether a prisoner or offender is subject to or the victim of a current family violence intervention order, or whether they have been the victim or perpetrator in one or more historical intervention orders. This arrangement poses significant resourcing problems.¹⁸⁹

The inability to transmit information securely between agencies funded by the Department of Health and Human Services, Victoria Police and Corrections Victoria was emphasised by a number of witnesses. Mr Widmer explained, 'A key example of this is that police referrals, or L17 forms, are still faxed to family violence agencies'.¹⁹⁰ Assistant Commissioner Steendam and Senior Sergeant Howard explained that this is because of information privacy law and outdated IT systems on the part of some agencies:

L 17 reports are faxed to the referral organisations. The L 17 report is a digital form. Victoria Police's IT systems allow email transmission of the L 17 report. However, the SLEDS require that email transmission of law enforcement data, which the L 17 reports contain, is subject to suitable levels of encryption. Referral agencies on the Victoria Government Global Address List, such as the Victims Support Agency, have the capacity to receive encrypted emails. However, other referral agencies, funded by but not a part of government do not. In these circumstances Victoria Police must, in order to remain SLEDS compliant, revert to an alternative immediate transmissions system—digital facsimile.¹⁹¹

Assistant Commissioner Steendam elaborated on this during public hearings, explaining that in some cases Victoria Police must inspect family violence services or seek letters of attestation to ensure that their IT systems meet the appropriate encryption and data protection standards.¹⁹²

In its submission the Magistrates' Court of Victoria highlighted the importance of information sharing in the context of family violence, while noting the current technological limitations that inhibit this from occurring:

An effective, integrated family violence system must be built around timely, appropriate information and data sharing across agencies, if decision making is to be properly informed and evidence based. Specifically, in relation to family violence, if the inherent risks associated with these matters [are] to be properly assessed and managed then it is critical that there be effective communication across involved agencies, including courts ...

The capacity to share appropriate information quickly and securely across courts, police, and family violence legal and support services is a critical prerequisite for any systemic reform aimed at improving the efficiency and responsiveness of the court's approach to meeting the needs of families experiencing family violence.

Currently, even if the requisite legislative frameworks were in place to facilitate comprehensive information and data sharing across jurisdictions and agencies, the case management systems of [the Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the Children's Court of Victoria] do not have adequate functionality to support this aim.¹⁹³

Courtlink was first implemented in Victorian courts in the 1980s and is the main IT system used to hold information about court matters, including parties' details and hearing dates. During the public hearings the anachronistic nature of Courtlink was the subject of frequent comment.¹⁹⁴

The Commission notes that at present there is no effective way of using IT systems to identify recidivist perpetrators of family violence.¹⁹⁵

Current initiatives

The Commission was told of a number of initiatives that have occurred recently or are under way aimed at improving information technology in the family violence system. These include the following:

- ▶ The LEAP Electronic Direct Reporting Mk 2 (LEDR Mk 2) has been rolled out, which enables police to complete L17 forms electronically, automatically entering relevant information into LEAP and transmitting formal referrals to relevant support agencies—albeit largely by way of facsimile. Previously, L17 forms were filled out in hard copy and faxed to both the relevant support service and the Victoria Police Central Data Entry Bureau for entry into LEAP.¹⁹⁶
- ▶ Courtlink now interfaces directly with LEAP to enable family violence intervention order information to be accurately sent between the two organisations.¹⁹⁷
- ▶ Victoria Police is progressing the Policing Information Process and Practice Reform Program, with the dual focus of maintaining the performance of core information systems while planning for longer term reforms to IT systems.¹⁹⁸ This program is discussed in Chapter 15.

In relation to the Department of Health and Human Services, Mr Widmer said that work is under way to integrate the department's numerous IT systems:

We have been doing some exploration for some time now, and this is ongoing at the moment, in working out how we are able to get our systems to talk to each other, so looking at where there are opportunities for a software mechanism to sit over the top of databases with a set of permissions so that, if you log in as a worker, whether you are a disability worker or a child protection worker, you have permissions set around your access and that we seek to work out how we can get you access to the other information that sits around a client, where that's appropriate, where it's lawful and where that's relevant. That's ongoing work and that's certainly one of the avenues that we are pursuing at the moment.¹⁹⁹

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria also identified current and planned work aimed at modernising their IT platforms:

In the short term, MCV and CCV are undertaking work to stabilise Courtlink, and create basic functionality that will enable e-services such as electronic document lodgement and increased automation and digitisation of current paper based and manual processing functions.

In the longer term, MCV and CCV will pursue partnerships to secure investment in the budget process for a case management system that will fundamentally re-shape the way in which IT can support a modern court and client service delivery model, enable fast and accurate information sharing between jurisdictions and justice agencies and ... unlock human capital from the delivery of manual administrative tasks to high value client based services and support. Government investment will be critical to achieving outcomes in this area.²⁰⁰

Mr Reaper told the Commission that work is under way to integrate key Corrections Victoria IT systems, including connectivity with other Justice portfolio entities:

We are currently certainly under active consideration of the development of a single database or IT system for all of the Corrections information, whether that would be a system that replaces all of our existing IT systems or certainly is able to connect them better and just replace those that are most aged is the work that is underway ... As we move forward, whatever we develop will be done being mindful of its ability to connect at the very least to our Justice entities going forward.²⁰¹

Ms Marisa De Cicco, Deputy Secretary, Criminal Justice Division, the Department of Justice and Regulation, gave evidence about work in progress to better integrate critical IT systems throughout the Justice portfolio, with a focus on improving information flow and exchange between Victoria Police, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Corrections Victoria, without necessarily waiting to renew legacy case-management systems:

What we are trying to do in the scoping of this particular project is to try and identify systems that can be used with a multiplicity of existing potentially quite out of date systems that can mine data from those systems to form some sort of comprehensive view of a particular family circumstance ...²⁰²

We are mindful that the development of systems that are end to end or that capture a whole range of data through, I suppose, created interfaces [is] very problematic. They are generally expensive, they take a long time to develop and in many respects you don't know until you are quite close to the end as to whether or not they will work.²⁰³

So we tried with this one to see if there weren't off-the-shelf systems that could be customised to actually mine the data. There are many that have been developed in the US. We are mindful of some of our law enforcement Commonwealth agencies that use similar sorts of systems to do intel and other sort of allied work. So we are hopeful that the market will be able to bring forward a solution that can be implemented in a timely fashion and that won't require years and years of product development.²⁰⁴

It is anticipated that the project will be completed by December 2016.²⁰⁵

In summary, the Commission heard that the primary organisations in the family violence system see IT system reform as a priority, as well as a major challenge. At present there is no way to track a particular victim or perpetrator through the system, provide feedback on the results of a referral or identify recidivist perpetrators. Similarly, opportunities for automated and proactive information sharing are limited. The consequences of inadequate IT systems are discussed further in the following section.

Proposals for reform

The Commission received evidence about using existing mechanisms or enacting reforms to Victorian legislation in order to remove barriers to information sharing in the family violence system. For example, Domestic Violence Victoria said:

Legislative change to exclude family violence where there is a risk of serious and imminent harm, and family violence exemptions across professional codes of practice, protocols and practice frameworks [are] urgently needed.²⁰⁶

Broadly, there are three options for dealing with information-sharing barriers: use the existing mechanisms under Victorian law; amend Victoria's information privacy legislation (the Privacy and Data Protection Act and the Health Records Act) to facilitate information sharing in the context of family violence; or create a new information-sharing regime based on approaches in other jurisdictions. In this section some of the suggested options are discussed.

Using existing mechanisms under Victorian law

As outlined above, the Department of Health and Human Services is seeking an information usage arrangement, or IUA, for the RAMP program. One possible reform option would be to implement IUAs for different programs throughout the family violence system. The Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection observed, however, that there are problems both with implementing separate IUAs for different programs across the family violence system and with implementing one IUA for the entire system.²⁰⁷

The Commissioner noted that it is neither feasible nor desirable to conduct separate privacy impact assessments nor to have separate IUA applications across the many different family violence programs. To the extent possible there should be a single privacy impact assessment conducted across the whole of the system.²⁰⁸ On the other hand, the Commissioner acknowledged that having one IUA to cover the entire family violence system may be inappropriate given the number of participants in the family violence system: 'where too many parties are involved, IUAs can become unwieldy'.²⁰⁹

The Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner suggested that an alternative might be a sector-wide code of practice under the Privacy and Data Protection Act.²¹⁰ At present, however, codes of practice cannot reduce the minimum protections provided by the Information Privacy Principles; the Privacy and Data Protection Act would need to be amended to allow codes of practice to modify the IPPs.²¹¹ Even if such amendments were made, a code of practice would not apply to the Health Records Act or other subject-specific secrecy and confidentiality provisions. Further, the development of a code of practice would be an enormously time-consuming task.

Amending Victorian information privacy legislation

Submissions and witnesses suggested that Victoria's information privacy legislation be amended to enable information sharing throughout the family violence system.²¹²

The Commission heard evidence about removing the word 'imminent' from the serious and imminent threat test in the Privacy and Data Protection Act and the Health Records Act. The Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection supports this idea:

I would support removing the word 'imminent'. That's what happened in New Zealand when they were faced with similar issues in relation to family violence, the difficulty I think that people had in working out what 'imminent' meant ...²¹³

Such an approach was also supported by the Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions in Family Violence—a National Legal Response and subsequently enacted in the Australian Privacy Principles.²¹⁴

The Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission also made the following recommendations in that report:

Recommendation 30–11 State and territory family violence legislation should expressly authorise the use or disclosure of personal information for the purpose of ensuring the safety of a victim of family violence or an affected child.

Recommendation 30–13 State and territory family violence legislation and child protection legislation should expressly provide for information sharing among specified agencies in specified circumstances, and should include provision to allow information to be shared with specified private sector organisations.²¹⁵

However, the Commission notes that the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection has raised concerns about 'any broadly-framed legislative exemption for information sharing for the purposes of identifying and responding to the risk of family violence'.²¹⁶

Legislation in other jurisdictions

The Commission was referred to legislation in other jurisdictions that specifically authorises, or has been used to authorise, information sharing in the context of family violence.²¹⁷ Table 7.4 summarises several of the provisions the Commission considered.

Table 7.4 Family violence information-sharing legislation in other jurisdictions

Jurisdiction	Legislation	Description
Australian Capital Territory	s 18 Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986	This section provides for a police officer or a staff member of the Australian Federal Police to disclose information to an approved crisis support organisation for the purpose of rendering assistance to victims of family violence or their children.
New South Wales	Part 13A Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007	This part establishes an information-sharing regime for family violence. It specifically overrides NSW information privacy legislation by authorising the disclosure of personal information and health information relating to both victims and perpetrators of family violence. Because the information-sharing regime integrates with the NSW Safer Pathway reforms, information can be shared with a central referral point (to electronically manage and monitor family violence referrals) and a statewide network of local coordination points (non-government family violence services). Most information sharing requires the consent of the victim but not the consent of the perpetrator or alleged perpetrator. In situations of serious threat, the consent of the victim can be overridden. The legislation also expressly prevents perpetrators from gaining access to information collected about them under the regime.
	Chapter 16A Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998	This chapter establishes an information sharing regime to facilitate the provision of services to children and young persons by agencies that have responsibilities relating to their safety, welfare or wellbeing. The chapter authorises those agencies to share information and requires them to take reasonable steps to coordinate their services. The regime applies to certain prescribed bodies and provides protection from civil or criminal liability for persons, acting in good faith, who provide information in accordance with the legislation. Other laws prohibiting or restricting the disclosure of information are expressly overridden so as not to operate to prevent information sharing under the regime.
Tasmania	s 37 Family Violence Act 2004	This section provides that 'a personal information custodian, within the meaning of the Personal Information Protection Act 2004 , acting in good faith, does not commit a breach of that Act by reason only of collecting, using, disclosing or otherwise dealing with personal information for the purpose of furthering the objects of this Act'. The effect of this provision is to override Tasmania's information privacy legislation where information is shared, in good faith, to further the 'safety, psychological wellbeing and interests of people affected by family violence'.

Jurisdiction	Legislation	Description
Western Australia	S 70A Restraining Orders Act 1997 and r 15 Restraining Orders Regulations 1997	This section provides for the exchange of 'prescribed information' between a limited number of 'interested parties' (government organisations). 'Prescribed information' is defined in regulations to mean: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▶ the name, address, telephone number, age and ethnicity and other details of – ▶ the person or child; or ▶ a person who is bound by the violence restraining order; or ▶ an offender or alleged offender responsible for, or involved in, any offence relevant to the granting of the violence restraining order; ▶ a description of any offence relevant to the granting of the violence restraining order and an abridged description of the circumstances of its commission; ▶ any information about the grounds on which the violence restraining order was granted; ▶ the name, rank and any other relevant identifying information of any police officer in charge of investigating any offence relevant to the granting of the violence restraining order; ▶ the police station or office where information is held – ▶ about the investigation of any offence relevant to the granting of the violence restraining order or the breach of that order; or ▶ about the grounds on which the order was granted; ▶ the status of the investigation and prosecution of any offence relevant to the granting of the violence restraining order by a police officer. An interested party may provide to another interested party prescribed information if the parties agree that the provision of such information is necessary to ensure the safety of a person protected by a violence restraining order or the wellbeing of a child affected by such an order. The information must be provided in confidence, and there are protections from exposure to civil or criminal liability, or professional standards if information is shared in accordance with the section.
British Columbia	Ss 26(f) and 33.1(1)(m.1) Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act 1996	These provisions specifically authorise public bodies to collect and disclose information if it is necessary for the purpose of 'reducing the risk that an individual will be a victim of domestic violence, if domestic violence is reasonably likely to occur'. The Act also enables public bodies to share personal information for delivering or evaluating a common or integrated program or activity such as those dealing with family violence.
New Zealand	Part 9A Privacy Act 1993	This part allows for the creation of an Approved Information Sharing Agreement similar to the information usage arrangement under the Privacy and Data Protection Act. The Commission considered the 'Information Sharing Agreement for Improving Public Services for Vulnerable Children' (dated 25 June 2015), which modifies relevant New Zealand privacy legislation.
The United Kingdom	Data Protection Act 1998	The Commission examined UK information-sharing arrangements such as Multi-Agency Safeguarding Hubs, or MASHs, which rely on specific statutory gateways in legislation. For example, some MASHs rely on the implied statutory gateway in section 11 of the Children Act 2004 (UK), which obliges relevant agencies to ensure that their 'functions are discharged having regard to the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children'. This duty is said to satisfy the condition in the Data Protection Act that states that information can be processed if 'the processing is necessary for the exercise of any functions conferred on any person by or under an enactment'.

The Commission notes the recent finding of the University of New South Wales Social Policy Research Centre, referring to Chapter 16A of the Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act 1998 (NSW), that: 'The introduction of specific legislative authority has clearly been helpful in the ongoing development of a culture of appropriate information sharing in NSW'.²¹⁸

The Commission also examined information-sharing arrangements in South Australia. South Australia does not have information privacy legislation equivalent to the Privacy and Data Protection Act or the Health Records Act. Instead, the South Australian Cabinet has issued an administrative instruction, requiring government agencies and contracted service providers to comply with a set of Information Privacy Principles.²¹⁹ Consistent with the administrative instruction, the South Australian Ombudsman has issued the Information Sharing Guidelines for Promoting Safety and Wellbeing, which 'provide [for] a consistent statewide approach to appropriate information sharing practice wherever there are threats to safety and wellbeing'.²²⁰ The guidelines are complementary to the Multi-Agency Protection Service (MAPs), discussed below.²²¹

In the Commission's view, changes must be made to current information-sharing arrangements in order to ensure that victims and support organisations are aware of the actions of perpetrators of family violence. Evidence before the Commission consistently demonstrated that government agencies, specialist family violence services and others working to prevent family violence and support victims cannot adequately achieve their aims without sharing risk-related information about perpetrators. Improving information-sharing practices to focus on perpetrators is a vital next step in the development of Victoria's family violence system.

As Judge Gray stated, 'The fact is that the perpetrator ultimately controls the risks of family violence'.²²² Sharing necessary information about perpetrators—to keep them in view, engaged and accountable—will enhance victims' safety and help prevent family violence.

In this section the Commission sets out how it considers the barriers to information sharing in current legislation and policy, in organisational structures and cultures, and in IT systems might be overcome. The Victorian Government should accord the highest priority to removing the barriers identified in this chapter. Ultimately, we recommend that a new information-sharing regime be developed for the family violence system.

A new information-sharing regime

The various options

The Commission considered the existing mechanisms in the Privacy and Data Protection Act. We are of the view that none of these mechanisms offers a comprehensive answer to the information-sharing barriers described in this chapter. Apart from not applying to the Health Records Act or other secrecy and confidentiality provisions, the mechanisms are designed to allow information sharing to occur on discrete projects (for example, information collection or sharing by one or two organisations) rather than create systemic change.²²³

It is not acceptable that victims' safety and lives can be put at risk because of complex legislative provisions and confusing policies. The disappointing example of the extensive delay in rolling out the RAMPs to all of Victoria demonstrates that existing laws are not adequate.

As outlined above, the Commission heard evidence calling for the Privacy and Data Protection Act and Health Records Act to be amended to remove the requirement that a threat be imminent in order for an exemption to apply. However, we consider that this change alone would not remove all the barriers to information sharing (as demonstrated by the RAMP case study in this chapter) and nor would it necessarily overcome the complexity and confusion accompanying the current legislative framework.

We also contemplated recommending amendment of the Information Privacy Principles and Health Privacy Principles, as well as other secrecy and confidentiality provisions, to include specific family violence exemptions for the collection, use or disclosure of information. This approach is not appropriate, though: the IPPs and HPPs should retain, as far as possible, their general application. It would also require multiple amendments to multiple Acts containing secrecy and confidentiality provisions, which the Commission considers impractical and likely to lead to further confusion.

In the context of family violence it is vital that front-line workers can easily understand and implement best-practice information sharing. Amending default information privacy legislation and various secrecy and confidentiality provisions to include family violence is unlikely to provide the clear authority and reference point required to overcome the identified barriers to information sharing.

The Commission's preferred approach

On the basis of responses in Victoria (such as the information-sharing regime provided for in Part 3.2 of the Children, Youth and Families Act), and other jurisdictions such as New South Wales, Western Australia and South Australia, our preferred approach is to amend the Family Violence Protection Act to create a specific family violence information-sharing regime. This approach is preferable for a number of reasons:

- ▶ It will provide clear authority for organisations responding to family violence to share information.
- ▶ It will provide a single point of reference for the law relating to information sharing, cutting through the complexity of the current legislation and policy.
- ▶ It will offer a clear basis for workforce training and the development of protocols and procedures for putting the new regime into operation.
- ▶ It will enable professionals to confidently share information from other organisations and to take timely and decisive action to respond to family violence.
- ▶ It will probably take less time and involve less cost than preparing multiple information usage arrangements or a code of practice under the Privacy and Data Protection Act.

The Commission notes the recent finding of the University of New South Wales Social Policy Research Centre that, in the context of Chapter 16A of the NSW Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act, the introduction of specific legislative authority was useful in developing a culture of appropriate information sharing. Our recommended information-sharing regime is partly modelled on Chapter 16A of the NSW Children and Young Persons (Care and Protection) Act, Part 13A of the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) and Victoria's Children, Youth and Families Act. It is intended to be a comparable catalyst for change to information-sharing practice in Victoria.

The Commission also notes the recommendations of the Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission that support disclosure and sharing of personal information to ensure the safety of victims of family violence.²²⁴

While the Commission is alert to the concerns raised by the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection in relation to the operation of a broadly framed legislative exemption for information sharing,²²⁵ it makes this recommendation on the basis that information sharing will only be authorised when it is necessary for certain organisations to assess risk or to manage a risk to safety from family violence. We consider that the recommended regime strikes a suitable balance between information privacy rights and the need to keep victims safe.

The Commission is also mindful that Parliament will be required to consider the compatibility of the proposed new regime with the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities. In view of this, the new regime should be designed according to a number of guiding principles and should include specific design elements.

Guiding principles for legislative reform

In the Commission's view, the development of the new information-sharing regime should be guided by the following high-level principles:

- ▶ The legislation should be clear and succinct, so that it can be effectively applied by front-line workers.
- ▶ The balance between a victim's right to safety and a perpetrator's right to privacy should be recalibrated in the victim's favour.
- ▶ Notwithstanding this recalibration, the new regime should displace existing privacy protections only to the extent necessary and should also preserve victims' control over sharing their information.
- ▶ The potential for any unintended consequences—for example, concerning the willingness of victims to report family violence—should be given careful consideration.
- ▶ A broad range of interested parties—including the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection, government agencies, legal practitioners and the specialist family violence sector—should be consulted during development of the new regime to ensure that it is balanced, workable and effective.

Design elements

Although the final drafting of any legislative amendment is a matter for government, and ultimately Parliament, the Commission considers that the new regime should adhere to the following design elements, which are consistent with the guiding principles just listed.

Objective

The new information-sharing regime should have a clearly stated objective, which should be to support the intentions of the Family Violence Protection Act in two ways:

- ▶ by authorising specific organisations to share information when this is necessary for risk assessment or to protect safety
- ▶ by requiring these organisations to take reasonable steps to coordinate services and share information in accordance with the Family Violence Protection Act.²²⁶

Application

Prescribed organisations

The information-sharing provisions should apply to prescribed organisations that may provide services to victims of family violence or to perpetrators of such violence. Prescribing organisations by regulation will have several important effects:

- ▶ Organisations that can share information under the Family Violence Protection Act will be easily identifiable.
- ▶ Organisations can be added to or removed from the regime as necessary.
- ▶ Information sharing will be limited to a discrete number of organisations relevant to family violence.

The particular organisations to be prescribed should be determined by thorough analysis. The Commission considers, however, that they should be similar to the bodies currently able to share information under Part 3.2 of the Children, Youth and Families Act. These bodies include registered 'community services' such as homelessness, health care, aged care, disability, drug and alcohol and mental health services, as well as 'information holders', such as police officers, nurses, midwives, doctors and teachers.²²⁷

Broadly, community service organisations (including specialist family violence services, sexual assault services and other providers who come into contact with people experiencing family violence and who will need to assess family violence risks) should be prescribed organisations.

Each of the Support and Safety Hubs, Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, the Men's Referral Service and the Victims Support Agency should be prescribed organisations. Home and Community Care agencies and Aged Care Assessment Services are other bodies that could also be considered.

Additionally, relevant Commonwealth agencies should be prescribed, so that Victorian agencies can consult them. Because Victorian legislation cannot override Commonwealth legislation, however, it should be made clear that Commonwealth agencies are not required by Victorian law to share information.²²⁸

Courts

The Commission further considers that Victorian courts should also be prescribed organisations, to ensure that any actual or perceived legislative barriers that might exist to impair or constrain information sharing by the courts are overcome. Including courts as prescribed organisations will confirm the courts' ability to share information with another prescribed organisation (in accordance with the proposed new regime) without that organisation having to seek an order from the court to gain access to the information in question, as discussed in Chapter 16.

As part of this approach, changes will also be required to current court rules, practices and procedures to reflect their greater capacity to share information. While the courts are encouraged to actively share information to the greatest extent possible under this new regime, it will be important for courts to have an ability to refuse to share information in certain circumstances (for example, where it would prejudice an ongoing proceeding). This is discussed in greater detail below.

Individuals

Information sharing on family violence risk involves information about two main categories of people – people who are the victim of or are at risk of family violence (victims) and perpetrators.

To align with the current Family Violence Protection Act, the new information-sharing regime should authorise prescribed organisations to share information about a person who is protected by a family violence intervention order or a family violence safety notice ('protected persons') and individuals against whom such orders and notices have been issued. This provides an objective standard for engaging the regime and will allow prescribed organisations to clearly identify individuals named in such orders.

Not all victims of family violence will have family violence protection orders in operation, though: some victims will not have had contact with the police or the Magistrates' Court, and children might not be protected by orders or safety notices but might still be at risk of family violence. Information about these people will also need to be shared. The Commission therefore proposes that the new regime apply to any person a prescribed organisation reasonably believes is at risk of family violence ('person at risk'). Prescribed organisations should be able to share information about a person at risk and the person who is the source of the risk, in accordance with the new regime.

Part 13A of the NSW Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act uses the terms 'primary person' and 'associated respondent' to identify the individuals whose information may be shared. Adapting the definitions, the new regime should apply to the following individuals:

- ▶ a 'primary person'—meaning a protected person (as defined in the Family Violence Protection Act) or a person at risk
- ▶ an 'associated respondent'—meaning in relation to a protected person, the respondent (as defined in the Family Violence Protection Act, excluding subclause (a)(i) of the definition) and, in relation to a person at risk, the person who is the source of the risk.

The Commission considers that, in contrast with Part 13A of the New South Wales legislation, an application for a family violence intervention order should not automatically allow information about the parties to be shared. Before information can be shared, it is desirable that an order has been made or a safety notice has been issued or that a prescribed organisation reasonably believes there is a risk. This will prevent the regime from applying when there is a vexatious or frivolous application for an intervention order by a perpetrator of family violence. It is noted, however, that in cases where a genuine application has been made by a victim, the 'person at risk' test will most likely be satisfied.

The Commission emphasises that the new regime must also be capable of applying to information relating to multiple victims of the same perpetrator. For example, if an associated respondent has committed family violence against a person who is not the primary person (that is, they are a third party), information about that violence can be shared to protect the primary person. In most cases, however, the identity of the third party would not be shared with the primary person.

Information sharing under the new regime should also take into account situations where a victim (primary person) and perpetrator (associated respondent) have been incorrectly identified; where the perpetrator was previously the victim; or where both parties are or claim to be victims (for example, where two intervention orders are in operation). Responses to these situations need not be drafted into the Family Violence Protection Act, but they do need to be considered by prescribed organisations.

A requirement to respond to a request for information

When a prescribed organisation receives a request for information from another prescribed organisation, it should be required to comply with the request if it reasonably believes that the requested information should be disclosed under the relevant test. As discussed below, the test is whether an organisation reasonably believes that sharing the information is necessary to manage a risk to the safety of the primary person. If a prescribed organisation refuses to provide information in accordance with a request, it should provide written reasons for the refusal. A provision to this effect would send a clear message that Parliament intends that information be shared in the response to family violence.²²⁹

Such a requirement may play a clarifying role when secrecy or confidentiality provisions in other Acts might apply. For example, as discussed, the Police Act prohibits a member of the police force from gaining access to, using or disclosing police information if it is the duty of that member not to do so. The Family Violence Protection Act should override that prohibition in circumstances involving family violence so that the police member can share relevant information.

Defining 'information' and 'information sharing'

As noted, it might be necessary to share a wide variety of information in order to assess the risk of family violence and secure the safety of primary persons. This will include personal information and could include health information and other sensitive information. As a result, the definition of 'information' in the new regime should not be restricted.

The Commission also considers that the expression 'information sharing' is preferable to the separate concepts of 'collection', 'use' and 'disclosure': it is simpler to understand. In keeping with the approaches in the UK Data Protection Act and section 98M of the NSW Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act, 'information sharing' should be defined to include each of 'collection', 'use' and 'disclosure'. Such an approach is more appropriate in the context of multilateral information sharing, where information can be shared between several prescribed organisations simultaneously. Using the term 'information sharing' rather than 'disclosure' will also encourage continued communication and coordination between prescribed organisations, which is crucial to best-practice risk management, as opposed to one-off disclosures.

Interaction with other laws

The Family Violence Protection Act should clearly state that it does not prevent disclosure of information under any other law. This will ensure that the new regime cannot be interpreted as a barrier to sharing when there is other authority.

The new regime should specifically override the Privacy and Data Protection Act and the Health Records Act. The Commission notes that such an 'avoidance of doubt' provision, although not strictly required because these Acts are 'default legislation', would help to clarify that the Family Violence Protection Act takes precedence.

It is noted, however, that the Privacy and Data Protection Act and the Health Records Act should be overridden only when the collection, use and disclosure of, and access to and correction of, information is carried out in accordance with the new regime. That is, other Information Privacy Principles and Health Privacy Principles will continue to apply—including, for example, IPP 3 (Data Quality) and IPP 4 (Data Security).

As mentioned, other legislation contains secrecy and confidentiality provisions that might apply in the context of family violence. The new regime should override these provisions where necessary—for example, if the provision does not contain an exemption whereby disclosure is authorised by another law. This includes in relation to relevant provisions in the Children, Youth and Families Act and the Family Violence Protection Act itself, to the extent that these provisions prohibit or limit the power of courts to allow access to court documents. For example, the Magistrates' Court notes that it is prohibited by Part 8 of the Family Violence Protection Act from allowing access to final family violence intervention orders, other than by order of the court or with the consent of an adult victim.²³⁰ We refer to the discussion in Chapter 16 regarding the relevant provisions. The new regime should override these provisions to the extent necessary to ensure that courts, as prescribed bodies, can share information with other prescribed bodies under the new regime.

The Commission makes it clear, however, that nothing in the new regime should operate to enable the sharing of information where doing so is inconsistent with the underlying aims of the regime (namely, the safety and support of family violence victims) or any other legitimate policy objectives. For example, nothing in the new regime should apply to override the prohibition on disclosing the identity of a reporter or referrer to child protection, Child FIRST or family services under the Children, Youth and Families Act.

For reasons already explained, the new regime will not override the requirements of the Commonwealth Privacy Act. Prescribed organisations that are subject to Commonwealth laws must continue to comply with them.

A test for sharing information

The Family Violence Protection Act should clearly authorise a prescribed organisation to share information about a primary person or the associated respondent with another prescribed organisation if the prescribed organisation reasonably believes that sharing the information is necessary to manage a risk to the safety of the primary person. 'Safety' is defined in the Family Violence Protection Act as meaning 'safety from family violence'. Importantly, managing a risk to safety should not necessarily mean reducing the risk: in some circumstances it might mean simply ensuring that the risk does not escalate.

In the Commission's view, this test is appropriate because the primary purpose of information sharing should be to keep children and adults safe from family violence. The test also requires sharing to be necessary in order to manage risk. What is necessary will depend on the circumstances. As part of their practice, prescribed organisations have regard to various factors, including what the primary person has told the organisation, the level of risk as determined by the CRAF or the actuarial tool, and any internal practice manuals or policies.

For example, the Commission considers it will often be necessary to share information collected or included in a risk assessment in order to manage a risk to the safety of a primary person. If a prescribed organisation performs a risk assessment it should be able to share that information with other prescribed organisations. This will obviate the situation—revealed in evidence in the inquest into the death of Luke Batty—where 'risk assessment[s] undertaken by the various agencies were performed in "silos", not shared and not updated'.²³¹

Because 'information sharing' includes collection and disclosure, the same test applies to organisations that provide the information and those that receive the information. Both organisations should be satisfied that sharing the information is necessary so as to manage a risk to safety. Applying the same test will encourage organisations to consult each other and clearly explain why sharing is necessary.

Further, the same test should be applied to sharing information about an associated respondent with the primary person. If it is necessary to tell a primary person something about an associated respondent in order to manage a risk to their safety, the person should be told. Again, whether sharing is necessary will depend on the nature of the information and the nature of the risk.

The Commission considers that the situation identified by Judge Gray in his findings relating to the death of Luke Batty constitutes an example of when information sharing with a primary person is necessary:

FC Topham [a Victoria Police officer] telephoned Ms Batty and advised her that a magistrate had granted Mr Anderson bail. This was entirely appropriate information sharing. Constable Guenther's evidence was that the decision to contact Ms Batty was because of the:

need to notify the victim of the bail so she knows what to expect and she knows what he can and can't do, so she can notify us if she knows that he's breaching his bail conditions.

... The police officers' actions were completely appropriate. The approach they took should, in my view, be routine for all bail matters related to family violence.²³²

Risk assessment by intake organisations

A different test should apply to some organisations for the purposes of risk assessment and referral.

One of the main functions of the Support and Safety Hubs the Commission recommends be established, and of existing specialist family violence services including Safe Steps and the Men's Referral Service (referred to as 'intake organisations') is to conduct comprehensive family violence risk assessments. As a result, intake organisations should be specifically authorised to collect information from other prescribed organisations when it is necessary for them to do the following:

- ▷ conduct a family violence risk assessment
- ▷ determine which service(s) are appropriate to help a primary person or an associated respondent
- ▷ refer a primary person or an associated respondent to the appropriate service(s).

There should be no risk threshold for information sharing for the purposes of risk assessment and referral; that is, intake organisations will not need to be satisfied that a specific or identifiable risk exists. Determining whether a risk does exist is the purpose of the assessment. As noted, intake organisations will also need to be authorised to collect information about multiple victims of the same perpetrator. As with risk management, however, the information provided by the primary person, the CRAF (including a proposed actuarial tool within the CRAF), and internal practice manuals and policies will guide organisations in determining what information is necessary for risk assessment and should be collected by and disclosed to intake organisations. This will prevent the sharing of irrelevant information.

Prescribed organisations that are not intake organisations—for example, Corrections Victoria or a registered school teacher or principal—should also be authorised to disclose information to intake organisations for the purposes of risk assessment or referral, without having to reasonably believe such disclosure is necessary in order to manage a risk to the safety of a primary person.²³³

Victims' consent

Information sharing under the new regime must respect victims' right to choose whether information about them is shared. This is important for ensuring confidence in the family violence system. As a general principle, prescribed organisations must not share information about a primary person (victim) without their consent.

The Commission recognises, however, that there could be situations in which information should be shared without the consent of the primary person. Currently, information can be shared without consent under the serious and imminent threat exemption under the Privacy and Data Protection Act and the Health Records Act.

Such an exemption should continue to apply to enable prescribed organisations to share information about a primary person without their consent. Importantly, however, the test for the exemption should be that there is a serious or imminent threat to their life, health, safety or welfare, or that of their children, because of family violence.²³⁴

Perpetrator's consent

Information sharing, for either risk assessment or risk management, should not require the consent of the associated respondent (the perpetrator or alleged perpetrator). This should be clearly expressed in the Family Violence Protection Act.

In relation to risk assessed by intake organisations, the Commission considers that not requiring the consent of an associate respondent (the perpetrator) is justified because the information-sharing regime applies only when there is a current intervention order or family violence safety notice in force or an organisation reasonably believes there is a family violence risk. We also consider that managing risks to safety takes priority over associated respondents' privacy rights. The effect on privacy rights will be proportionate because information sharing must be necessary to conducting a family violence risk assessment, making an appropriate referral or managing a risk to safety in order to comply with the Family Violence Protection Act.

Consent to sharing information about children

Consistent with the principles just outlined, it is the Commission's view that when the primary person and associated respondent have children, consent should be sought only from the primary person when sharing information about the children. No consent should be required from the associated respondent.

Access to shared information

On request, primary persons should have access to and be able to correct any information about them that is shared. A prescribed organisation that obtains information under the regime should not, however, be required to take steps to make an associated respondent aware that information about them has been collected or provide access to such information.²³⁵

Even though a prescribed organisation need not take steps to provide access to associated respondents, the new regime should not prohibit information being provided to associated respondents if providing the information would not increase the risk to the safety of the primary person or a third party. This will allow cases in which errors have been made to be corrected, so that information remains accurate, complete and up-to-date.

Refusing to share information

Although information sharing under the new regime should be voluntary (subject to the requirement to respond to a request for information outlined above), it might be important to expressly define a limited number of situations in which a prescribed organisation can refuse to share information. This could include circumstances in which sharing information would prejudice an ongoing investigation or a proceeding, contravene legal professional privilege, prejudice a coronial inquest or inquiry, or increase the risk of family violence occurring.²³⁶ As mentioned earlier, this may be particularly important in the case of courts.

Protection for people sharing information

In order to encourage information sharing, people who share information in accordance with the Family Violence Protection Act should be protected. Information sharing in good faith should not amount to unprofessional conduct or a breach of professional ethics and should not expose the information sharer to any criminal or civil liability.

Reference could also be made to specific sections in legislation that impose confidentiality obligations—for example, section 346 of the Mental Health Act and section 141 of the Health Services Act—so that information sharing in accordance with the test proposed above does not contravene those Acts.²³⁷

Inappropriate information sharing

Prescribed organisations may share information only in accordance with the Family Violence Protection Act. A penalty should be applied to unauthorised information sharing. This could be similar to the provisions in section 36(5) of the Children, Youth and Families Act.²³⁸

Complaints about information sharing

An individual should be able to make a complaint to the Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner if they believe information about them has been shared by a prescribed organisation other than in accordance with the Family Violence Protection Act. The Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner should have powers of investigation and conciliation similar to those provided for in Division 8 of Part 3 of the Privacy and Data Protection Act.²³⁹

Guidelines

Some legislative information-sharing regimes explicitly provide for the creation of standards, protocols or guidelines, often by the responsible minister; others do not. If any standards, protocols or guidelines are developed to support the new regime, the Commission considers that they must have several important characteristics:

- ▷ They must be developed in consultation with all prescribed organisations or their representative bodies, the independent Family Violence Agency and the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection.
- ▷ They need to be clear and concise, so that they will be easily understood and applied by front-line workers in prescribed organisations.
- ▷ They should be reviewed as appropriate but at least at the same time as the new information-sharing regime is reviewed following implementation (as recommended below).

The Commission does not consider it necessary to provide for mandatory standards, protocols or guidelines for the new information-sharing regime. This is in contrast to section 98J of the NSW Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act, which requires compliance with the New South Wales Domestic Violence Information Sharing Protocol.²⁴⁰

Clear, simply drafted legislation is preferable to lengthy, complex guidance. Further, implementation of other recommendations put forward in this report will support best-practice information sharing. Among these are recommendations about the development of a revised common risk assessment framework, and the standardisation of that framework across all agencies (see Chapter 6). Mandatory standards, protocols or guidelines should therefore not be necessary.²⁴¹

Statutory review

The Family Violence Protection Act should contain a requirement that the Attorney-General, in consultation with the Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner, conduct a review of the new information-sharing regime within two years of the regime's introduction. Following implementation of the Commission's recommendations in Chapters 6 and 13, including in respect of the Support and Safety Hubs and the Central Information Point (discussed below), there should be another review within five years of the commencement of the fully operational system.

In light of its recommendation for a new information-sharing regime, the Commission notes that current high-level information-sharing arrangements and policies affecting prescribed organisations will need to be reviewed, updated and potentially consolidated once the new regime comes into force.

Recommendation 5

The Victorian Government amend the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to create a specific family violence information-sharing regime [within 12 months]. The new regime should be consistent with the guiding principles and design elements described in this report.

Developing an information-sharing culture

Legislative change alone will not create a culture of information sharing throughout the family violence system. Legislative barriers are only one of many reasons for individuals to shy away from sharing information.

The proposed new information-sharing regime incorporated in the Family Violence Protection Act will send a clear signal to people working in prescribed organisations that they can share information in order to manage risks to safety. Such a change will go some way toward redressing the general culture of risk aversion identified by the Commission. Risk aversion and non-disclosure must be replaced by proactive, coordinated and timely information sharing. There is also a need for strong leadership in prescribed organisations so as to create a clear authorising environment for information sharing. Much work on improving the information-sharing culture will be necessary.

It is the Commission's view that the Victorian Secretaries Board Family Violence Sub-committee should oversee implementation of the new information-sharing regime and be responsible for developing an information-sharing culture throughout prescribed organisations.

The sub-committee should coordinate the production of any guidelines or guidance material created to support the new regime and be responsible for developing an awareness campaign to explain the new regime to prescribed organisations. Implementing the new framework—in terms of drafting and updating information-sharing protocols and memorandums of understanding, and delivering internal training—should, however, be the responsibility of prescribed organisations. The sub-committee should also be responsible for monitoring progress, holding organisations to account, disseminating information about good practice and resolving any emergent difficulties. It should work closely with the Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection in performing these tasks.

Recommendation 6

The Victorian Secretaries Board Family Violence Sub-committee oversee a working group consisting of representatives of 'prescribed organisations' covered by the recommended information-sharing regime and the Office of the Privacy and Data Protection Commissioner [within 12 months of the legislative amendments]. The working group should:

- ▶ identify priority areas for the development of an information-sharing culture throughout the family violence system
- ▶ develop an awareness campaign to explain the new information-sharing regime to prescribed organisations
- ▶ coordinate the production of any guidelines or guidance material created to support the new information-sharing regime and help prescribed organisations put their information-sharing arrangements into operation
- ▶ help prescribed organisations update information-sharing protocols and memorandums of understanding and deliver internal training on information sharing.

Improving multi-agency information sharing

The Commission recognises that timely information sharing is crucial to effectively managing the risk posed by the perpetrator and to ensuring strategies are in place to keep victims safe. Further, it recognises that creating a more permissive information-sharing regime requires new system infrastructure, in addition to legislative and cultural reform.

The Commission recommends that a statewide Central Information Point be established to provide up-to-date information to assist risk assessment and risk management, in particular for medium to high-risk cases. Introduction of an actuarial risk assessment tool within the revised CRAF, as recommended by the Commission in Chapter 6, will help with determining medium to high-risk category cases. This model is loosely based on the existing South Australian Multi-Agency Protection Service model which is discussed in the box below.

The South Australian MAPS model: 'real time information sharing to reduce risk'²⁴²

In 2012, following a visit to the UK, the Chief Commissioner of Police recommended to government that they implement a UK 'MASH-type' model to support early intervention for family violence in the South Australian context. This model was also developed in response to criticism from the State Coroner following the death of Zahra Abrahamzadeh.

MAPS is a police led, co-located model, with the agencies involved including police; Corrections; Health; Housing; Office for Women; Education, and Families SA (Child Protection). The model operates as follows:

- ▶ all police family violence incident reports (both the criminal and the 'domestic abuse' reports) are automatically uploaded each morning into the MAPS system
- ▶ these are reviewed by the MAPS multi-agency research team, who search through for relevant information from their own agency databases (that they access from on-site)
- ▶ any concerns are selected for 'mapping' and referred to a twice daily taskforce meeting (the "tactical table") where agreed actions are referred back to local agencies for action.

Currently MAPS referrals come from South Australia Police only, but the intent is to include referrals about domestic violence and child protection concerns from all partner agencies.

This model is described as an 'an early warning system', intended to increase system accountability and provide an escalation point where there have been process flaws or gaps in the response to family violence.

South Australia Police has leadership of the response, which includes the power to instruct and hold other agencies to account in relation to identified cases. The information gathered is then automatically uploaded into each agencies database in real-time. The model is currently unfunded and is being reviewed.

The Central Information Point should consist of a co-located multi-department team led by Victoria Police and with representatives from the Departments of Justice and Regulation (including Corrections Victoria) and Health and Human Services (including health, drug and alcohol, mental health, child protection, housing and homelessness and youth justice services).

It should also include a representative from the registry staff of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria (and potentially from other Victorian courts as well). Information held by the court, such as final family violence intervention orders and risk assessments completed by the applicant support worker, should be shared consistent with the legislative regime we have proposed. The Commission recognises, however, that there are specific challenges that exist in respect of the Magistrates' Court inclusion in the Central Information Point, because of its outdated information technology system and difficulties associated with efficiently and effectively accessing information from its databases. However, the Magistrates' Court should provide information and participate as a member of the Central Information Point to the extent possible. As upgrades to the Magistrates' Court IT systems progress, the system should be used to more efficiently provide the required information, as well as providing a greater range of information.

Consideration should be given to any other agencies who could over time be included as additional members of the Central Information Point.

Each department represented at the Central Information Point should be a prescribed organisation under the new information sharing regime in the Family Violence Protection Act. This will allow information sharing between members of the Central Information Point, as well as with other prescribed organisations, such as the recommended Support and Safety Hubs described in Chapter 13.

As discussed above, the Commission notes that there may be limited situations in which an agency participating in the Central Information Point will not be able to share information. This may be particularly important in the case of courts and would include circumstances in which sharing information would prejudice an ongoing investigation or proceeding.

The Central Information Point will work closely with the 17 proposed Support and Safety Hubs. On a request from such a hub, each agency member of the Central Information Point will be authorised to have access to their own agency's databases and to provide any information that might be held in relation to nominated individuals. The information obtained from the Central Information Point will primarily be about the perpetrator; information about the victim may be obtained from the victim directly or from the Central Information Point with the victim's consent.

The agency databases might include information about criminal history, community correction orders, parole, child protection, mental health, drug and alcohol and other health services, as well as disability and housing services. The Central Information Point would consolidate the relevant information from each agency's database into one report and provide it to the Support and Safety Hub in question. As risk assessment forms part of the Support and Safety Hubs' intake process which is performed daily, the information would be consolidated on a daily basis.

The Central Information Point would also provide updated information to a hub each time such information is received in relation to a perpetrator who has already been the subject of a request for information. For example, the Central Information Point should provide information to a hub when a perpetrator is approaching release from prison or is the subject of an L17 referral with respect to a different victim. This means that the Central Information Point needs to have the capacity to run searches on individuals who have previously been the subject of a request for information, and to have a mechanism for flagging important dates such as the expiry of a family violence intervention order and the end of a prison sentence. The hub should in turn share this information with the agencies working with the victim(s) when it is necessary to manage risks to the victim's safety.

Unlike, for example, the Multi-Agency Protection Service model in South Australia, it is not envisaged that the members of the Central Information Point would undertake the process of risk assessment, or seek to make decisions as to how to manage the particular risk. They will, however, be required to make decisions as to which information is necessary (under the new legislative regime recommended by the Commission) to provide to the hubs or others. Accordingly, staff at the Central Information Point should have continuing training around family violence, as well as comprehensive and continuously updated knowledge of family violence risk, including a strong understanding of the CRAF.

RAMPs, the statewide 24-hour crisis service (Safe Steps), the Men's Referral Service and the Victims Support Agency should also have access to information from the Central Information Point. This is because the Men's Referral Service and Safe Steps will continue to be responsible for after-hours referrals and the Victims Support Agency for L17 referrals for male victims. As the mechanism for managing high-risk cases, RAMPs must also have easy access to risk information.

It is envisaged that other prescribed organisations such as specialist family violence services will be able to obtain information from the relevant Support and Safety Hub rather than dealing directly with the Central Information Point. We also note that the Central Information Point is not intended to replace information sharing at the local level. Police, courts, specialist family violence services and other prescribed organisations can and should communicate directly with each other as necessary (provided it is in accordance with the new legislative regime under the Family Violence Protection Act).

The Central Information Point will offer prompt access to comprehensive information in order to strengthen risk assessment and risk management and improve the quality of measures designed to keep victims safe. The establishment of this facility is a key reform on which many other actions rely. Accordingly, we recommend that the Central Information Point be established in advance of the Support and Safety Hubs, and no later than 1 July 2018 when the hubs are due to commence.

Recommendation 7

The Victorian Government establish a secure Central Information Point. Led by Victoria Police, it should consist of a co-located multi-disciplinary team with representatives from Victoria Police, the courts (registry staff), the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Justice and Regulation (Corrections Victoria) who are authorised to obtain information from their respective databases [by 1 July 2018]. A summary of this information should be available to the Risk Assessment and Management Panels, the recommended Support and Safety Hubs, the 24-hour crisis telephone service Safe Steps and the Men's Referral Service to permit effective assessment and management of risk in individual cases.

Updating IT systems

In order to support the Central Information Point, the Commission considers it imperative that there be joint planning between all prescribed organisations to ensure that upgraded or replacement IT platforms have adequate functionality for prompt, effective and appropriate information sharing. There is a pressing need for central oversight of this process in view of the once-in-a-generation opportunity associated with the overhaul or replacement of major case management platforms such as LEAP and Courtlink.

Equally, the Commission considers that government should not wait for major system changes before moving to improve technology-enabled information sharing in the family violence system. Building on the work being done by the Department of Justice and Regulation, a project should be started immediately to examine opportunities for purchasing off-the-shelf applications to integrate databases, without replacing legacy systems.

In the Commission's view, government should have as its aspiration the creation of an integrated case management system whereby relevant agencies can upload and access in real time the information they need to fulfil their roles and responsibilities as part of the family violence system. This will probably require significant scoping and planning because of the complexity of what is involved, and the broader policy implications of options such as adopting e-records in the human services field.

Recommendation 8

The Victorian Secretaries Board ensure that proposed upgrades to key Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Victoria Police, Corrections Victoria and Department of Health and Human Services information technology systems equip these systems [by 1 July 2018] to:

- ▷ share information for the purposes of risk assessment and management in individual cases of family violence
- ▷ permit the use of system data for the purpose of evaluating the effectiveness of outcomes from implementation of the Commission's recommendations and the recommended Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
- ▷ participate in the Central Information Point.

Recommendation 9

The Victorian Government examine options for the development of a single case management data system to enable relevant agencies to view and share risk information in real time [within 12 months].

199 Transcript of Widmer, 20 August 2015, 3154 [9]–[22]. The Commission was subsequently told by the Department of Health and Human Services that this work initially formed part of the 'Single Client View' project undertaken by the department which focused on technical barriers to information sharing. On review in early 2015, it considered that this project was no longer the best approach to deliver the department's future information sharing needs for reasons including that its focus on technical barriers (without also addressing cultural and practice issues) was too limited. Accordingly, the Department of Health and Human Services is currently developing a new business case that will identify challenges and propose options to address the complexities of information sharing. This is known as the 'Better Client Information' project: see Department of Health and Human Services, 'Information Sharing', provided in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August and 20 October 2015).

Appendix A Letters Patent and terms of reference

ELIZABETH THE SECOND, BY THE GRACE OF GOD
QUEEN OF AUSTRALIA AND HER OTHER REALMS AND TERRITORIES, HEAD OF THE COMMONWEALTH:

I, the Honourable Alex Chernov AC QC, the Governor of the State of Victoria, with the advice of the Premier, under section 5 of the Inquiries Act 2014 and all other enabling powers, appoint you the Honourable Marcia Ann Neave AO as Commissioner and Chairperson, and Patricia Mary Faulkner AO and Anthony Joseph Nicholson as Commissioners to constitute a Royal Commission to inquire into and report on the matters specified in the terms of reference.

BACKGROUND

- Family violence is the most pervasive form of violence perpetrated against women in Victoria. While both men and women can be perpetrators or victims of family violence, overwhelmingly the majority of perpetrators are men and victims are women and children.
- The causes of family violence are complex and include gender inequality and community attitudes towards women. Contributing factors may include financial pressures, alcohol and drug abuse, mental illness and social and economic exclusion.
- The impacts of family violence are profound.
 - a. In 2013 there were 44 family violence related deaths in Victoria.
 - b. For women and children, family violence has extensive and often long term physical, psychological and emotional consequences. It creates homelessness, disrupts children's schooling and leads to social and economic isolation for women.
 - c. The estimated annual cost of family violence to the Victorian economy in 2009 was $3.4 billion.
- The response to family violence is necessarily complex and requires coordinated and concerted effort across government and the community, including by government departments, courts, police, correctional services, legal services, housing, child protection and family services, schools, health and community organisations.

- Many committed and dedicated persons are involved in the prevention of and response to family violence, given the challenges it presents. There were 65,393 family incidents reported to Victoria Police in 2013-14, an increase of 83 per cent since 2009-10. This increased reporting of traditionally under-reported incidents may signal a positive step towards encouraging victims to speak out and an increased awareness of family violence. However, the increase in reported family violence incidents presents a challenge for the family violence system and has had significant impacts on all parts of the system, including police, courts, legal services and specialist family violence services.
- Preventing and responding to family violence is a shared responsibility across government and local government, media, business, community organisations, communities, families and individuals.
- Victoria's response to family violence must reduce the incidence of family violence, hold perpetrators to account for their actions and support victims in an effective, efficient and sustainable way into the future.

TERMS OF REFERENCE

You are appointed to inquire into and report on how Victoria's response to family violence can be improved by providing practical recommendations to stop family violence. You are required to:

1. examine and evaluate strategies, frameworks, policies, programs and services across government and local government, media, business and community organisations and establish best practice for:
 - a. the prevention of family violence;
 - b. early intervention to identify and protect those at risk of family violence and prevent the escalation of violence;
 - c. support for victims of family violence and measures to address the impacts on victims, particularly on women and children; and
 - d. perpetrator accountability;

2. investigate the means of having systemic responses to family violence, particularly in the legal system and by police, corrections, child protection, legal and family violence support services, including reducing re-offending and changing violent and controlling behaviours;
3. investigate how government agencies and community organisations can better integrate and coordinate their efforts; and
4. provide recommendations on how best to evaluate and measure the success of strategies, frameworks, policies, programs and services put in place to stop family violence; and inquire into and report on any other matters reasonably incidental to those set out in paragraphs 1-4 above.

You may make such recommendations arising out of your inquiry as you consider appropriate, having regard to any matters you consider relevant including:

5. the need to establish a culture of non-violence and gender equality, and to shape appropriate attitudes towards women and children;
6. the needs and experiences of people affected by family violence with particular regard to children, seniors, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, culturally and linguistically diverse communities, gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities, regional and rural communities and people with a disability and complex needs;
7. the need to identify and focus on practical short, medium and long term systemic improvements to Victoria's current response to family violence and the need for this response to be sustainable into the future;
8. the need for coordination across jurisdictions to provide the most effective response to family violence;
9. the systems and mechanisms to identify and appropriately prevent and respond to family violence, including information sharing and data systems; and
10. the expertise of professionals and academics working in the field of family violence, including any relevant international and Australian family violence research, past inquiries, reports and evaluations that may inform your inquiry and avoid unnecessary duplication.

You are required to report your findings and any recommendations to the Governor as soon as possible, and in any event, no later than 29 February 2016.

In these terms of reference, family violence means family violence as defined in section 5 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008.

community organisation means any non-government body, agency, association, institution, organisation or other entity or group of entities of any kind (whether incorporated or unincorporated) and however described, that provides services or conducts activities to prevent or respond to family violence in Victoria.

CONDUCT OF THE INQUIRY

You are directed to:

- conduct your inquiry as you consider appropriate, having regard to adopting informal and flexible procedures where desirable;
- have regard to the desirability of conducting your inquiry without unnecessary cost or delay;
- not prejudice, and to work cooperatively with, other inquiries and current investigations into any matter of family violence, including having regard to the need to treat any evidence received by you in a way that does not prejudice current or future criminal or civil proceedings or other contemporaneous inquiries; and
- conduct the inquiry in accordance with these letters patent, the Inquiries Act 2014, and all other relevant laws.

You may also consult with experts and engage persons to provide relevant advice and assistance, including persons who have experienced family violence and support providers.

The powers of the Royal Commission, at the discretion of the Chairperson may, at any time, be exercised by one or more Commissioners.

Appendix B Amendment to Letters Patent

Appendix F Lay witnesses

The Commission invited eight individuals who had direct experience of family violence, either as a victim or, in one instance, as someone who had used violence, to give evidence about their experiences of current responses to family violence. A ninth person provided a written statement. Eight of the witness statements are presented here. For safety reasons, one of the statements remains unpublished. The Commission is very grateful to all people who provided statements and appeared as witnesses.

Witness statement of ‘Susan Jones’

I, Susan Jones,¹ say as follows:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my own knowledge, save where otherwise stated. Where I make statements based on information provided by others, I believe such information to be true.

Background

2. In 2000 while living overseas, I eloped to marry a man who did not have the approval of my family or community. As such, I was cut off from all family and community support. My father is Australian.
3. The sexual, physical and verbal assault began almost immediately. In the first week of our marriage, after having intercourse, my husband threw me on the concrete floor, which is where he made me sleep on nights he was not pleased with me. He said that he should have married a whore instead of me because a whore would ‘know how to pleasure her man.’
4. Over the first few weeks of marriage, he repeatedly had sexual intercourse with me and made me sleep on the floor if I could not keep up with his sexual needs. He told me ‘the floor is where sluts sleep.’ He made me feel insecure by telling me I couldn’t do anything right.
5. It was during these early weeks of marriage that I learnt the hard way that I was not allowed to say ‘no’ to my husband. Physical and sexually demeaning behaviour would occur towards me, which made me fearful and anxious around my husband. His wishes and needs were met at every request and I was not allowed to express my opinion or preference for anything, whether it be what we ate, where we went or anything that is otherwise normal in a relationship, companionship or marriage.
6. I became pregnant within the first month of marriage, which made him angry as he implied I had broken an agreement that ‘we are supposed to have fun for a while, and not get pregnant straight away.’ No such agreement was ever discussed, but he did put the blame on me for becoming pregnant. One night, he kicked me in the stomach while I was sleeping. I had to prove that my becoming pregnant would not make me less obedient. Examples of this behaviour was when he made me carry all the grocery bags, push start his car while he sat in it and have sex any time he demanded it. He had no concern for my state of pregnancy.
7. During the pregnancy, I suffered morning sickness and I could only eat oranges. My husband wouldn’t let me leave the house, even to get oranges to ease my morning sickness. When I asked his relatives who visited if they could buy me some oranges and gave them money to do so, he took the money and said he would purchase the oranges. When his relatives had left, he became furious that I had asked his family to run errands for me, and didn’t buy the oranges.
8. In October 2000, when I was eight months pregnant with our first child, I flew, with my father’s assistance, to Australia, with the intention of leaving my husband due to his abusive behaviour. My siblings were all living in Australia at that time.
9. He followed me to Australia one week later to my surprise, and the abuse continued. I had nowhere to go as my family didn’t realise the extent of the abuse, and I didn’t have any further support networks. Any connections I had in Australia didn’t know what had been happening behind closed doors so they therefore continued to encourage me to stay with him.

10. At some point in our marriage I went to speak to our religious leader and ask advice about my husband's abusive behaviour. The religious leader advised me that perhaps if the house was cleaner when my husband got home, or if I cooked better, he might not be so angry. As a result of confiding to my religious leader, I was referred to a counselling service that advised me on how to be a more obliging and obedient wife.
11. The abuse intensified every time I became pregnant. During our marriage, I became pregnant four times and I now have four sons.

Initial contact with the health system

12. In 2001 I had attended a medical clinic due to injuries sustained from rape. The female GP did discuss the severity of my injuries and had asked if it was rape. I told her 'no, it was my husband.' She told me she would keep this incident on record, but these records were lost by the time I went to the police in 2011. She gave me a pamphlet for a women's helpline, I thanked her for it, but disposed of the pamphlet in case my husband found me in possession of it. At the time, I did not know the significance of this helpline.
13. Again in 2004 while pregnant with my third child, I sustained such significant injuries from my husband's sexual assault that I had to attend a hospital. I was bleeding and thought I might be losing the baby. The doctor that treated my injuries identified that the cause must have been sexual assault. The doctor asked if I wanted to press charges for rape. I was confused by the suggestion as my understanding of 'rape' was that the rapist had to be a stranger or an intruder, not a husband.
14. I thought that the role of wife meant that when you sign the marriage contract, you sign over the rights to your body. Any time your husband wants your body, it belongs to him. The doctor informed me that this information was not correct, that when your husband signs the marriage contract, he agrees to love and protect. This doctor's statement had a huge impact on my understanding of what rape and consent meant. The doctor told me that my body belonged to me and explained that any form of non-consensual sex was rape, regardless of whether you were married to the perpetrator or not.
15. This doctor referred me to a counsellor and enlightened me to the opportunity of learning more about my rights through discussion. I did attend these counselling sessions. I walked to my counselling sessions, children in tow, while my husband was at work. Although learning about my rights was insightful, putting that learning into practice was not so easy.
16. On a separate occasion, a GP had asked me if I was being 'abused'. My understanding of the word 'abuse' was being beaten with a closed fist. My husband had told me that through his job, he had learned that if you hit someone with an open palm, it's not considered 'abuse'. As my husband would hit me with an open palm, I told the doctor that I was not being abused.
17. Throughout the 10 years of marriage, I had no idea that financial control, social control, manipulation, fear tactics, threats of hurting me or the children were all forms of abuse. I even laughed when someone told me about emotional abuse—how can anyone cause pain to feelings? I now know this to be true and very possible.

Police response

18. The doctor at the hospital referred me to a counsellor, who told me that I could call the police when my husband's behaviour was making me feel unsafe, scared, or resulted in the injuries that I had when I attended the hospital. Before this time, I thought the police only dealt with car accidents or other emergencies. I didn't realise that they could come to our house for the behaviour my husband was displaying to me. At the time I did not understand domestic violence to be an emergency.
19. The first time I phoned the police, I felt the threat of violence as I could tell he was angry. He was exhibiting erratic and frightening behaviour such as slamming doors and cupboards and flicking the lights on and off in the children's bedroom while they were sleeping. This frightened me and I did not know what he was going to do. The police attended and separated us to different sides of the house. As my husband worked as a [REMOVED], he later told me that he had had interactions with these specific officers through his work. He told me all he had to say was that I was taking anti-depressants and hadn't been taking my medication, and that there was no threat of violence. I heard him tell the officers 'women, they over exaggerate you know.' The police officers laughed with him and no further action was taken.

20. The second time I phoned the police, they attended again and again no action was taken. As soon as the police arrived, my husband pretended to be calm and friendly. One of the officers asked me what I wanted them to do, but I didn't know what my options were. They didn't tell me that I could take out an intervention order against him, which would mean he couldn't continue hurting me. If that had been explained to me, I would have asked them to make him leave.

Isolating and controlling behaviours

21. My husband locked the phone and computer in a padlocked room every time he left the house. I was only able to use them when he was home and with his permission. He would sit next to me when I made any phone calls to family. This was both intimidating and frightening. I could not speak freely while he monitored my phone calls. He controlled which friends and family members I was allowed to speak to. For example, he learnt that one of my friends was divorced. He told me I wasn't allowed to associate with divorced women as they would corrupt a God-sanctioned marriage.
22. He didn't allow me my own mobile phone. In 2001, my sister had provided me with my own mobile, as she was concerned about me. He threw it against the wall and smashed it.
23. My husband held my bankcard so I couldn't spend any money without approval. He allocated me $20 a week to provide for me and our four children. If I needed more money for nappies or any extras for the kids I had to beg him for extra money. If he approved of the extras that I requested he would ask exactly how much I needed, and count out that precise amount in coins. He used my card freely to buy expensive gym equipment, clothes and overseas holidays. I was never allowed to question his spending.
24. In order to have control over my whereabouts, he would often take me to work with him. Sometimes he worked night shift. He would demand I come with him so he knew where I was at all times. I had to sleep in the car all night without access to a toilet. The children were small at the time. My anxiety rose dramatically; I had to ensure they were warm and comfortable as we all slept in a small car.
25. I was restricted to the house. When my father gave me access to a car, my husband took the keys with him to work and wouldn't let me drive it. If I needed the car for any reason I had to beg and promise exactly where I was going and what time I would be back.
26. He was very controlling about being on time. If he had to pick me up from somewhere (for example, picking me up from an ultrasound appointment) he was often late to pick me up. On one occasion I waited up to three hours and I was not permitted to ask what delayed him. I was only allowed to say 'thank you' when he arrived. But if he needed to be picked up from somewhere (a train station) I would cop it if I was three minutes late.

Role of the education system in identifying the abuse

27. When I was pregnant with my fourth child, a teacher from my children's school made contact with me to ask about my five year old who was in prep. He had stopped talking during class and the teacher wasn't sure if he was learning the material being taught. The teacher asked my permission for him to see a counsellor, which I of course approved. Once the counselling session had been completed, the teacher phoned again and asked if they could interview his older brother. After this session, the school asked me to come to speak to them. At this point, I assumed it was in relation to strategies within both of the boys' education to assist my younger child to speak and learn in the classroom. When I attended the school, the counsellor started asking me questions based on answers the children had given during counselling and some pictures my children had drawn which depicted family violence. The counsellor asked me if my children had witnessed family violence in our house, such as my husband pulling me by the hair, or throwing food at me.
28. The children had given detailed descriptions of what they had witnessed and as it was being relayed to me I felt my sad secret was now not only about me. I then realised that they had been witnessing the violent behaviour that my husband was perpetrating and it was affecting them. I broke down in tears as I felt I had let the children down, as it was my role as a mother to provide for and protect these children. I felt I had let them down, that I had failed to some degree. I realised that whilst my husband only occasionally hit our children, they were also affected emotionally by the abuse that was occurring to me.

29. The school counsellor referred me to a refuge, and told me that it was likely that if we went to a refuge, we would stay there for two weeks before moving into more permanent housing. I didn't have an understanding of what a refuge was as no one had ever explained it to me. I had an expectation that it would be a facility as depicted in the news, surrounded by barbed wire like an internment camp. I didn't want to take my children to a facility like that.
30. The school counsellor also referred me to a women's information service helpline, which I was unable to use as I didn't have access to a phone.
31. At that time, I was attending counselling as referred by the doctor at the hospital. I found it emotionally exhausting to bring up the issues I'd been facing and felt embarrassed to talk about the abuse. How can talking about a horrible past help the future? I still had to go home to this man. Talking about it felt silly and futile.

Access to a women's refuge

32. Between 2000 and 2009, I tried to leave my husband on five occasions with the children and stayed with family or friends. When I was at my sister's house with the boys, my husband would call incessantly, including to my sister's mobile or home phone, or would simply come around and demand that he have access to his children. Using the children as a need for reuniting his family, he would ask, 'who else would love you and the children more than me?' I felt my presence at my sister's house was an inconvenience to her and her family. When I fled to a friend's home, I felt that I was equally inconvenient to them.
33. In October 2009, I planned to attend a woman's refuge by telling my husband I was babysitting my sister's children for two weeks, when the reality was that we only needed to babysit for one week. I planned to leave for the refuge after the first week. Through advice of the women's helpline I packed my children's things, including their passports and birth certificates, a few articles of clothing and a small toy without my husband becoming suspicious.
34. The refuge organised for a taxi to transport me and the children back to the refuge at the start of the second week. As we were leaving, my sister was confused about my husband not collecting us from her driveway and asked where we were going. I told her we were going to a refuge which upset her because she had the same understanding of what a refuge was that I did, which is similar to a prison or internment camp. My sister tried to stop us from going to the refuge. I phoned the refuge and told them that we were reconsidering coming to stay there, based on both mine and my sister's understanding of what sort of facility it was.
35. The refuge made it clear that if we didn't come, that we would not receive counselling or housing support.

Homelessness and access to housing

36. The incident with the refuge began the next 12 months of homelessness for myself and my children. From time to time, we were able to stay with my sister and various friends and family. All four of my children would sleep in one bed and I would sleep on the floor next to them, or on lounge room floors.
37. We also spent periods of time in a tent in local parks when the weather was warm enough. We started sleeping in the car when it was too cold.
38. When we slept in the car, it had to be near enough to the children's school that they could walk, as I didn't have enough money for petrol to drive them to school every day. The car couldn't be too close to school as there was a chance that their school friends might see our living conditions. We selected a park that had a toilet facility that we could wash up in before the kids went to school.
39. During this time, whilst my children attended school, I began looking for permanent accommodation for myself and my children.

Housing Service (Department of Human Services)

40. I filled out an application with a housing service. They informed me there that I should expect a long wait for housing (up to two years for emergency housing, and 20 years for non-emergency housing). They asked me if I had an address to put on the form. I said that I didn't have an address as we were living in a car. They then informed me that if I didn't have an address to put on the form, they couldn't process my application. I asked them if I should put my sister's address on the form, to which they said I wouldn't qualify for emergency housing as I already had accommodation at my sister's house. I told them that we didn't have accommodation and that I would provide my sister's address to be eligible to apply for housing. After the conundrum of this issue was settled they finally agreed to process the application and told me that I would be contacted within two months.
41. After two months, I hadn't heard from the housing service. After three months, the housing service still hadn't contacted me, so I phoned them to check on the progress of my application. The service informed me that there was no application in my name and that I would need to fill out another form. I told them I had already filled out a form and they said 'sorry, we don't have a record of your application'. I attended the service and filled out another application form. This time, I requested that the housing service photocopy the dated and stamped application so I could have proof, which they did under protest. The service then told me I would be contacted within another two months.
42. After another two months, I still hadn't heard from the service. After three months, or six months in total from the first time I filled out an application, I phoned them again. They informed me again they didn't have an application in my name. I attended the housing service office and showed them the stamped dated copy of my second application. It wasn't until I produced this copy of my application that they acknowledged that they did in fact have my application. I was always very polite and patient in dealing with services as it is my nature to be so, but to me I couldn't help but feel that this service had a system of losing forms, or making it difficult to complete forms as a deliberate strategy to deter people.
43. It was also at this point, they referred me to crisis accommodation housing. It was six months after initially walking into the housing service office that they referred me to a private crisis accommodation.

Salvation Army

44. During the 12 months of homelessness I attempted multiple avenues of looking for stable accommodation. One of these avenues was reaching out to the Salvation Army and asking if they had any accommodation options for myself and my four sons. They informed me that they didn't have housing for more than one mother and two children together, and asked if there was somewhere else my 'other' two children could go. There was a moment's desperation of contemplating which of my two children would benefit from separating from me for a bit while I got on my feet. That moment did not last long as I could not bear the thought of splitting the brothers up during this difficult time. We didn't have much, but we had each other and I felt it would be horrible to choose which children to send elsewhere. I didn't want to separate my children, or be faced with the choice of which two to take with me, and which other two to put in another form of accommodation or care.
45. I asked if they could refer me to another service where a mother could stay with all four of her children. The Salvation Army said that they only knew about the housing in their own area and didn't know about what housing was available in other areas. They didn't know where to refer me.
46. I kept cold calling various housing options I found using the internet on the local library computer. I ran out of phone credit before I could get hold of anyone who could offer any other housing options.

Crisis Accommodation Centre

47. The centre offered short-term crisis accommodation to single women, as well as women with children, with a restriction on boys over 12 years of age. My eldest son was 11 at the time, so there was a finite amount of time we would be able to stay. In the end, we were there for about four months.
48. They charged a lot. For $400 per week, we had one room with two sets of bunks for myself and all four boys. It had a communal bathroom in a dismal state, tiny communal kitchen, communal dining and TV room to share with the other people at the centre. There was only one key for the room so if one needed to use the toilet or shower we all moved about in a group together. We felt unsafe there and my children were anxious and unhappy. It was the only time my eldest son cried. It was worse than camping or sleeping in the car for him.

49. I recall reiterating to my children at the time we were staying at the centre of the importance of their education. I couldn't promise that they would never be homeless again, but if they concentrated on their studies, and worked hard, and made the most of opportunities that come their way, there would be less likelihood that they would ever have to be homeless again. I also took the time to teach my boys that it is better to live like this than to live in fear from my husband and how very important it was to me that they never harm their wives/partners. I told them when they find a companion to share their life with that they should cherish them, and never harm them, ever. I felt it was important, as they will be men one day to teach them what kind of men I expected them to be and why it was we were living like this. The children didn't miss any school (still attending their original school) during the 12 months of homelessness.

Rental accommodation

50. I attended numerous rental properties to find somewhere safer and more permanent for us to live. At one inspection, I was told by a local real estate agent that as a single unemployed mother with four children, my application would be at the bottom of the pile. She implied that I was wasting her time. I felt it was unfair for my hopes to be dismissed so carelessly. I was hurt but not deterred and kept politely attending open days. I was never offered anything, despite an impeccable rental history.
51. I attended open for inspections on Saturdays, as each weekday, I needed to drive my children 45 minutes each way to school. I didn't have enough petrol money to drive back to the crisis accommodation centre while the boys were at school. Having very limited funds I had to be conscious of fuel use and limit my driving. I spent my time while the kids were in school volunteering around the school, reading with the children, helping with weeding and other odd jobs.
52. The Chaplain at the school noticed me and asked what I was doing at the school every day. I explained that our current accommodation was too far away for me to drive the car back and forth, so I stayed at the school to pass the time until I could pick the boys up again.
53. The Chaplain made enquiries on our behalf and found a rental property, which was made available to those needing temporary housing after the bushfires. As those affected by the fires were moving back to their homes, the Chaplain knew of some houses that were becoming available and was able to refer me to some home owners that were willing to rent to us. It was much closer to the school and we moved into one as soon as it was available to us. We have since secured a more permanent rental option.

Intervention Order

54. My husband was still in contact with our children and would spend time with them every Saturday. I gave him $200 per week to take the children to the cinema, go bowling, or swimming. It was important for me that they build better memories of their father than the ones surrounding our departure. It was also important that they build a positive relationship with him, as I knew this would reflect on what kind of men they would grow to become.
55. The money also went towards a loan for the seven seater car that my husband was driving, but I did not have access to.
56. I didn't want my husband to find out where our rental property was for safety reasons, so I would take the children to the local McDonalds for my husband to collect them from there. I knew McDonalds has security cameras so I felt safe in making the change over there. He asked our children to show him where we were living and they did.
57. He began attending our rental property and asking for money and sex, threatening to take our children away if I didn't provide him with either. If I didn't come out to see him, he would sit in the car and lean on the car horn until I did.
58. I asked my friend, whose husband is a police officer, if there was anything I could do to stop him from coming to the house. She told me about Intervention Orders. I was able to ask her in detail what an Intervention Order meant. How can a piece of paper stop him from actually coming to my house? If I got an Intervention Order does that mean he'll lose his job and the children would suffer? I had so many questions on what an Intervention Order meant.

Financial abuse

59. When my husband became angry, he would drive the car erratically and speed through red lights. The car was in my name and so the red light and speeding fines would also be in my name, and I would have to pay the fine. Although I knew about nominating another driver at that time, the circumstances of a violent relationship meant it was not possible for me to nominate him as the other driver.
60. After I had left my husband, I was still forced to pay half of the loan for a car that he continued to drive and in which he continued to incur fines in my name. Even though I had attempted to live free from his violence, I was not free from his control and the financial strain of meeting the needs of four children, paying rent, and the occasional fine incurred by him having the family car.

Further family violence

61. In 2010, my husband asked if the family could spend Christmas together at his new house. The children were excited about the idea. I said we could all go, provided that I could pitch a tent in the back yard of the property for myself and the children. I didn't want myself and my husband to sleep under the same roof.
62. He didn't have any clothes, food or furniture for our children at his house, even though when I'd moved out in 2009, we left with only backpacks. He had access to all the furniture and clothes from the house we had shared. I was not aware that when the kids had weekends with their father, that they had no beds. As a result of learning the living conditions I later purchased some bunk beds from Savers to give the boys somewhere to sleep and brought some clothes from our home.
63. The night before Christmas 2010, he came into the tent I had pitched in the backyard and raped me while the children were asleep in front of the television inside the house. I did not consent in any way.
64. On New Year's Eve a week later, I entered the house to install the bunk beds for the children, as there was nowhere for them to sleep. This was the only time the children weren't with me when I went to his house. I had to fit the bunk beds in the back of the car and so I had left the children with a friend. I was there to provide for the children while they were in his care. I had no reason to suspect he would attack me at this time. My husband approached from behind while I was assembling bunk beds with his [REMOVED] handcuffs. After a brief scuffle he secured the handcuff to my right hand and the other link to the furniture and proceeded to brutally rape me. I tried to break my wrist to get out of the handcuffs but could not. After the sexual assault, he left me locked there for a further 45 minutes before releasing me.
65. I was extremely hurt, physically and emotionally, as I had only agreed to be at the house over the holiday period for the sake of the children, and my husband violently and repeatedly abused me.

Criminal Justice System

66. As a direct result of these attacks, I applied (with the advice of the friend mentioned above) for the Intervention Order against my husband in April 2011. The form required that I provide information on what the most recent incident of family violence was, and whether there had been other incidents of family violence in the past. I looked at the small area on the form that asked to list harm caused and realised that I would require significantly more space than was allocated. I started writing out more and more pages to attach to the form, which made me reflect on the extent of the abuse.
67. The friend that had answered my questions about what an Intervention Order meant accompanied me to the Court to apply for an Order. There was a moment during the proceedings that the Magistrate was going to dismiss my application as 'historical' since all I was showing him was hospital records from prior to 2009 and the children's school counsellor report also prior to 2009. As it was already 2011 when I was applying for this Intervention Order, he didn't see the need for one. I pleaded with the Magistrate that I don't want there to be another violent event and begged his assistance to keep us safe. I told him that 'I don't have any records of any recent events as I haven't told any professionals' his reply is significant when he said, 'you are their mother, what more qualifications do you need to speak on their behalf?' This was very empowering for me, as I felt the only records that could be seen in court are documents written by doctors, teachers, or other professionals. To stand there and speak for myself of my own experiences was very liberating. I did not know I was allowed to do that. He granted an Interim Order.

68. Although I did have the Order, I still did not feel safe. I knew my ex-husband was furious with me and that the threat against me could escalate. I also knew that he was dating a young lady and felt responsible for her not knowing his manipulative ways. There were many reasons to go to the police to press charges for the harm caused but mainly so that he would not do it to me or anyone else again.
69. I initially (and for a long time later) thought that I could not report the father of my children to the police. The granting of the Intervention Order gave me real courage, as did the assistance of the friend. I am very conscious that many women in my position have no access to such knowledge and support. I finally walked into the police station and by appointment was interviewed by the Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation Team officer there. It took three days in total to get a record of 10 years of abuse towards me. As I was raising boys, I felt it was important that they know the behaviour they had witnessed their father harm their mother was not ok, and that he take responsibility for his actions.
70. After my report to the police, it took four months until his house was searched and further investigations began. He now had notice that I was serious about talking.
71. This was an extremely high-risk time for me and I felt an imminent threat.
72. It took so long to finalise the police brief that he left the country and married another woman whom he had met and with whom he had built a relationship on the Internet. He has had another child.
73. When he returned to Australia, he was apprehended at the airport, arrested and charged. He had his passport confiscated by police and was placed on remand. He was released on bail and I was not notified. I later learnt that he was back in the country and immediately called the investigating officer who told me that he was apprehended and released two weeks after I had learned that he was back in the country. I felt this was an extremely scary time for me to learn that he had been living close by without me knowing, that he knew where the kids went to school and I wasn't alerted. I had no idea why he was back in the country and if I allowed my thoughts to wander, my fears would never end. I was afraid that he wanted to take at least one of the kids. I was also afraid that for the sake of his pride, it was better for him to say his wife was dead rather than divorced.
74. He was finally tried on seven counts of aggravated rape in June this year. The trial was extraordinarily difficult for me, as court proceedings are very intimidating in all ways. Thankfully, he was convicted. To give you some idea of the seriousness of what he had done, he was sentenced to 13 years imprisonment, with a 10 year non-parole period.

Integrating services and structural impediments

Access to drug and alcohol services

75. While living at the crisis accommodation centre, I met and heard the story of a mother who had substance abuse issues. She said that her mother had the same substance abuse issues and felt, fatalistically, that her daughter would grow up to inherit the same abuse issues. She said she wanted to be a better mum to her daughter. I spoke with her about seeking treatment so she could be a better mum to her daughter and she was open to the idea of getting help. I offered to look after her children while she attended rehab.
76. We attended the local Council who told us that there were no free drug and alcohol treatment services available for her in the area. We were then referred to a GP who told us that drug and alcohol treatment of this kind has the starting price of $2000. The GP said that the only place he knew that provided longer term treatment for drug and alcohol addiction was prison.
77. Neither the Council nor the GP could refer us to any further appropriate support services.

