The Commission was told by a number of people that this provision is not well-known and is underutilised.²¹⁰ In 2013–14, there were 39 applications for the reduction of a fixed term tenancy agreement because of an intervention order and 13 applications for the creation of a tenancy agreement because of an intervention order.²¹¹ During this same period, 24,947 final family violence intervention orders were made.²¹²

The Commission was told that steps should be taken to increase the use of section 233A so that victims of family violence are better able to maintain their tenancies. This could include programs to build awareness of these applications within Victoria Police, the Magistrates' Court and frontline service providers.²¹³

In addition, Justice Connect told the Commission that 'despite the laudable intention of section 233A',²¹⁴ there are limitations to its usefulness in practice. VCAT noted that 'this is an entirely reactive regime, and is predicated on the existence of a final order of this nature. The conditions on the exercise of jurisdiction very significantly limit the capacity of VCAT members to respond to family violence when this is evident in cases before them'.²¹⁵

Similarly, the Judicial College of Victoria stated that:

The Residential Tenancies division relies heavily on the Magistrates' Court making an intervention order with the correct exclusionary clauses... If the Magistrates' Court fails to impose an exclusionary condition on the intervention order, VCAT will adjourn the matter, while application is made to the Magistrates' Court for the correct form of order. This results in double-handling by both jurisdictions, and delay.²¹⁶

VCAT proposed that an ability to make orders under section 233A in situations where family violence has occurred, but a final family violence intervention order with the relevant exclusionary condition not yet in place, would enable it to better respond to situations of family violence.²¹⁷

Other states have made amendments to their residential tenancy legislation in recognition of the issues that arise in the intersection between family violence and tenancy agreements. For example, in Queensland and South Australia an existing tenancy can be terminated, and a new tenancy created in the name of the victim of family violence, in situations where family violence has occurred but there is no protection order or intervention order in place.²¹⁸

In addition, concern was expressed that victims of family violence have to make applications in two different forums—the Magistrates' Court and VCAT—in order to obtain a final family violence intervention order with an exclusion condition and then to obtain an order under section 233A for creation of a new tenancy.²¹⁹ If a victim has to attend VCAT after having already sought an order in the Magistrates' Court, they have to navigate another system, retell their story and potentially face the perpetrator again.

Apportionment of liability

Victims of family violence living in rental accommodation, either public or private, are often burdened with compensation claims and debts that limit their ability to obtain safe alternative housing.²²⁰

The Commission heard that issues can arise for victims of family violence in relation to apportionment of liability, where parties are co-tenants on the lease. The general position under the Residential Tenancies Act is that tenants are jointly and severally liable for any loss or damage that the landlord suffers as a result of a breach of the tenancy agreement or the Residential Tenancies Act by any of the co-tenants. This means that a landlord seeking an award of compensation can make their claim against any or all of the co-tenants to the lease agreement.

According to Justice Connect, compensation claims are most commonly brought under the Residential Tenancies Act against victims of family violence in one of the following two ways:

- ▷ a landlord claims compensation against all co-tenants in relation to damage caused by a single co-tenant who is the perpetrator of family violence
- ▷ the landlord claims compensation for rent arrears that accrued after a victim of family violence fled the premises and a perpetrator remained in possession.²²¹

Justice Connect noted that other than under section 233C of the Residential Tenancies Act, it is difficult for VCAT members to apportion liability between tenants even where it is clear that property damage has been caused, or the rental arrears have been incurred, by the perpetrator.²²²

The Tenants Union of Victoria also raised issues that arise under section 234 of the Residential Tenancies Act.²²³ This allows a person to apply for an order reducing the term of a fixed-term tenancy (sometimes called 'breaking the lease'). The VCAT member must be satisfied that the applicant has experienced an unforeseen change in their circumstances that will cause severe hardship. This includes situations where the applicant is a protected person under a family violence intervention order and is seeking to break the tenancy in order to protect their own or their children's safety.²²⁴ VCAT can order that the applicant pay compensation to the landlord, such as the cost of advertising the property and lost rent.²²⁵ This order can only be made against the applicant; VCAT is not able to order a co-tenant—for example, the perpetrator—to pay some or all of the compensation to the landlord.

A number of submissions recommended that the Residential Tenancies Act be amended to address situations such as this and ensure that victims of family violence are not held legally liable for debts that are properly attributable to perpetrators of family violence.²²⁶

'Blacklisting'

Under the Residential Tenancies Act, tenants' details can be listed on the tenancy database, where one or more tenants have breached certain provisions of the Act or the tenancy agreement and the landlord is either owed more than the bond will cover, or VCAT has made a possession order in respect of the rented premises.²²⁷ Breaches that can result in such a listing include the failure to pay rent and damage to premises, both of which are often the result of a perpetrator's actions.²²⁸

A number of submissions raised concerns that details of family violence victims were listed on tenancy databases.²²⁹ This was identified as a significant barrier for women trying to access the private rental market. According to Justice Connect, residential tenancy database listings for victims of family violence can contribute to delays in transitioning women out of crisis and refuge accommodation.²³⁰

Several submissions called for the Residential Tenancies Act to be amended to allow victims of family violence to prevent their personal details from being listed on residential tenancy databases and to remove existing listings where the breach or damage occurred in the context of family violence.²³¹

Modification of rental properties

Under section 64 of the Residential Tenancies Act, a tenant must obtain consent from the landlord to install any fixtures on the property or make any alteration, renovation or addition to the rental property.²³² A person affected by family violence who may wish to increase security on the premises, for example, by installing video cameras, requires the landlord's consent to do so. The landlord can refuse to allow the modification, regardless of the reason and regardless of the fact that tenants are required to pay for the cost of restoring the property when they vacate.²³³

In its submission to the Commission, the Tenants Union of Victoria called for section 64 to be amended so that the landlord must not unreasonably withhold consent to a request to modify the rental property, when modifications are requested to improve the security of the rental property, and the tenant is affected by family violence.²³⁴

Termination of tenancies

The Commission was told of other issues in relation to the termination of co-tenancies, specifically the inability of a victim to terminate the tenancy without the consent of her co-tenant (the perpetrator) or where the perpetrator refuses to vacate the property.

Where a periodic tenancy is on foot—for example, where an initial fixed term lease has ended—the Residential Tenancies Act allows tenants to terminate the lease by giving 28 days' notice.²³⁵ However, a notice to vacate may be seen as invalid if it is signed by only one tenant. In addition, a tenancy will usually only terminate when the tenants deliver vacant possession, which requires all tenants to leave the property, remove their belongings and return the keys.

The Tenants Union of Victoria noted that even where an application has been made under section 234 of the Residential Tenancies Act to reduce the fixed term tenancy, all co-tenants are required to give vacant possession to the landlord in order for the tenancy to be terminated.²³⁶ If one party remains in possession, a periodic tenancy will be created²³⁷ and, as in the case above, both tenants may continue to be jointly and severally liable.²³⁸ If an application under section 234 is not made and the tenants wish to terminate the lease, the potential costs of ending the lease early could be very high; the landlord can seek compensation for reasonable costs incurred as a result of the early termination of the lease, including payment of rent until the landlord is able to enter into a lease with new tenants.²³⁹

This is in contrast to, for example, New South Wales, where a co-tenant may give a 21-day termination notice to the landlord and each co-tenant if the fixed term of the residential tenancy agreement has ended or the agreement is a periodic agreement. If the co-tenant gives such a notice and vacates the premises, the co-tenant will then cease to be a tenant on the termination date.²⁴⁰ Further, co-tenants can also apply to the NSW Civil and Administrative Tribunal for an order terminating the tenancy, be it a fixed term or periodic tenancy agreement, because of 'special circumstances'.²⁴¹

Promoting economic recovery

Financial security for victims of family violence is not just about meeting the daily cost of living and resolving the financial implications of debt, personal property and tenancy issues but also about women re-gaining control over their lives and counteracting the disempowerment they experienced as a result of relationship abuse.²⁴² This section examines the evidence the Commission received in relation to initiatives and mechanisms to promote economic recovery.

Access to employment

I am trying very hard to heal and move forwards and do this through further education and employment seeking.²⁴³

The Commission was told that securing paid employment is one of the most effective means of moving towards a position of financial security after family violence.²⁴⁴ It can also be an effective pathway out of a violent relationship.²⁴⁵

Any strategies developed to protect the financial security of women who have experienced family violence must enable women to acquire decent and secure employment ... [W]omen and their children who experience family violence are far more vulnerable to poverty, financial insecurity and homelessness. The most effective way to counter poverty is meaningful and decently paid employment.²⁴⁶

However, gaining, re-gaining and maintaining paid employment can be difficult for women living in a violent relationship and post family violence.²⁴⁷ Women's Information and Referral Exchange, also known as WIRE, informed the Commission that women face difficulties providing work history if the perpetrator has prevented them from working and also providing referees if they have changed their identity for security reasons. Maintaining employment can be equally challenging—there are barriers to accessing transport and sustainable child-care arrangements and avoiding disruptions to work attendance due to legal and health appointments.²⁴⁸

Based on their experience working with job-seeking women who are or have experienced family violence, WIRE recommended that women who have experienced family violence should have access to specialist employment programs.²⁴⁹ This was supported by a number of other submissions.²⁵⁰ One survivor of family violence told the Commission:

There should be employment pathways for them so they can gain a sense of dignity and know that their hard work can generate results to keep them motivated.²⁵¹

Specialist employment programs can assist women throughout the job seeking and placement stages. Programs that support or provide training and education opportunities are essential. These are critical pathways to employment and financial security. The following two case studies highlight the role of specialised family violence employment programs.

Case study: McAuley Works

Established in 2010, McAuley Works is an employment program aimed at assisting women experiencing family violence, and/or homelessness and/or mental illness to secure meaningful employment.²⁵² In her evidence, Ms Jocelyn Bignold, Chief Executive Officer of McAuley Community Services for Women, told the Commission that of the 201 referrals it had received at the end of the 2013–14 financial year, 134 women had found employment. In July 2015, 90 of those women were still in jobs, 88 women had accessed vocational education and training programs and 45 women were no longer, although they had previously been, receiving Centrelink payments.²⁵³

Ms Bignold told the Commission that co-case management and supporting women before, during and after placement into a job contributed to the success of the program. This was evidenced in women returning to the program and seeking other job opportunities, varying their working hours and beginning vocational training based on their needs and aspirations.²⁵⁴

Case study: Fitted for work

Fitted for Work provides interview training, mentoring, work experience, personal outfitting and a range of transition to work and staying employed programs for women experiencing disadvantage.²⁵⁵ Since 2005, Fitted for Work has assisted over 20,000 women into employment.²⁵⁶

Fitted for Work has identified that many women accessing their service are impacted by family violence. In their submission they note that 'work provides a way out' after the devastation family violence has on their families, career and financial status.²⁵⁷

The Commission heard that uncertain funding arrangements can severely impact on the effectiveness of employment programs. Because employment programs are largely funded by the Commonwealth and have varying funding criteria, smaller programs rely on ad hoc funding usually through corporate grants trusts or state government.²⁵⁸ Speaking in response to the closure of McAuley Works, Ms Bignold told the Commission:

It's a loss of continuity, loss of experience in the sector at large, loss of a successful program for women ... it's difficult to plan, it's difficult for workforce retention, difficult to get a long-term analysis of what's going on.²⁵⁹

In November 2015, the Victorian Government announced Family Violence Flexible Support Packages of up to $7000 for practical expenses including, among other goods and services, education/training courses to promote employment.²⁶⁰ In Chapter 9 the Commission recommends expanding these packages considerably, including longer term rental subsidies and further assistance towards the costs of gaining employment.

Financial literacy

The experience of economic abuse and the removal of financial control from the victim to perpetrator, means many victims do not have an opportunity to develop or maintain their financial skills.²⁶¹ Financial literacy is both a tool for the prevention of economic abuse and also for economic recovery following family violence.²⁶² A number of service providers told the Commission that addressing the financial literacy of women experiencing family violence is a powerful prevention tool.²⁶³ Ms Julie Kun, Deputy Chief Executive Officer and Business Development Manager, Women's Information and Referral Exchange, told the Commission:

I think that with education and training, when women come into the relationships they will be more able to see the red flags that financial abuse is happening because one of the things that we heard over and over again is that it is a slow, creeping thing and that by the time they're gone, 'Uh-oh, what's happening here', they are well down the track and it's really hard to extricate themselves from the relationship.²⁶⁴

It is also clear that economic empowerment is vital to post family violence recovery. The Commission heard of women who for years were kept financially dependent on their abusive partner, restricted from making any financial decision or accessing bank accounts, bills and other essential information.²⁶⁵ For many, this affected their confidence and financial literacy.

The Commission was told about several financial literacy initiatives. For example:

- ▷ WIRE described two financial literacy programs to the Commission. The first is a prevention program called Strong Beginnings—Financial Equals which targets women who are beginning new relationships, builds their financial management skills and teaches them how to identify financial abuse. The second program is called New Beginning: Steps to a more secure financial future which targets 'women who have experienced family violence to improve their short, medium and long-term financial security outcomes by decreasing their financial recovery time'.²⁶⁶
- ▷ Casey North Community Information & Support Service provides a program called Keeping It Together which includes a workshop on financial literacy and capability (delivered by a qualified financial counsellor).²⁶⁷ In 2012, this financial literacy program was presented a highly commended award by the National Money Smart Week Awards.²⁶⁸
- ▷ Women's Health in the North developed Managing Money: Every Woman's Business which provides culturally sensitive financial literacy education and skills training for women including newly-arrived and migrant women.²⁶⁹ This program received a highly commended award at the 2015 Financial Literacy Australia Awards.²⁷⁰ This organisation also produced the For Love or Money film and resource materials on financial abuse.²⁷¹

The Commission understands that in the past, the Office of Women’s Policy and Consumer Affairs Victoria have funded financial literacy training in partnership with organisations including WIRE and the Queen Victoria Women’s Centre. Women’s Legal Service Victoria’s Stepping Stones report also noted that ‘some financial counselling services provide financial literacy training, including pairing women with “money mentors” to assist them in budgeting, finding entitlements and negotiating with creditors.’²⁷² The Commission heard these are all vital initiatives to improve women’s financial literacy.

Delivering programs can be challenging when women are in unstable living situations and have other pressing priorities dealing with abuse. In addition, while there are some education programs targeted specifically at women, the majority of financial literacy resources are generic.²⁷³ The Commission heard these are important considerations in delivering financial literacy education more broadly to women experiencing family violence.

Microfinance initiatives

Microfinance initiatives provide small loans to people on low incomes. They are one important way of assisting women to build their financial capacity and become financially independent post family violence.

Case study: No Interest Loan Scheme

Good Shepherd Microfinance provides a No Interest Loan Scheme for loans up to $1200 to people on low incomes to purchase essential household goods and services.²⁷⁴ In partnership with other organisations, Good Shepherd Microfinance also provides low interest loans, financial services, savings incentives programs, assistance with energy retailers and insurance products.²⁷⁵

Keys findings of an evaluation of the NILS showed that, of 710 clients surveyed, 82 per cent experienced a net improvement in economic outcomes, 74 per cent experienced a net improvement in social and health outcomes and the financial capabilities of 47 per cent of clients increased.²⁷⁶

Women’s Health Goulburn North East runs a specific family violence NILS program through Good Shepherd Microfinance which assists women leaving violence relationships navigate the complexities of obtaining loans given their often limited access to eligibility documentation such as utility bills.²⁷⁷

The Commission heard that providing this immediate financial relief and assisting women to develop their financial skills is reliant on having access to financial workers who understand economic abuse and can respond appropriately.²⁷⁸

The way forward

Family violence occurs across the social spectrum—regardless of postcode, class or background. While an absolute nexus between socio economic status and family violence does not exist, it is clear that economic dependency—not having financial resources to escape violence—will prevent or delay action by victims. Some perpetrators capitalise on the threat of poverty to coerce their partners into returning. While poverty may not always be a contributing factor for family violence, it is very often a result.

This chapter has outlined the key issues presented to the Commission in relation to the financial implications of family violence, both as a consequence of economic abuse and other forms of violence that affect victims’ financial wellbeing. While recognising the diversity in women’s experiences—in economic circumstance, age and life stage—it is clear that financial security and independence are significant factors in victims gaining freedom from violent relationships and also in their recovery.

Evidence provided to the Commission also suggests that the lack of awareness and understanding of economic abuse among victims, the broader community and police, all contribute to women's ongoing experiences of financial insecurity as a result of economic abuse, even after issues related to physical risk have been addressed.