Centrelink

78. When I had decided to leave my husband, I attended Centrelink to try to find someone to assist me in understanding my entitlement to payments for myself and my children. The Centrelink representative I spoke to was unhelpful and confusing when asking me what payments I was entitled to. I did not know the answers and was worried I was applying for the wrong one. I became anxious and distressed. I was referred to a Centrelink social worker who identified that I required assistance and helpfully talked me through the appropriate payments.
79. Prior to this time, I didn't know that Centrelink offered the service of a social worker to people in distress and who didn't know the system. I would have found it helpful if a Centrelink representative had told me about this service earlier.

Child Support Payments

80. When I considered the option of child support payments for the four children, I thought I would have to have contact with my husband again for him to hand over the money. Child support services did not make it clear that I could receive these payments electronically, so I chose to forego the payments rather than risk seeing my husband again.
81. It would have been helpful if any of the services, whether it be Centrelink, a GP, a housing service, a counsellor or police, were able to provide me with this information.

Recommendations

82. Changing the name of Women's Refuges to Safe Houses would greatly ease the confusion as to what sort of facility it is. A distressed woman in fear and confusion would be more likely to run towards a Safe House purely because of its name.
83. Women who are isolated have very limited windows of opportunities to reach out. It is crucial when that first brave step is made that they are supported to keep going for themselves, and especially if there are children involved. The anxiety about whether or not she is making the right choice can be greatly alleviated if clear information is offered about the options a person has when they are subject to family violence. Many of the entry points that I tried to connect with on my journey didn't advise about the full scope of options available for victims of abuse.
84. There should be a fully funded community engagement program which can educate all people about avenues to services that are able to provide help. I think there should be other services, such as a GP, police, Salvation Army, Centrelink, teacher, or counsellor that can refer women to a service that can answer what an Intervention Order means, and can offer support when filling out legal forms or attend court with her. A service that knows what options are available, from the big issues (legal rights and medical help, housing) to all the little hurdles along the way (child support, changing schools, and the basics, food and clothing for women on the run). This one service would be responsible for both support and follow up so that police, GPs, counsellors and courts can be freed up to allow the one service to attend to these details.
85. There should be education in schools about healthy relationships so that children can understand concepts of abuse and healthy homes from a young age. Teenagers can learn more complex intricacies of relationships such as coercion, consent and companionship. This will assist in an understanding of how all people in all relationships should be treated, and how you should allow yourself to be treated.
86. The support services need to talk to each other as there needs to be a reliable referral system in place to assist victims/survivors with multiple needs. For example, I attended a White Ribbon day event in 2014 where the mainstream services had set up information booths. I asked each of the services if they knew where a single mother with four young children could find accommodation after experiencing family violence. It had taken me six months to find this form of housing myself three years earlier and I was interested to see if the system had changed. None of the services knew the answer, or knew where to refer me.

87. I think there is a place in the criminal justice system for restorative justice, where, in some cases, a victim can face their perpetrator and the perpetrator can apologise for their destructive and damaging behaviour. The perpetrator could make it clear that they will never repeat the actions which have led to the offence. They could be forced, in a closely monitored way, to do courses, programs, practical active things that could help to change their thinking for good. The victim could explain the effect that the family violence has had on them so that the perpetrator can have some understanding of the consequences of their actions. This might even take the place of a lengthy prison term, providing no further abuse occurs. Of course, if the abuse occurred again, none of this could apply. In a case like mine, there was never so much as a hint of contrition, so it would probably not be possible.

Accepted into evidence at the Royal Commission into Family Violence public hearing on Monday, 13 July 2015.

Witness statement of ‘Anjali Jana’

I, Anjali Jana,² say as follows:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my own knowledge, save where otherwise stated. Where I make statements based on information provided by others, I believe such information to be true.

Background

2. I was born in India and lived there for most of my life. Several years ago my parents arranged a marriage for me, to a man who was already living in Australia. We got married and I moved to Australia on a temporary visa.
3. My husband was working here as a civil engineer at the time and supported me for the first month or so that I was in the country, as I learnt about the new culture and the place where I was living. Initially everything was good within my marriage and he treated me really well.
4. I told him that I wanted to pursue my dream of working as a nurse in Australia. However, my qualifications were not recognised here. I found that to become qualified I would have to undertake a training course that would cost several thousand dollars. I asked my husband if I could have the money to pay for it, but he also said that he had no money and soon after that he stopped paying my expenses as well. It was at that point that he told me that I had to work, and he arranged with someone he knew at a major retailer to get me a job there. I thought that this would be OK as it would allow me to save up enough money for the training course. My husband never really gave me an answer but I thought that it would be OK if I gave him some of the money to help with my expenses as well.

My new job at a major retailer

5. I got the job with that major retailer and I have been employed there for over two years now. Initially, my husband was supportive of me working at the major retailer. We opened a joint bank account together and my wages went into that account but his wages went into his personal account, which I didn't have access to. I was able to save a few thousand dollars, half of what I needed for the course. However, he started to work less and less. Then, one day, I realised that he had spent all of the money that I had saved in just one month. I had no idea that he would spend it, he knew that was my savings for my course.
6. I was devastated and when I tried to talk to him about it he just told me that I was only allowed to work with my current employer, whether I liked it or not. He said that I wasn't allowed to become a nurse. I was so upset—that was my dream. I didn't want to argue with him, I was prepared to accept that this would be my life and I would never be able to achieve my dreams.
7. I was doing really well at work and I was given more shifts than I was contracted for, meaning that I was earning quite a bit of money. It was around about this time when I realised that he had stopped working altogether and was completely relying on me for money. There was no reason for this, as he had good qualifications and could have worked if he had wanted to. He started to make me put all of my money that I was earning directly into his personal bank account, so that I had nothing. I had to rely on him for access to my money, but he always spent it and said that we had no money for anything.

My husband's change in behaviour

8. When my husband stopped working, this is when his behaviour really started to change. I wasn't allowed to answer my phone after work or to call the other people I was working with to discuss shifts and if I did he would scream and yell at me. He knew what time my shifts at work were and if I was one minute late from work, I would have to call him to tell him, otherwise he would get really angry and yell at me. He didn't let me go out with my friends, I was only allowed to talk to his friends and their wives. When I first moved here, I used to visit my sister a lot, as she lived nearby but now I was hardly allowed to see her either. He wouldn't even let me talk to my parents, who still lived in India. I felt isolated and alone because of this.
9. He refused to do some things for himself, he told me it was my job, as his wife. For example, he needed medicine everyday but unless I stopped preparing dinner or what I was doing at the time and put the tablet in his hand, he would not take it, even if I left it right in front of him, he would just keep sitting there, watching TV. Later, he would blame me in front of the GP when he was told that his results were bad.
10. Even though I was the one working and he did nothing all day, I still had to come home and cook the dinner and clean up afterwards as well as doing all of the other cleaning and other housework. He did absolutely nothing. I also had to do everything when he wanted me to do it, I had to cook as soon as I got home because he was hungry even though I wasn't. He would complain if any little thing was wrong, like if there was too much salt in his dinner, he would scream at me about it. He never picked me up from work even though he had a car and I did not. I always had to catch the train even when I had shifts early in the morning and late at night, even when he was nearby or doing nothing. On top of that, I wasn't allowed to do anything, I wasn't allowed to watch TV unless he was, and it was only what he wanted to watch. There were lots of things like this that he did, small things really but which added up over time and made living intolerable. He was always controlling and I wasn't allowed to do anything but work, though he took all of the money anyway. I didn't know why he was doing this to me, what I had done.
11. All of these things continued to happen over a period of about a year and a half. My husband had isolated me, taken away my dream of being a nurse in Australia, forced me to work and left me with no money. It felt inescapable.
12. Because of all of this, I began to feel sad all of the time, and it was hard to feel motivated, particularly in terms of my work. Previously I had been an excellent employee but now I was having trouble concentrating and I found it hard to do a good job, like I used to. I found that I would make lots of mistakes at work. They started giving me less shifts as a result.

Realisation that my husband's behaviour was wrong

13. People at work had noticed the drop in my performance and I think that they were privately concerned for me but I didn't talk about my life at home with them. I didn't understand at the time that a marriage was supposed to be any different to what I was experiencing. I thought that this is just how marriage is supposed to be. However, when I spoke to the other people that I worked with, I began to see that they were really happy in their marriages and their lives. In contrast, I grew to realise that the marriage that I was living in was like being in hell. I knew that there was something wrong with my marriage, that the way that my husband was treating me was not right.
14. My manager had noticed that something wasn't right with me. She spoke to me and asked what was wrong. She was worried that it was something that was wrong in the workplace. I said no it wasn't, but I didn't want to say what the real problem was.

Seeking help in a time of crisis

15. Eventually, my manager spoke to me privately. By then, I knew that something was not right in my marriage so I told her about my home life and what was happening. She told me to see a GP, as I was feeling really down all of the time, and to get a referral to see a family counsellor. This happened around two months before I finally left my husband.

16. When I went to see the family counsellor with my husband, to try and fix our problems, he didn't let me talk at all. He told the counsellor all of these things about me that weren't true, to make me look bad. I cried the whole time. When the counsellor asked me about what was happening, I told her that I didn't feel that I was able to say anything after what my husband had said, that I needed another appointment. We arranged a new appointment and my husband drove us there. I went in alone, and he was supposed to go in after me but he never did. The counsellor gave me advice about how to change his behaviour. However, he refused to change his behaviour or to even try to improve things between us. I began to see that things were never going to change, that our marriage was never going to improve and that this is what my life would always be like.
17. It was around this time when my father had a stroke. I was really worried about him as he was really sick. I spoke to my sister and we decided that we would fly home to India to see him and help to look after him, which was our duty as daughters. I told my husband that I wanted to go and initially he was supportive of the idea. However, he changed his mind and said that I could not go because I would lose my job. I explained that I wouldn't, that I could get leave but he wouldn't listen. He said no. I thought about telling my sister everything then as she knew that something was going on, but I didn't.
18. I decided that if I couldn't go to India, at least I could save up some money and send it to my father for the special medicine he needed, which was very expensive. I saved $950 and because I didn't know how to get it to India I gave it to my husband to send to him. I thought that he would send it, but I found out later that he didn't.
19. Then, my mother was involved in a car accident. It was a real shock. I told my husband that I definitely had to go back now. My father even phoned my husband and asked if I could go back to see them. He picked me up from work that night after my father had called him. He was so angry that my father had called. He told me that he had booked my flights to go home. He told me that he had used the money that I had saved. That was the money for the medicine for my father. I would never have spent that money on the flights. I was so angry. I couldn't believe that he had done this. He just said that he had not sent it to India as we had no money, that I wasn't allowed to give money to my parents. This was unbelievable to me, that he would act in this way.
20. It was then that I knew that I definitely had to go to see my parents in India. I spoke to my employer about getting leave because my parents were sick and they were completely fine with it—just like my sister said they would be. They said that it was no problem. They just said that I should try to get a medical certificate but if I couldn't that would be OK too. I told my husband this but he told me I couldn't unless I was taking annual leave, not unpaid leave. I didn't care about the money, I was just so happy to be able to go. In the end I got half of the time as annual leave and the other half as unpaid leave.
21. He then refused to drive me to the airport. He said that since it was my idea to go that I had to figure it all out myself. I had never been before and I had no idea how to get there, I was never allowed to do anything, like catching a taxi. I asked my sister how to get there and she arranged to give me the money, she was very helpful. She couldn't drive me as her and her husband didn't want to get caught up in the problems I was having, as it would affect them too, especially as she was pregnant. He then told me that he had changed his mind, that he would drive me, but only if I transferred all of my money to him that I would receive for my annual leave. He then told me as well that I had to ask my parents for money and bring it back for him, to cover the two weeks that I didn't have paid leave for. He made me give him his pin number so that he could take the money as it came into my account. I did it so that he would let me go.
22. I finally left and saw my parents. I didn't tell them anything about my marriage. While I was there he would call me every day, and yell at me for all of these things that I didn't have control over. Even if I tried to talk to him nicely he would just yell. Eventually I stopped even answering the phone.

Escalating abuse

23. When I got back it was worse than before. We were sleeping in separate rooms, living like two strangers living in one house. It was too much. This is when I gave up on our marriage.

24. It was around this time that I had been feeling sad all of the time, like everything was hopeless, that I couldn't escape. It was like my mind had stopped working properly, I felt like I didn't know what I was doing, and what was happening. Sometimes I thought about committing suicide, there was the train track near where I lived and I thought about just jumping in front of it. I didn't know what to do, I had no one to talk to, both of my parents were sick and overseas, I had no friends and no money. My sister was pregnant and her husband didn't want to get involved. All I had were his friends but they didn't want to get involved either. I had no way to get out, no one to ask for help.
25. I realised eventually that when I was going to the train station to go to work he was following me there and watching. He would know exactly what seat I had been sitting on and what time my train came. When I asked him about it he admitted it and told me he was making sure I was going to work and not somewhere else. This made me really confused and angry because he always went out without telling me where, who with or when he would be back. I thought, why was he doing this to me then?
26. He was also hacking into my Skype, Facebook and email account as well as my phone to see who I had been calling and what I was saying. He would often yell at me and ask me why I was calling my sister or mother when I wasn't allowed to, and providing details that I had never told him, that's how I knew.
27. I asked him why he was following me and listening to all of my calls. I told him that I wanted some privacy in my life and since I couldn't have it, I didn't want the phone anymore. I gave it to him and he threw it at me. I moved and it smashed against the wall. I couldn't afford a new one. I was worried that if I was ever running late to work that I wouldn't be able to let my work know that I would be late. I felt completely alone and scared.
28. It was around this time that I received in the mail a traffic fine. I asked my husband why it had been sent to me as I don't have an Australian drivers licence as he had never helped me to learn or let me have lessons. I tried to learn by paying for my own lessons but he stopped me from going and said we didn't have enough money for that. He told me that he had transferred the fine to me, to say that I had been driving the car so that he would not lose the points. He said that if I didn't pay it I would get a second notice and then the Sheriff would come around.
29. I got the second notice but I decided that I wasn't going to accept this. I went to the police station and I spoke to the police officers there about the situation. They did a search and said that there was indeed no record of a driver's licence existing in my name. To prove then that I could not have been driving the car, I spoke to my work and they provided me with a letter confirming that I was at work at that time. After this, they said that I did not have to pay. This made me angry, it wasn't fair that he did this to me.

Escape

30. Soon after, on a hot day, we were at home and I was getting ready to go to sleep. I had an early shift the next day but it was too hot to sleep. My husband had the cooler in the lounge room and wouldn't let me move it into my bedroom so that I could sleep. I said that I would sleep out there in that room so that we could share it. But when I lay down to go to sleep he turned the TV on and put the volume up really loud so that I could not sleep, even though he was using the computer and not even watching it. I asked him to turn it down but he just yelled and told me to go if I didn't like it. I asked him again and he became furious. We had a huge fight. I have never been involved in such a huge argument before. He said to get out of the room or to get out of the house. I had nowhere else to go so I went into the other room—I was really scared, I didn't sleep at all.

31. The next day, without really knowing why, I took my passport and phone charger with me when I went to work. Maybe I thought that he would burn them. I went into work but I couldn't concentrate, I couldn't talk to anyone, it was all too much. My manager spoke to me and I admitted to her what was going on, that it was really bad. I knew that if I went back I would do something that I would regret, to myself, because this was not the life that I wanted. One of my colleagues was there and she gave me a 1800 number to call, I think it was the Woman's Domestic Violence Hotline. I called them but they said that they couldn't help me because I had a job. They told me to call WAYYS in Dandenong instead, so I did. WAYYS told me to come and see them in person. I asked my manager and she said that was absolutely fine, that I needed to go and sort this out and get my life in order because I couldn't work like this. She said that she would look after my shift and that I should take as long as I needed. My manager spoke to the area manager and he said that this was OK as well. Normally you have to give four days' notice for leave but they were great about letting me go with no notice at all. They were so supportive and lovely throughout the whole process.
32. I stayed at WAYYS for one night but then they refused me after that as I had a job, and they said it was for women that did not. I called my sister and told her the situation that I had left my husband. My husband had been around to her house accusing her of letting me stay there, threatening them. My brother-in-law said that I couldn't stay there more than one night, as he didn't want to get involved.
33. WAYYS gave me another number to call for a woman's refuge service. They said that they couldn't help me because I was working. I stayed at a friend's house from work and then they found me a room in a boarding house as my friend was afraid my husband would turn up at her house. He showed up at my work one time and created a disturbance but I wasn't there. I wasn't going back.
34. I called InTouch and they were able to help me. I had a social worker that was helping me with everything. She helped me to apply for an intervention order against my husband. This included a condition that he couldn't call me, my friends or my parents, as he had called them and threatened them. He also had to stay 200m away from me. The order lasted a year. She was my guardian angel. He stayed away from me after that and I haven't been in contact with him. They were also very helpful in helping me with my visa.
35. My husband called my parents and told them I had left, and they tried to pressure me to go back, because it is not socially acceptable in India to get divorced. I refused. I said I that I would not do it. My parents do not treat me the same anymore, not as a daughter. I hope though over time things will return to how they were.

A fresh start with the help of my employer

36. I am starting to get my life back on track after all of this. It has been about a year since I left. He took everything, every penny in my account, however I have been able to save up by working hard and my manager helped me to find extra shifts. In addition, the people at work have been so amazing in helping me get all of the basics that I needed. They gave me money to help me when I had first left my husband. They were like my family, when I had no one else to turn to. My employer has been so supportive, they did things like making sure that I was never rostered on alone until my intervention order was in place, in case my husband turned up at work, so that I was safe. They have been amazing.
37. I have saved enough money and I have started my training to be a nurse. I am so happy. However, I will still keep working one shift with my employer so I can stay in contact with all of my friends there.

Accepted into evidence at the Royal Commission into Family Violence public hearing on Thursday, 16 July 2015.

Witness statement of 'Melissa Brown'

I, Melissa Brown,³ say as follows:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my own knowledge, save where otherwise stated. Where I make statements based on information provided by others, I believe such information to be true.

Background

2. I am a mother of two, living with a physical disability. I am a survivor of domestic violence.
3. For about 10 years I was abused by my husband, Henry. He was also my sole carer.
4. I met Henry through disability sports. He is also physically disabled. We married in 2007 and have one son together, now aged 11. I also have a son from my previous marriage who is now 17 years old.
5. Henry started abusing me not long after the birth of our son. The abuse was sexual in nature and continued for many years. I tried to seek support for Henry, but he refused to accept help. I confided in one friend during this period of time as to what was going on at home.
6. Henry's behaviour got increasingly worse over the years. I confided in my psychiatrist and other mental health care workers. I was being treated for anorexia nervosa, which I have suffered on and off since I was a teenager. It also worsened as Henry's abuse escalated. He didn't see that his behaviour contributed to it.
7. My situation was further complicated by the fact that Henry was also my carer. I use a wheelchair and I relied on Henry for physical and practical support. This put me in a difficult position. I was too afraid to be on my own. I didn't think I could look after myself and my children due to my physical disabilities. Also, like everyone else, I was living in hope that he would change. So there was the emotional side of an abusive relationship, along with of course the financial. And then you compound it with the physical disability.
8. The abuse ended about a year ago when Henry was finally charged for various assaults I had sustained. He pleaded guilty to all charges and is currently serving a gaol sentence.

Events leading up to charges

9. I made one of many suicide attempts to get out of the abusive situation I was in. I thought that was the only way out. The last suicide attempt was roughly 11 months ago. When I presented at the Hospital's Emergency Department, the staff asked me why. I told them that Henry had raped me four times in one week. They asked me whether I wanted to go to a shelter, but I couldn't. I didn't want to leave my children. I returned home the next day.
10. The Emergency Department was the first one to report the abuse, finally. They reported it to the Child Protection Service.
11. I would have begged them not to say anything had I known as I would have been afraid of the repercussions. In hindsight I was relieved they didn't tell me they would report it.
12. No one asked me if I wanted it reported, I found out about it when a note was left in our letterbox asking that we contact Child Protection because when they first visited our house, we were not home.

Child Protection services

13. Child Protection came back to our house and spoke to Henry and I. They spoke to us together in the same room. They asked about the incidents that led to me telling the Emergency Department that he had raped me. They asked him bluntly. He was in such a huge amount of denial about what he was doing being a criminal offence. He was upfront with them. He said, yes, I have done that, and that he had done it before and would likely do it again. He said he had been violent, because he had to be. He tried to explain it as a couple arguing. I think Child Protection was very shocked. They were not expecting that.

14. Child Protection then talked with the children individually while they were at school. They asked about life at home. The children said they had seen Henry assault me on a couple of occasions, and that they had heard the arguing and that they were scared of him. That was a surprise to me. Even I was in denial about the impact it was having on the kids.
15. The second time they came to visit us at home, after they had spoken to the children, they again placed us in the same room together. That meeting lasted about two minutes. Henry lost his temper with them and left. It was scary. I had never seen him explode like that in front of other adults.
16. From there, Child Protection went to the Police.

Police involvement

17. When the Police became involved they firstly came and spoke to me one-on-one to discuss the options before they went any further, which I felt was good.
18. Henry and I were then called into the station together, by the Sexual Offences and Child Abuse Investigation Team (SOCIT). I was not expecting the outcome that happened that day. I did not see it coming.
19. They took Henry one way and asked me to come in the other direction. They asked me to make a statement but I wasn't ready. I was told that I would be going home on my own. They said he was being questioned in relation to what Child Protection had told them (the abuse and the rapes). They made sure I could get home safely by myself.
20. Henry was questioned. He confessed to everything because he believed it was what husbands do. He thought they would feel sorry for him. He fully believed all men did this but just didn't talk about it. He also blamed my mental health issues as an excuse for his behaviour. Not once did he realise his actions were contributing to the deterioration of my mental health. When you are being raped every four weeks, constantly harassed every night, yelled at, hit, called all sorts of names, you end up with no self-esteem and no confidence as a person.
21. At that point I was told the Police were seeking a family violence intervention order against him because I was not capable of protecting myself. They said words to the effect that, 'If you won't do it, we will.' It was not what I wanted at the time, but in hindsight, I'm grateful. I wish someone had done it years ago when I first spoke about it. I wish someone had stepped in like that a long time ago.

Intervention order

22. I was required to attend the first court hearing for the order. I felt supported because my Police contact, who stayed my point of contact throughout the whole ordeal, was there but I was also very nervous and anxious about having to be in the same room as Henry. I didn't want to see him. The matter ended up being adjourned because Henry didn't turn up. An interim order was made at this time.
23. Henry continued to breach that order by contacting me via social media and through text messages from his parents' mobiles. I reported it to the Police and they then took proceedings against Henry for breach of the order.
24. Henry's justification was, 'She can't survive without me.' To be honest, I didn't think I could either. That's the nature of family violence. It took me a while to understand how much control he had over my emotions and my ability to cope on my own.
25. Henry pleaded guilty which was a huge relief for me because it meant that I didn't have to attend the hearing and see him. He received a $400 fine and was required to undertake a 12 month behaviour change program for breaching the intervention order.
26. I refused to make a statement in the hope he would go to the behavioural change program and would change. I was hoping we could see it as a positive thing and that he would realise all the things I have been telling him all these years were true, and that his actions were wrong and had to stop. Finally, I thought someone else would back up what I had been telling him. All I ever wanted was for him to get help and to stop.

27. He was referred to the men's behavioural change program at Kildonan. He went twice. He was also asked to see a forensic psychologist.
28. The day he told Kildonan where to stick their program, he called me to abuse me, and that was the day I made a statement to the Police. A few days after the statement, he was arrested and charged and released on bail. It was a condition of his bail that he was not to make contact with me and yet he was still able to fight the intervention order and he had legal aid which supported him to continue to fight this losing battle.
29. I didn't hear from him for a couple of weeks until we had to go to the Children's Court because the Department of Human Services (DHS) sought a supervision order for the kids (which I discuss separately below).
30. After seeing him at the Children's Court Henry started making contact with me again through social media.
31. Eventually I contacted the Police to let them know he was breaching the order again, and his bail. He was arrested and remanded into custody and has been there ever since.
32. The Police took further breach proceedings for a persistent contravention of an intervention order. I again had to attend court for the hearing. The court was going to transfer him so he could attend but the hearing was again adjourned and because of this I didn't have to see him. After that, the Police told me not to come to the next hearing where his intervention order was ultimately extended by two years.

Children's Court

33. My eldest son and I had to attend the hearing for the supervision order. My youngest son was still under 10 so fortunately did not need to attend. We had to sit waiting in the same area as Henry and try not to look at him. It was very hard being in the same corridor waiting to be heard.
34. I didn't have a lawyer so Henry's lawyer spoke to me. I said I didn't want to hear what he had to say.
35. In the early stages, we attended a mediation as agreement couldn't be reached around supervision orders. DHS was there to represent themselves and Henry had his Legal Aid lawyer. No one was there to support me.
36. The support provided by the Salvation Army at the court was the only support I received.
37. When it went to a hearing, I was still required to turn up even though I was not contesting the orders. I wasn't allowed Legal Aid because of this. I was expected to sit at the same table as the lawyers and address the court. This was very intimidating for me.
38. Prior to hearing, I had to request that I did not see him on video link to the prison. I was assured by the court staff that my request would be granted, but it wasn't. I had to sit up the front with all the other lawyers and with Henry's image projected on the screen, all of which was very intimidating.
39. I wasn't given an opportunity to speak until close to the end of the hearing. When I finally did, I let the Judge know that I had requested he not be able to see me and had been assured of this. The Judge looked through the intervention order and apologised—he said he would take full responsibility for the mistake. Unfortunately at the Courts they can't keep you separate from the perpetrator.
40. Henry's lawyers were also very abrupt and very rude to me. They treated me as if I was an idiot. His Legal Aid lawyer said, 'Henry wants you to know he really loves you' and because I had been in hospital, referred to me being so used to being institutionalised. Henry wanted me to retract my statement. He even asked the kids that in his supervised access. I was dumbfounded. I was amazed at the ways in which 'no contact' can be broken. I told the Police.

County Court

41. By contrast, the County Court process was less stressful on me. Henry pleaded guilty so I didn't have to go through the trial.

42. I also received assistance from the witness assistance program. They helped me with a victim impact statement and sat with me through the hearings. They came to my house and made sure my statement was what I wanted to say. I found this process helpful.
43. During the hearing, I was kept in a remote witness room so I wouldn't have to see Henry. They also had a covered camera so I couldn't be seen. When the defence team started to try to blame me for Henry's conduct the Judge quickly shut them down.
44. I also attended sentencing via remote access in 2015. I heard the Judge handing down the sentence. Henry received several years with no parole period, further time on community corrections and intense therapy with community service. The prison sentence doesn't justify what he did to me. He pleaded guilty because he wanted a lighter sentence. I was disappointed that the courts could take that into account in favour of a lighter sentence. He showed no signs of remorse.

Gaps and downfalls

Legal support for victims

45. Amazingly, through the whole process the justice system allowed Henry to fight the supervision order. He was allowed to contest the intervention order even though he was charged and on bail. He was also allowed to contest the supervision orders with DHS. They gave him supervised access after he made suicide threats. He didn't understand that you couldn't make threats about your own life, and then a few days later apologise. It showed a pattern of instability. One second he'd be angry, then when there were repercussions he'd be sorry. He was still allowed to contest supervised access, even though there was no chance of him winning. I felt it was crazy. I wasted so many hours in court. Lawyers' time, court resources, legal aid resources were all ridiculously wasted during these processes.
46. Victims also need to be represented in the court process. I had no legal representation whatsoever throughout all processes. The intervention order was made by the Police. In the criminal matter, I was represented by the Police. In the Children's Court there was no representation for me because I wasn't contesting what DHS was asking for.
47. Henry on the other hand was given Legal Aid to contest the different orders, including the family violence order and the child supervision order. That made things very hard for me. It meant that every small court date, I had to attend. It also meant I had to liaise directly with Henry's lawyers in person, not knowing what I was doing. I also had to liaise directly with the lawyers my children were given through Legal Aid.

Magistrates' and Children's Court

48. There was no formal support services at the court. Emotional support would have been better than nothing. Being able to access someone with some advocacy skills would have also assisted me.
49. Fathers, mothers and children should all be kept separate from each other. My oldest son had to attend court because he was over 10 years old. At the very least, he should have been in a separate area to his dad.
50. Videolink services should also be available for people like myself not just prisoners. I had to attend most court dates in person.
51. I found the victim assistance program in the County Court really helpful. I wish I had received the same sort of support in the other courts.

Disability assistance

52. When Henry was removed from the house it took eight weeks to get someone to come in and do something as basic as give me a shower. They removed my carer but didn't put anything in place to back that up. For eight weeks, all I wanted was for Henry to come home. I was struggling to look after my kids. If I didn't have my oldest son, it would have been a lot worse. But it's not my son's job to give me a shower. I didn't want him to do that.
53. When he was removed, they should have asked me what my physical needs were. The Disability and Family Violence fund through DHS took eight weeks to be initiated. It should have happened straight away.

54. When I first met with SOCIT I talked to them about my dependence on him and that he was effectively my carer and they reiterated he can't return to home. I wished the Police had made that referral back then.
55. Child Protection eventually made the referral after I kept complaining. I then received 12 weeks of funding.
56. It has taken 12 months but I now have a disability worker through DHS.

Mandatory reporting

57. For me, unfortunately, there was no mandatory reporting. Because I am not under the age of 18, sexual assaults did not have to be reported. My psychiatrist and other mental health workers I sought assistance from knew about the abuse, but they did not have to report it nor did they ask me if I wanted it reported. I was not in a state where I would have been ready to report it to the Police.
58. I think mandatory reporting, no matter the person's age, should be implemented, across the healthcare field. They should have a duty of care to the patient and be compelled to report it. If that had of happened, this would have stopped 3, 4, or 5 years ago.
59. The reason behind mental health professionals not reporting it is because my actions were not impacting on anyone, so it was not their job to take action. Because it was Henry raping me, no one was under any obligation to help me. Nobody did anything.
60. When I was an inpatient in hospital, we had family therapy with Henry. Just the two of us. The issue of the rapes came out. When the therapist didn't agree with what Henry was saying, Henry got aggressive and the session was shut down and he was asked to leave. I was offered help to leave my marriage. But it was the same thing, I couldn't leave my children. Where would I go? What money would I go with? How do I tell my family? So, of course, I said no. If it had of been reported, that's two years I would have saved living with this. It shouldn't have taken a suicide attempt for someone to finally step in and stop it. The only way I would have stopped it is by me killing myself or him killing me. You start to believe the things that you are told—that you are stupid, that you are incapable of looking after yourself and that you need that person to survive. You hear it often enough, you are petrified to leave. I believed it. I didn't think I could look after myself.

Child support services

61. Whilst my sons received assistance from Legal Aid lawyers, they could have benefited from a carer or worker to help explain what their lawyers were saying to them. My eldest son has a language delay and I felt his lawyer was not well skilled in dealing with children with learning disabilities.
62. It would have also been helpful for the kids to have emergency counselling. One moment they had a Dad, the next he was gone. It was very hard on them. My youngest blames himself because he spoke to Child Protection. He thought he got his Dad into trouble. To this day he wants his Dad to come home. Dealing with my own issues, while hearing my child cry, 'I want Daddy to come home' is hard. My 10 year old is having extreme mood swings and has been diagnosed with severe depression. The life he knew was all of a sudden gone.
63. Because of the nature of the offences, Henry is not allowed any visitors under 18 years of age. The prison won't allow it. For the children, it is like their Dad has died. It is like he is dead. They are grieving for the loss of the family; they are grieving for the loss of their Dad. They don't know how to tell their friends that their Dad is in prison. They needed and still do need counselling. They should have had it in the beginning when they were brought home by Child Protection.
64. Berry Street has a six month waitlist for kids counselling. After nine months, he has finally been referred to counselling. I was able to get counselling through CASA, but they do not have kids counselling. CASA has gone well over their sixteen week support. Their support has been amazing.
65. And for my 17 year old, there is nothing. He has been referred to Headspace, but there is a waitlist.
66. We have had good workers at Child Protection. I was worried about my mental health issues causing trouble, but they have been very supportive. Even with a hospital admission for my anorexia, they have been supportive. We now have monthly Care Team meetings which include Child Protection, DHS, a disability support worker, the Principal from the kids' school, myself and one of my outreach workers.

Other matters

67. Maybe if there were better disability services while we were together, rather than the responsibility being on my partner to be a carer, I would have felt more confident to leave earlier. I was regularly told, 'We can't provide that, your husband can do it.' That puts a lot of pressure on any relationship. Our relationship became one of invalid and carer.
68. There's a lot of stigma involved with the kind of violence that was happening, especially with the sexual assault. No one wants to talk about that. Not many people understand it. A friend asked whether it was sex games gone wrong. Others blamed me for Henry's actions: 'You've been in hospital. You've got a mental health problem'. Or, 'You pushed him to do this'. It's almost like it was OK because I suffer with mental illness. It made his actions understandable. Justifiable.
69. The fact we were both disabled also presented issues. Henry was constantly put on an 'inspiration pedestal'. There was pressure to live up to that in people's eyes.
70. I have had very little privacy. Everything about my life, everyone knows. It is placed in reports. But because Henry is in prison, his privacy is fully protected.
71. I found the book Real Rape, Real Pain very helpful. It explains the hurdles and the way society justifies it. I am not the only one who has come up against these same things. I recommend it to the Commission. (Real Rape, Real Pain: Help for Women Sexually Assaulted by Male Partners by Patricia Eastal and Louise McOrmond-Plummer, published by Hybrid Publishers, Melbourne, 2006.)

Accepted into evidence at the Royal Commission into Family Violence public hearing on Wednesday, 22 July 2015.

Witness statement of 'Lyndal Ryan'

I, Lyndal Ryan,⁴ say as follows:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my own knowledge, save where otherwise stated. Where I make statements based on information provided by others, I believe such information to be true.

Introduction

2. I am 42 years old and have a Masters degree. I have spent most of my career with the Federal Government in Canberra but now live in Melbourne.
3. I have lived in very high-risk countries and experienced situations there where I was fearful for my safety. Nothing prepared me, however, for the fear of domestic violence. It's entirely different being frightened of someone you love, yet who is so unpredictable; someone who knows where you live, what your patterns are, what your vulnerabilities are; someone who knows how to manipulate you; and someone who is specifically targeting you.

Background

4. I have two children to my first husband, and met my violent ex-partner ('X') a year later. After a year with X we had a child together. During the pregnancy in 2012 I experienced escalating controlling, abusive and bullying behaviour, particularly towards my children (who were 8 and 5 at the time). For example, he would threaten to beat my son, deliberately run over the children's toys with his car and throw their belongings in the bin. My son in particular was terrified of X and would walk around the house with his head down avoiding any eye contact so he would not get into trouble.
5. Our home became a place of fear and intimidation. As I became desensitised to his behaviour throughout 2012 and 2013—and he convinced me what he was doing was OK—I became confused about my parenting and judgement of values and safety. As a result of his anti-social behaviour, I became increasingly socially isolated, which further removed me from benchmarks of acceptable behaviour.

Application for intervention order

6. In 2013 as part of their wellbeing curriculum at school, my children were asked how they resolved conflict at home. My son disclosed what was happening at home, and the Deputy Principal, who was also the student wellbeing coordinator, contacted me.
7. The way the school dealt with the situation was excellent. They didn't undermine me or make me feel like a bad parent. At that stage, I didn't realise what was happening to us was domestic violence. I needed someone else to say that what X was doing was not OK.
8. The school suggested that Child First become involved. X refused to engage with Child First, and when I provided them with a detailed list of things X had done, they organised a consultation meeting with a representative from Child Protection and a second meeting with a representative from the NGO Safe Futures and a police member from the local domestic violence unit.
9. When the police heard about the kinds of behaviour X had engaged in, I was told that on a scale of one to 10, what we were experiencing was eight out of 10. I was advised that the nature of the abuse required an intervention order (IVO) and either I would need to take that out, or the police would. I applied for the IVO in January 2014 listing the three children as protected people, which was granted for a year.
10. I didn't list myself as a protected person on the IVO application form because I thought that if I controlled the IVO process I could at least help X and keep him from getting more angry.
11. I have since learnt that we cannot help perpetrators of violence—as Rosie Batty clearly said when Luke died. Back then I believed I could, but when it became apparent I couldn't after two months of a dramatic escalation in threatening and abusive behaviour, the police subsequently took out a second IVO in March 2014 for one year listing me as a protected person.
12. Safe Futures were invaluable in providing me with advice, linking me with resources, and supporting me in person—particularly in navigating the court system, which was so daunting. They paid to have the locks changed on my house and installed switch lights. In addition, my mother flew over from London to live with me for four months because I was too frightened to live on my own in the house; and when she left I often had friends spend the night. This support, along with that of a psychologist, are what I attribute to me making it through the most terrifying and confusing year of my life.

X's conduct after the first IVO

13. Over the next nine months from the start of the IVO (January–September 2014), I supported X to attend a behaviour change program, which he commenced in February 2014 (but dropped out of) and organised ongoing visitation in public places with our daughter. I did this because I was advised by a private family lawyer that X would be granted access to her anyway through the Family Court. At this stage, I understood that X had a 'right' to see our daughter and didn't feel in a position to refuse access. I wrote a Parenting Plan with legal advice that set up the framework for these visits.
14. X's behaviour escalated and increasingly targeted me. He was incredibly abusive, would come to the house regularly in breach of the IVO and destroy property, he managed to fiddle the locks and enter the house, he turned the power off one night while I was inside, he smashed a window trying to break into the house, he would follow me around in his car trying to run me off the road—and indeed tried forcing me into his car on one occasion, he took our daughter from daycare also in breach of the IVO and Parenting Plan, and used his visitation access with her as opportunities to abuse me in front of her, often ignoring her entirely.
15. He would email me constantly and would phone me incessantly, sometimes using different numbers so I wouldn't recognise it was him. There were numerous terrifying incidents—and our daughter was present during almost all of them. X timed his visits to the house (in breach of the IVO) when my older children were with their father, so I was somehow able to protect them from what was occurring and maintain a level of normalcy for them.

16. During this time I largely locked myself in my home, too afraid to walk down my local street, go to my local shops, sit outside in my garden, or drive normal routes to and from school pickups. I was frightened to go to sleep, or even have a shower. I would drive around the block before going home, looking for his parked car or signs that he was at or near the house. At one point I lived out of my car, staying with friends that would have us because I was too frightened to return home. And when I did return home, I arranged for a friend to stay. I felt like a 'sitting duck' just waiting for him to come, helpless—with my only course of action to call 000 if X came. It was terrifying and my anxiety was severe, I slept with one hand on my mobile phone and one on the home phone. But yet I only reported a small fraction of these breaches because I was frightened of the repercussions from him and Child Protection. X was charged with some of the breaches, and served two weeks in prison in April 2014. Child Protection contacted me twice during this period, but did not open a case file as I was able to demonstrate I was acting protectively of my children. X started a second behaviour change program at my insistence following his release from prison.
17. As X continued to breach the IVO following his release from prison, I was advised I may need to relocate to a refuge. But this was a last resort for me as the upheaval would be dire with the three children, and I was fearful my ex-husband would seek full custody of my two eldest children. Staying safe in my own home was my priority.
18. During the most serious incident in September 2014, X tried to smash his way into the house. As I ran for the phone to call 000 he went to the front of the house and cut the phone line. Thankfully my mobile was charged and I managed to get to my mobile phone and dial 000. As I went through the (lengthy) questioning in this horrific ordeal, X attempted to climb in, cutting himself severely in the process. Glass was flying everywhere. I kept begging 000 to 'please just send the police' instead of questioning me—which I do understand is required, but when you feel you are about to be murdered, seems superfluous. Eventually X cut himself so badly he fled. The police arrived 10 minutes later. X was on the run for a week and eventually handed himself in to police. He served a second prison sentence of five weeks with a two month suspended sentence.
19. I was advised by X's behaviour change program that, during this incident, I was in a position where I could have been killed. They advised me that X was not out of control, but was choosing to behave in a violent and controlling way with no regard for his impact on us, and that I should cut all contact with X. I found the ongoing contact with X's behaviour change program facilitators invaluable. He helped me realize that X wasn't going to change and that I could, and should, stop all contact with X immediately, including stopping him from seeing our daughter.
20. I was contacted again by Child Protection who agreed that I should not allow X to see our daughter and that he would have to apply for court orders to arrange access. For the first time I felt I was in a position where I would be fully supported to draw a line with him—where I could keep my children and not allow him to see our daughter (and thus me). It was only with this complete cessation of all contact that I felt safer to report all breaches of the IVO. I wrote a letter to X while he was in prison in October 2014 advising him that I would no longer allow him to see our daughter and that I would now report every breach of the IVO.
21. At this time Safe Futures included me in a trial program of the SafeTCard. I made sure (via a friend) X knew I had the card and that he would be recorded if I pressed the alert button during a breach, and thus would not be able to counter my testimony. After receiving the card, and following his release from prison, X did not physically breach the IVO, although he continued to send me text messages, emails, and attempted to call me from unknown numbers. The card gave me increasing confidence to go out again, to feel safe in my own home, and indeed to sleep again at night.
22. Using the alert button on the SafeTCard can be done subtly so as not to alert and inflame the perpetrator, as well as circumventing the lengthy questioning required of the 000 process. These were significant issues the night X broke in to my house. While I do see benefits of a GPS ankle bracelet for the perpetrator, the SafeTCard provided me with an essential sense of safety and immediate (and discrete) access to help.

23. In January this year the children's IVO was extended by the police for another year, and I applied for mine to be extended in March, which it was, indefinitely. I plan to apply for an indefinite extension to the children's IVO in January 2016 as well. X has now been charged with the email, phone, and text message breaches to the IVO and will go to court in September 2015. I hope X will not be granted access to his daughter should he apply, as she will not be safe with him physically or psychologically, and he will use her to get access to me.
24. In May this year I was interviewed by SBS and ABC on my experience. As I wrapped up the ABC interview detailing the incidents, a parcel of presents arrived from X along with a letter begging me to reconsider our relationship and the IVO. It perfectly illustrated the emotional and psychological complexity of domestic violence and how perpetrators are able to keep convincing their partners to forgive them and give them another chance. Without full system support and a complete feeling of safety, it is an incredibly difficult situation to extract oneself from.
25. I have since learnt X has a long history of family violence. X fits perfectly with the description of a sociopath; and thankfully the early intervention alerted me to the pattern of escalation that inevitably ensued.
26. I gave back my SafeTCard in January 2015 after I heard that X had left the country. I have since got it back because I learnt that X never left the country, and am feeling frightened again knowing he has been charged for further breaches of the IVO and may act violently in desperation prior to his court hearing in September.

Reporting breaches of the intervention order

27. I am often asked why I did not report all of X's breaches of the IVO. I probably only reported about 10 of over 50 breaches. On occasions other people reported his breaches. The reasons I didn't were because:
 - 27.1 I had to see him in order to arrange for him to see our daughter (which a family lawyer had told me he would have rights to do under family law). If I reported all his breaches I was fearful of antagonising him further and placing me and our daughter at increased risk.
 - 27.2 I felt sorry for him—during the remorseful phases of domestic violence his pleas of love and desire for personal change were compelling.
 - 27.3 The police had on occasions told X it was me that reported him, which I felt compromised my safety.
 - 27.4 I was frightened that if Child Protection knew how frequently X was breaching the IVO they would determine I could not protect my children and I would lose custody. In my first meeting with Child Protection, they told me explicitly that they were not interested in me or my circumstances, their only concern was whether my children were protected by me or not. This made me feel highly anxious.
 - 27.5 X would often counter my breach reports with statements that I had agreed for him to be at the house.

What I felt 'worked' in my situation

28. The things that I felt worked for me were:
 - 28.1 Early intervention by the school and domestic violence unit of the police that informed yet didn't undermine me.
 - 28.2 Support from Safe Futures. I felt initially that I was on my own and that the only people completely on my side were Safe Futures. They supported me to manage the risk that X posed to me and my children. They understood the complexity of domestic violence and the complexity of my situation where I was trying desperately to keep X non-violent while protecting myself and my children at the same time. I felt judged by almost everyone else—the police, Child Protection, and even friends and family.

- 28.3 Engagement by the behaviour change program staff that worked with X. Both programs engaged with me regularly (and are in fact still in contact) and their insightful and informed advice was invaluable. As with Safe Futures, they genuinely understood the complex situation I was in.
- 28.4 The SafeTCard intervention. This changed my life dramatically. I felt I had the confidence to go out again and it made me feel safer in my own home.
- 28.5 The close proximity of the police to my home. They were able to respond quickly and became familiar with me and my situation (and thus became less judgemental over time).
- 28.6 The dedicated domestic violence unit of the police and staff that I became familiar with. I particularly appreciated their 'home visit' on one occasion.
- 28.7 Courts taking IVOs increasingly seriously.

What I felt could be improved

29. The matters which I feel could be improved are:

- 29.1 Family law allowing access by the perpetrator to their children. This placed me at ongoing and severely increased risk, as well as risk to our daughter. I would say that this was the primary cause of my protracted experience with fear and violence. This is a rights vs responsibilities debate; but why does X have a right to see his daughter when he is such a threat to her and me, and takes no responsibility for his role as a safe father. She is not safe with him, either physically or psychologically due to his sociopathic character. He used access to her as an opportunity to get to me.
 - 29.2 The role and approach of Child Protection. I felt they actually worked against me initially by demanding to know how I was protecting my children. I understand this is their role, but I was desperately doing everything I could to protect them, and I felt threatened I could lose them. If I had felt supported earlier on by Child Protection, I would have reported X's breaches much more readily. I welcomed the moment they told me I could stop X from seeing our daughter, and if he went to court I could subpoena their files showing their advice to cease contact. I wish I had received this support from Child Protection earlier.
 - 29.3 Police awareness of how what they say or do may place the victim at increased risk. Our protection needs to be paramount and they need to be careful what they reveal to the perpetrator.
 - 29.4 There needs to be some consideration as to the type of incarceration. When X went to jail he rallied with his fellow inmates about how they were OK and the system worked against them; they justified themselves as the victims. X's prison sentences were too short to result in behaviour change, it did not deter him from breaching the IVO. Perhaps some sort of secure rehabilitation centre with compulsory behaviour change program and community service might be an alternative.
30. My experience of domestic violence is not the sort that has been making headlines. I may not have had black eyes, but I did experience domestic violence that left me terrified and at times fearful for my life. Also, X's controlling and abusive behaviour was not fuelled by alcohol or drugs. The words of the behaviour change staff ring through here—men perpetrate domestic violence a) because they choose to; and b) because they can.
31. I do agree the roots of domestic violence lie in stereotypical attitudes towards women. We need to seriously address these issues, particularly how women are portrayed in our society. How are we raising our girls to value themselves, and how are we raising our boys to value girls? However, it is due to tertiary intervention that I am here today.

Witness statement of 'James Collins'

I, James Collins,⁵ say as follows:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my own knowledge, save where otherwise stated. Where I make statements based on information provided by others, I believe such information to be true.

Background

2. I grew up in a country town where the ideal of a man was someone macho, gruff, strong and silent. You had to be a drinker, you had to be one of the boys. I always put on a persona of being a tough guy. I am a big guy so it was easy to carry on this bluff. But underneath, I was a wimp.
3. I was quite isolated when I was a kid. My family was quite remote and my brother and sister and I were often left at home by ourselves. I was always a bit of a bully. There were a few times when I got called out on my behaviour. The guys at school would do the freeze out thing. They would cut me out and make me think about my behaviour for a little while, but I would always go back to what I was doing before. I was always alone, as a kid. It was the way I went through life.
4. The ultimatum to change my behaviour or leave came from my wife about five years ago. My wife and I had been married for about 15 years at this point. Throughout our entire marriage I had been psychologically abusive, manipulative and underhanded. I would be threatening and intimidating towards my wife and my family, yelling and screaming and punching walls. I kept my wife off balance all the time. I would hide things from her.
5. Around five years ago, my wife got to a point where she wasn't willing to put up with it any longer. As they were growing up, our kids, both boys, had started to mimic my behaviour and disrespect her. They would take my side on things. She was becoming isolated in our own home. She told me that I had to do something about my behaviour, or our marriage was over.
6. It was crunch time. It really made me think—I purport to be a father and a husband and to love my family. But what is the real truth?

Getting in touch with services

7. My wife had a friend who worked for Men's Referral Service. She contacted him and he agreed that what I was doing was abusive. He gave her some details which she passed onto me. I called Men's Referral Service, who referred me to an organisation called Kildonan UnitingCare (Kildonan). I rang Kildonan but they didn't have any openings in any of their programs for three months. It was coming up to Christmas time and all the programs were finishing up for the year.
8. While I was waiting to start one of the programs at Kildonan, I was trying to improve my behaviour myself. I was buying books so I could read up on passive aggression and those kind of issues. I read a couple of different books and these were consistent with what I saw myself as doing. In the meantime, I was going through a cycle of violence and remorse. I couldn't identify this pattern of behaviour at the time, but I later realised what I had been doing.
9. In February, I had four weeks of one-on-one sessions at Kildonan with one of the counsellors. I started to feel changes in myself at that stage, from talking to someone and receiving feedback on what I was saying.
10. Then I had the opportunity to start participating in some of the programs Kildonan offered.

Men's behavioural change programs

11. The first program I participated in was a Men's Behavioural Change program. This initially ran for eight weeks but was extended to 12 weeks. Within the broader Men's Behavioural Change program, I did several other programs including programs relating specifically to parenting. Overall, I participated in about four programs over a 12 month period. I refer to these programs collectively as MBC programs.

12. The MBC programs helped me to understand my own behaviour. I realised throughout the program that anxiety and depression had a big impact on my behaviour and my reactions to situations. I was able to recognise that my main issue was that, when people raised an issue with me, I thought they were having a go at me. Previously I used to feel very anxious when my wife would raise issues with me. It might be issues with the house, or with me or things I had done. I felt confronted, like I was being called out on it.
13. I got really defensive and anxious and I felt like I was being attacked. My response to the increased anxiety was to deny the issue, fight and get out. That would result in me becoming aggressive, angry and threatening in my behaviour. I would yell and scream and stomp around.
14. The MBC programs helped me to reflect on my behaviour and showed me how damaging that kind of behaviour was. The MBC programs made me realise I'm not the only person in the world with this problem. I was educated about the typical cycle of violence. This was mind blowing. We also did role playing. I put myself in my wife's position, which was a real eye-opener. I understood what she was going through, to a degree. I felt much more compassion for my wife after that.
15. The MBC programs also taught me techniques to deal with that depression and anxiety. One of the techniques that was suggested is to look out the window and breathe. I took up meditation which helped with recognising how to breathe and keep control.
16. I also learned to persevere in conversations where previously I would have become very anxious and exploded and left. On one occasion, I decided to sit through a whole conversation with my wife where we were discussing an issue. I forced myself to sit through it, despite the anxiety I was feeling. That was terrifying, sitting there talking to my wife. The first time I felt like my heart was going to stop. But I got through it—I didn't stomp off or yell and scream. I listened to my wife and I thought to myself, 'I'm not dead.' It was a breakthrough. Once I broke through that fear, it got better and better. We talk openly all the time now.
17. It was a mind-blowing experience for me. It helped me to see what was truly happening and gave me ways to stop falling back into the patterns of my old behaviour. If I'm not feeling right, I will lie in bed and go through where my mind is at and where I felt my best during the day and where I am struggling.
18. I am not as angry as I used to be. I am not abusive anymore, I don't yell and scream and intimidate my wife and family. I can calmly go through discussions instead of getting upset and stomping around and being a bully.
19. The MBC programs turned around the way I thought. The changes I experienced I will carry for the rest of my life; I have had a complete turnaround in the last five or six years. It is a wonderful gift to be given. My relationship with my wife is the best it has ever been, since our first year of marriage. My relationship with my boys has also improved dramatically. I can give them a hug now. We are a much warmer and closer family.

My perspective on MBC programs

Voluntary versus non-voluntary involvement

20. When I started doing the MBC programs, I was really motivated to change. Before I started, I had decided I was going to do something about myself and my behaviour. I didn't want to lose everything I had. I went in there the first day with the intention of being honest and open with what my experiences were and what I saw myself as being.
21. I don't know how effective the programs are when men are there involuntarily. Of the 12 men I started the first MBC program with, there were only four that were doing the program voluntarily. Once the guys had done the minimum that was required of them by the court, most of them disappeared and didn't stay involved any further. There was only one man (of those that were not there voluntarily) who continued involvement with the services after his court-ordered program finished. He started going to a support group.

22. If men are there because they are forced to be there, I'm not sure how they can confront the issues and start dealing with them and making changes. I was motivated compared with most men and I noted a big difference between my experience and those of men who were there involuntarily. A lot of them seemed to view themselves as victims. I think one key thing was that in order to change they needed to see themselves for who they truly are—the perpetrator, not the victim.

Support offered to women and children

23. Kildonan was very proactive about offering support to my wife and children as well. My wife attended a support group along the way that was for women whose partners were doing the MBC programs. I think these groups, and this support, is really important.

Increased demand

24. I understand that it is currently not possible, or at least it is very difficult, to voluntarily attend an MBC program. There is so much demand coming from court-ordered attendees that those who would voluntarily attend can't get a spot.
25. I think this is a real shame. Given how helpful the MBC programs were for me, I think there should be opportunities to participate for men who identify in themselves a need for change, as well as those who are ordered to do so by the court.

Ongoing supports

26. I am now part of a men's group, through my interfaith church community, that meets monthly. The men in the group are all older than me. It is good to hear the maturity and common sense that these men have by virtue of being older than me. They will listen and give feedback on what I have to say. We do working bees and other activities together.
27. I have had some treatment for my depression, but nothing ongoing. I am not on any medication at the moment. I also attend meditation sessions through my church.
28. About 12 months after I completed the MBC programs I got in touch with Men's Referral Service and No to Violence to see what other avenues were available to give something back. I started doing phone counselling but I had to stop in the end; I couldn't deal with it because it brought back too many memories. But I still touch base with these sorts of services occasionally. If I feel things aren't right, I will ring up and have a chat and get back on track. This sort of thing is not a fast process; you take three steps forward then a step back.
29. I think having had a mentor or someone I could talk to and be appreciated by would have made a big difference. There are people I meet now that I wish I had known 30 or 40 years ago. It might have made a big difference to my life.

The impact on my children

30. My two boys are 23 and 21. They are very aware of what I've done. I think it is important to talk about it, given what I've been through and what can happen. If their behaviour is not up to scratch then I help them make changes and be there with them. I am trying to help them as much as I can. I am trying to lead by example as to what can be done and what the outcomes can be.
31. My sons are lucky though. My sons have lots of friends who are both girls and boys. When I was growing up, the boys only spent time with the boys and you basically didn't talk to girls. I think this is important to have relationships with the opposite sex from a young age.

Message to other men

32. My message to other men in this situation would be that no matter what, you can still make a difference. Things aren't lost. Even if the relationship is gone, you can still be better than what you are. However, you have to be open to it and willing to be raw and honest and face some hard truths.

Witness statement of 'Jessica Morris'

I, Jessica Morris,⁶ say as follows:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my own knowledge, save where otherwise stated. Where I make statements based on information provided by others, I believe such information to be true.

Background

2. From a young age I was brought up, with my sister, by a foster family; our grandparents. I had a really beautiful upbringing; my grandparents were amazing. I had never experienced family violence during my childhood.
3. I am currently working as a receptionist for a financial company. I also work as a waitress on weekends.

My relationship with Sam

4. Sam and I got together in about February of 2014. We had been in a relationship for about seven months before the incident occurred which led to the police getting involved, and to me leaving the relationship.
5. Our relationship had been OK for a while, but slowly, it started to become violent. I wasn't living with Sam but I was with him nearly every night, at his parents' house. When he got kicked out at one stage and was living with some friends, I stayed with him there too.
6. Looking back now, the first signs of his violent behaviour were violence towards himself. He would get really angry but then be able to calm himself down. Slowly, he started to turn his anger onto me and blame me for things and that's when the violence towards me started.
7. Sam was verbally violent in the beginning but then became physically violent. There were probably six or seven times when he was physically violent towards me, over about four months.
8. He used to self-harm, and tell me that I could never leave him or he would kill himself. Once, he cut his leg in front of me to show me what he would do if I left him. He tried to hang himself once when I drove off on him. Another time, he actually had a gun and put it to his head.
9. One of the first times he was physically violent, he locked me in the shed and threw sawdust at me. The sawdust had a nail in it which hit me in the eye and left my eye bruised.
10. Another time, the day after my birthday, I left him and said the relationship was over. He called me and said he was about to commit suicide. I called the police and they came to my house. I explained what had happened and I said, "I can't deal with it." I didn't tell the police I had ended it because of violence, I just said he was out there, suicidal. The police didn't really ask questions about our relationship. They tried to ask one or two questions, but they didn't press me at all. I didn't want to tell them about the violence at that time anyway; I wasn't concerned about the violence then, I was more worried about Sam. At the time, I believed that he really would kill himself, and that it would be my fault because I made him feel that low.
11. I tried to call the police on another occasion. Sam was really angry with me and I was scared of him. We were at my foster parents' house, but no one was home. He had taken my car, my phone and everything else. I ran and hid and called the police on the home phone, but he found me on the phone before I was able to get through. He threw me down in the living room, and was punching me and hitting me. He threatened to kill my family.
12. I didn't try to call the police again after that. He was violent again towards me a couple more times before the incident where the police intervened.

The incident that led to police intervention

13. In September of last year, Sam had picked me up from work in his car. It was about 9:00 pm when he picked me up. He locked the doors and assaulted me in his car. It went for a few hours. This time felt very different to previous times. Before, there had always been remorse and he would realise what he was doing and stop and apologise. This time, it felt really dark. I honestly didn't know if I would get out alive. The abuse was constant, it wouldn't end.
14. We were driving around an industrial area with lots of factories so there was no one around. I couldn't get out of the car. I said to myself, 'Once we see the main road, I will scream for help.' It was about 11 o'clock at night by this time. We got close to the main road. Sam had pinned me down but I kicked out the windscreen and screamed my lungs out. A lady who was driving past heard me. I found out later she was only a week off giving birth. I jumped out of the car. She drove her car towards me and I just ran into her car, she put me in it and we drove away.
15. Sam latched on to the side of the car and tried to pull me out. The lady was freaking out. She couldn't call the police because she was driving, but someone else saw what was happening, pulled over and called the police.

Police response

16. The police arrived at the scene. They put Sam in the police car and they took me down to the police station. One of the police officers was driving me back to the station. He was lovely. He was saying to me during the drive, 'You don't have to make a statement, you don't have to do anything, but you have to realise that it's not OK.'
17. When I arrived at the police station, they left me with a female police officer and I told her what happened and she took a statement from me. I didn't want to sign it, to make it official. Ben, the constable who ended up taking on the case, then came in. I didn't like Ben at first. He really wanted me to sign my statement to help him to lay charges against Sam. Looking back, I realise now he had my best interests at heart.
18. Ben talked to me about intervention orders and what that meant. I decided I wanted to make an application for an intervention order but that I didn't want to make a statement. I loved Sam and I didn't want to get him in trouble. I didn't want to feel guilty. I thought it would be my fault if he was in gaol.
19. The police were really good. They didn't pressure me, but they did talk about why they thought it was important for me to make a statement. Ben said things to me like, 'It's not fair, it's not right. You shouldn't have to deal with this, he shouldn't get away with this.' They tried to make me understand that this behaviour was not real love. They asked me to read my statement out loud. After I read it, they said, 'Do you think this is OK?' I knew it wasn't OK.
20. They also told me that they knew about another girl who had been abused by Sam. I didn't know about this previous girl. I knew she was an ex-girlfriend of Sam's, and I remember asking his mum what happened between them. His mum lied to me about it, and Sam would always lie to me about it too. I realised she had gone to the police for family violence too.
21. Finding out that someone else had been through what I had been through made a big difference to me. It really made me think about the fact that, if I didn't do something, another girl might have to go through the same thing.
22. I decided I would sign my statement.
23. Up until the time the police got involved, I hadn't told anyone in my family how Sam was treating me. I think I was ashamed. I also didn't know myself what was even happening; I was numb, I was in survival mode. I didn't think it was his fault and I was always trying to help him through stuff. I knew that if my family found out, they would think badly of him and I didn't want that.

The impact of the police response

24. If someone hadn't pulled over and involved the police, Sam might have eventually stopped and apologised and begged me for forgiveness. If he had, I would have forgiven him. You just want the violence to stop, your head is numb, you can't even think.
25. Looking back, that day in the station, if the police had not encouraged me to make a statement, I think I would have stayed in the relationship and, honestly, I think I would have died in that relationship. That's where it was headed. I am so grateful that the police encouraged me to make that statement, and took the time to help me understand that what Sam was doing was not right and that I didn't deserve it.
26. A big part of what the police did was make me feel like I had the power to stand up for myself and that I didn't have to put up with what had been happening. They helped me realise that it wasn't up to me to take care of Sam or protect him, that justice should take its course and that they wanted to help me by charging him.
27. Their support was amazing. I can imagine that they would speak to so many women, go to so many women's houses and tell those women to take a stand.
28. I feel really positive about my experience with the police. They have taken the whole journey with me, they didn't just take the statement and leave me to deal with the aftermath. I still email Ben, the constable who was there on that awful night.
29. He worked really hard on my case. He asked my sister and my aunty to come down to the station and give witness statements. He got me to write a victim impact statement. He was the one who told me about the work the Royal Commission was doing. He emailed me the details of the Royal Commission's community consultations and said I should go. I emailed him afterwards to thank him for his support. He emailed me back saying, 'You should be proud of yourself.' He has supported me through everything.

Intervention order and criminal proceedings

30. After the incident, the police charged Sam with various offences, including false imprisonment. I think Sam went straight to gaol for a month because his lawyer said not to apply for bail. While he was in gaol, the police applied for an intervention order (IVO) on my behalf. I went to court when we applied for the IVO and I saw him on the video screen, from gaol. The application was successful and the IVO said he couldn't come near me at all.
31. He got out on bail after a month, but had to stick to some conditions, including to do a rehabilitation program. He went to rehab, then moved to a place in St Kilda. He had some drug and alcohol issues, although he never told me about them and I didn't really realise at the time. I still don't know what he was into. His mum had her suspicions as well and she would try to talk to me about it. There was definitely ice involved. I think his drug use did add to the violence and there was a definite cycle in his behaviour. However, at the same time, he made his own decision to be violent.
32. Before the IVO had been put into place he sent me a note through his mum. However, after he got out on bail, he obeyed the IVO.
33. He pleaded guilty to the criminal charges and was sentenced a couple of weeks ago. I didn't have to give evidence but I went to the hearing and I saw him in person for the first time since the incident. I read my victim impact statement aloud in court.
34. He was sentenced to six months in gaol. He has appealed that sentence, so I am waiting to see what the final outcome is. The case is going from the Magistrates' Court to the County Court. The case will be heard in September 2015, exactly a year since the incident that night. I am not focussing on the outcome of the appeal though. He can't control me anymore.
35. The IVO will be in place until October. At that point, I will consider whether I need to extend it or not. I think that by that time, he will either have learned or, unfortunately, he will be on to his next victim.

36. At some stages during the process, after the charges had been laid, I changed my mind about wanting the charges to proceed. I saw the whole process ahead of me and I didn't want to go through it. I felt like it was my fault and I was still wanting to help Sam. The police played a role in that shift in my decision making. I would talk to Ben about my concerns, and say I was worried about Sam, and Ben would say, 'He will get what he needs, it is not up to you to look after him.' I feel glad now that Ben encouraged me.
37. When I went to court for the sentencing hearing Ben drove me in and sat next to me in court. He will be with me at the next court case in September. He really did support me through the whole process.

Reflecting on the court process

38. It's hard leaving the relationship. What's even harder is making a statement and going through a long court process. I am unsure how other court cases have gone, but mine has been a long process where he has played victim to the courts, including making excuses based on his drug use and unstable upbringing. Why would any women want to go through that? She wants to leave the violent relationship, but it doesn't end; she has to remain linked to him through a long court process and watch him plead victim. At the end of it, he eventually gets off with a light sentence. She has suffered for a long time and to an extent she is not taken seriously. What message does that send to the offenders? How is that encouraging the victim to speak up?

Events after the police response

39. The police linked me into WAYSS Domestic Violence Outreach Program (WAYSS) straight away. I went there with my aunty. That was the first time I realised I had been in a domestic violent relationship.
40. The worker from WAYSS had a questionnaire which had a series of questions about our relationship, with healthy and unhealthy factors set out in two columns. All of my answers were factors that appeared in the unhealthy column.
41. After completing the questionnaire, the worker said I was in a domestic violent relationship. She said that in seven years of working, she had never seen a relationship become so violent so quickly. Sam and I had only been together for seven months. The worker said that if I had stayed in the relationship, I would have died. That's when it really sunk in.
42. From there, the worker referred me to Windermere, where I started to see a counsellor. That has been amazing. I have learnt so much about family violence and relationships. It's incredible.
43. My counsellor has been one of the most important supports I have had throughout this whole process. She is amazing. I now see things from a completely different perspective. I am on the lookout now, too. Next time I am in a relationship, I will be able to recognise the signs of domestic violence and I won't let myself get stuck in that sort of position again. I now see other women and I know when they are in a relationship of domestic violence, I can tell from body language and other signs. The way these men work is very calculated. They don't beat you in public but in private. I made excuses for Sam and I believed him when he told me that it was my actions that led him to do this. Over time, with the manipulation and control, you believe this. My counsellor pointed out that Sam knew what he was doing and that he made the conscious decision to beat me behind closed doors.
44. After the incident happened, Sam's mum said to me, 'I've been there too, it's fine, you'll get through it.' That makes me so angry now. She didn't take a stand when it was happening to her and then she let her son do it to me. She is enabling this to continue. He obviously saw this kind of violence in his own childhood and understood that it was OK or that it was love, or something. Sam's mother now hides it for him and is letting him hide it. If he could bring it to the surface and understand that what he did was wrong and that he can change, he would be able to change.
45. I also understand that, regardless of his childhood, or the drugs, behaving in this way is a choice that he makes. He is his own person and can make his own choices.

Victim versus survivor

46. I don't like the label of 'victim'. Throughout the whole process I was referred to as a victim—'victim's assistance', a 'victim impact statement'. Once a woman leaves that relationship, it should be about survival. I was a victim, and I can label myself as that, but I am not a victim anymore. I am now a survivor.
47. I think the language we use is important, and I think people should be really conscious of how they label people who have experienced domestic violence.

Message to other women

48. My message to other women in this situation is that you do not deserve that kind of treatment. Women are so loving and nurturing and it's in our nature to put up with this kind of behaviour. But no one deserves it, and it's not OK at all. They say the worst part is leaving the relationship, and I think that's right.
49. You need to realise that you deserve real love, a relationship where you aren't in fear, where you are free to live your life. That's true love.
50. It is not going to be easy when you leave that relationship; but it will get easier. If you reach out for help, the help will be there.

Accepted into evidence at the Royal Commission into Family Violence public hearing on Monday, 3 August 2015.

Witness statement of 'Rebecca Smith'

I, Rebecca Smith,⁷ say as follows:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my own knowledge, save where otherwise stated. Where I make statements based on information provided by others, I believe such information to be true.

The relationship

2. In 2001, when I turned 22, I entered a relationship which became abusive; physically, emotionally and financially. I was in that relationship for three and a half years.
3. The violence escalated over the three and a half years and I tried to leave several times. Incidents included having my finger broken, being choked and, on a number of occasions, having a knife held up to my throat whilst being told that if I left, not only would I be killed and buried in the backyard, but that he would go after my family and friends.
4. The first time I involved the police was when my ex-partner held me hostage at gunpoint on my birthday one year. However, the response I got from the police was very much a boys' club response which deterred me from calling again. My ex-partner then used that lack of response from the police against me, and it became part of his controlling and abusive behaviour. He would do something, and then taunt me with the fact that there was no point calling the police because they wouldn't do anything anyway.
5. At the same time, he became involved in criminal behaviour. He was dealing drugs from our home. His brothers had also moved in and were involved. I was scared that if the police got involved, they wouldn't believe that I had nothing to do with the drug dealing. There were all these different levels of fear that stopped me from calling the police again.
6. It took three and a half years, and several attempts, before I left for the final time. The tipping point for leaving was not what an outsider might have expected. It came when my ex-partner refused to visit my brother, when my brother had to go into hospital. For me, that was the lightbulb moment. I realised that I did not want to spend another moment with someone who was not only so disrespectful to me, but also treated my family so badly. Had the situation been reversed, and one of his siblings been in hospital, I would have been there in a second.

7. We had stopped living together a little while earlier. I asked him to come and pick up his things that were at my house, and said we should end things. A week later, he started stalking me. This was in 2005. The stalking continued up until last year.

Events after the relationship

8. We were both living in the same suburb, at the time I ended the relationship. As a result, I continued to see him around that suburb when I was out on weekends or after work. Late in 2005, an incident occurred when I was out one night. My ex-partner was very threatening towards me and I became too scared to go home, I thought he would be there waiting for me. I stayed out because I didn't want to go home. That night, I was raped by a stranger. It was a traumatising experience, but I am also really angry about it. I feel like it would never had happened had I felt safe to go home.
9. In around 2006, I saw my ex-partner at our local pub one evening. He was being horrible towards me. The barman happened to be a friend of his, and witnessed what happened. This friend said to me, 'You need to take out an intervention order against him'. That gave me a lot of courage.
10. Later that night, my ex-partner sent me a text message with a threat to kill me. This, combined with the comment from his friend, gave me the courage to go to the local police station to find out how I could go about getting an intervention order.

The first attempt to seek an intervention order

Police response

11. I went to the local police station and told the police officer in charge about the violence I had experienced from my ex-partner, about the current events, and that I had received a threat to kill. I showed him the text message that contained the threat. I told the police officer that I wanted to apply for an intervention order, and asked him what the process was. I had no idea how to go about it. I had never had an experience of family violence in my upbringing and very little exposure to the justice system at all.
12. The response from the police office was, 'Go to the Magistrates' Court and speak to the Registrar.' That was it. He didn't give me any referrals or ask any further questions. He also did not take a statement from me about the threat to kill or the other conduct I had disclosed to him.

Magistrates' Court

13. Shortly after that, I went to the Magistrates' Court and applied for an interim intervention order. I didn't know where my ex-partner lived at that time. I got two extensions to the interim order because on the first two times I attended court the police had not been able to find my ex-partner to serve him and so the matter could not proceed. Having the interim order extended while the police kept trying to find him was a relatively straightforward process and on each occasion I had my older brother and my best friend there as my support people and as witnesses if necessary. The Magistrates I had appeared before were all reasonably sympathetic.
14. In January 2007, I received another Notice of Hearing and assumed that this too would not go ahead because I had never been told that he had been served with my application. I thought that, as on the two previous occasions, it would just be a case of me applying to extend the interim intervention order until he could be served. Given my previous experiences, I decided I didn't need my older brother or best friend with me. They had previously taken time off work so they could come with me and I didn't want to inconvenience them anymore. I said to my family and friends, 'Don't worry about coming, I am just doing the same thing again and I will be fine.'
15. However, as it turned out, my ex-partner had been served with my application and so this hearing was for the final order. I didn't realise this was the case, and there was no assistance provided to explain what it meant. I had no legal advice.

16. On the day of the hearing I was driving to the court and I saw my ex-partner standing out the front having a cigarette with an ex-housemate of mine. This ex-housemate was a friend of my ex-partner's, who had witnessed the violence. He had seen my ex-partner bang my head repeatedly on the kitchen table and had done nothing. I went into shock at seeing them.
17. When I got inside the court I went to the Registrar and asked what I should do. I told the Registrar I didn't realise my ex-partner was coming to the hearing, I didn't have any support people and I didn't know what to do. I was crying and shaking. He asked me if I wanted to see the applicant support worker, and shortly afterwards pointed towards someone who I assumed to be that person. I went over to her and said, 'Are you the applicant support worker?' and she said, 'Yes, I am'. I had a conversation with her where I told her the events that had occurred since the interim order had been in place. She tried to get me to agree to an undertaking. She seemed very cold and I started becoming concerned. In fact, as I found out when we were in court, she was not the applicant support worker at all, but my ex-partner's lawyer.
18. After having spoken with this person who I thought was the applicant support worker, I called my Dad who, on hearing how upset I was, told me to try to get the hearing adjourned to the afternoon and that he would drive down to attend with me. He lives quite far away and I knew it would be at least two hours before he arrived. When we got into the hearing I explained to the Magistrate what had happened. The Magistrate eventually agreed to adjourn the hearing until the afternoon but he was not pleased about it.
19. In the break I called everyone I knew, but no one could get out of work to come down to help me. After lunch, the hearing was called back on and Dad still wasn't there. I had to stand up and represent myself. I didn't have any support people present. I wasn't prepared at all. Stupidly, I had deleted the text message which contained the threat to kill, just three days earlier. I didn't have any witnesses present. I then had to cross-examine my ex-partner. I don't even know what came out of my mouth. I was like jelly the whole time. It was horrible. At the end, the Magistrate was not convinced I had enough proof and said it was a case of 'He said, she said'. The final intervention order was not granted.
20. I walked out. I was in a flood of tears at that point, I felt so numb. The applicant support worker then finally located me. As she was taking me into her office I saw my ex-partner, his lawyer and the ex-housemate coming out of the court high-fiving and laughing, and I could hear my ex-partner making comments about me. My Dad then arrived.
21. It was a totally disempowering, traumatising experience.

Events after my experience at the Magistrates' Court

22. The harassing and threatening behaviour from my ex-partner continued at a relatively low level from then on, including hang up phone calls, clothes that had been hanging on the clothes line being cut up and being menacing towards me whenever we were out at the same place together.
23. After the rape, I had made an application to the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal (VOCAT). Through VOCAT, I had been able to access counselling services. Through these counselling sessions, I had been made more aware of other services that were available to me to support me with the family violence I had experienced and was continuing to experience. For the first time, I started to become aware that there were people who could help me. Previously, I had disclosed the family violence to GPs who would minimise the violence or didn't respond.
24. In mid-2007, I saw an ad for the safe steps Volunteer Survivor Advocate Program. This program empowers women who have experienced family violence to break their silence and have a voice in the prevention of violence against women and children. Women who have survived family violence are trained and supported on how to use their personal story to change society's attitudes and beliefs that fuel and enable violence against women.
25. This was an amazing program to be involved in, and really had a significant impact on me. The program has given me the ability to do something with those negative experiences—to help me channel change processes to ensure people experiencing those things now don't have to go through what I have gone through.

The second attempt to seek an intervention order

26. In the period following the rape, I had gone through the VOCAT processes and received an outcome. As part of this process I had participated in a closed VOCAT hearing. I had the experience of speaking to a Magistrate, who believed what I had to say, and I felt validated. Even though the person who raped me had left the country and was not prosecuted, I felt satisfied with having spoken about my experience and having been believed.
27. As a result, when the harassment by my ex-partner escalated again in 2010, I had the confidence to decide to try again to seek an intervention order. I felt empowered enough and removed from the relationship enough to proceed. The escalation of the harassment in 2010 involved harassing phone calls and threats when we were out and about.
28. I reported this behaviour to the police and on this occasion the police took a statement from me and heard the whole history of the relationship. The police then made the application for the intervention order on my behalf. The hearing was also held at the Family Violence Division of the Heidelberg Magistrates' Court. I felt a huge difference walking into the court knowing that the police were on my side. I also felt comfortable with the court itself, because the VOCAT proceeding had been held at Heidelberg Magistrates' Court too.
29. I located the applicant support worker and asked to see identification. In the hearing itself, I had the police, the applicant support worker and a support person present to assist me. I didn't have to stand up to represent myself. I didn't even have to give evidence because he didn't oppose the order. I was conscious of the fact that it was a specialist family violence division. I walked in knowing the Magistrate had a higher level of understanding of family violence. It was also a closed court which made me feel a lot better.
30. The intervention order was put into place for a 12 month period. The entire process was the complete opposite of the first experience I had at the first Magistrates' Court. I felt like I had been listened to, believed and supported. I felt so much more confident and empowered. I couldn't believe the difference.
31. After having reported the family violence to the police, I also received a call from Berry Street offering me counselling and support. I was adequately supported at that stage, as a result of my experience through VOCAT, and didn't need to take up their offer, but I was so grateful that it had occurred. It would have made a huge difference had this referral been made the first time.

Current circumstances

32. I haven't felt the need to extend the intervention order since it lapsed in 2011. Over the last four years there has been the odd attempt to contact me but I have now blocked his number and I am using the tactic of ignoring him completely. I am treating him as completely insignificant. I am very secure and happy with my current partner and feel I am getting on with my life.

Reflections on my experiences

33. One of the most distressing aspects of the violence I experienced was the way, after the relationship ended, my ex-partner was able to use the system against me. My first experience at the Magistrates' Court was very disempowering and re-traumatised me to an even greater extent than before. It made things so much worse.
34. As I stated above, I submitted a claim through VOCAT for the rape I experienced in 2005. I received $10,000 compensation. I later also submitted a claim for the family violence and received $1000 compensation. I found that interesting. The rape was horrible, it had really affected my life—but it was one night of my life. The family violence affected my life for years and was damaging on so many levels. I couldn't work out how they came to those figures. Given the extent to which you are emotionally and psychologically damaged by the family violence conduct, it is odd that it weighed less on the scale.
35. The police and the Centre Against Sexual Assault were very proactive in providing me with information and referrals to services in relation to the rape, but there was far less information provided to me in relation to the family violence.