The Commission makes recommendations to promote financial security and independence—by improving the understanding of economic abuse, addressing debt, protecting personal property, reforming tenancy law, and by promoting long term economic recovery. These initiatives and regulatory changes are mutually reinforcing. They respond to those directly experiencing family violence and promote financial security to assist with long term recovery after the experience of family violence.

Improving understanding of economic abuse and financial recovery

Economic abuse is rarely identified as a form of family violence. The Commission received evidence that service providers, police, judicial members, regulatory bodies, financial services and utility providers do not consistently and appropriately recognise, intervene and respond to economic abuse and the financial hardships associated with post family violence separation. This presents an opportunity to develop the capacity of these professionals to identify economic abuse and know what to do in response.

Given the front-line role that police play in responding to family violence, being able to identify and understand the impact of economic abuse is critical in addressing this often invisible form of violence.

In Chapters 14 and 27, the Commission outlined recommendations to improve understanding and awareness of economic abuse and financial recovery. In recognition that older people, particularly women, are at greater risk of experiencing economic abuse, the Commission made recommendations to improve workforce literacy on elder abuse, and to, for example, strengthen Victoria Police's response to economic abuse. In addition, the Commission recommended that Victoria Police specialist family violence positions and family violence teams, as part of their leadership, education and quality assurance functions, should encourage general duties members to identify and prosecute all breaches and substantive offences against the person and property (including, for example, financial abuse).

The lack of understanding and awareness of economic abuse in the community may also affect how data is collected on its prevalence and nature. Chapter 39 discusses data collection practices more generally, noting that key data such as the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey does not currently specifically collect data-economic abuse.

Further, while there is some evidence that examines the intersection between problem gambling and family violence, the Commission's view is that this is an area requiring further research. The Commission was particularly disturbed by evidence that victims go to a licensed venue with poker machines because it is a safe place to avoid their partner's violence. This is indicative of the lack of options women face to find safety and shows how far we still need to go to keep women safe.

We consider the Victorian Government should fund evidence-based research into the intersection of problem gambling and victimisation/perpetration of family violence, the use of gambling venues as 'safe spaces' for victims of family violence and the disproportionate effects of gambling on women.

Addressing family violence-related debt

The Commission received substantial evidence about the difficulties victims experience in attempting to resolve debts and liabilities with financial, utility and car-related service providers and institutions. Improving the capacity of employees to understand, identify and respond to economic abuse and introducing clear and accessible laws, regulations and processes to enable victims to resolve ongoing financial complexities will result in a clearer pathway towards financial security. It is equally important for consumers to know that there are contact officers (for example—financial hardship officers, family violence officers) within these institutions to provide assistance to victims of family violence. These initiatives will likely improve the service experience for victims when resolving family violence-related debt issues.

Recommendation 107

The Victorian Government encourage the Financial and Consumer Rights Council to require that its members receive family violence and economic abuse training as part of continuing professional development and in order to remain members. The council should also work with other financial counselling member organisations to encourage them to do the same [from 1 January 2017].

Financial institutions and essential household utility providers

The Commission has considered the role of financial institutions and utility providers and agrees with Women's Legal Service Victoria that there is a need to develop the capacity of employees to understand, identify and respond to family violence and economic abuse and the financial insecurity that follows.

Based on the experiences of victims of family violence and the information provided by services supporting victims working through these issues, the Commission recommends a suite of actions to improve protections for victims, create more consistent approaches to hardship policies and procedures, and provide certainty for utility providers and financial institutions.

The Energy and Water Ombudsman, Telecommunications Ombudsman and Financial Services Ombudsman have an essential role in resolving disputes between service providers and consumers. The Commission's view is that ensuring employees are provided with guidance and training in understanding, identifying and responding to family violence is vital. This will improve the experience of family violence victims and ensure fairer outcomes for parties.

Recommendation 108

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ amend the National Credit Code to include family violence as a ground for financial hardship and develop an awareness campaign to ensure that both consumers and credit providers are aware of their rights and responsibilities.
- ▷ work with the Australian Communications and Media Authority and its related representative bodies and associations to amend the Telecommunications Consumer Protections Code to:
 - ▷ list minimum eligibility criteria for access to hardship programs
 - ▷ make family violence an express eligibility criterion
 - ▷ incorporate a requirement for specific policies for customers experiencing family violence to clarify consent requirements for payment plans when an account is jointly held
 - ▷ include grounds for splitting jointly held debt and removing an account holder's name if family violence has occurred.

Recommendation 109

The Victorian Government work with the Essential Services Commission [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ amend the Energy Retail Code and Customer Service Code—Urban Water Businesses [within 12 months] to:
 - ▷ list minimum eligibility criteria for access to hardship programs
 - ▷ include family violence as an explicit eligibility criterion.
- ▷ develop industry guidelines for energy and water retailers to require comprehensive and ongoing training of customer service staff to help them identify customers experiencing family violence and financial hardship
- ▷ publicise the availability of dispute resolution mechanisms for people affected by family violence.

Recommendation 110

The Victorian Government encourage the Victorian Energy and Water Ombudsman and the Commonwealth Financial Services Ombudsman and Telecommunications Ombudsman to publicise the availability of their dispute-resolution processes to help victims of family violence resolve disputes with service providers in relation to debts and liabilities incurred in the context of family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 111

The Victorian Government encourage the Australian Bankers' Association, through its Financial Abuse Prevention Working Group, to develop a family violence-specific industry guideline [within 12 months]. This should be supported by training and education for relevant banking staff, to help them understand, identify and deal with economic abuse associated with family violence.

Recognising family violence in the infringements regime

The Commission is concerned about the disproportionate impact of car-related debt on victims of family violence. The Commission heard evidence about circumstances that can result in the accumulation of fines by victims of family violence and result in women being penalised for the behaviour of the perpetrator. In addition to the financial burden of having to pay fines, a victim may face the suspension of their drivers licence and registration, confiscation of their car, and imprisonment.

The Commission was greatly assisted by the Infringements Working Group (IWG) who work with clients experiencing family violence, financial hardship and family violence-related infringements. Evidence presented by Ms De Cicco drew the Commission's attention to some of the complex issues in reforming infringement laws, particularly when the infringement is related to a criminal offence.²⁷⁹

The Commission agrees with the two primary issues raised by the IWG, namely that victims face difficulties in nominating the perpetrator when they incur the infringement or fine in the victim's name, and in having a fine or infringement waived in situations where the victim incurred the fine or infringement in circumstances of family violence.

Nominating another driver

Amendments to the Road Safety Act might alleviate the impact of infringement debt on family violence victims where they did not commit the offence.

The extent of information required to demonstrate that family violence has occurred and the reality of the threat of retribution, as well as any obligation on the enforcement agency or related body to report the family violence to police, are additional considerations.²⁸⁰ This is especially challenging as not all women feel able to report family violence to police, or seek a family violence intervention order.

As raised by the IWG, amendments could mean the perpetrator would not be pursued for the offending, however 'it would remove the risk of retaliation the current nomination procedure entails, avoid the risk of nominations being rejected by violent partners, and prevent victims of family violence taking responsibility for offences they did not commit'.²⁸¹ Despite this, the Commission agrees with Ms De Cicco that the issue of liability, particularly in serious cases of car-related offending, is very serious.²⁸² On balance, we consider any amendments require further detailed consideration, including in light of the other recommendations in this chapter.

Recommendation 112

The Department of Justice and Regulation investigate whether the Road Safety Act 1986 (Vic) should be amended so that, if a perpetrator of family violence incurs traffic fines while driving a car registered in the name of the victim, the victim is able to have the fines revoked [within 12 months] by declaring:

- ▷ They were not the driver of the vehicle at the time of the offending.
- ▷ They are a victim of family violence—as evidenced by a statutory declaration, a copy of a family violence safety notice or family violence intervention order, or a support letter from a family violence worker, general practitioner or other appropriate professional.
- ▷ They are unable to identify the person in control of the vehicle at the time for safety reasons.

Applying for a withdrawal or revocation

The Commission learned that women who incur infringements as the driver are limited in their ability to make use of the provision of special circumstances or exceptional circumstances to apply to have fines withdrawn or revoked.