36. The key differences between my experience in 2007 at the Magistrates' Court and the experience at Heidelberg in 2010, included the following.
- 36.1 The initial police response: when I walked into the police station and explained my story, I was taken seriously by police as someone who was reporting criminal conduct. They believed what I had to say.
 - 36.2 Police taking up the application for the intervention order on my behalf: having the police in court, on my side, made me feel so much more confident. I didn't feel like I was by myself and having to be my own advocate.
 - 36.3 Clearly identified applicant support workers: not being able to locate the applicant support worker, and having my ex-partner's lawyer wrongly identify herself as the applicant support worker, made the first experience at the Magistrates' Court even worse. It is important that the applicant support worker is clearly and easily identified.
 - 36.4 Better understanding of the process: I had a support person and was not caught unprepared. I knew what the hearing would involve.
 - 36.5 Having the hearing in the specialist family violence division of the Heidelberg Magistrates' Court: the way the Magistrate behaved was respectful and compassionate and he clearly had a much greater understanding of family violence than the Magistrate in the first Magistrates' Court. This made a huge difference.
 - 36.6 Having a closed court: the first hearing was humiliating in that members of the public were able to witness the entire thing. It made representing myself so much harder as I was conscious of all the people watching. I felt much more comfortable in the second hearing when the court was closed to the public.
7. I realised, after having gone through the process of seeking an intervention order on these two separate occasions, it is possible to have very different experiences of the same process. I hope that women in my situation in the future don't have to experience what I went through at the first Magistrates' Court.

Accepted into evidence at the Royal Commission into Family Violence public hearing on Tuesday, 4 August 2015.

Witness statement of 'Anna Jones'

I, Anna Jones,⁸ say as follows:

- 1. I make this statement on the basis of my own knowledge, save where otherwise stated. Where I make statements based on information provided by others, I believe such information to be true.
- 2. Based on my experience, I aim to highlight what I see to be some of the greatest challenges affecting victims of family violence who are seeking protection via the legal system. As a private person, sharing my story and matters of my private life in a court room has proved to be incredibly difficult for me and, like many women, was almost reason enough to not take legal action against my ex-husband in the first place.

My experience of family violence

- 3. After a time living together interstate my ex-husband and I sold our family home in 2013 and commenced a road trip around Australia with our son, then aged five. We made this decision after an escalation in his violent outbursts and a string of marital difficulties. Most alarmingly for me at this time was that my ex-husband had begun to direct violence at my son. I was becoming aware of significant changes in my son's behaviour, most notably anxiety around his father and nightmares about his father.

4. Our trip was intended to be the last attempt at salvaging the marriage, particularly as my ex-husband blamed a lot of his behaviour on the stress of running a small business. He also blamed a lot of his behaviour on me and this 'red-flag' was never far from my mind. In 2013, my ex-husband drove the vehicle we were travelling in toward my son and I on a crossing. This was the moment that I knew I had to get out of the relationship for the safety of my son and myself. Later when drafting an affidavit for the family court I realised that this incident of violence had occurred after a pattern of monthly, and at times more frequent, acts of family violence.
5. Although I knew the Police were in walking distance, I did not go. I felt certain that if I did go to the Police, I would give a statement but then would be in the predicament of returning to the same vehicle with my ex-husband. I knew him to be a man who could be beyond irate yet had the capacity to present as perfectly calm and reasonable in an instant if it was in his interest. I had no faith that I could gain protection at that time, so I instead chose to return to the vehicle with my son and attempt to calm his father down.
6. I then made up my mind to leave him two weeks later when we were scheduled to be with my entire extended family at my parent's house marking the end of our trip. As we no longer shared a family home and the proceeds of our house sale were in the bank, I felt we were in a situation that would make the separation reasonably easy. I was wrong.
7. My ex-husband left in the van we had been travelling in and headed north with no regard for our welfare, evading contact from me for several days so I was unsure of his whereabouts. This was distressing because I knew he had access to an unregistered firearm and had previously threatened to kill me and my son if I ever left him.
8. My son and I were left standing with only the basic possessions we were travelling with. With my family rallying around me, I drove from interstate to my sister's house in Victoria. We decided this to be the safest alternative, as my ex-husband had not previously attempted to use threatening behaviour with my brother-in-law, though he had done with my mother and sister.

Initial attempts to obtain advice and assistance

9. From the point my ex-husband drove away in the van I was effectively homeless. As a result, I moved, with my son, to Victoria to be with my family. I was fortunate to have family support during this transition. Many mothers and children without such a family would be placed in an even more vulnerable predicament.
10. I contacted a solicitor to obtain legal advice regarding property separation and custody arrangements. I asked her advice on what I should do if the violence escalated. She instructed me to obtain a family violence intervention order (Intervention Order). At the time, I had no idea what an Intervention Order was and contacted the Magistrates' Court for advice. The first woman I spoke to asked: 'Did your lawyer put you up to this?' This was the first, but not the last, time that the notion that I was a 'scorned wife' who was being deliberately vengeful toward her ex-husband was implied. Considering the woman had just spent less than 30 seconds on the phone to me, the lump in my throat obvious through my speech, her behaviour was out of line.
11. Based on this experience, I suggest that the Royal Commission should consider implementing standardised first response communication for peripheral support people.

12. Obviously in emergency situations our emergency personnel are well trained in the manner in which to handle victims and attend to domestic violence situations appropriately. I am referring here to the many other roles in our community where staff may inadvertently find themselves handling a very early enquiry for a victim of domestic violence, such as the courts, General Practitioners, teachers, etc. A standardised script could be formulated and implemented with suggestions as to how to recognise indicators that a person may be a victim of family violence, how to delicately handle this situation and know what services and support could be recommended. I think that such training could be implemented without great expense. It could be a self-perpetuating campaign with tools available online and implemented in workplaces, similar to how workplaces implement Occupational Health and Safety training. I have concerns that the manner in which many women are treated presently in early requests for help leads them to give up and not pursue the matter further. I refer to the statistic that 64 per cent of women who experienced physical assault and 81.1 per cent of women who experienced sexual assault still did not report it to police.

Recovery order proceedings

13. Knowing that his son was now to reside with me in Victoria, my ex-husband commenced legal proceedings interstate for a recovery order with the assistance of a lawyer in his family. He did this despite my offer to attend to legalities rationally and amicably in Victoria.
14. The recovery order application was heard in the Federal Circuit Court interstate. The judge dismissed the recovery order on the basis of evidence of our joint decision to sell our house and leave that state almost one year earlier. However, despite this outcome, my experience of the court system has been wholly unsatisfactory in many respects. This day in court was my first introduction to what would become a 'He-said, She-said' case in the eyes of the legal system.
15. In my experience, the first problem with the recovery order proceeding was that there was insufficient time to establish a clear background of family violence. In what is effectively a 'mentions' hearing, I found it virtually impossible to tell my story. Having heard a handful of details in the limited time available, the judge quickly set her attention to the question of 'access', a word that is thrown around frequently in custodial and family violence matters. Rather than considering the best outcome for my son, I found that the judge's focus centred on the father's rights. She expressed concern that he had not had contact with his son for approximately two months. This fact was given precedence over my son's safety. The father of my child had previously threatened to kill him, had made a potential attempt to kill the day he drove towards us both and had the means to kill with his firearm. Yet here I was being forced to accept his 'right' to see his son, denying my son the right to safety.
16. My fear is that after generations of inequitable custodial settlements disadvantaging positive paternal relationships, the pendulum has now swung too far the other way. The short term risk here was blatant. My 'story', my 'case' had the hallmarks of becoming a family violence statistic in the future. Under current legislation, the courts are impeded in their ability to respond preventatively and are forced to function reactively. Given the appalling statistics of women and children who are killed each year by a parent or intimate partner, this must change. It must change effectively and intelligently and not at the glacial pace we have come to expect and accept of our judicial system.
17. The Magistrate stood the matter down so that my barrister and my ex-husband's lawyer could confer and reach a custody arrangement. The starting point of that conferral between the lawyers was 50/50 custody. I considered this completely unacceptable. I wanted a no contact arrangement, but my barrister advised me not to ask the judge for no contact, implying that I would never be successful because my case was not 'bad' enough. I was advised that the consequences could be severe if I asked for no contact, including a result that my ex-husband would be awarded majority custody. I felt that not only was I battling the court system, but I was battling my own barrister. I refused to agree to 50/50 custody but constantly felt that I was pushing my barrister to follow my instructions.
18. We were unable to agree to a position outside of Court so we went back before the judge. The judge ordered supervised access, but only for a limited time. Therefore, I still felt that her focus was very much about ensuring that my ex-husband had access to his child.

19. After this hearing, my ex-husband continued to pursue 50/50 custody. The proceeding was resolved by mediation in 2014. This was only because I had run out of money by this stage, and could not fund a full contested trial. I thought the mediator was appalling. I found him to be very arrogant and he lacked sensitivity with regard to the family violence issues I tried to explain to him. The mediator treated my case as if it was just another custody hearing, without regard to the safety risks to my son. He seemed to just assume we would meet in the middle of our respective positions as if it was a commercial dispute. At the mediation, I was very firm that I would not agree to 50/50 custody. I would not budge from this position and the mediator became very frustrated with me. At one point, he said 'This is moving at a glacial pace, I am not happy with this.' The efficiency of the mediation was more important to the mediator than coming to an agreement that would protect my son.
20. As a result of the mediation, my ex-husband has two-thirds of holidays and two weekends every school term. He also has scheduled half hour Skype phone calls with my son once a week. My ex-husband is required to pay for half of the cost of the flights interstate for my son.
21. I have felt that, through my dealings with the courts, my son was rarely mentioned. His experience and his wellbeing was not at the centre of the custody proceedings, nor was he given proper consideration at the Intervention Order proceedings. The court's primary focus was ensuring that his father's right to see him was protected. We should be focusing on what is best for the child.

Family Court Report process

22. In the recovery order proceedings, the Court ordered that a Family Report be prepared. My experience of the Family Report process, and in particular the reporter himself, was appalling.
23. The reporter was around the same age as me, and he had spoken to my ex-husband first. I felt that they had struck up a rapport, because they were both young men and seemed to get along well. Already, I felt at a disadvantage. The reporter was a counsellor with limited professional experience, and not a trained psychologist. Throughout the day, based on how the reporter conducted the interviews, I felt that he was extremely underqualified and inexperienced. He was also consistently dismissive of my recount of the violence I had experienced, instead proposing that it was a matter of my own 'perception'.
24. For example, during my interview with the reporter, I raised concerns to him about my ex-husband's prior drug use. I have genuine concerns that my ex-husband shows signs of a medical condition and felt it important to raise this with the reporter. I did not do so maliciously or as a tactic to badmouth my ex-husband to the reporter. I told the reporter that I lacked knowledge about drugs. The reporter said to me, 'If this was a different environment, I could really educate you with a few stories about drugs'. I was speechless and completely shocked by this comment. It is indicative of how completely unprofessional the reporter was.
25. Another example from this day was that my ex-husband showed up with two presents for my son, for Christmas and his birthday, which had been four months earlier and which had both passed without acknowledgement from him. The reporter asked me if I was happy for my ex-husband to give the presents to my son. I said yes, of course he can have the presents, but said too that I thought it was very contrived that my ex-husband had brought these presents today, four months after Christmas and my son's birthday and on the day his relationship with his son was being assessed. When I read the Family Report, the reporter stated in the report that I had 'wondered if there was a sinister reason for doing this'. This comment was a blatant misquote and left out all of the context. It painted me in a bad light, which continued on a theme already introduced by my ex-husband that questioned my mental stability. I suggest that it should be standard practice that gifts are not allowed to be exchanged during a family court assessment.
26. The court reporter also stated in his report that 'Whether or not there was family violence rests on disputed facts, but if there is a court determination that it occurred, it was likely situational violence'. I felt that the court reporter's use of the phrase 'situational violence' excused and trivialised the family violence that my son and I had experienced. In my opinion, it is not the court reporter's role to provide an expert opinion (especially when the reporter is underqualified and inexperienced) about the court's likely determination regarding the violence I had experienced. I think that this is an abuse of his role and is morally and professionally reprehensible.

27. I am very concerned about how much weight the Family Report carries in custody proceedings. The examples I have included of what happened on the day show that there are too many variables, such as, who the reporter is and what the reporter chooses to include in the report. The Family Report is too subjective and does not take into account all of the circumstances. I am concerned that Family Report interviews are not recorded, and are only written based on the reporter's notes. I was misquoted a number of times in the Family Report. I think there should be some form of check on what is written in the report, to ensure that what is said in the interview is not taken out of context.
28. Most significantly, the Family Report did not adequately address the safety of my son. There was little discussion in the report about the violence that my son had been exposed to and experienced. I thought that the report completely missed the point in terms of determining what would be safe circumstances for my son.
29. I found the Family Report process very confronting and very draining. My barrister had told me that it was a very important day and that the Court would put a lot of weight on the Family Report. Naturally, I was anxious and I worried that this would affect how I was perceived in the report. This was already a very stressful situation for me, having to see my ex-husband and recount to the report writer my experience of family violence, but I felt that the way the Family Report process was managed only made my stress worse.
- It was so confronting to even just describe to the reporter the violence, but especially so to a person who I felt was inexperienced and not considerate of my experiences.
30. I was also very concerned about what the process expected of my son. I had to send him into a room to talk to a stranger and I was not allowed to take him into the room and settle him as I would do—as any parent would do—in any other circumstance where a child of his age was going somewhere for the first time. I had to hand him over at the door and was not allowed to tell him about what was about to happen as it would be seen as influencing him. It is obvious from the report that once inside my son was very anxious and took some time to settle.

Supervised contact centres

31. I made a request that at least initially, my child spend time with his father in supervised contact centres only. I was told by my legal team that this 'could not be a long term solution', which the Magistrate reiterated. I was very frustrated that my ex-husband was not considered a long term risk. At what point is a person who has threatened to kill their own child no longer a risk? I know that my ex-husband has access to an unregistered firearm, about which I have tried to alert authorities. After contacting Crime Stoppers numerous times regarding his weapon, I received no response. My local police informed me that they could only act if he 'arrived at my house with weapon in hand'. If my son's father wanted to carry out his threat to kill, I felt that he was being spoon fed the opportunities by the same people I was appealing to for help. In these circumstances, please consider whether the risk to my son is any less and if our courts truly have any power to function preventatively.
32. Following the supervised access order, I signed up immediately to both interstate and Victorian government placements. My ex-husband signed up after four months, which I consider is indicative of his desire, or lack thereof, to see his son.
33. During this period, I was continually harassed by his legal team offering ludicrous alternative suggestions, including offering for a senior member of his legal team to supervise the contact between my ex-husband and my son. This harassment was bullying, and at times demeaning, expensive to respond to and undermining of what had been approved by the judge. I think my ex-husband's actions were tactics for when we re-appeared for a further mentions hearing, at which my ex-husband attempted to use the lack of time spent with his son as leverage to override the allegations of violence. Although my lawyer told the Court he had refused to sign up to the contact centres, my ex-husband still managed to gain some sympathy for his lack of contact. We left that hearing with new interim orders which again approved my request for supervised contact. However, the supervised contact was only for a limited time, after which my ex-husband was allowed overnight visits from my son.
34. At this time a placement became available in the interstate supervised contact centre. However, I was shortly advised that the centre was ceasing operations due to funding.

35. Sufficient funding is critical so that these centres can remain open as a viable option for children who have experienced family violence. These centres are particularly important in the early stages of separation from a violent partner, when that partner's behaviour is likely to be very unpredictable and irrational. Contact centres provide an environment that protects the child's safety. It seems obvious to keep these centres open to protect the child's welfare, but sadly this is not the case, with several government supervised contact centres being closed. Access to this vital service is now unreliable and, for most people, completely inaccessible. In the end, I paid for the contact centre visits with my ex-husband and son. It was very expensive and cost even more to receive a report of the visit.
36. There also needs to be a consistent standard applied across government contact centres. I made numerous enquiries to various centres and found that the safety standards for each centre was very different. As my ex-husband had access to firearms, I asked each of them if they had metal detectors or a pat-down security procedure. None of them did. This may seem overly cautious, but I consider it necessary. Allocating funding to the security of these centres to ensure a safe and well-managed system for contact to occur, with as little risk to children's safety as possible, is crucial.
37. Although I was informed that the supervision would be careful and that there would be no chance of any problems, the visit between my ex-husband and son was supervised by a very petite woman, who would not have been able to physically stop my husband from walking out with my son.
38. Keeping in mind that I had initially sought no contact, and felt that I had been bullied into contact arrangements that I was not happy about, it was not acceptable that the supervised contact centres could not even provide a safe environment for my child. If supervised contact centres were properly funded and operated with adequate safety measures, I think they would be a good way to provide access to the other party, without labelling a parent who feels they are acting protectively as a 'no-contact parent', inferring that they are acting maliciously. Supervised contact should not just be limited to a short term solution.
39. Following the occasions that my son visited his father interstate, I have noticed significant behavioural changes. I find that it takes weeks for him to re-stabilise after the visits with his father. My son's school has also reported that they have noticed changes in his behaviour when he returns from visits with his father. I am very concerned about sending my son into this environment, where it is mentally distressing for him and affecting his life both in the short and long term. At the present time for a variety of reasons my son is not having any contact with his father.

Jurisdictional barriers

40. There have been jurisdictional difficulties because of the fact that I live in Victoria and my ex-husband lives interstate. I have discovered the lack of communication between State government departments to be particularly difficult. For instance, I only came to learn recently that the Department of Human Services is state operated and as such, does not produce reports or implement safety plans to effectively deal with children of interstate parents, where family violence is an issue.
41. I think that jurisdictional difficulties will have affected many separated families and it is a prime example of how children can 'fall through the cracks' of the system and be overlooked. One way to address this problem could be standardised reporting. I also think that an inquiry into what constitutes a 'thorough' report from the Department of Human Services would likely prove very revealing. There needs to be an effective way for State government departments to communicate, or better yet, consider the implementation of policies and procedures that would be applied nationally in circumstances of family violence.
42. Related to this need for better communication, I think there could be better communication from schools where children have experienced family violence. I think that schools could play an important role in monitoring children's behaviour, particularly of changes that may be indicative of exposure to family violence. I wanted my son's school to monitor his behaviour and take notes about changes after he returned from visits with his father, so that I could use this as evidence in Court. The school said that they could not do this, as they did not want the information being used as evidence, exposing them to cross-examination. I think there is a clear gap here, where the school has a lot of contact with my son, and other children in similar situations, during the week, but don't feel they have an effective means of providing this information to the courts.

Legal funding

43. At the start of my legal proceedings, I was ineligible for legal aid because I had some savings in the bank. Legal Aid interstate would not represent me in the recovery order proceedings because I am now a Victorian resident. When my funds were exhausted and the recovery order proceedings were approaching a final, contested hearing, I was informed that Victoria Legal Aid does not fund any final trials. I find it a sad irony that after stepping forward and negotiating through over 12 months of legal proceedings, the opportunity to have my case heard and finally determined by a Magistrate was out of reach. Up to this point, I had spent over $50,000 of my own money and was then told it would cost a further $50,000 to have the matter 'heard'. As noted above, we reached final orders through the Court ordered mediation process. However, I felt let down by the legal system, in that a judge would not hear the full details of my case to make an informed judgement on my son's behalf. Perhaps, with all of the facts at hand, the judge would not consider my instinctive desire for 'no-contact' excessive. Perhaps the judge would consider it to be the safest and fairest outcome for my son, in which case, I would be in a very different position today.
44. I have been very frustrated by the legal representation I have had, especially considering how expensive it is. I have found that I am constantly battling my legal representatives because they do not agree with the outcome that I want or think that I am being unreasonable by insisting that the custody terms take into account the family violence issues. It has seemed to me that even my own legal team would prefer to ignore the issue of family violence to negotiate on simpler terms for the custody arrangements. Now that I am more experienced with the process of the legal system, I would like to represent myself because I know my story better and I can no longer afford private legal representation. I find it very frustrating that I have to pay someone to talk about my personal life. However, I continue to experience that courts have a negative attitude towards self-represented parties. In an earlier mentions hearing, a Magistrate at the Magistrates' Court commented to me that 'everyone wants their 15 minutes'. I found this comment so demeaning. Speaking about my experience of family violence in court is not about getting my '15 minutes', but about making sure the details and history of my case are properly and accurately told.

Current Intervention Order proceedings

45. I wrote my submission to the Royal Commission into Family Violence while I was at court, waiting for an Intervention Order hearing at the Magistrates' Court. That day, despite all parties being summonsed for appearance at 9.30 am, I spent most of the day waiting for the hearing which ended up being adjourned. At that hearing, I sought an extension of the Intervention Order made against my ex-husband last year, which had expired. In the initial Intervention Order proceedings, I privately briefed a barrister for the hearing, which cost more than $5000.
46. The contested Intervention Order proceeding was finally heard in 2015. For this hearing, I engaged Legal Aid for the purpose of cross-examination, but I represented myself in all other matters that came to hand in that trial as I could not afford further legal representation.
47. Although I had previously been advised that contested Intervention Order hearings are very rare, I pursued the contested Intervention Order hearing, which was heard at the Magistrates' Court. In previous hearings, I have been pressured by my own lawyers and also by the duty lawyer at the Magistrates' Court to come to a negotiated outcome on the day, instead of seeking an Intervention Order that applies to both me and my son. The current Intervention Order applies only to me, but the conditions are such that it also covers my son.
48. The result of the contested hearing in 2015 was that the Magistrate granted a 12 month extension of the existing Intervention Order. The Magistrate declared a number of times throughout the hearing that he was 'not really prepared to adjudicate' the matter and that he would leave it to my Legal Aid representative to direct the process. Although I was technically 'successful', I am very disappointed by the Magistrate's conduct of the proceeding.

49. As noted above, I know that my ex-husband has access to an unregistered firearm, which is very concerning to me as he has previously made threats to kill me and my son. The original Intervention Order (the subject of the contested hearing) included a weapons restriction, however there was some debate about the restriction on the Intervention Order, given that the interim Intervention Order included a firearms restriction. I have consistently requested that the Intervention Order include a restriction on the ownership of firearms, and specifically, that my ex-husband be required to hand in his gun. In court, I attempted to establish that his refusal to do this was a breach of the Intervention Order. The Magistrate did not agree and ruled that the weapons restriction (as included in the original Intervention Order) did not cover ownership of an unregistered firearm. The Magistrate said that there was a difference between a weapon and a firearm 'in the Act'. He also said 'so it never covered a gun, oh well', and then literally put up his hands, indicating a complete lack of concern. I felt as though he spoke to me as if I was a child. At this hearing, like the previous hearings I have attended, my son's safety was not taken into consideration. The Magistrate did not acknowledge my son's position at all.
50. I reiterated to the Magistrate that I had consistently sought that the Intervention Order include a restriction on firearms. I stated that the Court should not regard the seriousness of the risk any less, simply because there had been some kind of administrative error in processing the restrictions on the interim Intervention Order compared to the original Intervention Order. While I was speaking to the Magistrate about this point, the Magistrate made a derogatory comment to me to the effect that I was pretending to be a lawyer, and remarked that 'everyone wants their day in court'. This Magistrate has made comments to me of this nature several times, such as saying to me that 'everyone wants their 15 minutes', as noted above at paragraph 44. Throughout the hearing, the Magistrate and my ex-husband's barrister spoke to me in a belittling way. They were unnecessarily rude and insensitive. I felt that I was penalised for being confident and articulate, and the fact that I did not fit the Magistrate's preconceived idea of a victim of family violence.
51. I felt as though the Magistrate was sympathetic to my ex-husband. When granting the extension to the Intervention Order, the Magistrate acknowledged that it was 'tough' for my ex-husband because the Intervention Order 'enforces pleasant behaviour' and that the 'repercussions are quite serious if you don't'. At no point did the Magistrate acknowledge the seriousness of the violence that led to the Intervention Order in the first place. Even though I was 'successful' in the eyes of the law, I felt cheated in that I had listened to the Magistrate's ruling on the matter, which was so sympathetic to my ex-husband that I felt he almost apologised to my ex-husband for granting the extension. Of all the court appearances and hearings I have now attended, the Magistrate that heard this contested Intervention Order was the worst I have encountered.
52. Experiencing family violence altered my course in life and career path significantly. Last year I commenced studies at university to undertake a double major, Journalism being one of them. Throughout 2014, despite having around a dozen court appearances and all of the upheaval that comes with separating from a violent partner with a child, I maintained a high distinction average. I have intentions to put my skills to good use in the area of justice, women's rights and areas of community significance.

Accepted into evidence at the Royal Commission into Family Violence public hearing on Friday, 7 August 2015.

Glossary

Affected family member	A person who is to be protected by a family violence intervention order. This terminology is also used by Victoria Police to describe victims of family violence.
Affidavit	A written statement made under oath or affirmation.
Applicant	A person who applies for a family violence intervention order (or other court process). This can be the affected family member or a Victoria Police member acting on behalf of the affected family member.
Applicant support worker	A worker at some magistrates' courts who advises and assists an applicant with court procedures (for example, applying for a family violence intervention order).
Bail	The release of a person from legal custody into the community on condition that they promise to re-appear later for a court hearing to answer the charges. The person may have to agree to certain conditions, such as reporting to the police or living at a particular place.
Breach	A failure to comply with a legal obligation, for example the conditions of a family violence safety notice or family violence intervention order. Breaching a notice or order is a criminal offence. In this report the terms 'breach' and 'contravention' are used interchangeably.
Brokerage	A pool of funds allocated to a service provider to purchase goods and/or services for its clients according to relevant guidelines. For example, brokerage funds could be used to pay for rental accommodation, health services and other community services.
Child	A person under the age of 18 years.
CISP	The Court Integrated Services Program is a case-management and referral service operating in certain magistrates' courts for people who are on bail or summons and are accused of criminal offences.
Cold referral	A referral to a service where it is up to the client to make contact, rather than a third party. For example, where a phone number or address is provided to a victim.
Committal proceeding	A hearing in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, to determine if there is sufficient evidence for a person charged with a crime to be required to stand trial.
Contravention	A breach, as defined above. In this report, the terms 'breach' and 'contravention' are used interchangeably.
Crimonogenic	Producing or leading to crime or criminality.
Culturally and linguistically diverse	People from a range of different countries or ethnic and cultural groups. Includes people from non-English speaking backgrounds as well as those born outside Australia whose first language is English. In the context of this report, CALD includes migrants, refugees and humanitarian entrants, international students, unaccompanied minors, 'trafficked' women and tourists. Far from suggesting a homogenous group, it encompasses a wide range of experiences and needs.
Culturally safe	An approach to service delivery that is respectful of a person's culture and beliefs, is free from discrimination and does not question their cultural identity. Cultural safety is often used in relation to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.
Directions hearing	A court hearing to resolve procedural matters before a substantive hearing.

Duty lawyer	A lawyer who advises and assists people who do not have their own lawyer on the day of their court hearing and can represent them for free in court.
Ex parte hearing	A court hearing conducted in the absence of one of the parties.
Expert witness	A witness who is an expert or has special knowledge on a particular topic.
Family violence intervention order	An order made by either the Magistrates' Court of Victoria or the Children's Court of Victoria, to protect an affected family member from family violence.
Family violence safety notice	A notice issued by Victoria Police to protect a family member from violence. It is valid for a maximum of five working days. A notice constitutes an application by the relevant police officer for a family violence intervention order.
Federal Circuit Court	A lower level federal court (formerly known as the Federal Magistrates' Court). The court's jurisdiction includes family law and child support, administrative law, admiralty law, bankruptcy, copyright, human rights, industrial law, migration, privacy and trade practices. The court shares those jurisdictions with the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Court of Australia.
First mention	The first court hearing date on which a matter is listed before a court.
Genograms	A graphic representation of a family tree that includes information about the history of, and relationship between, different family members. It goes beyond a traditional family tree by allowing repetitive patterns to be analysed.
Headquarter court	In the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, there is a headquarter court for each of its 12 regions at which most, if not all, of the court's important functions are performed. All Magistrates' Court headquarter courts have family violence intervention order lists.
Heteronormative/heteronormatism	The assumption or belief that heterosexuality is the only normal sexual orientation.
Indictable offence	A serious offence heard before a judge in a higher court. Some indictable offences may be triable summarily.
Informant	The Victoria Police officer who prepares the information in respect of a criminal charge. The informant may be called to give evidence in the court hearing about what they did, heard or saw.
Intake	A point of entry or 'doorway' into a service or set of services.
Interim order	A temporary order made pending a final order.
L17	The Victoria Police family violence risk assessment and risk management report. The L17 form records risks identified at family violence incidents and is completed when a report of family violence is made. It also forms the basis for referrals to specialist family violence services.
Lay witness	A witness who does not testify as an expert witness.
Mandatory sentence	A sentence set by legislation (for example, a minimum penalty) which does not permit the court to exercise its discretion to impose a different sentence.
Other party	A term used by Victoria Police to describe the person against whom an allegation of family violence has been made (the alleged perpetrator).

Prescribed organisation	An organisation empowered to share information relevant to risk assessment and risk management under the Commission’s recommended information-sharing regime to be established under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) . Such organisations could include, for example, Support and Safety Hubs, specialist family violence services, drug and alcohol services, mental health services, courts, general practitioners and nurses. The proposed regime is discussed in Chapter 7.
Protected person	A person who is protected by a family violence intervention order or a family violence safety notice.
Recidivist	A repeat offender who continues to commit crimes despite previous findings of guilt and punishment. In this report this term is also used to describe perpetrators against whom more than one report of family violence has been made to Victoria Police, including where no criminal charge has been brought.
Registrar	An administrative court official.
Respondent	A person who responds to an application for a family violence intervention orders (or other court process). This includes a person against whom a family violence safety notice has been issued.
Respondent support worker	A worker based at some magistrates’ courts who advises and assists respondents with court procedures, (for example, a family violence intervention order proceeding).
Risk assessment and risk management report	A Victoria Police referral L17 form, completed for every family violence incident reported to police.
Risk Assessment and Management Panels	Also known as RAMPs, these are multi-agency partnerships that manage high-risk cases where victims are at risk of serious injury or death. These are described in Chapter 6.
Summary offence	A less serious offence than an indictable offence, which is usually heard by a magistrate.
Summons	A document issued by a court requiring a person to attend a hearing at a particular time and place.
Triable summarily	Specific indictable offences that can be prosecuted in the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, subject to the consent of the accused and the magistrate.
Universal services	A service provider to the entire community, such as health services in public hospitals or education in public schools.
Warm referral	A referral to a service where the person making the referral facilitates the contact—for example, by introducing and making an appointment for the client.
Young person	A person up to the age of 25 years.

8 Specialist family violence services

Introduction

Specialist family violence services are designed to support victims of family violence. There are also specialist family violence services which work with male perpetrators. This chapter looks exclusively at services for women and children, since these services account for the bulk of the family violence response. Responses for male victims are discussed in Chapter 32; responses for perpetrators are discussed in Chapter 18.

Along with the police and the courts, specialist family violence services form what is known as the ‘family violence system’ in Victoria. Under its terms of reference, the Royal Commission must examine services that support victims of family violence and how these services form part of the state’s systemic response to family violence.

Specialist family violence services focus on keeping women and their children safe and helping them to recover from the violence they have experienced. Historically, this focus has been through primarily working with the woman. The experiences and needs of children affected by family violence are discussed in detail in Chapter 10.

Much of the discussion in this chapter concerns intimate partner violence, since this is the most common form of family violence and has traditionally been the focus of specialist family violence services for women and children. As is evident throughout this report, family violence encompasses other forms of violence, such as elder abuse, and violence against parents and siblings.

The first section of this chapter describes the role of specialist family violence services—what they do, how they are funded, and the principles that govern their work. It also considers the evidence the Commission received about women’s experiences of finding help, including the difficulties many women have had when trying to find their way through different service systems.

The chapter then looks at specialist family violence services and associated challenges that were commonly raised in evidence. The Commission heard that there has been a significant and rapid rise in demand for such services—particularly as a result of referrals from the police—and that this has outstripped the capacity of the services to meet their clients’ needs. There is also evidence of service gaps, including a lack of after-hours support and a lack of responses aimed at the individual needs of victims and the longer term effects of family violence.

In the final section of the chapter the Commission proposes a way forward. We recommend increasing the resourcing of specialist family violence services in order to ease demand pressures and ensure that services have the capacity to respond better to victims’ needs.

Not all victims of family violence seek assistance from specialist family violence services. People experiencing family violence can seek support from friends and family or from other ‘service systems’, such as the health system. It is important that the community is able to readily access information and resources about how to recognise and respond to family violence and, in particular, how to help friends and family members who may be affected by violence, or intervene safely. The Commission heard that information is not readily accessible or sufficiently detailed to equip people to support those taking steps to safely address violence. For this reason, the Commission proposes that additional information for friends and family be made available through a new or existing website. The Commission recognises that community responses cannot, and should not, replace specialist family violence or core support services.

This chapter does not consider in detail accommodation options for women and children; that is discussed in Chapter 9. Nor does it discuss how specialist family violence and other services provide pathways and referrals into other supports for women: this is the subject of Chapter 13.

Context and current practice

Victoria's specialist family violence service sector began as a network of community-based women's refuges established in the 1970s and has expanded to provide a range of support services for women and children affected by family violence. Historically, apart from statutory services such as Child Protection and community-based homelessness services, few other services were directly involved in family violence work. A more detailed overview of the history of family violence policy and the service response is in Chapter 4.

In 2005 the Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence released a report entitled Reforming the Family Violence System, in which it announced an intention to build an integrated family violence system to bring together all the major services dealing with family violence in Victoria. Specialist family violence services are an important part of this response.

The term 'specialist family violence services' is used in the Commission's report to mean services funded to specifically respond to family violence, although the organisations that deliver these services may do work in other areas as well. There are three main types of specialist family violence services for women and children: support services, accommodation services (refuges), and family violence counselling services. This chapter deals only with support services. Accommodation services are discussed in Chapter 9, and counselling services are discussed in Chapter 20. In this chapter the term 'specialist family violence services' refers specifically to support services.

The Commission notes that support services are called 'case-management services' in some contexts and that in funding arrangements the Department of Health and Human Services refers to them as 'outreach services'.

Not all specialist family violence services are funded to provide the same services but, broadly, they have the same aim, which is to keep women and their children safe by offering the following:

- ▷ risk assessments and safety planning
- ▷ case management—including coordination and support
- ▷ the receipt of referrals (known as L17 forms) after police attend a family violence incident
- ▷ information and referral—including to refuge accommodation
- ▷ advocacy for complex matters—including legal, financial, and health and wellbeing needs.

How specialist family violence services are delivered

Specialist family violence services are delivered through community service organisations. Some organisations provide either support or accommodation services; others do both. Others also provide counselling.

Some service providers are small, stand-alone organisations, but most are medium to large organisations that work in multiple policy areas—such as child and youth services, homelessness, community health and sexual assault. Further, some service providers operate in a number of different parts of the state. For example, in addition to providing specialist family violence services (both support and accommodation), Berry Street Northern Family and Domestic Violence Service provides education, training and employment programs, family services, youth services, and foster, kinship and residential care services. Similarly, in addition to specialist family violence services Gippsland Lakes Community Health provides allied health, medical and nursing, disability support, men's behaviour change and family services.

These arrangements are indicative of the pathways available for linking women and children to a range of services and programs according to their needs. This can occur either through other programs delivered by the particular service or by working with local partner organisations. The Commission heard, however, that the extent to which this happens in practice varies and is largely dependent on the strength of regional integration committees and local-level initiative, goodwill and resourcing.

Statewide telephone services

The Safe Steps Family Violence Response Service provides a 24-hour statewide telephone information and referral service for women seeking information about their options, including leaving a relationship to escape abuse. The staff complete risk assessments, help women develop safety plans, and refer them to support options in the community—both specialist family violence support services and generalist services such as community health centres. The organisation also receives after-hours referrals when police attend family violence incidents.

Additionally, Safe Steps is the statewide contact point for referral to refuge accommodation; it also operates a crisis accommodation unit and places women in other emergency accommodation such as motels pending placement in a refuge.

1800 RESPECT, funded by the Commonwealth Government, provides 24-hour telephone and online crisis and trauma counselling services to help people experiencing the effects of sexual assault or domestic or family violence.¹ This service can also provide information about local services to callers.

Support services

There are 28 specialist family violence support services. These services aim to keep women and children safe, and their work includes risk assessment and management and safety planning with women who are in a violent relationship, are thinking of leaving their relationship, or have left it.

Different specialist family violence services deliver support services in different ways. Women experiencing family violence often have a diverse range of needs—legal, housing, financial, health and wellbeing, and so on. The specialist services provide support and advocate on behalf of women as they make their way through the various service systems.

As part of a case-management response, specialist family violence services can work with women to do the following:

- ▷ apply for a family violence intervention order
- ▷ accompany a woman to appointments with her lawyer and to any court hearings
- ▷ arrange for locks to be changed at her house
- ▷ talk to her children's school to explain the terms of a family violence intervention order
- ▷ help her set up a new bank account and obtain a new mobile phone
- ▷ help her negotiate with government departments and agencies such as Centrelink, the Office of Housing, and the Department of Immigration and Border Protection if there are visa concerns
- ▷ help her secure suitable alternative housing—whether this be crisis accommodation (a refuge), transitional or social housing, or private rental
- ▷ help her identify and act on employment, education and training opportunities.²

Not all specialist family violence services are funded to provide this full suite of services.

Funding arrangements

Specialist family violence support services are funded to deliver services against a target for episodes of support based on an average of 12 weeks per family.³ This gives services flexibility as to the duration and intensity of support while still providing the number of episodes of support for which they are funded. For example, one service's policy allows for women and children to be supported for up to 12 months, depending on identified and assessed needs.⁴ The Department of Health and Human Services was unable to provide to the Commission data showing the actual length of periods of support provided.⁵

Victorian Government funding information shows that some specialist family violence services are funded to provide intensive case-management support for high-risk and complex cases; this is based on an average of 26 weeks per family.⁶ Funding information suggests that this is a relatively small component of expenditure, with 206 'episodes of support' funded in 2014–15 compared with 5953 episodes of support for outreach and case management.⁷

The Code of Practice

Specialist family violence services are governed by the Code of Practice for Specialist Family Violence Services for Women and Children.⁸

The Code of Practice explains the values underpinning the work of specialist family violence services, describes the different types of services provided, and sets out eligibility criteria and referral pathways. It has not been updated since it was first published in 2006. A number of submissions to the Commission called for it to be updated to reflect the changed policy and practice landscape.⁹

Services provided

Not all specialist family violence services are funded to provide the same suite of services. Of the 28 specialist family violence support service providers:

- ▷ Nineteen are contact points for L17 referrals.¹⁰
- ▷ Twenty-four receive funding for the Safe at Home program, which provides specialist workers to help women stay at home with supports such as installing deadlocks, screen doors, security lighting and home alarms or by providing short-term rental subsidies or mortgage top-ups.¹¹
- ▷ Sixteen provide intensive case management based on an average of 26 weeks of support.¹² This work is funded through the Department of Health and Human Services Transition Support activity. Twenty providers are funded to provide this service through the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness which expires on 30 June 2017.¹³
- ▷ Fourteen provide high-risk family violence services and respond to referrals from the multi-agency risk assessment and management panels.¹⁴
- ▷ Thirteen provide access to private rental programs—including help to find a rental property and brokerage funds (to pay for rental arrears, for example).¹⁵
- ▷ Twelve receive funding for after-hours support funded through the Transition Support activity. Fourteen are funded for extended after-hours support through the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness.
- ▷ Four receive funding for court support.¹⁶
- ▷ Fifteen provide women's refuges and emergency accommodation.¹⁷

This is on top of the organisations' core work of providing support services (for example, case management, coordination and advocacy) for women and children.

In addition, family violence counselling services are provided by 35 community service organisations, some of which are also specialist family violence support services.¹⁸

Women's experience of services

Women are referred to specialist family violence services in a number of ways, including informally or formally through the L17 form when police attend a family violence incident.¹⁹ They can be referred by a general practitioner, a maternal and child health nurse, or a teacher or counsellor at their child's school or by another specialist service such as housing, Integrated Family Services, or drug and alcohol or mental health services. They might find out about a service from the internet, by calling a helpline, or by talking with a family member or friend.

Friends, family and other community members are often the first to become aware of family violence, and many victims may not seek specialist help. The following interaction took place at one of the community consultations the Commission held:

Where did you go when you first sought help?

I went to a friend and then probably watching their reaction and you realise 'hmm'.

Were they helpful?

They said that's not normal. That was the first step in understanding that what's happening to you isn't normal. One friend then contacted her lawyer for me. Then once you tell one friend you get confidence to tell another friend. You start off with people further away from you rather than those close to you. So eventually you tell your best friend and then you tell your family.²⁰

Some victims of family violence rely mainly or entirely on the help of family and friends, rather than on the police, the courts or any services. The range of help family and friends provide includes being an initial sounding board, putting the person in touch with other forms of assistance and providing a safe place to stay. Longer term, family and friends can play a monitoring role by keeping the victim informed about the movements or behaviour of the perpetrator.

Analysis by ANROWS (the Australian National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) found that more than 50 per cent of women who had told someone about their most recent physical assault by a male perpetrator first disclosed the incident to friends, family members, work colleagues or a minister of religion.²¹

Ms Sheryl Leigh Hann, Lead Advisor Quality Programs and Practice for Community Investment in the Ministry of Social Development in New Zealand noted in relation to the New Zealand experience:

The [New Zealand] research also showed that people want help from their friends and family. They would much rather that happened than go to police or to Child Protection. They wanted their community to help them.²²

Although it is important not to transfer responsibility for keeping people safe to their family and friends, how these people respond can be crucial to a victim's experience and to their recovery. The findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey show that, compared with 2009, there has been a decrease in the number of people 'who would know where to go to get help with a domestic violence problem'.²³

The Commission heard that 'there is no central website for Victoria' that informs people experiencing family violence where to go or who to contact, and some friends and family members reported finding it hard to access information about what to do to help.²⁴ Some websites provide information for family and friends looking for guidance on how to respond to family violence. Among these are the following:

- ▶ The Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria and the 1800RESPECT websites both have information on how to ask about family violence and what to do to help.²⁵
- ▶ Our Watch's website offers general bystander guidance on preventing family violence and White Ribbon's website has information on 'What men can do', which describes concrete steps men can take if they witness violence, are aware of violence or need to stand up to violence.²⁶
- ▶ The Say Something website, an initiative of Crime Stoppers, provides information to young people about sexual assault and how to report it.²⁷
- ▶ The Lookout website has a page for friends and family, although the information on the page is the same as that provided for victims.²⁸
- ▶ The Tell Someone website provides family violence information 'for people with a mild intellectual disability and for the support agency community'.²⁹

Among those women who do connect with a specialist family violence service, most speak highly of such services—particularly if they have access to services that provide continuity of contact and flexibility to adapt to multiple needs over time. One woman was supported by a worker for three years and said the continuity of care was a central aspect of her recovery from family violence.³⁰ Women who made submissions also praised the services:

Support workers, they listen, validate, support and advise. For someone who has never been down the path before this is so helpful in making sure you follow through with required actions.³¹

Today as I write, these frightening days are receding – but at the time I had some real concerns about my state of mind. Mine is so far, a story of relatively successful recovery over a period of three years, made possible by some good support, alongside my own energetic efforts. I recall well, the hazards of the journey though and recognize that it might easily have been a very different outcome and that at various points the success of my efforts to find external assistance seemed more a matter of fortunate circumstance than of clear pathway ... I cannot stress enough the pivotal role that this support worker played. The continuity and dependability of care I received from her and the calming effect of having a qualified and skilled worker with real knowledge of this area made an immense difference to my recovery.³²

Other women described negative experiences because they could not get the help they needed, were not listened to or felt their experience was not understood.³³ Some reported being refused service:

Domestic Violence couldn't help, refused her help because of no physical signs of abuse. They only help people who don't work. But she had no place to go. They instructed her to go to a police station or to go back home. She said her husband would definitely kill her. She went to her sister's place. Her friend from [workplace] took her in.³⁴

A timely response is seen as essential. The Women's Mental Health Network noted:

Organisations don't seem to be able to streamline the provision of timely information, waiting lists for support are too long and often women are told to ring back – this creates a critical safety issue for women who may need to remove themselves from a situation where if they stay they may be killed. Searching for information and help seeking can be stressful. Organisations must show more understanding about how stressful it is when women call them.³⁵

In their submissions women also outlined concerns related to the process of seeking help, as well as some of the reasons they did not seek assistance—for example, because they did not identify themselves as a victim of family violence, they felt undeserving, or they did not know about the range of services available:

It took me eighteen months after I left my abusive ex-partner to fully comprehend that I had been in a FV relationship. I, too, held the misconception of the stereotypical FV victim and, whilst, I was aware I had been abused, as far as I was concerned, this was not FV. As a result of this, I did not feel as though I deserved to access FV support services because, I believed, I had not experienced it so I was taking the time my case worker spent with me away from a more deserving woman. It was not until I had to fill out an application for an intervention order myself that I finally realised that, yes, it was FV.³⁶

I didn't have a language to describe what was wrong in my relationship. I didn't know who to call or who to see or which hotline to ring. I felt so stupid. It was all in my head.

I wish there had been information campaigns on TV or on the radio, that told me what abuse is and what a healthy relationship isn't. I wish I had known that all of the services for women experiencing domestic violence looked after women experiencing all kinds of violence, not just physical violence.³⁷

Many submissions mentioned difficulties encountered when trying to negotiate one's way through the specialist family violence service system. This is discussed in the 'Challenges and opportunities' section of this chapter.

The experiences of specific populations

There is concern that some people—such as children and young people, older people, young people, women with disabilities, women who work in the sex industry and people from lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities—are 'invisible' to the family violence system.³⁸ People from culturally and linguistically diverse and faith communities also expressed this frustration.³⁹ Many called for better recognition of people's life experiences, as determined by intersections of gender, disability, sexuality, race, and other aspects of identity such as poverty or socio-economic status.⁴⁰

Among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander stakeholders, in particular, there was emphasis on a cultural lens being applied to programs and services, including specialist family violence services.⁴¹ The Commission heard that recognition of the effects of trauma, dispossession and racism and of the need for holistic, community-controlled solutions is essential to providing effective specialist support to Aboriginal peoples.⁴² This is referred to as 'cultural safety' by some and as 'culturally appropriate practice' by others.⁴³ The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria submitted:

[Any] approach must necessarily recognise the over-representation of Aboriginal women and children among victims/survivors of family violence, and prioritise culturally safe and targeted approaches which address Aboriginal women and children's unique needs, perspectives and barriers to getting assistance.⁴⁴

These matters are discussed in Volume V. Barriers to family violence accommodation services—in particular, refuge accommodation—are discussed in Chapter 9.

Principles of specialist family violence services

Despite the diversity and range of support services provided, several themes emerged in evidence before the Commission about the principles underlying specialist family violence service provision.

The importance of specialist expertise

Domestic Violence Victoria stated that the sector's approach to family violence reflects an understanding of the following:

- ▷ the characteristics, dynamics and impacts of family violence
- ▷ the barriers to leaving a violent relationship
- ▷ the effects of violence on children and young people
- ▷ the nature of the first response—particularly what women need when they first disclose or seek support to leave a violent relationship.⁴⁵

Submissions used terms such as 'client-centred focus', 'women-centred practice', 'victim/survivor-led' practice, 'end-to-end wrap around' and a 'holistic approach' to describe how specialist family violence services operate and stressed that this manner of operation needs to be standard throughout the family violence system.⁴⁶

This is closely linked to the gendered approach that specialist family violence services for women and children have traditionally taken.⁴⁷ Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand described this as a best-practice model:

... that frames support and advocacy within a human rights approach and feminist analysis ... The approach is woman-focused, respectful, non-judgemental and strengths based. It facilitates women's self determination in meeting immediate and longer-term needs ...⁴⁸

Women's Health West Inc. talked about the ethos of women-only services:

The continuing role and leadership of specialist family violence services in a multi-agency system, especially those with strong feminist principles providing services for women by women, is integral to effective integration and systemic response. This ensures that women are always at the centre of our service models, providing consistency between service delivery and our work to meet the holistic needs of women in housing, flexible childcare, time out to attend court, primary or mental health services for themselves and their children in their employment, and so on.⁴⁹

Submissions emphasised the need to treat victims with dignity, to support them in making choices about how to respond to the violence, and to help them maintain control over what happens.⁵⁰ Some submissions conceptualised this as women's 'autonomy' or 'agency';⁵¹ others talked about working with people in place and on their terms and 'listening directly to the voices of those affected'.⁵² This was seen as a standard for services but also an aspiration for the entire system:

Understanding the lived experiences of women and children who experience family violence must be at the centre of any system responses and reforms.⁵³

Women must be regarded as best placed to determine how to be agents for themselves and their children as it relates to managing safety and survival in the context of separation. Their experiences of violence and interpretations of risk matter ... [w]omen's interactions with specialist and mainstream services across the system must be characterised by respect for their decision-making and support for measures adopted to manage safety. This is critical to empowering women to exercise a degree of agency when leaving a violent partner.⁵⁴

One woman remarked that this:

... could be an alternative story. It puts maximum effort into containing and holding accountable those who are violent whilst making sure victims of violence are safe, have options, are empowered and informed, and simplifies the service system to benefit victims.⁵⁵

Submissions also stressed the depth of expertise held by services that have a sole focus on keeping women and children safe.⁵⁶ Kara House submitted:

It is important to maintain this knowledge and understanding of the multiple unique experiences of women and children that can only be learnt by working closely with them and not have it diluted by reliance on mainstream services.⁵⁷

The Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee noted that the reforms of the mid-2000s, aimed at better integrating the family violence system, 'articulated that responding to family violence is complex and requires that those who work with women and children experiencing family violence and sexual assault must possess a particular set of skills and expertise'.⁵⁸ Other submissions called for maintaining and strengthening a specialised response for women and their children who experience family violence.⁵⁹ Some argued for specialisation across the continuum, from prevention to early intervention, crisis response and post-crisis recovery.⁶⁰

Submissions noted that specialisation is occurring in other parts of the family violence system in recognition of the complexity of the issue.⁶¹ For example, Victoria Police introduced family violence teams from the mid-2000s to provide expertise and dedicated support for police responding to family violence.⁶² The Magistrates' Court of Victoria also highlighted the importance of specialisation:

Specialisation has been shown to have a range of positive outcomes for the Courts ... [It] facilitates a depth of understanding of family violence among practitioners and personnel involved in those matters, which results in more consistent and effective processing of cases.⁶³

While many submissions emphasised the specialised nature of family violence work, some also noted that specialist family violence services should not be the only response.⁶⁴ This is particularly the case in rural and regional areas, where a lack of specialist services means that women often depend on universal services.⁶⁵ Some rural communities that were reliant, for example, on a once-a-week outreach session from a specialist lamented the lack of a specialist service.⁶⁶

Chapter 40 discusses the specialist skills needed in family violence services.

Understanding trauma and keeping women safe

The Commission heard that a woman will disclose her experience of violence or end the relationship only if 'she is confident that the system will keep her safe'; it was also informed that many women do not realise the extent of the risk they face until they are helped to undergo a risk assessment conducted by a highly skilled specialist.⁶⁷ Similarly, submissions highlighted the importance of specialist skills in helping women experiencing violence to become safe.⁶⁸ Victoria Police stated:

In many situations, the fear and intimidation of the perpetrator makes it challenging for victims to disclose their experiences. We also recognise some victims feel unable to disclose their experience due to uncertainty about what will occur in the aftermath. In other instances, professionals may suspect something is wrong, but perhaps feel ill-equipped to know how to help. Any consideration would therefore need to take into account potential unintended consequences, such as discouraging victims from seeking assistance or disclosing, for fear of mandatory action being taken.⁶⁹

The importance of keeping women and their children safe—either at home or if they have to leave—was one of the strongest messages the Commission received. This reflects the role of specialist family violence services in responding to the immediate crisis—for example, after a police incident or when a woman seeks to leave—and on a continuing basis (including if the woman stays in the relationship). Victims valued this support highly:⁷⁰

The only service who truly understood and helped me actually begin a plan to leave my home safely with my children was a local Women's Service. I first accessed them via phone and was incredibly amazed and relieved to hear a support worker saying 'yes we're familiar with that behaviour' ... I cannot tell you the relief it was to finally, after ... years have my experiences validated by an understanding voice from that service.⁷¹

Another central message from the evidence was that women and children living with family violence experience trauma.⁷² Almost every victim of family violence who recounted their experience to the Commission spoke of the profound impact of the violence against them. Some people described the role of the specialist family violence practitioner in responding to this impact as 'trauma-informed practice'. Sunbury Community Health observed that trauma caused by family violence had specific impacts:

Addressing the trauma and other impacts of family violence in its early stages is critical, whenever possible, to re-form safe and affirming relationships and improve life choices for everyone involved, most importantly the victims. Parents' ability to attend to their children's needs is severely fractured when family violence is present, having traumatic consequences on their bonding and attachment.⁷³

Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee described the dual focus of safety and trauma-informed practice. Others talked about the multi-faceted process of responding to trauma beyond the immediate crisis:

Workers need to have a sophisticated understanding of the nature, features and dynamics of family violence and sexual assault, and be highly skilled at risk assessment and safety planning and in managing ongoing risk. They also need to be able to provide therapeutic, trauma-informed, clinical practice to support and aid recovery.⁷⁴

In many cases submissions expressed the need for measures and strategies that take account of the impact of trauma as a vital part of the recovery process:

To achieve this, post-crisis support is essential in supporting women who have already experienced family violence to strengthen their capacity to consolidate and sustain the changes they have already made during the initial crisis period. Thus underpinned by a focus on breaking the cycle of violence and prevention of further harm and trauma, post-crisis support seeks to provide 'support safeguards' which target support where it is required and for as long as it is needed. This includes support to maintain stable housing, to overcome financial hardship, to find avenues of ongoing emotional support, to re-connect with family and community, to build resilience and self-determination, to address mental health and physical wellbeing issues, and to increase social and economic participation.⁷⁵

Chapters 19 and 20 discuss trauma in more detail.

Risk assessment and timely and continuing support

The Commission received evidence that victims of family violence who are not ready to leave their relationship need support and time in order to gain confidence that it is safe to act.⁷⁶ Victims who are ready to act need timely and practical support that provides accurate information about their options.⁷⁷

Victims' and their children's lives can be put at risk if this process is mishandled—for example, if a woman feels she is being rushed or is given inaccurate information or if a service inadvertently implies that she is not believed.⁷⁸ Inappropriate responses can also result in victims staying in a violent situation for longer than they would have if they had received the right support.⁷⁹

Submissions noted that the daily work of specialist family violence services is underpinned by continuous risk assessment and management.⁸⁰ Risk management is a dynamic process: risks change over time and are liable to sudden shifts that are often beyond a woman's control.⁸¹ Domestic Violence Victoria noted that specialist family violence services need to be able to respond to the woman's and her children's safety needs at any point in the process.⁸²

Chapter 6 discusses risk assessment and management.

Current demand on the specialist family violence system

The Commission heard that demand is one of the biggest challenges facing specialist family violence services in Victoria.

A number of submissions argued that, from the mid-2000s, well-conceived policies designed to secure an integrated response to family violence have been hampered by inadequate resources. It was argued that long-term under-investment in family violence perpetuates and entrenches a crisis-driven response, whereby 'support is prescribed by funding, not determined by need'.⁸³ Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand articulated the concerns of many:

Every component of the Victorian integrated family violence service system is over-worked, under-resourced, and despite its collective efforts, failing Victorian women and children.⁸⁴

What worked decades ago is no longer relevant or effective. The system we are working within now is reactive. Rather than applying band-aid solutions to a system that is clearly fractured, an overhaul of policy reform and service delivery structures is necessary.⁸⁵

The numbers of people reporting family violence have grown substantially in recent years, and a consistent message in submissions, community consultations and hearings was that the consequent increase in demand has had a dramatic effect on police, courts and specialist family violence services.⁸⁶ The scale of growth in demand is described as unprecedented and, most probably, greater than anticipated at the time of the reforms of the mid-2000s.⁸⁷

Police L17 form referrals

In 2013–14 Victoria Police attended over 65,000 family violence incidents—an increase of 83 per cent over the preceding five years.⁸⁸ During the same time, the number of formal referrals of affected family members (female victims) to specialist family violence services grew by 317 per cent.⁸⁹ In 2013–14, of the 51,628 L17 referrals to specialist family violence services (see Figure 8.1), almost 40,000 (77 per cent) were made on behalf of female victims.⁹⁰ An L17 referral requires a specialist family violence service to attempt to contact the victim and offer support. The Commission was unable to obtain data on the proportion of victims who were able to be contacted or who wanted a service.

Figure 8.1 L17 referrals for all affected family members to specialist family violence services, 2009–10 to 2013–14

Source: Based on Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence In Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14', Victoria Police data source, Tab 31, Table 31: Referrals made by Victoria Police by police region and gender of the affected family member, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.

In addition, a number of submissions identified localised and regional increases in L17 referrals. Areas of high population growth on Melbourne's metropolitan fringe—for example, the City of Casey, the City of Whittlesea and Hume City Council—experienced significant increases in demand.⁹¹ These areas have poor community and transport infrastructure, which makes it harder for victims to gain access to services. They are also characterised by historical inequities in terms of the physical location of specialist services.⁹² For example, the City of Whittlesea submitted:

The capacity of the services available in the City [of Whittlesea] is inadequate, despite having one of the highest rates of family violence in the State. Women and children can only access the regional family violence service through outreach and a small amount of very limited out-posting. Residents in the City experience differential access to specialist family violence services when compared to residents in the inner northern metropolitan areas of Melbourne. Specialist services such as Berry Street Northern Family and Domestic Violence Service (who receive the Victoria Police family violence incident reports or 'L-17's') are under significant pressure to respond to demand in the large geographical area of the Northern Metropolitan Region of Melbourne and an area that has vastly different cultural and contextual factors that vary from municipality to municipality.⁹³

The following are other examples provided to the Commission:

- ▷ Women's Health West Inc. reported a 286 per cent increase in the number of referrals from police between 2009–10 and 2013–14. It receives an average of 517 L17 referrals a month.⁹⁴
- ▷ During the same period, Berry Street observed a 259 per cent increase in police referrals. For the period July 2014 to April 2015 it received an average of 782 L17 referrals a month.⁹⁵
- ▷ Eastern Domestic Violence Service reported that police referrals increased by 275 per cent over five years, from an average of 130 referrals a month in 2010–11 to 485 a month in 2014–15.⁹⁶

Although the Victorian Government stated it does not provide dedicated funding for a response to L17 referrals (the response being part of overall case management or 'outreach'), Domestic Violence Victoria stated that some services have funded targets for responding to L17 referrals. The Commission understands this could be a consequence of local arrangements. Domestic Violence Victoria told the Commission these targets are unrealistic and cited the following data:

- ▶ Good Shepherd's Peninsula Family Violence Program is funded to respond to 72 L17 police referrals a year; it received 1413 referrals in the nine months to March 2015, an average of 157 a month.⁹⁷
- ▶ Quantum Support Services in Gippsland received 2208 L17s from 1 July 2014 to 31 March 2015, an average of 245 a month. It receives 0.8 equivalent full-time funding to respond to L17s. It has assigned two full-time staff to processing L17 referrals and says this is still inadequate.⁹⁸
- ▶ The Centre for Non-Violence in Bendigo receives L17s for men and women since it runs perpetrator programs as well as providing services for women and children. There is a funded target for men but not for women.⁹⁹ The centre received 1708 L17s for women in the year from May 2014 to May 2015.¹⁰⁰
- ▶ WAYSS Ltd is funded to respond to 12 L17s for women each year. It received 5134 L17s for women in 2013–14.¹⁰¹

Investment compared with demand

Domestic Violence Victoria reported that demand vastly outweighs agencies' ability to respond adequately, which has led to strained and ad hoc responses.¹⁰² This was a theme common to many submissions.¹⁰³ The Commission was told that the pressure is exacerbated by the fact that the level of funding has not kept pace with the rapid rise in demand and that the gap is growing.¹⁰⁴

To test this, the Commission examined funding data provided by government in order to see how funded capacity has changed in the past five years. We chose the period 2009–10 to 2013–14 because we had police data on L17 referrals as a source of demand-flow information. Demand is not just measured by the number of L17 referrals, however, since services also receive referrals from sources such as general practitioners, maternal and child health nurses and schools, as well as direct contact from women, but there is no comprehensive statewide system for ascertaining the number of these referrals.

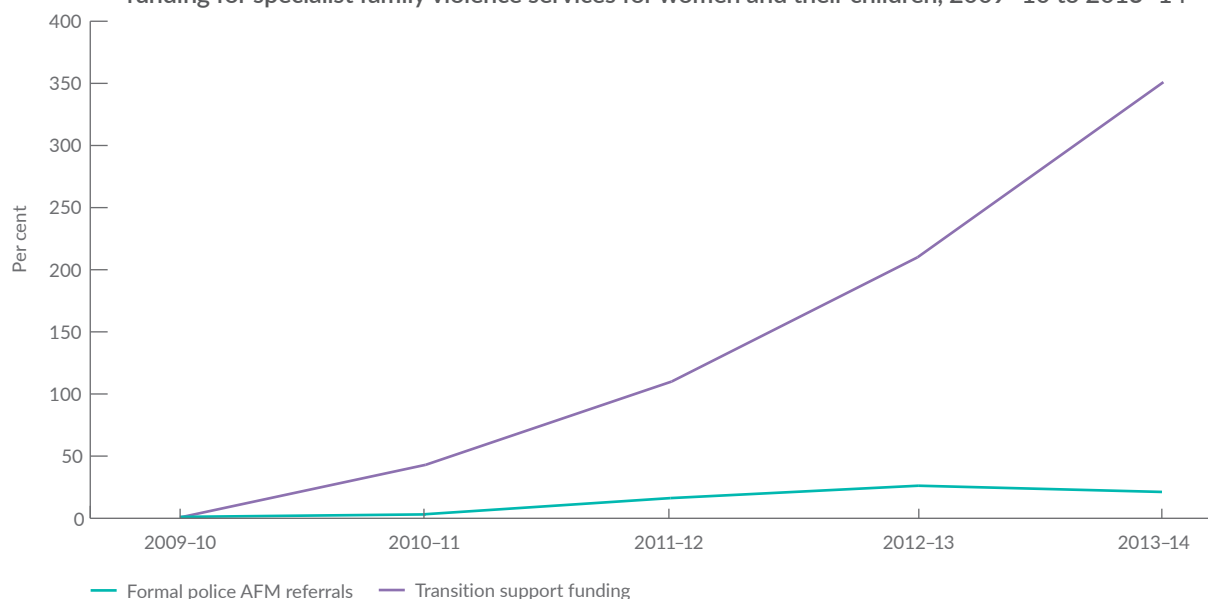

Information provided by the Department of Health and Human Services shows that funding for specialist family violence services under the Transition Support activity grew by about 9.2 per cent in the five years to June 2014.¹⁰⁵ In comparison:

- ▶ In 2009–10 there were 9530 L17s sent to specialist family violence services for female victims.¹⁰⁶ That year specialist family violence services were funded to provide 7304 'episodes of assistance'¹⁰⁷—a difference of 2226 episodes of support.
- ▶ In 2013–14 there were 39,772 L17s sent to specialist family violence services for female victims.¹⁰⁸ That year 8788 episodes of support were funded¹⁰⁹—a difference of 30,984 episodes of support.

In the following year (2014–15) the number of funded episodes of support decreased to 8508.¹¹⁰ The number of family violence incidents Victoria Police attended during that period was 70,906,¹¹¹ noting that not all incidents result in a formal referral to specialist family violence services. This number does not reflect the number of individual women affected by family violence: L17 referrals can relate to repeat violence against the same woman.

Figure 8.2 shows the growth in demand (measured by formal police referrals) compared with the level of Transition Support funding for the period 2009–10 to 2013–14.

Source: Based on Department of Health and Human Services, 'Query 70', Tab 1: Q70(20082_Transition Support), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

The Department of Health and Human Services produces regular forecasts of family violence incidents based on the number of such incidents recorded by Victoria Police; the forecasting is usually for the following three years.¹¹² The Commission understands, however, that there is no systematic demand modelling done to ascertain the level of specialist family violence services or funding required to accommodate the forecast demand.

Challenges and opportunities

This section looks at some of the challenges and opportunities associated with reforming the specialist family violence service sector and Victoria's response to family violence more broadly. Our discussion can be grouped into three main themes: difficulties with navigating the system; the impact of increased demand on the service response; and gaps in the services that specialist family violence services provide.

Navigating the system

Responding to family violence can bring a woman into contact with many different services as she deals with things such as legal matters, court appearances, securing immediate alternative accommodation, supporting children and helping them with school, medical treatment, telling family and friends about the violence, considering and applying for medium-term accommodation, and obtaining financial and material support.¹¹³ None of these are easy on their own, let alone managing all of them at the same time.

Many women told the Commission they found these systems complex and did not know where to start or how to find the right service. These systemic problems are discussed in Chapter 13, which also provides recommendations relating to system navigation. They are noted briefly in this current chapter because it is impossible to talk about women's experience of specialist family violence services without making mention of some of these factors.

I had no idea where to start or of what services were available – financial, legal, housing, personal support etc.¹¹⁴

I had no idea where to go to for help. I was not aware of any services available to women in my circumstances.¹¹⁵

Many women reported that, despite persistent efforts, they found it difficult to gain access to support services. In some cases this was a result of the multiplicity of referral pathways; in others women were frustrated by long queues for services when they needed immediate help:¹¹⁶

I tried on multiple occasions to access the domestic violence help line and I could never get through. It should be funded to run 24 hours a day. I could never find help outside of legal aid provided to me. I felt like I was entirely on my own despite many efforts to reach out for help.¹¹⁷

Others described how they went from service to service but were never told about specialist family violence services. One victim submitted:

I sought counsellors in [a large country town] ... Lifeline on the phone was a listening ear, but no help. A young male counsellor [employed] by the Council didn't know much and just kept saying (just before we split up) make really good sex with him and he'll be OK. I said it was way past that, but he just kept insisting. I spoke to a Minister of religion and while he was sympathetic he could offer no help. In Melbourne a young counsellor employed by the Council listened passively for an hour and said, well I'm sorry you'll have to explain this to the next person, I'm going on maternity leave now. No one at any time offered any referral to any agency, welfare, social work etc, ever. Maybe they didn't exist then. I'll never know ... All I wanted was someone to tell me how to handle his behaviour and what I could do to stop him abusing us.¹¹⁸

The Commission heard much criticism of the complexity and compartmentalisation of existing service system responses:¹¹⁹

There have been individuals within the system I have been lucky enough to meet and who have advocated on my behalf. I cannot help but wonder how those women who do not have an education or vital financial resources can navigate their way through the complex minefield of civil, criminal, and federal law once they leave their abuser. These three systems operate in isolation of each-other and are incongruent to each-other, making it near impossible to survive the post separation journey.¹²⁰

There was strong support for simplifying and unifying the system and making it easier and less traumatic to seek and receive support, so that the first response received by the victim is the best possible response.¹²¹

Although this subject is often discussed in the context of non-specialist responses—for example, by general practitioners or other health professionals to whom women might turn for help—the Commission was also told that simplifying responses should apply to all aspects of seeking help, including through information lines, websites and face-to-face contact. For example, websites and brochures often use language that is meaningful to service providers, government or funders but does not make sense to the person needing help:

I would love to see greater commitment from Government and non-government to plain English material, seen through victims' eyes. A recent example from [an] ABC online piece about 1800 RESPECT included this scenario – I said to her 'Are you experiencing domestic violence?' and she said 'No', '... And I thought, she has rung the DV line, I better ask this question another way.

So I said 'Can I ask you why you phoned?' and she said, 'He's going to kill me.'¹²²

Women told the Commission they wanted someone to help them obtain the things they needed in order to stay safe and recover from the violence, to help them deal with all the relevant systems (including courts, police, housing, finance and other matters) and to stand beside them rather than just referring them on to someone else.¹²³ Most specialist family violence services consider these tasks part of their case-management or advocacy role and expressed frustration that demand pressures mean they cannot always fulfil this role or cannot do it well.¹²⁴

Effects of increased demand

The increase in demand for services and the lack of growth in funded capacity have led to a heavily rationed service response, with very negative consequences for women and children and for the way the service system operates.

Rationing

The Commission consistently heard that for specialist family violence services the main task has become managing demand, particularly L17 referrals. Quantum Support Service reported that referrals are heavily triaged, with only the 'most serious' being dealt with.¹²⁵

There is evidence that, in the absence of discrete funding for intake, services have developed variations in how they respond to referrals, including in the level of resources allocated to triage, in order to manage demand.¹²⁶ For example, some services allocate full-time workers to intake and processing of L17 referrals,¹²⁷ while others add processing L17 referrals to workers' caseloads.¹²⁸ This is a source of considerable frustration for services, who see it as a diversion from their core work at a time when overall demand is rapidly escalating.¹²⁹

The Salvation Army submitted that in one service L17 demand had increased by 30 per cent from one year to the next—to over 3000 referrals a year. It reported that each L17 form is followed up with four phone calls in an attempt to make contact:

[This] takes a significant amount of case workers' time, yet services receive no funding for this work. Case workers have to reduce the amount of time they spend providing case management support to respond to L17s.¹³⁰

It further submitted:

Despite services' best efforts to stretch resources and respond to all women in need, services report that there is still a large number of women who are not receiving services. L17 data suggests that only 38 per cent of L17s received result in women receiving any kind of service which may include information and advice. The remaining women either are not able to be reached or refuse a service. Unfortunately, data shows that these women and their families are the most likely to be the most complex, be well known to police and involved in child protection.¹³¹

Submissions also noted that women who are not yet ready to leave home or want to remain at home are given lower priority. Berry Street submitted that it has limited capacity to assist women identified as at lower risk, which means opportunities to intervene early, before the violence escalates, are often missed:¹³²

Under-funding results in services rationalising limited resources. This creates a perverse incentive in which women are unable to access crisis services until their need is assessed as sufficiently pressing. This process is not only dangerous it is more cost intensive than earlier interventions.¹³³

A crisis focus

The Commission was advised that focusing on crisis is problematic because crisis does not necessarily equate to risk.¹³⁴ Ms Annette Gillespie, Chief Executive Officer of Safe Steps, said:

All of the resources in the sector are directed towards the back end, towards the highest risk individuals. What we know about family violence is that, if it is not attended to in the beginning, then it escalates. The system we have now is akin to a sausage factory, pushing women towards being at the highest risk. It is only then that they will get a genuine intervention ...¹³⁵

She went on to describe the system as resulting in ‘a kind of “either, or” situation, where either you have reached the requisite risk level and you can come through the system, or you aren’t at risk enough and therefore we don’t have anything for you’.¹³⁶

The current focus on crisis can lead to victims making repeated entries to and exits from the system, which increases the number of attempts a woman must make before she can safely leave a violent relationship. Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee stated:

The redirection of resources [to crisis intake response] has been at the expense of longer term support and has jeopardised the capacity of services to provide the level of support required by women and children experiencing family violence and sexual assault, increasing the likelihood they will repeatedly seek assistance.¹³⁷

This can lead to services limiting the period of support offered to women. Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee explained:

In Geelong, the specialist women’s service has had to limit its intervention to three months of service. This, in turn, has had a noticeable impact on demand to Barwon CASAs and Bethany’s family violence counselling service who have similarly had to impose more stringent ongoing case reviews.¹³⁸

Eastern Domestic Violence Service reported that ‘due to the significant demand and the concerns staff hold with turning women away, EDVOS made a decision to assist women based on higher risk, but usually for shorter support periods’.¹³⁹ This also impacts on the consistency and quality of the service response, with workers under pressure to assist more women with limited resources.¹⁴⁰

Delays in following up referrals

Intake and triage of referrals, including L17s, is not discretely funded, which means this work is done as part of the overall case-management function. Each provider determines the level of resourcing it directs to this activity compared with providing case-management services (within its available budget).

Most specialist family violence services triage referrals based on a risk assessment using the information available at the time of referral, such as the L17 form. This process differs between agencies. For example, Berry Street’s triage process involves an initial review by senior practitioners who determine whether the immediate response will be a priority intake call, an intake call, a text message or a letter to the victim.¹⁴¹ Eastern Domestic Violence Service has a designated intake team that assesses and allocates L17 referrals to extremely high risk, high-risk and low-risk categories, which then determines the time frame for response.¹⁴²

The Commission understands that services aim to follow up all referrals as quickly as possible—ideally within 24 to 48 hours of receipt—but that is not always possible because of demand:

Ideally we would provide early intervention in cases coded as low risk ... but we no longer have the resources to assist all victims of family violence with the same level of urgency given the increase in demand without comparable levels of funding.¹⁴³

The Commission is aware that, when a referral is assessed as relatively low risk, follow-up can occur days or weeks after the incident or there might be no follow-up at all. It was put to the Commission that instances of no follow-up at all were a direct result of increasing demand without adequate funding for staff to respond.¹⁴⁴

The Commission was told that, of those women who are contacted, some decline the support services offered. Ms Jacky Tucker, Family Violence Services Manager at Women’s Health West, gave evidence that:

... we will make an attempt at a phone call, not necessarily a successful one, for all respondents [victims of family violence] within three days, and most of them are done within 24 hours ... We are generally able to respond to—actually speak to somebody in 65 per cent of those within that timeframe.¹⁴⁵

When asked what proportion of women who are contacted accept some sort of help, she said, ‘most women will actually engage.’¹⁴⁶

Because data is not systematically collected on how many women are contacted and, of those, how many accept the offer of support, it is not possible to determine why some women accept support and others do not. As noted earlier in this chapter, some women might turn to family and friends for support.¹⁴⁷ Some women might decide not to proceed because contact by services has occurred beyond the initial crisis period and the offer of assistance is ‘too little, too late’.

More generally, concern was expressed to the Commission that the lapse in time between the violence occurring and a service system response might also give the perpetrator time to persuade a woman not to proceed with formal assistance, such as applying for a family violence intervention order.¹⁴⁸ Alternatively, some women might not be ready to proceed with formal assistance at the initial contact, although initial contacts are important in order to make a connection and provide information the woman can use at a later time.¹⁴⁹

Because of a lack of data, it is not possible to determine the extent to which L17 contact points refer women to other specialist family violence services in the area or to determine the circumstances of these referrals—such as whether the L17s are forwarded before the initial follow-up or after the initial assessment for ongoing support. Nor is it possible to ascertain the proportion of L17 referrals that represent multiple incidents involving the same victim and/or perpetrator.

Service gaps

Submissions and participants at community consultations referred to gaps that go beyond those associated with demand pressures, as discussed—for example, shortfalls in the provision of tailored support, after-hours support, advocacy services, working with families while the perpetrator remains at home, and dealing with the longer term effects of family violence. Other gaps—in particular, in relation to supporting women to stay at home safely, offering good-quality crisis accommodation, and provision of other supports such as counselling—are considered in Chapters 9 and 20.

Tailored support

A strong theme in the evidence was that each person’s experience of family violence can vary: there are different types of violence and different levels of severity, and people need different services and supports to recover. Additionally, people experience family violence differently at different times in their lifespan—as infants, children, young people, partnered adults and older people.¹⁵⁰ The experience of family violence is also different in different places, including rural and regional and outer urban communities, and submissions called for locational disadvantage and geographical equity to be taken into account.¹⁵¹ People also called for greater responsiveness to particular forms of family violence and the inter-related nature of different types of violence—including financial abuse, stalking, sibling abuse, sexual violence and elder abuse.¹⁵²

The Commission was informed that current responses are based on programs and throughputs (the number of people able to be helped in a year), rather than women’s and children’s needs, because this is how the government funds services.¹⁵³ There is particular concern that most specialist family violence services are funded through the homelessness funding stream: several organisations submitted that this affects what and how services are provided to women, noting that homelessness funding focuses on shelter and accommodation, while family violence responses need to secure safety.¹⁵⁴ The implications of this are discussed in Chapter 41.

The Commission was also informed that people who obviously need support sometimes fail to receive it because they do not meet the specifications of the program area from which they are seeking help:

A major deficiency in current responses to family violence is that responses are constructed around ‘programs’ and ‘systems’ not around people. The type of support, the frequency of support, the period of support, and the places in which that support is delivered is determined by which program or service a worker can best ‘fit’ a person’s needs to; and what the funding and service agreement for that program or service allows.¹⁵⁵

Additionally, the Commission heard that options are limited and do not necessarily align with what women need at different stages of crisis and recovery.¹⁵⁶ For example, a woman with a disability might need specific supports or face particular costs; an older single woman might need different things to a young woman experiencing intimate partner violence; and the needs of a person leaving their home for good might differ from those of a person who stays at home or leaves and returns when it is safer to do so.

Many submissions also noted that the service system often fails to accommodate the needs of specific children experiencing family violence. Domestic Violence Victoria stated that this is in part because of ‘the limited capacity of the family violence system to respond to children and young people, due to extreme demand and endemic underfunding.’¹⁵⁷

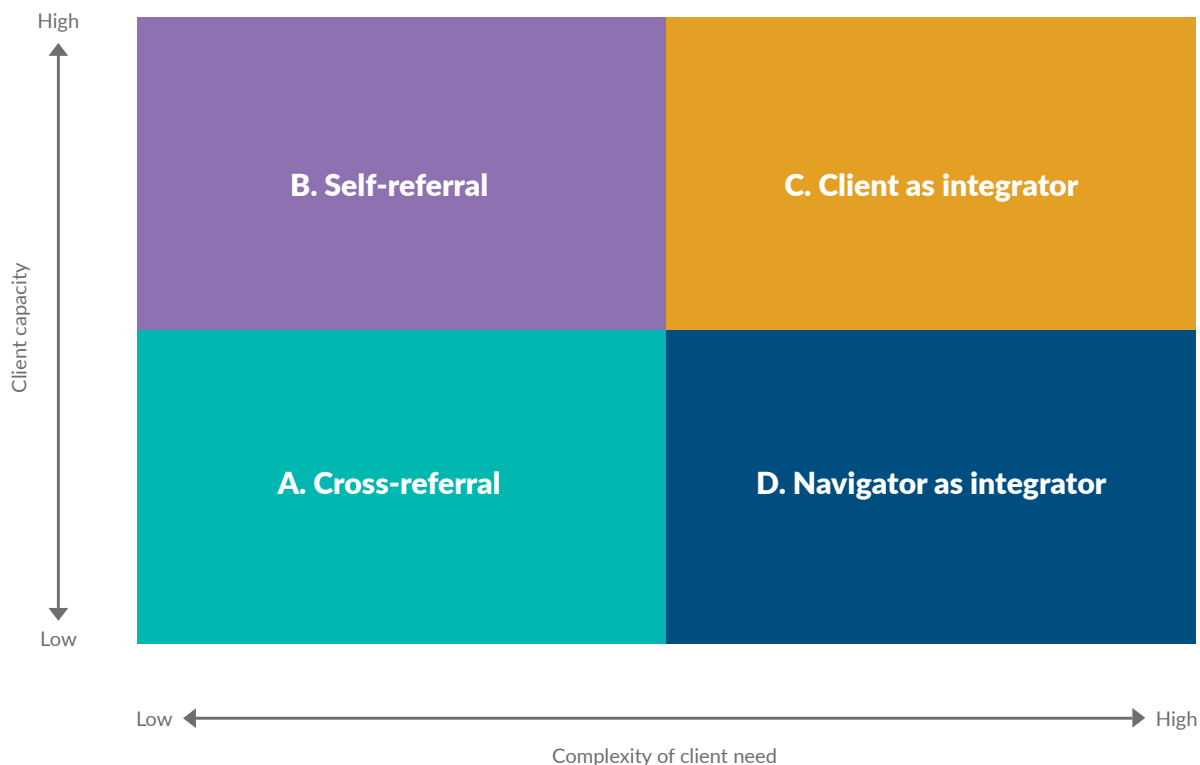

Children’s ‘invisibility’ in the service system and programs specifically for children and young people are discussed in Chapter 10; the experience of children living in crisis and emergency accommodation is discussed in Chapter 9; and referral pathways for family violence incidents involving children is discussed in Chapter 13.