The Commission agrees with the IWG that the exceptional circumstances category does not provide much assistance to family violence victims due to a lack of legislative guidance and the potential for inconsistency in how it is applied.²⁸³

We also agree that although some family violence victims may meet the criteria for special circumstances because their experience of family violence involves, for example homelessness, the requirement to prove that the particular circumstances 'resulted' in an inability to understand or control offending conduct requires a level of causation that is hard to prove.²⁸⁴

The Commission's preferred option is to amend the Infringements Act to ensure that family violence is a special circumstance that can 'contribute to' rather than 'results in' the offending conduct. Amending the test for application of the other special circumstances (mental or intellectual disability, illness, addiction to drugs or alcohol, or homelessness) to 'contributes to' is not within the Commission's terms of reference however, this may be a matter for the Director, Fines Victoria, to consider further.

Recommendation 113

The Victorian Government amend the Infringements Act 2006 (Vic) to provide that the experience of family violence may be a special circumstance entitling a person to have a traffic infringement withdrawn or revoked [within 12 months].

Infringement matters dealt with in family violence intervention order proceedings

The Commission understands that the Department of Justice and Regulation has been considering options to alleviate the impact of infringements on victims of family violence.²⁸⁵ Their preferred option is for the Magistrates' Court to address infringement issues in the context of FVIO proceedings.²⁸⁶

The Commission heard that there are two options to address this issue; the first is for the relevant material in the Magistrates' Court to be amended so that family violence-related infringements are identified and form part of the proceedings; the second is for amendments to infringements legislation so that family violence-related issues can be identified and resolved.²⁸⁷ The Commission recognises that not all family violence victims apply for an FVIO, so whilst it is important for those people in the system, legislative change is required to improve the experience of other family violence victims.

The Commission is supportive of infringement issues forming part of the FVIO proceedings in the Magistrates' Court. This will require further consideration.

In addition, the Commission also understands that under the Fines Reform Act, the Director, Fines Victoria, will be appointed who will oversee and monitor infringement activity and review decisions by enforcement agencies to service the infringement notice and to enforce the fine.²⁸⁸ The Commission agrees with Ms De Cicco that this centralisation will improve consistency for family violence victims.

Protecting personal property

Personal property conditions are a powerful and important mechanism in preventing economic abuse, protecting victims' personal safety and helping victims recover from family violence.

While the Commission recognises that personal property conditions are not long-term solutions for the division of property between spouses, which is a matter to be determined under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth),²⁸⁹ the underutilisation of personal property conditions by magistrates in FVIO's is of concern. In order to ensure their effectiveness, personal property conditions must be as specific as possible regarding the property that may be returned to the victim or recovered by the perpetrator.²⁹⁰

Similarly, applicants require more specific information about how they can request personal property conditions. The Application for a Family Violence Intervention Order form (FVIO1) should allow applicants to list specific items of personal property that they would like the court to include in the FVIO. Similarly, applicants should receive appropriate information and legal assistance about personal property orders.

Recommendation 114

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria consider [within 12 months]:

- ▷ issuing a practice direction to encourage the use of personal property conditions in family violence intervention orders
- ▷ including specific questions about personal property conditions in the information form that precedes the application for a family violence intervention order (FVIO1 form).

Recommendation 115

Victoria Police amend the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to provide guidance and examples in relation to when it is appropriate to seek personal property conditions in family violence intervention orders [within 12 months].

Tenancy law reform

Evidence provided to the Commission identified a number of significant limitations in the way in which Victoria's family violence law intersects with tenancy law. A number of submissions to the Commission called for amendments to the Residential Tenancies Act to allow for more appropriate responses to situations of family violence.²⁹¹ Justice Connect submitted that 'modest changes [to the Residential Tenancies Act] could have significant potential to reduce evictions into homelessness and barriers to obtaining alternative safe accommodation.'²⁹²

The Commission acknowledges that the Residential Tenancies Act is currently being reviewed and that this review has a much broader focus than family violence. The Commission makes recommendations as to particular reforms which should be considered as part of this broader review. In our view, some of these particular reforms could be considered immediately, before the overall review is completed. These reforms include the proposed amendment to section 233A and better enabling tenants to make reasonable modifications to improve safety. Similarly, given that the review is not due to conclude until 2018, the Commission also makes a number of recommendations beyond the review to address key areas of concern in the short term.

Applying for a new tenancy agreement

As discussed, section 233A of the Residential Tenancies Act allows VCAT to make an order to terminate an existing tenancy agreement that a victim of family violence has with the perpetrator and to order the landlord to enter into a new tenancy agreement with the victim. However, VCAT can only make such an order where a final FVIO excluding the perpetrator has been made. This contrasts with other jurisdictions, including Queensland and South Australia, where from the home similar orders can be made without a final FVIO. VCAT submitted that a similar provision in Victorian law would assist them to better respond to family violence.²⁹³

The Commission notes that in establishing such a provision, VCAT would be required to adjudicate on matters of family violence and to make assessments as to whether family violence, as defined under the Family Violence Protection Act, is occurring. Unlike the Magistrates' Court, VCAT has not traditionally been a forum in which these matters are adjudicated and VCAT members may not have particular expertise in this area. Further, a decision to terminate a person's tenancy is a significant curtailment of that person's rights. Such an order by VCAT would have similar effect to a final FVIO with an exclusionary condition. However, in this instance, the order has been made by a VCAT member, rather than a magistrate, as is contemplated by the Family Violence Protection Act.

While the Commission agrees that VCAT should have broader powers to make orders under section 233A, we would also recommend that VCAT should have regard to specific criteria, such as whether an application for an family violence intervention order has been made and, if so, the status of that order. Given the complex nature and dynamics of family violence, we would also recommend that training and education be provided to all members in the relevant list (see Chapter 40).

The Commission also heard concerns that victims of family violence have to make applications in two different forums—the Magistrates' Court and VCAT in order to obtain a final FVIO with an exclusion condition and then to obtain an order under section 233A for creation of a new tenancy.²⁹⁴

One possible mechanism to address this concern is to broaden the powers of the Magistrates' Court to make orders under section 233A of the Residential Tenancies Act, as part of an application for an FVIO heard in the Magistrates' Court.²⁹⁵ This would allow applicants to deal with tenancy matters as part of the FVIO application, in the same jurisdiction and as part of the same proceeding. This approach would, however, involve joining the landlord and any other existing tenants as parties to the proceeding, prior to making an order under section 233A.

While there are currently few applications made under section 233A, this proposed mechanism has the potential to increase the workload of already over-burdened Magistrates' Courts. The Commission was informed that most applications for FVIOs resolved by consent at the first mention.²⁹⁶ Otherwise, the current delay between a first mention and a directions hearing in an application for an FVIO that does not resolve immediately is between two and three months.²⁹⁷ Accordingly, proceedings that would otherwise resolve on the first day are likely to have to be adjourned, and may not be heard for several months. While in theory it appears an attractive solution for a victim of family violence to be able to make application for a section 233A order in the Magistrates' Court at the same time as seeking a family violence intervention order, in practice it may not result in a significantly more streamlined process and, in some cases, may create additional delays.

The Commission does, however, agree with the recommendation contained in Justice Connect's submission that, in hearing FVIO applications, magistrates should inquire as early as possible about whether the applicant and respondent are in shared rental accommodation and, if so, ensure the protected person is notified of the right to apply for a new tenancy agreement. In these circumstances, a successful applicant could be provided with an information pack about this process, including the application form and details of relevant agencies that may be able to assist.²⁹⁸

Apportionment of liability

The Commission heard evidence that victims of family violence living in private and public rental accommodation are often burdened with compensation claims and debts that limit their ability to obtain safe alternative housing.

Tenants are, in general, jointly and severally liable for any loss or damage as a result of a breach of the tenancy agreement and a landlord can claim against any or all of them. Apart from using section 233C of the Residential Tenancies Act (which requires a final FVIO to be made), it is difficult for VCAT members to apportion liability between tenants, even when it is clear that the perpetrator is responsible for the loss, including under section 234 of the Act.

The Commission considers that the Act should be amended to address these limitations and ensure that victims are not held legally liable for debts that are properly attributable to perpetrators of family violence.

Giving notice and ending a tenancy

The Commission heard that further challenges can arise for victims of family violence in relation to the termination of co-tenancies.

Based on the issues raised previously, the Commission's view is that an ability to apply to VCAT for termination of a co-tenancy in circumstances of family violence would be a desirable reform. However, as discussed above, such an amendment may require the victim to initiate two sets of proceedings in two separate jurisdictions, imposing an additional administrative and potentially emotional burden on the victim.

One solution may be to create the ability for a magistrate to terminate the tenancy of a co-tenant who is a protected person under an FVIO at the time the intervention order is made. Magistrates could also be given the ability to make orders apportioning liability between the co-tenants at this time. However, this again gives rise to the concern discussed previously that the landlord and any other tenants would need to become parties to the proceeding, which would necessitate an adjournment and create delays. In addition, if a magistrate was able to make orders regarding the liability of the respective tenants, additional information would need to be sought regarding the extent of any liability.

Modification of rental properties

As discussed previously, a landlord may currently refuse a modification to a property; for example, installing security cameras or other fixtures that might assist with safety. This is regardless of the fact that tenants are required to meet the cost of restoring the property when they leave. This provision has the potential to undermine the ability of victims of family violence to stay safely in their homes. A solution would be to amend the Residential Tenancies Act to provide that a landlord must not unreasonably withhold consent to a request to modify the rental property when notifications are requested to improve the security of the rental property, and the tenant is affected by family violence.

Recommendation 116

The Department of Justice and Regulation's review of the Residential Tenancies Act 2006 (Vic) consider amending the Act to:

- ▷ empower Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal members to make an order under section 233A of the Act if a member is satisfied that family violence has occurred after considering certain criteria—but without requiring a final family violence intervention order containing an exclusionary condition
- ▷ provide a clear mechanism for apportionment of liability arising out of the tenancy in situations of family violence, to ensure that victims of family violence are not held liable for rent (or other tenancy-related debts) that are properly attributable to perpetrators of family violence
- ▷ enable victims of family violence to prevent their personal details from being listed on residential tenancy databases, and to remove existing listings, where the breach of the Act or the tenancy agreement occurred in the context of family violence
- ▷ enable victims of family violence wishing to leave a tenancy to apply to the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal for an order terminating a co-tenancy if the co-tenant is the perpetrator of that violence—including, where relevant, an order dealing with apportionment of liability for rent (or other tenancy-related debts) between the co-tenants
- ▷ prevent a landlord from unreasonably withholding consent to a request from a tenant who is a victim of family violence for approval to reasonably modify the rental property in order to improve the security of that property.

Recommendation 117

The Victorian Government encourage the use of applications under section 233A of the Residential Tenancies Act 2006 (Vic) [within 12 months], including by means of training and education for family violence support workers, Victoria Police and other relevant support staff in relation to the existence and operation of the provision.

Recommendation 118

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria consider issuing a practice direction to encourage magistrates hearing family violence intervention order applications to inquire as early as possible about whether the applicant and respondent are in shared rental accommodation and, if so, ensure that the protected person is notified of the right to apply for a new tenancy agreement and receives information about how to do so [within 12 months].

Recommendation 119

The Victorian Government consider any legislative reform that would limit as far as possible the necessity for individuals affected by family violence with proceedings in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria to bring separate proceedings in the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal in connection with any tenancy related to the family violence [within two years].

Recommendation 120

The Victorian Government ensure that Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal members receive training and education to ensure that they have adequate expertise in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and family violence matters [within 12 months].

Promoting economic recovery

Victims of family violence described their simple desire to be able to rebuild their lives by having the opportunity and capability to be able to confidently participate in the mainstream social and economic life of the Victorian community. The Commission consistently heard of their aspirations to be able to fully recover: to be able to renew their enjoyment of family and friends, to benefit from the income and self-esteem derived from having a job, to see their children do well in school and to be confident about their futures.

However, we also heard from many of their great sense of frustration, and at times despair, due to these aspirations seeming unachievable and to their own opportunities and those of their children being limited. Economic security is a protective factor against family violence and also a significant aspect of recovery. Promoting economic independence through a variety of mutually reinforcing initiatives is vital to empowering victims of family violence.

Family violence packages

This chapter discussed several powerful recovery tools including employment and skills development, financial literacy programs, financial counselling services and microfinance initiatives. These initiatives assist victims to gain, re-gain and maintain financial security. The importance of these opportunities is discussed below.

Employment

As areas of jobs growth in the Victorian economy are increasingly in the service and knowledge-based industries, employers are placing a premium on education, up to date skills, recent work experience and the personal networks people have to support themselves in finding and keeping work. This makes it particularly difficult for people who have suffered the trauma, dislocation and loss of self-esteem caused by family violence to gain and maintain employment. The often lengthy periods the system takes to resolve matters as basic as stable housing can lead to the atrophy of work skills, personal and professional confidence and credentials.

The Commission is persuaded that specialist employment assistance needs to be made available to victims of family violence. It should be based on an understanding of the impact of family violence and be able to be closely integrated with other forms of assistance in order that the different forms of assistance become mutually reinforcing steps on the road to recovery. The policy principle here is similar to that underpinning the Victorian Government's Work and Learning Centres and initiatives under its Back to Work and associated programs. The Commission recommends that there be an explicit link in working with women around housing and employment in recognition that resilience in the housing market may be enhanced through employment.

We further recommend that this form of integrated and rapid assistance be delivered through expanding the existing Family Violence Flexible Support Packages. The Commission's recommendations regarding these packages are discussed in Chapter 9.

The Commission acknowledges that victims experience family violence and its financial impacts at all ages, life stages and economic circumstances. For example, a woman entering retirement who has experienced years of economic abuse will require a different response than a young woman with children who wishes to re-enter the workforce or maintain her employment.

Financial literacy programs

In this chapter, the Commission detailed evidence that lack of financial knowledge among some women makes it harder to leave violent relationships or to be financially secure enough to do so. There remain structural and cultural barriers to women achieving economic equality—the gender pay gap, along with the myth that men are better money managers and should control household finances, still exists.

The Commission is strongly of the view that financial literacy is a significant protective factor from financial insecurity generally and that which results from family violence.

As discussed above, strategies to enhance women’s economic participation are important but they must be accompanied by initiatives to improve financial literacy. The Commission notes the important projects run by WIRE, Casey North Community Information & Support Service and Women’s Health in the North. The success of financial literacy programs depends on the provider’s understanding of the particular challenges of women living in violent relationships and recognition of the needs of women in different life stages and economic circumstances.

The Commission supports these types of financial literacy programs as part of broader efforts to address gender equality. There is an opportunity to reflect the importance of financial literacy in the Victorian Gender Equality Strategy.

Recommendation 121

The Victorian Government support the expansion of initiatives that deliver financial literacy training and education for victims of family violence [within two years].