The New Zealand Productivity Commission recently examined the effectiveness of social services and how the system caters for complex, multiple and interdependent needs. The commission divided users of social services into four groups:

- ▷ people whose needs are relatively straightforward but who need assistance in order to gain access to services
- ▷ people whose needs are relatively straightforward and who have the capacity to access services for themselves
- ▷ people whose needs are complex but who have the capacity to access services for themselves
- ▷ people whose needs are complex and who require assistance to access services.¹⁵⁸

As the New Zealand Productivity Commission noted, an ‘efficient and effective system must cater for all types of clients.’¹⁵⁹ This Royal Commission consistently heard, however, that people with complex and interdependent needs had difficulty obtaining the services they needed.¹⁶⁰

Submissions called for a broader range of options to help victims of family violence, rather than the current 'one size fits all' approach.¹⁶¹

A number of submissions discussed the importance of individualised approaches, so that support provided during the crisis and post-crisis periods better fits the specific requirements of individual victims and, where relevant, their children.¹⁶² In her evidence to this Commission, Ms Kym Peake, then Acting Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, acknowledged that responding to family violence 'requires an approach to service delivery that is flexible and holistic—designed around individual preferences and needs rather than programmatic boundaries'.¹⁶³

The Commission was advised of some existing sources of funding and individualised packages that can supplement casework and provide a flexible response.¹⁶⁴ Flexible funding programs allocate to providers a lump sum that can be used to achieve a broad goal. It is argued that this flexibility allows people to receive assistance according to their individual needs rather than receiving a predetermined type and level of assistance—for example:

- ▷ purchasing security measures under the Safe at Home program and the recently announced Personal Safety Initiative¹⁶⁵
- ▷ assistance to pay for goods such as household furnishings to set up a new home or rent in advance or arrears (through the Housing Establishment Fund) or a rental bond (through the Bond Loan Scheme)¹⁶⁶
- ▷ short-term funds for women with disabilities for up to 12 weeks to a maximum of $9000 per person through the Disability and Family Violence Crisis Response Initiative¹⁶⁷
- ▷ children's resource coordinators, who have a small brokerage fund for children who are homeless. In 2013–14 a total of $136,574 was available for Victoria, shared between eight areas.¹⁶⁸

The Commission was informed that, although these programs are welcome, they are relatively small and heavily subscribed.¹⁶⁹ A number of submissions also pointed to a more comprehensive model of individualised support beyond the crisis period—the Integrated Post Crisis Response Service developed by Good Shepherd Youth and Family Services and McAuley Community Services for Women in 2011.¹⁷⁰

During the term of this Commission, the Department of Health and Human Services announced funding packages of up to $7000 for Family Violence Flexible Support Packages as part of a $12 million four-year budget commitment.¹⁷¹ These discretionary packages will be administered by 15 family violence services and can be used for rent, relocation costs, material aid such as clothing and books for children, and security measures at home.¹⁷² The packages can also be used to pay outstanding bills or debts or to 'cover medical costs or enable enrolment in education or training courses to develop new skills to help find employment'.¹⁷³ It is estimated that about 1000 packages will be available each year, with an average cost of $3000.¹⁷⁴ Ms Peake gave evidence in October 2015 that the packages were 'soon to be rolled out'.¹⁷⁵

These packages are targeted at women and children who: 'are escaping and/or have recently experienced family violence; and/or are planning to leave an abusive situation or have the perpetrator removed from the family home with appropriate legal sanctions in place'.¹⁷⁶ The period during which a woman can have access to the funds is not clear. In relation to services such as counselling, it is not clear whether there are any conditions attached to the type of counselling that will be funded (for example, that the counselling must relate to family violence) or from whom the counselling should be purchased (for example, a counsellor who is trained in family violence).

The packages cannot be used to replace or duplicate supports that are available through other funding mechanisms (including other local, state or Commonwealth programs), but the Commission understands that the packages can be used where '... available supports (e.g. Local, State or Commonwealth Government services) cannot be provided in a timely manner'.¹⁷⁷

The relationship between these packages and supports such as counselling, employment and education is discussed in Chapter 20; the relationship between the packages and housing options is discussed in Chapter 9.

After-hours support

Although many submissions emphasised the need to act at the time of crisis, the Commission heard that specialist family violence support services have limited capacity to provide after-hours support. Most assistance is offered during business hours, which is not necessarily when women need support.¹⁷⁸ This is seen as a problem throughout the family violence system. Court Network submitted:

There is little congruence between when family violence incidents occur and the subsequent response by the family violence system. Police and the 24 hour crisis telephone line for women are the only primary responses available to women outside standard business hours (Monday – Friday 9am – 5pm) despite the vast majority of family violence incidents occurring outside business hours. The family violence system is essentially ‘asleep’ when women could most do with support.¹⁷⁹

The Police Association Victoria described the challenges of offering a 24-hour service in a sector that largely operates during business hours, noting that ‘police are currently reliant on an under resourced and under staffed service sector’ and are faced with an ‘ever-expanding list of tasks performed by [police] members to assist external agencies’.¹⁸⁰

Opportunity Knocks, which is made up of a number of family violence and women’s organisations, made the same point. It stated that there are ‘insufficient immediate face to face support services for women and children in crisis, and a lack of services able to facilitate after-hours outreach support to a women where she is located (for instance, at a police station or hospital)’.¹⁸¹ It estimated that a person with an L17 referral ‘can wait 15 hours to be seen on weekdays or 63 hours on weekends, compromising women’s and children’s safety’.¹⁸²

The Commission was informed that ‘funding for after hours responses locally, regionally and across the state [is] clearly inadequate with an over reliance on a stretched statewide telephone response system’.¹⁸³ The statewide 24-hour crisis telephone service Safe Steps provides information and support by telephone, rather than face-to-face support.¹⁸⁴ The Commission understands that 24-hour outreach is not funded as a core activity throughout the state but that some specialist family violence services do provide after-hours support. For example, a weekend specialist family violence response service delivered by Women’s Health West Inc. in partnership with McAuley Community Services for Women operates for six hours on Saturdays and six hours on Sundays to deal with L17 referrals.¹⁸⁵ Another example is the Southern Women’s Integrated Support Service, operated by WAYSS Ltd, which operates extended hours seven days a week to provide a crisis response and support women and children escaping family violence.¹⁸⁶

Funding information from the Department of Health and Human Services shows that 12 services receive funding to provide after-hours support funded through the Transition Support activity.¹⁸⁷ Fourteen are funded for extended after-hours support through the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness,¹⁸⁸ but the funding for this is not secure past 30 June 2017.

The Commission learnt that in places where an after-hours response is funded, these are primarily telephone-based services that operate on call.¹⁸⁹ The services act as the contact point for Safe Steps, which will call them to refer a woman requiring after-hours assistance in that area. The specialist family violence service can carry out a risk assessment by phone and arrange for accommodation (generally in a motel) unless Safe Steps is arranging accommodation.¹⁹⁰

Safe Steps submitted that, while ‘face-to-face crisis responses are sometimes available to some women and children in metropolitan Melbourne’, the availability of such responses is insufficient to deal with the number of crisis referrals received; nor are face-to-face responses available in most parts of Melbourne and Victoria.¹⁹¹ Go Goldfields also noted the lack of after-hours support in the regions:

After hours support is limited to women across the region. Again, telephone based support is the only response to women in locations outside of Bendigo. Whilst this may be appropriate in some cases, there are many women who require additional and face to face support after hours.¹⁹²

The Commission was informed that some service providers have pooled resources (including after-hours funding) so that they can deliver an after-hours response through the Crisis Advocacy Response Service model.¹⁹³ It learnt of two CARS services operating in northern and eastern metropolitan Melbourne—NCARS and ECARS.¹⁹⁴ The intention is to provide face-to-face assistance to women after hours at locations such as hospitals, motels and police stations (but not at women's homes), usually after an incident has occurred.¹⁹⁵ The services provide information about legal options and other rights, material aid (such as nappies and baby formula), referrals to relevant services, and planning for follow-up the next day if needed.¹⁹⁶

There is variation in how CARS providers deliver services: some providers no longer visit women in motel rooms because of concerns about safety.¹⁹⁷ One current CARS provider, Eastern Domestic Violence Service, noted that when it was launched it had a high level of recognition in the family violence sector and with police but that over time the number of referrals decreased. It submitted that models such as CARS 'need to be constantly brought to the attention of services to ensure that new staff entering the sector are aware of them' and that dedicated resources for community development and evaluation are needed.¹⁹⁸

Several organisations submitted that family violence after-hours outreach and contact for victims need to be improved. For example, the Police Association Victoria submitted that 'service provision by these agencies should be urgent and immediate post the family violence event and as such would require agencies to operate 24 hrs a day 7 days a week'.¹⁹⁹

For its part, Safe Steps expressed a strong preference for face-to-face assessment and response since this is seen as best practice. It argued that the Victorian Government should establish an outreach support service to provide a 24-hour face-to-face crisis response for women and children throughout the state under the Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre model.²⁰⁰

A face-to-face contact, particularly as the initial contact a woman makes with the service system, is vital to ensure a woman receives the support she needs ... All women and children experiencing family violence should have access to an immediate face-to-face crisis response regardless of their location.²⁰¹

Central Goldfields Council submitted that, although after-hours and weekend access to a face-to-face response does need to be improved, to some extent this can be done with existing services working together. It might be done, for example, by collaboration between a specialist family violence response worker and a member of Victoria Police working together.²⁰²

A number of submissions noted that if sexual violence has occurred after-hours services are available at Centres Against Sexual Assault. This includes sexual assault crisis units in some hospitals.²⁰³ South Eastern CASA provides a 24-hour crisis service for sexual assault and family violence.²⁰⁴ Some submissions noted that there is potential to make use of the existing expertise of CASAs to improve after-hours service responses to family violence.²⁰⁵

The intersection between specialist family violence services and sexual assault services is discussed in Chapter 12.

Advocacy as part of case management

It was argued that specialist family violence services should be specifically funded to do advocacy work, which would include intensive assistance for the range of problems a client might be facing.²⁰⁶

The Commission notes that, while family violence support or outreach functions and roles are given different labels by different services, each is broadly consistent with casework functions. These roles are variously referred to as ‘advocates’, ‘caseworkers’ or ‘navigators’. For example, Eastern Domestic Violence Service assigns a ‘domestic violence advocate’ whose task is to work with the woman in question to identify her needs and obtain suitable services and support. This might include accompanying the woman to legal appointments and court hearings and negotiating with agencies such as Centrelink and the Office of Housing, as well as the Department of Immigration and Border Protection if there are visa concerns.²⁰⁷ Safe Futures calls its case-management response ‘Circles of Support’; it involves an advocate working with each woman and child to ‘identify their safety and support needs within a holistic framework, and then assist with referrals to appropriate support agencies’.²⁰⁸

Domestic Violence Victoria submitted that assertive advocacy is an intrinsic part of case management in managing risks for women and promoting integration of the family violence system.²⁰⁹ It argued that this advocacy role should be strengthened with adequate resourcing in order to improve individual women’s experiences of the family violence system and to contribute to better integration and effectiveness of the system overall.²¹⁰

Along with several other organisations, Domestic Violence Victoria cited the United Kingdom independent domestic violence advocates model as an example that could be emulated in Victoria.²¹¹ The UK program provides independent advocates who give ‘practical and emotional support to clients at the highest levels of risk’.²¹²

This matter was also considered in the inquest into the death of Luke Batty: former State Coroner, Judge Ian Gray recommended the establishment of a family violence advocate service based on the UK model.²¹³ Judge Gray also stated that there should be specialist family violence case management for all matters involving families at high risk of family violence.²¹⁴

Independent domestic violence advocates

In the United Kingdom independent domestic violence advocates help to keep clients safe while liaising with the numerous agencies involved in bringing charges against perpetrators. They advocate for the client—acting as their ‘eyes and ears’²¹⁵—and their role includes the following:

- ▷ creating safety plans and performing risk assessments
- ▷ accompanying clients to court or arranging pre-trial visits
- ▷ supporting clients in giving evidence and writing victim impact statements
- ▷ requesting special measures—for example, screens to conceal clients in court so that a client does not have to face their abuser
- ▷ helping clients obtain refuge accommodation
- ▷ helping clients improve the security of their property so that they can continue to live safely at home
- ▷ providing emotional support and referring victims to counselling or mental health services
- ▷ liaising with social workers in relation to child protection.²¹⁶

Working with families when the perpetrator is still in the home

A number of women told the Commission they wanted to keep living with their partner or that they lived with their partner for a long time before they felt it was safe enough to end the relationship.²¹⁷

I stayed married for many years longer than I wished to because of his threats to take the children so that I would never see them again. I stayed because I wanted to protect my children and because I knew that given his level of anger and aggression that I would be left homeless.²¹⁸

A specialist family violence worker reflected on her experience:

Why doesn't she leave? ... Two things! Firstly that they love their partners is a very simple message. They just want the violence to stop. We have a tendency to reduce what is a complex relationship to a risk assessment checklist in our crisis response rhetoric and approach ... The second most commonly expressed response from women is they stay for the children. It seems a dichotomous attitude to keep your children living with FV however most women I have supported go to great lengths to keep their children safe and away from the violence.²¹⁹

The Commission was also told that in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities it is particularly important to take a whole-of-family approach. This may include working with the perpetrator of the violence in the home:

We need community involved to keep the family together. We haven't got a family-centred approach. We need to pull the mum, dad, children together – we need to get the children involved. I'm talking about keeping the family together at home. Making sure the violence doesn't escalate.²²⁰

... in their [Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency family violence workers] experience working with Aboriginal women affected by violence, the majority of them want to stay in the relationship, they do not want the relationship to stop, just the violence.²²¹

As observed throughout this report, specialist family violence workers play an important role in providing information and support to enable women to make choices, particularly in the immediate crisis period. This involves assessing the needs of a woman and her children over time and helping them obtain the services and supports they need.

According to Safe Steps, women who remain living with the perpetrator of violence have few support options. The organisation noted that, although support is currently funded through outreach or case management, 'caseload caps, capacity and resource constraints mean that women and children wait for weeks or months for follow up contact'.²²²

The Commission was told that in practice specialist family violence services tend to work with women who have left or are on the point of leaving a violent relationship. Some people were critical of this focus:

The refuge made it clear that if we didn't come ... we would not receive counselling or housing support.²²³

It also frustrates me that some service providers decline to work with people who are subject to violence if they are ambivalent about the relationship or staying in the relationship. From my point of view some support is better than none and the risks to the person subject to violence and/or the service provider needs to be assessed on an individual basis not one size fits all, especially if the person using violence has committed also to working on their behaviour.²²⁴

Families@Home

Families@Home is an example of a program that works with families where the perpetrator may still be in the home. It is delivered by Kildonan Uniting Care in partnership with homelessness services Salvation Army Crossroads and Launch Housing and was one of several Homelessness Innovation Action Projects established in mid-2012 and funded by the then Department of Human Services.²²⁵ It has since been funded on an ongoing basis. Kildonan told the Commission that Families@Home has supported 393 families since November 2012.²²⁶

The program supports families who are experiencing family violence—although not high-risk cases—with a multi-disciplinary team who operate a ‘one-stop shop’ model providing services based on a whole-of-family assessment.²²⁷ The Commission understands that there are no formal referral pathways into the program; instead a community engagement worker promotes the service to referrers such as family and community services.²²⁸

The Families@Home program provides financial counselling, family support, specialist family violence support and housing support services. It also provides women seeking employment financial assistance to enter vocational studies, linking them with employment agencies and work-readiness training courses, as well as dealing with factors preventing women from working (such as affordable child care).²²⁹ The service offers advocacy with real estate agents and assistance with initial accommodation costs if the woman is not able to remain in her home.²³⁰

The program also supports perpetrators if the woman consents to this, although the program evaluation reported consistently low engagement from this group.²³¹ The program evaluation also noted that the model of intervention required clarification, with differences observed in the approach of family violence, housing and family services agencies, which are partly a result of differing views of what constitutes early intervention.²³²

Western Melbourne Child and Family Services Alliance noted that there are challenges in working with women who remain living with the perpetrator or in having a solely legal response:

By working solely to encourage women to seek protection orders we risk losing genuine engagement with a victim and the perpetrator may still remain in the home. Instead of increasing safety, an unintended consequence is that we may decrease safety as we no longer have the trust and information necessary to properly intervene and provide support.²³³

MacKillop Family Services argued:

While it is generally the practice of some specialist family violence services to focus support towards women and children who are no longer living with the perpetrator, MacKillop’s family support teams work with families in which violence is on-going ... There are a number of reasons a woman might decide not to leave and ... support should not be predicated on her leaving ... Some services still require that women and children have left (or the perpetrator has left) before support can begin. Ongoing support of this service model leaves many women and their children without adequate assistance.²³⁴

The Commission was informed that it is often Integrated Family Services, rather than specialist family violence services, that work with families when the perpetrator is still living at home. For example, Kildonan Uniting Care estimates that about 60 per cent of all families referred to Child FIRST by means of police L17s are families where the parents remain in a relationship.²³⁵

Kildonan Uniting Care pointed out that, because many women do not choose to leave their partners, at least initially, this has ramifications for child protection and child safety work.²³⁶ The Commission received substantial evidence that when Child Protection is notified it can place further pressure on a woman to leave the relationship as part of her duties as a 'protective parent'.²³⁷ This is discussed in Chapter 11. In summary, many women and family violence professionals expressed the view that the 'protective parent' approach leads to re-victimisation and a failure to focus on the person responsible for the violence; they called for child protection practice to take a 'family violence' approach.²³⁸

Some submissions suggested that specialist family violence workers be placed within Integrated Family Services and Child FIRST teams to support the woman when the perpetrator is still in the home. Western Melbourne Child and Family Services Alliance submitted that 'these workers should be prepared to work alongside family support workers within family units where the perpetrator has not left the family, providing specialist expertise and strategies to manage this issue'.²³⁹

In relation to family services, in New South Wales the Parenting Research Centre has been commissioned by Burnside Uniting Care to develop a practice framework aimed at strengthening parent and family functioning and improving child outcomes in families who have been identified by the child welfare system and where family violence is a current or recent concern.²⁴⁰ The Commission was informed that the framework uses a 'harm reduction' approach to reduce the harmful consequences of the particular family situation and incorporates a range of goals as alternatives to separating whilst at all times maintaining the safety of family members, particularly children. The framework is being trialled at two locations in New South Wales, with a third to be rolled out, and further review and evaluation to be conducted by the end of 2015.²⁴¹ The Commission heard that this work is at a relatively early stage but could make an important contribution to how Integrated Family Services work with families where men are using violence.²⁴²

It was also submitted that delivering a better response to families when the perpetrator is in the home calls for consideration of how to use the expertise of perpetrator programs, noting that, with a few exceptions, the current intake and referral pathways to these programs are separate from those for services for women and children.²⁴³

In Chapter 22, the Commission discusses the potential of restorative justice processes to meet some of the needs of victims who remain living with or in contact with the perpetrator.

Dealing with the longer term effects of family violence

There was strong support for expanding the response to family violence beyond the crisis phase and frustration that this is currently hindered by inadequate resourcing.²⁴⁴ The Commission received evidence about the importance of longer term support for victims of family violence, to help them recover physically, emotionally and financially:

The true goal for family violence reform is for women to fully participate in society and live a free and independent life. The full aim for men is the same. Quality of life is diminished for perpetrators and victims. Safety is an essential part but not the end point we want for women. It is a stepping stone for her to reach her full potential.²⁴⁵

The lasting impacts of family violence and men's violence against women is life long, however women, children and families have the ability to survive this and even thrive after the violence has occurred. What is crippling for individuals and families is a lack of support which would otherwise enable them to return to work, continue to study, maintain relations and participate in everyday life again.²⁴⁶

Tackling financial and social disadvantage was another important principle:²⁴⁷ 'Supporting victims of violence to obtain their financial independence is vital if we are to prevent them and their children from experiencing ongoing poverty and disadvantage'.²⁴⁸

Submissions noted that employment and education are protective factors against violence.²⁴⁹ For women who have left a violent relationship, stable and secure housing was seen as a lynchpin in helping families rebuild their lives.²⁵⁰ This is discussed in depth in Chapter 9. Recovery, including financial security and health and wellbeing, is discussed in Chapters 20 and 21.

The way forward

The Commission recognises the unique and crucial role specialist family violence services have in the family violence system. As is apparent, though, the policy and service delivery landscape has changed since the mid-2000s, with complex referral pathways, growing demand, and gaps in services emerging. At the same time, many other service systems are confronting the reality of family violence. This has implications not only for services such as health and Integrated Family Services: it also has implications for the specialist family violence services that must connect with and understand those service systems.

Specialist family violence services, along with police and the courts, are under enormous pressure as a result of the unprecedented demand for assistance in the past decade. The situation has been exacerbated by the largely static levels of funding provided for specialist family violence services during this period.

Put simply, current funding is insufficient if we are to respond properly to demand. Demand pressure has resulted in services for women and their children focusing on crisis responses. The Commission considers it a priority that the capacity of the system be immediately expanded in order to enable it to better respond to demand.

Alleviating the immediate demand pressure should allow specialist family violence services to focus on what they do best—helping women and children stay safe and rebuild their lives. Alleviating demand pressures should also free up services to concentrate on new and better methods of service delivery, enhancing staff capabilities and improving access for victims of family violence who face specific barriers.

The Commission is aware that family, friends and community organisations are often the first to become aware of family violence. Individuals and communities, therefore, need to be equipped to recognise and respond to family violence, in relation to both victims and perpetrators.

Addressing demand is only part of what must be done. Chapter 13 discusses the integration between specialist family violence services and other parts of the service system, such as Child Protection, Integrated Family Services and men's services, and considers opportunities for more streamlined pathways to receipt of services.

Elsewhere in this report the Commission makes recommendations that are also relevant to specialist family violence services—in relation to housing and accommodation (Chapter 9), industry planning (Chapter 40), and the needs of specific population groups (Volume V). For this reason, most of the recommendations in this chapter are limited to dealing with the demand specialist family violence services face to allow them to move from managing demand to meeting demand.

Short-term action to support family and friends

As noted, the Commission is conscious that not all women who experience family violence will seek help through specialist family violence services. Family and friends should be better equipped to support victims, both at the point of crisis and during the recovery period, and men should be encouraged to play a more active role in discouraging family violence.

At present there are websites that provide family violence-related information for victims, family and friends. Although these websites are helpful, there is no distinction between information directed towards victims and that relevant to family members, friends and others who might be concerned about the victim. Additionally, the focus is more on the crisis period than on helping victims rebuild their lives.

Recognising that family, friends and community organisations already respond to family violence, the Commission considers that a website that provides all involved with the information they need to be safe, supportive and proactive, would be a valuable initiative. This could draw upon existing family violence information sites as well as looking to leading practice in other sites that deal with complex social problems that provide information to people seeking to support their family, friends and colleagues. It is important that any information about family violence is presented in ways that are accessible to everyone in the community, including young people and people from diverse communities.

Recommendation 10

The Victorian Government expand an existing website or create a new website [within two years], to provide information for:

- ▷ victims of all forms of family violence—including victims who face particular barriers to obtaining help—about where and how they can seek help
- ▷ families, friends and community networks, to help them recognise family violence, support victims and support perpetrators who are seeking help to change their behaviour.

This information should relate to both help during the crisis period and recovery in the longer term.

Responding to demand

Specialist family violence services are overwhelmed by high levels of demand, and women and children are being left vulnerable to violence. The system is under enormous pressure, trying to respond to the growing number of referrals with existing resources. This has a number of effects on the way specialist family services are delivered, among them the following:

- ▷ Responses are rationed and triaged with a focus on crisis. Services are trying to manage demand when their service ethos is to meet demand.
- ▷ Lower risk referrals might not be followed up or are followed up days or weeks after the violence occurs.
- ▷ Early intervention to assist the victim and prevent the violence from getting worse may not occur.
- ▷ The duration of support services provided is truncated.
- ▷ The quality of service and risk management is compromised.
- ▷ Some women face specific barriers that are likely to be intensified when the system faces demand pressures. This adversely affects service quality and accessibility.
- ▷ The relatively static level of investment in specialist family violence services in the past decade has resulted in inadequate options beyond the crisis period.
- ▷ Some women return to or remain in violent situations because adequate support is not available. This creates 'churn' in the system and can lead to multiple contacts with services before a woman and her children are able to find safety.

The focus on trying to manage demand has skewed the entire system and gets in the way of effective systems thinking and innovative responses. We make a recommendation to provide funding for processing and responding to L17s in Chapter 13. We make an additional recommendation about a funding boost below.

A funding boost as a circuit breaker

The rate of growth in demand has significantly affected the ability of specialist family violence services to provide services to all who need them. The situation is exacerbated by funding levels that have remained relatively unchanged. Services have always had to be resourceful but, if demand is not addressed, it will not be possible to embark on system reform or deliver on the promise of an integrated family violence system as first articulated in the mid-2000s. Without additional funding to meet immediate demand, the pressure will continue to define and restrict the focus of specialist family violence services.

Although the 2015–16 State Budget allocated a small funding increase to family violence, that funding is for one year only. The Commission recommends that, in addition to maintaining the funding on an ongoing basis, government should ensure that adequate funding is available immediately to stabilise the system and deal with current demand.

There are opportunities for greater efficiencies through more streamlined intake arrangements and a greater role for other services to recognise and respond to family violence. It is, however, unlikely that these efficiency gains will offset the full level of additional investment required. Further, there are important gaps that need to be filled—in particular, the following:

- ▷ after-hours face-to-face responses
- ▷ consistent therapeutic responses for children
- ▷ support for women who remain at home—including when the perpetrator is present
- ▷ support for victims who experience family violence other than intimate partner violence.

These improvements are necessary to ensure that victims can receive support no matter when, how and where family violence occurs.

The Commission notes that the expansion of Family Violence Flexible Support Packages, as recommended in Chapter 9, will help victims receive support that is tailored to their individual needs.

The most important thing is that women and children receive the help they need. Regardless of whether decision makers choose to call this 'case management', 'advocacy' or 'navigation', it is vital to ensure that this function—which already exists—is funded at an appropriate level.

The Commission recommends that the Victorian Government model the total investment required to ascertain the impact of the various measures and reforms it recommends. Any response to longer-term demand must be based on robust forecasting coupled with strategic planning that takes account of the requirements, contributions and interdependencies of the broader service system beyond specialist family violence services. This demand modelling should be completed within two years, be reviewed regularly, and form the basis for determining future investment levels. This is discussed further in Chapter 41.

Strengthening specialist family violence services

A specialist response at the point of crisis is crucial, and it is important to note that this period of crisis is not necessarily short or a one-off occurrence.

When a person seeks assistance it is vital that they have confidence in the system and are provided detailed information about their options including in circumstances where they choose to stay living with the perpetrator. The level of support and information provided at this stage can affect whether a woman decides to leave a violent relationship or whether she chooses to stay safely at home.

One of the most important functions of specialist family violence services is risk assessment and management. As noted elsewhere in this report, specialist family violence services are responsible for undertaking risk assessment and management, while other services focus on the indicators of risk and understanding when they should refer a victim to specialists.

For those victims who report family violence, whether through a planned disclosure or as a result of a crisis, it is crucial that the response is guided by specialised skills and knowledge of family violence, particularly in relation to assessing risk.

Specialist family violence services quite rightly focus on the crisis stage: this is when their expertise is most needed. Safety during a crisis is paramount and must be secured so that other measures can be put in place for longer-term recovery.

Some women will not wish to become involved with specialist family violence services, no matter what the level of risk is, and other services such as community health or Integrated Family Services will need to play a more prominent role. The Commission is also aware that specialist family violence services will not be the most appropriate response for every woman who experiences family violence. It is neither viable nor desirable to have a service system that channels all women into one type of service.

Beyond the crisis phase, other services might assume a larger role with the task of specialist family violence services involving co-managing cases, and providing ongoing advice about risk management. The way this will work will depend on an individual woman's needs, and any handover between services must be guided by continued risk assessment and responsiveness to the victim's preferences.

The Commission also considers that, in view of the extent of family violence, specialist family violence services should focus on supporting women who are at medium to high risk, including women who elect to remain at home. Once the risk subsides, case management can be transferred from specialist family violence services to other services—assuming that these services have the capacity and skill to respond and that they remain in contact with specialist family violence services so that risk assessment can continue to be carried out.

In the case of women with children who are at lower risk, Integrated Family Services or other generalist or specialist services should play a greater role in case management, with the advice of specialist family violence services. This is particularly important in relation to risk assessment and management because risk can escalate quickly. Further, the choices of the victim must be recognised: many women build trust with a specialist family violence service, and passing them on to another service is not always appropriate.

The Commission is aware that this is the way many specialist family violence practitioners aim to work at the moment, but that options for co-working with other services vary. The challenge lies in ensuring that the skills and expertise of specialist family violence services are captured and integrated into whichever service women are most comfortable using. Specialist family violence practitioners have a role in helping others develop their skills in responding to family violence.

This capacity building can, and already does, take many forms—secondary consultation, co-case management, shared training in areas of commonality, training in specific aspects of family violence, and so on. A specialist workforce has the knowledge and expertise necessary to ensure that family violence practice continues to be refined, is guided by practice-based research, and is shared with others. The Victorian Government must recognise and fund this work.

Addressing inconsistency

The Commission observed variations between service providers in practice, approaches and delivery arrangements. Some variation can be considered positive since it reflects a tailoring of services to local circumstances (for example, in rural areas) and allows for innovative practices and approaches. The current scale of variation means, however, that women experiencing family violence do not receive a consistent service response throughout the state.

One of the factors contributing to this situation is the lack of specificity by government in relation to what it requires specialist family violence services to provide, how, to whom and to what standard. There is no consistent definition of the services to be provided by specialist family violence services. The services have evolved over time in response to changing demand and delivery arrangements, and their development has been characterised by complex, multiple and sometimes insecure funding streams, investment in ad hoc or one-off pilot programs, and a lack of sustained governance structures.

As noted, the primary governance document for specialist family violence services—the Code of Practice for Specialist Family Violence Services for Women and Children—was released a decade ago and has not been updated.

The Commission proposes that the Victorian Government work in partnership with the family violence sector to refresh the code and in some cases develop new frameworks and guidance material that make clear the role, objectives and focus of specialist family violence services. This would assist with consistency between services. This matter is examined in Chapter 13.

Recommendation 11

The Victorian Government provide additional funding for specialist family violence support services to deal with the current crisis in demand and to ensure that victims of family violence receive appropriate support [within 12 months].

Recommendation 12

Pending the establishment of the recommended Support and Safety Hubs, the Victorian Government expand funding for after-hours responses—including the capacity to activate a face-to-face crisis response when required—in each of the 17 Department of Health and Human Services regions [within 12 months].

9 A safe home

Introduction

Access to safe, stable and affordable housing is vital for women and children who have experienced family violence.

Family violence can often displace women from secure housing, whether they remain in the home or leave for alternative accommodation. Women who stay at home may require additional steps to be taken to ensure their safety and may struggle financially to meet mortgage or rent payments as a result of disruption to their own earning capacity or the failure of the perpetrator to maintain contributions. Women who leave their homes can have trouble finding safe, suitable and affordable alternative accommodation and, in some instances this can lead to homelessness.

A lack of housing options can exacerbate the trauma and dislocation of the violence, disrupting social and economic participation and education and adversely affecting health and wellbeing. In some cases it forces women to choose to return to a violent partner. Once women and children who have experienced such violence are housed in a safe place, they can begin to rebuild their lives and plan for the future.

The conventional response to family violence has been for the victim and any children to leave the home and enter refuges or crisis accommodation to escape the risk posed by the perpetrator. This remains the model underpinning crisis accommodation to this day. There has however, been a growing move towards supporting victims to stay at home, where it is safe to do so and they wish to remain.

This chapter begins with a description of Safe at Home programs that, along with new technologies, seek to support women and children to stay in their own homes whenever this is possible. It outlines the necessary elements to ensure Safe at Home strategies are effective—for example, by ensuring that technological measures are coupled with broader practical and emotional support, effective risk management and justice system responses, case management and good information sharing between service providers.

The chapter then provides a snapshot of accommodation options in Victoria when a victim cannot stay at home because it is not safe to do so. It follows the victim's journey from immediate crisis accommodation towards a permanent home, highlighting existing gaps and identifying opportunities for improvement. The Commission was told that there is limited availability of crisis accommodation because of capacity and eligibility requirements, which leads to some victims being forced into inappropriate or ad hoc accommodation such as motels or rooming houses that are unsafe, unpleasant and alienating, particularly for children. The Commission was also told of the lack of affordable medium-term and long-term housing, causing the system to clog up, leaving victims trapped in transitional or crisis housing arrangements with limited options to move into more stable housing.

At the end of the chapter, the Commission sets out recommendations aimed at supporting victims to remain in or return to their own homes and communities, as well as improving refuge accommodation and promoting access to a greater range of crisis accommodation. The Commission also proposes expanding the existing Family Violence Flexible Support Packages and significantly extending their availability so that assistance for people affected by family violence better meets their specific needs.

Much of the discussion in the chapter focuses on the housing needs of women and children. The Commission also received evidence about the housing needs of specific groups of victims, such as young people, older people and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people. The experiences of these groups are considered in Chapters 10, 27 and 30.

The impacts of family violence on housing

Family violence is the major reason for women seeking assistance from homelessness support services in Australia.¹ In 2014–15, 31 per cent ($n=31,421$) of all people seeking assistance from homelessness services in Victoria did so as a direct result of family violence.² Of this number, 86 per cent ($n=26,979$) were women.³

Family violence is also a growing cause of homelessness among young people. Recent research has found that nationally 56 per cent of young people experiencing homelessness had to leave their home at least once as a result of violence, while about 90 per cent had witnessed violence in the home.⁴ Melbourne City Mission informed the Commission that 'homelessness is correlated with early school leaving, precarious employment, welfare dependency and justice system engagement, as well as poor physical and mental health'. It submitted:

There is something fundamentally wrong with our community's response to family violence, when the default response to a young person disclosing family violence is to pathway them into the homelessness system.⁵

The Commission was also informed that meeting the short-term and longer term housing needs of victims of family violence is crucial so that their experience of the violence does not define their future.⁶ Witnesses told the Commission that responding to these housing needs is central to everything else. People cannot move out of crisis without first having a safe and secure place to live:

We know from our work that once you have someone housed, a huge amount of the stress of their situation is removed. While someone is homeless, the only thing that they can really address is their homelessness. Once clients are housed, they are more open to having a think about their mental health and physical health, getting a plan in place with workers if there are substance issues or tackling old debts. Those things can often only be looked at once the primary stressor, their lack of safe and secure housing, has been resolved, particularly if they have children.⁷

It was submitted that the longer women and children remain homeless or in temporary accommodation the more likely it is that the crisis will extend and repeat. This can trap a victim in a cycle of violence, homelessness and, for women who perceive they have no other choice, a return to a violent partner.

Being homeless with a kid and having to constantly move from refuges to motels was a real hassle, especially without a car. Honestly, it just made me want to go back to the violence because I knew there was at least a roof over our heads and I had somewhere to feed my son.⁸

Staying home safely

Many submissions to the Commission made the point that the best outcome for women experiencing family violence is that they are supported in staying in their own homes if it is safe to do so.⁹

The Public Health Association of Australia observed that 'the onus should not be on the victim to find a place of safety but [should be on] society to keep the victim safe from the perpetrator'.¹⁰ One victim articulated the frustration many women feel at being forced from their homes in order to keep themselves and their children safe:

The thing I hate the most is, why do we as women of domestic violence/survivors, why do we have to leave our families and our homes because of them bastards. Why do we have to leave and run? Why do we have to leave everything we love because someone just can't let go. That's what I hate the most.¹¹

In her evidence to the Commission, Dr Angela Spinney, research fellow and lecturer, Institute for Social Research, Swinburne University of Technology, who evaluated the first Australian Safe at Home scheme, in Tasmania, emphasised that it is '... the element of choice which is really important'.¹² For some women, their home has been '... a really unhappy place and they may not want to remain there, but many women do ...'¹³

The Commission was advised that in recent years there has been a move towards helping women and children stay in their homes when it safe to do so, with orders excluding perpetrators from the home and an expectation that they should be the ones to seek alternative accommodation.¹⁴ This has been supported by changes to law and practice—such as the introduction of family violence safety notices and the use of family violence intervention orders to exclude the perpetrator—as well as funding for and trials of programs aimed at supporting women in staying at home.¹⁵

Safe at Home initiatives: a time line

Early 2000s	A number of Safe at Home programs trialled throughout Australia show that the initiative is a viable option for some women. ¹⁶
2007	The BSafe trial begins and will run until 2010.
2008	Family violence safety notices and family violence intervention orders are introduced, strengthening the ability of police and the courts to order perpetrators to leave a home.
2008	The Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) is amended to allow victims of family violence to transfer leases previously held in the perpetrator's name (or jointly with the perpetrator) into their own name following the making of final intervention orders. ¹⁷
2008	The Australian Government's White Paper on homelessness is released. It acknowledges that homelessness can be reduced by increasing support for women and children who wish to stay in their own homes when it is safe to do so. ¹⁸
2009	The first National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness between the Commonwealth and state and territory governments commences, which funds expanded models of support known as Safe at Home programs.

'Safe at Home' refers to a variety of different interventions aimed at helping women and children to remain safely at home. As noted by the SAFER research program, 'there is no single approach to "safe at home" interventions': services develop programs to 'meet the specific needs of their client group, their agency context and available resources'.¹⁹ Some of the programs are location specific; others form part of strategic policy approaches at the state and territory and national levels.²⁰ They are variously referred to as Staying Safely at Home, Home Safe and Staying Home, Leaving Violence.²¹

In Victoria, Safe at Home programs are delivered by some specialist family violence services and funded through the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness.²² As part of the program, specialist workers assess the safety needs and the level of support required for women and children to stay in their own homes. Steps are also taken to increase home security by, for example, 'installing deadlocks, screen doors, security lighting and home alarms, or providing short-term rental subsidies or mortgage top-ups'.²³

Developments in technology have also been used to bolster security for women and children who stay in their homes—for example, personal alarms that, when activated, provide a GPS reading of the woman's location to a 24-hour call centre and trigger a police or security company response. Some of the more recent models of safety alarms also incorporate a live video and audio stream that can capture evidence.²⁴

In addition, family violence apps for smartphones have been developed. In May 2013 the New South Wales Government announced the release of Aurora, a free smartphone app for people experiencing domestic and family violence in the state.²⁵ The app provides information about what constitutes family violence and about services that can help. It also allows a user to quickly send in-built messages (such as 'Call the police' or 'Come and get me') or customised messages to up to five friends or family members if they need urgent help. The app's GPS system allows the message alert recipients to see where the sender is. In announcing the launch of the app, New South Wales Minister for Family and Community Services, the Hon. Pru Goward, noted that it could be particularly useful in 'regional and rural areas where women don't necessarily have access to a computer, but they often own a smart phone'.²⁶

Bsafe

Bsafe is a personal alarm system for women and children escaping family violence. It uses a GPS tracking unit to notify a response centre of the user's location and the need for urgent assistance.²⁷ The program was initiated by Benalla police following a visit to Sweden in 2003. Women's Health Goulburn North East trialled it in 2006 in the Hume region.²⁸

The program was formally evaluated following a pilot run through Women's Health Goulburn North East between 2007 and 2010, with funding from the Commonwealth Government. Women in the pilot were asked to complete an evaluation questionnaire after having their personal alarm kit for three months, six months and on leaving the program.²⁹ The questionnaire sought information about breaches of family violence intervention orders, kit activations and police responses, as well as victims' feelings of safety and their broader experiences.³⁰

Thirty-six women participated in the evaluation.³¹ The evaluation states that 27 women reported a decrease in perpetrator recidivist offending, and of this number, 16 women reported that breaches of intervention orders 'stopped entirely once Bsafe was installed'.³²

Some women reported that the perpetrator's violence reduced or ceased as a result of 'a combination of factors—including Bsafe, relocating to another community, securing an Intervention Order with more conditions, and effective perpetrator programs in conjunction with drug and alcohol counselling [where this was a presenting factor] ...'.³³ Other women said the violence they experienced changed from being physical to psychological in nature—including threats, intimidation and stalking, which usually ceased with time.³⁴

It was found that a majority of the women were able to remain safely in their own home and that most women felt safer because of Bsafe and access to other services associated with the program.³⁵ The evaluation noted that this '... sense of increased safety that Bsafe offered had allowed women to regain some personal strength and freedom in their lives post-violence'.³⁶

The program was found to be effective for a diverse group of women, including women with disabilities and women from culturally and linguistically diverse communities.³⁷

According to Women's Health Goulburn North East, over 500 women have now been assisted since the program began.³⁸ The program is currently operating through VincentCare Victoria's Marian Community in Shepparton and no longer receives government funding.³⁹ VincentCare Victoria noted that it and its parent organisation, the St Vincent de Paul Society, 'regard this risk of violence as being so critical that [the] two organisations have continued to fund alarms beyond the pilot for family violence victims who remain in situations of extreme risk'.⁴⁰

Improving Safety in The Home

Safe Futures, a specialist family violence service, assists 40 women whom police have assessed as being at extreme risk of family violence. Each woman has a family violence intervention order in place.⁴¹ The Improving Safety in The Home program provides a risk assessment and property assessment service, case-management support, personal safety training and security technology, including Safe-T-Cards, which are personal alarms that on activation provide a GPS location to a 24-hour call centre. Police inform the perpetrators that these women have been given the Safe-T-Card and CCTV cameras in order to deter them from breaching the intervention orders. During the pilot, with 21 clients, there were no incidents of a breach of an intervention order after the women received the Safe-T-Card,⁴² in circumstances where some of these women had previously been experiencing up to 40 or 50 breaches a day.⁴³

Current investment

The Victorian Government estimates that funding for programs and services aimed at dealing with family violence in 2014–15 was $80.6 million.⁴⁴ Of this, $1.8 million was spent on Safe at Home programs, the majority of this funding being available through the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness.⁴⁵ In 2014–15 a target of 877 'episodes of support' was set for the program in Victoria.⁴⁶

The main funding source for Safe at Home programs, the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness, ends on 30 June 2017. Mr Arthur Rogers, Director of Housing and a Deputy Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, told the Commission, 'There is not a plan to say we will extend Safe at Home to a broader degree.'⁴⁷

A further $900,000 was allocated for a Personal Safety Initiative pilot in the 2015–16 Victorian State Budget. In December 2015 the government announced that a consortium led by the Safe Futures Foundation with partners Quantum Support Services and WISHIN had won the tender and that the pilot will be trialled in Eastern Melbourne (Darebin, Whittlesea, Moreland and Hume), the Latrobe Valley and Wellington. The pilot will provide safety devices—including safety cards, personal alarms, home safety and surveillance—to more than 70 women to test how technological interventions can be used to improve the safety of those experiencing family violence.⁴⁸ Associated case-management services will form part of the trial.

On 24 September 2015 the Commonwealth Government announced $17 million over four years for a range of measures designed to help women stay safely in their homes; this included an expansion of the Safe at Home program.⁴⁹ At the time of writing the proportion of funding allocated to Victoria was not known, and nor is it known whether the funding is ongoing or for a fixed period.

The Commission was advised that the funding for Safe at Home programs is insufficient to achieve full implementation across Victoria.⁵⁰ It was argued that this leads to inconsistent arrangements and inequitable access, depending on where people live:

There are a handful of these programs dotted around Victoria: although it is increasingly recognised that they are a good idea, the availability of this support in Victoria is very piecemeal. This is partly because Safe at Home programs have only been started relatively recently in Victoria. More overall leadership by the Victorian government is needed to ensure that safe at home schemes become available to all women living in Victoria.⁵¹

Domestic Violence Victoria submitted that there is considerable variation in the design and implementation of programs and that implementation has not been underpinned by program standards.⁵² McAuley Community Services for Women reported that, 'while some Safe at Home funding has been allocated, its effectiveness is undermined by limited resources, piecemeal coverage and inadequate coordination with the broader service systems'.⁵³ It noted that many women want to stay at home but fear for their safety and was also concerned that some women who have left will return home when it is unsafe:

The current 'Safe at Home' response is piecemeal and inadequately resourced. Successful Safe at Home programs (unfunded) occur where the perpetrator is removed and safety measures and coordinated supports are put in place. Only around 10% of women who come to MCSW crisis service each year, leave to return home, and of them, only half with adequate protection.⁵⁴

The Council to Homeless Persons, along with 128 other organisations, submitted that Safe at Home programs should be expanded at an initial cost of $7.6 million a year.⁵⁵ It estimated that this would provide assistance to 1521 households, based on a $5000 package.⁵⁶

The importance of support as well as technology

During the Commission's consultations a number of women spoke about the feeling of safety and confidence new technology had given them. One woman said the Safe-T-Card—the personal alarm that provides an immediate GPS location to a 24-hour call-centre—had improved her feelings of quality of life:

It makes me feel so safe. I don't have to buy milk for the whole week. I can go out and buy milk during the week. I pay $40 per month. The first three months were free. It's really given me a quality of life. It should be available [more broadly]. It makes me feel safe.⁵⁷

A lay witness, Ms 'Lyndal Ryan', told the Commission that the Safe-T-Card had 'changed [her] life dramatically'.⁵⁸ Once her violent ex-partner knew she had the card, Ms Ryan said she felt confident to go out, felt safe in her home and was able to sleep again.⁵⁹ Her view was as follows:

Using the alert button on the [Safe-T-Card] can be done subtly so as not to alert and inflame the perpetrator, as well as circumventing the lengthy questioning required of the 000 process ... While I do see benefits of a GPS ankle bracelet for the perpetrator, the [Safe-T-Card] provided me with an essential sense of safety and immediate (and discrete) access to help.⁶⁰

Others said technology alone did not make them feel safe, with one woman telling the Commission: 'The Be Safe card is useless – if he comes out and wants to kill me, he will'.⁶¹ Some felt it should be the perpetrator who has to wear a tracking device.⁶²

Domestic Violence Victoria cautioned against focusing solely on 'technological fixes' such as changing locks and installing security cameras.⁶³ It advised the Commission that practical and emotional support is also required if Safe at Home programs are to be successful.⁶⁴ In Chapter 6 the Commission notes that such initiatives can complement, but not replace, good risk management practices.

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children submitted that evaluations of Safe at Home schemes in Australia and overseas show that providing 'wrap-around' support—that is, 'integrating a service system around the woman and the children'—and an advocate or case manager for the woman is the optimal model.⁶⁵ It also noted that these elements are 'difficult to implement in the current Victorian economic and political context when sufficient funding is not made available to sustain an integrated service system'.⁶⁶ Support for a whole-of-system approach was expressed in other submissions:

The success of these programs relies on effective support services, financial and legal assistance, and the financial capacity to maintain housing costs on a single income. Also crucial are [a] proactive police response to enforcing intervention orders and responding to [breaches], accommodation for perpetrators and access arrangements for children to be able to occur outside the home.⁶⁷

On the basis of evaluations conducted under an Australian Research Council Linkage Project Grant (referred to as the SAFER research), the Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children argued:

The Safe at Home approach is an important and potentially effective strategy for many women and children leaving abusive relationships. However, we need bipartisan commitment to implement and resource a tighter, more coherent, integrated service system than has been possible to date in order to support Safe at Home initiatives. This is necessary in order to increase the choice of 'a safe home' available for women and their children in the post-separation context.⁶⁸

The SAFER research identified the following key elements for successful implementation of Safe at Home programs:

- ▷ effectively integrated family violence system—collaboration, cooperation, consistency, information sharing and formal agreements are required between a range of agencies and sectors
- ▷ community education prior to implementation in order to raise awareness about a woman's right to choose to remain at home, and to gain community support in making that choice
- ▷ financial support for women to maintain security of tenure
- ▷ appropriate, supportive and consistent police and court responses—this both fosters women's confidence in the system and delivers an effective message about perpetrator accountability.⁶⁹

In addition, the Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children submitted that Safe at Home responses should:

- ▷ ensure that women have a safe space within which they can explore their options for living safely—including having information and support from a specialist advocate
- ▷ provide support for complex case management to assist women and children in the medium to long term and limit the risk of returning to unsafe living arrangements
- ▷ take account of diversity in the context of safety at home for women with disabilities, Aboriginal women, and women from immigrant and culturally diverse communities.⁷⁰

ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) reported that timely access to information about options and entitlements is a crucial feature of effective Stay at Home programs.⁷¹ Although some women seek assistance in determining their options during a 'non-crisis' period, for many women the trigger for action can be a crisis incident, sometimes involving the attendance of police. The Commission was informed that in these cases it is vital that women have access to out-of-hours services that can provide support and information about options.⁷²

Access to information about the risk the perpetrator poses

The literature shows that Safe at Home programs are most successful if there is adequate information sharing between services, particularly in relation to the risk the perpetrator poses.⁷³ In particular, the SAFER research found that a shared risk assessment and management tool that can track adult and child victim and perpetrator risks over time (for example, at the time services are provided), as well as share information about risk among agencies, was central to the success of Safe at Home programs.⁷⁴

The Commission was informed that men's services—men's behaviour change programs—are largely separate from women's services and take inconsistent approaches to partner contact.⁷⁵ The Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (referred to as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or CRAF) was designed to use with victims, and while it does include risk factors affecting the perpetrator, the Commission heard that the CRAF should include greater guidance for agencies working with perpetrators.⁷⁶ It was submitted that both these factors limit the ability of women to fully exercise their choice to remain at home.⁷⁷ These issues are discussed further in Chapter 6.

The length of the perpetrator's exclusion

The length of the perpetrator's exclusion from the home was seen as a factor contributing to women's capacity to remain safely at home. Dr Spinney highlighted the difference between Tasmania, where in certain cases the police can issue an intervention order in the field to exclude the perpetrator from the property for 12 months, and Victoria, where police can issue a family violence safety notice ordering the perpetrator to leave the home for five days before the matter must be considered by the Magistrates' Court:

If you imagined yourself in the situation where you have been attacked by a man in your own home, and the police arrive and say 'he has to go for at least 12 months', as opposed to 'he has to go for at least 72 hours', you would be a lot more confident that you could make a long term future for yourself in Tasmania than in Victoria.⁷⁸

Police powers to make orders are discussed in Chapter 14.

Enforcement of intervention orders

The SAFER research reported that a central factor in the success of Stay at Home programs is victims' confidence in the police and justice responses—particularly in enforcing a perpetrator's exclusion from the home.⁷⁹ Dr Spinney gave evidence that, in order for Safe at Home programs to work:

We need to make sure the justice system really enforces to perpetrators that this is behaviour that will not be accepted. We know that when the justice system is strong enough, in most cases perpetrators will desist from their damaging behaviour, but they need to know the implications are strong enough ... that if they break injunctions, et cetera, there will be criminal enforcements and they will be imprisoned.⁸⁰

Women and family violence workers told the Commission they had a mixed experience with police responses, and particular concern was expressed about the enforcement of family violence intervention orders:

[Safe at Home interventions] become less effective at keeping women and children safe where breaches of Intervention Orders are not properly enforced. Where women and children are not able to be safe in their homes, they are forced into the service system creating far greater costs in accommodation, as well as the community costs of women having to leave their jobs and children being forced out of school.⁸¹

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children drew attention to the high number of breaches of intervention orders, especially in the case of women who remain in a property that had previously been shared with the perpetrator.⁸² The researchers found that women living in places other than their own home were more likely than women remaining at home to find intervention orders helpful and that most felt safer with an order in place.⁸³

Using alarm and security technologies as sources of evidence of breaches of intervention orders was seen as an important component of effective Safe at Home approaches.⁸⁴ The Commission was told of a number of initiatives in this regard. For example, Telstra has designed and is considering the possible application of an app to support applicants for and respondents to family violence intervention orders so that they can meet the obligations of the orders. The app will do this by sending court appearance reminders, tracking the proximity and vicinity of the two parties, moderating communications, and capturing an evidence log of any detected breaches.⁸⁵

Economic and housing security

It was stressed that a woman's ability to afford to stay in her own home is a basic precondition for the success of Safe at Home programs.⁸⁶ The Commission heard from many women who were unable to leave a violent relationship because they were unable to afford their current home on their own and were afraid they would be left homeless:

There was one time I was pregnant with my [child] and he punched me in the stomach ... there have been times when we were on the verge of splitting up – that I have actually looked into moving out on my own and I haven't had the money to do it ... I had to stay in that situation because I didn't have the money to get up and leave ...⁸⁷

Others explained how household incomes are invariably reduced in the short term and long term as a result of the loss of the perpetrator's income contribution, the partial or total loss of the victim's income because of increased care responsibilities, and the disruption to paid employment when the victim is trying to manage her safety, her legal affairs and multiple other concerns.⁸⁸ Among other factors that can cause difficulties for women seeking to retain their home is the responsiveness of financial institutions in relation to mortgages.⁸⁹ These and other factors related to economic abuse and recovery are discussed in Chapter 21.

The Commission heard evidence about Justice Connect's Women's Homelessness Prevention Project, which aims to keep women and children in housing 'through a combination of legal representation and social work support'.⁹⁰ Justice Connect reported that 95 per cent of women assisted by the program have experienced family violence.⁹¹ The primary tenancy-related problem for women presenting at the service is eviction for rental arrears.⁹²

Of the matters finalised in its first 12 months of operation, Justice Connect reported that 25 out of 33 clients at risk of eviction for rental arrears were able to maintain their existing tenancy; a further two women were helped by the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal to obtain additional time to enable them to move into new housing without an intervening period of homelessness.⁹³ Justice Connect stated that 'evictions are preventable for the most part, with the right intervention of legal representation and intensive social work'.⁹⁴

A number of submissions noted that under the Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) leases can be transferred to victims of family violence if the violence has been perpetrated by the tenant named on the lease.⁹⁵ It was also noted that these provisions are not well known and as a result are under-used.⁹⁶ These and other legislative provisions relating to family violence and the private rental market are discussed in Chapter 21.

Crisis and emergency accommodation

For some women and children staying at home is not an option: they are forced to leave home and find alternative accommodation because of the violence they have experienced. This section examines the types of crisis and longer term accommodation available to women and children escaping family violence and considers the evidence the Commission received about the experiences of women living in these types of accommodation.

When a woman seeks to escape violence and needs alternative accommodation, there are two broad entry pathways:

- ▷ specialist family violence services (generally through Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre)
- ▷ specialist homelessness services, which include Initial Assessment and Planning services.

These entry pathways are not mutually exclusive. Some specialist family violence services are also Initial Assessment and Planning services, or IAPs, and each pathway can refer to the other when trying to secure accommodation. The Commission heard from homelessness IAPs that it is not uncommon to receive a referral from Safe Steps.⁹⁷ In other examples, Launch Housing which runs several IAPs, has formal referral arrangements with Kildonan Uniting Care, Inner South Domestic Violence Services and Berry Street.⁹⁸ Launch Housing reported that it supports a number of women who have experienced family violence and a large number of children, mostly under the age of 12, who have been displaced by family violence; it estimates that 59 per cent of its clients have experienced family violence.⁹⁹

In addition, the Commission heard that IAPs and generalist homelessness services often see extremely vulnerable people who do not seek out police or family violence services—effectively making these agencies first responders.¹⁰⁰ Many come to IAPs saying simply that they are homeless and do not disclose family violence. 'At times this may be because they are not asked, or the worker does not recognise the signs of family violence' or it could be because the person does not wish to disclose.¹⁰¹ Dr Heather Holst, Deputy Chief Executive Officer and Director of Services and Housing, Launch Housing, told the Commission that housing and homelessness staff across the state need clear guidelines and training in how to identify family violence and whether referrals are required.¹⁰²

Accommodation types

Crisis accommodation

There are 31 refuges in Victoria, consisting of 54 individual properties or units able to accommodate about 105 households at any time.¹⁰³ Refuges are intended to provide short-term accommodation (up to six weeks) for women and children immediately after they leave a violent partner.¹⁰⁴ In reality, women often end up staying much longer.

Access to refuges generally occurs with the involvement of Safe Steps. Some refuges accept referrals only from Safe Steps; others accept referrals from a broader range of sources, such as homelessness Initial Assessment and Planning services.¹⁰⁵ A few refuges accept referrals from any source, including directly from women and police.¹⁰⁶

Each refuge advises Safe Steps of its vacancies. It is not possible, however, for Safe Steps to book a place at a refuge: instead, Safe Steps calls the relevant refuge and it decides whether to accept the woman and her family. Each refuge has its own intake process and makes its own decision based on operational considerations, such as whether the referred client can be accommodated within the current client mix.¹⁰⁷ This is influenced by the fact that many refuges in Victoria still offer communal accommodation, rather than free-standing units.

The Victorian Government has 'not specifically funded refuges to operate 24 hour, seven days per week intake services', and it is not common practice for refuges to admit clients after hours.¹⁰⁸

Emergency accommodation

Women's refuges in Victoria also have access to 57 emergency accommodation properties (Crisis Accommodation Program properties), where refuge staff provide support to the women and children.¹⁰⁹ Women experiencing family violence can also gain access to emergency accommodation through the homelessness service system. In some instances, a refuge might transfer a family from a high-security refuge to a Crisis Accommodation Program property until alternative safe housing can be arranged.¹¹⁰

Ad hoc accommodation

When refuges are unable to take a woman she might be placed in ad hoc emergency accommodation (such as a motel) by Safe Steps, a homelessness service provider or a specialist family violence service. Rooming houses and caravans are other forms of ad hoc accommodation. Payment for ad hoc emergency accommodation is made from the Housing Establishment Fund, discussed shortly.

The demand for crisis and emergency accommodation

Data from the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare indicates that 5688 people came to homelessness services in Victoria in need of short-term or emergency accommodation in 2014–15 because of family violence.¹¹¹ Of this number, 1104 people (19.4 per cent) did not have this need met.¹¹²

Service providers consistently told the Commission that the demand for crisis accommodation exceeds the number of available places:

For many women and children, refuge accommodation is a supported and safe alternative to remaining at home or with family or friends; however, due to the scarcity of beds, the access criterion has become increasingly narrow. Sometimes women who are at extreme risk, are rendered ineligible, because the most recent incident of violence was more than a week ago. The criteria can prevent the use of preventative placement, for example, when a person who has used violence is about to be released from remand or jail.¹¹³

In 2014–15 Safe Steps placed about 450 women in refuge accommodation.¹¹⁴ Of this number, about 20 were placed directly in a refuge; the remaining 430 were placed in interim accommodation before gaining entry to a refuge.¹¹⁵ These figures do not include women experiencing family violence who might have found ad hoc emergency accommodation through a homelessness Initial Assessment and Planning service. Safe Steps also reported a 131 per cent increase in the number of women and children requiring high-security accommodation between March 2013 and March 2015.¹¹⁶

Submissions noted specific barriers faced by some groups of women. The Council to Homeless Persons submitted:

Women with children are often prioritized for access to crisis and transitional housing, in order to reduce the impact and harm of homelessness on the children. While these priorities are, in CHP's opinion, the right judgments, they nonetheless leave a gap in the service system for single women experiencing family violence. Indeed during CHP's consultations with consumers one participant noted 'I felt I became a person [to the service system] once I had children'.¹¹⁷

Investment and demand

There is no comprehensive statewide data on the level of demand for refuge places, so it is difficult to determine how well the system meets demand. It is, however, possible to examine how investment compares with increases in family violence reporting overall.

Information provided by the Department of Health and Human Services shows that funding for refuges and emergency accommodation remained substantially the same between 2009–10 and 2013–14 (see Figure 9.1). Refuges and emergency accommodation were funded to provide about 4372 'episodes of support' in 2013–2014 compared with 4312 in 2009–10, an increase of 60 episodes of support.¹¹⁸ The department advised the Commission that in 2014–15 it purchased 3695 episodes of support for crisis accommodation—a net loss of 677 episodes of support.¹¹⁹

In 2013–14 funding for crisis supported accommodation for family violence was $12.6 million, representing 32 per cent of the total funding spent on all forms of crisis accommodation.¹²⁰ Overall, funding for crisis supported accommodation rose by an average of 3.8 per cent a year between 2009–10 and 2013–14, which is marginally above indexation.¹²¹

Figure 9.1 Family violence crisis supported accommodation (refuges): episodes of support, 2009–10 to 2013–14

Source: Based on Department of Health and Human Services, 'Royal Commission into Family Violence SAMS Data Request - 2009-2014' (1 January 2014) produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

In the same period the number of formal police referrals for female victims to specialist family violence services rose by 317 per cent.¹²² Although many of these referrals would not require a refuge or emergency accommodation placement, the figure does provide an indication of demand growth overall. The number of L17 referrals (the Victoria Police family violence risk assessment and management report) to Safe Steps increased by 102 per cent in the same period.¹²³

The demand for and use of ad hoc accommodation

A strong theme that emerged in the evidence was that, because of the limited availability of refuge and other supported crisis accommodation, services increasingly rely on ad hoc emergency accommodation such as motels, boarding or rooming houses, and caravans.¹²⁴

The Commission received the following information:

- ▶ On average, 17 per cent of women referred to Safe Steps in need of crisis accommodation were told that there was no refuge vacancy that day.¹²⁵
- ▶ Safe Steps accommodates about 40 families in motels each night while waiting for a refuge placement.¹²⁶
- ▶ Between March and April 2015, 95 per cent of women referred to Safe Steps had spent at least part of their crisis accommodation stay in a motel.¹²⁷

This data does not include women placed in similar interim emergency arrangements by homelessness services or other specialist family violence services.

There is no statewide data on the average length of time women spend in interim accommodation, although the Commission was informed that many women are placed in motels for weeks rather than days.¹²⁸ In some cases women need to move between temporary options. Between March–April 2015, Safe Steps reported that, the average length of stay in a motel for women awaiting refuge accommodation was eight nights.¹²⁹

Domestic Violence Victoria noted that the number of refuges in Victoria 'has remained static for years'.¹³⁰ Further, the location of refuges 'reflects the historical need to relocate women and children out of their home location, rather than ... local need'.¹³¹

The Commission was told this situation is exacerbated in regional and rural areas as a result of the dearth, or sometimes total lack, of crisis accommodation. The Council to Homeless Persons gave evidence that there are no refuges or Crisis Accommodation Program properties in some areas, forcing rural women to move to the city to obtain crisis or refuge accommodation.¹³² During one of its community consultations the Commission heard that women and their children from rural areas were sent by train to refuge accommodation in Melbourne.¹³³

Ms Simone Doody, Senior Specialist Homelessness Services Worker at St Luke's, stated, 'All of the crisis accommodation in Echuca is provided by local motels and caravan parks: anywhere that we can find a bed. Finding crisis accommodation is probably one of our biggest problems'.¹³⁴

A number of providers noted that some motel operators are becoming less willing to accommodate referrals from specialist family violence or homelessness services, particularly in areas where other demand for accommodation is at a premium:

Most of the motels in Echuca are at 80+% capacity at any given time. They have plenty of money coming in and therefore don't really want or need to accept our clients. From time to time our clients may experience a break down in their supported accommodation arrangement, leading to refusal on the behalf of the provider to work with our service on future occasions.¹³⁵

Women and service providers consistently told the Commission that the use of interim accommodation compromised women's safety and left them feeling isolated and vulnerable,¹³⁶ especially if they are unable to obtain counselling and other support services provided by the refuge:¹³⁷

The motels! It's not the kind of environment where when you have just been bashed and tortured for a while to go and – it's depressing. I mean it's depressing. I got put on anti-depressants and I reckon it was probably the lowest point in my life, being there. It's a confined space. You don't have any cooking facilities. No washing up facilities. You are spilling water everywhere. No space ... you get frustrated! You wake up every day in that limbo that you know you have left him. You know you don't want to go back. You don't want to find an excuse to go back. But it's hard. The system is so hard to leave. I can understand why women go back.¹³⁸

These challenges were compounded for women who were living in motels and were accompanied by children. McAuley Community Services for Women submitted:

When accommodated in motel rooms, women report that they receive minimal support from services, usually only a phone call. They still feel unsafe and are isolated and unable to manage the emotional and material demands of children at that time. In addition the women have no space to think clearly while remaining in a state of trauma and chaos, and are unable to begin to plan next steps effectively. For accompanying children, the trauma continues as they watch their mothers under continued stress.¹³⁹

Evidence was put forward that the risks for women in smaller townships can be amplified because it might be easier for a perpetrator to find out where a woman is staying. In addition, the limited range of accommodation options means a woman could end up sharing a facility with a variety of people experiencing risk. The Commission was told of occasions when women were placed in a rooming house that also accommodated perpetrators (although not necessarily the perpetrator of that woman's violence).¹⁴⁰ In some cases women decide to return to violent relationships rather than stay in ad hoc accommodation:

Extortionate rental in a rooming house for a woman and her children, sharing with alcoholics and drug users or returning to the devil you know – it's not that big of a stretch to understand how women end up going back to their abuser when the options are so equally appalling.¹⁴¹

Costs of ad hoc accommodation

The main source of funding for ad hoc emergency accommodation is the Housing Establishment Fund. Homelessness agencies (some of which are also specialist family violence services) receive an annual funding allocation from the HEF. This funding was originally intended to assist people leaving homelessness and provide practical assistance such as transport and housing establishment costs.¹⁴²

The Commission was told, however, that '[a]s crisis services are often at capacity, Housing Establish[ment] Fund ... or similar brokerage funding is also used by homelessness and family violence agencies [to] fund temporary accommodation at motels'.¹⁴³

Demand for HEF funds was consistently reported as exceeding supply.¹⁴⁴ Providers said they had to ration funds to balance competing demands because this funding source is intended for a number of purposes. Ms Robyn Springall, Accommodation Services Manager, Northern Community Hub, VincentCare Victoria, gave the following evidence:

We maintain a daily budget for crisis accommodation, so that we do not run out of funds by the end of the month. If we overspend on the budget on one particular day, we will try to spend less, and only on crisis accommodation, not rent in advance or rental arrears, the following day. Nevertheless, if we need to, we will eat into the following month's budget to provide support to women and children, or anyone who is particularly vulnerable.¹⁴⁵

Barriers to obtaining crisis accommodation

Beyond the demand problems just described, the Commission was informed that some groups of women experience additional barriers to gaining access to refuges and crisis accommodation—because the current model does not meet their needs.¹⁴⁶ As a result, these women could be more likely to be placed in ad hoc emergency accommodation.

The groups most likely to be affected are women with disabilities; Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women; women without permanent residency; women with complex needs, such as drug and alcohol problems or mental illness; women with adolescent male children or with children of different ages; women with large families; and women without children.¹⁴⁷ The accommodation challenges these groups face are discussed here; the broader barriers they face are discussed in Chapters 26 to 31.

Safe Steps told the Commission that up to 35 per cent of all refuge providers had vacancies on any particular night.¹⁴⁸ It was said that one of the reasons for these vacancies is that refuge providers need to manage group living dynamics, particularly in the case of women with complex needs.¹⁴⁹ Safe Steps argued, however, that this is not the sole reason:

While there may be genuine reasons why a woman's circumstances do not exactly match the circumstances of the bed that is available the gap between women needing beds and women getting access to beds is too great to adequately be explained as a 'client matching' issue. Often beds are not available due to unwillingness by refuges to take clients at specific times or to take clients with particular high and complex service needs.¹⁵⁰

Women with adolescent male children

Although refuges are expected to provide support and accommodation for women and dependent children up to 18 years of age,¹⁵¹ the Victorian Government told the Commission it was aware that 'a small number of refuge services—particularly in communal settings—may restrict access to refuges for women with adolescent boys'.¹⁵²

Services reported that adolescent male children were commonly excluded from refuges, although this could be changed depending on the circumstances:

In theory the age limit on boys at the refuge is 12 years old. We have however taken boys older than that from time to time, depending on the individual circumstances and whether we are able to house them. For example, we had a child with an intellectual disability who we allowed to stay.¹⁵³

The Commission reviewed refuges' policies and found that approaches varied. Some refuges had 'a deliberate policy not to discriminate against women who have older accompanying male children',¹⁵⁴ whereas others said accommodation of children over 12 years of age would be assessed case by case, consideration being given to the safety of other residents and staff.¹⁵⁵ One refuge stated, '[M]ale children aged over 14 will not be accommodated in the communal refuge but may be housed in alternative crisis accommodation if available'.¹⁵⁶

The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission advised the Commission that, although the exclusion of accompanying male children 'may prima facie constitute discrimination', exceptions under the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) that allow refuges to discriminate on the basis of sex might apply.¹⁵⁷ As VEOHRC noted, however, refuges are under no obligation to apply the exceptions in the Equal Opportunity Act.¹⁵⁸

Women with complex needs

The Commission heard that women with complex needs have difficulty gaining access to refuges and crisis accommodation. For example, the Commission was told that some refuges will not accommodate women with mental illness or drug and alcohol problems¹⁵⁹ and that others have insufficient resources to adequately support women with complex needs.¹⁶⁰

This was particularly the case with communal refuges: service providers said they have to 'actively manage' who is accepted into a refuge and that, because of the communal nature of many refuges, a refuge can decline a referral for a woman with a mental illness if it is already accommodating other residents who have similar issues.¹⁶¹ Some refuges will only accept women with drug and alcohol problems if they have already detoxed.¹⁶²

Evidence was provided, however, that interim accommodation such as a motel is especially unsuitable for this group of women since they need additional supports in order to manage the range of difficulties they face. One worker told the Commission, 'we have high-risk, complex-needs clients but we have nowhere to put them'.¹⁶³

Dr Sabin Fernbacher, Women's Mental Health Consultant, Aboriginal Mental Health Project Manager and Families where a Parent has a Mental Illness Coordinator, Northern Area Mental Health Service, told the Commission that women experiencing mental illness can face barriers to entry into refuges as a result of a lack of capacity among staff to understand and respond to mental illness:

One such example is a woman who has to take a train to go to a refuge; during the train ride she has a panic attack and has to get out of the train. Her distress escalates and she is attended by a mental health team. The refuge refuses to take her, as it is believed she is not capable of 'looking after herself' and [living] independently.

[Another] example is a woman who told family violence workers that she felt watched by her partner but could not substantiate her claims. Workers believed this was part of her delusion due to her mental illness. After prolonged abuse, it was found out ... her partner had indeed installed cameras in the ceiling and filmed her.¹⁶⁴

Women without permanent residency

The Victorian Government advised the Commission that women without permanent residency are eligible for refuges and emergency and transitional accommodation.¹⁶⁵ Mr Rogers stated:

Similarly, we don't specify that a non-permanent resident is not eligible for a refuge; the fact [is] non-permanent residents are eligible for refuges and crisis and transitional accommodation. A refuge may make that decision based on the real difficulty that they might think about a person moving on to long-term housing, because a non-permanent resident is not eligible for public housing. But they are eligible for the refuge. They will make that call within the confines of their operational policy and based on the particular configuration of people they have in the house. It wouldn't be on a financial issue because refuges generally don't charge for accommodation.¹⁶⁶

Ms Springall stated, 'They might charge a service fee. But they will make that decision based on their own access policies within the broad family violence guidelines that exist'.¹⁶⁷

Nevertheless, the Commission was consistently informed in consultations and submissions that women without permanent residency or who are otherwise ineligible for social security benefits face difficulties obtaining refuge and crisis accommodation:¹⁶⁸ 'The women we see often have no income. We have had to impose a limit that we can only have two people who are on no income at the refuge at any one time'.¹⁶⁹

Victorian government guidelines allow service providers the discretion to apply full or partial rental subsidies for clients without income or with significantly reduced income.¹⁷⁰ The Commission found that some refuges charge a nominal amount for refuge services: at least one refuge policy manual states that all clients are required to pay a service fee of 10 per cent of their total income;¹⁷¹ another's fees were $30 per woman per week, plus $10 per child per week.¹⁷² Other refuges' policies note that fees are required only if the woman is in receipt of income and that this may be waived if the woman is paying rent elsewhere.¹⁷³

Safe Steps reported that over 80 per cent of the women and children accommodated in its emergency accommodation units have not been able to enter a refuge because they lack permanent residency and that these people remain in crisis accommodation twice as long as other residents.¹⁷⁴

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women

At present there are three refuges specifically for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women in Victoria.¹⁷⁵ As discussed in Chapter 26, community members and Aboriginal organisations stressed to the Commission that this is inadequate for responding to need, especially in view of the over-representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children as victims of family violence.¹⁷⁶ There was also a very clear message that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women were reluctant to use mainstream services because those services do not always provide a response that is sensitive to their culture.¹⁷⁷

Women with disabilities

The Commission heard that there is limited capacity to respond to women with disabilities who are seeking to leave a violent relationship. Evidence was also presented that women whose children have a disability face impediments, regardless of whether the disability is physical or non-physical.¹⁷⁸ One mother said, 'I can't go to a shelter with a daughter who is bipolar'.¹⁷⁹

Beyond physical access, some of the barriers to access crisis accommodation for people with disabilities are as follows:

- ▶ There are fewer 'exit options' for women with disabilities, which can mean refuges are less likely to accept these women.
- ▶ Some refuges do not accommodate women with a mental illness because of the nature of communal settings.
- ▶ Many refuges do not allow disability support workers on site because of security concerns.¹⁸⁰
- ▶ Services may not be able to meet the support or communication needs of the woman.¹⁸¹

Few refuges have full disability access. Women with Disabilities Victoria reported that, of the 31 refuges in Victoria, up to nine might accommodate women or children with a physical disability; of these, three are specifically for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.¹⁸² The Council to Homeless Persons noted, however, that access may be even more limited, with as few as three refuges being fully accessible:

For women with disabilities, finding crisis accommodation is even more challenging. Many family violence refuges were purchased by community organisations in the 1970s, and as such, few are built for purpose and only three are fully accessible for women with disabilities.¹⁸³

The Victorian Government informed the Commission that a works program of about $900,000 was under way to modernise refuge facilities, including improving access for women and children with a disability.¹⁸⁴ It is not clear how many refuges will have full disability access at the completion of the upgrades.

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities

Although in recent years there has been increased acknowledgment of LGBTI communities by specialist family violence services, the Commission was advised, '... family and intimate partner violence service provision remains inadequate to cater for the diverse circumstances that can arise in LGTIQ community contexts'.¹⁸⁵ Safe Steps and No To Violence gave evidence that many people in LGBTI communities believe they will not be treated fairly when reporting intimate partner abuse and using mainstream services because of the discrimination, homophobia and transphobia regularly experienced by their communities.¹⁸⁶

A particular barrier identified for these communities is the lack of crisis and emergency accommodation.¹⁸⁷ As noted in Chapter 30, the Commission heard that in one case a refuge required a transgender man to resume living as a woman in order to gain access to the service.¹⁸⁸ The experiences of LGBTI communities are discussed in Chapter 30.

Women without children, including older women

The Commission heard that the family violence system gives priority to women with children, making it harder for women without children to obtain crisis accommodation.¹⁸⁹ For example, one refuge's policy states, '[D]ue to the size of some bedrooms the number of single women accepted will be restricted to two at any one time'.¹⁹⁰

The Commission was told that, because of high demand, the assistance service providers can offer to women without children is limited:

When she contacted the Salvation Army, since she had no children with her, she was at the bottom of the list for housing; and they have the housing monopoly and there is no other group to provide housing options. They did give her three nights' accommodation in a hotel and then she bought a 2-man tent on an unpowered site. Three quarters of her money was going to pay for her camp site. She was there for nine months.¹⁹¹

One woman stated, 'I felt I became a person [to the service system] once I had children'.¹⁹²

The Commission also heard that older women face barriers when they seek crisis accommodation because the accommodation might not meet their specific needs; for example, it might not be fully accessible to someone with mobility difficulties.¹⁹³ The needs of older people are discussed in Chapter 27.

Life in crisis accommodation

Experiences of refuges

Refuges in Victoria

- ▶ Eighteen of the 31 refuges in Victoria are 'communal' facilities. Located on a single property, they have a communal kitchen and living areas and a number of bedrooms, one for each family unit (a woman and any children).¹⁹⁴ These facilities can accommodate a total of 69 families.¹⁹⁵
- ▶ Thirteen refuges in Victoria are 'dispersed', or 'cluster', refuges. These have several self-contained properties on one site or across dispersed sites and can accommodate at least 36 families.¹⁹⁶
- ▶ Twenty of the 31 refuges in Victoria are 'high security', meaning that their addresses are not disclosed on the housing database of the Department of Health and Human Services.¹⁹⁷

The Commission heard directly from many women about the experience of living in a refuge. Many gave positive accounts of their time, saying they felt safe and supported by refuge staff who validated their experience. Others highlighted the opportunity for peer support and being able to share stories with other women who have had similar experiences:

I left my husband three years ago and he never found me. I went to a refuge. It was the best system.¹⁹⁸

Support workers, they listen, validate, support and advise. For someone who has never been down the path before this is so helpful in making sure you follow through with required actions.¹⁹⁹

Some women, however, said they found the experience confronting and distressing both for them and for their children: ‘... the refuge house, it was really horrible. It was a nightmare. Living in an abusive relationship and in a refuge was one and the same thing.’²⁰⁰

Reflecting on her experience working in specialist family violence services, Dr Rhonda Cumberland, Chief Executive Officer of Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, stated in her evidence to the Commission:

... we did offer women the option of going to a refuge, a very blunt instrument, took her away from her family, non-violent members of her family. It took her identity. It was the bluntest thing we could have done, and the impact was felt on women.²⁰¹

High-security refuges

DHHS told the Commission that 20 of the 31 refuges in Victoria are ‘high security’.²⁰² The addresses of these high-security refuges are confidential, although Ms Annette Gillespie, Chief Executive Officer of Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, noted that ‘the refuges have often been operational for generations and their whereabouts is often commonly known’.²⁰³

High-security refuges have additional eligibility criteria and restrictions, which differ according to the refuge. These restrictions are intended to keep women, children and staff safe and to ensure the refuge’s security. There was broad consensus that some women experience a level of risk that warrants a high-security response. There was, however, also criticism that high-security refuges hide women away and that we should instead be helping these people live their normal lives in safety.²⁰⁴

Women and children living in high-security refuges are asked not to disclose the refuge’s location and, depending on the individual refuge’s policy, might be expected to cease working and prevent children staying with them from attending school.²⁰⁵

Dr Holst described this:

[It is] hugely disruptive for the children’s education and wellbeing and adds to the trauma arising from family violence incidents. It also means that women do not have a steady stream of income, which could assist them in entering the rental property market. Additionally, real estate agents are more likely to house employed people.²⁰⁶

Evidence was provided that residents may not be allowed to have visitors at a refuge.²⁰⁷ Curfews can also operate. For example, one refuge’s manual states, ‘[I]n the interests of safety and security all women and children are requested to return to the refuge property by either the children’s bed time or curfew time of an evening, unless otherwise arranged with staff’.²⁰⁸

Another security measure involves switching off GPS devices in mobile phones so that a woman’s location cannot be tracked.²⁰⁹ At least one high-security refuge has a specific policy of accepting women only if parenting access arrangements are able to be ‘suspended, revoked or negotiated’ while the children are at the refuge.²¹⁰

Melbourne City Mission said these arrangements can be particularly difficult for young women, for whom connection to friends is a central part of their identity and an important protective factor:

... the requirement to cease contact with friends whilst in the 'safe house' environment and temporarily give up all that entails (for example, no mobile phone, no email, no social media) can, in itself, be traumatic. Some young women will not be able to comply with the requirements, and will leave.²¹¹

The Commission was told these measures are restrictive to the point where some women choose not to go to a refuge:

The strict security rules imposed at refuges are often another reason women avoid refuges. I understand that there are often a large amount of empty beds at refuges due to ... the rules, which, if breached once, can result in women being excluded from the refuge system entirely.²¹²

Communal refuges

More than half the refuges in Victoria are single properties, with a communal kitchen and living areas and bedrooms for each family unit (a woman and any of her children).²¹³ Opportunity Knocks told the Commission this style of living can be '... very challenging when mothers are trying to get children ready for school with limited facilities or there are women with divergent social and cultural needs or language backgrounds sharing the space'.²¹⁴ Others reported that the model suits some clients: '... however there are many who are deterred from entering [a] refuge as they prefer privacy or fear exposing their children to clients with drug and alcohol or mental health issues'.²¹⁵

As part of her research, Dr Spinney conducted interviews with women who had lived in refuges. She told the Commission:

... being in a refuge can be scary: they are noisy and you are thrown into this ... communal atmosphere, which is a marked difference from your home. Although refuges may have started off with a great feminist, collectivist ambition, it feels alien to many women to be suddenly cooking together, not to be deciding what to cook for their children and sharing all facilities. There will often be other residents who have quite chaotic lifestyles; who may be drinking or taking drugs, and so if you do not come from a chaotic household, they are actually very frightening environments. Women have told me that they will do virtually anything to avoid going into a refuge.²¹⁶

A number of submissions noted that some women choose to return home—possibly to a violent situation—because they find living in a refuge too stressful:

After 2 /3 weeks of living with the fear of not knowing if I had accommodation I decided it was actually more stressful living under those circumstances than back with [the perpetrator] so when he kept suggesting I returned I agreed.²¹⁷

On some occasions we have had to shut down the six bedroom facility for a period of time (usually two weeks), because we have had situations where some of the women were allegedly bullying others. We had to move those women on to other crisis accommodation.²¹⁸

The Commission was also told that the infrastructure of communal refuges means some families are not accepted if the make-up of the family does not reflect the bedroom capacity:

... one of the reasons can be that the provider may have a room that fits a women with three children and we might not have that make-up of family. We might have several families with a woman with one or two children.²¹⁹

Life as a child in a refuge

Many people stressed to the Commission that the prevalence of family violence, along with family violence's serious and long-term effects for children, means that a much greater focus is needed on developing age-appropriate practice and dedicated services for children and young people. Specialist family violence services have traditionally worked with children by providing safety support to their mother.²²⁰ Children have not been considered as 'clients' in their own right, even though their needs might not be the same as those of their mother.²²¹

Although there is no firm data on the number of children in crisis accommodation on any particular night, the Commission heard evidence that there are more children living in refuge accommodation than there are women.²²² Safe Steps estimates that 37 per cent of women they accommodate have children with them and that as many as half of all people they place in accommodation—refuges, emergency accommodation, motels or other ad hoc accommodation—are under 18 years.²²³

Dr Spinney gave evidence about life in a refuge for children:

Refuges are not environments where children are able to prosper. It is important for very young children to have friends and family, however when they enter a refuge, they are forced to change their kindergarten and no longer know their neighbours. If they are older and in school, we know that it is much better for children for that schooling to remain constant. There are often further changes when families move on from the refuge to transitional or private rented accommodation.²²⁴

Submissions also noted that being housed in high-security refuge accommodation disrupts children's connection with school and friends, which in turn can influence women's decisions about whether to stay or return home:

These children sometimes arrive in school uniforms as that was the easiest and safest way for them to be "plucked out" to safety in high security refuge. It does not take long for the children to start crying about missing the school excursion the coming Friday or worrying about what their friends will think that they have gone missing. Such pressure on a traumatised mother in crisis goes a long way to explain why many women return home. We [refuge staff] are kind and friendly but we are not their friends and family and the refuge does not smell like their bedroom at home.²²⁵

Domestic Violence Victoria stressed that long-term recovery from the impacts of family violence is strongly influenced by the degree of safety and stability that women and children experience post-separation.²²⁶ The Commission was told that living in ad hoc accommodation such as motels and moving between different crisis accommodation types and locations added to disruption and trauma for children. Similarly, a lack of service capacity to offer therapeutic support to children can aggravate harm.²²⁷ Dr Spinney said the 'very temporary nature' of refuges and other crisis accommodation also makes these places unsuitable for children:

They are really designed to only be in there in blocks of six weeks. It is often much longer than that, but it's normally not more than a year. If you are living in that kind of situation, it's not home, because you know that you are going to move on at any moment ... it's moving away from everything that you knew and knowing that you can't put down roots there in terms of local schools, et cetera, because you are going to be moving on again very shortly.²²⁸

The Commission was informed that in refuges' policies there is increasing recognition of the importance of trying to meet children's specific needs. For example, many refuges' policies state that the refuge will provide a safe, welcoming area for children, with toys, books and other activities, and will involve children in safety planning and other decision making where appropriate and with their mother's consent.²²⁹ Programs such as the Babies in Refuge training resource were also described in submissions, although it was also noted that funding for training is needed in order to maximise the effectiveness of such resources.²³⁰

The Commission understands that some refuges have staff whose role is to work with children. It is not possible, however, to determine from the information provided by the Victorian Government how many of these positions exist and whether this is the primary function of the role or if refuge staff build this capability onto their work. Where there are such staff, this activity does not appear to be funded as a discrete function with dedicated resources.²³¹ For example, Kara House submitted:

We are not funded to provide services for children. We do provide services for children, however, by virtue of our limited funding this does not cover the needs of the children we accommodate. Funding refuge services would allow us to employ a qualified children's worker, provide therapeutic groups for children and improve the parenting of mothers.²³²

The experiences of children and young people are discussed further in Chapter 10.

New types of refuges

One alternative to the communal refuge model is the 'core and cluster' model, which has been introduced in all refuges in South Australia.²³³ In Victoria, similar arrangements are called 'dispersed' or 'cluster' models. At present 13 of the 31 Victorian refuges are cluster-style on one site or dispersed across sites.²³⁴

A core and cluster is a set of individual units on a piece of land, together with office space or workers' space and communal activities areas for residents.²³⁵ The site allows for independent living while also providing comprehensive support services for women and children. The model offers families privacy while allowing them to connect and be supported as they wish. Families effectively have their own home.²³⁶

One Victorian example is Meminar Ngangg Gimba, which is in Mildura and is run by Mallee District Aboriginal Services.²³⁷ The Commission visited Meminar and a cluster refuge in South Australia as part of its program of site visits.

In the case of Meminar, Aunty Janine Wilson, Chairperson, Northern Loddon Mallee Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Group, explained that the facility was established because Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women fleeing violence were not able to obtain mainstream services for a variety of reasons, including difficulties with communal refuge models.²³⁸ Several features distinguish Meminar from other crisis response services.

First, the service provides a holistic case-management response, based on the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force definition of 'family violence'. Aunty Janine commented that they therefore call Meminar 'a women's response, not a women's refuge'.²³⁹ There is no limit to the amount of time women and their children can stay at Meminar. Services such as health and housing services and Centrelink are provided on site, and women and children are able to maintain relationships with external support organisations and case workers.²⁴⁰

Secondly, the Meminar facility is based on a cluster model and has six individual units. Each unit is fully furnished and self-contained, with a kitchen and bathroom.²⁴¹ The unit design is flexible, so that units can be joined to accommodate larger families. This is particularly important for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, who might be caring for extended family.²⁴² Thirdly, unlike most mainstream refuges, Meminar's location is not kept secret.²⁴³

Meminar also works closely with men's behaviour change programs and services, so both men and women receive assistance and the services talk to each other.²⁴⁴

The Commission observed that the communal spaces are used to run group programs for women and children that focus on violence and its effects and help build self-esteem and confidence, re-establish the bond between mother and child, and build women's capacity to reach financial independence and so break the cycle of violence and poverty. At the South Australian site the Commission visited, these programs are provided in partnership with other regional government and non-government service providers, among them Centrelink, legal services, vocational education services, children's services, psychologists and health services.

As noted, women and children can sometimes be excluded from refuges as a result of personal circumstances such as disability, mental illness, substance dependency, and when adolescent boys accompany their mother. Ms Maria Hagias, Executive Director, Central Domestic Violence Service, South Australia, gave evidence that because there is no communal living in a cluster refuge there is much less likelihood of a women being refused access, and blanket exclusions do not apply:

We don't have age limits for children, or curfews. We don't have rules around drug[s] and alcohol ... some women using our services will present with mental health issues and drug and alcohol issues. Our role is to work with them and support them to address those issues. The only rules that we do have are based on behaviour. Women are required to engage with their domestic violence case manager regularly, and we don't tolerate violent, aggressive or intimidating conduct.²⁴⁵

Ms Hagias also noted that security features were provided for the different sites:

[One site] resembles a retirement village ... The women have a security code to come in and out and women can drive their cars into the complex, which keeps them off the street and provides another level of security. [At another site] all of our properties face the street and there are no high fences, although fences separate each property. Every unit at that site has a duress alarm that goes directly to a security company. We also have security screens on the external windows and doors.²⁴⁶

DHHS gave evidence that the cluster model is now the preferred approach in Victoria. With the exception of one communal refuge that is being funded for conversion into cluster form,²⁴⁷ at present there is, however, no program of funding for the redevelopment of existing communal refuges.²⁴⁸ The department advised that the estimated cost of converting the remaining communal refuges to the cluster model is about $70 million—an average of $3.85 million for each refuge rebuild, excluding land costs.²⁴⁹

Post-crisis housing options

Refuges were established as a short-term option for supporting women and children during the immediate crisis period. The model is based on the premise of a woman staying in a refuge for about six weeks, then moving on to transitional housing for an interim period of up to 12 months, and then going to long-term accommodation such as public housing or private rental.²⁵⁰ The Commission heard evidence, however, that, 'In practice, bottlenecks in the system form at the point[s] of entry into refuge, transitional and long-term housing, preventing the system from flowing as is intended'.²⁵¹

Services reported that women and children are staying in refuges for increasingly longer periods. Women's Liberation Halfway House reported stays of up to five or six months in refuge and that 'targets for numbers of women served cannot reasonably be met'.²⁵² Other service providers reported similar lengths of stay:

Women and children now stay in refuge often for 12 weeks or longer and our support of clients in transitional housing can stretch 5 years or more.²⁵³

Most of the people on the transitional housing prioritisation list will never receive it. Last month we had ten vacancies, or ten new tenants in, from a waiting list of over 400.²⁵⁴

This backlog was identified as a major contributor to the long-term use of motels and other ad hoc arrangements.²⁵⁵

Victims said that the pressure to clear backlogs and 'move them on' left them without adequate support:

I'm grateful that I've got my safety but it's not fair. I still don't have any support and I have to do it all on my own. The refuge system was amazing but then they cut me loose because there are women waiting in motels.²⁵⁶

A number of factors were identified as contributing to the backlog—in particular, the lack of transitional accommodation and permanent affordable options either in the private rental market or in social housing. Eastern Domestic Violence Service informed the Commission:

Rents are high requiring women to often spend more than 55% of their income on accommodation making them ineligible for bond assistance and rent in advance from Centrelink as the tenancy is considered to be unsustainable. The high cost of alternative accommodation is a major factor in a woman's decision to remain in a violent relationship. Even when the woman can access transitional housing (which is in short supply), the expectation is that she will move into more permanent accommodation. The Centrelink crisis payment is not sufficient to even rent a cabin in a caravan park in the Eastern Region. Public housing is often not a viable option due to the extensive waiting list, even for priority housing. It is common for women to wait 8–15 months (or longer for women with many children, or special needs) for priority public housing. It is also disruptive for the family as they may settle into the community where the transitional property is, and then often have to relocate to a new area for the public housing.²⁵⁷

These matters are discussed briefly in the following sections. Options for clearing this backlog and providing viable housing solutions for victims of family violence are examined later in the chapter.

Transitional housing

Transitional housing

Transitional housing properties are either owned or leased by the Director of Housing, an officer of the Victorian Government. They are administered by community service organisations that are funded to manage tenancies—arranging minor maintenance, ensuring that those in greatest need have access to transitional housing properties, negotiating and monitoring tenancy and occupancy agreements, collecting rent, and working collaboratively with organisations helping tenants to sustain their tenancies.

The current supply

Data from DHHS shows that the number of transitional housing properties has decreased in recent years. Between 30 June 2010 and 30 June 2014 the total number of such properties in the state decreased from 3703 to 3667.²⁵⁸ Subsequent information from the department showed a further reduction in transitional housing properties with 3571 properties as at September 2015.²⁵⁹ Of these 3571 properties, 206 were allocated for crisis housing, 843 were allocated for specific groups (such as people with alcohol and drug problems or with mental illness) and 2522 were 'generalist'.²⁶⁰ There are no transitional properties solely for people who have experienced family violence.²⁶¹

DHHS advised the Commission that data relating to demand or unmet need for transitional housing is not collected consistently across all agencies.²⁶²

Eligibility for transitional housing

The Commission heard that, because there is no dedicated transitional housing for women escaping family violence, women are forced to 'compete' with people experiencing homelessness for access to these properties. At a community consultation in Gippsland the following was noted:

Two or three workers putting families up for the same property. Up against homelessness applications. So competitive for the transitional houses. Safe houses are backed up and trying to fund emergency accommodation in motels.²⁶³

A person needs to be linked to a support service in order to be eligible for a transitional property.²⁶⁴ In cases involving family violence, this support is generally delivered by specialist family violence services funded to provide 12 weeks of support (or 26 weeks in the case of intensive case-management services).²⁶⁵ Support workers' focus tends to be on stabilising housing before dealing with other things. Ms Springall stated:

In my experience, this is what works best for most people: if someone is uncertain about where they are going to be sleeping that night, or they're worried about their immediate safety and accommodation, then it is difficult for them to grapple with other issues.²⁶⁶

The Commission was told that, because of extended waiting times for transitional housing, there is a tension between the requirement for transitional housing applicants to be connected to a service and the length of time services are funded to provide assistance. In reality, women can be left in crisis accommodation with minimal support.²⁶⁷ We were also told that people who maintain an ownership interest in the family home are not eligible for transitional housing.²⁶⁸

Life in transitional housing

The Council to Homeless Persons described some of the negative outcomes for women and children living in temporary accommodation. It stated that the structures of homelessness and housing services can exacerbate the women's and children's disconnection from important people and social supports and connections:

Children may face two or three school moves within a year due to their changing housing circumstances: firstly on entering a refuge, then on exiting refuge into transitional housing, and then exiting transitional housing into either private or public housing. There have been efforts to minimize this disruption, by swapping a transitional housing property to a public housing property in some regions, or investing in private rental brokerage programs. However these practices are not routine, and are limited by the availability of public housing properties to swap and private rental brokerage packages to deliver.²⁶⁹

The Council said that, although services make every effort to limit this disruption, 'these are individual "work arounds" rather than systemic interventions'.²⁷⁰

Transitional housing was initially introduced as a way of helping to stabilise people experiencing homelessness before they gained long-term housing, such as public housing or private rental.²⁷¹ Mr Rogers told the Commission that '[l]engths of stay in transitional housing should be from three months, generally up to 12 months, with stays of up to 18 months for young people, where required'.²⁷² The Commission was informed that, although transitional housing used to be a pathway out of crisis accommodation, this is no longer the case.²⁷³ 'Blockages' in the system and a lack of exit points mean that transitional housing tenancies are now much longer than originally intended: while the average tenancy is about 12 months,²⁷⁴ in some cases it can extend up to two or three years.²⁷⁵

We will often have clients living in transitional housing for anywhere between 12 months and two years: the movement through these properties can be slow. We are finding that our clients get stuck in those properties, waiting for public housing or a suitable alternative.²⁷⁶

The Victorian Government advised the Commission that a recent audit of lengths of stay in transitional housing showed that over one-third of these properties are tenanted for more than a year and 4.3 per cent are tenanted for more than five years.²⁷⁷

Some submissions called for additional transitional housing properties, recognising that if the system worked as intended transitional housing would play an important role in providing short-term accommodation while longer term housing is secured.²⁷⁸ Because of the significant lack of long-term accommodation options, however, others argued that it is difficult to know whether the current transitional housing response is adequate. The Council to Homeless Persons stated:

The shortage of long-term properties creates a bottleneck in different parts of the system: people are stuck in transitional who should be in long-term; people are in crisis because they can't get into transitional; and people are in hotels because they can't get into crisis. It is not flowing as it is supposed to be. If the system was flowing, we might find that there is enough crisis and transitional accommodation, however we suspect there is not, because the number of those properties has not kept pace with population growth.²⁷⁹

Long-term housing

Social housing

Because it is affordable and offers security of tenure, social housing is essential for those who are at risk of longer term struggles to sustain housing. Victoria's social housing provides subsidised rental housing for people on low incomes. The accommodation response to women escaping family violence was designed with social housing as a major destination following transitional housing.

Types of social housing

There are two types of social housing in Victoria.

Public housing is delivered by the Office of Housing in the Department of Health and Human Services. Rent is capped at 25 per cent of combined eligible household income, with the amount of rent payable formally determined by calculating market rental value and applying a rebate (discount) to ensure rental payments do not exceed 25 per cent.²⁸⁰ Public housing tenants are not eligible to receive Commonwealth Rent Assistance.

Community housing is delivered either by housing associations or by housing providers who manage Director of Housing-owned properties that have been allocated to a community group for management.²⁸¹ Income and asset limits are generally higher than those for public housing, although community housing tenants generally pay no more than 30 per cent of their combined household income.²⁸² Tenants are also eligible to receive Commonwealth Rent Assistance. Housing associations are required to accommodate 50 per cent of people who would be eligible for public housing.²⁸³

Social housing accounts for less than four per cent of the total housing stock in Victoria.²⁸⁴

Current supply

The majority of the social housing stock in Victoria is public housing, which, as noted, is administered by DHHS. The Commission received evidence that Victoria has less public housing per capita than the national average.²⁸⁵ Australian Bureau of Statistics data for 2013–14 shows that Victoria has the lowest proportion of public housing residents across all states and territories: 1.9 per cent of people in Victoria live in public housing compared with the national average of 3.2 per cent.²⁸⁶ Mr Rogers explained that this difference is partly a result of historical policy differences, which began when the then Victorian Housing Commission sold many thousands of properties to tenants.²⁸⁷

- ▷ In 30 June 2014 there were 85,199 social housing properties in Victoria—including 64,886 public housing properties.²⁸⁸
- ▷ The Victorian Government advised the Commission that it expects a net reduction of 84 social housing properties in 2015–16.²⁸⁹

Department of Health and Human Services data (see Table 9.1 below) shows that social housing stock levels have remained largely static in the past decade, with average annual growth of 1.3 per cent between 2006 and 2014. The majority of this growth occurred in 2010–11, coinciding with the Nation Building Economic Stimulus Plan.²⁹⁰ While the overall social housing stock base has grown by 10.6 per cent since 2006–07, the public housing component has, however, had a net decrease of 267 properties (see Table 9.1).

Eligibility

At present there is no common waiting list or access point for social housing.²⁹¹ Community housing is obtained by applying to individual providers, who each maintain their own records—which may or may not include a waiting list—and use varying systems.²⁹² The Victorian Government has, however, announced its intention to move to a single waiting list for all social housing, so that ‘it is totally visible to the whole sector in terms of what the availability of resources [is]’.²⁹³

To be eligible for public housing, applicants must satisfy the following criteria:

- ▷ live in Victoria and have Australian citizenship or permanent residency status
- ▷ not earn or own more than the current public housing income and asset limits
- ▷ not be subject to Centrelink’s two-year waiting period for newly arrived migrants
- ▷ not own or part-own a house, unit or flat
- ▷ repay any money that is still owed from a previous public housing tenancy or bond loan
- ▷ provide the required proof of identity, residency status, and income and other documents.²⁹⁴

There are, however, exemptions to these requirements, and some of them relate specifically to family violence. For example, the requirement to be resident in Victoria is waived for those escaping family violence in other states.²⁹⁵

Public housing operates a ‘segmented early housing waiting list’ with the aim of making public housing available to those most in need.²⁹⁶ There are four ‘segments’ of the waiting list, the top three comprising the Early Housing allocation:

- ▷ homeless with support (highest priority segment)
- ▷ supported housing
- ▷ special housing needs
- ▷ wait turn (lowest priority segment).²⁹⁷

Applicants on the Early Housing waiting list are allocated housing before others on the waiting list. There are several sub-categories in the Early Housing allocation.²⁹⁸ The two sub-categories that most directly apply to women experiencing family violence are as follows:

- ▷ 'Homeless with support' applies to people who have no alternative housing options and are receiving support from a government-funded service—for example, women living in crisis accommodation arranged by a family violence service or living in transitional housing or other housing managed or arranged by a crisis service.
- ▷ 'Special housing needs' applies to people who are living in housing that has become unsuitable. Women experiencing family violence are eligible under 'Insecure housing' for those who are living in transitional, emergency or crisis housing or temporarily with friends or relatives. This does not require support to the same level as those in the 'Homeless with support' sub-category or under 'Unsafe housing', when a member of the household is facing actual or a serious threat of physical danger or family violence.²⁹⁹

Evidence was presented to the Commission that a woman living at home with the perpetrator of family violence or living temporarily with friends or family is not necessarily at lower risk of family violence than a woman living in a refuge and that allocating housing support to those 'most in need' is particularly problematic in the context of family violence because 'need' does not necessarily equate to 'risk':

Many requests for assistance with public housing ... are usually for or by women who have an underlying issue such as family violence ... anecdotal evidence suggests that women are unable to remove themselves from violent situations due to a lack of alternative accommodation; the catch 22 being they are unable to get on a priority housing list while they are still in existing accommodation, on the other hand they don't wish to forecast their intention to their partner or leave before they have guaranteed accommodation.³⁰⁰

A Department of Health and Human Services review of the allocations policy found that the system could be changed to improve outcomes for homeless people by, among other things, 'prioritising individuals and families who are homeless due to family violence, as it continues to be a major contributor to family breakdown and homelessness in Victoria'.³⁰¹

Waiting lists

There were 41,953 applications on the Victorian public housing waiting list at 30 June 2014; this included 7321 existing tenants who were seeking a transfer.³⁰² Department of Health and Human Services data shows that almost 400 of the 41,953 applicants had included family violence as a circumstance associated with their application.³⁰³ About one-third of all public housing applicants were on the Early Housing waiting list (13,184); of these, 6.4 per cent (840 applicants) were in the 'Unsafe housing' sub-category (see Table 9.2).³⁰⁴

Although the data suggests that the number of people seeking public housing who have experienced or are experiencing family violence is low, this is not consistent with the evidence the Commission received through consultations and in submissions: it was consistently stated that women were waiting long periods to obtain public housing.³⁰⁵ The Commission is unable to reach any conclusions about the level of demand on the basis of this data: the figures might represent poor identification or recording of family violence on application forms, poor data management, or the fact that people might be deterred from applying for public housing because of the extensive waiting lists.

The Commission also heard that there has been a decrease in the allocation of public housing stock generally as people stay in tenanted properties for longer periods. Turnover is slow and few vacancies arise:

The number of allocations to public housing has declined over the last decade due to fewer vacancies being available as tenants are staying in properties longer. For example, in 1999–00, 11,051 new households were allocated public housing. In 2004–05, 8,125 households were allocated public housing. In 2013–14, this number was 5,715 allocations, representing a decline of almost 30 per cent since 2004–05.³⁰⁶

Waiting times

A strong theme in submissions was that long waiting times for public housing mean that the family violence response system is blocked because of the lack of accommodation options, leaving women and children in 'limbo' for long periods:

After the crisis has passed, there are limited housing options to exit refuge: many wait many months for a THM (transitional housing management property) and often years for a permanent OoH (Office of Housing Property). Although children are linked into schools and child care temporarily whilst they are in refuge & THM, [women] are unable to resume their life fully as they do not know where they will be located. Women and children are in limbo for too long and they are therefore unable to participate fully in the community. Currently the long waits mean that women and children are still being affected by the violence years later due to homelessness.³⁰⁷

One family violence victim told the Commission:

I've been on public housing lists for years. I've been on transitional housing for three months. There's no choice – either stay homeless, or deal drugs to pay for private rental. Once you go into private rental you lose your spot on the public housing list.³⁰⁸

The Victorian Government advised the Commission that in 2014–15 the average waiting period for Early Housing allocation was 9.5 months.³⁰⁹ For those waiting for a house with four or more bedrooms, however, the waiting time was 16.6 months.³¹⁰

Calls for investment

DHHS provided to the Commission information showing that the level of expenditure on public housing acquisitions and renewal has declined in recent years, from $462.8 million in 2009–10 to an estimated $131 million in 2014–15.³¹¹

The Commission was informed that the private rental market will never be a viable option for some victims of family violence, so investment in social housing is particularly important:

Some women managing complex traumas, who have other complex needs, or have been unemployed for some time may not be able to sustain housing in the private rental market. For these women, public housing and community housing is, and should continue to be, the most appropriate housing option. Unfortunately the construction of social housing hasn't kept up with demand or population growth ... We must reverse this trend in order to provide long term affordable housing for women escaping family violence.³¹²

Submissions and consultations showed strong support for a substantial expansion of social housing in view of the scale of the current blockages in the system and the associated consequences for women who have experienced family violence. The submission from the Council to Homeless Persons, which was endorsed by 128 other organisations, called for the establishment of an affordable housing growth fund of $200 million a year.³¹³ It stated that investment at this scale would produce about 800 additional units of accommodation each year.³¹⁴

The Commission observed that such an injection of emergency funds would be less than that under the previous Nation Building Economic Stimulus Plan, which had a stock growth rate of about two per cent a year. Applying a two per cent growth in stock would deliver an extra 7300 units of accommodation over four years, or about 1825 units a year.³¹⁵

Another suggestion for increasing the supply of affordable rental housing related to the use of 'inclusionary zoning'.³¹⁶ Inclusionary zoning is a planning law mechanism that requires contributions from land developers as a condition of development consent, in the form of either units of affordable housing or an equivalent monetary amount.³¹⁷ These schemes operate to a limited degree in some other Australian jurisdictions and are widespread internationally, particularly in the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Commission notes that the Victorian Government's Plan Melbourne Refresh process is actively considering this idea as well as broader proposals for improving the supply of social housing.³¹⁸ For example, in March 2015 the government announced its intention to trial inclusionary zoning for land it sold in a policy that could require 10 to 15 per cent of new construction to be affordable for first-home buyers and low-income families.³¹⁹

Future directions for social housing in New South Wales

Released in January 2016, the New South Wales Government's report Future Directions for Social Housing in NSW signals the government's commitment to expand and diversify the options for people requiring housing assistance. There are three strategic priorities:

- ▶ more social housing—expanding the social housing supply and optimising planning settings and infrastructure
- ▶ more opportunities to avoid and/or leave social housing—improving access to the private rental market, expanding the affordable housing supply, and supporting people in pursuing work and educational opportunities
- ▶ a better experience in social housing—access for priority clients, housing stability, ensuring suitable, safe and quality housing, and high-quality customer service.

The report states that these priorities will be achieved in several ways:

- ▶ by significant expansion and redevelopment of stock through partnerships with private sector developers and finance—including through the Social and Affordable Housing Fund
- ▶ by transferring significant tenancy management responsibility to non-government housing providers
- ▶ through 'wrap around' services to support tenants in building their capabilities—such as education, training and employment opportunities
- ▶ by increasing the use of private rental assistance.

Public housing tenants and family violence

Although public housing provides important security for people without other housing options, there are still difficulties for people who experience violence while living there. The Commission was told that the public housing system is not able to respond quickly and flexibly to the needs of women and children experiencing family violence.³²⁰

If a public housing tenant is forced to leave the home because of the risk of family violence, this can have implications for her continuing tenancy. One woman informed the Commission:

I am [at] risk of homelessness all the time. I am currently lucky enough to be in a DHS house. However my abuser claims that he knows my whereabouts. I am at risk of having to pack up and run again. This will put myself and children in abject poverty and homelessness again. We need special circumstances for maintaining our DHS houses if we need to be away from the residence for extended periods of time (in refuges). Currently it is only a four week absence from a DHS house which will cause them to evict you.³²¹

DHHS released a temporary absence policy statement on 21 September 2015.³²² Under the new policy, if a person is a victim of family violence and is forced to leave their home, they may be afforded 'special circumstances' and permitted to pay a reduced weekly rental of $15 for the duration of the absence (up to six months).³²³ This is in recognition of the financial hardship experienced by tenants who might have no income during the time they are absent and might also be expected to pay temporary accommodation costs somewhere else, such as in a refuge.³²⁴

The Commission also heard of cases where women accrued debt for damage to public housing property caused by the perpetrator. The DHHS Office of Housing's policy statement on property damage was amended in October 2015 and now provides as follows:

The Department accepts that there are circumstances where damage to the property occurs and the tenant is unable to prevent it. In these instances, such as family violence where the perpetrator of the violence caused the damage to the property or the damage is caused by a natural disaster, the Department will not charge the tenant for the costs of repairs.³²⁵

The Department will generally not claim costs from the tenant for property damage if the damage was caused by:

- An accident or actions which could not be reasonably prevented, taking into account the individual needs or circumstances of the tenant or the household members remaining in the property, for example, the tenant has a disability or is a victim of family violence ...³²⁶

Where family violence is involved, the Department accepts advice from the victim's family violence worker or other relevant support worker as sufficient evidence to support the victim's claim.³²⁷

There are similar statements in the more detailed Office of Housing operational guidelines.³²⁸

In one case, the Commission heard that a woman was prevented from transferring to a safer property because the Office of Housing requires that debts be cleared before it approves transfers:³²⁹

She remained in the house with her children and tried to get her ex-partner to take his name off the lease as per Office of Housing (OoH) policy, he refused. Her ex-partner regularly returned to the house vandalising the property, including smashing windows. On each occasion she contacted police and a report was done. She has also applied for a transfer out of the area in an attempt to avoid any further contact with the ex-partner.

Ms A was denied a transfer because she was deemed to have a debt to the OoH because too many windows had been smashed and replaced, so the OoH was charging her for the replacement of the glass. Due to the high rental she was paying she could not afford to pay this debt, therefore remained living in the house in fear and desperation. With a growing debt and no ability to transfer to another area she could see no way out of this unacceptable situation.³³⁰

At present tenants wishing to transfer have to wait for extended periods as transfer applicants are allocated properties in turn with those on the general waiting list. The Commission was informed that in practice this means that many women abandon their properties.³³¹

Service providers told the Commission that since the guidelines for the Social Housing Advocacy and Support Program were amended in 2012 they have been unable to advocate on behalf of tenants in relation to property maintenance or damage.³³² It was argued that 'in the case of family violence this can have serious implications for tenants retaining their homes' and that this function should be restored.³³³

The Council to Homeless Persons emphasised that transferring between public housing properties can be a very lengthy process and that the long waits can lead to women abandoning their properties. The Council suggested that another way of managing transfers requested because of family violence might be to allocate vacancies to transfer applicants first and then allocate to the vacated property from the waiting list. It argued that this would 'essentially give transfers priority but would not disadvantage those on the waiting list overall'.³³⁴

The private rental market

The other housing option available to victims of family violence is the private rental market which accounts for about 22.6 per cent of total housing stock in Victoria.³³⁵ This can include staying at home when the perpetrator is excluded, on leaving a violent situation, or after time spent in crisis or transitional housing. The Commission heard that the private rental market 'plays a central role in both resettlement and in providing medium term housing options for women affected by family violence'.³³⁶ The high cost of private rental accommodation can, however, make it difficult for many women to obtain and maintain a tenancy.

Access to the private rental market

A number of submissions made the point that, although private rental can offer choice and flexibility for many women escaping family violence, it remains out of reach for many because of multiple and intersecting barriers.

Affordability

The Commission heard that, even with the availability of Commonwealth Rent Assistance, the vast majority of low-income private renters remain in 'housing stress', which occurs when a person pays more than 30 per cent of their income on housing costs.³³⁷

Melbourne City Mission submitted that rental unaffordability is particularly acute in metropolitan Melbourne.³³⁸ It reported that total average female earnings in Victoria (full-time and part-time earnings) amount to $843 a week and that income at this level would only secure affordable housing (under 30 per cent of weekly income) in seven out of 30 municipalities in Melbourne for a one-bedroom property.³³⁹ 'For every other housing type a woman would be paying more than a third of her income on rent'.³⁴⁰ The council noted that this 'highlights not only the challenge of finding housing, but the challenge of sustaining it'.³⁴¹

The Council to Homeless Persons also informed the Commission that for women relying on Centrelink payments 'only [three] in 100 two bedroom homes would be affordable to a single parent with one child, and less than one in two hundred would be affordable to a single woman on Newstart'.³⁴² Anglicare Victoria's 2015 rental affordability snapshot presented a similar finding. It showed that less than 0.1 per cent of rental properties in metropolitan Melbourne are affordable for single parents relying on the single parenting payment, and only 0.8 per cent of rental properties are affordable for these families in coastal or regional Victoria.³⁴³

The Commission was advised that, while rental properties in regional Victoria are more affordable compared with metropolitan areas, fewer properties in total are available and their cost has increased above inflation in recent years.³⁴⁴ It was further noted that, 'with few crisis accommodation options in regional areas, women may be forced to move out of a region temporarily, but find it difficult to return'.³⁴⁵ Dr Holst commented:

Whilst rental properties are less expensive in rural areas, they are still often too expensive for a low income family and there are still a myriad of complexities around the tight knit communities witnessing the trauma of the ramifications of a family violence incident. More attention should be paid to women in rural areas experiencing homelessness having affordable and long term housing options, as well as discreet options for attending these premises.³⁴⁶

Initiatives aimed at tackling the problem of the unaffordability of private rental properties are discussed shortly.

Discrimination

Victims of family violence told the Commission they faced discrimination in the private rental market. A lay witness, 'Ms Susan Jones', spoke of her experience:

I attended numerous rental properties to find somewhere safer and more permanent for us to live. At one inspection, I was told by a local real estate agent that as a single unemployed mother with four children, my application would be at the bottom of the pile. She implied that I was wasting her time. I felt it was unfair for my hopes to be dismissed so carelessly. I was hurt but not deterred and kept politely attending open days. I was never offered anything, despite an impeccable rental history.³⁴⁷

Research conducted by the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission suggests that women with children—particularly single parents—find it difficult to enter the private rental market.³⁴⁸ A 2011 study by the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse for its financial security project also reported that many women in the study felt they were discriminated against by landlords or real estate agents because they were single mothers or had pets.³⁴⁹

They've put me in a box of 'I'm a no-hoper, single mother with three kids, there's something wrong with me, I can't pay my bills' ... One social worker – which I think is hilarious – has said, 'Why don't you just say you're widowed and they might look at you in a different light'. And you shouldn't have to do that. That is discrimination.³⁵⁰

The Commission heard evidence that discrimination can occur on multiple grounds—including race and disability—and that some women have to go to extraordinary lengths to find a home. A community consultation in Mildura produced the following example:

The discrimination regarding housing for Indigenous people here is rife in the private rental market. One client took six months to find somewhere, and that was really fast. Her children were Aboriginal but she wasn't, and that made it easier (she didn't take them to the open for inspection visits).³⁵¹

Submissions also noted that programs intended to promote access to the private rental market can cause delays, leaving women at a disadvantage in a competitive market. In other cases, services reported that '... women have been verbally approved for properties only to have the approval withdrawn when they indicate they will get a Bond Loan or HEF assistance from a homelessness agency'.³⁵²

Other barriers

The Commission was told of other barriers to gaining access to private rental that are unique to women who have experienced or are experiencing family violence. As discussed elsewhere in this report, it is common for perpetrators to isolate their victims, both socially and from services, while controlling access to the family's resources. This might mean women do not have a credit rating because they were not permitted access to the family's income. Alternatively, the perpetrator might have incurred debts on items that were in both names, resulting in a poor credit rating for the woman. Further, a woman might not have her own rental history or the perpetrator might have damaged the property, resulting in a poor rental history.³⁵³

Victims also described difficulties such as not having documentary evidence (for example, bills in their name) or cases when they had to leave the relationship or property abruptly, leaving behind documentation such as birth certificates or passports. Examples were given of women without documents being unable to secure a property for over 15 months, despite having the means to pay rent.³⁵⁴

Current private rental programs

The Commission received evidence about a number of programs and initiatives that aim to help women secure private rental accommodation, either so that they can leave home or in order to leave crisis or emergency accommodation.

The Housing Establishment Fund

Victoria's Housing Establishment Fund is administered by the Department of Health and Human Services and provides funds to homelessness services so that they can assist people with housing establishment costs such as rent in advance to establish a tenancy or to pay rental arrears to avoid becoming homeless. As noted, however, submissions claimed there are competing demands on these funds, which are also used to pay for emergency accommodation in places such as motels and rooming houses.³⁵⁵

Although the Victorian Government does not have data on the proportion of the Housing Establishment Fund budget spent on assisting women escaping family violence, it advised the Commission that $3.268 million of its total budget of $11.8 million in 2015–16 was allocated to family violence service providers. No details were available about how much of the fund's budget is spent on ad hoc accommodation compared with rent arrears or in advance.³⁵⁶

Service providers said the demand for Housing Establishment Fund funds far exceeds supply.³⁵⁷

Bond Loan Scheme

The Director of Housing funds a bond loan scheme to help households meet the cost of paying a bond on a private rental property, generally equivalent to the first month's rent. This amount is to be repaid at the conclusion of the tenancy.³⁵⁸ The scheme has a budget of $13.191 million for 2015–16 and is expected to make 12,000 bond loans. It is not known how many of these loans are made for women experiencing family violence.³⁵⁹

To be eligible for this assistance, applicants must be Australian permanent residents, thus excluding people with uncertain residency status.³⁶⁰ Applicants must also have sufficient income to be able to afford the rent (less than 55 per cent of their gross weekly income), must have repaid any previous bond loans, and must not owe any money on previous or current public housing tenancies. Applicants are also ineligible if they own or part-own a house, flat or unit, although it is not clear if there is an exemption for women who own or have a share in a residential property but are unable to live there because of family violence.³⁶¹

Family Violence Flexible Support Packages

Assistance for family violence victims has commonly been funded by the Victorian Government in the form of staff in specified programs—for example, case managers in specialist family violence services. To better respond to the particular needs of victims, the government has started to introduce various forms of additional ‘discretionary’ funding, sometimes referred to as ‘brokerage funding’ or ‘flexible funding packages’. In these cases, service providers receive an allocation of funds and, in consultation with the family violence victim, and within an upper limit for each household, have a degree of discretion about what they purchase for each client. This means that people receive assistance that is more closely aligned to their individual needs.

Some of these programs are targeted to deal with specific barriers and costs facing certain groups of women. For example, the Disability Family Violence Initiative provides funds for up to 12 weeks to a maximum of $9000 per person.³⁶²

As discussed in various sections of this report the Victorian Government has allocated $3 million a year for the next four years for up to 1000 Family Violence Flexible Support Packages a year. The Commission understands that these packages will be administered by 15 specialist family violence services and can be used for housing and non-housing costs, including paying for rent arrears in advance, relocation costs, furniture, security measures, counselling, education, training and employment assistance.³⁶³

This move reflects the view that social services should provide more individualised support than has been the case in the past. Mr Chris Eccles, Secretary, Department of Premier and Cabinet, suggested that any future service system should deliver a more ‘personalised response’, so that the various supports required by people experiencing family violence are ‘tailored to their needs’.³⁶⁴

Head-leasing arrangements

Head leasing occurs when a housing provider leases a property from a landlord in the private rental market and then subleases it to a person requiring housing assistance.

This approach can be attractive to landlords because it guarantees them a secure rental.³⁶⁵ For the potential tenant it might help to overcome problems of discrimination and adverse credit ratings resulting from their experience of family violence because the lease is managed through a service provider, not directly with the resident. It also makes more properties available in diverse locations. A further advantage of using head leases is that the lease can potentially be transferred into the woman’s name at a suitable time. Dr Holst explained that this is the objective of Launch Housing’s head-leasing program to divert families out of rooming houses:

We have actually downgraded the head leases and made them principally leases that are held by the women that we have subsidised. We actually think that’s better. It gets the welfare agency out of the picture a bit sooner and, as long as the subsidy is there, it can be taken over more readily by the woman who is then the tenant.³⁶⁶

This was also the approach adopted by the A Place to Call Home program, which converted transitional housing into ongoing public housing and thus minimised the need for a woman to move again.³⁶⁷

Private rental brokerage

Some specialist family violence services are funded to support women in obtaining and retaining private rental properties. This assistance includes brokerage funds to subsidise rent for a limited period. It also includes liaison with real estate agents and provision of ongoing contact and housing-related assistance for the duration of the brokerage period.

DHHS advised the Commission that funding was to provide 611 ‘episodes of assistance’ to women and children through the private rental brokerage program in 2014–15, delivered through 13 family violence services at a total cost of $1.13 million.³⁶⁸ Examples were given of currently available brokerage packages being insufficient to meet demand: one regional service providers had 25 packages of funding for family violence private rental brokerage in 2014–15 and had allocated them all by January 2015.³⁶⁹

Sustaining private rental accommodation

The Commission was informed that there are few programs that help women sustain a home in the long term and that it is important that housing assistance is combined with support where needed. One submission noted that treating family violence as ‘resolved once the client has a new house is dangerously naïve and belies all contemporary academic literature on family violence intervention.’³⁷⁰

Help to improve a woman’s position in the labour market so she can meet longer-term housing costs was named as a priority, including linking her to education and training opportunities, employment services and financial counselling.³⁷¹ McAuley Community Services for Women also noted that employment assistance should be sensitive and responsive to the specific needs of women who have experienced family violence.³⁷²

One feature of the Family Violence Flexible Support Packages just discussed is that funds can be used for education costs, training and other employment-related items within the $7000 limit.³⁷³

The Commission was also told of specialist family violence services establishing partnerships with local real estate agents in order to negotiate bonds and rents and, in some cases, to install fences and additional security measures.³⁷⁴ Workers reported that advocating with real estate agents on behalf of clients had brought considerable benefits and had helped women who would otherwise have found it difficult to leave a violent relationship.³⁷⁵

Many submissions expressed support for existing measures designed to help women move into the private rental market, while also noting the need to review and expand programs that have been operating for a long time.³⁷⁶ They also submitted that funding for these initiatives is insufficient to meet current demand.³⁷⁷

Rapid rehousing programs

Some submissions called for a greater number of focused rapid rehousing programs to secure and maintain new tenancies.³⁷⁸ These programs were developed in the United States and aim to quickly move people who are homeless into private rental by providing a short-term rental subsidy (up to 18 months) as well as support services to strengthen their capacity to sustain the tenancy in the long term.³⁷⁹ They are not specifically family violence programs; rather, they have emerged in response to high levels of homelessness, including family homelessness.

A recent large-scale experimental research study being conducted in the United States—the Family Options Study, led by the Department of Housing and Urban Development—compared outcomes for families who had stayed in emergency shelters and subsequently been assigned to one of four forms of housing assistance, including community-based rapid rehousing.

In the United States the rationale for rapid rehousing approaches with time-limited support stresses the importance of helping families into conventional housing in their communities as quickly as possible to reduce dislocation and potential further harm resulting from the extended periods that occur under the standard ‘stepping stone’ model of housing assistance. Time-limited support is justified to encourage families to become economically self-sufficient more quickly. The Family Options Study findings reported in 2015 found that a ‘housing first’ approach through a permanent rental supplement was most effective in stabilising the housing of families and improving the wellbeing of children compared with time-limited rapid rehousing or transitional housing. The permanent housing supplement intervention did, however, have a negative impact on employment participation and family incomes.³⁸⁰ The Commission understands that this intervention was not accompanied by any form of tailored employment assistance.

The Victorian Council of Social Service told the Commission:

Many people experiencing violence have been previously housed and are able to maintain a tenancy in permanent housing. A rapid rehousing program uses flexible resources to secure and maintain new tenancies quickly, such as establishing relationships with real estate agents and negotiating with potential landlords, providing guarantees, bonds or subsidies and working with people to ensure their tenancies are successful.³⁸¹

The Council to Homeless Persons, along with 128 other organisations, suggested to the Commission that the Victorian Government should establish such a program. It estimated that $10 million (approximately $2.3 million in annual rental subsidies and $7.3 million in other annual support costs) could finance assistance to search for suitable properties, offer incentives for landlords to participate, and provide medium-term rental subsidies of up to six months to ensure that rent remains affordable for up to 1000 women and their children.³⁸²

The Commission was also told about a 'rapid rehousing' program operated by Launch Housing. With the support of philanthropic funding from realestate.com.au (the REA Group), Launch Housing operates a rapid rehousing program for women and their children leaving family violence by providing 'extra brokerage for rent and other private rental expenses'.³⁸³ The REA Group will also donate furniture to help women set up a new home. Launch Housing also operates its own not-for-profit real estate agency.³⁸⁴

In October 2012 the New South Wales Government began a 12-month demonstration project for rapid rehousing in Penrith, Mt Druitt and Coffs Harbour. The aim was to help frequent users of temporary accommodation secure and sustain private rental housing.³⁸⁵ Project workers aimed to carry out an assessment within 24 hours of referral and develop a case plan within 48 hours. The program sought to ensure that the tenancy of housed clients was maintained for at least four months.³⁸⁶

An evaluation of the project demonstrated a range of social and economic benefits for clients. The project had helped build their life skills, confidence and tenancy management skills (such as budgeting and keeping up to date with rent). The majority of tenancies established under the project have been able to be maintained.³⁸⁷ The evaluation report pointed to the following as success factors:

- ▶ Early turnaround. Having the initial contact with clients as soon as possible after referral was a critical part of the success of the project.
- ▶ Relationships with real estate agents. Each site developed good relationships with real estate agents, enabling them to secure tenancies for clients who would otherwise probably be rejected because they received Centrelink benefits, were first-time renters or had poor rental histories.
- ▶ Support tailored to individual need. Most clients required a range of supports to establish a tenancy, including intense assistance up front. Support also focused on how to maintain the tenancy in order to avoid tenancy breakdown.
- ▶ Flexible use of funds. Funds could be tailored to meet individual needs.
- ▶ Options for singles. To respond to rental affordability problems for single people on Newstart, each site developed share-housing options.³⁸⁸

The evaluation report found that the cost per client ($4700) was higher than the cost of providing temporary accommodation because it involved intensive support, such as accompanying clients to real estate agents and on property inspections. The project was, however, effective in securing timely outcomes, with the time spent in temporary accommodation before securing private rental generally three to four weeks.³⁸⁹ The main change stakeholders proposed was for a longer period of support (12 months) to ensure long-term tenancy sustainability. Some suggested that rapid rehousing should focus on clients with more complex needs; others, particularly service providers, said it is best targeted at clients with low to moderate needs.³⁹⁰

Accommodation for perpetrators

In some submissions the provision of accommodation to men who are excluded from the family home as a result of family violence was identified as a gap.³⁹¹ The Commission was told that ‘providing accommodation to keep men who use violence “in sight” of the justice system and other service interventions is in the interest of both victims and the broader community’.³⁹² One woman told the Commission during its consultations:

I think that the refuges should be for the men, not the women who can stay in their house. The problem with that is that the man still knows where she’s living. It (moving men into refuges) won’t work for everyone but it would for some. It’s so disruptive for the kids and then they miss him. If the man is placed in the refuge then they (the kids) can go to see him. I know that I’m simplifying it and it’s really about control but it’s worth doing.³⁹³

Crisis accommodation and medium- to long-term housing options for single men are limited. For example, there are two crisis accommodation facilities for single men in Melbourne and two that take men, women and families. In one of the male-only facilities there are 63 beds and about three vacancies a week:

These facilities are targeted to men who have multiple and complex needs and have slept rough, and deliver a service model that is based on addressing long term homelessness. With few vacancies and a specific target group, current crisis accommodation facilities are neither readily available nor provide the right solution for people who have been removed from the home due to violence.³⁹⁴

The Commission heard that homelessness services often used ad hoc accommodation such as rooming houses to house perpetrators.³⁹⁵ Mr Rogers advised that accommodation options include singles accommodation funded under the homelessness program or use of the Housing Establishment Fund to pay for motel or rooming house accommodation.³⁹⁶ Information about the number of perpetrators accommodated or the demand levels under either option was not available.³⁹⁷

Concern was expressed that ‘... many private rooming houses continue to house people with a range of complex needs, and very little ongoing outreach is able to be provided within current resources. Violence is not uncommon in private rooming houses and can reinforce violent behaviours’.³⁹⁸

Community consultations revealed concern that the environment of a rooming house is not conducive to children visiting their father when parenting orders are in force. People were particularly concerned that the mix of people living in rooming houses, including people with substance dependency, made them a dangerous place for children and an environment that is not well suited for men to learn to change their use of violence.³⁹⁹

As noted earlier in this chapter, the Commission was told of instances of victims and perpetrators being placed in the same motel or ad hoc accommodation. Some homelessness services do, however, have specific protocols in place to prevent this occurring.⁴⁰⁰

Another common concern was that a lack of suitable accommodation for the perpetrator often led to pressure being placed on the woman to allow him to return home.⁴⁰¹ Conversely, the woman might not be able to return home if the perpetrator is still in the property because he does not have access to alternative accommodation.⁴⁰²

The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service stated:

Stable housing is the foundation from which all other change and growth can come. It is essential that there is stable and accessible housing for victims fleeing family violence, but also for perpetrators of family violence. Whether it’s anything from “cooling off” houses as have been utilised in some Aboriginal communities in the Northern Territory, or safe houses, there needs to be suitable accommodation for [all] involved ... Lack of appropriate emergency and transitional housing for those in crisis, both perpetrator and victim/s, may result in offenders or victims returning to the household if they have no other practical accommodation, resulting in further breaches or possible further violence.⁴⁰³

The Commission also heard that therapeutic crisis accommodation interventions should be introduced.⁴⁰⁴ In considering temporary housing options for perpetrators, a number of submissions called for accommodation to be linked to behaviour change programs as a condition of stay, while others saw a more general connection between stability of housing and engagement in perpetrator programs:

In situations where perpetrators are removed from the home, there needs to be accommodation (emergency housing for perpetrators – intervention houses, please don't call them male refuges – language matters and it is not these men who need safety and refuge) alongside NTV accredited men's behaviour change program intensives for these men, where there are no waiting times. These houses need to have a therapeutic focus and much work in terms of evaluating the work there.⁴⁰⁵

Lack of housing options affects perpetrators too as insecure housing can impede behaviour change and other programs focussed on supporting men develop appropriate and respectful behaviours, dealing with alcohol and drug issues or unemployment – all of which may contribute to violent behaviours.⁴⁰⁶

Others suggested that, rather than redirecting resources from the homelessness sector, specialist accommodation options attached to behaviour change programs should be considered; the Western Australian Breathing Space facility was cited as an example.⁴⁰⁷ The Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Ltd suggested that 'time out' programs be given an accommodation component by converting transitional housing stock to crisis accommodation for use as a 'time out' facility. It argued that this would provide Aboriginal men '... with meaningful time out whilst the family can be maintained and supported in their family home'.⁴⁰⁸

DHHS advised the Commission that in 2014–15 $0.2 million was allocated to emergency accommodation for men who are unable to remain in the family home as a result of an intervention order with exclusion conditions being granted.⁴⁰⁹ It is not known, however, to what extent the funding is used for this target group since it is allocated either to providers of men's family violence services (which may purchase emergency accommodation such as motels) or to homelessness services that may also provide a range of emergency accommodation to men who are not perpetrators of family violence. The Australian Institute of Health and Welfare has noted that the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data is not able to separately identify victims and perpetrators of family violence from the number of people presenting to homelessness services because of family violence.⁴¹⁰

As noted above, Dr Spinney gave evidence about her research on the first Australian Safe at Home scheme, which was developed in Tasmania. She told the Commission that while some program funding was originally intended to be set aside for perpetrator accommodation, this had not occurred because there was 'not a driving need for it': perpetrators normally found accommodation with friends or family.⁴¹¹

Principles of an effective housing response

Secure and affordable housing is an essential foundation if victims of violence are to regain a sense of safety and recover from the trauma they have experienced. For a woman, it provides the space she needs in order to rebuild her life, plan her future, care for her children and build positive connections with people and services in the community. Having a secure home is crucial to ending the powerful hold family violence has on victims and the way it can define their futures. Without a secure place to live, victims can slip into homelessness, stay in crisis for longer or end up returning to live in an abusive relationship. Women should not be forced to make that choice.

The accommodation needs of women in Victoria who are experiencing or have experienced family violence are diverse: some women are able to stay at home; others can return home after a short period away; others are unable to return home and need alternative long-term accommodation.

When it is safe to do so, and provided they want to do it, it is in the best interests of women and children to stay in their own home. That means they can stay close to the things that are important to them, such as family, friends, work, school and community networks. But, despite some progress, there is still insufficient support available for women and children to stay at home safely. Those who do stay often carry an exceptional burden to keep themselves safe, living with security devices and having to remain constantly vigilant. It can also place a major financial burden on them because they need to pay rent or mortgage repayments on their own.

Although some women can leave home safely and successfully, leaving home to escape a violent relationship can be the start of a pathway into homelessness, poor-quality housing and housing-related poverty. It is not surprising that some women do not take that chance at all or return to a violent relationship as a way of escaping such a situation.

When women are forced to leave their homes, securing accommodation quickly is vital in order to recover and begin to deal with the multiple challenges in their life—such as dealing with grief and trauma, obtaining a family violence intervention order and resolving other legal issues, adjusting to a new area, looking after children in an unfamiliar environment, and resuming or seeking employment. Only a small proportion of women gain access to refuge accommodation and, before they do, they might spend extended periods in a motel, caravan or rooming house. These are not good environments for women and children who are trying to recover from family violence. They are not a home.

Of those women who did enter a refuge, many spoke highly of the support and the safety they found there. Others struggled, especially where there was communal living or it was a high-security environment. There has been progress in making Victoria's refuges better and more liveable: some refuges now feature individual units for greater privacy, and disability access is being improved in a small number. These developments need to be expanded and to become standard throughout Victoria. Barriers that prevent some groups of women—among them Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, women with complex needs, and women with adolescent male children—being accepted into refuges must also be removed.

The Commission found that women often have to move repeatedly, leading to dislocation from community and existing supports and increasing the likelihood that they might become homeless. Women and children need support and a stable environment in order to recover from the trauma and uncertainty of family violence. Safe, secure and affordable accommodation is essential if they are to have this stability. At present Victoria is failing in this.

There is clear evidence that housing pathways are 'blocked up' and not flowing as intended. There is a lack of viable long-term housing options that allow people to 'exit' the system and get on with their lives. There are simply not enough short-term or long-term accommodation options for victims in metropolitan and regional Victoria. Other jurisdictions, such as New South Wales, have faced a similar problem with a housing system that is clogged: they are now using a mix of housing options.

Simply continuing existing programs and strategies will not deliver better outcomes for the women and children whose lives have been damaged by family violence. It will not overcome the 'siloed' approach to program delivery or remedy the gaps and failings in housing provision that were made clear in the evidence the Commission received.

We need a bolder, more proactive approach to expanding the housing options for family violence victims—one that is more individualised, more sustainable, and more connected to promoting broader social and economic participation.

Social and economic participation is central to the recovery from family violence. A rapid response to victims' housing needs is important to ensure continuity of participation in education, employment and social networks. The location of housing is important for the same reasons. Developments in Safe at Home strategies—particularly with increasing use of technology backed up by a strong justice response and case-management support—can make an important contribution to the objective of fostering continuity of participation.

The housing response for people experiencing family violence should have the following characteristics:

- ▷ be tailored to the victim's circumstances, choices and goals, whether they live in metropolitan, regional or rural Victoria
- ▷ be non-discriminatory and responsive to the full range of people who might be victims of family violence
- ▷ ensure safety and provide options commensurate with victims' level of risk
- ▷ follow a simple pathway so that people can obtain the help they need, whether they are able to stay in their home or have to leave
- ▷ recognise that keeping victims in their home is optimal if it is safe and the victim's choice and provide support accordingly
- ▷ provide alternative safe accommodation when a victim cannot remain or return home, while minimising the number of moves they need to make and the time taken to acquire permanent housing
- ▷ ensure that accommodation is of good quality, affordable to the victim and in a location that will help them retain or build on protective factors to support their recovery—including employment, training, education and natural supports such as family and friends
- ▷ complement other forms of support in a manner that reflects the victim's needs and aspirations—including referral to other services they might need
- ▷ be part of a broader, integrated system of support so that the system keeps the woman safe by maintaining a focus on the perpetrator and reducing the burden on the victim no matter where she is living.

The Commission therefore proposes the following:

- ▷ There should be greater support, both financial and non-financial, for women to retain their existing housing or to gain access to private rental properties in their community.
- ▷ A more concerted shift towards individualised assistance is needed in order to meet the specific needs of people affected by family violence. This means amending the existing Family Violence Flexible Support Packages to include a longer period of rental or mortgage subsidy and further assistance with costs to support economic recovery.
- ▷ Housing options should be expanded so that there is a much greater capacity to rapidly rehouse people and, in doing so, free up places within refuges and crisis accommodation and bypass transitional housing when the victim's full range of needs are better met in the private rental market with other supports as necessary.
- ▷ Better integration between accommodation and support is essential so that a victim's housing and other needs—such as counselling, legal advice, financial counselling and employment assistance—are considered at the same time and the link between housing assistance and the support to improve the victim's financial security and employment status is made explicit.

Greater support for victims to stay at home

Supporting women who choose to stay at home

- ▶ Current funding for Safe at Home initiatives accounts for only a small proportion of overall government spending on family violence initiatives.
- ▶ It is important that women are told that staying at home is a genuine option and that sufficient supports are available for those who decide to remain at home or return there.
- ▶ Evaluations show that Safe at Home programs can be effective, but there has been insufficient funding to provide the programs consistently throughout Victoria.
- ▶ There are no universal guidelines or principles for Safe at Home programs, and the design and implementation of the programs has been inconsistent.
- ▶ The primary features of effective Safe at Home programs are accompanying support, confidence in police and court responses, and the use of security technology. An integrated system is needed to keep women safe.

Although there is growing recognition that staying at home safely should be an option for women and children, service providers still tends to focus on options for women to leave and enter the refuge system. The Commission supports the increasing efforts to help women and their children remain in or return safely to their homes. This approach quite appropriately transfers the responsibility for leaving the family home to the perpetrator of family violence and allows victims to stay in their home and community. In this way the disruption associated with multiple moves—including losing connections with family and friends and other supports, school networks, employment, and participation in the community—is largely avoided.

The Commission found, however, that the current roll-out of Safe at Home programs is piecemeal, does not have geographic coverage throughout the state, and has inconsistent standards. As a consequence, only a very small number of victims of family violence are able to benefit from the programs. In the absence of a consistent statewide approach, local services have had to cobble things together to respond to need. Further, existing Safe at Home programs make no provision as a matter of course for a longer term rental or mortgage subsidy that will be required by many victims to secure the stability of housing that can form the basis of their recovery.

The Commission was told of recent developments in personal security devices, which—when accompanied by adequate risk assessment, safety planning and, when necessary, case-management support—hold the promise of allowing a major step forward in enabling people to stay in their existing home and community, being reasonably confident of their safety. This would, in turn, reduce the demand for crisis or refuge accommodation.

Nevertheless, although technological supports make promising additions to the suite of measures that enable women to stay safely in their homes, they are not on their own sufficient to keep women safe. Accordingly, Safe at Home programs must be based on a strong systems response to the perpetrator and effective support for the victim; evidence has shown that these are vital ingredients of programs. In particular, a proactive approach to enforcing intervention orders, swift police action on breaches of orders, and information sharing about the perpetrator are needed to transfer the burden away from requiring women to be vigilant in order to maintain their safety.

To ensure that risk assessment and management guide the support that is to be provided, specialist family violence services should continue to take the lead in delivering Safe at Home programs, collaborating with others to involve necessary complementary services. The programs should be part of a comprehensive case-management response that includes the involvement of and coordination with police and legal services.

The Commission's recommendations aimed at allowing for greater exchanging of information about perpetrators are set out in Chapter 7. Our proposal to integrate risk and needs assessment across women's, children's and perpetrator interventions through the establishment of Support and Safety Hubs, as part of a second generation of system integration, is discussed in Chapter 13. Together, these recommendations should assist in supporting victims who stay at home by establishing a tighter risk management environment.

The additional $900,000 investment by the Victorian Government for the Personal Safety Initiative pilot to provide support for about 70 women is welcome. Importantly, the trial will be evaluated so as to determine future actions. The Commission expects that a successful pilot would lead to an investment in such initiatives, sufficient to meet the needs of victims of family violence statewide.

The Commission notes with concern that most of the existing Safe at Home programs are funded through the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness, which is due to expire on 30 June 2017. Although the agreement and the concomitant Commonwealth funding contributions lapse at that time, the Victorian Government's contribution is secure until 30 June 2018.⁴¹²

The Commission considers that the Safe at Home programs should be retained and substantially expanded in order to make staying at home a real option for victims of family violence. This needs to happen regardless of the funding source—including by the Victorian Government allocating its own resources to give the programs the certainty and scale needed to fulfil their potential. Investment decisions by the Commonwealth Government are beyond the scope of this Royal Commission, although we do note the strong statements the government has made in relation to responding to family violence and consider Safe at Home programs to be an important part of a comprehensive response.

The success of Safe at Home programs depends on effective support services, legal assistance and the financial capacity to maintain housing costs on a single income. Put simply, a person cannot stay at home if they cannot afford to do so. The Commission therefore proposes that the Victorian Government ensure that staying at home is indeed a viable and sustainable option by explicitly including access to rent or mortgage subsidies within such schemes.

Recommendation 13

The Victorian Government give priority to supporting victims in safely remaining in, or returning to, their own homes and communities through the expansion of Safe at Home-type programs across Victoria [within two years]. These programs should incorporate rental and mortgage subsidies and any benefits offered by advances in safety devices, with suitable case management as well as monitoring of perpetrators by police and the justice system.

Improving crisis accommodation

The evidence presented to the Commission makes it clear that Victoria's crisis accommodation capacity—both refuge and other crisis accommodation—is insufficient to meet current demand. There is an urgent need to expand crisis accommodation, especially in view of the fact that funding and capacity have remained unchanged since 2009–10. Since that time there have been reports of substantial growth in the demand for crisis accommodation, particularly as a result of the increase in police referrals to services. The number of police referrals of affected family members (female victims) to specialist family violence services grew by 317 per cent between 2009–10 and 2013–14.⁴¹³

The Commission agrees with the Council to Homeless Persons that it is difficult to determine how much extra crisis accommodation would be required if the system was working as intended.⁴¹⁴ Nevertheless, a number of factors would improve refuges' existing capacity to meet demand:

- ▷ greatly expanding Stay at Home options
- ▷ improving efficiency through amended intake procedures
- ▷ reducing demand for refuges by introducing more community-based crisis accommodation options
- ▷ increasing movement throughout the accommodation system by improving access to post-crisis housing options
- ▷ reconfiguring communal crisis accommodation into 'core and cluster' models so as to increase capacity, improve amenity and offer greater physical accessibility.

The Commission is not able to assess the potential impact of these changes. It does note, however, that expanding the 'crisis accommodation response' capacity does not necessarily mean simply establishing additional refuges. The priority should instead be developing a range of crisis options that enable women to remain in their community. In particular, these options should be carefully explored in regional and rural communities because of the dearth of specialist crisis accommodation in these areas.

The intake into crisis accommodation

The Commission found that there are multiple referral pathways for accommodation and support for women experiencing family violence. This makes it difficult for services to develop a holistic view of a woman's needs and, as a result, makes it difficult to integrate service responses. Support for women and children experiencing family violence is generally obtained through specialist family violence case-management services, usually in response to a police L17 referral, while access to crisis accommodation is generally coordinated through Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre. Initial Assessment and Planning Services also play a role in placing victims and perpetrators in accommodation.

The Commission found that the current arrangements for access to refuge properties are inefficient. Family violence service Safe Steps is the referral and contact point for refuges but does not act as the intake point: it has no 'control' over entry into either the 31 refuges or the 57 Crisis Accommodation Program properties refuges managed. Although access to accommodation is largely limited by supply, the Commission found evidence of delays that were caused by staff not being available to accept referrals after hours or by refuges' operational decisions that mean that beds might be kept vacant or certain individuals excluded.

There is a need to streamline referral and intake arrangements for all specialist family violence crisis accommodation—especially since, for some women, the alternative often is either to remain in a violent situation or to move to a motel.

In Chapter 13 the Commission recommends the establishment of Support and Safety Hubs in each of the 17 Department of Health and Human Services local areas by 1 July 2018. These hubs will provide a single referral and intake point for family violence services, including facilitating access to crisis accommodation services in each local area.

The role of the hub intake team would be to work with the woman to determine what is required for her to remain in her home—or to return home if this is her choice and it is safe to do so. This should be part of the first response: timing is crucial in helping women make informed choices that minimise the disruption and dislocation associated with moving to alternative accommodation. The intake process would include assessment for Safe at Home assistance, which, as recommended, should be expanded throughout the state.

If a woman chooses to take up another accommodation option, it is essential that the hub intake team is able to facilitate her placement into the most appropriate accommodation option available. Safe Steps will continue to organise refuge accommodation. A central coordination role is necessary to match these women to scarce resources, as well as coordinate the transfer of women to refuges that will probably be quite a distance from the area in which they were living. In order for Safe Steps to be able to do this efficiently it must be able to book victims into refuges without it being necessary for the victim to be re-assessed, and possibly rejected, by the refuge. This change should occur as a matter of urgency: government should not wait until the Support and Safety Hubs are established to facilitate this reform.

The Support and Safety Hubs and Safe Steps will also need to have brokerage/flexible funding in order to buy goods and services to respond to a woman's immediate needs, particularly if she is in crisis. This could include items such as emergency accommodation in a motel, food, clothing, toys, transportation and pet care. Service providers who have case coordination responsibility will also require flexible funding to help the woman achieve the goals set out in her service plan. This approach supports the Commission's recommendation that the system move to adopt a more individualised response to victims of family violence (as described shortly).

The intake team at a Support and Safety Hub will also have risk and needs assessment capability for men's services and perpetrator interventions. Additionally, they should identify accommodation options for the perpetrator as appropriate and make a 'warm referral' to the local homelessness service to facilitate the person's placement.

Expanding crisis accommodation options

The accommodation options currently offered to women who choose to leave a violent relationship are inadequate: women are faced with a choice of going to a motel or going to a crisis accommodation service, which commonly means moving to a new area. The Commission learnt that women and children are staying in motels for long periods.

The crisis accommodation response should move away from a 'one size fits all' approach—which was developed at a time when it was the sole response to family violence and fleeing was generally the only option available—and instead focus on providing more tailored assistance to women.

A woman escaping violence needs confidence that crisis accommodation will provide a level of safety consistent with her assessment of risk. As far as possible, it should also help her maintain her connection with the important people and supports in her life, such as family, friends, work and her community. Women should also be able to expect that crisis accommodation will do the following:

- ▷ keep the number of moves and the disruption associated with leaving a violent home to a minimum
- ▷ offer the support she needs—that is, beyond accommodation, having access to regular support from specialist family violence services and knowing this support will accompany her regardless of where she lives or moves to
- ▷ be kept to the shortest time necessary to enable her to move out of crisis and begin to rebuild her life
- ▷ be sensitive to the needs of children and support her rebuilding parent-child bonds.

The Commission expects that the recommended expansion of Stay at Home options will divert some demand away from crisis accommodation. There will, however, continue to be a need for emergency accommodation for women who need to leave, either permanently or for an interim period, and require accommodation immediately following a crisis. Accordingly, accommodation should be of the best quality possible.

Staying connected to community

The Commission considers that a broader range of crisis accommodation options should be made available to women who choose to leave a violent situation. In the first instance, it proposes a significant expansion of options designed to help women and their children remain within their community when risk assessments suggest this is possible. This will involve women moving from their home to different accommodation but not necessarily to a high-security refuge. This does not mean greater use of ad hoc accommodation such as motels: rather, in order to provide stability of housing through the crisis and recovery phases, the Commission has in mind the use of ordinary houses in ordinary streets.

Historically, crisis and emergency accommodation has been delivered by specialist family violence services and housing and homelessness services through properties, in the most part, owned or allocated to providers by the Director of Housing. In the Commission's view, additional procurement measures need to be explored. As noted earlier in this chapter, some services have taken the initiative and have already started to do this—for example, through head leasing and other initiatives.

Reducing the use of ad hoc accommodation

There is an urgent need to greatly reduce the use of motels and other ad hoc accommodation, especially as additional Stay at Home programs and more diversified crisis accommodation options are made available. For example, Mallee District Aboriginal Service noted that it 'currently pays $300–400 per week for a tent site in local campgrounds'.⁴¹⁵ A community consultation in Mildura confirmed that this is the case for both Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal people in that area.⁴¹⁶ Such measures show the desperate measures the family violence and homelessness systems have been forced to adopt in the face of inadequate investment.

The Commission accepts that there will continue to be a need for interim accommodation, but it is unacceptable for women escaping family violence to be placed in emergency accommodation without access to appropriate support. These women, often accompanied by children, are in crisis, and their placement in an unstaffed facility such as a motel can be confronting and alienating. It is crucial that the response does not further traumatise the victim or inadvertently contribute to her deciding that it is easier to return to a violent partner.

Although there will also be a need to place some women in motels overnight as refuge and crisis accommodation options are pursued, facilities such as rooming houses and caravans should no longer be used: they are insecure, and their use is inconsistent with the principle of maximising safety for women and children, regardless of the support provided by specialist family violence services. The Commission's vision is that motels and other ad hoc accommodation will never be used to house women and children for weeks or months and should be used only for short stays in exceptional circumstances. To achieve this, the range and supply of crisis accommodation available must be expanded.

Refocusing refuges on providing accommodation to women at highest risk

The recommended expansion of Stay at Home and local community options should mean that women at lower or medium risk can be supported safely and will not need to go to a refuge. There will, however, continue to be a need for high-security accommodation for women who are at significant and high risk. Responding to these women's needs should be the specialist and primary role of refuges, although they should not only provide a high-security response. The goal is to increase the number and range of options overall for victims of family violence—options that respond appropriately to each individual's level of risk and that are flexible enough to deal with changes in risk so that women can 'step up' and 'step down' in security as required.

Adoption of the Commission's recommendation that the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or the CRAF) be refreshed to contain a stronger actuarial methodology would help ensure that the specialist family violence service response aligns with the assessed level of risk. Such an approach—along with the use of Risk Assessment and Management Panels—will reinforce the importance of refuges forming part of the response to women at high risk. High-risk cases are considered in Chapter 6.

Making refuges more liveable

The refuge model evolved at a time when there was limited support from police and the courts to keep women and children experiencing family violence safe at home. In these circumstances the best option was to move the women and children to a secure and confidential location. This meant that many women and children left behind their family, friends and community and were unable to attend school and work. The police and justice responses to family violence have since improved, but the reliance on refuge accommodation as a major part of the crisis accommodation response remains largely unchanged.

High-security measures are applied to the majority of women accommodated in refuges, regardless of their level of risk.⁴¹⁷ This means that there is limited scope to offer a different response to women who might not require high-security measures such as curfews, prohibitions on employment or school attendance, and surrendering phones and other devices that can be tracked by the perpetrator.

Although the Commission found that the communal refuge model does offer benefits for some women—for example, enabling them to share their experiences with others in similar circumstances—this was far outweighed by the negative effects of group living. Some of these negatives are cohabitation of several families, most of whom are in crisis, which can be chaotic and confronting; the behaviour of women with additional needs, such as drug and alcohol problems or mental illness; and the challenges for women trying to parent their children in a communal and unfamiliar environment.

The Commission also found that women with disabilities and those whose children have disabilities are routinely denied access to refuges because very few refuges are accessible for people with disabilities. Women with adolescent male children face similar barriers. With changes in design, operational policies and attitudes, these groups of women could all live in a refuge.

The ‘core and cluster’ refuge model is preferable to the communal model because it provides self-contained facilities for families while maintaining the positive aspects of communal living, such as onsite support from workers and opportunities to spend time with other families who might have had similar experiences. With this configuration, women can have friends and family visit, have their teenage boys live with them, and have room for attendant carers and other supports. A further benefit is that the core and cluster model provides a base for services, such as legal services, to meet with residents, as well as ensuring that the physical environment has space for child and youth-sensitive facilities, with play areas, books, toys and private space for young people.

The Commission is particularly concerned that the stress and anxiety some women experience in group living can contribute to their decision to return home to an unsafe environment. It considers that moving away from a communal refuge model is a priority in order to improve client outcomes and to align Victoria with leading practice in other Australian jurisdictions.

All Victorian refuges should be converted to the core and cluster model within five years. In doing this, it is imperative that each crisis accommodation provider be consulted in relation to the design and approach most appropriate for its particular circumstances.

Recommendation 14

The Victorian Government increase the number and range of crisis and emergency accommodation that is available by using a wider range of service models—including head leasing of premises—with priority being given to rural, regional and remote areas [within 12 months].

Recommendation 15

The Victorian Government support service providers in phasing out the communal refuge model [by 31 December 2020] and replacing it with accommodation that promotes safety, is accessible to people with disabilities, provides private units and enables connections with the community, work and school (core and cluster model). To facilitate the transition, the Victorian Government should provide a capital fund to assist service providers with business case development, design options and implementation (including construction of redesigned accommodation) and fund interim arrangements to avoid loss in service delivery during refurbishment or redevelopment.

Improving the responsiveness of crisis accommodation to diverse population groups

The Commission received consistent evidence that some groups of people are routinely denied access to refuge accommodation. We were informed that this depends on operational considerations—such as whether the referred client can be accommodated within the current client mix—as well as the physical accessibility of the premises.

There is inconsistent availability of crisis supported accommodation for people from lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, single women, older women, women without children, women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, women with disabilities, women without permanent residency, women with adolescent male children, women in contact with the criminal justice system, and women with a mental illness or drug and alcohol problems. This situation needs to be redressed. Victims who face these barriers are more likely to end up in ad hoc emergency accommodation, which further prolongs their ‘crisis’ period.

Admission policies and practices vary between refuges, and government policy, as set out by the Department of Health and Human Services, is not explicit about what is expected of refuges. This leaves room for individual refuges to develop practices that reflect ‘operational considerations’, many of these practices being the result of funding constraints or the need to manage group living arrangements.

The Commission agrees with the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission that great care should be taken in applying exceptions under the Equal Opportunity Act allowing refuges to refuse access to women with adolescent male children. Among the consequences for victims of family violence in these circumstances is the risk of homelessness and ongoing exposure to violence.

The Commission proposes that the crisis accommodation needs of diverse groups should be addressed in three ways:

- ▷ by ensuring that the use of crisis accommodation services is maximised through eliminating discriminatory practices
- ▷ by reducing communal living arrangements in refuges
- ▷ by developing additional crisis accommodation models for each group of women.

The Commission notes that the development of additional crisis accommodation services specifically targeted to each group of women is both expensive and not necessarily viable and that certain groups—such as women living in rural and regional areas—might still miss out.

In Volume V, the Commission recommends that steps be taken in the following areas to improve the capacity of existing services to better meet the needs of all women experiencing family violence who require crisis accommodation services:

- ▷ allocating additional resources for statewide organisations—such as InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Women with Disabilities Victoria and Seniors Rights Victoria—to provide consultancy services and training to specialist family violence services, including crisis accommodation providers in connection with actions designed to meet the needs of particular population groups
- ▷ allocating additional resources to crisis accommodation for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children
- ▷ having the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission produce a guideline under the Equal Opportunity Act, providing guidance to specialist family violence services, including crisis accommodation providers, on meeting their obligation to act inclusively and avoid discrimination when delivering services
- ▷ for DHHS, reviewing and updating standards for family violence service providers, specifying providers' obligations to develop suitable services for diverse communities.

Recommendation 16

The Department of Health and Human Services review the contractual arrangements (including funding levels) for crisis supported accommodation to remove barriers for particular groups, such as women with no income and women and children with disabilities [within 12 months].

Towards a more effective system

There is clear evidence that the current system for rehousing family violence victims is 'blocked up'. Rather than being offered housing assistance that meets their individual needs, victims are being funnelled into a system that more often than not results in lengthy and/or episodic stays in various forms of temporary and transitional housing—in some cases with long stays in motels and other unacceptable accommodation.