Endnotes

- 1 National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women, 'Background Paper to Time for Action: The National Council's Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Children, 2009–2021' (March 2009) 44 citing Women's Health Australia, 'The Australian Longitudinal Study on Women's Health Partner Violence and the Health of Australian Women' (2005) 1; Rochelle Braaf and Isobelle B Meyering, 'Seeking Security: Promoting Women's Economic Wellbeing Following Domestic Violence' (March 2011) 18.
- 2 Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, 'Economic Abuse Policy Position Paper' (December 2015) 1.
- 3 Ibid.
- 4 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5(1)(iii).
- 5 VicHealth, 'Australians' Attitudes to Violence Against Women: Findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes Survey (NCAS)' (September 2014) 59.
- 6 Statement of Mooney, 9 July 2015, 8 [41].
- 7 Women's Legal Service Victoria—03, Submission 940, 11.
- 8 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015.
- 9 Community consultation, Werribee 1, 11 May 2015; Community consultation, Shepparton 1, 18 May 2015; Community consultation, Bendigo 1, 5 May 2015; Women's Legal Service Victoria—03, Submission 940, 11.
- 10 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 21.
- 11 Owen Camilleri, Tanya Corrie and Shorna Moore, 'Restoring Financial Safety: Legal Responses to Economic Abuse' (2015) 12.
- 12 Belinda Fehlberg and Christine Millward, 'Post-Separation Parenting and Financial Arrangements Over Time: Recent Qualitative Findings' (2013) 92 Family Matters 29, 35.
- 13 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 12.
- 14 Fiona MacDonald, 'Spotlight on Economic Abuse: A Literature and Policy Review' (Good Shepherd Youth & Family Service and Kildonan UnitingCare (September 2012) 10.
- 15 Ibid; Emma Smallwood, 'Stepping Stones: Legal Barriers to Economic Equality After Family Violence' (September 2015) 6; Prue Cameron, 'Relationship Problems and Money: Women talk about financial abuse' (978-0-9925517-1-1, WIRE Women's Information, August 2014) iv.
- 16 Isla Evans, 'Battle Scars: Long-term Effects of Prior Domestic Violence' (2007) 25.
- 17 Cameron, above n 15, 22.
- 18 Anonymous, Submission 583, 3.
- 19 Deborah K Anderson and Daniel G Saunders, 'Leaving an Abusive Partner: An Empirical Review of Predictors, the Process of Leaving, and Psychological Well-Being' (2003) 4(2) (April) Trauma, Violence & Abuse 163, 171.
- 20 WAYSS Limited, Submission 542, 39.
- 21 Anonymous, Submission 726, 2.
- 22 Smallwood, above n 15, 5 citing David de Vaus, Matthew Gray, Lixia Qu and David Stanton, 'The Economic Consequences of Divorce in Australia' (2014) 28(1) International Journal of Law, Policy and The Family 26.
- 23 Brotherhood of St Laurence, Submission 818, 7 (Citations omitted).
- 24 See, eg, Anonymous, Submission 175, 1; Anonymous, Submission 850, 5.
- 25 Anonymous, Submission 415, 1.
- 26 House of Representatives Standing Committee on Social Policy and Legal Affairs, 'From Conflict to Cooperation: Inquiry into the Child Support Program' (June 2015) 45; Australian Law Reform Commission, 'Family Violence and Commonwealth Laws—Improving Legal Frameworks: Final Report' (ALRC Report No 117, November 2011) 288.
- 27 House of Representatives Standing Committee on Social Policy and Legal Affairs, above n 26, xiii, 93; Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 15.
- 28 Australian Law Reform Commission, above n 26, 288.
- 29 Ibid 296–8, 323–3.
- 30 Wyndham Legal Service—02, Submission 83, 13. See also Elizabeth Branigan, 'His Money or Our Money? Financial Abuse of Women in Intimate Partner Relationships' (Coburg-Brunswick Community Legal and Financial Counselling Centre Inc, 2004) 3 29; Cameron, above n 15, 41; WIRE Women's Information, Submission 574, 10.
- 31 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 13; Anonymous, Submission 218, 3; WIRE Women's Information, Submission 574, 10; Anonymous, Submission 627, 3; Women's Health Goulburn North East, Submission 367, 2.
- 32 Council of Single Mothers and Their Children Victoria Inc, Submission 368, 13.
- 33 Ibid 12.
- 34 Cameron, above n 15, 41; Elizabeth Branigan, 'His Money or Our Money? Financial Abuse of Women in Intimate Partner Relationships' (Coburg-Brunswick Community Legal and Financial Counselling Centre Inc, 2004) 30; Anonymous, Submission 175, 1; Wyndham Legal Service—02, Submission 83, 56; Anonymous, Submission 230, 3.
- 35 Statement of Rich, 6 August 2015, 23 [90.3].
- 36 Penalties for underestimation also apply. Department of Health and Human Services, Response to Questions (15 July 2015), 1, provided to the Commission by the Department of Health and Human Services, 8 July 2015, 1–2.
- 37 Anonymous, Submission 291, 1.
- 38 House of Representatives Standing Committee on Social Policy and Legal Affairs, above n 26, 71.
- 39 Statement of Rich, 6 August 2015, 23 [90.2]; Anonymous, Submission 182, 1; Cameron, above n 15, 43.
- 40 Department of Human Services, above n 36, 1.
- 41 Anonymous, Submission 533, 10.
- 42 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS) and VicHealth, 'Framework Foundations 1: A Review of the Evidence on Correlates of Violence Against Women and What Works to Prevent It. (Companion document to Change the Story: A Shared Framework for the Primary Prevention of Violence Against Women and Their Children in Australia' (2015) 55.
- 43 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) s 3(d)(i); Ibid 16–17.
- 44 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS) and VicHealth, above n 42, 55.
- 45 Brotherhood of St Laurence, 'What next for place-based initiatives to tackle disadvantage? A practical look at recent lessons for Australian Public Policy.' (2015) 2.
- 46 See, eg, Amanda George and Briget Harris, 'Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria' (2014).
- 47 Brotherhood of St Laurence, Submission 818, 8.
- 48 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Census of Population and Housing: Socio-Economic Indexes for Areas (SEIFA), Australia, 2011' (Catalogue No 2033.0.55.001, Australian Bureau of Statistics, March 2013) Local Government Area, Indexes, SEIFA, 2011, Table 3; Crime Statistics Agency, Family incidents (Year ending 30 June 2015) (October 2015) Table 4 <<http://www.crimestatistics.vic.gov.au/home/crime+statistics/year+ending+30+june+2015/family+incidents>>.

- 49 Further, the ABS data is from the 2011 Census, whereas the police data is for the period July 2014–June 2015. Patterns of family violence may have changed in that period. For study explanatory notes see Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2033.0.55.001—Census of Population and Housing: Socio-Economic Indexes for Areas (SEIFA), Australia, 2011 (28 March 2013) <<http://www.abs.gov.au/AUSSTATS/abs@.nsf/Lookup/2033.0.55.001Explanatory%20Notes12011?OpenDocument>>.
- 50 Tony Vinson et al, 'Dropping Off The Edge 2015: Persistent Communal Disadvantage in Australia' (2015) 6–8.
- 51 Those living in the three per cent of most disadvantaged postcodes are 2.6 per cent more likely to have experienced domestic violence. Statement of Vinson, 4 August 2015, 4 [19], [23]. Ibid 10.
- 52 Francisco Azpitatre and Dina Bowman, 'Social Exclusion Monitor Bulletin' (Research Bulletin June 2010, Brotherhood of St Laurence and Melbourne Institute of Applied Economic and Social Research, June 2015) 1.
- 53 Ibid 2.
- 54 Brotherhood of St Laurence, above n 45, 2.
- 55 Vinson et al, above n 50, 10.
- 56 Azpitatre and Bowman, above n 52, 3.
- 57 Ibid 3, 7.
- 58 Ibid 3.
- 59 Twenty-eight and 40 per cent respectively. Ibid 5.
- 60 MacDonald, above n 14, 15–16.
- 61 Australian Council of Social Service, 'Poverty in Australia 2014' (October 2014) 10.
- 62 Australian Human Rights Commission, 'Accumulating Poverty? Women's Experiences of Inequality Over the Lifecycle: An Issues Paper Examining the Gender Gap in Retirement Savings' (September 2009) 8.
- 63 Workplace Gender Equality Agency, 'Gender Pay Gap Statistics' (Commonwealth of Australia, Workplace Gender Equality Agency, September 2015) 2.
- 64 Ibid 3. See also Rebecca Cassells et al, 'The impact of a sustained gender wage gap on the Australian economy' (University of Canberra, National Centre for Social and Economic Modelling, November 2009) 3.
- 65 Workplace Gender Equality Agency, above n 63, 3.
- 66 Australian Human Rights Commission, above n 62, 2.
- 67 Cameron, above n 15, 5.
- 68 Anonymous, Submission 466, 1.
- 69 Nicki Dowling et al, 'Problem Gambling and Intimate Partner Violence: A Systematic Review and Meta-Analysis' (2014) 17(1) Trauma, Violence & Abuse 43, 44, 58.
- 70 Australian Gambling Research Centre, 'The Impact of Gambling Problems on Families' (AGRC Discussion Paper No. 1, Australian Institute of Family Studies, November 2014) 4.
- 71 Ibid.
- 72 Women's Health in the North, Submission 637, 19.
- 73 Australian Gambling Research Centre, above n 70, 4 citing Nicki Dowling et al, 'Problem gambling and family violence: Prevalence and patterns in help-seeking populations' (2014) Addictive Behaviors 39, 1713–1717; Aino Suomi et al, 'Problem Gambling and Family Violence: Family Member Reports of Prevalence, Family Impacts and Family Coping' (2013) 3(13) Asian Journal of Gambling Issues and Public Health 15.
- 74 Dowling et al, above n 69, 56.
- 75 Suomi et al, above n 73, 1.
- 76 See, eg, Increasing the Odds for Safety and Respect Project Partnership, Submission 716, 3; Anonymous, Submission 998, 10. See also WIRE Women's Information, 'Opening Doors to Women: Assistance for Organisations Working with Women Experiencing Problem Gambling and Isolation' (Women's Information and Referral Exchange, 2010).
- 77 Victorian Primary Care Partnerships, Submission 248, 33.
- 78 Jo Wainer, Peteris Darzins and Kei Owada, 'Prevalence of Financial Elder Abuse in Victoria: Protecting Elder's Assets Study' (Monash University, 10 May 2010) 29.
- 79 Ibid 6.
- 80 Transcript of Blakey, 16 July 2015, 464 [5]–[12].
- 81 Australian Human Rights Commission, above n 62, 7 citing Diana Warren, Aspects of Retirement for Older Women (2006) 42.
- 82 Super Guru, Women and super (2015) The Association of Superannuation Funds of Australia Limited. <<http://www.superguru.com.au/about-super/women-and-super/>>.
- 83 Ross Clare, 'Developments in the Level and Distribution of Retirement Savings' (Association of Superannuation Funds of Australia, September 2011) 2.
- 84 Women's Gender Equality Agency, 'Women's economic security in retirement' (Perspective paper, 2015) 1.
- 85 Australian Human Rights Commission, above n 62, 3 citing Bruce Heady and Diana Warren, Families, 'Incomes and Jobs, Volume 3: A Statistical Report on Waves 1 to 5 of the HILDA Survey' (2008) 55.
- 86 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 78.
- 87 Frank McGuire MP—Member for Broadmeadows, Submission 759, 1.
- 88 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 28–29.
- 89 Ibid 28–29.
- 90 Transcript of Morton, 16 July 2015, 470.
- 91 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 33, 62.
- 92 Ibid.
- 93 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc.; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 15.
- 94 Smallwood, above n 15, 16.
- 95 Women's Legal Service Victoria—03, Submission 940, 15–18 [2.1]–[2.4].
- 96 The National Credit Code is contained in Schedule 1 of the National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (Cth).
- 97 The Australian Bankers' Association is a voluntary membership organisation. It is governed by a Code Compliance Monitoring Committee which can undertake investigations and make determinations in response to breaches of the Code of Banking Practice. See Australian Bankers' Association Inc, Code of banking practice <<http://www.bankers.asn.au/Industry-Standards/ABAs-Code-of-Banking-Practice>>.
- 98 Smallwood, above n 15, 16.
- 99 Ibid 16.
- 100 Anonymous, Submission 583, 3.
- 101 Transcript of Nelthorpe, 16 July 2015, 508 [15]–509 [25].
- 102 Smallwood, above n 15, 27.
- 103 Australian Bankers' Association Inc, 'Code of Banking Practice and Code Compliance Monitoring Committee Mandate' (Australian Bankers' Association, 2013) 24 [29.3]; Smallwood, above n 15, 27.
- 104 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 13; Smallwood, above n 15, 27.

105 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 32.

106 Smallwood, above n 15, 32.

107 National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (Cth) Schedule 1, National Credit Code, s 76(2).

108 National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (Cth) Schedule 1, National Credit Code, ss 77(b), 77(e).

109 Women's Legal Service Victoria—03, Submission 940, 15 [2.1].

110 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 13, 32, 75.

111 National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (Cth) Schedule 1, National Credit Code, s 72(1).

112 Australian Bankers' Association Inc, above n 103, 23 [28].

113 Australian Bankers' Association Inc., 'Promoting Understanding About Banks' Financial Hardship Programs—Industry Guideline' (Australian Bankers' Association, May 2013) 2.

114 Anonymous, Submission 175, 2.

115 Smallwood, above n 15, 27.

116 Ibid 33–4.

117 Australian and New Zealand Banking Corporation, Submission 561, 3.

118 Ibid.

119 Financial Ombudsman Service Australia <<https://www.fos.org.au/>>.

120 Smallwood, above n 15, 24–5; Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 13.

121 Anonymous, Submission 681, 1.

122 Smallwood, above n 15, 20.

123 Consumer Utilities Action Centre, 'Helping Not Hindering: Uncovering Domestic Violence and Utility Debt' (August 2014) 17.

124 Smallwood, above n 15, 20–2.

125 Ibid 23.

126 Essential Services Commission, Energy Retail Code: Version 11 (1 January 2011).

127 Essential Services Commission, Customer Service Code: Urban Water Businesses (September 2014).

128 Industry ACMA, The TCP Code (18 December 2015) <<http://www.acma.gov.au/Industry/Telco/Reconnecting-the-customer/TCP-code/the-tcp-code-telecommunications-consumer-protections-code-acma>>.

129 Essential Services Commission, 'Supporting Customers, Avoiding Labels: Energy Hardship Inquiry Draft Report' (September 2015) 32.

130 Ibid 41.

131 Consumer Utilities Action Centre, above n 123, 22–23.

132 Ibid 23.

133 Inner Melbourne Community Legal, Submission 506, 27. Clause 3.1 of AGL's Staying Connected: Hardship Policy and Program provides that hardship indicators might include a customer experiencing domestic violence or separation while clause 7.2 of Energy Australia's National Hardship Policy provides that with the customer's consent, their hardship team will refer a customer to an appropriate organisation including domestic violence counsellors.

134 Women's Legal Service Victoria—03, Submission 940, 5 [13]; Inner Melbourne Community Legal, Submission 506, 26.

135 Essential Services Commission, above n 129, 41.

136 Consumer Utilities Action Centre, above n 123, 25.

137 Smallwood, above n 15, 21.

138 Telstra Corporation Ltd, Submission 366, 2.

139 Department of Human Services, Utility Relief Grant and Non-Mains Utility Relief Grant schemes (November 2013) <<http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/for-individuals/financial-support/concessions/hardship/utility-relief-and-non-mains-utility-grant-scheme>>.

140 Smallwood, above n 15, 24.

141 Ibid 24.

142 Consumer Utilities Action Centre, above n 123, 45.

143 Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission 447, 2; Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, 7 [25].

144 Mental Health Legal Centre and Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 16. Community consultation, Richmond, 1 May 2015, 2.

145 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 2.

146 Statement of 'Jones', 13 July 2015, 12.

147 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 2. Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission 447, 16.

148 Infringements Act 2006 (Vic) s 22(1)(a)(ii), Road Safety Act 1986 (Vic) Part 6AA.

149 Infringements Act 2006 (Vic) ss 22(1)(b) and (c).

150 Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, 3 [11], [12]. See Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, [10]–[24] for an overview of the infringements system in Victoria.

151 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 6–7; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission 447, 16; Transcript of Nelthorpe, 16 July 2015, 516 [14]–[22]. See also Road Safety Act 1986 (Vic) s 84BA–BC.

152 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 9.

153 Ibid.

154 Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, 13 [37.1].

155 Ibid [37.3].

156 Ibid 14 [37.5].

157 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 2, 5. Ibid 8 [28].

158 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 2.

159 Infringements Act 2006 (Vic) s 22, 65–66.

160 Infringements Act 2006 (Vic) s 3.

161 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 4.

162 Ibid.

163 Ibid.

164 Ibid 5–6.

165 Ibid 1, 6.

166 Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, 13 [37.1].

167 Ibid 14 [38].

168 Ibid 14 [39].

169 Ibid 15 [40].

170 Ibid 15 [41], [42], [43].

171 Ibid 16 [43].

172 Transcript of Gartlan, 16 July 2015, 497–498.

173 Consumer Utilities Action Centre, above n 123, 24–25.

174 WIRE Information Service, Submission 574, 16; Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, Submission 836, 23.

175 Statement of Gartlan, 8 July 2015, 9 [42]–[44].

176 Smallwood, above n 15, 62.

177 Statement of Gartlan, 8 July 2015, 9 [45].

178 Transcript of Smallwood, 16 July 2015, 493.

179 Smallwood, above n 15, 65.

180 Anonymous, Submission 182.

181 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 81(2)(c), 86. Section 4 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) defines ‘property’, in relation to a family member, to include: (a) property of the family member; and (b) property that is situated in premises in which the family member lives or works whether or not it is the family member’s property; and (c) property that is being used by the family member whether or not it is the family member’s property.

182 Women’s Health Goulburn North East, Submission 367, 2.

183 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 40.

184 Ibid 15.

185 Anonymous, Submission 175, 1.

186 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 15.

187 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 86.

188 Explanatory Memorandum, Family Violence Protection Bill (Vic), [86].

189 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 86(a)(ii).

190 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 86(b)(ii).

191 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 86(b)(i).

192 Transcript of Smallwood, 16 July 2015, 502 [26]–503 [3].

193 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, ‘Family Violence—A National Legal Response: Final Report’ (ALRC Report No 114, NSWLRC Report No 128, Commonwealth of Australia, 2010) 748 [16.224].

194 Transcript of Smallwood, 16 July 2015, 500 [31]–502 [10]. See also Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 14–15.