This reflects the 'throughput' model of moving people from crisis to transitional to permanent accommodation, which has operated throughout the homelessness system for the past decade or so. Although this approach should be able to provide for victims, options that suit their needs at different stages of their journey from crisis to recovery, in practice the delays and the unavailability of properties mean that the response is often damaging rather than beneficial. Although some women will return home or find a home themselves along this pathway, the system assumes that the goal of a permanent home will be reached. As the evidence in this chapter shows, however, this goal proves elusive for many.

The throughput model fails to have women and children housed quickly in a home that best suits their needs. At present the system relies on the prospect of social housing, which, while being a suitable long-term option for some family violence victims who are able to obtain it, does not offer the flexibility to deliver a rapid response or a property in the right location to suit women and children's needs.

The flaws in the throughput approach need to be confronted. They reflect the pragmatic development over several decades of a service system that is no longer in keeping with what we now understand to be the needs of women seeking to rebuild their and their children's lives. Continuing the existing approaches alone will not ensure that most victims have the housing assistance that will maximise their chances of recovery and long-term economic and social participation so that they can effectively compete in what is often an expensive housing market.

Access to sustainable private tenancies

The Commission recognises that the housing response to family violence will continue to require a mix of options in order to meet the diverse needs of family violence victims. There is no one-size-fits-all approach. There is, however, considerable potential to facilitate greater access to the private rental market for victims of family violence, as a way of securing suitable housing and promoting their continued social and economic participation.

Compared with social housing, the private rental market can offer greater locational choice and flexibility in meeting the needs of family violence victims. Social housing is generally offered in areas where there is a vacancy, rather than where a woman needs to live. In addition, only 3.1 per cent of households in Victoria live in social housing.⁴¹⁸ Excessive demand, a low turnover of tenants, and a stock profile not well matched to demand mean that such housing struggles to be responsive to the needs of the wide range of women having to move from their home as a result of family violence.

Although the private rental sector accounts for about a quarter of Victoria's housing stock and has greater capacity to respond flexibly, it is generally not affordable for low-income earners. Centrelink recipients are eligible to receive Commonwealth Rent Assistance, which is a capped payment that in most areas—and particularly in metropolitan Melbourne—is insufficient to ensure that net rental costs are confined to 30 per cent of household income, the accepted benchmark for affordability.

The housing assistance currently available to victims of family violence largely ignores these realities. Apart from Commonwealth Rent Assistance, any help available to meet private rental costs is generally short term in nature. At the same time, scant attention is paid to improving victims' ability to be resilient in the private housing market by helping them improve their status in the labour market and, as a consequence, their level of earned income.

For many women, becoming financially secure to the point where they are able to take on a lease in their own right can be a long-term proposition, and they may be reliant on receiving assistance (for example, for child care, training and employment) to help them to get to that point. Some women will not be in a position to rent privately. For this reason it is important that private rental subsidies be offered to those who are most likely to be able to sustain a private rental lease within the time frames of the rental subsidy; other women will need to be assisted in other ways.

Analysis of rental data identifies the indicative private rental supplements required to meet an affordability benchmark of 30 per cent of household income spent on rental costs for four typical categories of households that are solely reliant on Centrelink income. The geographical areas analysed were Ringwood, Cheltenham and Horsham. Details of median weekly rental were obtained from the Department of Health and Human Services Rental Report.⁴¹⁹ This analysis indicates that, in the 2015 housing market, affordability supplements would need to be in the order of $100 to 180 a week, depending on the suburb in metropolitan Melbourne and the relevant regional city. The amount of supplement would be substantially lower in some rural housing markets. Table 9.3 provides details of the scenarios.

Notes: Affordability for three selected of households solely reliant on Centrelink payments in different property types was calculated assuming the receipt of Commonwealth Rent Assistance (RA) to the maximum level entitled. Two methods were used; the first expresses weekly rent as a percentage of income plus RA, the second 'net rent' method expresses the weekly rent less RA as a percentage of income. The latter produces a lower figure and was used to calculate level of housing supplement required for each household to achieve the 30% affordability benchmark. In order to cross-check the amount of weekly rent, a survey was undertaken of private lettings across the three selected areas advertised on the domain.com website on Saturday 12 September 2015. A total of 491 lettings were included in the sample (230 in Ringwood; 176 in Cheltenham; 85 in Horsham) covering 1 and 2 bedroom flats/units and 2 and 3 bedroom houses. An analysis of the distribution of the advertised lettings concluded that the use of median rents is an acceptable indicator for the affordability analysis.

If access to private rental property can be maximised through the provision of dedicated rental supplements for the period of a victim's recovery, and the victim is supported in improving their employment status, there is the prospect that many more people will be able to be assisted and many more people will recover more rapidly than is the case when housing assistance provided to them takes the form of social housing. Such a move should also free up social housing places for those with the greatest need.

In addition to these benefits, investing in rental subsidy strategies has the potential to be more economically efficient than investing solely in social housing stock.

For illustrative purposes, though, if as the Council to Homeless Persons and other organisations suggested, $200 million might deliver 800 social housing units (which could be used to assist more than one household over time),⁴²⁹ an equivalent amount invested in rental subsidies and other supports could help several thousands of family violence victims to secure housing. For example, if a $200 million program of rental subsidies consisted of an average annual supplement of $5500 each year for a four-year recovery period, this could assist 9000 households. If the same program also provided an employment assistance component of $6000 for each of two years it could assist 5880 households.

The Commission recognises that rental subsidies and capital expenditure are very different propositions: the former involve a recurrent program of expenditure; the latter involves a one-off investment and creates an asset (albeit with ongoing operating costs). Even if expanded considerably, however, capital expenditure would result in a finite set of stock, whereas rental subsidies would be able to be applied in a more flexible manner, potentially assisting many more people. Since capital costs and rental subsidies are treated differently for budgetary purposes, the comparative costs of both approaches would need to be subject to detailed modelling by the Department of Treasury and Finance to take into account a range of complexities.

The Commission also heard, and accepts, that the private rental market will never be a viable option for some people and that as a consequence investment in social housing remains vitally important. The proportion of family violence victims who fall into this category is, however, unknown.

We know that family violence is experienced across all strata of the Victorian community. The recent New Zealand Productivity Commission report on the social services sector stressed the importance of full assessment of client needs and capacities through its articulation of a segmented typology, whereby the level and duration of support are tailored to the individual household's capacity and complexity of needs.⁴³⁰ More broadly, Australian data on social exclusion suggests that the proportion of people who fall into the high-needs/low-capacity quadrant and most likely need social housing is relatively low. Based on HILDA (the Household, Income and Labour Dynamics in Australia Survey) data, the Melbourne Institute – Brotherhood of St Laurence Social Exclusion Monitor reports that 27 per cent of women experience social exclusion annually. Five per cent face deep social exclusion; that is, they face multiple barriers to fully participating in social and economic life. Single parents with children experience the highest rate of deep exclusion—nine per cent of all household types nationally.⁴³¹

On this basis the Commission concludes that there will still be a need for flexibility in responses to women who seek alternative accommodation. A comparison of social and private housing options should therefore not be seen as a binary choice: the goal must be to increase the number and range of housing options overall for victims of family violence. We need more, not fewer, solutions.

The Commission therefore proposes that a Family Violence Housing Assistance Fund be established to fund a program of rental subsidies (and other items) for victims of family violence. Among the factors that will need to be considered when implementing this program are eligibility requirements, the period for which an individual would be entitled to receive the subsidy, and opportunities to link rental subsidies with access to employment and training programs in order to increase the likelihood of a woman being able to afford private housing in the longer term.

The Commission also considers that the following initiatives warrant further attention and support:

- ▷ using planning law mechanisms such as inclusionary zoning to encourage contributions from developers for affordable housing head leasing. For example, the units of housing generated in the Victorian government trial of inclusionary zoning could be designated for family violence victims
- ▷ working with real estate agents to help women remain in or secure private rental properties
- ▷ promoting more flexible practices by financial institutions—such as permitting a victim of family violence to borrow against current equity pending resolution of property matters
- ▷ transferring transitional housing to women experiencing family violence, so that they have a permanent home and do not need to move again into public housing.

Individualised assistance

A strong theme that emerged in evidence the Commission received is that each person's experience of family violence differs, as do the services and supports these people need in order to recover from the violence. Accordingly, the Commission considers that service provision should move away from the current one-size-fits-all approach and offer victims greater choice and control over the nature of the assistance they receive.

The Victorian Government's introduction of Family Violence Flexible Support Packages is a move in this direction. The Commission considers, however, that the funding allocated for these packages is unlikely to be sufficient to meet the full range of expenditure on the housing-related needs of family violence victims. The scale of family violence-specific programs involving elements of discretionary funding—such as Safe at Home and private rental brokerage—is inadequate for the demand, geographic coverage is patchy, and assistance focuses primarily on the crisis response.

These forms of discretionary funding packages should feature much more prominently in the response to people experiencing family violence. Such an approach offers significant flexibility for providing a timely response to victims of family violence by enabling goods and services to be obtained quickly, thus expediting families' recovery.

Individualised packages should be available to help victims (including children) during crises and throughout the recovery phase. Importantly, such funds need to be able to be deployed flexibly in recognition that risk in family violence is dynamic, liable to escalate quickly, and can recur over time—at times unexpectedly. In some circumstances it would be most beneficial if such a package of funds were made available to victims who have a plan for leaving their home. This would obviate the need for them to move into either community-based crisis accommodation or a refuge and so allow them to stabilise their living arrangements without having to enter 'the system'.

The Commission envisages such packages being available and administered through funded staffing positions in the recommended Support and Safety Hubs and by specialist family violence services. Specific elements of the package would be delivered in collaboration with agencies in complementary service sectors. The scope of the packages should cover assistance to ensure that victims' safety, health, housing, education and employment needs are met. The packages are crucial to promoting recovery, so that victims' futures are not defined by their experience of family violence. They would be available to all victims of family violence—women, women with children, young people, older people and male victims, including gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex victims.

It is important that investment in individualised packages does not divert existing funding from service providers or from other discrete programs such as the Disability and Family Violence Crisis Response Initiative or Safe at Home initiatives. The system is already under great pressure and in need of additional investment.

The housing assistance element of flexible recovery packages

The housing assistance available to victims should include funds to meet costs associated with upgrading the safety of homes, relocation, the purchase of essential household furnishings, and the provision of time-limited rental or mortgage subsidies. It needs to be sufficiently flexible to support victims in either staying at home or securing stable housing within a relatively short period, including after a period in a refuge or other crisis housing.

The Commission considers that the provision of housing to victims who have to leave their own home will be most effectively achieved under a head-leasing arrangement in the private rental market. Here, collaboration with regionally based housing associations offers the advantages in tenant and stock management associated with scale and opportunities for vertical integration between short and long-term housing.

The depth and duration of rental subsidies will initially be determined and be regularly reviewed by the woman's case coordinator (which depending on the family violence service, might be called a case manager, advocate or navigator) in light of individual victims' household circumstances and what is needed to achieve the 30 per cent affordability benchmark in the local rental market. Importantly, rental supplements themselves need to be supplemented with assistance aimed at improving the tenant's labour market participation where that is appropriate.

The Housing Assistance Implementation Task Force (as proposed shortly) will need to establish the initial upper limits to the duration and depth of rental subsidies and to monitor their appropriateness in practice. It should also be prepared to alter them as part of an 'adaptive' approach to implementation of the scheme.

The employment assistance element of flexible recovery packages

For many victims of family violence employment assistance is a central element of the recovery process. Victims told the Commission how their experience of family violence severely affected both their self-confidence and their professional confidence in the workplace. At times they had become unemployed as a result. When determining the type of employment assistance these people require, service providers need to be cognisant of the particular impact of family violence and ensure that the employment assistance is integrated with other assistance a victim is receiving. Where housing assistance is provided, it should be explicitly linked to consideration of employment assistance. Consequently, the Commission envisages employment assistance providers with a record of effectively working with highly disadvantaged job seekers being engaged, to utilize funds available through the package.

Through the Back to Work program and associated initiatives in the Regional Jobs and Investment Fund and the Premier's Jobs and Investment Fund, the Victorian Government has acknowledged the debilitating impact of unemployment. The Commission suggests that the Victorian Government consider whether any of the funds available as part of these programs can be allocated to support the employment assistance element of the flexible recovery packages for victims of family violence.

Detailed design

In expanding Family Violence Flexible Support Packages to meet the Commission's recommendations, a number of aspects of design will need to be taken into account, among them the following:

- ▷ what the right cap is for each package, bearing in mind the reasonable amount required for rental subsidy to achieve housing affordability and the various other supports that need to be purchased
- ▷ the maximum duration of rental subsidy
- ▷ whether the amount of the subsidy is fixed or proportionate (that is, a percentage of rent) and, if the latter, what capping of the maximum should apply
- ▷ whether the level of subsidy is based on the number of people in the household
- ▷ the way in which rental subsidies will be means tested and how the subsidies might be targeted to those most in need
- ▷ the degree to which a woman's choice of location and housing type can be accommodated
- ▷ in cases where accommodation is made available other than under head-leasing arrangements, how the rental subsidy component interacts with Commonwealth Rent Assistance or eligibility for other income support or Centrelink benefits
- ▷ how the employment and training component would intersect with other existing subsidies or requirements—for example, any existing obligations imposed by Centrelink
- ▷ how the package will be treated for the purposes of determining child support and/or family law matters
- ▷ managing other factors that might limit the effectiveness of the subsidy program—such as market factors outside government's control, including demand levels from other groups, rental property supply levels and uneven rental property distributions.

Recommendation 17

The Victorian Government expand the provision of Family Violence Flexible Support Packages [within 12 months]. These packages should provide to victims assistance beyond the crisis period and should include longer term rental and mortgage subsidies where required, along with assistance for costs associated with securing and maintaining counselling, wellbeing, education, employment, financial counselling and other services designed to assist housing stability and financial security.

Ending the crisis

It is clear that the existing system of providing housing assistance to family violence victims is not working as intended. The system has become 'blocked', with bottlenecks forming at the point of entry into crisis accommodation, transitional housing and social housing. As a result, people end up staying in motels or refuges for extended periods, often for much longer than the stated limit of six weeks in a refuge. Transitional housing as a post-refuge destination is no longer a realistic option for many women in crisis accommodation. For those that do obtain transitional housing, their stay can also be extended long past the official period. In some cases, women have lived in 'transitional' housing for five years.

These circumstances are exacerbating the harm caused by family violence and are undermining other efforts within the service system to help victims recover. For many, effective housing assistance is the foundation for the effectiveness of other services available to them. As a consequence, the Commission considers that priority attention needs to be given to two urgent matters.

First, the blockages associated with access to and exit from refuges and crisis housing need to be resolved by making sufficient subsequent housing options available so that victims' stays will, on average, be less than six weeks.

Secondly, the implementation at scale of the various forms of housing assistance under the package approach the Commission recommends (by significantly expanding Family Violence Flexible Support Packages) will be a complex task. There is a lack of empirical data that would enable those implementing the scheme to readily categorise victims according to the type and level of housing support required to achieve desired outcomes. Existing secondary data sets do not allow for the depth of understanding about victims' circumstances that will be required. Similarly, while there are emerging pockets of practice wisdom concerning how the private rental market can be most effectively used for this purpose, this knowledge is confined to specific housing markets and is not well documented and shared.

Consequently, in the Commission's view the implementation of the housing assistance elements of packages, at a scale commensurate with demand, needs to be phased. It should begin with an initial two-year phase in which the number of packages delivered will be at a scale that is adequate for gathering data that will assist in forecasting demand, segmenting needs and service responses and in testing new delivery strategies. This first phase of implementation will need to incorporate applied research methods that will enable close monitoring, constant reporting, and an adaptive approach to management. It should be seen as a necessary precursor to larger scale implementation beyond two years, coinciding in each area with the introduction of the proposed Support and Safety hubs, enabling them to function as intended.

A housing blitz

Implementation of the Commission's recommendations relating to housing assistance calls for expert knowledge of family violence services, housing markets, applied research methodologies and systems design. It also calls for creativity, new thinking and an intense focus.

As a consequence, the Commission proposes the establishment of a Housing Assistance Implementation Task Force. The task force's primary objectives will be to oversee efforts to 'unclog' family violence refuges and associated crisis housing, as well as bringing housing-related packages to scale in the manner just described. In doing this, the task force will be expected to develop a body of knowledge about the most cost-effective strategies for achieving the desired outcomes and for understanding the determinants of demand. The Family Violence Housing Assistance Fund will need to be adequately funded to support these objectives.

The key performance indicators for the task force will be to return to a situation where the maximum time spent in crisis accommodation (including refuges) is six weeks and to bring to an end the use of ad hoc accommodation options such as rooming houses and caravans.

In fulfilling its role of breaking the current inertia in the system, the task force will need to use all the tools at its disposal. This means it will have to consider the appropriate level of investment required in social housing and related options for augmenting supply, so that those women and children for whom private rental is not an option are not left behind and the aim of returning crisis accommodation to a maximum of six weeks is achieved.

The challenge here lies in the current lack of empirical evidence on the proportion of victims of family violence for whom private rental may not be a viable long-term housing tenure. We know there are long waiting lists for public housing, but this is only a measure of expressed demand and is not supported by robust information about the incidence of family violence among applicants. We know little about the many more women who do not 'hit the system'.

Before an expansion of social housing specifically to meet the needs of family violence victims can be quantified, a much deeper conceptualisation of the long-term role of public housing in assisting in the recovery of victims is needed. The differences in the cost of providing social housing units as compared with medium-term support in the private rental market during the recovery phase, as discussed, suggest that attention to this matter is warranted.

The task force should be independently chaired and should include senior representatives of the private rental housing sector, registered housing providers and associations, family violence services and the public sector, as well as an expert in applied social research.

Consistent with arrangements recommended in Chapter 38, the Commission recommends, first, that the task force report through the Minister for Housing to the Cabinet Sub-Committee on Family Violence and, secondly, that the Minister for Housing report annually to the Parliamentary Family Violence Committee on the extent of unmet housing need (including the average and range of current stays by women and children in refuge and associated crisis housing) among people affected by family violence.

Recommendation 18

The Victorian Government give priority to removing current blockages in refuge and crisis accommodation and transitional housing, so that victims of family violence can gain stable housing as quickly as possible and with a minimum number of relocations, are not accommodated in motels and other ad hoc accommodation, and spend on average no longer than six weeks in refuge and crisis accommodation [within two years].

Recommendation 19

The Victorian Government establish a Family Violence Housing Assistance Implementation Task Force consisting of senior representatives from the public and commercial housing sectors and family violence specialists [within 12 months]. The task force, which should report through the Minister for Housing to the Cabinet Family Violence Sub-committee, should:

- ▷ oversee a process designed to remove blockages in access to family violence crisis accommodation by rapidly rehousing family violence victims living in crisis and transitional accommodation
- ▷ design, oversee and monitor the first 18-month phase of the proposed expanded Family Violence Flexible Support Packages (including rental subsidies)
- ▷ quantify the number of additional social housing units required for family violence victims who are unable to gain access to and sustain private rental accommodation
- ▷ subject to evaluation of the proposed expanded Family Violence Flexible Support Packages, plan for the statewide roll-out of the packages (including rental subsidies) and the social housing required.

Recommendation 20

The Victorian Minister for Housing, Disability and Ageing report annually to the Parliamentary Committee on Family Violence [within two years] on:

- ▷ the extent of unmet housing demand among people affected by family violence—including the average and range of current stays by women and children in crisis and transitional accommodation
- ▷ progress in meeting the benchmark of six weeks in crisis accommodation
- ▷ proposed actions for meeting the continuing housing demand from people affected by family violence.

Accommodation for perpetrators

Although this chapter focuses on the urgent pressures on the accommodation system for women escaping family violence, the Commission did receive submissions from homelessness organisations arguing that funding should be directed towards accommodation for perpetrators. This could occur with some form of flexible housing package, noting that perpetrators are currently eligible for housing assistance through the Housing Establishment Fund and homelessness services. If it were to occur, however, the Commission considers that further work is required to determine the level of demand for such accommodation, noting that there was ambiguity on this point in the evidence before the Commission. It is also important that any investment in housing options for perpetrators of family violence does not detract from the priority of increasing housing security for victims.

Proposals for the introduction of therapeutic interventions tied to crisis accommodation options for perpetrators have some merit, but further work is required to develop a suitable service model. Some of the important considerations concern what constitutes ‘therapeutic’, whether this support should be integrated as a core element of the accommodation or be obtained from other providers, whether men would seek the support voluntarily or it should be mandated (noting the legislative impediments discussed in Chapter 18), and how this would link to services for victims. Similarly, in relation to proposals for developing communal accommodation options for perpetrators, careful analysis of the risks associated with such an approach would need to be done before any such facilities were contemplated. The Commission therefore encourages the Victorian Government to investigate the extent and nature of the demand for such accommodation and the most appropriate model.

There is a strong argument for capital works spending for "bricks and mortar" for new crisis accommodation facilities to meet this demand. It is worth noting that $44m of capital expenditure, earmarked for refuges, was cut from the federal homelessness budget in 2014 (within the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness) and has not been reinstated': Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 26.

- 261 Ibid. In 2008, reforms to the transitional housing program meant that 'nomination rights' which allowed particular target groups access to a specified number of transitional housing properties were largely removed. Victims of family violence were one of these target groups. Currently allocations are generally made by the Transition Housing Manager, employed by the Department of Health and Human Services, who acts as 'landlord' and who is separate to the program providing housing support (although in some cases both programs might be administered by the same agency). It is not clear to what extent women experiencing family violence have access to transitional housing and whether this proportion has changed since the removal of nomination rights that retained a certain number of properties solely for this group.

There are three variables in the Household, Income and Labour Dynamics in Australia Survey which are used to measure the safety domain of social exclusion; the first is whether a person is the victim of violence, the second is whether the person is a victim of property crime and the third is feeling of being secure—none of these variables are family violence specific.

10 Children and young people's experience of family violence

Introduction

The Commission received a large number of submissions describing the devastating effects of family violence on children and young people. We heard that they are often described as silent victims because the system has historically focused on the safety and wellbeing of women (or women and their children). The Commission also heard that more recently this focus has shifted.

Family violence has a serious impact on the health and wellbeing of infants, children and young people. There is no known 'safe' level of exposure to such violence. It is important to note, however, that despite this, many children and young people display great resilience in the face of family violence and the Commission heard evidence about factors that can support their resilience.

The first section of this chapter 'Context and current practice' begins by looking at key data regarding the incidence of family violence against children and young people. It then discusses evidence and submissions the Commission received about children and young people's experience of family violence and the role of early childhood services and schools in identifying and responding to family violence. Specialist family violence services as well as services that work with vulnerable families and children more generally (Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services) are also discussed in this section. Existing counselling and therapeutic programs for children are described, along with key parenting support programs. The role of Child Protection is discussed in Chapter 11.

The effects and specific experiences of particular cohorts of children and young people—Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children and young people, those from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, children and young people with a disability, or living in rural, regional or remote communities, and those who are same-sex attracted or gender diverse—are also discussed in this section. The experience of these groups is also considered in more detail in Volume V.

In the next section 'Challenges and opportunities' the effectiveness of the current system in meeting the needs of children and young people affected by family violence is assessed. The Commission was told that children are 'frequently marginalised' in current responses to family violence.¹ Although a child's safety and welfare are often intrinsically linked to the mother's safety and welfare,² a child's needs can differ from, and at times even conflict with, a parent's rights.³ The Commission was also told that there is a need for more (and more comprehensive) services specifically focusing on the needs of children and young people.⁴

Victoria has a legal framework that recognises children's rights to safety and wellbeing, provides specific protections for children who experience family violence, and outlines principles designed to facilitate the participation of children in decisions affecting them. Despite this, the Commission heard that there is no system-wide recognition in practice of children and young people who experience family violence as unique victims in their own right. Child and youth-centred services that recognise and respond to children and young people's distinct experiences of family violence are largely missing in Victoria. These are needed to complement the work responding to women. In some cases this will mean working directly with the child or young person, in others it will mean working with mother and child, and in other cases by helping her, we are also helping her children.

Some examples of effective interventions are noted, however it is clear that these initiatives, welcome though they are, are reliant on the efforts of services already at capacity and are not supported in any systemic way. Specific barriers and the lack of services for young people experiencing family violence are also identified, along with major concerns regarding the link between family violence and homelessness of young people.

In the final section of this chapter the Commission recommends a system-wide, coordinated response to family violence that focuses on the specific needs of children and young people, and makes recommendations aimed at ensuring that their needs are met. The Commission calls for greater focus on assisting universal services to identify children and young people experiencing family violence, and more resources for mother and child therapeutic programs to help repair the bond which can be broken by family violence.

Promising responses that could be developed, improved and strengthened are identified in this section. In particular trauma-informed therapeutic interventions that are currently largely only available to children in the statutory child protection system are identified as model programs with features that could be adapted and expanded for children and young people who require this level of support. Similarly, existing counselling and support programs that only operate in specific geographic areas are identified for expansion so that children and young people experiencing or recovering from family violence can access these, regardless of where they live.

The Commission also recommends amendments to the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to ensure that a child who has experienced family violence (including through witnessing, hearing or otherwise being exposed to it) is protected by a family violence intervention order.

In making its recommendations, the Commission envisages a system that incorporates a focus on children and young people, promotes early intervention with families, increases support and better engages them. Underpinning these recommendations is the Commission's view that children and young people experiencing family violence should be recognised as victims in their own right. Their safety and wellbeing are paramount and their distinct needs should be recognised when planning and delivering responses to family violence.

Note: The Commission uses the legal definition of 'child' as a person who is under the age of 18 years.⁵ The term 'young people' refers to people up to the age of 25 years.

Context and current practice

This section discusses relevant legislation; available data on the prevalence and incidence of family violence affecting children and young people; and describes some of the main services provided to this group, recognising that the needs of infants, children and young people are distinct.

The rights framework

There are a number of statutes in Victoria that protect children's rights. These include Victoria's Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) which recognises children's rights to safety and wellbeing. Section 17(2) of the Charter states that every child has the right, without discrimination, to such protection as is in his or her best interests and is needed by him or her by reason of being a child.⁶ This reflects Australia's obligation to protect children's rights under the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.⁷

The Family Violence Protection Act specifically protects children, including by defining 'family violence' to include behaviour by a person that causes a child to hear or witness, or otherwise be exposed to the effects of family violence.⁸

In addition, the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) provides a legislative framework for ensuring that children's services best support children's needs. For example, the Act provides for a number of decision-making principles to be considered when the Department of Health and Human Services or a community service is making decisions or taking action in relation to a child.⁹ This includes both Child Protection within the Department of Health and Human Services and community-based Child FIRST/Integrated Family Services. These principles require services to use a practice approach that is child-centred and family-sensitive—decisions and actions must protect the child from harm, protect the child's rights and promote the child's development. These principles require practitioners to focus on children's safety, stability and development in the context of their age and stage of life, as well as their culture and gender.¹⁰

The Child Wellbeing and Safety Act 2005 (Vic) outlines 'principles for children' to guide the development and provision of services for children.¹¹ These include an expectation that service providers 'acknowledge and be respectful of the child's individual identity, circumstances and cultural identity and be responsive to the particular needs of the child'.¹²

Prevalence and incidence

As a result of under-reporting of family violence and the lack of comprehensive data collection, it is difficult to assess the full extent to which children and young people are experiencing family violence in Victoria.¹³ The best data we have on the likely prevalence of family violence against adult women is from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, however this survey does not extend to children.

The National Children's Commissioner in her Children's Rights Report 2015 found that national and disaggregated data about child victims of family violence, including breakdowns on the age of victims and data about offenders, is limited.¹⁴ The Commissioner recommended improvements to data collection, including that the ABS Personal Safety Survey extend its collection of information to experiences of abuse between the ages of 15 and 17¹⁵ and that data about a child's experience of family violence be recorded as a separate entry and not part of an adult entry in the ABS National Data Collection and Reporting Framework.¹⁶

One thing we do know is that children and young people are often present when their mothers suffer family violence. The ABS Personal Safety Survey estimated that for 31.3 per cent of women who had experienced violence by a current partner since the age of 15, and for 47.6 per cent of women who had experienced violence by a previous partner since the age of 15, violence was seen or heard by their children.¹⁷ This means that many homes in which family violence occurs will have children in them.

Victoria Police data

The police data set out below relates only to reported family violence incidents, which, due to under-reporting, are likely to represent only a portion of actual family violence incidents against children.

Victoria Police data analysed by the Crime Statistics Agency for the Commission shows:

- ▷ there has been a 76 per cent increase in reported family violence incidents at which children were present between the years 2009–10 and 2013–14¹⁸
- ▷ children under 18 years were present at 12,688 family violence incidents attended by Victoria Police in 2009–10. This had increased to 22,376 incidents by 2013–14¹⁹
- ▷ often multiple children are present at these incidents. In 2013–14, there were 11,053 incidents in which one child was present, 6627 where two children were present, 2866 where three children were present, 1089 where four children were present and 741 where five or more children were present.²⁰

From 2009–10 to 2013–14, the proportion of incidents in which children were present has remained relatively constant (35.6 per cent in 2009–10 and 34.3 per cent in 2013–14).²¹

In addition to recording the number of children present at family violence incidents, police data also includes where a child has been listed as an 'affected family member' (meaning victim) on the L17 form which police complete after attending a family violence incident.²² It should be noted that although an L17 should be completed by Victoria Police for each child that is present at a family violence incident, in practice it may be that an L17 will be completed for the person that police assess to be the direct victim (this is most likely the mother).²³ This may mean that any children who were in the residence at the time will be recorded on the L17 as present, rather than as an affected family member on a separate L17.²⁴

Over the five year period 2009–10 to 2013–14, the number of L17s that recorded children as the affected family member of family violence has increased.

- ▷ In 2009–10, 2742 L17s were completed for affected family members who were aged less than 18 years, and by 2013–14 this figure had more than doubled to 5781.²⁵
- ▷ As a proportion of all recorded family violence incidents, in 2009–10, 7.7 per cent of affected family members were aged under 18, increasing slightly to 8.9 per cent in 2013–14. In 2013–14, children in the age cohorts 12 to 14 years and 15 to 17 years made up the highest portion of child affected family members where the other party (the reported perpetrator) was a parent.²⁶
- ▷ In 2013–14, where a parent was the other party, girls were more likely to be the affected family member than boys (56 per cent (n=1860) girls and 44 per cent (n=1481) boys).²⁷ Further information about the age and gender of affected family members for the 2013–14 period is in Figure 10.1 below.

Fathers were ‘other parties’ in the majority of incidents: 63 per cent (n=927) where the affected family member was a male child and 55 per cent (n=1019) where the affected family member was a female child.

Mothers were ‘other parties’ in 37 per cent (n=554) of incidents where the affected family member was a male child and 45 per cent (n=841) where the affected family member was a female child.²⁸

Family violence intervention order applications

Over the five years from July 2009 to June 2014, combined Magistrates’ and Children’s Court data shows that there has been a 20.5 per cent increase in the number of child affected family members on FVIO applications (compared with an increase of 28.9 per cent in the number of adult affected family members).²⁹ Across both courts, the majority of respondents to these applications were males, however, from July 2009 to June 2014 20 per cent were females.³⁰

In 2009–10, 46.5 per cent (n=20,575) of all affected family members listed on FVIO applications in both courts were children (aged 0–17 years) and in 2013–14 this was slightly lower at 44.8 per cent (n=24,802), with minor variations in between.³¹

Magistrates' and Children's Court data relating to children and young people

Magistrates' Court data on parties to original applications for FVIOs shows the following:

- ▶ In the five years from July 2009, the number of affected family members aged 17 years and younger increased by 20.6 per cent.³²
- ▶ In 2013–14 the largest age group of child affected family members was five to 12 years.³³
- ▶ On applications where the affected family member was aged under 17 years, the related respondent was most likely between 30–44 years of age and most likely male.³⁴

Children's Court data on parties to original applications for FVIOs, which includes children who are respondents, shows the following:

- ▶ In the five years from July 2009, the number of affected family members aged 17 years or younger increased by 20.3 per cent.³⁵
- ▶ In 2013–14, 70 per cent (n=1028) of these applications were against a male respondent and 30 per cent (n=442) were against a female respondent.³⁶
- ▶ In 2013–14, the largest age cohort amongst all male affected family members (including adult males) was 10–14 years.³⁷
- ▶ In 2013–14 the largest age cohort amongst all female affected family members (including adult females) was 15–19 years.³⁸

The effects of family violence on children and young people

Family violence can have profound short and long-term effects on children and young people that may or may not be immediately apparent: '[i]mpacts on children who live with family violence may be acute and chronic, immediate and accumulative, direct and indirect, seen and unseen.'³⁹

Impacts during pregnancy and infancy

The Commission was told that pregnancy is a time of increased risk of family violence, and there is evidence that such violence can have an impact on the foetus.⁴⁰ A pregnant woman experiencing elevated levels of stress and fear as a result of family violence can transmit stress hormones such as cortisol and adrenaline to the foetus.⁴¹ High exposure to cortisol has been linked to low birthweight, significantly smaller head size and reduced ability to fight infection.⁴² There is a recognised link between intimate partner violence and miscarriage.⁴³ A foetus can be injured as a result of physical trauma, which can cause miscarriage or pre-term labour:

During my pregnancy I was subjected to numerous [beatings] which finally resulted in a miscarriage ... My daughter was born with spinal fractures due to the physical abuse that was never identified until recently.⁴⁴

... when I found out I was pregnant [he] told me I had to have an abortion, when I tried to leave to raise the child myself he threatened to kick me in the stomach and kill the child ...⁴⁵

I became pregnant with his baby, and the abuse became worse. On one occasion he throws me in the pool smashing my head on the concrete. I lost my baby at 5 weeks.⁴⁶

There is also an increased risk of family violence just after a baby is born.⁴⁷

The Commission heard that infants are 'highly sophisticated in their capacity to process information' and very attuned to their environment and whether they feel safe.⁴⁸ Family violence affects infants' development because the human brain grows very quickly during the early years of life and is highly sensitive to prolonged periods of stress at this time.⁴⁹ Exposing infants to family violence therefore 'interferes with the basic building blocks of development' and can affect their cognitive, emotional and behavioural development.⁵⁰

Physical, emotional, mental and behavioural effects on children

Children can be affected by family violence in many ways, including the following:

- ▷ suffering direct or indirect physical harm—for example, if a mother is holding a child when she is attacked or if a child is injured while trying to protect their mother
- ▷ feeling scared of those they love when they should feel safe
- ▷ feeling anxious about their safety and that of other family members and pets
- ▷ having to be responsible for the care and safety of the abused parent and/or siblings
- ▷ feeling they are responsible for the violence
- ▷ becoming homeless, losing treasured possessions, and losing a sense of security and familiar toys, surroundings and people
- ▷ through disrupted schooling as a result of prolonged absences from school or multiple new schools in a short space of time
- ▷ being unable to bring friends home or being socially marginalised because of the perpetrator's controlling behaviour.⁵¹

The result is that children can suffer from a variety of physical, emotional and mental health effects including depression, anxiety, low self esteem, impaired cognitive functioning and mood problems.⁵² The Commission was told they might be burdened by the 'secret' at home and are more likely to suffer from learning difficulties, trauma symptoms and behavioural problems.⁵³ Such children can also have problems with bedwetting and disturbed sleep, and be plagued by flashbacks and nightmares.⁵⁴ Additionally, their social skills may be affected and they might have difficulty regulating their emotions, trusting others and forming relationships:⁵⁵

I was incredibly suicidal from a very young age—it's very painful to think about. I remember being what could only have been about 6 years old and just crying and crying and being so afraid, wondering how I could live if I ran away from home—I was also incredibly afraid of and obsessed by death. I was already starving and hurting myself when I was around 11.⁵⁶

Children's schooling can be affected as a result of mental health and behavioural problems that arise from the violence.⁵⁷ They might learn coping strategies that protect them in their home but that detract from their learning at school; for example, a child might withdraw at home to mitigate the risk and the impacts of violence there, but this could compromise their learning and their ability to form friendships at school.⁵⁸ They might also have problems concentrating and managing day-to-day tasks, including getting to school.⁵⁹

It is well established that children do not have to directly experience family violence or even witness it to be negatively affected by it.⁶⁰ Reflecting this, the Family Violence Protection Act defines 'family violence' to include behaviour by a person that causes a child to hear or witness, or otherwise be exposed to the effects of family violence. Examples of behaviour which may constitute family violence are provided in the Act:

- ▷ overhearing threats of physical abuse by one family member towards another
- ▷ seeing or hearing a family member being assaulted
- ▷ comforting or providing assistance to a family member who has been physically abused by another family member
- ▷ cleaning up a site after a family member has intentionally damaged another family member's property
- ▷ being present when police officers attend an incident involving physical abuse of a family member by another family member.⁶¹

The Commission heard that observing the aftermath of a violent incident, seeing an injured parent or feeling a sense of tension and fear in the home can be just as traumatising for children.⁶² Research has shown that the impacts on children of exposure to family violence are similar to the impacts on children who experience direct physical violence:⁶³

The aftermath of the violence where there is blood on their mother's face, walls are smashed, or glass is broken, is often something that children have often spoken to me about as being intrusive memories that they can't get out of their heads during the day, and which keep them awake at night as nightmares.⁶⁴

Witnessing an attack on a primary caregiver can be a terrifying experience for a child. Professor Louise Newman AM, Director at the Centre for Women's Mental Health at the Royal Women's Hospital stated:

The most damaging type of situation for a young child exposed to family violence is where the child believes that their primary carer will be unavailable to them and will die. This belief is as damaging to the child as the belief that the child itself will die. This reflects the dependency of the child on his or her primary carer and attachment figure.⁶⁵

The Commission heard many descriptions of the effect of family violence on children who witnessed the violence:

I was torn; yearning to escape my situation, terrified that further harm would come to my mother and siblings if I were not there to protect them. I considered committing a serious crime, sufficient to have me placed in juvenile detention or jail as a means of escape, however the responsibility I felt to my mother and siblings stopped me from pursuing what I feared was a selfish course of action.⁶⁶

[M]um would call out to me every night in some terrible situation, or something violent, with a chair in her hand, steel armed chair, I was only three or four, Dad loved me and I could stop him. It was a lot of responsibility, it's a huge thing. It does affect the kids, the way it affects me.⁶⁷

Once he cut the head off my Mother's pet to 'teach her a lesson.' He regularly beat—and I mean beat the shit out of our dogs. Hearing the sounds of this in my memory is still gut wrenchingly sickening. In fact, I hate ever thinking about my childhood, because all I can remember is screaming, crying, horrible insults, and the sounds of people running away from each other.⁶⁸

Although she was never diagnosed, I also believe that my mother suffered from depression, and I remember her telling me that she wanted to kill herself when I was a child and also overdosing on pills when I was a teenager. There were many occasions where there were blow ups and my Dad would start yelling, swearing and hitting my mum. We were incredibly scared and frightened as children, and I remember my sister calling my Aunties on several occasions who would rush over and try to intervene. As us siblings grew, we were able to physically intervene and hold them off.⁶⁹

Domestic Violence Victoria told us that children living in households where family violence occurs are more likely to suffer physical abuse, sexual abuse or neglect when compared with children who live in non-violent homes.⁷⁰ Child sexual abuse is discussed in the context of family violence in more detail in Chapter 12.

The Commission also heard that perpetrators sometimes use the family law system to inflict abuse—for example, by making repeated parenting applications in order to punish the child’s mother or as a means of controlling her. This form of family violence can also be highly stressful for children:⁷¹

My experiences in the Family Court have all been unpleasant. I have been told that I have no choice even though I have been frightened and suffered from panic attacks as well as anxiety. The court were going to place me in a room with my abusive father just to see how I react. Before this ruling, I had made my views known to the court but they ignored my statement. One of my greatest fears is that no one takes my concerns seriously nor do they really think my views are important.⁷²

I believe that my ex husband attempted to control me and ‘see’ me ... pushing the legal case for as long as possible, often refusing to make an agreement in respect to the children. If the children felt unsafe or didn’t want to spend time with their father, my ex-husband would apply for a breach of contact orders against me, repeatedly attempting to drag me back to court and have me ‘punished’ by the court. He made repeated threats to my family members in person and via phone, stating he would not stop until he ‘rubbed my face in the dirt’.⁷³

Effects of family violence on the mother–child relationship

The Commission heard from many women about the extraordinary lengths they had to go to try and keep their children safe from the violence. Research also shows that some perpetrators systematically undermine the mother–child relationship as an abuse tactic—for example, by undermining the mother’s parenting skills through criticism⁷⁴—and one submission described for the Commission the effect of such tactics:

So many arguments I have lost count, he would follow me around the house trying to get me to join him in a yelling match. He would make sure the children could hear him putting me down. ... [He] constantly put me down to the children and questioned the children as to why they loved me.⁷⁵

As a survival mechanism, some children may identify with the perpetrator and participate in undermining their mother.⁷⁶ Professor Newman noted that children want to be loved and accepted by their parents, and in family violence situations ‘the only way they can get that closeness is often to join with the abusive aggressive parent’.⁷⁷ In the long term this can distort the child’s understanding of relationships.⁷⁸

The Commission was told that family violence can affect the mother–child bond.⁷⁹ For infants, family violence can result in ‘disorganised attachment’,⁸⁰ which occurs when the baby ‘does not have a consistent or coherent strategy for obtaining help or comfort from its mother’⁸¹ and can even be frightened by the presence of its mother, as well as by the presence of the perpetrator of the violence.⁸²

Infants and children may suffer if their mother’s ability to parent is compromised as a result of family violence.⁸³ Parenting capacity can be undermined because a mother’s mental health is adversely affected or because she is physically injured.⁸⁴ She might also ‘be preoccupied with trying to control the home environment’ so that the perpetrator’s needs receive priority.⁸⁵

There is evidence that women who experience family violence during pregnancy are more likely to develop depression after the birth of their child.⁸⁶ Maternal perinatal depression is in turn linked to a number of psychological and developmental disorders in children.⁸⁷

I can’t adequately parent our daughter while I am sick, and under the stressful circumstances of the past few years, my immune system is not what it ought to be and I am more susceptible to illness.⁸⁸

Dr Robyn Miller, social worker and family therapist, told the Commission that aggravating this situation is the fact that a child experiencing family violence might need additional parental attention because of their emotional and behavioural difficulties.⁸⁹ This can place considerable pressure on women who are dealing with family violence. However many women increase their nurturing behaviours towards their children in an attempt to compensate for the violence, and evidence shows that mothers have a central role in their children’s recovery from family violence.⁹⁰

Mothers sometimes also use violence against their children. According to Victoria Police, women were the offenders in just over two in five of all reported family violence incidents with a child victim.⁹¹ One anonymous submission said:

While my Mother was terribly abusive herself- especially verbally- I believe that a lot of her emotional instability was as a result of my stepfather's creation of an incredibly frightening, negative household where everybody was reacting out of sheer terror constantly.⁹²

Cumulative harm

Children can suffer cumulative harm when subjected to 'a series or pattern of harmful events and experiences that may be historical, or ongoing, with the strong possibility of the risk factors being multiple, interrelated and coexisting over critical developmental periods.'⁹³ Among these experiences can be parental substance abuse, disrupted living arrangements and neglect, as well as family violence.⁹⁴

The effects of cumulative harm on children can be 'profound and exponential, covering multiple dimensions of [their] life'.⁹⁵ This is recognised in the Children, Youth and Families Act, which requires that practitioners working with vulnerable children consider the 'effects of cumulative patterns of harm on a child's safety and development'.⁹⁶ The Commission was told, however, that cumulative harm is not always fully understood by family violence workers and other practitioners who come into contact with children experiencing such violence. There are a number of different risk assessment frameworks and decision-making tools, that are poorly connected, and this contributes to confusion among practitioners. These systemic problems lead to some practitioners treating violence and abuse as discrete events, and failing to recognise the cumulative harm of such violence, and the trauma to children that can occur as a result.⁹⁷

Effects of family violence on young people

Young people's experiences of family violence and its effects are distinct from those of children, and from those of adults.

Adolescence and young adulthood involve major transitions, such as moving from primary to secondary school, leaving secondary school, gaining employment, forming intimate relationships, moving out of home for the first time, and becoming sexually active.⁹⁸ Young people's experience of family violence can also intersect with and be compounded by a number of other factors; for example, young people are more vulnerable to poor mental and sexual health, homelessness and unemployment.⁹⁹

In addition to the ways in which children experience family violence, young people's experience of such violence can also involve the assumption of caring responsibilities; for example, caring for younger siblings.

Every day I walked home from school I would be terrified, because I was sure it would be the day he'd snapped and I'd walk in to find that he had murdered my Mother and brother. It was like walking into a warzone—I never knew what might have happened or would be about to happen. I used to pray that he would die so that we could be free of him.¹⁰⁰

There is also evidence that experiencing family violence may have different effects on girls and boys and can affect their relationships as adolescents and adults:

Children have a gender differential response to family violence – as a generalisation, girls tend to internalise and boys act out. In terms of risk, gender impacts place girls at higher risk of victimisation as adults and boys at greater risk of perpetration as adults. Having witnessed parental violence, emerged as the strongest predictor of perpetration of violence in young people's own intimate relationships.¹⁰¹

The Commission for Children and Young People submitted that young women who are victims of family violence may have complex issues such as substance abuse and a lack of life skills due to lifelong abuse from their parents and later from partners.¹⁰²

Intimate partner violence can affect young women's income and financial stability, housing security and parenting capacity.¹⁰³ When young parents experience intimate partner violence, there are also concerns about the effect of that violence on their children.¹⁰⁴

Homelessness as a consequence of family violence for young people

Just as family violence causes homelessness for women, it also causes homelessness for children and young people either when they accompany their mothers or when they are forced to leave the family home on their own because of family violence.¹⁰⁵

I took all the abuse because I didn't want to be homeless. Besides I had school to think about and I wanted to pass. How was I going to pass if I was homeless?¹⁰⁶

[W]hen unaccompanied 12 to 18 year olds show up homeless, sometimes it's the first time they have disclosed family violence. The question is: How did it get to this point without being picked up first? Are these people already known in the system? If so, where is the coordination across services and what is capacity to respond?¹⁰⁷

The Australian Institute of Health and Welfare has reported that, nationally, of 44,414 young people seeking the assistance of a homelessness service in 2013–14, 15 per cent identified family violence as the main reason for seeking assistance and a further 13 per cent identified relationship or family breakdown.¹⁰⁸ A 2014 longitudinal study found that of 382 young Australians suffering from long-term homelessness (four or more years), 64 per cent had experienced physical violence in the home and 71.6 per cent had experienced some form of child abuse.¹⁰⁹

In Victoria in 2013–14, 4038 boys and 4338 girls aged 0 to 14 years (the largest age cohort for males, but one of the smaller cohorts for females) were reported as seeking specialist homelessness assistance for family violence reasons.¹¹⁰

Children can experience a range of harms as a result of homelessness. Dr Angela Spinney, a research fellow and lecturer, Institute for Social Research at Swinburne University of Technology, gave evidence on the importance of very young children having stability, including constant schooling.¹¹¹ Merri Outreach Support Service submitted, 'For children homelessness is not just about having a home to live in, it is about feeling unsafe, about being disconnected from supports and not having a sense of security'.¹¹² Other effects include:

- ▶ an increased likelihood of developmental delay, anxiety and depression, low self-esteem and nutritional deficits
- ▶ emotional isolation and difficulty relating to peers
- ▶ discrimination and stigma at school
- ▶ reduced concentration
- ▶ increased school absenteeism
- ▶ an increased risk of infectious diseases as a result of low immunisation levels.¹¹³

Young people and intimate partner violence

The Fifth National Survey of Secondary Students and Sexual Health, conducted in 2013, found that of the students who reported being sexually active, 28.3 per cent ($n=124$) of females and 19.8 per cent ($n=54$) of males reported having experienced unwanted sex.¹¹⁴ Of those who reported having unwanted sex, 60.5 per cent ($n=75$) of young women reported having unwanted sex because their partner thought they should, compared with 37.0 per cent ($n=20$) of young men.¹¹⁵

A 2010 study surveyed 146 Australian women aged 14–18 years, asking about their experiences with boyfriends. It found that more than 90 per cent of the young women had experienced at least one abusive and controlling behaviour and over half of them had experienced five or more such behaviours.¹¹⁶

For young women, the increased risk of intimate partner violence is attributable to a range of factors, such as beliefs about gender roles, limited experience of interpersonal relationships, and lack of access to support services.¹¹⁷

The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria told the Commission that although young people recognise family violence as a problem, they are more likely 'to be poorly-informed about family violence and relationship violence, and to have been influenced by beliefs that encourage or excuse violence'.¹¹⁸ VicHealth's 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey found:

- ▷ Twenty-seven per cent of the young men surveyed believed 'domestic violence is a private matter to be handled in the family'—compared with 17 per cent of the survey sample as a whole.¹¹⁹
- ▷ Sixty-six per cent of the young men surveyed and 55 per cent of the young women believed that women could leave a violent relationship if they really wanted to.¹²⁰
- ▷ Forty-six per cent of the young people surveyed believed it was sometimes all right for a man to use a phone or computer to track his female partner without her consent—compared with 38 per cent of the surveyed sample as a whole.¹²¹

Chapter 36 discusses the importance of primary prevention in depth (including primary prevention with children and young people) through, in particular, respectful relationships education.

Other long-term effects of family violence for children and young people

The Commission heard from a number of people who described the long-term effects of family violence for children and young people.¹²²

Professor Newman told the Commission that those who experience family violence in their early years have poorer health outcomes—for example they have higher rates of high blood pressure and Type 2 diabetes as adults as a result of the activity of stress-related hormones.¹²³ Children and young people who have experienced family violence are also at greater risk of drug and alcohol abuse and post-traumatic stress disorder as young people and adults.¹²⁴

Evidence submitted to the Commission showed that there is a strong link between the experience of family violence and contact with the youth justice system and adult criminal conduct.¹²⁵ In 2014 the Youth Support and Advocacy Service analysed Victoria Police referrals to the service's diversion program for people aged 10 to 17 years.¹²⁶ The results showed that 55 per cent of young people who had had recent contact with Victoria Police reported that family conflict occurred in their home 'often' or 'very often'.¹²⁷

The Victorian prison population shows 'considerably higher than average' levels of exposure to sexual, physical and emotional abuse.¹²⁸ Family violence and female prisoners is discussed in Chapter 34.

Intergenerational effects

There is some evidence that children who have experienced family violence are at greater risk of using violence later in life and are more likely to have violence used against them.¹²⁹ Many young women who experience family violence in their early intimate relationships have experienced family violence during their childhood.

The subject of the intergenerational effects of family violence—in terms of both perpetration and victimisation—was raised in many submissions and consultations:¹³⁰

Each relationship is a violent relationship because as children we've never been loved. We come from broken families.¹³¹

If anger and abuse surrounds a young person's childhood, then they will [grow] up only understanding anger and abuse, because nobody has taught them otherwise.¹³²

As a young adult, I replicated what I knew. I entered into and then became trapped in a relationship that was dangerously violent.¹³³

I have six sons, they've all witnessed violence. He was 22 months old, in the refuge and he did exactly the same thing to me as his dad did. My son has only just turned 18, he's got the power in him for how to destroy a person. I taught them 'Youse don't do this to your girlfriends'. They need to be taught.¹³⁴

The Youth Affairs Council of Australia noted that, even when young women did not experience family violence during childhood, intimate partner violence affects young people's earliest experiences of gender roles and intimacy and can 'set a damaging precedent and shape the family lives they later establish as adults'.¹³⁵ Therefore, responding to the problem of intimate partner violence experienced by young people is a crucial element in breaking the cycle of violence and preventing intergenerational violence, as well as to responding to the immediate harm it causes.

The diversity of experiences

Children and young people's experiences of family violence are influenced by their individual characteristics. Some children face specific barriers in gaining access to services or require additional or culturally-specific support. This section examines the experiences of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children and young people, young people who are same-sex attracted and gender diverse, children and young people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities, children and young people with disabilities, and children and young people from rural, regional and remote communities.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children and young people

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children and young people experience higher rates of family violence than other children and young people. A National Crime Prevention survey conducted in 1998 and 1999 with 5000 Australians aged between 12 and 20 found that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander young people were significantly more likely to have experienced physical violence between their parents or parents' partners. In the case of violence from a male parent to a female parent, 42 per cent Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander young people reported witnessing this, compared with 23 per cent of all respondents.¹³⁶

In its 2009 State of Victoria's Children report, Victoria's Department of Education and Early Childhood Development (now the Department of Education and Training) reported that 20.5 per cent of Aboriginal young people aged 15–24 years had been the victim of physical violence and 27.2 per cent had been threatened with violence.¹³⁷ Of those who had experienced physical violence, 82.5 per cent knew the perpetrator.¹³⁸ The Department of Education and Training provided the Commission with a School Entrant Health Questionnaire, which showed that in 2014, 4.2 per cent of Indigenous children compared with 1.2 per cent of non-Indigenous children reported a 'history of abuse'.¹³⁹

For Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children and young people, family violence occurs in the context of intergenerational grief and trauma resulting from colonialism, dispossession and loss of traditional language.¹⁴⁰ This has led to communities suffering from a range of adverse effects, among them poor health, poor educational and employment outcomes, poverty, and higher rates of incarceration.¹⁴¹ These effects can contribute to the prevalence of family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and compound the impact of violence on these communities.

The Commission heard that both nationally and in Victoria, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children are significantly over-represented in out-of-home care, and that family violence is a central factor contributing to their removal from their home.¹⁴² Fear of having children taken away can also prevent Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women from reporting family violence. This was one of the most consistent themes heard by the Commission, and is discussed in detail in Chapter 26.

The child protection system is required to operate under the Aboriginal Child Placement Principle which states that kinship care is the preferred home-based placement type and must be considered and investigated before any other placement option is considered.¹⁴³ In Victoria in 2013–14, 66.9 per cent of Aboriginal children were placed in accordance with the principle.¹⁴⁴ The Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, Mr Andrew Jackomos PSM, is investigating the circumstances of Victorian Aboriginal children in care with a view to highlighting the relationship between family violence and the placement of Aboriginal children in out-of-home care. The May 2015 Taskforce 1000 report for the South Melbourne area found that four out of five Aboriginal children in out-of-home care in that area had been exposed to family violence and parental substance misuse.¹⁴⁵ Similarly, 86 per cent of Aboriginal children in out-of-home care in the Inner Gippsland area had been exposed to family violence.¹⁴⁶

Commissioner Jackomos has also noted that the number of Aboriginal children placed in statutory care increased by 42 per cent in the 12 months to 30 June 2014 (from 922 to 1308 children).¹⁴⁷ This represents 62.7 such arrangements per 1000 children and compares with 5.1 per 1000 for all Victorian children.¹⁴⁸

Children who are removed from their home, including for reasons of family violence, can suffer major trauma as a result of cultural loss:

If family violence leads to a Koorie child or young person needing to leave their family, sometimes resulting in them being placed in statutory care, this can have a significant effect on their cultural identity and wellbeing. If that placement is not with kin or appropriately within the Koorie community, a child or young person's connection to family, land and culture can be adversely affected or undermined.¹⁴⁹

This loss of connection to family, land and culture can greatly limit a child's recovery from family violence because factors associated with connectedness promote resilience and healing.¹⁵⁰ Dr Miller gave evidence that for Aboriginal children 'connection to culture is healing and needs to be part of our planning and ongoing work with the family'.¹⁵¹ It is therefore crucial that Aboriginal children and young people experiencing family violence have access to culturally competent assessment, intervention and support services that 'emphasise cultural connection as a key aspect of emotional and social wellbeing'.¹⁵² A 2012 report co-authored by the Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Take Two Berry Street and La Trobe University noted:

For too long Aboriginal children have been assessed using measures and assessment approaches which do not take into account their culture, beliefs, connection to community and place, spirituality and their individual experiences. Furthermore the assessment of an individuals' social and emotional status independent of the family and community is an alien concept to Aboriginal people as well as being ecologically uninformed.¹⁵³

Although the Children, Youth and Families Act requires that the cultural safety of Aboriginal children be protected when these children are placed in out-of-home care, the Commission was told that this often does not occur.¹⁵⁴

The Koorie Youth Council told us that assumptions made about young people on the basis of Western cultural frameworks can be inappropriate if blindly applied to Aboriginal communities without acknowledging cultural differences.¹⁵⁵ For example, in Aboriginal communities there might not be a clear distinction between adolescents and adults, as is the case in mainstream Western cultural frameworks.¹⁵⁶

It is also important that mainstream youth services ensure that their staff are culturally sensitive and that partnerships are developed between Aboriginal community controlled organisations and other youth services.¹⁵⁷ In Chapter 26, we discuss providing capacity to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander organisations to give secondary consultations to mainstream services and make recommendations to support culturally safe service delivery.

Chapter 26 provides a detailed discussion of family violence and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.

Children and young people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities

The School Entrant Health Questionnaire showed that in 2014, 13.9 per cent of students were listed as having a language other than English compared with 82 per cent without.¹⁵⁸

There is little specific data on the number of children and young people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities who are affected by family violence.¹⁵⁹ However, there are a number of additional circumstances that can affect their experience of family violence and compound the trauma they suffer as a result. The Commission for Children and Young People told the Commission that these children and young people:

- ▷ can be further traumatised if they are relied on as an interpreter for their mother with police or other services
- ▷ might have witnessed violence in their country of origin
- ▷ might have been forced to flee their country of origin in dangerous circumstances and with an uncertain future
- ▷ might have lost their family networks, extended family and friends and the familiarity of their country of origin
- ▷ might have spent time in a refugee camp or detention centre
- ▷ might have become separated from parents or other family members on being accepted as a refugee.¹⁶⁰

In addition to family violence, children and young people from CALD communities often face other hurdles associated with relocating to a new country—for example, uncertain immigration status, learning a new language, establishing new friendships, learning new cultural norms, and adjusting to a different school system.¹⁶¹ They might also be subjected to racism, have a high degree of responsibility for younger siblings, and have a ‘general feeling of being caught between two worlds’.¹⁶² They need access to services that are both culturally appropriate and child or youth focused.¹⁶³

The Centre for Multicultural Youth submitted that adolescents from CALD backgrounds can face additional challenges associated with ‘the intersection of both adolescence and the broader challenging process of settling in a new country’.¹⁶⁴

A particular concern arises when young CALD people adapt more quickly than their parents to their new environment, for example, learning English at school and adopting values and modes of interaction that differ from those in their country of origin. This can change the power dynamic within families and ‘damage the pride of the adults’, who might use violence to exert control over their children.¹⁶⁵

As a result, the type of family violence these children and young people experience can be quite different from that experienced by other children and young people. The Centre for Multicultural Youth submitted that young CALD women have noted that the perpetrators of family violence against them are more likely to be brothers or fathers, rather than intimate partners.¹⁶⁶ For example, an older brother might adopt a violent disciplinary attitude because of culturally motivated concern about his sister’s behaviour.¹⁶⁷ The mother might be unable to intervene for a variety of reasons, among them feelings of disempowerment associated with parenting in a new culture, and being fearful of trying to gain access to support services.¹⁶⁸ This can have implications for the accessibility of specialist family violence services, which ‘generally target women who are in intimate partner relationships’.¹⁶⁹

The State-wide Children’s Resource Program submitted that solutions need to:

Strengthen the capacity to advocate for the specific needs and resources of children from migrant and refugee families ... use culturally competent practices in supporting children, cultural diversification of the workforce [and] use the expertise of those belonging to particular cultural groups to address family violence.¹⁷⁰

The experiences of culturally and linguistically diverse communities are considered further in Chapter 28.

Young people who are same-sex attracted and gender diverse

In common with adults, same-sex attracted and gender diverse young people are vulnerable to particular types of family violence such as 'outing' violence (the threat of being outed or actually being outed), the withholding of hormones and/or HIV medication, and subjection to psychological, emotional or physical violence in relation to coming out.¹⁷¹

A 2010 study showed that 61 per cent of 3400 same-sex attracted and gender diverse young people surveyed had experienced verbal abuse because of homophobia and 18 per cent had experienced physical abuse; 24 per cent who had experienced abuse because of homophobia were abused at home.¹⁷²

A 2014 study showed there is a link between families' rejection and youth homelessness, disrupted schooling, and suicidal ideation.¹⁷³ Discrimination, shame and abuse can also place young people at greater risk of harmful or exploitative relationships.¹⁷⁴ In addition, same-sex attracted and gender diverse young people can have greater difficulty gaining access to support services as a result of discrimination or lack of staff sensitivity and can also feel uncomfortable in refuges because of homophobic or transphobic views among other residents.¹⁷⁵ They are 'more inclined to sleep rough because of a fear of facing discrimination, homophobia and violence at homeless shelters'.¹⁷⁶

These issues are discussed in more detail in Chapter 30.

Children and young people with disabilities

Children with disabilities are more likely to be victims of family violence—particularly sexual abuse.¹⁷⁷ There is evidence that the prevalence of maltreatment of children with disabilities is 3.4 times greater than that for children without disabilities.¹⁷⁸

My dad used to hit me with the strap. I was 14 when that stopped. Maybe it was my fault, I had an attitude problem. Or maybe because I'm different. I'm the only one in the family who has a learning disability. He didn't give the other children the strap as much.¹⁷⁹

Young women with disabilities are particularly vulnerable to violence by people they know, whether in their home, in schools, group homes, or supported accommodation, as well as to intimate partner violence.¹⁸⁰ One study showed that 90 per cent of women with an intellectual disability have been sexually abused.¹⁸¹

Children and young people with disabilities can have a variety of needs when seeking assistance from family violence services; for example, they might need short-term funds for disability-related support, such as attendant care, hire of equipment, Auslan interpreting or transport costs.¹⁸² In addition, children and young people with disabilities who are forced to leave their home as a result of family violence can be particularly vulnerable to the trauma associated with moving. The Safe Futures Foundation submitted:

Children with a disability are often attending schools that cater to their specific needs. Links to health agencies, home and community care responses, travel and other specialist community supports are also often key to the woman or child receiving the most appropriate support to meet their requirements. Change can be destabilising and supports almost impossible to link to if the family moves from their home and community.¹⁸³

Women with children who have a disability have greater difficulty gaining access to family violence services and refuges, which might not be able to cater to their needs.¹⁸⁴ Women with Disabilities Victoria noted the lack of appropriate refuge options for women and children with disabilities.¹⁸⁵ As one woman said, 'I would have had to give up my job, my house. I can't go to a shelter with a daughter who is bipolar'.¹⁸⁶ Melbourne City Mission noted:

The current supply of emergency accommodation (motel or secure women's refuge) does not have the capacity to physically accommodate women or children with high-support needs—for example, beds with hoists. The staffing model and practice model is not amenable to accompanying children with high physical and/or medical support needs (for example, children who require peg feeding) or children with behavioural support needs (for example, children with autism who have restricted and/or repetitive patterns of behaviour).¹⁸⁷

Young people with disabilities also face major barriers when seeking family violence services.¹⁸⁸ For example, if a young person with a disability is living in a violent household it might be difficult for them to find alternative accommodation that offers the supports needed to enable them to live independently. For young men with disabilities, crisis accommodation options can be even more limited.¹⁸⁹

The Commission was told that the Department of Education and Training does not collect data on out-of-home care status and disability.¹⁹⁰

The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria submitted that young people with disabilities are 'often sidelined from the planning of their own lives'¹⁹¹ and it is important that they receive the necessary supports and information to allow them to make their own decisions.¹⁹²

Chapter 31 provides a detailed discussion of family violence and people with disabilities.

Children and young people from rural, regional and remote communities

There are disproportionate impacts on kids that live outside of the inner metro area due to a dearth of services in the outer suburbs and regional areas.¹⁹³

Children and young people from rural, regional and remote communities are more likely to have witnessed family violence than children living in metropolitan areas.¹⁹⁴ Victoria Police records of family violence incidents where a child is present show a higher rate per 100,000 population in rural and regional areas, in particular the Western Region.¹⁹⁵

There is a lack of family violence services that have a specific focus on children and young people generally (as we discuss in the next section of this chapter), and this is especially the case in rural and regional communities.¹⁹⁶ The Commission was informed that, because of the severe lack of housing, few conditions requiring respondents to move out of the home, are included in intervention orders made in regional and remote communities.¹⁹⁷ This might arise from a concern that requiring respondents to move out of the family home could involve them having to move hundreds of kilometres in order to obtain affordable housing, resulting in loss of contact with children and difficulties with work.¹⁹⁸ On the other hand, if women and children are required to relocate in order to escape violence, this is highly disruptive.¹⁹⁹ Moving to metropolitan areas can also result in further trauma and isolation.²⁰⁰

Youthlaw noted that there are fewer youth services in rural, regional and remote areas, and young people in those areas face barriers to obtaining support services because of concerns about confidentiality in small communities.²⁰¹ The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria also submitted that the protective factors that could be present in young people's lives are compromised in young people in those areas because of shortages of infrastructure such as public transport and relatively limited options for education, employment and social activity.²⁰²

Geographical isolation can also exacerbate young women's vulnerability to family violence. Cobaw Community Health submitted:

Many women, particularly younger women, may not have a driving license making escaping Family Violence particularly problematic. We have seen cases where this significantly increases the risk to women and children experiencing Family Violence, particularly those in isolated areas characteristic of parts of our community.²⁰³

The Commission was also informed that inadequate court infrastructure and a lack of affordable and accessible child care in regional and remote areas result in children being present during intervention order application hearings.²⁰⁴ This can expose a child to the trauma of hearing the details of family violence incidents.²⁰⁵ The lack of dedicated children's spaces at court can also mean that children have informal contact with the perpetrator, which may be confusing for them, especially when they then enter the courtroom and are exposed to discussions about violence in their home.²⁰⁶

Chapter 16 discusses court infrastructure and children. Chapter 33 discusses family violence in rural, regional and remote communities.

Children and young people's resilience

The way each child or young person experiences family violence differs and is necessarily influenced by a variety of circumstances.²⁰⁷ The Commission was told that:

... exposure to domestic violence is not a homogenous one dimensional process where its impact can be neatly examined in isolation from other potential stressors. There is rarely a direct causal pathway to specific outcomes. It often occurs in combination with other factors such as child abuse, poverty, mental health or drug and alcohol issues. Also each child is unique and their reaction will vary according to age, gender, personality, role within the family, socioeconomic status and the frequency, nature and length of exposure to violence.²⁰⁸

The Commission was reminded that many children and young people display great resilience in the face of family violence, and it should not be assumed that they will fare worse than those who have not experienced such violence or that they will grow up to be perpetrators themselves.²⁰⁹ Research shows that at least one-third of children who experience family violence do just as well as children who have not experienced it.²¹⁰ Children's recovery from family violence has also been shown to improve the longer they are free from violence.²¹¹ The majority of children who experience family violence neither grow up to be perpetrators nor become victims in their adult relationships.²¹²

The Australian Institute of Family Studies explained that the correlation between childhood exposure to family violence and future perpetration of violence is likely to be attributable to several factors, rather than to childhood exposure alone. These are factors such as socio-economic disadvantage, parental mental ill-health and substance abuse,²¹³ gender roles and stereotypes and violence-supportive attitudes.²¹⁴ On the other hand, a number of factors can mitigate the effects of family violence, including the presence of a supportive adult or older sibling, and the mother's positive mental health.²¹⁵ Mothers play a vital role in mitigating the effects of family violence on their children:

Research has also indicated that children's ability to cope with the adversity of living in a violent home is linked to their mothers' ability to maintain mothering functions, to model assertive and nonviolent responses to abuse and to maintain positive mental health. High levels of extended familial and social support have also been demonstrated to positively impact children's coping capacity.²¹⁶

A woman told the Commission how she supported her children and ensured they maintained their education, despite their homelessness due to family violence:

I recall reiterating to my children at the time we were staying at the centre of the importance of their education. I couldn't promise that they would never be homeless again, but if they concentrated on their studies, and worked hard, and made the most of opportunities that come their way, there would be less likelihood that they would ever have to be homeless again. I also took the time to teach my boys that it is better to live like this than to live in fear from my husband and how very important it was to me that they never harm their wives/partners ... The children didn't miss any school (still attending their original school) during the 12 months of homelessness.²¹⁷

Identifying family violence against children and young people

Universal services are those that are available to all Victorians. Many staff in universal services, including registered doctors, nurses, midwives, early childhood teachers, school teachers and principals, are required to report risk of harm to children under the Children, Youth and Families Act.²¹⁸ Mandatory reporting to Child Protection is discussed in detail in Chapter 11.

The following discussion focuses on universal services that have the potential to play an important identification and early intervention role in relation to children and young people at risk of, or experiencing family violence, specifically early childhood services and schools.

Universal health services that work primarily with parents—such as antenatal care and child and maternal health services—are discussed in Chapter 19. In that chapter, the Commission recommends mandatory screening for family violence, which currently occurs in child and maternal health services, be extended to all public health antenatal care.

Early childhood services

The Department of Education and Training supports early childhood services for children from birth to age eight. These services include long day care, family day care, occasional care, playgroups, early childhood intervention professionals, school nurses, outside school hours care and kindergarten.²¹⁹ Maternal and child health nurses and enhanced maternal and child health nurses are also funded by the department.²²⁰

Early childhood services constitute one of the largest service systems working with families and young children.²²¹ The evidence presented to the Commission was that more than 1.57 million Australian children attend some form of government-funded early childhood service each year,²²² and in Victoria more than 1200 early childhood centres provide services to more than 270,000 children.²²³

The Victorian Government also funds Early Parenting Centres, which build parenting capacity, skills and knowledge, and support vulnerable parents to nurture and care for their children and build a secure attachment with them.²²⁴ Parenting Assessment and Skill Development Services, which are intensive parenting services for those involved with Child Protection, are also funded by the Victorian Government.²²⁵

Cradle to Kinder is another program that targets vulnerable mothers up to 25 years. We discuss these further in the section 'Parenting programs.'

Schools

It is critical for those caring and teaching children to understand the early signs of stress in children which could be related to the invisibility of Family Violence. All children's service areas should be able to recognise early signs of Family Violence and provide referral and support.²²⁶

The Commission heard examples of excellent practice in relation to identifying family violence in schools, effectively supporting both the children and the mother who is trying to protect them.

When I was pregnant with my fourth child, a teacher from my children's school made contact with me to ask about my five year old who was in prep. He had stopped talking during class and the teacher wasn't sure if he was learning the material being taught. The teacher asked my permission for him to see a counsellor, which I of course approved. Once the counselling session had been completed, the teacher phoned again and asked if they could interview his older brother. After this session, the school asked me to come to speak to them. At this point, I assumed it was in relation to strategies within both of the boys' education to assist my younger child to speak and learn in the classroom. When I attended the school, the counsellor started asking me questions based on answers the children had given during counselling and some pictures my children had drawn which depicted family violence. The counsellor asked me if my children had witnessed family violence in our house, such as my husband pulling me by the hair, or throwing food at me.²²⁷

The children had given detailed descriptions of what they had witnessed and as it was being relayed to me I felt my sad secret was now not only about me. I then realised that they had been witnessing the violent behaviour that my husband was perpetrating and it was affecting them. I broke down in tears as I felt I had let the children down, as it was my role as a mother to provide for and protect these children. I felt I had let them down, that I had failed to some degree. I realised that whilst my husband only occasionally hit our children, they were also affected emotionally by the abuse that was occurring to me.²²⁸

In this particular case the school provided the children's mother with a referral to a refuge and a women's information service helpline. While she initially did not make contact with either of these services, this interaction with the school counsellor was the first time she became aware that the violence perpetrated against her was also greatly affecting her children. This was one of a few points of intervention that culminated in the mother and her children becoming safe.²²⁹

The Commission was told about a number of existing processes, resources and protocols in schools that could be used to strengthen the response to family violence.

Primary school nursing services use the School Entrant Health Questionnaire to identify possible exposure to family violence.²³⁰ The School Entrant Health Questionnaire asks questions relating to abuse of a parent or child and about children or parents 'witnessing' violence.²³¹

Where issues concerning violence are identified, the nurse will facilitate referrals to school support services, local family support agencies or health practitioners.²³² In 2014, 6774 disclosures were made.²³³

The department provides resources and guidelines for staff that set out their responsibilities in responding to risks of harm to children, which includes child abuse and family violence.²³⁴ As noted elsewhere, teachers (including early childhood teachers) are mandatory reporters under Victoria's child protection legislation and so have an obligation to report a reasonable belief that a child may have suffered, or is reasonably likely to suffer, significant harm arising from physical injury or sexual abuse and their parents have not protected, or are unlikely to protect them.²³⁵

In 2013–14 the category of 'education notifier' types reported 15,510 cases to Child Protection of which 4784 had family violence indicated.²³⁶

As discussed in Chapter 6 the Department of Education and Training has an online training tool for teachers and school staff on their mandatory reporting obligations.²³⁷ This training module must be undertaken every year by all teachers and principals registered by the Victorian Institute of Teaching and includes how to identify child abuse, family violence and neglect, how to manage disclosures and how to make a report.²³⁸ The Commission has noted some concerns about the quality of the training and the extent to which staff feel confident to make referrals in respect of their mandatory reporting obligations in Chapter 36.

The department also employs, funds and sets policy and guidelines for wellbeing staff and allied health professionals in government schools.²³⁹

Health and wellbeing staff and services in government schools

- ▶ Student Support Services staff assist children and young people who face learning barriers. They provide individual and group-based support and workforce capacity building and include psychologists, guidance officers, speech pathologists, social workers and visiting teachers.²⁴⁰
- ▶ The Primary School Nursing Program, where primary school nurses visit schools during the year to identify children with potential health-related learning difficulties and to respond to parent and carer concerns about their child's health and wellbeing.²⁴¹ It provides links to community-based health and wellbeing services.²⁴²
- ▶ The Secondary School Nursing Program is in about two-thirds of government secondary schools. The program's objectives include improving health and reducing risk-taking behaviour among young people, including drug and alcohol abuse, eating disorders, obesity, depression and suicide.²⁴³
- ▶ The Primary Welfare Officer Initiative supports students who are at risk of disengagement and not achieving their educational potential. It works in collaboration with students and parents, school staff including principals, teachers, aides, specialist staff, nurses and student support services officers and with broader community agencies.²⁴⁴
- ▶ Student Welfare Coordinators support students in handling issues such as truancy, bullying, drug use and depression.²⁴⁵
- ▶ Koorie Education Coordinators and Koorie Engagement Support Officers are located in each departmental regional office and provide advice about supporting Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander students at school and facilitate links to local and regional resources.²⁴⁶

The Commission was initially informed that there was no data available on the number of students individually assisted by primary school welfare officers, student support officers or student welfare coordinators, or primary school nurses or secondary school nurses where family violence was flagged, although instances of family violence could be collected from case notes.²⁴⁷ In Student Support Services, in June 2013–14, 287 students had 'family violence' mentioned in the case notes and 280 were mentioned in case notes from June 2014–15.²⁴⁸

However, a family violence 'tag' was made available in December 2014.²⁴⁹ Since then, schools used this indicator in 498 referrals for 496 students for June 2015 to mid-October 2015, indicating that the case notes may under-report family violence.²⁵⁰

The Department of Education and Training, Department of Health and Human Services (Child Protection), licensed children's services and Victorian schools (including Catholic, independent schools and government schools) have a joint protocol on protecting the safety of children and young people.²⁵¹ There is also a partnering agreement between DHHS, the Catholic Education Commission of Victoria and Independent Schools Victoria, which outlines strategies to support the needs of children and young people in out-of-home care in the years they attend school.²⁵² There is a similar agreement in place at the early childhood education level.²⁵³

The Commission understands that DET has established the LOOKOUT program (the pilot starting early 2016 in south-western Victoria and the remaining three centres to be established for the start of the 2017 school year, pending evaluation)²⁵⁴ to support the educational needs of children in out-of-home care.²⁵⁵

LOOKOUT Centres will perform a critical advocacy, support and entitlement function by securing the rights and best outcomes for children and young people in Out of Home Care (OoHC) within the education system. In essence, LOOKOUT Centres will ensure the role of the State as a corporate parent for children and young people in OoHC.²⁵⁶

The Commission was also told that the Victorian Government has funded the Navigator program for 2015–16 to 2016–17, which is a service-based program to be delivered by schools and community agencies 'to provide outreach, follow-up, advocacy, and pathway planning support to young people aged 12 to 17 years who are not connected to schools at all, or who are at risk of disengaging'.²⁵⁷

Beyond early childhood, health and educational services there are a range of other services that play a role in identifying family violence. These include child and family welfare services, such as Child Protection and Child FIRST, which are charged with assisting families experiencing difficulties that may be impacting on their child's development. As part of their work, these services play a role in identifying children at risk of or experiencing family violence and then working with those families. We discuss Child Protection in Chapter 11. Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services are discussed later in the chapter.

Vulnerable Children's Strategy 2013–2022

The need for universal services to improve their capacity to assist vulnerable children is highlighted in Victoria's Vulnerable Children's Strategy 2013–2022, which states:

Schools, health services, early childhood services and other services need to foster safe, inclusive environments to enable the identification of family or child vulnerabilities and the provision of positive interventions.²⁵⁸

The strategy's second goal is to 'act earlier when children are vulnerable': 'the earlier we can respond to child vulnerability, the more effective that intervention is likely to be'.²⁵⁹

One of the initiatives designed to support the strategy is the establishment of Children and Youth Area Partnerships in 17 multi-local government areas across the state.²⁶⁰ The Commission was told these are being tested at eight sites (starting in mid-2014).²⁶¹

Parenting programs

Programs for vulnerable mothers

Parenting is crucial in children's development, particularly in the first three years of a child's life, when a child's language acquisition, cognitive development, sense of self and security, emotional regulation and ability to form relationships are shaped by parenting.²⁶² Practitioners highlighted the importance of programs that focus on developing parental coping skills.²⁶³

The Commission heard that some specialist programs are demonstrating good outcomes. The Commission also heard about the importance of consistent, flexible support; the importance of culturally competent programs; and of the need for more targeted programs and supports where there has been intergenerational trauma.²⁶⁴

The Commission heard the following initiatives play an important role in supporting women antenatally and postnatally who have experienced, or are at risk of experiencing family violence. Unlike the Turtle Program described later in this chapter, these are not family violence-specific but many of the young women who use them are likely to be at risk of, or have experienced family violence.

The Cradle to Kinder program for vulnerable young mothers (under 25) is described later in this section.²⁶⁵ It is one of a number of services funded by DHHS that are designed to help young vulnerable parents during the early years. Others include Early Parenting Centres and Parent Assessment and Skills Development services (see next page). The Commission notes that there are some Commonwealth parenting support programs that operate alongside the state-funded ones, for example the Children and Parenting Support services, which 'have a primary focus on children aged 0–12 years and provide support to children and families based on an early intervention and prevention approach'.²⁶⁶

Mallee District Aboriginal Services and Queen Elizabeth Centre's Bumps to Babes and Beyond program for pregnant young Aboriginal women and Aboriginal Cradle to Kinder initiatives are discussed further in Chapter 26.²⁶⁷

Parenting programs for vulnerable families

DHHS funds programs that specifically help build the parenting capacity of vulnerable families, including:

- ▶ Early parenting centres. These build parenting capacity, skills and knowledge to support vulnerable parents to nurture, care and build a secure attachment with their children.²⁶⁸ The assistance is provided either through a residential service, a day stay service or help in the parent's own home.
- ▶ Parenting Assessment and Skills Development. This is an intensive specialist parenting service for parents of children aged up to three years who are involved with child protection. The service helps parents to develop their skills, knowledge and capacity to safely care for and nurture their children.²⁶⁹
- ▶ Enhanced Maternal and Child Health. This provides a more intensive level of support, including short-term case management, particularly for those vulnerable children and families where there are multiple risk factors.²⁷⁰
- ▶ Parentline Victoria. This is a statewide telephone counselling service to parents and carers of children aged from birth to 18 years operating from 8.00 am to midnight, seven days a week. This is funded by the Department of Education and Training.²⁷¹

Cradle to Kinder

Cradle to Kinder is an intensive ante and postnatal support service that provides longer term intensive family and early parenting help for vulnerable young pregnant women aged under 25 years—targeting young mothers who are or have been in out-of-home care, Aboriginal women and women who have learning difficulties—working with them until their child reaches four years of age.²⁷²

There are currently 10 programs (six programs, including one Aboriginal program were introduced in early 2012 with a further six (including another Aboriginal program) announced in January 2014).²⁷³ In 2013–14 the service's budget was approximately $4.3 million for 220 clients/families.²⁷⁴

The program aims to build the capacity of parents to provide for their children's health, safety and development, and to build their own self-reliance and sustainability through access to education, vocational training and employment. The service is flexible, providing help through a combination of individual and group services that can be delivered in the young woman's home, the agency or in the community.²⁷⁵

While not family violence-specific, the Cradle to Kinder program recognises that family violence is one of the factors that would be experienced by its target group. Program guidelines emphasise the importance of family violence risk assessment and risk management, and encourage staff to consult with specialist family violence services. One of the program's outcome measures is a reduction in (or absence of) family violence incidents.²⁷⁶

The Commission was told by Dr Miller that programs such as Cradle to Kinder are having very positive outcomes and that the program demonstrated the importance of early intervention.²⁷⁷ Dr Miller observed that:

These targeted family services can be circuit breakers for intergenerational patterns of violence and positively interrupt vicious cycles of abuse and neglect of children.²⁷⁸

Dr Miller went on to note some of the valued features of the program, including consistent flexible support that was practical and home-based, and called for an expansion of such services, arguing that although they are seen as more expensive, this was a 'small price to pay' compared to the social, health and economic costs of a child being subjected to family violence.²⁷⁹

An evaluation of the first six Cradle to Kinder programs is under way.²⁸⁰ The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children has recommended that the program be retained and permanently integrated into the service system. It also made suggestions for further developing the program including making it available to women who do not presently satisfy the program criteria (for example, victims of family violence referred by Maternal and Child Health) and improving coordination between the program and local specialist family violence services.²⁸¹

Programs for expectant and new parents

Professor Mark Feinberg, Prevention Research Centre, Pennsylvania State University, gave evidence regarding the Family Foundations program in the United States which aims to support expectant parents in gaining the knowledge and skills necessary for a transition to parenthood.²⁸² Professor Feinberg stated that while the program was not originally designed to address issues of family violence, by focusing on strengthening co-parenting support, this has contributed to lower levels of such violence.²⁸³

In a local example, the Baby Makes 3 program was developed by Whitehorse Community Health Service (now Carrington Health). The program is designed to effect cultural change between new parents in relation to their attitudes about gender roles and responsibilities.²⁸⁴ It targets first time parents with babies under 12 months. Both parents attend with their baby and the program addresses issues such as the transition to parenthood, gender expectations, division of household labour and equality as the basis for a healthy relationship. It consists of three two-hour evening sessions over three weeks.²⁸⁵

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children noted that while an important step, three group work sessions directed towards fathers within a 'respectful and equal relationship' model provides only 'one spoke in what should be a complex wheel of inter-connected parenting services.'²⁸⁶

The program has now been evaluated across a number of sites.²⁸⁷ Ms Julianne Brennan, Director the Community Crime Prevention Unit, Department of Justice and Regulation, gave evidence that the evaluation has indicated some confusion among facilitators about the aims of the program and whether it is a violence prevention program or a parenting program.²⁸⁸

The Chief Executive Officer of Carrington Health, Ms Ronda Jacobs, stated Baby Makes 3 is designed to be a mainstream program for first time parents, and not a program for parents who are at risk of, or known to be experiencing family violence, with those parents needing to receive the support of specialist services.²⁸⁹

Programs targeted at fathers

Early Childhood Australia submitted that for men new parenthood is a time that they may be more open to receiving information and skills development, as well as to considering alternative models of masculinity as they move into a new parental role.

It is important to promote a greater role for fathers in the day-to-day care of their children including nurture, care, respect and equality to challenge dominant notions of masculinity which play a key role in men's violence against women. There is some research which suggests that engaging men in their children's lives can reduce the risk of family violence.²⁹⁰

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children also noted research on engaging men as fathers through parenting programs as showing potential in preventing child maltreatment.²⁹¹

The Commission heard about a number of current programs targeted at fathers that currently exist. These are outlined in Table 10.1. Some are focused specifically on men who have perpetrated family violence, while others work more generally with men as an early intervention strategy. Others are culturally specific. This is not an exhaustive list. Perpetrator programs for fathers are also discussed in Chapter 18.

Further research being led by Professor Cathy Humphreys, Professor of Social Work at University of Melbourne, will provide advice about practice guidance in working with men to improve the safety of women and children where there is family violence.²⁹²

Table 10.1 Examples of programs for fathers

Aboriginal Fathers Forum	The Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited is planning an Aboriginal Fathers Forum, which will be a group discussion amongst Aboriginal men and some women 'to yarn about parenting, being a dad and strengthening current and future relationships'. ²⁹³
Active Fathers	Kildonan Uniting Care partners with the City of Moreland, City of Hume and Merri Community Health to deliver Active Fathers, a program that engages new parents, and in particular fathers, in groups to discuss infant needs, the impact of a new baby on the relationship of the parents and dealing with the challenges faced by new parents. It focuses on promoting respectful and equitable relationships between parents and promoting infant development and wellbeing. ²⁹⁴
Children's Protection Society	The Fathers Support Service Team 'works with vulnerable men and their families to encourage, promote and enhance the positive parenting involvement of fathers and/or male carers'. CPS also facilitates 'I'm a Dad' antenatal education program for first-time fathers who are registered at the Northern Hospital. ²⁹⁵
Dads Putting Kids First	This program has been developed by Anglicare Victoria and is available to fathers who have completed men's behaviour change programs. ²⁹⁶ This program aims to teach men about using reparative parenting techniques, after they have ceased their violent behaviour. Anglicare Victoria stated that the program has been found to be effective in an evaluation. ²⁹⁷

Services that work with families

Children and young people can come into contact with services as a result of family violence in a number of ways. Police may attend a family violence incident in which a child or young person is present and make a referral to a service or services; a parent may apply for a family violence intervention order in court; a child, young person or parent may disclose family violence to a specialist family violence service or universal service. Young people may leave the family home on their own and seek assistance from various service providers, or they may be victims of intimate partner violence.

In this section we describe some of the key services that come into contact with children and young people experiencing family violence, noting that in many cases it is not the child, but the parent or whole family that is the 'client'. This is a theme we will return to later in this chapter.

Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services

Integrated Family Services is the major program responsible for responding to vulnerable families where there are issues affecting children's development. As a result they have the capacity to play a key role in responding to family violence. In this section we describe their work, and the prevalence of family violence in their current practice.

In this report the term 'Integrated Family Services' refers to those child and family services that provide direct assistance to vulnerable children and their families. Child FIRST provides the intake function to Integrated Family Services.

These services are also discussed in Chapters 8 and 13. In particular, Chapter 13 explores how these services intersect with specialist family violence services, demand generated by police and child protection referrals, and how they might be further integrated into the formal family violence system (alongside police, courts and specialist family violence services).

Service profile

In 2013–14 there were 96 community-based child and family services registered and funded by the Department of Health and Human Services to provide Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services in Victoria.²⁹⁸ In the 2013–14 budget, $84 million was allocated to Integrated Family Services including $9.7 million for Child FIRST.²⁹⁹

Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services are designed to assist families when a child's safety, stability or development is affected by factors such as:

- ▷ significant parenting problems that may be affecting the child's development
- ▷ serious family conflict, including family breakdown
- ▷ families under pressure due to a family member's physical or mental illness, substance abuse, disability or bereavement
- ▷ young, isolated and/or unsupported families
- ▷ significant social or economic disadvantage that may adversely impact on a child's care or development.³⁰⁰

Child FIRST, the intake component of the Integrated Family Services system, provides a central referral point to a range of community-based family services and other programs within each of the 23 Child FIRST catchment areas across Victoria. Child FIRST receives referrals directly from families, as well as concerned third parties on behalf of families.³⁰¹ It also receives some police L17 referrals. In 2013–14, 1901 L17 referrals were made by the police to Child FIRST.³⁰² Child FIRST provides information about relevant services, and assessments of children's and families' needs and risks to help determine what services are required. It also makes referrals to relevant agencies, if necessary.³⁰³

One important service that Child FIRST refers families to is the family services program. As family services provide the majority of services, the terms family services and Integrated Family Services are often used interchangeably.

Family services provide assistance to those families that are:

- ▷ likely to experience greater challenges because the child or young person's development has been affected by the experience of risk factors and/or cumulative harm
- ▷ at risk of concerns escalating and becoming involved with Child Protection if problems are not addressed.³⁰⁴

The services work with families to enhance parenting capacity and skills, parent–child relationships, child development, and social connectedness. This assistance may include counselling, as well as in-home support and group work, and may also include secondary consultations with other services.

In each of the 23 Child FIRST catchments there are also community-based child protection practitioners. Their role is to assist with the identification of cases and referrals between Child Protection and Integrated Family Services, provide consultation on specific cases, build the capacity of Integrated Family Services workers and work in partnership with Integrated Family Services to engage families as appropriate, including through joint visits.³⁰⁵

All Integrated Family Services operate under 'best interests principles' which are defined in the Children, Youth and Families Act.³⁰⁶

The Commission received a range of estimates about the extent to which family violence accounts for the work of Integrated Family Services programs. As noted elsewhere in this report, the Victorian Government's advice regarding the costs attributable to family violence indicates that 41 per cent of Child FIRST and 34 per cent of family services cases had family violence flagged in the database.³⁰⁷ However, some submissions indicated that family violence was even more highly represented amongst those families accessing Integrated Family Services.³⁰⁸ A KPMG evaluation found that, in the 12 months to March 2010, around 28 per cent of families accessing Integrated Family Services were experiencing family violence.³⁰⁹

Direct work with children

It is important to note that Integrated Family Services is not designed to be a crisis service in the same way that specialist family violence services are.

The Commission heard that Integrated Family Services programs largely focus on enhancing the capacity of parent(s), both in terms of skills and confidence, to meet their child's developmental needs.

The outcomes we seek to achieve with our families include increased parenting confidence, safety, stability and healthy development, improved overall health, connectedness to community, improved family relationships and resilience.³¹⁰

Its focus is on advocating for the baby/toddler and improving the skills of the parents/ carers in order to achieve the best outcome for the baby/toddler.³¹¹

The Commission heard of a number of Integrated Family Services programs that focused on repairing and strengthening the relationship between a mother and her child, in recognition that perpetrators frequently target a woman in her mothering role, which may impair the mother-child bond.³¹²

Specialist family violence services

The role of specialist family violence services is discussed in detail in Chapter 8. This section briefly describes current service provision that is specific to children. It does not consider children's experiences in women's refuges and crisis accommodation as these are discussed in Chapter 9. However, young people's experiences in youth refuges, including that of young women fleeing intimate partner violence, are discussed below in the section entitled 'Lack of accommodation for children and young people'.

The Commission understands that some services have carved out resources from their funding to employ child-specific workers or activities, or sought philanthropic funding to run such programs. The Commission also heard that some services used to run specific activities or designate staff whose sole focus is on children, however due to resource constraints these roles have ceased.³¹³ Training courses are also provided by Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria on topics such as 'How to talk to babies in refuge, or the counselling room' and 'Adopting child-led practice'.³¹⁴

At a system level there are three programs that are relevant, although none are solely for children experiencing family violence. Some are for all children who are homeless and some are also for women who are victims of family violence. Across these programs some practitioners are located inside specialist family violence services, others are located in organisations that provide multiple services to families to children. Some are funded under the homelessness stream and others are funded under child protection and family services funding. These are described in the next section.

The only family violence-specific program, Family Violence Support Services, is also referred to as the family violence counselling program, described further below.

Some of the other counselling initiatives described to the Commission include the child-focused counselling and support team and Beyond the Violence, both provided by Anglicare.³¹⁵

There are also activities that sit outside government-funded programs. For example, the Alannah and Madeline Foundation has a Children Ahead intensive case management program to help children to recover from violence and build resilience. Case management is for up to two years and includes ways to maintain and improve their children's health, overcoming education obstacles, developing social skills and parenting support.³¹⁶

Family Violence Support Services (counselling)

Also referred to as the Family Violence Counselling Program, this program aims to help women and/or their children experiencing or recovering from family violence to enhance their safety, confidence, life skills and independence.³¹⁷ Services include individual and group counselling, support and case coordination.

DHHS requires that a minimum of 30 per cent of counselling and support funds are allocated specifically for the provision of services to children and young people.³¹⁸ In 2013-14, 1,891 or 41 per cent of cases involving specialist counselling and support services related to children.³¹⁹

Regional Children's Resource Program

The aim of this program is to improve service delivery for children and young people accessing homelessness and family violence services with their family.³²⁰ Funded by DHHS, there are 10 children's resource worker positions across the state and one children's resource worker for local Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities in Bendigo.³²¹

These staff provide resources, training, information and secondary consultation to homelessness practitioners (including specialist family violence services and advocates) on a broad level to raise awareness of the issues facing children and young people experiencing homelessness and/or family violence.³²²

They also manage brokerage support funds to assist children and young people to engage in and maintain their education and facilitate access to social, recreational and support opportunities in their community.³²³ In 2013–14 the program had brokerage funds of $136,574 across the state.³²⁴

Homeless Children's Specialist Support Service

This program was established through the initial National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness.³²⁵ It is unique because the child or young person is the primary client.

Located in four service locations with a total budget of $1.7 million in 2013–14,³²⁶ it provides direct assistance to children and young people aged up to 18 years who have experienced homelessness. The assistance is in the form of intensive one-on-one case management support, therapeutic group work and psychological support.³²⁷ In addition, funding is provided for one service specifically for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children in Gippsland.³²⁸

A 2013 review found the program's achievements included a decrease in the evidence of trauma in children, an increase in family members' capacity to communicate with each other, a greater awareness among agencies of the importance of a focus on children, development of partnerships with schools and local government, and cross agency relationships through co-location and co-case management.³²⁹ The report also noted that the key elements for success include:

- ▷ child-specific services need to be trauma-informed in their design and delivery
- ▷ strong partnerships with specialist children services such as Child FIRST and Child Protection
- ▷ group work, noting that children particularly value peer-to-peer relationships.³³⁰

Challenges included addressing competing interests of multiple siblings and parents, accessing services and treatment support to respond to children's sexualised behaviour and trauma-related issues, and engagement with the education sector.³³¹

Hanover Welfare Services—now Launch Housing—undertook an evaluation of its HCSSS program. The evaluation recommended that the HCSSS program employ a child psychologist/family therapist within the team, given the long waiting list that currently exists for child and adolescent mental health services.³³² The Commission understands that in response, Hanover introduced this as a further stream in its program but it is not known to what extent other HCSSS programs include this element.

Therapeutic supports

Therapeutic care: a definition

Berry Street defines 'therapeutic care' as intensive support for carers and children that aims 'to provide reparative experiences that promote healing and recovery'.³³³ Rather than providing basic care and managing behaviour, therapeutic care emphasises relationships and considers and responds to the child's underlying needs.³³⁴

There are some intensive supports available to children and young people. Below we describe:

- ▷ Take Two, a statewide therapeutic program coordinated by Berry Street Childhood Institute for children and young people in the child protection system
- ▷ Turtle Program, a therapeutic program specifically for children and young people who have experienced family violence who do not meet the criteria for statutory services. This works with children and their mothers.

Other therapeutic services funded by the Victorian Government (but not family violence-specific) include mental health clinical services such as Children and Adolescent Mental Health Services, Orygen Youth Health and a number of youth services.³³⁵ Most Centres against Sexual Assault provide services for children and young people. The Gatehouse Centre, funded as a CASA, is solely for children and young people and covers the north-western metropolitan area of Melbourne.³³⁶ DHHS also funds Therapeutic Residential Care³³⁷ and Therapeutic Foster Care for children and young people on statutory child protection orders who are unable to live safely with their family.³³⁸

The benefit of trauma-based responses designed specifically for children and young people, along with gaps in current provision is discussed in 'Challenges and opportunities'.

The Turtle Program

The Berry Street Turtle Program is a small therapeutic service, which focuses on mother-child attachment and supporting the mother-child relationship as an effective vehicle for children's healing. The Turtle Program is delivered as part of Berry Street's women's specialist family violence service.³³⁹

It is an example of a therapeutic program specifically for children and young people who have experienced family violence who do not meet the criteria for statutory, clinical or associated therapeutic services but who nonetheless may still suffer symptoms of distress and trauma.³⁴⁰

Ms Emma Toone, Senior Clinician, Turtle Program, Northern Family and Domestic Violence Service, Berry Street, gave evidence that programs that link risk management with therapeutic mother-child support can keep women and children safe, while noting that engaging women to support them in their role as a mother and talk about their child's needs is a challenge, as some women may feel the best way to protect themselves and their child is to hide.³⁴¹

Ms Toone went on to note the key features of children's family violence services, which include the capacity to respond to children's relationships; the ability to respond to the trauma that children and parents have experienced; and the ability to do specialised risk assessment, especially post-separation where children may have contact with their father but there is little capacity to assess the risk or intervene with the father.³⁴² She stated:

What we are really missing are services that have Specialised Family Violence Risk Assessment capacity and the capacity to work with children and their relationships in a trauma informed way.³⁴³

Take Two

Take Two is an intensive therapeutic program for children and young people in the child protection system who have suffered trauma, neglect and disrupted attachment.³⁴⁴ Some children will be living away from their family but others will still be with their parent(s) and so potentially still experiencing family violence.

An evaluation found that between January 2004 and June 2007, of 1034 children referred to Take Two, 67 per cent had been exposed to family violence.³⁴⁵

The program is delivered by Berry Street Childhood Institute in partnership with the Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency. There are Take Two teams in rural and metropolitan areas as well as some statewide teams such as the Aboriginal team and in Secure Welfare.

Take Two employs psychologists, social workers, nurses and other mental health workers as well as researchers and trainers to build and share knowledge. Following an assessment, an intervention can involve working directly with the child or young person by themselves, with the parent or carer or with others. Take Two also provides consultation, training and guidance to other services.

Ms Beth Allen, Assistant Director, Child Protection Unit, Statutory and Forensic Services Design Branch, Department of Health and Human Services, gave evidence that while the program was 'sizeable' and funded to assist just under 300 clients at any one time, the program constantly reprioritised, with estimated waiting times of three to six months.³⁴⁶

Challenges and opportunities

In this section the Commission reviews the evidence it received regarding the adequacy of response across a number of sectors, before considering specific issues regarding the responses to trauma experienced by children and young people associated with family violence. In the final part of this section we examine in depth the experiences and barriers faced by young people seeking assistance due to family violence.

Children and young people as ‘silent’ victims of family violence

I am a victim of Domestic Violence, where is my real protection? My voice is ignored. My requests are ignored. My doctor and psychologist wrote to the court for me and they were ignored. I spoke to so many people but they have been ignored. How can this be good for children? This has to change for children like me to be safe. My father would record conversations and video us secretly often, on his phone, that I would delete but what do I do to protect myself from this? What rights do I have?³⁴⁷

There needs to be a change, it is easier to build a child than to repair an adult. Children should have the right to a loving relationship without fear, without abuse and without psychological damage. Children have the right to be heard and be involved in decisions that affect them.³⁴⁸

The Commission received a large number of submissions describing the devastating effects of family violence on children.³⁴⁹ Despite this, children are also described as the ‘forgotten’³⁵⁰ or ‘silent’ victims.³⁵¹ This is because family violence services have historically focused on the safety and wellbeing of women (or women and their children). One of the consequences is that there is a significant gap in targeted responses for children and young people.³⁵²

The Commission was also told that although there is a strong evidence base about the physiological, psychological and emotional impacts of family violence on children, knowledge of family violence has not been fully incorporated in the practices of universal services and family violence is not fully understood by professionals who have direct contact with children.³⁵³ As a result, many services—legal, police, educational, medical, psychological, and so on—do not effectively support children who have experienced family violence.³⁵⁴ Other submissions indicated that even where universal services do identify signs of family violence, adequate measures are not always taken to ensure a response.³⁵⁵

It is increasingly recognised that children are not ‘passive’ witnesses or secondary victims and that the impacts of family violence on them are profound—even when they are not directly targeted or do not see or hear the violence.³⁵⁶ Nevertheless, the Commission was told that children’s voices are still infrequently heard, and too often ‘we rely on the voice of workers and mothers over what children and even infants may tell us’.³⁵⁷ Ms Wendy Bunston, senior clinical mental health social worker, family therapist, infant mental health specialist and PhD candidate at La Trobe University, gave evidence that ‘there is little to no research about understanding the impact of family violence from the young child’s perspective’ and ‘no research on an infant’s experience or perspective to living in a home with family violence’.³⁵⁸

Ms Anita Morris, PhD Candidate at the University of Melbourne, gave evidence about a recent Victorian study entitled Safety and Resilience at Home: Voices of Children from a Primary Care Population.³⁵⁹ The project involved interviews and focus groups with 18 mothers and 23 children, and it was found that children are ‘rarely asked by professionals about their experiences of family violence and have limited input into decisions that affect their actual safety, and their feelings of safety’.³⁶⁰ Ms Morris also gave evidence that children often have useful knowledge to contribute to their safety and that allowing them to do so makes them feel more in control and supported.³⁶¹

Merri Outreach and Support Service submitted that a ‘cultural shift’ is necessary to ensure that children’s independent needs are considered.³⁶²

Young people fall through the gap

The Commission was also told that adolescents are vulnerable to ‘invisibility’ in the family violence system.³⁶³ Although still under the age of 18 years, they can be forced to leave their home unaccompanied by a parent but might not fall into the well-recognised category of ‘women and their children’ for the purpose of gaining access to family violence services.³⁶⁴ In 2013–14, of 33,684 Victorian women who came into contact with homelessness services and who were in need of assistance from domestic violence services, 11 per cent ($n=3084$) were not provided with this service. The age groups with the largest percentage with an unmet need for assistance from domestic violence services were 18 to 19 year olds (17 per cent, $n=141$) 15 to 17 year olds (17 per cent, $n=102$) and 20 to 24 year olds (14 per cent, $n=438$).³⁶⁵

Melbourne City Mission submitted that some child protection workers consider young people aged 15–17 years ‘old enough to look after themselves’ and so less in need of protection after experiencing family violence.³⁶⁶ The subject was also raised during community consultations: ‘Child Protection won’t pick up on kids 15 and over (unless there are younger siblings)—those kids end up homeless and/or in foster care.’³⁶⁷ The result is that young people experiencing family violence can be ‘too old’ for Child Protection but too young to have access to family violence services, and youth refuges might not be family violence-aware.

Where services do exist, they are not always appropriate for young people.³⁶⁸ For example, workers might not be trained to support young people.³⁶⁹

The Commission was told that the result of these deficiencies is that young people seeking assistance from the specialist family violence sector are referred to a youth homelessness service as ‘the default response’.³⁷⁰ The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria told the Commission:

There is an urgent need for age-appropriate supports, ranging from legal assistance to therapeutic care, for young people who have experienced family violence and relationship violence.³⁷¹

The evidence presented to the Commission was that failure to provide services that are accessible to young people and that reflect their specific needs can have serious implications for a young person’s safety and wellbeing and can lead to an entrenched cycle of violence into adulthood.³⁷²

The potential of early childhood and school settings

The National Children’s Commissioner in her Children’s Rights Report 2015 noted the importance of the first 1000 days between conception and the age of two as a time for early intervention across a number of domains, including family violence.³⁷³

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children submitted that ‘the prime time for engagement lies in pregnancy and following the birth of the baby’³⁷⁴ and cited a 2000 report by the National Research Council and the Institute of Medicine that showed intervention early in a child’s life offers cost benefits ‘not only in terms of dollars invested early but in terms of the long-term wellbeing of children.’³⁷⁵

Professor Newman told the Commission that it is ‘essential to identify infants with risk factors impacting growth and development including those with sensory problems, neurological conditions and those experiencing trauma and neglect’.³⁷⁶ Although there is not yet clear evidence on whether neurological changes in a child’s first three to four years of life can be reversed, it is nevertheless important to intervene early.³⁷⁷

Professor Newman gave further evidence that current antenatal systems are not good at identifying family violence and that there should be ‘more systematic ways of identifying family violence experienced by pregnant women’.³⁷⁸ In view of the nature of their work, these health professionals could play an important role in identifying children, and even unborn babies, affected by family violence or at risk of experiencing it and providing support for them and their mothers.³⁷⁹ In Chapter 19 of this report the Commission recommends that family violence screening be mandatory in public antenatal services.

Others noted that early childhood settings are viewed as non-threatening and non-stigmatising as they are not perceived as 'welfare', and are therefore in an ideal position to act as an important entry point to the broader service system.³⁸⁰ It was argued that people working in early childhood services often form trusting relationships with one or both parents and can detect subtle changes in families and children; they are thus in a good position to act as a gateway, or 'soft access point', and make suitable referrals for families experiencing violence.³⁸¹

The evidence before the Commission was, however, that early childhood educators need to improve their understanding of the prevalence of family violence and the impact of such violence on children. Early Childhood Australia submitted that workers currently receive very limited family violence training, despite the fact that families with young children are at greater risk of family violence.³⁸² Goodstart Early Learning submitted:

Once it has been identified that a child has experienced trauma associated with family violence, more could ... be done to ensure that educators understand the impacts on children and the implications for their learning and development, including flow on impacts for children's attachment with parents and other adults in their lives.³⁸³

Ms Gill Callister, Secretary of the Department of Education and Training, gave evidence that from September 2015, early childhood teachers must comply with mandatory reporting requirements for child abuse and neglect, including in the family violence context.³⁸⁴ There is, however, no requirement that staff be informed about family violence or its effect on children. Goodstart Early Learning noted that, as a result of this, its staff training in relation to family violence occurs only in the context of mandatory child protection training.³⁸⁵

The Commission also heard that the early childhood sector is relatively 'silent' in relation to family violence and the impact this may have on children's development and learning:

While there is literature in relation to risk factors and reporting of abuse, and programs available that support teachers in supporting young children experiencing child abuse and mental health issues (KidsMatter Program) there seems to be little mention of domestic violence, as a specific risk factor likely to cause trauma, anxiety and poor outcomes for young children, including mental health issues that have the potential to escalate if left unaddressed.³⁸⁶

The Commission for Children and Young People also expressed concern about the lack of family violence guidelines and other resources for early childhood workers:

Early childhood services, such as long day care and preschools or kindergartens, do not appear to have any specific guidelines or resources for staff in relation to family violence. This is quite concerning given the young age of children being cared for, the likelihood of a high prevalence of family violence occurring, and an apparent lack of training and guidance for staff in being able to recognize indicators of family violence and implement appropriate intervention including referral.³⁸⁷

The Commission asked the Victorian Government for copies of departmental evaluations, policies, practice notes, operational guidance, training and practice materials relating to the introduction and implementation of family violence risk assessment practice—including the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF)—within Early Childhood Services and was told that no relevant documents were identified.³⁸⁸ However, the Department of Education and Training told the Commission (in answer to a separate request) that there are various guidelines in place for action following completion of the family violence flag in the early childhood data set.³⁸⁹

The Commission heard that collaboration between family violence services and other services that have contact with children could also be improved; for example, Goodstart Early Learning expressed the view that family violence services are not always aware of the support early childhood centres can offer, such as fee waivers.³⁹⁰ Early Childhood Australia submitted that collaborative partnerships can improve outcomes for children including by supporting families to access appropriate resources within the community.³⁹¹

The Commission heard that early childhood workers need to expand their capacity for early identification, appropriate responses and the development of referral pathways.³⁹² The Commission was told that early childhood services already have strong connections with the child protection system and that building stronger relationships with the family violence system would be the next step in supporting children and families.³⁹³

An example of a capacity building initiative is the Whittlesea Early Years Family Violence Working Group which aims to strengthen integration between family violence services and early years' services.³⁹⁴ It enables practitioners from a range of services to 'share practice expertise, engage in group problem solving and access peer support with a particular focus on the needs of children (aged 0 to nine years) who have experienced family violence.'³⁹⁵

The Commission heard that, like early childhood services, staff within schools must have the capacity to respond to violence, and link effectively to services. However, the Commission heard that educators do not necessarily have the skills to identify and respond to family violence and referral pathways are under-developed.³⁹⁶ The Association of Child and Family Development submitted that:

There is currently a disjointed systemic approach to addressing these behaviours in the education system, with kindergartens and schools 'referring out' for assistance.³⁹⁷

One person at a community consultation said that schools could use some more training and that they are very unsupportive and don't want to get involved.³⁹⁸ The Commission was also told that there are limited referral pathways for schools because of the lack of child-focused specialist family violence services for children and young people.³⁹⁹

Gaps in service responses

Police and courts

Some submissions noted that police may overlook the details of children when making an L17 referral and suggested that more training would help to improve the capture of information related to children.

Further the information collected on the police VP form L17 highlights the need for ongoing training and improvement in police identification and recording of details about children who regularly reside at, or regularly access, the address of the family violence incident, regardless of whether the children are present or not at the time that the police attend. In addition, police skills need to be enhanced in relation to responding to children in these incidents and the narrative content communicated in the VP form L17.⁴⁰⁰

It was reported that the structure of the current L17 form omits the collection of some information specifically related to children. For example, Berry Street recommended that information about whether a child has intervened to stop violence against their mother should be captured, and that the L17 incident codes to be extended to include incident codes for specific risks to children, such as physical assault to child, child sexual assault, threats to abduct, threats to harm or kill or reference to murder or suicide.⁴⁰¹

The Commission was also told there are issues associated with having multiple police referral points for children experiencing family violence, which have introduced further complexities into the system.⁴⁰² The Commission discusses this and makes recommendations regarding this in Chapter 13.

Some stakeholders expressed the concern that children affected by family violence were not being listed as affected family members on family violence intervention orders.⁴⁰³ This concern was among those raised in Deakin University's Landscapes of Violence report on women experiencing family violence in regional and rural Victoria.⁴⁰⁴ In this research, based on court observations and semi-structured interviews with survivors, workers, lawyers and magistrates, the authors reported hearing of many instances where magistrates were reluctant to include children on FVIOs, particularly in privately initiated applications.⁴⁰⁵ The researchers further noted that, because there is limited space on the FVIO information form to explain the circumstances in which the child may have witnessed violence, magistrates may view such claims as an 'add-on' to the substantive application.⁴⁰⁶ Of particular concern is the report's assertion that:

Workers and women alike told the researchers that private and Legal Aid lawyers for both parties often place a great deal of pressure on women not to include children by arguing that the respondent will consent to an FVIO as long as the children are removed from the application.⁴⁰⁷

Specialist family violence services

Few services are available to directly assist children. A lot of family violence services are, rightly, geared towards assisting the adult survivor, and the general needs – for example, parenting, finances, housing – of the mother and children. But it is hard to access play therapy or specific supports for children. There is often a requirement that therapy for children can only occur once the family is settled and safe. Access to play-based sessions for children would be beneficial for some children in helping them deal with the situations they have experienced. The challenge is to support and enable children to have a voice and be able to share what is happening for them in their families while violence is occurring.⁴⁰⁸

Like Integrated Family Services, specialist family violence services have generally assisted children by providing support for their mother.⁴⁰⁹ Domestic Violence Victoria, the peak body for specialist family violence services, argued the sector has long recognised the need for specialised responses for children and young people, but that underfunding has created demand pressures that have precluded services from responding to either the crisis or ongoing needs of children and young people.⁴¹⁰

The lack of prominence of individual children and young people within the specialist family violence services sector extends to the data collected, which counts children as 'add-ons' to their mothers and does not capture their individual support and counselling needs.⁴¹¹

Nevertheless, Victoria's 2008 practice guidelines Women and Children's Family Violence Counselling and Support Programs endorse the principle that responses to family violence can be improved through better recognition of the independent rights and needs of children.⁴¹²

The Department of Health and Human Services has also developed the Assessing Children and Young People Experiencing Family Violence practice guide to help family violence workers meet the needs of children affected by such violence. The guide is based on a number of principles, one of them being that children have unique experiences of family violence and are 'service users in their own right', with each child requiring independent assessment.⁴¹³ The guide is mandatory for the Risk Assessment and Management Panels, (RAMPs).⁴¹⁴ It is not mandatory for the family violence specialist support services programs (counselling for women and children)⁴¹⁵ or women's refuges.⁴¹⁶

Submissions said that despite the sector's recognition of children's independent needs, there is insufficient resourcing and workforce capacity to provide suitable services and adequately cater for children's needs.⁴¹⁷ The Australian Institute of Family Studies stated that the family violence sector is currently limited to providing crisis support for children as it lacks the resources to provide continuing assistance or to evaluate its interventions.⁴¹⁸

The Commission heard that the specialist family violence sector consistently points to the need for programs that target children, but that funding streams do not reflect this.⁴¹⁹ The result is that family violence services are often unable to support children separately from their non-violent parent.⁴²⁰

Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria submitted that specialist family violence services are primarily funded to work with adult victims and most do not receive dedicated funding for case management of children.⁴²¹ Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre submitted that they, along with other specialist family violence services, 'regularly work with children, however most family violence services are not specifically resourced to meet children's needs'.⁴²² It also noted that 'there are no resources specifically allocated to supporting children, and some resource allocation models work against agencies' efforts to support children'.⁴²³

Homelessness service, WAYSS, told the Commission that it has two dedicated children's case workers who provide individualised case management but this is not enough to support a large number of the children experiencing family violence who are linked to WAYSS services.⁴²⁴ A participant in a community consultation stated: '[A] [s]ingle worker may have eight clients, there may be 40 children for these eight clients—how do you assess the needs of all those children?'⁴²⁵

An evaluation by Hanover Welfare Services and HomeGround Services—now known as Launch Housing—of its Homeless Children's Specialist Support Service program found that the needs of children and young people who enter the homelessness system (including family violence refuges) are not adequately addressed:

While the situation may be marginally better in the family violence sector, most refuge services are not resourced to look after the needs of children/young people. Many services do not have designated workers to focus on the needs of children. Of those that do, the evaluator is aware of concerns that many of them are not adequately trained.⁴²⁶

Ms Bunston gave evidence that that refuge workers 'often feel very under skilled in working with children and most certainly with infants'.⁴²⁷ She further stated that women's refuges are 'ideal places' to work with infants and children since these individuals are usually the most damaged and traumatised victims of family violence and there are enormous opportunities for engaging with them in this setting.⁴²⁸

In order to improve the response, Domestic Violence Victoria suggested that specialist family violence services should be funded to provide children-specific support services and that a child specialist should be placed in each family violence service to provide individual counselling to children and young people, as well as assisting family violence workers in their work on mother-child relationship issues.⁴²⁹ Similarly, McAuley Community Services for Women submitted that there should be case management for children in 'all women's refuges (with quality assurance and monitoring) to focus on the individual child as well as rebuilding/repairing family trust and bond'.⁴³⁰

Integrated Family Services

The Commission was told that due to demand pressures and their role in crisis response, it is likely that specialist family violence services prioritise working with women who are at the point of leaving, while Integrated Family Services may be more likely to work with families where the perpetrator is still in the home and where there may be other factors that impact on a parent's capacity to meet their children's developmental needs such as substance abuse, housing stress, or mental health issues.⁴³¹

While recognising that specialist family violence services and Integrated Family Services often undertake similar roles such as advocacy and support, it was noted that:

...one of the unique aspects of the family services sector is that we provide support to women, children and young people who are still in a relationship with the perpetrator.⁴³²

A number of submissions suggested that Integrated Family Services required further resources to enable it to respond earlier with families experiencing difficulties, including family violence.⁴³³ The Centre for Excellence in Child and Family Welfare, the peak body representing Integrated Family Services providers, told the Commission that due to the high level of demand, Child FIRST had to prioritise services.⁴³⁴ Safe Steps submitted that in its experience 'Child FIRST and Early Intervention services are under-resourced to meet demand for children who have experienced family violence who are not at immediate risk'.⁴³⁵

A number of Integrated Family Services providers also noted that as a result of demand pressures, there was tension between responding to increasing numbers of referrals via the L17 process, and responding to those who may not be in crisis but are still experiencing difficulties, including children and young people at risk of family violence.⁴³⁶

Family services focus on building the capacity of parents to address their children's needs. The importance of the parenting role is reinforced by the emerging research findings that indicate that the key point of intervention is strengthening of the mother-child relationship that has been impaired by the family violence, in the post-crisis period.

While a wide range of programs and approaches are delivered within the scope of Integrated Family Services, the dominant approach by family services is working with the parent(s) rather than directly with the child and while Child FIRST/Integrated Family Services is considered to be improving responses to families with children, some have concerns regarding their effectiveness in relation to family violence.⁴³⁷

Families may need either specialist family violence services or Integrated Family Services at different times, depending on risk. Both may be needed, potentially simultaneously if a woman is getting support around managing the violence from a specialist and also needs family services support in relation to parenting, or the child's development needs. The lead service response might also change as the level of risk changes, and as the victim moves towards recovery.

The Commission heard that families affected by family violence would substantially benefit from greater cross-sector collaboration between specialist family violence services, Child Protection and Child FIRST.⁴³⁸ It was acknowledged that there is a need for improvements to ensure a more coordinated and integrated approach.⁴³⁹ Some suggested placing specialist family violence children's workers inside Integrated Family Services teams, in particular when the perpetrator is still in the home.

Specialist workers/therapists with Family Violence experience should be embedded within IFS and Child FIRST teams focussing on children and young people and their short and long term needs. These workers should be prepared to work alongside Family Support workers within family units where the perpetrator has not left the family, providing specialist expertise and strategies to manage this issue.⁴⁴⁰

These issues are discussed further and recommendations made in Chapter 13. Recommendations regarding enhanced resources for Integrated Family Services are also made in that chapter.

Lack of counselling and therapeutic interventions

The National Children's Commissioner in her Children's Rights Report 2015 observed that child victims of family violence are currently provided therapeutic support based on the needs of their parents rather than based on their specific needs.⁴⁴¹ Similar views were expressed in the Commission's community consultations:

[It's a] [m]isnomer that if you treat the mother, the child will be ok.⁴⁴²

Often there's so much support for the parents and the children often aren't included in the support. You're not necessarily re-traumatising them by talking about it. By not talking about it you're denying their experience. It's all about how can we train people so that they can do that in a safe way.⁴⁴³

The Australian Institute of Family Studies submitted that, once immediate safety has been secured for a child, trauma-based and culturally sensitive therapeutic interventions are important and considered best practice.⁴⁴⁴ Angicare Victoria described the benefits of child-focused counselling and support:

Counselling focuses on strengthening the parent-child bond, which is often undermined by violence and its effects ... Counselling also focuses on helping children develop strategies to manage anxiety and other issues related to their trauma, and helping mothers to understand the impact of such traumatic experiences on their children, and steps they can take to ameliorate this impact.⁴⁴⁵

The evidence before the Commission, however, was that lack of resources means that not all children and young people who have experienced family violence are benefitting from counselling or more intensive therapeutic interventions (where these are required).

While some individual and group programs specifically for children have been introduced, the Commission heard that these programs tend to be 'very limited in capacity, time and contingent on insecure funding'.⁴⁴⁶ Ms Bunston told the Commission that while the availability of therapeutic services [for children] 'is pretty poor ... what is available can sometimes lack sophistication therapeutically'.⁴⁴⁷ She further identified that programs that had achieved positive results no longer operated or did so on an ad hoc basis.⁴⁴⁸

The Gippsland Integrated Family Violence Service Reform Steering Committee told the Commission there is a shortage of counselling services for children who have experienced family violence, and waiting lists are long.⁴⁴⁹ This is particularly the case in rural and regional areas.⁴⁵⁰ Central Goldfields Shire Council submitted:

There is limited access to specialist children's counselling and support services who are aware of the impact of exposure to violence on children's emotional, intellectual and social development. Those services available are only available regionally and only cater to the extreme cases such as child sexual abuse.⁴⁵¹

Cobaw Community Health Service also noted the lack of statewide coordination of children's counselling services and limited opportunities for networking to develop consistent best practice standards.⁴⁵²

Barwon Area Integrated Violence Committee submitted that Barwon Centre Against Sexual Assault provides trauma-related therapeutic support for children affected by violence and abuse 'but the service is experiencing significant demand beyond its capacity'.⁴⁵³ The committee stated that 'reducing the impact of family violence and abuse on children and delivering appropriate therapeutic interventions is [a] priority area requiring urgent attention'.⁴⁵⁴

Trauma-informed and therapeutic interventions

The Commission heard evidence that supports the importance of trauma-based therapeutic interventions for children and young people. Dr Miller told the Commission that these interventions can have a powerful impact: for young children, whose brain development is occurring at a rapid rate, early intervention is essential to prevent poor outcomes in the long term and can be a way of breaking intergenerational cycles of violence.⁴⁵⁵

The Play Connect arts therapy program, delivered under the auspices of the Loddon Mallee Homelessness Network, has also been identified as a successful initiative, as have the programs offered by the Royal Children's Hospital.⁴⁵⁶ Other sorts of programs with a mentoring focus such as Big Brother and Big Sister can also provide role models who demonstrate non-violent behaviours, positive adult behaviour and healthy relationships.⁴⁵⁷ Dr Miller gave evidence that such programs can help build the resilience of young people through the development of trusting, ongoing relationships with volunteers who also act as alternative role models.⁴⁵⁸

Although the cost of these programs is relatively small, they have been consistently underfunded.⁴⁵⁹ One of the themes to come out of the Commission's hearings and consultations is that there is little continuity in program availability—many programs are funded for a short period of time and then the funding stops.⁴⁶⁰

The Commission heard that early therapeutic intervention for young people is essential before 'windows of opportunity' are missed—that is, while young people still have connections with extended family and are attending school and before they have become chronically homeless or are engaging in risk-taking behaviours.⁴⁶¹

Failing to intervene at this formative stage can lead to the normalisation of violence: Melbourne City Mission's submission argued that the 'marginalisation of the trauma needs of this cohort is creating the conditions for young women to normalise intimate partner violence and young men to become perpetrators'.⁴⁶² Similarly, Youthlaw argued:

To prevent long term psychological consequences of family violence there must be a large injection of funding into youth appropriate therapeutic services for young people who have experienced family violence. These services need to be accessible and flexible (eg salaried psychologists not sessional & allowing a degree of drop in, and integrated with other youth services). We recommend a starting point would be availability of therapeutic services through youth services that currently support vulnerable young people presenting with homelessness, substance abuse and mental health issues.⁴⁶³

Many submissions called for an expansion of access to therapeutic services. Some proposed that trauma-specific services for children and young people who have experienced family violence should be available within family support services.⁴⁶⁴

The Australian Childhood Foundation, a provider of one of the few specialist programs currently available, recommended that a network of Child Trauma Centres be established across the state to enable the short and long term provision of therapeutic services to children and their networks of adults.⁴⁶⁵

Best practice working with mother and child

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children told the Commission there is emerging research that indicates the most effective response in the post-crisis period for both women and their children is for them to receive therapeutic interventions together.⁴⁶⁶ This can take the form of parallel women's and children's groups or joint mother-child counselling.⁴⁶⁷ The Commission for Children and Young People submitted:

... the emphasis must be on strengthening the communication between the mother and child and addressing their interconnected needs as part of recovery planning. Intervention should be focussed on supporting the mother and child to move from crisis and trauma to greater stability, and establish a trauma narrative to make meaning out of their individual and joint experiences, look at their identity in the future, and develop a hope based narrative.⁴⁶⁸

Working therapeutically with mothers and children for 12 months can 'decrease children's symptoms of traumatic stress, and depressive symptoms in the child and mother'.⁴⁶⁹ It has also been shown that therapeutic support for children and parents together after a potentially traumatic incident (such as witnessing a physical assault) can decrease the child or young person's propensity to develop post-traumatic stress disorder.⁴⁷⁰

Anglicare Victoria submitted that group work interventions can also be effective—for example, their Beyond the Violence program referred to earlier. Anglicare Victoria surveyed 15 families who participated and found that 87 per cent of the parents thought the program had improved their parenting, 80 per cent said they were more confident in responding to their children's behaviour, and 80 per cent reported improved relationships with their children.⁴⁷¹

The Commission also heard about group work programs which started in 1996 at the Royal Children's Hospital Mental Health Service. 'Parkas' ('parents accepting responsibility kids are safe') is a ten-week group program for children aged eight to 12 and their mothers affected by family violence. Evaluations of the program conducted in 1999 and 2006 reported positive outcomes and overall improvement in children's functioning.⁴⁷² Therapeutic group work with children affected by family violence is described as 'deeply relational', and involving 'an appreciation of and great respect for the relating style children possess and the defences they have adopted in order to survive'.⁴⁷³

Emerging evidence also shows that the most effective interventions for children respond to both the child's caregiver and the child themselves in order to rebuild the bond between them, which might have been compromised as a result of family violence.⁴⁷⁴ A strong mother–child relationship can be important for the recovery of both mother and child, who can be 'promoters' of recovery for each other.⁴⁷⁵

The Commission heard evidence that there is, however, only limited funding for this type of therapeutic intervention. For example, Berry Street's Turtle Program focuses on restoring the mother–child relationship and has 'shown promise' and 'been valued as effective', but it remains a temporary program.⁴⁷⁶ Similarly, Berry Street noted that children experiencing family violence currently 'receive limited and in some cases no service responses that target their relationships'.⁴⁷⁷

Barriers faced by young people experiencing family violence

The Commission received evidence about why young people experiencing family violence may not seek support, and how best to reach those young people.

The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria submitted that young people are less likely than other age groups to seek help, and that this reluctance may be a consequence of 'confusion, poor self-esteem' and lack of accessible information.⁴⁷⁸

Youthlaw emphasised that, when developing family violence services for young people, young people's tendency to rely on pre-existing support networks and their reluctance to seek assistance directly from other services must be borne in mind.⁴⁷⁹ For example, referring a young person to a general practitioner in order to gain access to Medicare-funded counselling will probably be ineffective if the person is unlikely to attend the appointment or the counselling.⁴⁸⁰

It is well established in the youth sector that young people, and particularly vulnerable youth do not readily seek services they need and that they have a very high drop out and low attendance when referred to external or appointment based services. Young people tend to seek services from those they trust including caseworkers, family and teachers. In regard to seeking legal assistance we know that young people rarely directly seek assistance. We factor this into the design and location of our services including co-location and integration with other youth services and outreach methods that connect with vulnerable groups of young people.⁴⁸¹

Face-to-face contact is important:

When talking about young people—the face to face contact really matters—phone stuff doesn't work. People drop off. You need a warm referral for young people.⁴⁸²

The Commission was informed that many young mothers escaping family violence do not seek out available legal services in relation to family law and child custody disputes.⁴⁸³ This can be a consequence of confusion, lack of information or poor self-esteem and can have adverse impacts—not only for the woman's wellbeing but also for that of her children.⁴⁸⁴ In addition, they may not see family violence services as relevant to their own intimate partner relationship because they perceive family violence as 'adult' behaviour.⁴⁸⁵

The Commission was also told during community consultations that high numbers of young parents, particularly in regional areas, come to court to obtain an intervention order but then drop out of the system.⁴⁸⁶ This could be an important point of intervention, presenting the opportunity to link young parents to other youth-specific services they might not seek out themselves.

The Commission heard there is currently a lack of coordination between different youth services and between the youth and family violence sectors, both of which are under pressure from high demand. The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria submitted that current interventions for young people experiencing family violence are 'diverse and piecemeal' and involve a range of short-term projects.⁴⁸⁷

The Commission heard there is also a need to improve communication between family violence and youth homelessness services. Melbourne City Mission submitted that family violence services often make referrals without providing sufficient information to the young person or the agency.⁴⁸⁸ It expressed concern that such 'cold' referrals perpetuate feelings of disempowerment and could cause young people to return to unsafe homes or 'informally enter homelessness by couch-surfing or sleeping rough'.⁴⁸⁹

The Commission heard that youth services—including homework clubs, arts and recreation groups, and specialist services such as homelessness and drug and alcohol organisations—can play an important role in supporting young people experiencing family violence because they represent a non-threatening, 'soft' entry point.⁴⁹⁰ Youth workers work with the young person as the primary client in their own right, 'acknowledging their developing independence, and supporting them to make decisions about their own lives'.⁴⁹¹

The youth sector's interventions aimed at assisting young people experiencing family violence are diverse and include programs such as You, Me and Us, which is a peer educator initiative of Women's Health West Inc.⁴⁹²

The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria submitted that youth services' current interventions aimed at supporting young people experiencing family violence should be evaluated and assessed for their scalability.⁴⁹³ It also noted a 2012 survey it conducted with the Council and the Victorian Council of Social Service of 213 youth services, which found that about a quarter of respondents identified 'sexual assault/domestic violence' as an area of unmet need.⁴⁹⁴

The Commission also heard that youth refuges need to become better at identifying family violence and linking young people to other services if they are unable to provide the services themselves. Youthlaw submitted:

We also observe in the youth service sector and even in our own service that services do not ask about family violence. Increasingly they are doing so (eg. Frontyard) and the data are revealing very high numbers have been exposed to family violence.⁴⁹⁵

The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria submission stated that youth workers should be trained to identify family violence—for example, through youth-focused CRAF training—and to support young people who disclose experiences of it.⁴⁹⁶ Such training should cover cultural competency and family violence among young people from culturally and linguistically diverse and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander backgrounds. It should also highlight the unique experiences of same-sex attracted and gender diverse young people and young people with disabilities.⁴⁹⁷

The Commission received proposals for a number of youth family violence-specific initiatives including for the creation of a new service that would be supported by a youth-specific portal.⁴⁹⁸ The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria submitted that existing websites educating young people about healthy relationships—among them Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria's Bursting the Bubble—could also be expanded.⁴⁹⁹

It would be useful to consider whether anti-violence initiatives could draw on the findings of models such as eheadspace's online and telephone counselling service, the apps and online forums developed by ReachOut.com, and the Online Wellbeing Centre being piloted by the Young and Well Cooperative Research Project, which links young people to tools about health, relationships, thoughts and emotions.⁵⁰⁰

Youthlaw recommended co-location of services as a means of countering young people's reluctance to seek support from specialist services independently:

A starting point could be a number of services located together with current frontline services that support vulnerable young people presenting with homelessness, substance abuse and mental health issues (such as Frontyard, Youth Support Advocacy Service and Headspace). Such services could include therapeutic services ... These services should be fully integrated with the online/phone service ... and other family violence services (eg safe steps).⁵⁰¹

Lack of accommodation for children and young people

There are two types of crisis accommodation for young people experiencing family violence: youth refuges, and women's family violence refuges. The Commission heard evidence that both have major limitations.

Youth refuges

Youth refuges are funded to provide crisis accommodation and support for young people aged 16–25 years.⁵⁰² Immediate safety and security are the first priority for young people escaping family violence and are a necessary precondition for effective therapeutic interventions that seek to encourage healthy relationships, self-development and the generation of life skills.⁵⁰³

The Commission heard that Victoria's youth refuges have insufficient capacity to meet demand: in June 2014 there were 20 youth refuges, and in July 2015 they had a combined total of 159 beds.⁵⁰⁴ Melbourne City Mission noted that its Frontyard Integrated Youth Services receives more than 200 requests a fortnight from young people with nowhere to sleep.⁵⁰⁵ They stated that with only 109 beds available in metropolitan Melbourne (in 15 youth refuges), demand greatly exceeds supply and the turn-away rate is about 66 per cent.⁵⁰⁶

In Traralgon, the Commission was told there are only 16 beds in the entire region for young people experiencing homelessness.⁵⁰⁷ In addition, Hope Street Youth and Family Services highlighted the lack of crisis accommodation for young people in growth corridors, as outlined in Hope Street's recent report Responding to Youth Homelessness in the City of Melton.⁵⁰⁸

It was noted in evidence that young people living in rural, regional and remote communities who do manage to gain access to a youth refuge can find themselves far from their original home and community and isolated from specialist support services and other networks.⁵⁰⁹

If a bed in a youth refuge is not available, the Commission heard that alternative accommodation options for young people are often inappropriate or unsustainable, or both:

In the absence of a youth refuge bed, if a young person is not able to return home because of family violence or family breakdown and is not able to draw on their personal networks to find emergency shelter, the alternative accommodation options are cheap motels and backpacker accommodation. These are neither a sustainable (long-term) option nor a safe option for young people (although they are marginally safer than sleeping rough).⁵¹⁰

Melbourne City Mission said it 'reluctantly' spends about $100,000 a year on sub-standard accommodation for young people because a place in a youth refuge is not available.⁵¹¹

The maximum length of stay at a youth refuge is usually six weeks.⁵¹² The lack of long-term accommodation options for young people can result in blockages in the refuge system, where there is no option but to extend the person's stay. Melbourne City Mission cited an example of this:

In one recent case, Melbourne City Mission supported a 16-year-old woman from a CALD background to remain at a youth refuge for 12 months, in order to complete Year 11, find part-time employment and secure stable long-term accommodation. The young woman had no family networks beyond her adopted mother (who perpetrated violence).⁵¹³

Mr Arthur Rogers, Deputy Secretary, Social Housing and NDIS Reform and Director of Housing, Department of Health and Human Services, gave evidence that additional resources have been allocated under the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness (a two-year agreement for 2015–16 and 2016–17) for seven youth refuges to deliver a model of service that focuses on specialist support, family reconciliation and follow-up support.⁵¹⁴ The Commission notes that this is not a family violence initiative and that reconciliation may not be appropriate when violence is or has been present and the young person remains at risk.

Women's family violence refuges

As discussed in Chapter 9 women's family violence refuges are not always accessible to or suitable as accommodation options for young people experiencing family violence. One victim told the Commission: 'I was in a community refuge ... communal lounge ... it was a bit traumatic ... there were so many people, I was young, I was still scared to talk'.⁵¹⁵

Melbourne City Mission told the Commission the arrangements in some women's refuges can be inappropriate for young women who are not at high or imminent risk.⁵¹⁶ Social connections form a large part of young people's identity and are also an important protective factor,⁵¹⁷ so a requirement to cease contact with friends or to refrain from using social media can be isolating and can exacerbate trauma, causing some young women to return to unsafe situations.⁵¹⁸

Some young people face additional difficulties:

- ▶ Young men who are forced to leave their homes as a result of family violence cannot use family violence refuges for women and children. In addition, as discussed in Chapter 9, sometimes male adolescents accompanying their mother are also excluded.⁵¹⁹
- ▶ Contributing to the difficulty associated with leaving a violent relationship is the lack of suitable accommodation for young mothers. The Commission for Children and Young People noted that youth refuges are an option only for young people without children.⁵²⁰
- ▶ Youth refuges might not have the same kind of security as family violence refuges.⁵²¹ The Commission was told this can place young mothers in a difficult position if their children are in out-of-home care and the young mother is trying to demonstrate they can offer a secure home to their children. They will need flexible accommodation that is available to them when they do not have their children with them, and subsequently if they are reunited with their children and require different accommodation.⁵²²

Lack of long-term accommodation for young people

The Commission heard that although the lack of affordable housing in Victoria is a problem for many in the community, it can particularly affect young people, who might be unable to secure private rental accommodation because of both cost and age discrimination.⁵²³ In addition, young people are often excluded from certain types of social housing due to eligibility criteria—for example, a failure to satisfy income requirements.⁵²⁴ Hope Street Youth and Family Services told the Commission that in 2013–14 only one per cent of young people from its crisis accommodation programs were successful in gaining access to community housing.⁵²⁵

In Victoria, the minimum age at which a person can enter transitional housing in their own right is 15 years.⁵²⁶ Young people who go to adult homelessness services but are under the age of 15 are referred to local adolescent community placement services or protection and care units at Department of Health and Human Services divisions.⁵²⁷ Adolescent community placement services provide short and long-term out-of-home placements with approved caregivers.

A related issue is the need to provide appropriate support to the young person alongside the accommodation, so that if they secure a tenancy, they can maintain it. This goes beyond being able to afford rent and can include the need for other supports.

It was submitted that a cycle can develop whereby young people reach the end of their support period in transitional housing and, having failed to secure long-term housing, are forced back to a homelessness access point to re-apply for crisis accommodation.⁵²⁸

The way forward

The Commission heard that being exposed to family violence as a child can have a profound impact on a young person's future.⁵²⁹ If children's schooling is disrupted—for example if escaping family violence means moving away from their home—this will likely affect their chances of obtaining and keeping a job as poor educational outcomes can severely limit life opportunities. Family violence can also lead to children being placed in out-of-home care, which is associated with poorer long-term outcomes for a child.⁵³⁰ This can trap them into poverty, wasting their potential and their talents. Given the number of children and young people affected by family violence, the social and economic costs of this are likely to be significant.

In this section the Commission discusses the need for a system-wide, coordinated response to the specific needs of children and young people, in particular their emotional needs, and makes recommendations to extend the range and quantum of counselling and therapeutic services available to them.

Underpinning these recommendations is the Commission's view that children and young people experiencing family violence should be recognised as victims in their own right—and that their safety and wellbeing are paramount.

In other parts of this report, the Commission makes recommendations to improve the accessibility of specialist family violence services and other agencies, and to support workforce learning and development required to achieve inclusion. We also recommend improvements to risk assessment for children in Chapter 6.

In implementing the Commission's recommendations, these are the principles that should apply in relation to children and young people:

- ▷ Children and young people experiencing family violence should be recognised as victims in their own right and have their needs acknowledged.
- ▷ Children and young people have different needs—this should be recognised when planning and delivering responses to family violence.
- ▷ Many children and young people display great resilience in the face of family violence. Interventions should preserve and strengthen protective factors that might mitigate the effects of family violence, noting that the majority grow up to be neither perpetrators nor victims in their adult relationships.
- ▷ Interventions and support for children and young people who have experienced family violence should focus on:
 - ▷ keeping them safe
 - ▷ supporting them in their recovery from the effects of family violence
 - ▷ providing the right level and type of support when it is needed and for as long as it is needed. Not all children and young people will require an intensive therapeutic approach but those that do should have timely access to this.
- ▷ Services should be accessible, inclusive and responsive to the needs of all children and young people.

A family violence system that includes an equal focus on children and young people

The right of children and young people to live free from violence should be at the centre of family violence policy and practice. Their interests and welfare should be a primary focus—not a secondary consideration for action after the needs of the parents have been accommodated. In view of their unique experiences and vulnerabilities, young people also need to be recognised by the family violence system as a specific cohort, independent of adults and children.⁵³¹

In implementing the Commission's recommendations, services should place children at the centre of responses to family violence so that their safety and wellbeing are paramount. The rights and needs of children should be reflected at a contractual and program standards level to ensure they are upheld in practice. Therefore, the Commission therefore recommends that the Department of Health and Human Services specifically address the rights and needs of children and young people, including how services respond to and integrate their rights and needs in their practice and in the standards of practice for specialist family services and Integrated Family Services.

It is clear that refuges, and specialist family violence services more broadly, currently lack the capacity to respond directly to the needs of children who have experienced family violence. Further, there is a lack of specific family violence services for children and young people in the crisis and post-crisis periods. All of this is exacerbated by increasing demand.

Similarly, for Integrated Family Services, including their intake point Child FIRST, increased demand, issues with the referral pathway, as well as a focus on parenting assistance, mean these services have limited capacity to provide the intense level of support needed to meet demand for children and young people experiencing family violence. This means there is a missed opportunity to intervene earlier and change the trajectory of the child's experience.

We note Ms Bunston's evidence that women's refuges are 'ideal places' to work with infants and children,⁵³² and to start the work to recover. There are also opportunities to work across other disciplines and settings, including through family and health services, schools and youth services. Child-specific family violence programs could be linked with early childhood services, for example by providing family violence counselling and art therapy at child-care centre locations using family violence specialist counsellors and facilitators.

Some examples of effective interventions are noted; however, it is clear these initiatives, welcome though they are, are reliant on the efforts of services already at capacity and are not supported in any systemic way. A much more comprehensive approach to supporting children and young people is needed in order to make the family violence system truly responsive to their needs.

Recommendation 21

The Victorian Government ensure that all refuge and crisis accommodation services catering to families have adequate resources to meet the particular needs of the children they are accommodating, including access to expert advice and secondary consultations in supporting children [within 12 months].

Protecting children with family violence intervention orders

The Family Violence Protection Act allows the court to make a final FVIO if satisfied that the respondent has committed family violence against the affected family member/s and is likely to continue to do so or do so again.⁵³³ Further, before making a final order—even where it has been proposed by mutual consent of the parties—the court must consider whether there are any children who have been subject to family violence, and may, by its own motion, make an FVIO in respect of any child, or include the child in the adult affected family member's FVIO if their need for protection is 'substantially the same'.⁵³⁴

In the Commission's view, it is important, and consistent with the intention of the Act that children who have experienced violence (including through witnessing, hearing or being exposed to it) and are at ongoing risk are protected, either by their own FVIO or by inclusion in an FVIO.

Based on figures noted earlier in this chapter there are disparities between the number of family violence incidents attended by police at which children are present, the number of children recorded by police as affected family members, and the number of children listed on original FVIO applications.

While it is difficult to compare data sets from different agencies, it appears that not all children who are witnessing (or otherwise experiencing) family violence are being considered for protection by an FVIO.

We urge the Victorian Government to address this issue and, in consultation with Victoria Police and the courts, to consider means to ensure that where family violence gives rise to an FVIO application and a child is involved (including through witnessing, hearing or being exposed to the violence), that child is listed on the FVIO.

A rebuttable presumption that a child who has experienced family violence (including through witnessing, hearing or otherwise being exposed to it) is protected by an FVIO should be introduced. We accept that police and courts may require additional resources to comply with that presumption. Nonetheless, in our view it is an option that should be adopted.

Recommendation 22

The Victorian Government amend the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to establish a rebuttable presumption that, if an applicant for a family violence intervention order has a child who has experienced family violence, that child should be included in the applicant's family violence intervention order or protected by their own order [within 12 months].

Ensuring schools and early childhood services are equipped

The Commission heard that although there is much evidence of the various deleterious impacts of family violence on children and young people, this knowledge has not been incorporated in universal services' practices and not fully understood by workers who have direct contact with children.

Given that social, psychological and cognitive harm is cumulative and compounded by ongoing exposure to family violence, it is essential that interventions start as early as possible. Early intervention for children experiencing family violence is 'critical to disrupting intergenerational cycles of family violence'.⁵³⁵

As part of this, early childhood services and schools have a crucial role to play in identifying, responding and preventing family violence. As Ms Callister, Secretary of the Department of Education and Training observed in her witness statement, the services of the department are universal, touching on the lives of every Victorian, and children and young people spend a substantial amount of their time in schools.⁵³⁶

It is thus essential that early childhood services and schools augment their capacity to recognise when children are experiencing family violence and provide assistance including linking them to suitable services. We also understand that because of the current lack of child-focused specialist family violence services for children and young people, there are limited referral pathways for schools and other universal services to utilise.

In August 2015 the Victorian Government announced the statewide inclusion of respectful relationships education in the school curriculum from 2016.⁵³⁷ We consider this to be a positive step and have made recommendations about the scope of that program. Chapter 36 provides a detailed discussion of and makes recommendations around primary prevention programs in schools.

As the Commission has previously noted, the effective implementation of respectful relationships education requires a whole-of-school approach.⁵³⁸ Best practice in respectful relationships education requires programs to respond appropriately to disclosures of victimisation.⁵³⁹

This will mean that all school staff will need to be prepared for such disclosures and be supported in responding appropriately. School staff will need greater capacity to recognise the ‘warning signs’ of family violence—for example, when children lack concentration, become withdrawn or lash out at others—and to have referral procedures and strategies for linking affected families to services.⁵⁴⁰ They also need to be aware of the differing ways in which children respond to family violence—for example, internalised as opposed to externalised behaviour—and children’s differing coping mechanisms.⁵⁴¹ When family violence is identified, educators and other staff should be aware that this may be the first time a child realises that the behaviour they are experiencing at home is problematic and further, that respectful relationships education may be traumatic for some children.

Currently, family violence is included in educators’ annual online training modules on mandatory reporting to Child Protection. While this is helpful, given the anticipated increase in disclosures the family violence component of this training should be strengthened.

It is important that clear referral pathways are developed for children who disclose family violence when receiving respectful relationships education. As recommended by the Department of Education and Training in 2009, partnerships with specialist agencies will be important to provide the resources, training and other supports schools will require.⁵⁴² In particular, consultation with local family violence or sexual assault services should be encouraged.⁵⁴³ This not only builds capacity to respond but also ensures that students are linked to external support services where appropriate.

As discussed in Chapter 13, the Commission’s recommendations to augment existing secondary consultation by specialist family violence services, and the establishment of advanced practitioner roles in the proposed Support and Safety Hubs from 1 July 2018 should assist with this process.

Other recommendations of the Commission made in Chapter 40 including for the establishment of a Principal Practitioner, Family Violence in the Department of Education and Training should also assist schools, early childhood services and other education providers such as TAFE by providing proactive practice leadership in family violence. This will include developing guidance and resources, linking workforces to evidence based learning and development (including on the revised CRAF) and working across the department to coordinate family violence policy and practice with other relevant initiatives around vulnerable children and families, including those under Victoria’s Vulnerable Children Strategy 2013–2022 and those targeting children and young people in out-of-home care.

Increased counselling and therapeutic options

In the submissions received by the Commission the concepts of trauma-informed responses to children, counselling support and more intensive therapeutic interventions were often spoken of interchangeably. What was clear was that children and young people need a range of supports to assist them to deal with the impact of family violence.

For some, particularly in the crisis stage—including when they must leave their home—simple things like having toys, access to play, being at school and having someone to talk to can be key. For others, intensive counselling or therapeutic work is required to assist the child or young person to recover. While these are all distinct interventions they share a common thread—of making sure the child or young person feels safe, valued, and heard. These services also need to respond in different ways to the trauma that family violence causes while recognising and building upon the resilience of the child.

The Commission was told that due to lack of adequate funding, the family violence and youth homelessness sectors are largely limited to providing crisis support for children and young people rather than ongoing assistance. The Commission heard that current funding levels for counselling and more therapeutic interventions for children and young people experiencing family violence are insufficient, despite evidence of their importance. We also heard the sexual assault sector is struggling with the demand for counselling services for children and young people.

In addition to keeping them safe, interventions and support for children and young people who have experienced family violence should focus on supporting them in their recovery from the effects of family violence. This is particularly important given the evidence supporting therapeutic interventions to prevent poor outcomes in the long term and as a way of breaking intergenerational cycles of violence.

The Commission has heard and accepts that an increase in the availability of counselling and other ongoing therapeutic supports for children and young people who have experienced family violence is urgently needed—particularly in rural, regional and remote areas.

In Chapter 20 we consider the availability of counselling for adult victims of family violence. We note there, consistent with the evidence presented in this chapter, that demand for counselling services under Family Violence Support Services (counselling) program exceeds availability. The Victorian Government requires that at a minimum, 30 per cent of counselling provided under that program be targeted to children. The Commission notes that in 2013–14, children accounted for 41 per cent of all people counselled.⁵⁴⁴

Based on the submissions we received regarding lack of access to counselling, it seems that child and adult victims of family violence are competing for a scarce resource. This is not in the best interest of either children or women trying to recover from family violence. Accordingly, in Chapter 20 we have recommended an increase in resources for that program.

The Commission received evidence that there is growing support for trauma-informed care and practice in Australia but that such an approach is not as developed in Australia as it is in the US.⁵⁴⁵ We consider the Victorian Government should fund expansion and evaluation of models of therapeutic intervention for children and young people who are victims of family violence, including age appropriate group work.

In considering the evidence, we identified two existing programs that with adaptation could make a significant difference to the availability of therapeutic support for children and young people. These can be conceptualised along a spectrum of intervention—with the first less intensive.

First, the Homeless Children's Specialist Support Service, which is unique because the child or young person is the primary client, has been positively reviewed.⁵⁴⁶ The Commission considers this model has merit in terms of providing multi-faceted assistance, both directly to the child and in supporting other services such as schools to provide a better response. This one-on-one case management support, group work and psychological support is the sort of assistance that many submissions spoke of as lacking—yet the program is only funded in four service locations.

Second, the Take Two program—which is a more intensive therapeutic program—is achieving good results. However, at the moment it is only available to children and young people in the child protection system. The Commission considers that the therapeutic basis of the program and its mode of delivery can and should be made available for children and young people dealing with the trauma of family violence regardless of their status inside or outside the statutory child protection system. This does not mean that every child who has experienced family violence needs this program. But for those whose level of trauma is such that an intensive intervention is required, a program with these types of features should be made available.

In implementing the Commission's recommendations, there should be a recognition that many children and young people display great resilience in the face of family violence, with the majority neither growing up to be perpetrators nor victims in their adult relationships. Interventions should therefore preserve and strengthen protective factors that might mitigate the effects of family violence and, in turn, interrupt the cycle of intergenerational violence. For example, as mothers play a vital role in mitigating the short and long-term effects of family violence, programs that focus on rebuilding and strengthening the mother-child bond are valuable.

The Commission considers that priority should be given to programs, such as the Turtle Program, that work to rebuild mother-child relationships. Outcomes of the research being led by Professor Humphreys on the experience of children whose fathers have used family violence will also be useful to inform any future investment in programs for fathers.⁵⁴⁷

The Commission recognises that not all children and young people will need programs. In some cases other options will be more appropriate. Some simply need help with practical items such as having clothing, books and toys and getting to school. Currently some brokerage money is held for these purposes by the children's resource worker positions across the state (the Regional Children's Resource Program). However, this is not a significant fund. In order to overcome long waiting lists for places in publicly funded programs, additional brokerage funds should be made available to enable the purchase of a wide range of services to assist children and young people to maintain their education and access social, recreational and support opportunities within their communities.

The Commission notes that Family Violence Flexible Support Packages may also be used to support children and young people. In Chapter 9 the Commission recommends a significant expansion of those packages. Within this, a clear focus on the specific needs of children and young people will be required.

Parenting programs for vulnerable families

Early parenting programs for women experiencing issues that may be affecting their parenting, including family violence, are also worthy of investment where such interventions have been evaluated or otherwise proven to work. Examples include Cradle to Kinder (currently being evaluated). Elsewhere in this report we discuss positive initiatives with young Aboriginal mothers including Aboriginal Cradle to Kinder and local programs such as from Bumps to Babes and Beyond—again these are only available in certain locations.⁵⁴⁸

In relation to Cradle to Kinder, the Commission notes that many of its features, such as the level of intensity, duration, focus on the whole family, and multi-disciplinary team, would be of assistance to some women who are experiencing family violence but are not in the target group. Without wishing to pre-empt the outcome of the evaluation, the Victorian Government may wish to expand the program to ensure greater access to services with these features, such as for women who are older than 25 and/or for those with older children.

Recommendation 23

- ▶ The Victorian Government give priority to funding therapeutic interventions and counselling—including age-appropriate group work—for children and young people who are victims of family violence [within two years]. In particular:
- ▶ The Homeless Children's Specialist Support Service (or a program with similar features) should be extended beyond four service areas to be available statewide and be available to specialist family violence services.
- ▶ Eligibility for the Take Two program and similar intensive therapeutic programs should be introduced for children and young people affected by trauma associated with family violence who are not in the statutory child protection system.

Engaging and supporting young people

Evidence before the Commission indicated that not only are adolescents less likely than other age groups to seek assistance when experiencing family violence, but they are prone to ‘invisibility’ in the child protection and specialist family violence sectors.

In addition to the need for family violence services to provide more youth-focused services, youth services need to be more family violence-focused. Youth services’ capacity to provide a soft entry point to assist young people experiencing family violence should be strengthened. The Commission was told about a number of initiatives by youth services aimed at supporting young people experiencing family violence. These should be evaluated and assessed for their scalability.⁵⁴⁹

In view of young peoples’ reluctance to seek support outside their own networks, assertive outreach to attract young people who have experienced family violence should be explored.

Addressing gaps in accommodation

The Commission heard that demand for youth refuge beds greatly exceeds supply, and that the lack of crisis accommodation for young people in rural, regional and remote areas is even more extreme. The maximum stay at a youth refuge is usually six weeks, but the lack of long-term accommodation options for young people leads to these stays being extended, or to young people being placed in sub-standard or adult-based accommodation or becoming homeless again.

Even if there were sufficient beds in youth refuges staffed by workers trained to deal with children and young people who have experienced family violence, this would be only one part of the solution. Provision of stable long-term accommodation for young people is important to preserve the protective factors that mitigate the negative effects of family violence; it can also reduce the risk of children and young people entering the trajectory of poverty. There is an urgent need for viable accommodation options for young people escaping family violence, as they are too old for Child Protection but too young to gain access to family violence services, government housing or private rental accommodation.

The features of such accommodation must include youth-appropriate settings, a rapid response, and the provision of support integrated with a continuing participation in education and learning.

Recommendation 24

The Victorian Government support and fund youth homelessness and other youth services providers in developing and implementing a broader range of supported accommodation options for young people experiencing family violence [within two years].

11 Family violence and the child protection system

Introduction

In Chapter 5 we describe the various systems that respond to family violence, including Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services, and Child Protection. As discussed in Chapter 10, children may be direct targets of family violence or may be harmed by seeing or experiencing the effects of violence suffered by a parent (usually a mother).

Professor Leah Bromfield, Deputy Director, Australian Centre for Child Protection, University of South Australia and Professorial Fellow at the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses into Child Sexual Abuse, gave evidence that:

[I]n households where there is intimate partner violence children are at heightened risk of experiencing neglect, of experiencing physical abuse, of experiencing sexual abuse and of experiencing emotional abuse. Exposure of children to intimate partner violence is itself a form of abuse for children.¹

Children who are exposed to family violence may come into contact with Child FIRST and Child Protection. The child protection system is a statutory scheme administered by the Department of Health and Human Services. DHHS is the responsible government department for Victoria's child protection system and Child Protection is a specific unit within that department, to which the Secretary of DHHS delegates certain functions and powers under the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic).

Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services may provide support to families who come to their attention because of family violence or other matters. In some cases, children who are reported to Child Protection may not meet the statutory threshold for protective intervention and may be referred to other services, including specialist family violence services, Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services.

This chapter describes how the statutory child protection system can apply to children who are victims of family violence, when other family support services cannot adequately protect them. It does not deal with all aspects of the child protection system but focuses on the intersection between Child Protection and family violence.

We discuss concerns expressed in submissions and evidence about the way family violence is taken into account in the child protection system and discuss the findings of the former State Coroner, Judge Ian Gray, in the coronial inquest into the death of Luke Batty.² We also refer to some of the recommendations and findings of the 2012 report of the Protecting Victoria's Vulnerable Children Inquiry³ (Cummins Inquiry), which made recommendations for improving the child protection system and related service systems, including both universal systems and systems provided by community service organisations. We have taken that report into account to the extent that it bears directly on children who are exposed to family violence.

The Commission acknowledges the complex role of child protection practitioners. Given the critical nature of their role, they must be effectively supported in their difficult task. At the end of this chapter, the Commission recommends policy and practice changes to guide the child protection system's response to children who are victims of family violence.

Data

This chapter relies upon data that was provided to the Commission by DHHS. It is important to note that this data is inconsistent with police data, verified by the Crime Statistics Agency. There are also inconsistencies between the data provided by DHHS to the Commission, and the data provided in witness statements.

For the purpose of this chapter, we rely on DHHS data to illustrate pathways through the child protection system.⁴ Data provided in this chapter focuses on reports to Child Protection, not cases, and does not necessarily identify the number of individuals affected, the number of children or families who were subject to Child Protection reports, or the number of families who have had multiple reports to Child Protection.

Victoria's child protection response

Government-funded support services for families are provided through three systems:

- ▷ the universal and primary service system (maternal and child health, and education services) which delivers services to all Victorian children
- ▷ the secondary service system (Integrated Family Services and services provided to children and parents such as mental health, drug and alcohol services, specialist family violence services and counselling services). This provides targeted supports upon request or referral
- ▷ the statutory system (Child Protection) which intervenes only when the primary and secondary systems are unable to ensure the safety and wellbeing of a child.⁵

Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services

The establishment of Child and Family Information, Referral and Support Teams (Child FIRST) created a point of entry 'to an integrated network of family services'.⁶ Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services are community-based service providers within the meaning of the Children, Youth and Families Act and are funded by DHHS.

There are 23 Child FIRST catchments⁷ in Victoria, of which each provide 'a central referral point to a range of community-based family services and other supports within each of the Child FIRST catchment areas'.⁸ Child FIRST receives referrals from the community, including police L17 referrals, where a person 'has a significant concern for the wellbeing of a child'.⁹ Upon receiving a referral, Child FIRST undertakes assessments of need and risk to a child; may make referrals to other agencies; provide on-going support to a child;¹⁰ and may provide advice or assistance to the child or the family, or refer a family to Integrated Family Services.¹¹

Integrated Family Services comprises a diverse range of service providers, 'including community service organisations, community health, local government, Aboriginal community controlled organisations, culturally and linguistically diverse and specialist services'.¹² Integrated Family Services also has the role of facilitating connections with 'universal services, drug and alcohol services, mental health services, housing and homelessness services and family violence services'.¹³ As at 2013–14, there were 96 community-based family services.¹⁴

There is a Child and Family Service Alliance at each of the 23 Child FIRST catchments, to assist with integration and coordination of services. Representatives include Child FIRST, Integrated Family Services, DHHS and Child Protection, and where possible, Aboriginal community controlled organisations.¹⁵

A 2011 evaluation found that Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services were successfully intervening earlier than statutory-based interventions with vulnerable children and families, and reducing the extent of Child Protection involvement.¹⁶

The Commission heard that between 2009–10 and 2013–14, demand for Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services has seen:

- a 30 per cent increase in new referrals to Integrated Family Services
- a 94 per cent increase in referrals to Integrated Family Services from Child Protection
- an 89 per cent increase in the number of families with children aged 0 to 5 years who have been referred to Integrated Family Services by Child Protection.¹⁷

More detail about Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services is in Chapters 10 and 13.

Child Protection

The child protection system in Victoria intervenes when the primary and secondary systems, described above, are unable to ensure the safety and wellbeing of a child.¹⁸

In their statements to the Commission, Ms Beth Allen, Assistant Director, Child Protection Unit, Statutory and Forensic Services Design Branch, DHHS, and Ms Leeanne Miller, Director Child Protection West Division, DHHS, set out the main roles of Child Protection:

- receive and review reports concerning the wellbeing or protection of children under 17 years
- investigate allegations that children have been harmed or are at risk of harm
- refer children and families to services (including Child FIRST providers and other community-based child and family services) that assist in providing for the safety and wellbeing of children
- initiate applications before the Children’s Court where children are in need of protection because their parents have not protected, or are unlikely to protect, them from harm
- provide care for, and make decisions in respect of, children who are the subject of custody and guardianship orders granted by the Children’s Court, and supervise the care of children who are the subject of other orders granted by the Court
- provide and fund accommodation services, specialist support services, and adoption and permanent care services to children and adolescents in need of such services.¹⁹

Under the Children, Youth and Families Act, a child or young person may be found to be in need of protection when the child has suffered, or is likely to suffer, significant harm as a result of physical injury, sexual abuse, or psychological harm, and the child’s parents have not protected, or are unlikely to protect the child from harm.²⁰ As discussed in Chapter 10, a child’s exposure to family violence, whether as the direct victim or as a witness to violence against another family member, can have a long-term effect on a child or young person.

Family violence has different effects on children at different ages. For example, family violence during pregnancy may cause the miscarriage of a developing foetus, or bring on premature birth or disability. For a young child experiencing family violence, this can impact on their physical and psychological development and may lead to behavioural problems.²¹

Family violence is not defined as a specific harm justifying state intervention under Victorian law, but where a child is directly affected by family violence or is exposed to it, this may constitute grounds under the Children, Youth and Families Act for a child to be considered in need of protection.

Child Protection policy and procedure phases are as follows:

- ▷ Intake—Children who may be in need of protection can come into contact with DHHS through a report from a family member, member of the public, community or other organisation, some of whom are mandatory reporters. Child protection practitioners receive and review reports and assess whether an investigation is required.
- ▷ Investigation—Child protection practitioners obtain more detailed information about the child who is the subject of a report and determine whether the grounds for the report are substantiated, that is, they meet the statutory threshold for protective intervention.
- ▷ Protective intervention—If concerns for a child are substantiated, Child Protection may continue its involvement with the family through an appropriate level of continued involvement and referrals, during what is referred to as a 'protective intervention' phase. Child Protection may close substantiated cases where concerns have been addressed without the need for court intervention.
- ▷ Protection order—If a matter is substantiated and statutory involvement is needed to ensure a child's safety and wellbeing, Child Protection may file an application for a protection order in the Family Division of the Children's Court of Victoria. If the Court considers it necessary to protect a child from harm, there are a number of orders that can be made, including orders placing a child in out-of-home care.²²
- ▷ Case closure—Where protective concerns have been addressed or the matter has been referred to other services to address the concerns, Child Protection may close a case.²³

The vast majority of reports do not result in an investigation being undertaken, or substantiation. An overview of the stages in the child protection system is outlined below.

Source: Based on Department of Health and Human Services, 'Data Request Summary' (9 June 2015), Worksheet 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's notice to produce dated 5 June 2015, clarified on 4 February 2016.²⁴

Child Protection policy and procedure phases are discussed in turn below.

Intake

Child Protection receives reports from a number of sources. Anyone in the community may make a report to Child Protection if they are concerned about the wellbeing of a child,²⁵ or if they believe a child is in need of protection.²⁶

The Children, Youth and Families Act also provides for mandatory reporting of children at serious risk of harm. Certain people, including registered medical practitioners, nurses, midwives, teachers, school principals and police, are required to report to Child Protection when they believe on reasonable grounds that a child is in need of protection.²⁷

When a report is made to Child Protection, it is registered and, after an intake assessment process, the report is classified as either a 'protective intervention report', a 'child wellbeing report' or a report which is 'inappropriate/insufficient', in which case no further action is considered necessary or possible.²⁸ Classification of reports can be described as follows:

- ▷ If Child Protection determines that a child, who is the subject of a report, may be in need of protection, they may determine that the report is a 'protective intervention report' and investigate as soon as practicable.²⁹
- ▷ When reports are classified as child wellbeing reports, contact may be made with the family, child or the reporter to provide them with advice or a referral to an appropriate service and/or refer them to Child FIRST.³⁰

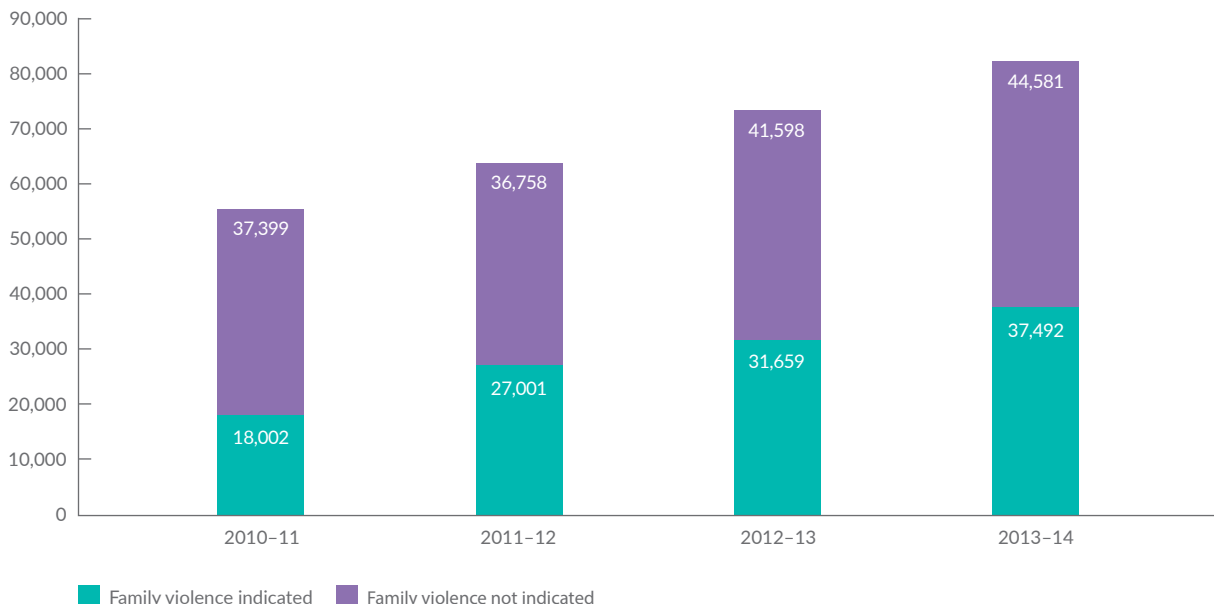

Ms Allen told the Commission that it generally takes up to three days for Child Protection to gather information and classify a report to determine whether a further investigation is required.³¹

Data from DHHS indicates that in 2013–14:³²

- ▷ Child Protection received 82,073 reports.
- ▷ 29.4 per cent ($n=24,139$) of those reports came from police, 23.1 per cent ($n=18,931$) from friends and family including extended family, 18.9 per cent ($n=15,510$) from education notifiers such as school teachers and pre-school teachers, 10.3 per cent ($n=8491$) from a range of community services such as Community Health and Child FIRST, and 9.4 per cent ($n=7697$) from medical notifiers.
- ▷ A total of 24,139 reports to Child Protection were made by police. Of those reports, 14,032 (approximately 58 per cent) were made to Child Protection via the police family violence L17 process.³³

There is some evidence that family violence is a driver for growth in Child Protection reports. In 2013–14, 37,492 reports to Child Protection had family violence indicated at the time of the report.³⁴ Data showing the trend of growth from 2010–11 to 2013–14 is set out in the figure below.

Investigation

Reports classified as 'protective intervention reports' are investigated by Child Protection. The aim of an investigation is to obtain more detailed information about a child who is the subject of a notification, to determine whether the notification is 'substantiated' or 'not substantiated'.³⁵

Child Protection undertakes its investigation by collecting information and interviewing relevant people, professionals and services who are involved with a family or child.³⁶ For example, they may interview parents and caregivers, schools, police and family services.

Child Protection analyses the information gathered during the investigation, based on the Best Interests Case Practice Model³⁷ and makes a recommendation within 28 days of the report as to whether the report is substantiated.³⁸ A Child Protection investigation will be substantiated where there is sufficient reason to believe a child is in need of protection,³⁹ after which a level of risk is determined.⁴⁰

According to DHHS data, of the total 82,073 reports to Child Protection in 2013–14, approximately 26 per cent ($n=21,222$) were investigated. For that same period, of the reports to Child Protection where family violence was indicated at the time of the report, approximately 30 per cent ($n=11,404$) were investigated.⁴¹

Substantiation

Of the reports where family violence was indicated that were investigated, approximately 73 per cent ($n=8278$) were substantiated and approximately 27 per cent ($n=3126$) were not substantiated.⁴² It is important to note that where a report is 'not substantiated', it does not mean that family violence did not occur or that a child is not at risk. Substantiated cases are those where Child Protection considers that a case has met the statutory test for protective intervention.⁴³

Cases that do not move to the protective intervention phase may still receive referrals to other services, such as specialist family violence services and/or Child FIRST as part of the Child Protection case closure procedure.

In 2013–14, of the 3126 reports where family violence was indicated that were not substantiated following investigation, by the point of case closure:

- ▷ 1320 (42.2 per cent) had no referrals made but other services were involved
- ▷ 656 (21.0 per cent) had no referrals made and no services involved
- ▷ 585 (18.7 per cent) had other referral or arrangements in place such as school monitoring
- ▷ 240 (7.7 per cent) were referred to Child FIRST (and a further 84 [2.7 per cent] to family services other than Child FIRST)
- ▷ 165 (5.3 per cent) were referred to another service or agency
- ▷ 53 (1.7 per cent) were referred to a family violence service
- ▷ eight cases (0.3 per cent) were referred to a disability service
- ▷ five (0.2 per cent) were referred to a drug and alcohol service
- ▷ seven (0.2 per cent) were referred to a mental health service
- ▷ three (0.1 per cent) had the case closure referral status of not stated.⁴⁴

Protective intervention

Once the threshold for Child Protection statutory intervention has been reached, a report is considered 'substantiated'. Child Protection must then attempt to ensure the safety of the child or children through an appropriate level of continued involvement, including the provision of support services to the child and family.⁴⁵

Protective intervention is the period of intervention with a family, following substantiation of a report to Child Protection.⁴⁶ After an investigation has substantiated child protection concerns, Child Protection has 90 days from the time of the report (or 150 days in exceptional circumstances) to work with families to address the substantiated concerns in an effort to strengthen protection for the child, and prevent the need for court intervention.⁴⁷ The Commission understands that these timelines are rarely met because of the increased number of reports.⁴⁸

Child Protection has a number of options available, including referring the family to a support service, taking no further action, or seeking a protection order application in the Children's Court of Victoria.⁴⁹

Many cases are closed following substantiation, without the need for a court order. In her statement to the Commission, Ms Allen said:

It is common for Child Protection to close substantiated cases without the need for court intervention. This most often occurs where the parents acknowledge the substantiated concerns and the need for change, or are actively involved in addressing the concerns or have addressed the concerns, or the concern for the child's safety and well-being is not significant and does not warrant court intervention.⁵⁰

The Australian Institute of Health and Welfare reported that in 2013–14 the national average of children receiving child protection services is 27.2 per 1000 children.⁵¹ The rate of Victorian children receiving child protection services was lower than in most other Australian states and territories. Nearly 23 (22.9) children per 1000 receive child protection services in Victoria, compared with 71.3 in the Northern Territory, 31.7 in New South Wales and 26.6 in Queensland.⁵²

Protection order

Where concerns for a child's safety have not been adequately addressed, Child Protection may consider an application to the Family Division of the Children's Court of Victoria for a protection order when a child is considered in need of protection.⁵³

The Children's Court can make a protection order under the Children, Youth and Families Act where at least one of six grounds have been made out, including abandonment or incapacity of parents, or where a child has suffered, or is likely to suffer significant harm as a result of physical injury or sexual abuse, or emotional or psychological harm.⁵⁴ Protection orders are regarded as a last resort and cannot be made by the court unless it is satisfied that all reasonable steps have been taken by the Secretary of DHHS to provide necessary services.⁵⁵ The court must make orders based on the best interests of the child.⁵⁶

Of the 17,405 new protective orders issued during 2013–14,⁵⁷ family violence was indicated in 68.6 per cent of cases ($n=11,933$). The Commission notes that this does not mean that family violence was the sole ground indicated.

If the grounds for a protection order are made out,⁵⁸ the court has the jurisdiction to make a range of protective orders, including:

- ▷ an order requiring a person to give an undertaking to do, or not to do, certain things⁵⁹
- ▷ a supervision order granting the Secretary of DHHS responsibility for the supervision of a child and placing the child in the day-to-day care of one or both of the parents, with the possible imposition of conditions made in the best interests of the child⁶⁰
- ▷ an order granting custody of a child to a third party (for example, an extended family member) which may include conditions considered to be in the best interests of the child⁶¹
- ▷ a supervised custody order, granting the custody of a child to a third party⁶²
- ▷ an order granting custody and/or guardianship of a child to the Secretary of DHHS⁶³
- ▷ an interim protection order where a child is in need of protection⁶⁴ but the testing of the appropriateness of a particular course of action before making a final protection order is desirable.⁶⁵

The Commission notes that the protective orders as listed above are subject to legislative amendments that will come into operation on 1 March 2016.⁶⁶

Children's Court conciliation conferences

As part of Children's Court proceedings, conciliation conferences are convened in the Family Division of the Children's Court when ordered by a Children's Court judicial officer.⁶⁷ The current conference process was established in 2010.⁶⁸ 2500 conferences were held in 2013–14.⁶⁹ Conciliation conferences are a form of informal dispute resolution or alternative dispute resolution.

Anecdotal information suggests that the vast majority of conciliation conference cases involve family violence.⁷⁰ The court requires that, prior to a conference, they are informed of the existence of any orders under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) by the parties or their lawyers.⁷¹

A risk assessment is conducted with each of the parties⁷² prior to the conference by a conference intake officer. A shuttle conference—where the parties do not come into direct contact with each other but only the convenor moves between the parties—may be held if there are safety risks due to family violence.⁷³ Officers have the power to determine that a conference is unsuitable in a particular case, meaning the matter will be listed for hearing by a judicial officer.⁷⁴ The Conciliation Conference Risk Assessment form asks specific questions so as to undertake a family violence assessment.⁷⁵ The Commission notes that this form does not comply with the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF).

Parents in conciliation conferences at the Children's Court do not necessarily negotiate directly with each other. Nevertheless, parents are required to attend the conference jointly and negotiate the care of their children (unless exempted by an intake officer). Given the prevalence of family violence cases in conciliation conferences,⁷⁶ it might be expected that the presence of a victim and perpetrator of family violence at a conference would impact upon the ability of the victim of family violence to advocate for herself and for her children. The presence of lawyers may mitigate the impact of family violence upon the conciliation conference process.⁷⁷

Legal representation of children

In the Family Division of the Children's Court, children aged 10 or above must be legally represented.⁷⁸ Children under the age of 10 are not independently legally represented unless the court identifies that there are special circumstances to warrant representation.⁷⁹

A lawyer for the child will act on the child's instructions⁸⁰ unless the court decides that the child is not mature enough to provide instructions.⁸¹ Where that is the case, the lawyer must communicate the child's wishes to the court, but make submissions based on what he or she believes is in the child's best interests.⁸² Children's lawyers in the Family Division are funded by Victoria Legal Aid.⁸³

A teenage victim of family violence who was removed from her parents' care described her experience of her lawyer to the Commission as the only time an adult had done something constructive for her over the period of the abuse she suffered.⁸⁴

Out-of-home care

Where a child or young person is assessed at risk of significant harm, Child Protection may take steps to remove the child from the care of their parents and place them in out-of-home care.⁸⁵ Child Protection may place a child in an out-of-home care service,⁸⁶ having regard to the best interests of the child and other factors set out in the legislation.⁸⁷

As at 30 June 2014, there were 7070 children or young people in out-of-home care placements in Victoria. Of those children or young people, family violence was indicated in approximately 48 per cent of cases ($n=3400$).⁸⁸

A 2007 summary of Australian research found that the outcomes for children and young people in out-of-home care 'demonstrated a worrying trend of increasingly complex behavioural problems and extensive placement instability. Collectively, the studies found that problems increased the longer the children spent indefinite periods in care.'⁸⁹

Given the timeframes of the Commission, we were unable to inquire fully into experiences of children and young people in out-of-home care due to family violence. However, this is an important issue worthy of a more detailed investigation to determine the impact that out-of-home care has on children who have already been exposed to family violence.

Case closure

Where Child Protection intervention is considered no longer necessary or not possible, a case may be closed. Prior to case closure, Child Protection may make referrals to link families in with family services and relevant support agencies.

As an example, in 2013–14, DHHS data shows that of the 8278 reports that had family violence indicated and were investigated and substantiated, by the point of case closure:

- ▷ 2753 (33.3 per cent) had no referrals made but other services were involved
- ▷ 1621 (19.6 per cent) had the case closure referral status of 'not stated'
- ▷ 1092 (13.2 per cent) reports had other referral or other arrangements in place
- ▷ 906 (10.9 per cent) were referred to Child FIRST
- ▷ 778 (9.4 per cent) had no referrals made and no services were involved
- ▷ 564 (6.8 per cent) were referred to another service or agency
- ▷ 311 (3.8 per cent) were referred to a family service other than Child FIRST
- ▷ 166 (2.0 per cent) were referred to a family violence service
- ▷ 52 (0.6 per cent) were referred to a mental health service
- ▷ 18 (0.2 per cent) were referred to a disability service
- ▷ 17 (0.2 per cent) were referred to a drug and alcohol service.

Based on that data, only about 2.0 per cent of reports were referred to a family violence service for that period. The Commission notes that the data indicates many cases already had other services involved, which may include family violence services.

Similarly, of the total number of reports to Child Protection for the same year where family violence was indicated at the time of the report ($n=37,492$ reports), approximately 2.0 per cent ($n=737$) were referred to a family violence service by Child Protection.⁹⁰

The Commission is unable to establish whether referrals should have been made in cases where this did not occur. Nor could we ascertain whether the services involved were appropriate. The Commission notes that, in cases that are referred to Child Protection by police as part of the L17 process, police may have already referred the parent to a specialist family violence service. When police formally refer an affected family member (victim) to a specialised family violence service, they state if there were any children present at an incident and children will be considered as part of that formal referral.⁹¹

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children in the child protection system

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children are over-represented in Victoria's child protection system. Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families experience family violence at far higher rates than the population generally.⁹²

In Victoria, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children are around seven to eight times more likely to be the subject of a report to Child Protection than non-Aboriginal children,⁹³ and are almost 10 times more likely than non-Aboriginal children to be the subject of a Child Protection substantiation (68.6 compared with 7.3 per 1000 children).⁹⁴ Across Australia, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children now account for almost 35 per cent of all children in care, despite comprising only 4.4 per cent of Australia's child population.⁹⁵

A preliminary finding of Taskforce 1000, a collaborative project between DHHS and the Commission for Children and Young People, indicates that family violence is the number one factor for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children in Victoria being placed in out-of-home care, closely followed by, and often related to, alcohol and substance abuse, and neglect.⁹⁶

Adjunct Professor Muriel Bamblett AM, Chief Executive Officer, Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, told the Commission that family violence and the over-representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities must be understood within the context of earlier government policies, including the forced removal of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children from their families and assimilation, together with 'structural inequalities of poverty and systemic racism'.⁹⁷ She said that family violence is predominately prevalent in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families 'experiencing poverty and other issues including drug and alcohol abuse and homelessness'.⁹⁸

In his evidence to the Commission, Commissioner Andrew Jackomos, Commission for Aboriginal Children and Young People, said:

The cause of family violence I believe is to do with the breakdown of our society's values and norms, traditions and culture that has increased over the past 30 or 40 years and its cumulative harm and dysfunction is happening for many families in generation to generation.⁹⁹

Commissioner Jackomos further told the Commission that:

The impact of past government policies and programs have had a devastating effect on my community that continues to this day, but there is no, and will never be, any justification for family violence, family violence that is ripping apart families and ripping apart children from their culture and heritage. From my perspective I'm looking at family violence from the perspective of Koori children in Victoria. In my families under threat from family violence, the offender is not always Koori and the victim is not always Koori, but the constant is that our children, our Koori kids, are always the victim.¹⁰⁰

The Commission consistently heard that a fear of intervention by Child Protection deters Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women from disclosing family violence¹⁰¹ and data shows that fewer families and children are accessing services.¹⁰²

Under the Children, Youth and Families Act, there are additional decision-making principles for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children who are referred to Child Protection.¹⁰³ Child Protection is required to consult with the Aboriginal Child Specialist Advice and Support Service about all reports regarding Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children, and prior to making significant decisions in all phases of Child Protection intervention.¹⁰⁴

The Act also includes the Aboriginal child placement principle, which requires regard to be given to a range of criteria and principles when deciding if it is in the best interests of an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander child to be placed in out-of-home care.¹⁰⁵ To give effect to those principles when considering to place an Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander child in out-of-home care, the Child Protection Best Interests Case Practice Model and the Act set out that practitioners must consult with an Aboriginal agency, the Aboriginal Child Specialist Advice and Support Service, to provide advice, support and advocacy.¹⁰⁶

The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (FVPLS Victoria) believes that greater investment needs to be made in culturally targeted early intervention, including ensuring that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families receive legal education and advice, when there is a risk that a protection order may be made.¹⁰⁷

In its submission, FVPLS Victoria states:

In the case of child protection and the removal of Aboriginal children, FVPLS Victoria believes early referral to specialist, culturally safe legal assistance is fundamental. Sadly, however, too many Aboriginal people in Victoria do not recognise child protection intervention as a legal issue until it is too late. Indeed, FVPLS Victoria routinely hears of clients being advised by Child Protection workers and other support workers that they do not need legal advice.¹⁰⁸

DHHS refuted this claim, referring to Child Protection's legal mandate and information sheets which child protection staff are expected to provide to parents.¹⁰⁹ In particular DHHS drew the Commission's attention to Practice Advice 1340, stating that in proceedings by notice, child protection practitioners should 'encourage and assist' parents to seek legal advice prior to the first mention date and that parents may be directed to Aboriginal Legal Services. In emergency cases, child protection staff are told to direct parents to Victoria Legal Aid or the court registry to obtain legal representation on arrival at court, and that practitioners should also alert the Victoria Legal Aid Coordinator of any new matters at court and the need for children and parents to be seen by a solicitor.¹¹⁰

The practice guidance does not require that a formal referral or notification be made to an Aboriginal legal service provider. FVPLS Victoria recommends implementing a child protection notification referral system for Aboriginal families 'which ensures that upon a child protection notification being received for an Aboriginal family the primary parent is immediately referred to FVPLS Victoria (or another appropriate legal assistance provider).'¹¹¹

Issues relating to child removal and family violence are further discussed in Chapter 26.

Challenges for Child Protection

A number of key themes emerged during the Commission's processes regarding Child Protection's response to family violence. These include:

- ▷ the invisibility of perpetrators of family violence in the child protection system
- ▷ the pressures placed on parents (typically mothers) identified as 'protective parents' and a lack of attention to post-separation violence
- ▷ a lack of support provided to 'protective parents' by Child Protection and the lack of written advice so as to better support parents in court proceedings
- ▷ victims being reluctant to report family violence because of the fear that Child Protection will remove their children
- ▷ concerns with the 'failure to protect' offence and how it can affect victims of family violence
- ▷ the increase in the number of referrals to Child Protection and difficulties with the differential response model in Victoria and the pressure placed on Child Protection
- ▷ concerns with the current family violence risk assessment within Child Protection.

These themes, and others, are discussed below.

The 'protective parent'

The concept of a 'protective parent' is central to the child protection system, including in family violence cases.¹¹²

Under section 162 of the Children, Youth and Families Act, the state has a legislative mandate to intervene in family life only where a child has suffered or is likely to suffer significant harm and his or her parents have not protected or are unlikely to protect the child from harm.¹¹³ In cases of family violence, in practical terms, victims may be unable to fully protect their child from harm because of the level of risk posed by the perpetrator. As we discuss below, this may make victims fearful of reporting family violence.

Separation (or attempted separation) is a period of heightened risk and danger for family violence.¹¹⁴ In exploring protective factors, consideration needs to be given to a victim's decision to move away from the perpetrator as this may 'significantly increase the level of risk and must be carefully examined, because it is truly protective only if there is no chance of the perpetrator locating the victim'.¹¹⁵

The Commission heard that separation from a perpetrator of violence could result in Child Protection classifying a victim as a protective parent and withdraw their involvement with a family:

When a mother is acting protectively and leaves a perpetrator, Child Protection services withdraw their involvement; this is in spite of the fact separation is a high-risk time which carries a heightened threat of perpetrators killing women and children. This is the [very] time that Child Protection needs to be further involved, as it one of the few agencies that has a statutory mandate to protect.¹¹⁶

Professor Cathy Humphreys, Professor of Social Work at Melbourne University, explained:

... the child protection system is not designed to intervene effectively where there is a protective mother (or father), but the child and often the mother are continuing to be subjected to post-separation violence and stalking. Much of the abuse occurs when the child moves from time with their father to time with their mother.¹¹⁷

The dynamics of family violence are such that it requires a complex analysis and risk assessment. In determining a parent's capacity to protect a child, Child Protection applies their Best Interests Case Practice Model. The model includes principles of gender analysis in responding to family violence¹¹⁸ and risk assessment¹¹⁹ together with 'stages of professional practice: information gathering, analysis and planning, action and reviewing outcomes'.¹²⁰

Using separation from an abusive relationship as a marker of being a protective parent was a strong focus in the literature and in expert evidence provided to the Commission.¹²¹ This was identified as a problem in many jurisdictions. Dr Katreena Scott, Associate Professor and Canada Research Chair, Department of Applied Psychology and Human Development, University of Toronto, Canada, stated:

Where Child Protection authorities become involved, rather than engage with the perpetrator of the violence, they tend to assess and monitor mothers' capacity to protect their children. There is often an implicit (and sometimes explicit) expectation that, to effectively protect their children, mothers should leave their violent partners (Jenney, Mishna, Alaggia and Scott, 2014). This focus on mothers' capacity to protect over fathers' need to change is inappropriate and unjust. It is especially problematic in the context of family courts, which often order children (and therefore mothers) to have ongoing contact with their fathers.¹²²

In her statement to the Commission, Ms Leeanne Miller explained how the concept of a protective parent is translated into Child Protection practice in Victoria:

In investigating child protection matters, Child Protection considers whether or not there is a protective parent. This involves considering the parent's attitudes and response to substantiated concerns concerning the child, as well as the parent's willingness and capacity to protect the child. Assessment of the parent's capacity to protect the child requires sound information-gathering and an analysis of parental attitudes, past behaviours that may be predictive of future behaviours, parental strengths, support systems and the parent's willingness and capacity to engage with support services to achieve change.¹²³

The Commission heard the focus on the protective parent's ability to protect their children from family violence tends to make perpetrators largely invisible to the child protection system. Professor Humphreys explained that 'women are still urged to separate but without the necessary supports to keep themselves and their children safe'. She stated that effective support needs to include: extensive discussion to assess 'readiness'; the evidence to demonstrate the child's father is a danger to the child; proactive links to the family violence support services; and leverage provided with housing services, Centrelink and legal proceedings to ensure there is accommodation (beyond a couple of nights in a refuge), money to live on and legal protection that is enforceable.¹²⁴

Burden placed on protective parents

The Commission heard that relying on a victim of family violence to be the protective parent may expose that parent and the child to further violence. In the inquest into the death of Luke Batty, Judge Gray heard that Luke's mother, Ms Rosie Batty, was assessed by her child protection worker as 'protective' because she had twice notified the police of breaches of the family violence intervention order she had taken out, she had herself sought Child Protection assistance from DHHS, and she was willing, and intended to protect her son.¹²⁵

After discussion with a child protection worker, Ms Batty signed an undertaking in which she agreed to supervise contact between her son Luke, and Gregory Anderson, the perpetrator of family violence. She agreed to prevent Mr Anderson from photographing Luke and keep Luke in her line of sight while he was with Mr Anderson.¹²⁶ The child protection worker in that case gave evidence that the undertaking worked as a safety plan and that she had considered that Ms Batty was the appropriate person to implement the agreement and ensure it was followed.¹²⁷

Under the Children, Youth and Families Act, the Children's Court of Victoria can, with the consent of a parent,¹²⁸ make an order for a person to enter into an undertaking to do, or not to do, certain things. A statutory undertaking normally lasts for six months, and in exceptional circumstances can last for 12 months.¹²⁹ The undertaking Ms Batty signed was not made under the Act.

DHHS practice directions, manuals and training materials do not require a 'protective parent' to sign a non-statutory undertaking,¹³⁰ however:

It is apparent that in the absence of specific policy advice a practice has emerged in parts of the State where undertakings are prepared by child protection practitioners to support safety planning discussions with families, including families experiencing family violence.¹³¹

When asked for information on the number of non-statutory undertakings which DHHS had required from victims of family violence in 2013–14 and 2014–15, DHHS told the Commission that it 'does not have systems in place to generate reports on the number of such undertakings made'.¹³² The extent of their use is unknown.

In the inquest into the death of Luke Batty, Judge Gray observed that requiring victims of family violence to enter into informal undertakings shifts too much responsibility onto protective parents and in that case, required too much of Ms Batty.¹³³ Judge Gray also noted that the undertaking conflicted with the family violence intervention order in place at the time, and that the agreement was not legally enforceable.¹³⁴ Judge Gray recommended that DHHS discontinue the practice of asking women who are victims of family violence, to enter into such undertakings.¹³⁵

The Victorian Government, in its response to Judge Gray's findings in the Luke Batty Inquest, advised that they have commenced implementation of this recommendation and DHHS will communicate to all Child Protection staff, 'that it is not appropriate to require protective parents to manage or supervise the perpetrator of family violence' and will amend the Child Protection Practice Manual accordingly.¹³⁶ This was expected to be done by 31 January 2016.¹³⁷

Lack of support

The Commission heard that women felt unsupported by Child Protection when they went to them for help and this could lead to confusion about what was expected of them by Child Protection.

The Peninsula Community Legal Centre told the Commission that:

Many of the Centre's clients who seek support from DHS, or who have come to the attention of DHS in order to keep their child/ren safe, are not only left with unclear verbal requirements, but are also expected to deal with the perpetrator, who may constantly be drug or alcohol affected or mentally ill, on their own. They frequently present with no written indication of what DHS expects of them, yet are at risk of losing their child/ren if they do not comply, or are unable to ensure that the perpetrator does not have contact with the child/ren as they have had no assistance from DHS to negotiate an appropriate order at the court.¹³⁸

Lack of support to obtain a court order

The Commission was told that women were often informed by Child Protection that they should obtain an FVIO to protect themselves and their children, or risk further involvement by Child Protection.

Throughout our community engagement process, the Commission heard that women who were victims of family violence felt unsupported by DHHS because there was no DHHS practitioner in court to help them navigate the court process, and because DHHS did not always provide information to the court to clarify their views regarding safety:

She was told by DHHS to get an Intervention Order. Violence was against both her and her children. DHHS said either she got an Intervention Order or they would take the children. She went to court by herself—very unhelpful experience, no idea what she was doing. Registrar did not explain anything and DHHS didn't help her.¹³⁹

Child Protection can take a long time and without the supports to be able to take that step you don't have the courage and then you lose your children. DHHS use a bargaining tool—apply for an Intervention Order and leave or lose your children.¹⁴⁰

DHHS tells you what you should do but they don't really help you.¹⁴¹

In her evidence to the Commission, Ms Allen said:

Any stage of Child Protection involvement, if we believe that the mother would require support for an intervention order we can do that through the Children's Court or the Magistrates' Court to support the mother and child in that process.¹⁴²

Ms Allen said that DHHS is encouraging its workforce to offer greater levels of assistance to mothers who are required to seek an intervention order. When asked about whether this assistance happens in practice, Ms Allen responded:

It does, yes. Probably I would say not as much as it could or should. Often what will happen is that mothers will initiate that process independently. What we are encouraging the workforce to do is to be engaging with mothers more frequently to offer greater levels of assistance where we are involved, to say, "Would you like us to go or, if not, have you got a family violence worker you are already engaged with," or, "Do you understand how to navigate the Magistrates' Court. This is what it looks like. This is what you need to do when you get to the registrar. These are the courts to go to where there's family violence specialists" and so forth. So as part of all of the training that we referred to earlier, a lot of that is covered in the training to promote better engagement of Child Protection practitioners with women who are trying to navigate what is a really very, very complex service system.¹⁴³

The Commission also heard that parents may be told by Child Protection practitioners to obtain parenting orders in the federal family courts in order to prevent the other parent from having unsafe contact with the child. However, if a Child Protection case is closed because the mother is regarded as a protective parent, she may not receive any support from Child Protection in applying for a parenting order.¹⁴⁴

In 2010, the Australian and NSW Law Reform Commissions recommended that where Child Protection workers assess a family violence victim as an adequately protective parent and refer the parent to a family court to apply for a parenting order, DHHS should:

- provide written information to a family court about the reasons for the referral
- provide reports and other evidence
- intervene in the proceedings.¹⁴⁵

Intervention in proceedings means that DHHS becomes a party to the proceedings in the federal family courts.

In the Luke Batty inquest, Judge Gray considered that in cases where Child Protection considers whether the other parent still poses a risk of harm, and thus a child is in need of protection within the meaning of the Children, Youth and Families Act,¹⁴⁶ then:

DHS ought supply evidence and/or support to the protective parent in family violence and family law proceedings where the right of the other (non protective parent) to have contact with the child is in issue.¹⁴⁷

Judge Gray considered that in cases where a parent is willing to protect a child, but is unable due to 'surrounding circumstances', that it should be DHHS' mandate to intervene in these circumstances.¹⁴⁸ He also canvassed the importance of ensuring a proper safety plan for the child rather than relying on the protective parent's ability to protect a child.¹⁴⁹

Judge Gray also recommended that:

... where the DHHS assess one parent to be 'protective' but the other is not, that the DHHS provide support to the protective parent, including in court proceedings, to manage the risk posed by the non-protective parent including, (where relevant and appropriate) by recommending that the other non protective parent have no contact with the child.¹⁵⁰

In their response to Judge Gray, the Victorian Government has said that this recommendation will be implemented so as 'to offer as much support as practicable to protective parents including during court proceedings'.¹⁵¹ However, they have confirmed that Child Protection intervention is limited to that necessary under the Act.¹⁵² The Commission has not had the benefit of reviewing the work proposed by DHHS to implement this recommendation but notes the existence of the current Child Protection specialist practice resource guide, Working With Families Where an Adult is Violent (2014). This provides some guidance to practitioners on providing information and support to a parent both in FVIO and family court proceedings. The practice guide includes guidance to child protection practitioners when supporting a woman going back to the family court as a result of family violence:

Practical support such as transport, child care and emergency financial assistance are important when you are supporting women to go back to the family court to vary the parenting order. Your emotional support and physical presence is very important as women negotiate the often confusing court experience. Keep in mind that court action of itself can increase dangers and some perpetrators will escalate at this point. If you are concerned about the risk factors, notify the registrar of the court to advise them of the risk and specific circumstances.¹⁵³

In Victoria, there is a protocol between DHHS, the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates' Court (now known as the Federal Circuit Court), the purpose of which is to facilitate contact between the Department and the courts, to enable cooperation, clarification of procedures, improve decision making and aid effective communication.¹⁵⁴

Information sharing between DHHS and the federal family courts is further discussed in Chapter 24.

Closing Child Protection cases

As we have explained above, a Child Protection case can be closed at any point of the process described above.

The Commission heard of the need for Child Protection to provide better support for families as part of the process of closing a Child Protection case. Berry Street told the Commission that 'a level of safety planning and service referral should be routine' wherever Child Protection is involved and 'whether family violence is disclosed or not'.¹⁵⁵ Research suggests that good Child Protection practice should involve supporting 'the non-abusing parent (normally the mother) and help her to strengthen the mother-child relationship, which will in turn protect the child'.¹⁵⁶

The Commission heard that where a person is considered to be a protective parent, Child Protection frequently decides to take no further action to protect the child. This can result in Child Protection ceasing to be involved with the family at the point of separation, although this can be a time of high danger for family violence.¹⁵⁷

The inquest into the death of Luke Batty found that Child Protection closed its file after Ms Batty signed an undertaking. Judge Gray recommended that in family violence cases, 'such as where one parent is believed to be non-protective' a professional case conference should be convened before closing a Child Protection case,¹⁵⁸ whereby DHHS should, among other things, exhaust best efforts to:

- engage all agencies involved with the family to remediate the issue of services working in isolation and risk assessments being made with insufficient information
- develop a comprehensive and robust safety plan with clear roles and responsibilities as required.

Judge Gray also made a related recommendation regarding a requirement for Child Protection to exhaust all best efforts to interview the alleged perpetrator of family violence.¹⁵⁹ That recommendation is discussed separately below.

The Victorian Government's response to Judge Gray's recommendations in the Luke Batty inquest stated that new legislation will be introduced from 1 March 2016 that will require the development of a case plan for substantiated Child Protection cases.¹⁶⁰ The response was limited to these cases because:

DHHS considers that the recommendation relates to substantiated reports of child abuse, and notes that there is a very large number of unsubstantiated allegations of child abuse and neglect made to Child Protection each year. Direct contact with parents occurs at investigation, and it is from the point of substantiation onwards that the new requirements will have effect.¹⁶¹

The relevant recommendations from Judge Gray would also feature in DHHS case planning processes for all substantiated cases from 1 March 2016. Given the timeframe, the Commission is unable to access or consider either the proposed legislation or new practice processes.

Fear of reporting family violence

The Commission heard that the focus on the behaviour of the protective parent can heighten the fear of some parents that if they report family violence, Child Protection may remove their children from their care:

[H]e was attending the Men's behavioural change program in [removed], the workers had made contact with me as part of the partner support program and I had a couple of meetings with them. They were very supportive and unbeknown to me reported my ex to child protection based on some of the things I was disclosing to them about his behaviour. I also linked in with the social worker at the [removed] hospital for support, and the enhanced care maternal health nurse. Despite these supports, I daren't disclose the extent of what he was saying or doing for fear of my baby being taken into care and away from me. After all I had previously been employed by [removed] ... so I knew this was entirely possible.¹⁶²

Another witness said:

[Y]ou know when you are in so much fear 24 hours a day, it is just a huge thing to deal with, and I'm frightened of not only my safety, my children's safety, trying to do the right thing. I was scared that Child Protection would try and take my children away from me if I couldn't show that I was protecting them, and obviously I couldn't stop him from breaching the orders. So it was pretty horrible ... I was also really scared that if Child Protection found out how much he was breaching the order, that they would try and take my kids.¹⁶³

I was frightened that if Child Protection knew how frequently X was breaching the IVO they would determine I could not protect my children and I would lose custody. In my first meeting with Child Protection, they told me explicitly that they were not interested in me or my circumstances, their only concern was whether my children were protected by me or not. This made me feel highly anxious.¹⁶⁴

An anonymous submission to the Commission articulated similar pressures:

The child services officer informed me that if I didn't kick him out immediately, I would probably be investigated for being a non-protective parent. After that advice, I had no choice, even though, knowing him, it would have been safer to 'make up' with him that evening and leave when I'd done some proper planning and got some money. I tried to explain this to the counsellor, but she kept overriding me, saying the money wasn't important. I realised that if I chose to [go] against their advice and something happened to me and the children, I would be blamed and the kids could be taken away from me.¹⁶⁵

Professor Humphreys has observed that state surveillance of single mothers is most marked for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.¹⁶⁶ Child Protection intervention has been a significant deterrent for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families to disclose family violence¹⁶⁷ and as a consequence, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women may be unable or unwilling to access support services for family violence. This is further discussed in Chapter 26.

'Failure to protect' laws

The Commission received a number of submissions calling for the repeal or amendment of the failure to disclose offence in section 327 of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic).¹⁶⁸

Background to Victoria's 'failure to protect' offences

'Failure to protect' laws are laws that make it an offence for adults to fail to take action when they are aware a child in their care is at risk of abuse or other violence. These laws exist, in broader and narrower formulations, in various jurisdictions including Victoria, South Australia, the Northern Territory, the United Kingdom, United States and New Zealand.¹⁶⁹ These laws can include a failure to report or disclose.

In 2011, as part of its pre-election commitments, the Victorian Government commenced consultation on the introduction of more stringent failure to protect laws.¹⁷⁰ Many organisations cautioned against this approach because of the possibility they could be used against victims of family violence. The Protecting Victoria's Vulnerable Children Inquiry (Cummins Inquiry) noted that caution should be exercised about the enactment of such laws. If they were to be introduced, the prosecution should be required to prove that the accused was not exposed to family violence.¹⁷¹

The Cummins Inquiry also recommended that the Crimes Act should be amended to create a separate reporting duty where there is a reasonable suspicion that a child is being, or has been, physically or sexually abused by an individual within a religious or spiritual organisation, and that this offence should attract a suitable penalty having regard to existing offences in the Crimes Act and the Children, Youth and Families Act.¹⁷²

In 2012, in response to another recommendation in the Cummins Inquiry that a formal investigation be conducted into the process by which religious organisations respond to the criminal abuse of children by religious personnel within their organisations,¹⁷³ the Victorian Government requested that the Family and Community Development Committee (Committee) undertake an inquiry into these processes. In November 2013, the Committee recommended, among other things, that a 'failure to report' offence in relation to child abuse should be introduced into the Crimes Act.¹⁷⁴ It also recommended that this offence should apply not only to religious and spiritual organisations, as recommended in the Cummins Inquiry, but to the community at large.¹⁷⁵ The Committee stated that all adults have a moral responsibility to report any reasonably held suspicions about someone who may be committing acts amounting to criminal child abuse, and that encouraging people to report actual or suspected criminal child abuse was vital.¹⁷⁶

Accordingly, the Victorian Government introduced the Crimes Amendment (Protection of Children) Bill 2014 (Vic) which enacted a 'failure to disclose' offence in the Crimes Act for failing to disclose child sex abuse to the police. Section 327(2) of the Crimes Act, which took effect in October 2014, provides that:

a person of or over the age of 18 years (whether in Victoria or elsewhere) who has information that leads the person to form a reasonable belief that a sexual offence has been committed in Victoria against a child under the age of 16 years by another person of or over the age of 18 years must disclose that information to a police officer as soon as it is practicable to do so, unless the person has a reasonable excuse for not doing so.

The Victorian Government did not take up the suggestion made in the Cummins Inquiry that any 'failure to protect' offence should require the prosecution to prove that family violence is not present.

However, section 327(3) provides a defence if a person has a 'reasonable excuse' for their failure to disclose, including where the person fears on reasonable grounds for the safety of any person (other than the person reasonably believed to have committed the offence) if the information was disclosed to police, and the failure to disclose the information to police was a reasonable response in the circumstances.¹⁷⁷

The maximum penalty for the offence is three years' imprisonment.

Comparison with other offences

In Victoria, there is an existing failure to protect offence in section 493(1)(b) of the Children, Youth and Families Act. This section provides that a person who has a duty of care in respect of a child who intentionally fails to take action that has resulted, or appears to result, in the child's physical development or health being significantly harmed, is guilty of an offence. Sub-section (2) provides that proceedings for an offence may only be brought after consultation with the Secretary of DHHS. The maximum penalty for the offence is 50 penalty units¹⁷⁸ or 12 months' imprisonment.

This offence existed in substantially identical terms in the previous legislation, the Children and Young Persons Act 1989 (Vic).¹⁷⁹ There have only been 13 incidents recorded against this offence by Victoria Police since 2000¹⁸⁰ and the Commission is not aware of any prosecutions to date.

There are important differences between many of the failure to protect offences that exist (both in other jurisdictions and in Victoria) and the offence in section 327 of the Crimes Act. Some of the key differences between section 493 of the Children, Youth and Families Act and section 327 of the Crimes Act are shown in Table 11.1.

Table 11.1 Section 327 of the Crimes Act and section 493 of the Children, Youth and Families Act

Section 327 Crimes Act	Section 493 Children, Youth and Families Act
The offence applies to the whole community (over the age of 18), not just those persons that have a duty of care in respect of a child	The offence applies to those who have a duty of care in respect of a child
The conduct required by the offence is limited to reporting to a police officer, not a general duty to 'take action'	The conduct required by the offence is to 'take action'. The appropriate action that should be taken in any particular case would depend on the facts of the case
The subject matter of the required disclosure is limited to disclosing information regarding sexual offences that have been committed against a child under the age of 16	This offence applies to any conduct that has resulted in the child's physical development or health being significantly harmed
There is no express element of intention	There is an express element of intention
There is a defence of 'reasonable excuse' under section 327 which may apply to victims of family violence	There is no specific defence that applies. However, as noted above, proceedings for an offence may only be brought after consultation with the Secretary of DHHS.

It has been argued that failure to protect laws should be drafted clearly to lessen their potentially negative effect.¹⁸¹ This may require defining when the duty of care to protect children exists, delineating the steps a person must take when they become aware of the abuse and adopting an affirmative defence to excuse persons who fear for their safety or the safety of abused children.¹⁸² Arguably, the section 327 offence has been drafted to meet some of these suggested criteria.

Concerns about section 327

Those who supported an amendment to the law argued that the Victorian Government should amend the offence to limit it to a failure to disclose by a person in authority within a relevant organisation.¹⁸³

The Commission was told that failure to disclose offences are problematic for a number of reasons. These include:

- ▷ the 'chilling effect' on rates of voluntary reporting
- ▷ the detrimental effect to women who are experiencing family violence because of the high co-occurrence of child abuse and family violence against others (for example, the child's mother)
- ▷ their disproportionate impact on women
- ▷ their relative ineffectiveness.

The Commission heard that failure to disclose laws place responsibility for abusive behaviour on the non-abusive parent, which is inconsistent with recent reforms regarding perpetrator accountability.¹⁸⁴

Several of the submissions argued that the 'failure to disclose' offence is unnecessary, particularly as it applies to individuals. In cases where, for example, a mother has voluntarily participated in the abuse of her children, this conduct would be adequately covered by the law on complicity.¹⁸⁵ The Commission notes that such laws may not cover every situation; for example, where a person had no involvement in the offence and merely had information suggesting that an offence had been committed against a child.

Finally, in relation to the offence under section 327, we were told that the offence is unnecessary because of the existence of section 493 of the Children, Youth and Families Act and that the 'reasonable excuse' defence is inadequate (discussed in detail below).¹⁸⁶

None of the submissions raised concerns in respect of section 493 of the Children, Youth and Families Act, which can also be characterised as a failure to protect offence. Some of the criticisms that were levelled at section 327 of the Crimes Act also apply to section 493 of the Children, Youth and Families Act.

There are clearly competing policy considerations that exist in respect of the offence under section 327 (and section 493 of the Children, Youth and Families Act). On the one hand, it is important to protect vulnerable children from sexual abuse and encourage the reporting of potential abuse. On the other hand, it is also critical to protect victims of family violence from prosecution for failing to take an action that they were arguably powerless to take and which may actually increase the risk to them and the child. It appears the provision has been drafted with these competing considerations in mind.

Invisible perpetrators

In her 2007 issues paper on family violence and Child Protection, Professor Humphreys noted a range of Child Protection practices that contribute to making perpetrators, often fathers, invisible to the system. These include formal Child Protection reports that fail to mention family violence; serious family violence being described by Child Protection as 'family conflict'; family violence being attributed to mental illness or substance abuse; and a failure by Child Protection to engage violent men in assessments.¹⁸⁷

The Commission heard multiple accounts of experiences within the Victorian child protection system on this issue.¹⁸⁸ As described by the Australian Association of Social Workers:

Child protection systems often emphasise the behaviour of the mother as the issue that puts children at risk, rather than it being the abusive behaviour of the perpetrator that places the children at risk. Women victims of violence often bear the full force of official surveillance and judgement of their competence as a parent, with the perpetrator of that violence disappearing from public scrutiny. The perpetrator is not held accountable for his violence, escaping any scrutiny or accountability. Rather than taking this opportunity to engage with the perpetrator and hold him to account for his violence the system misses a unique window to intervene and force him to deal with his behaviour and return the family to safety.¹⁸⁹

Cobaw Community Health argued that failing to engage with perpetrators is partly due to inadequate training of child protection workers who are 'often themselves intimidated by perpetrators and are not skilled enough to address issues of power inequities'.¹⁹⁰

In the Luke Batty inquest, Judge Gray highlighted the need for Child Protection to intervene with the alleged perpetrator when they closed their file. He recommended that DHHS:

exhaust (all best) efforts to:

- (a) interview the alleged perpetrator of the violence to determine whether harm in relation to a child has been substantiated;¹⁹¹

The Commission notes that where the perpetrator has no interest in opposing a Child Protection court order, there is no way of compelling him to participate in a DHHS interview.¹⁹² Dr Robyn Miller,¹⁹³ social worker and family therapist, told the Commission that this is sometimes known as the 'invisible man syndrome'. She said:

This is at times unavoidable because, through no fault of child protection, the perpetrator has made himself scarce and in some cases I've been involved with, has even been hidden by the women because of her fear of his retribution.¹⁹⁴

However, the Commission was made aware of a number of ways that Child Protection could take more proactive steps to engage perpetrators. It was also informed of a number of practice models for working with families where the perpetrator remains in the home or remains connected through children, for example where family court parenting orders allow him contact.

The Caledonian model from Scotland was mentioned in a number of submissions.¹⁹⁵ The model has three elements: a men's program to assess and address men's risks and build on their strengths; women's and children's services to understand and address women's and children's vulnerabilities and strengths; and effective protocols between relevant agencies.¹⁹⁶ The men's program is usually of two years duration and involves 14–20 one-on-one sessions, a 26 week group program and a maintenance phrase delivered on a one-on-one or group basis.¹⁹⁷ The model includes a module on children and fathering and identifies that for many fathers, the desire to be a good father is a motivating factor for change. The child-centred module is designed to help men acknowledge the impact and damage the violence has on their children.¹⁹⁸

The Safe and Together Model, prepared by American Mr David Mandel, was drawn upon by No To Violence, which suggested to the Commission that DHHS adopt a 'perpetrator-pattern, child-centred, survivor strength-based approach to improve outcomes with children and families exposed to domestic violence perpetrator's behaviour'.¹⁹⁹ The model is based on the principle that it is in the best interests of a child to remain 'safe and together' with the non-offending family violence survivor, and that a partnership between child welfare/protection agencies and the non-offending parent is the most effective and efficient way to promote the safety and wellbeing of the child.²⁰⁰ This model was also supported in a number of other submissions to the Commission.²⁰¹

The Commission heard that Mr Mandel's approach has been successful in several US states, and is used in the United Kingdom and parts of Australia.²⁰² It is a 'violence-informed' model which focuses on an assessment of the perpetrator and moves away from child protection system 'failure to protect' approaches to child protection practice.²⁰³ It is underpinned by three factors:

- ▷ first, an understanding that the source of risk to the child is the perpetrator's behaviour
- ▷ secondly, a comprehensive articulation of the nexus between the perpetrator's behaviour pattern and child and family functioning
- ▷ thirdly, an assessment of the man as a parent and a more comprehensive assessment of the protective capacity of the victim of family violence.²⁰⁴

Programs for men under this approach involve co-location and joint training of family violence and child protection workers. DHHS has indicated that Mr Mandel has been engaged to train a small number of practitioners in his approach.²⁰⁵ A key finding in a recent report by ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) report was that evidence suggests that training alone has little impact upon supporting a major culture and service system change.²⁰⁶ Models such as the Safe and Together Model include 'long-term technical and implementation support rather than one off training days'.²⁰⁷

The evaluation of the Safe and Together model in Ohio found the program led to a greater focus among

Child Protection workers on the entire family, including the perpetrator, less victim blaming, and better screening, assessment and evidence-based practices on the ground.²⁰⁸

Child and Family Services in Ballarat recommended a more coordinated response to provision and referral to men's behaviour change programs, including in the child protection context. It remarked that service demand was being driven by an uncoordinated service referral to the programs from Child Protection, the courts and corrections:

With the ever increasing demands on the MBC [men's behaviour change] services being made by departments that include the Magistrates Court of Victoria, DHHS and Corrections Victoria (CV) from a systems response it now feels like there are at least three bodies (DHHS, Magistrates Court & CV) fighting for their space in the service system. While there maybe discussions occurring at senior levels, at a service system response level there appears to have been little or no obvious communication occurring.²⁰⁹

Dr Robyn Miller told the Commission that a key area for improvement in child protection practice was engaging the perpetrator and holding him accountable for changing his behaviour.²¹⁰ Dr Miller told the Commission that effectively engaging with perpetrators would require partnership with other agencies during both risk assessment and management phases:

The partnership with police is crucial in these cases as at times it is simply unsafe for child protection, family services or family violence practitioners to engage with the perpetrator. Worker safety issues are of critical concern and there are some cases where a social work response is not the answer and the perpetrator requires a targeted police response to manage the criminal behaviour and disrupt the likelihood of further harm.²¹¹

The Commission notes that Child Protection is beginning to place greater emphasis on the ways in which a violent parent may endanger the safety of a child and the parent caring for that child. Since 2014, Child Protection practitioners in Victoria have been guided by a June 2014 DHHS practice guide, Working With Families Where an Adult is Violent, which stresses the importance of keeping the perpetrator in the picture and avoiding mother blame.²¹² Domestic Violence Victoria remarked that this resource was 'an important step in building this capacity' of the child protection workforce to work with violent offenders.²¹³

Judge Gray in the Luke Batty Inquest made recommendations in relation to this practice resource. He recommended that DHHS require their staff comply with the practice guide, Working With Families Where an Adult is Violent (2014), to ensure:

- when assessing the protective capacity of the non-offending parent, by analysing the protective factors and ensuring they have been weighted against the history
- assessing pattern and severity of harm perpetrated against them
- undertaking a comprehensive risk assessment of the perpetrator and their behaviour and that the department can demonstrate a robust approach to locating perpetrators that are evading service involvement or have no fixed address.²¹⁴

The Victorian Government has confirmed the commencement of the implementation of these recommendations and has indicated that 'DHHS's implementation of this recommendation will include a review of how to strengthen training approaches to mandate child protection participation in family violence training, based on the resource guide'.²¹⁵

There is further discussion on risk assessment in Child Protection practice below and is described in more detail in Chapter 6. Intervention and engagement with perpetrators of family violence so as to better protect victims of family violence, is described in Chapter 18.

Increased reports to Child Protection

The 2012 Cummins Inquiry found that a key challenge for the child protection system was the difficulty of deciding whether 'the right level of statutory child protection services was being provided to the Victorian community'.²¹⁶

Victoria's statutory child protection services ... must therefore address the inherent tension arising from the broadened community view of what places a child at significant risk of harm.

They get criticised for not doing enough to protect some children, whilst at the same time being criticised for being too intrusive or not managing demand.²¹⁷

A 'two-doorway' or 'differential response' system²¹⁸ has been operating in Victoria since 2005. A referral can either be made to the statutory child protection system or to family services through Child FIRST. The key principle behind this system is that children and their families should not be referred to Child Protection except in the most serious cases. Diversion away from Child Protection is intended to direct vulnerable families and children to support services and to encourage increased family cooperation with these services.²¹⁹

The Commission heard that in Victoria there has been a tendency to make blanket referrals to Child Protection when children are exposed to family violence.

The default position in Australia, the United Kingdom (UK) and North America has tended to be to refer all children living with family violence to statutory child protection. Sometimes this is through legislation on mandatory notification, at other times through practice guidance. Hitching children who are living with family violence to 'the child protection juggernaut' fails to acknowledge the differential response that may be needed and more appropriate.²²⁰

The Commission heard that this 'net-widening' approach brings some families experiencing family violence into contact with the child protection system when it may have been more appropriate to provide other forms of support to them. It also has the effect of swamping the child protection system. By swamping the system and expending finite resources on investigations to determine whether a child protection response is required, welfare resources are diverted from family support and prevention services.²²¹

Data on reports to Child Protection where family violence is indicated, is set out above. According to this data, in 2013–14 approximately 70 per cent ($n=26,088$) of these reports were not investigated. As we discuss below, of the police L17 reports sent to Child Protection in 2013–14, approximately 84 per cent ($n=11,764$) were not investigated.²²²

In the Luke Batty inquest, Judge Gray recommended that DHHS provide greater guidance to family violence agencies about when a report to Child Protection should be made.²²³ The Victorian Government has confirmed that they will implement this recommendation.²²⁴ However, the Commission notes that DHHS data provided to the Commission shows that the highest percentage of reports to Child Protection come from police.

Referrals from police

In 2013–14, DHHS data indicates that 24,139 reports to Child Protection were made by police, making up approximately 29 per cent of the total number of reports to Child Protection. Of the reports from police, 14,032 reports were made via the L17 process.²²⁵

Over the last four years, the number of reports by police to Child Protection where family violence is indicated have more than doubled. This is shown in Figure 11.3.

Source: Based on Department of Health and Human Services, 'Data Request Summary' (9 June 2015), Worksheet 4, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015, clarified on 4 February 2016

Police L17 reports to Child Protection and referral pathways

Despite growing numbers of reports to Child Protection, many police reports do not result in an investigation.

DHHS data shows that, in 2013–14, of the 14,032 reports made to Child Protection by police which were made as part of the police family violence L17 process, approximately 84 per cent ($n=11,764$) were not investigated by Child Protection.²²⁶

Following attendance at a family violence incident where a child or young person is present, or has witnessed, or has been affected by family violence,²²⁷ police must make a decision about the most appropriate pathway for their referral. Possible pathways include a referral to the statutory child protection system or to family services through Child FIRST.

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence requires that:

- ▷ police may make a report to Child Protection or to Child FIRST where they have significant concerns for the wellbeing of an unborn child, child or young person—they should not refer to both systems²²⁸
- ▷ police, as mandatory reporters to Child Protection, must make a report to Child Protection if they believe that a child or young person is in need of protection from significant harm as a result of physical injury or sexual abuse,²²⁹ or where they have reasonable grounds to suspect a child or young person has suffered, or is likely to suffer, significant harm as a result of physical injury, sexual abuse, or psychological harm, and the child's parents have not protected, or are unlikely to protect the child from harm.²³⁰

As part of the L17 process, Victoria Police also make formal or informal referrals to specialist family violence services. Police can formally refer an affected family member (usually a parent) to specialist family violence services at the same time they make a report to Child Protection or a child-specific referral to Child FIRST.²³¹ Where police make a formal referral to a specialist family violence service they will state if a child was present at an incident and the child will be considered as part of that formal referral.²³² Police can also make informal referrals for families, which involves them providing the family with contact details for the service.²³³

A police referral to a specialist family violence service means that a family may have already been formally referred to specialist services at the same time they are referred into the child protection system. Further discussion regarding police referrals to specialist family violence services can be found in Chapter 13.

The choice about whether circumstances require a Child FIRST referral or a Child Protection referral requires the exercise of police judgment. Victoria Police told the Commission that, in practice, police L17 referrals are most frequently sent to Child Protection rather than to Child FIRST:

This two-doorway system means Child Protection may receive a large volume of referrals that require their assessment before being deemed below their service threshold and that divert their resources from responding to cases that do merit their intervention (there is a high rate of reports that do not proceed to investigation, suggesting there are a number of reports that are not meeting the child protection threshold). By comparison, police refer relatively few matters to Child FIRST and there is potential to improve referrals to this non-statutory pathway

...

At present, police are expected to make decisions about this pathway in the field, sometimes with limited information.²³⁴

Elsewhere in this chapter, the Commission has relied on DHHS data. To determine police practice in sending L17s, we have used Victoria Police data, which identifies a lower number of police referrals than the DHHS data described above. In 2013–14, police data specified that 11,042 family violence L17 referrals were made by police to Child Protection and 1901 referrals were made to Child FIRST.²³⁵ For that same period, there were 51,628 L17 referrals sent by police to specialist family violence services.²³⁶

During the Commission's community consultation process, the Commission was told that, at least in some areas, duplicate referrals to both pathways into the child protection system were being made by police:

A lot of police are choosing to send the L17 to Child FIRST and Child Protection as they don't know the right agency to send it to. Sending it to the wrong service can provide delays for DHHS. Police need guidelines about who to send it to. Child FIRST are not a crisis service so the L17 can sit there for days before they are sent on to Child Protection.²³⁷

Ms Allen noted that the effect of police reporting most family violence matters involving children to Child Protection was that the differentiated pathway was not being effectively used.²³⁸ She described the impact of this on the child protection system:

This is burdensome for Child Protection as Child Protection must record every L17 report in the Department's Client Relationship Information System, assess each report and classify each report to identify those that require action and those that do not. Sometimes the detail on the forms does not indicate that a child is at risk or in need of protection or even that a support response or investigation is required.²³⁹

Dr Robyn Miller explained:

Child Protection resources are finite, and careful assessment is required so that only the most extreme cases where children are at significant risk and where other interventions have not mitigated that risk, are referred and dealt with by child protection.²⁴⁰

Victoria Police told the Commission that police may be reluctant to refer to Child FIRST as they understand that parental consent is a requirement for a family to engage with Child FIRST and they know that parents may not consent to engage.²⁴¹

The Commission acknowledges that assessing risk can be a balancing act for service providers. The 2012 Cummins Inquiry commented on this point in relation to intervention by Child Protection:

'False-positive' risk assessments occur when DHS, for a number of reasons, over-estimates the risk presenting for a particular child or young person and unnecessarily responds with statutory intervention when this is not required for a given family situation. A 'false-negative' assessment occurs when DHS underestimates the risk presenting for a given report and fails to detect the risk of significant harm of abuse or neglect ... [C]hanging decision-making practices with the objective of reducing false positive assessments will inevitably increase the rate of false negative assessments and vice versa, other things being equal.²⁴²

The Cummins Inquiry commented that Child Protection risk assessments tend to be dominated by a risk-averse approach to avoid the terrible consequences of a false negative involving the death or serious injury of a child who was missed or unprotected by the child protection system.²⁴³ The inquiry concluded that the statutory child protection system had an important role to play in responding to child abuse and neglect but that child protection services must be better connected to a broader government and community response to vulnerable children.²⁴⁴

Improving referral pathways for police

The Commission was made aware of a number of ways that police use of the current 'two-doorway' system could be improved.

Anglicare Victoria argued for a model based on the L17 triaging panels trialled in the Hume Moreland and Metropolitan North East regions, which are located in family violence services.²⁴⁵ Under that model, new referrals would be assessed by a panel comprising of police, family violence workers, Child FIRST workers and Child Protection staff.²⁴⁶ Anglicare Victoria stated: 'our view is that this was much more successful than the process of police or Child Protection simply forwarding L17s to Child FIRST'.²⁴⁷

Other proposals for reform to the present 'two-doorway' system included a single police referral point for child victims of family violence, including a triage and subsequent redirection of each case to Child Protection or Integrated Family Services, as appropriate. This approach was supported by Victoria Police:

Victoria Police ... suggests a single entry point for the referral of child victims, enabling Child FIRST and Child Protection workers to apply their respective powers and expertise to jointly assess the needs of each child victim and determine the most appropriate service pathway. This would ensure all child victims receive a timely initial assessment and are more likely to be directed appropriately in the first instance, and that a family does not end up with a Child Protection record that is not warranted. Importantly, a 'single doorway' approach would enable both services to refer the child to the other so that interventions can be escalated or downgraded as appropriate.²⁴⁸

Professor Humphreys argued that the premise of any new system should be a differential response, with the service response tailored to the varied needs of children who live with family violence.²⁴⁹ Such a system would involve initial rapid risk screening of all police family violence incident reports involving adult victims, perpetrators and children.²⁵⁰ The researchers also recommended that the triage could take place within defined geographic areas to maximise referral pathways.²⁵¹

Other suggestions included mandatory joint visits by police and Child Protection following a police call-out to a family violence incident.²⁵²

The Aboriginal Family Violence and Prevention Legal Service Victoria recommended a review of the L17 process relating to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander victims of family violence 'to ensure that culturally targeted and localised referral pathways are implemented in consultation with FVPLS Victoria and other local Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander organisations across Victoria'.²⁵³ The Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency recommended that all Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people should be given the option of whether they want to access mainstream services or Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander services.²⁵⁴

In her statement to the Commission, Ms Allen signalled that DHHS and Victoria Police were engaged in a process of reviewing the L17 form.²⁵⁵ Ms Allen suggested that the redesign of the form, together with further police training, would better assist police in directing their L17 referral to the most appropriate pathway.²⁵⁶

Further discussion regarding pathways in the Victorian family violence system, can be found in Chapter 13.

Response to family violence

Understanding family violence

One of the key issues identified in submissions received by the Commission is that family violence services focus predominantly on the risk to the mother, while Child Protection focuses predominantly on the risk to the child, despite the close relationship between these matters. In its submission to the Commission, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria explained:

Specialist family violence services are primarily funded to work with adult victims and most do not receive dedicated funding for case management of children. Child Protection services, on the other hand, focus on children. However, they generally do not undertake specific family violence risk assessment and risk management for children, nor do they have the specialist knowledge for responding to women and children experiencing family violence.²⁵⁷

The Commission heard that the different philosophies that guide specialist family violence and child protection services can hinder collaboration between the two systems,²⁵⁸ and that a lack of collaboration is 'a significant barrier to effectiveness' in responding to family violence.²⁵⁹

Domestic Violence Victoria submitted:

The historically divergent philosophical and practice responses of the family violence and child protection sectors have developed quite independently of each other resulting in significant barriers for collaboration. The child protection system is statutory, child-focused and involuntary and family violence services are woman-centred and voluntary. Over time these different practice frameworks have created a tension characterised by distrust, poor communication and poor collaboration that can undermine what should be the mutual goal of meeting both mother and children's safety and wellbeing.²⁶⁰

In its submission, the Integrated Family Violence Partnership, Southern Melbourne, suggested that having Child Protection assess the risk to the mother and child concurrently may contribute to improving this problem.²⁶¹

The Commission received many submissions that emphasised the need for child protection workers to better understand the dynamics of family violence.²⁶² The Victorian Council of Social Services submitted that:

... many examples of mistrust and poor practice in the interface between child protection and specialist family violence services have been identified, including:

- the failure of child protection to understand the dynamics of family violence
- holding women, rather than perpetrators, responsible for the protection of children in family violence situations
- inadequate training for child protection workers
- the use of inappropriate ultimatums to women to leave their abusive relationships and keep their children, or stand and lose their children
- lack of cultural awareness regarding Aboriginal and CALD women in family violence situations.²⁶³

Domestic Violence Victoria submitted that:

Current practice within child protection indicates that the lack of understanding of the dynamics and nature of family violence can limit workers' ability to respond effectively where family violence is present.²⁶⁴

The Commission heard that the lack of understanding of the effects of family violence can sometimes result in victim blaming. Cobaw Community Health Service said they believed that child protection workers were insufficiently skilled to address power inequalities between victims and perpetrators and tended to place responsibility for the perpetrator's behaviour upon mothers.²⁶⁵

The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (FVPLS Victoria) said that its clients routinely recount that child protection workers adopt punitive approaches to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women experiencing family violence, and that child protection workers do not abide by statutory obligations towards Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children and their families.²⁶⁶

This includes Child Protection workers responding to Aboriginal women as though they are to blame for being victims of family violence and making decisions about their capacity to care for their children on the basis of this misinformed view. This re-victimisation contributes to victims' reluctance to seek help which can contribute to victims/survivors' isolation and vulnerability putting them and their children at greater risk of family violence – and Departmental intervention.²⁶⁷

FVPLS Victoria recommended that a 'fundamental attitudinal shift is required within the Department to reform the way the system responds to Aboriginal [and Torres Strait Islander] victims/survivors of family violence.'²⁶⁸

The Commission heard other examples of Child Protection practice where a better understanding of family violence could have assisted the victim and her children. In an anonymous submission, the Commission heard that a victim's former husband, as part of his continued control over her following their separation, made malicious reports to Child Protection.²⁶⁹ The victim was subjected to repeated investigations and home visits by DHHS staff. The submission states, 'As my sons are happy, loved and well-cared for, these investigations have been a waste of CPS's valuable time and effort'.²⁷⁰

Another woman explained to the Commission that she felt Child Protection staff who were working with her did not have sufficient experience or length of involvement in her case to assess the risk to her and her newborn child from the family violence committed by her partner:

I feel that the issue here is that inexperienced DHS staff was put to supervise access, our case workers who were changed several times for unknown reasons, were all in their 20's and often women. I do not think that they had the experience nor the competence to assess things correctly as, a couple of well-behaved meetings were sufficient for DHS to state that there were no concerns in spite of all the history and past happenings.²⁷¹

Training and support

The 2012 Cummins Inquiry recommended that family violence training should be provided for those who are required to report child abuse to DHHS, including doctors, nurses, midwives, teachers, school principals and police.²⁷²

Submissions received by the Commission also focused on the need for training to increase awareness of family violence among child protection workers. Cobaw Community Health recommended enhanced training for child protection workers around understanding the gendered dynamics of family violence.²⁷³ FVPLS Victoria stated that along with 'family violence sensitivity training', '[w]orkforce development must include widespread, compulsory training for all child protection workers in order to improve cultural respect and awareness' of the experience of family violence for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders.²⁷⁴

Shakti Migrant and Refugee Support Group Melbourne told the Commission that child protection workers should undertake cultural sensitivity training with an emphasis on picking up culturally-specific forms of family violence, such as under-aged or forced marriage, dowry abuse and female genital mutilation.²⁷⁵

Dr Robyn Miller told the Commission that since 2006, child protection practitioners have been trained 'to understand the cumulative harm to children of family violence and also to be able to talk about this in ways with women that do not further diminish their self-esteem or make them feel blamed for the impact on their children'.²⁷⁶ Dr Miller recognised that:

Sometimes child protection saying 'you need to separate from this man or we'll need to become involved' can also result in some women keeping the relationship secret and therefore diminishing her capacity to seek help where needed. This may have devastating consequences for children.²⁷⁷

In 2012, the Office of Professional Practice was established as a result of a departmental restructure which brought together the Office of the Principal Practitioner and the former Office of the Senior Practitioner – Disability.²⁷⁸ Its role within DHHS is to 'build practice and to create an environment which fosters the continual improvement of workforce capability to meet the needs of the Department's clients'.²⁷⁹ The Office of Professional Practice comprises a chief practitioner and director, a senior practitioner disability, an assistant director and two statewide principal practitioners, among others including two co-located child protection practitioners at Victoria Police and the federal family courts.²⁸⁰

The functions of the Office of Professional Practice includes providing practice leadership across DHHS, including making authoritative decisions and recommendations for Child Protection.²⁸¹ The Office fulfils its leadership role by:

- supporting front line practitioners and programs through direct involvement with case work
- monitoring and reviewing practice
- providing practice research and evaluation
- promoting professional development and training
- being the expert spokesperson on professional practice
- influencing policy and program design.²⁸²

Child protection practitioners are able to contact the Office to obtain advice and support in relation to cases they are working on, and a key function of the office has been to consider emerging issues in child protection practice, including family violence.²⁸³ Professional development and training regarding family violence has been provided to child protection practitioners, as well as Youth Justice, Disability Services and Services Connect programs.²⁸⁴

The Commission heard that in recent years DHHS has introduced training to improve understanding of family violence among child protection practitioners. During a four-week long program known as Beginning Practice, practitioners are introduced to family violence legislation; possible Child Protection responses to family violence are canvassed; and family violence case studies are used to teach interview skills and provision of evidence in the context of family violence.²⁸⁵

Targeted programs have been offered to child protection practitioners, Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services, and select Victoria Police members on working with men who use violence. In addition, senior child protection practitioners received training on risk assessment and decision making where there are threats to harm children, partners or other family members. There has also been a number of other training programs to Child Protection practitioners on effective responses to family violence.²⁸⁶ This included training which was delivered by No To Violence and the Office of Professional Practice within DHHS.²⁸⁷ Professor Humphreys noted that '[c]ontinuing to support this professional development will begin to address the shift in "culture" which is required to change the focus of child protection work'.²⁸⁸

The Commission heard evidence about the current Child Protection Operating Model, which commenced in November 2012 and was designed to improve the quality and effectiveness of Child Protection practice by improving supervision of frontline child protection practitioners. This model resulted in the introduction of 'advanced practitioner' roles and is credited with increasing the proportion of child protection practitioners who continue working in that area.²⁸⁹

In addition to the common integrated case model known as the Best Interests Case Practice Model,²⁹⁰ which is used by DHHS staff who work with children,²⁹¹ there are also a number of internal DHHS documents which can be consulted by child protection practitioners. The 2014 specialist practice resource, Working With Families Where an Adult is Violent (noted above in relation to better engaging perpetrators) sets out key legislation relating to family violence, examines the impact of family violence on children, identifies issues faced by women with disabilities, culturally and linguistically diverse women, and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, and includes sections on risk assessment and child protection and family law.²⁹²

This resource has formed the basis of family violence education offered by DHHS across Victoria.²⁹³ The Commission understands that the Cumulative Harm Specialist Practice Resource also provides practical advice for workers in the area of Child Protection.²⁹⁴

In the Luke Batty inquest, Judge Gray commended DHHS for developing Working With Families Where an Adult is Violent, but noted that there was a failure to follow that guide.²⁹⁵ As discussed above, he recommended that DHHS ensure that all child protection staff comply with the practice resource by ensuring that they take a full history of the violence when determining whether the victim could act protectively, assess the pattern and severity of harm perpetrated against the victim, and undertake a comprehensive risk assessment of the perpetrator.²⁹⁶

The Commission notes that the 2015–16 Victorian Budget allocated $3.9 million for Child Protection Flexible Responses, a project to co-locate family violence specialist workers in child protection offices.²⁹⁷ The aim of this project is to improve the capacity of child protection practitioners to respond appropriately to cases of family violence and to assist them to navigate the adult family violence service system.²⁹⁸ The money will enable the recruitment of an additional twelve child protection workers and seventeen family violence workers statewide.²⁹⁹

Service collaboration

The Australian Law Reform Commission and NSW Law Reform Commission identified inter-agency collaboration as an important issue in its inquiry into a national legal response to family violence.³⁰⁰ Similarly the Cummins Inquiry noted the presence of 'siloes service systems' and, in a family violence and child protection context, stated that greater clarity is required over which service system is responsible for coordinating and case managing a child or young person and their parents.³⁰¹ The inquiry recommended that there should be improved collaboration and pathways between statutory Child Protection services, Integrated Family Services and other services such as family violence and disability services.³⁰²

The DHHS Strategic Framework for Family Services 2007 acknowledges the need for 'Integrated Family Services to work collaboratively with Child Protection to develop effective diversionary responses that try to prevent families' progression into the statutory child protection system'.³⁰³ The Child Protection and Integrated Family Services State-Wide Agreement (Shell Agreement) 2013 provides a high-level framework setting out the responsibilities of Child Protection and Child FIRST.³⁰⁴ Ms Allen said in her evidence that there are 'high levels of collaboration and mutual understanding of respective roles' between Child Protection and family services such as Child FIRST.³⁰⁵

By contrast, in 2015 the Victorian Auditor General noted that the documented arrangements between Child Protection and Integrated Family Services system are continually being tested because of changes in the external environment, such as the significant increase in demand and complexity of cases, partly due to family violence.³⁰⁶ Numerous weaknesses in communication between DHHS and family service providers were identified. The Auditor-General recommended that DHHS undertake a comprehensive and urgent review of its current approach to early intervention including how it 'investigates and implements ways of improving the effectiveness of its communications about operational and strategic issues between and across the department centrally, regionally and locally, and with community service organisations'.³⁰⁷

One of the key links is the placement of community-based child protection advanced practitioners at each Child FIRST site to facilitate referrals from Child Protection, provide advice on specific cases including safety planning, and manage cases moving from Child Protection to Child FIRST, amongst other activities.³⁰⁸ The role was established in 2006 so as to improve information sharing between Child Protection and family services, enable consultation, assessment of children and families, and 'enable collaborative practice'.³⁰⁹

Dr Robyn Miller, told the Commission that, '[i]n my experience, the role is greatly valued by the family services sector'.³¹⁰ Dr Miller stated that:

the embedding of a specialist child protection practitioner in family services platforms such as Child FIRST is crucial to early intervention and ensuring better outcomes for children. It would be further improved by bridging the knowledge and skill held in the family violence service sector by co-locating family violence specialists in the Child FIRST teams and family services alliances.³¹¹

The 2011 KPMG review of Integrated Family Services found that the placement of child protection practitioners at each Child FIRST site had been critical to developing a service continuum between family services and Child Protection and was the 'lynchpin' between the two sectors.³¹² However, the same review noted that beyond the placement initiative, there were inconsistent links between Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services on one hand and Child Protection on the other. The authors cautioned against over-reliance on one scheme for service connection and suggested a greater focus on improving linkages across the entire workforces of both sectors.³¹³ The review also noted a lack of a shared practice framework, limited shared governance with inconsistent engagement by child protection leadership and challenges presented by workforce turnover and varied workplace cultures.³¹⁴

The 2015 Auditor-General's report into Integrated Family Services found that the role of community-based child protection advanced practitioners had been diluted over time with the assigned child protection workers increasingly required to take on Child Protection cases rather than being available to support Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services with case referrals and risk assessment.³¹⁵