195 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 11, 14.

196 Statement of Smallwood, 10 July 2015, 4 [23]. See also Women’s legal Service Victoria—03, Submission 940, 11–12.

197 Victoria Police, ‘Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence—Edition 3’ (2014) 32.

198 Transcript of Nelthorpe, 16 July 2015, 503 [10]–[16].

199 Ibid.

200 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 87–88.

201 Transcript of Smallwood, 16 July 2015, 500 [31]–501 [10].

202 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, Form FVIO: Information for Application for an Intervention Order (September 2011) <<https://www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au/forms/application-family-violence-intervention-order-fvio1>>.

203 Note that the form does ask ‘Has the respondent removed any of your personal property or the personal property of another family member against your wishes?’ in the ‘History of Family Violence Incidents’ section at page 7: Ibid.

204 Transcript of Smallwood, 16 July 2015, 200 [31]–501 [10].

205 Victoria Police, above n 197, 29.

206 Smallwood, above n 15, 52–53.

207 Fairer, Safer Housing, Review of the Residential Tenancies Act 1997—A Fairer Safer Housing initiative <<http://fairersaferhousing.vic.gov.au/renting>>.

208 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 262; Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) s 233A.

209 Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) s 233A.

210 See, eg, Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, Submission 164, 3; Justice Connect, Submission 889, 27–29; Transcript of Adams, 21 July 2015, 1005 [26]; Statement of Adams and Russo, 15 July 2015, 6 [34]; Statement of Spinney, 20 July 2015, 9 [39.2].

211 Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, Submission 164, 3.

212 Crime Statistics Agency, ‘An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14’ (January 2016) Table 4 of Magistrates’ Court data. Note, however, that this figure does not specify how many of these intervention orders included conditions excluding respondents from a rental property.

213 Justice Connect, Submission 889, 27–29.

214 Ibid 27.

215 Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, Submission 164, 2.

216 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 10.

217 Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, Submission 164, 2–3.

218 In relation to Queensland, see Residential Tenancies and Rooming Accommodation Act 2008 (QLD) s 245. In relation to South Australia, see Residential Tenancies Act 1995 (SA) s 89A.

219 Confidential, Submission 575, 2.

220 Justice Connect, Submission 889, 22.

221 Ibid.

222 Ibid 23. There is some limited ability under Part IVAA of the Wrongs Act 1958 (Vic) to apportion liability for claims between ‘concurrent wrongdoers’: Ibid 23; Wrongs Act 1958 (Vic), Part IVAA. However, there are a number of issues with using this mechanism to assist victims of family violence against whom a compensation claim has been made: Ibid 23.

223 Tenants Union of Victoria, Submission 767, 2–3.

224 Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) s 234.

225 Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) s 234(3).

226 See, eg, Justice Connect, Submission 889, 22–24; Tenants Union of Victoria, Submission 767, 6.

227 Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) Part 10A (see, in particular, s 439E).

228 Justice Connect, Submission 889, 25.

229 See, eg, Ibid 25–27; Tenants Union of Victoria, Submission 767, 6; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 50; Quantum Support Services Inc, Submission 371, 4. See also, Statement of Adams and Russo, 15 July 2015, 12–13 [58].

230 Justice Connect, Submission 889, 25. As noted elsewhere in this report, victims of family violence may be forced to urgently leave their home, move to refuge accommodation and may then be unable to disclose their new address. Prior to listing personal information on the database, a landlord or database operator must provide the tenant with 14 days’ notice in order for them to object to the information being listed if it is inaccurate, incomplete or ambiguous. When a victim has had to flee her home and cannot be located, she will not have the opportunity to object to a listing and may not find out about it until she applies for a rental property: Justice Connect, Submission 889, 26. Once the person does become aware of the listing, it can be difficult to apply to have it removed or amended: Justice Connect, Submission 889, 26.

231 Justice Connect, Submission 889, 27; Tenants Union of Victoria, Submission 767, 6–7; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 50.

- 232 Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) s 64.
- 233 Tenants Union of Victoria, Submission 767, 7–8.
- 234 Ibid.
- 235 Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) ss 219, 235.
- 236 Tenants Union of Victoria, Submission 767, 3.
- 237 Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) s 230.
- 238 Tenants Union of Victoria, Submission 767, 3.
- 239 Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) s 210.
- 240 Residential Tenancies Act 2010 (NSW) s 101.
- 241 Residential Tenancies Act 2010 (NSW) s 102. See also, Residential Tenancies Act 1995 (SA) s 89A.
- 242 Braaf and Meyering, above n 1, 25.
- 243 Anonymous, Submission 76, 2.
- 244 WIRE Information Service, Submission 574, 13; Ludo McFerran, ‘Safe at Home, Safe at Work? National Domestic Violence and the Workplace Survey’ (Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, December 2011) 2.
- 245 Statement of Bignold, 13 July 2015, 7–8 [34].
- 246 WIRE Information Service, Submission 574, 13.
- 247 Fitted for Work, Submission 622, 2. Ibid 15.
- 248 WIRE Information Service, Submission 574, 15.
- 249 Ibid 16.
- 250 See, eg, Whittlesea Community Connections, Submission 375, 3; Lee Faliana, Submission 29, 2.
- 251 Lee Faliana, Submission 29, 2.
- 252 Statement of Bignold, 13 July 2015, 2 [11], 8 [39]. The program was closed at 30 June 2015 due to a lack of funding.
- 253 Statement of Bignold, 13 July 2015, 11 [53].
- 254 Transcript of Bignold, 16 July 2015, 589 [16]–590 [26].
- 255 Fitted for Work, Submission 622, 1.
- 256 Ibid.
- 257 Ibid 2.
- 258 Transcript of Bignold, 16 July 2015, 584 [16]–585 [11].
- 259 Ibid 586[3]–[11].
- 260 Minister for Families and Children, The Hon Jenny Mikakos, ‘Labor Government Boosting Flexible Family Violence Support’ (Media Release, 26 November 2015).
- 261 Tanya Corrie, ‘Economic Security for Survivors of Domestic and Family Violence: Understanding and Measuring the Impact’ (Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, 2016) 40.
- 262 MacDonald, above n 14, vi.
- 263 See, eg, Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, Submission 836, 23; Community consultation, Benalla 2, 19 May 2015.
- 264 Transcript of Kun, 16 July 2015, 446 [23]–30].
- 265 See, eg, Nicole Brand, Submission 385, 2.
- 266 WIRE Information Service, Submission 574, 12–13.
- 267 Casey North Community Information & Support Service, Submission 163, 1–2.
- 268 Australian Securities and Investments Commission, ‘Moneysmart Week 2012 Awards Ceremony Recognises Achievement in Advancing Australians’ Financial Literacy’ (Media Release, 3 September 2012) 6.
- 269 Women’s Health In the North, ‘Managing Money: Every Women’s Business’ (Guide, 2012).
- 270 Financial Literacy Australia, 2015 Award Recipients (20 November 2015) <<http://finlit.org.au/2015-award-recipients/>>.
- 271 Women’s Health in the North (2010) <<http://www.whin.org.au/>>.
- 272 Smallwood, above n 15, 65.
- 273 Braaf and Meyering, above n 1, 40. See also 10thousandgirl organisation, 10thousandgirl: Financial Thinking for Women <<http://10thousandgirl.com/>>.
- 274 To qualify for the No Interest Loan Scheme, the applicant must have a Health Care Card/Pension Card or be on a low income, have resided in their current premises for more than three months and show a willingness and capacity to repay. See Good Shepherd Microfinance, The No Interest Loan Scheme <<http://goodshepherdmicrofinance.org.au/services/no-interest-loan-scheme-nils>>.
- 275 Statement of Mooney, 9 July 2015, 4 [25].
- 276 Stephen Bennett et al, ‘Life Changing Loans at No Interest: An Outcomes Evaluation of Good Shepherd Microfinances’ No Interest Loan Scheme (NILS)’ (University of NSW, Centre for Social Impact, March 2014) 8. See also Statement of Mooney, 9 July 2015, 7 [36.5]–[36.7].
- 277 Women’s Health Goulburn North East, Submission 367, 2.
- 278 Ibid.
- 279 See, eg, Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, 13–14 [36]–[37].
- 280 Ibid 13 [37.1]–14 [37.6]
- 281 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 9.
- 282 Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, 13 [37.3].
- 283 Infringements Working Group, Submission 799, 2, 5.
- 284 Ibid 5.
- 285 Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, 14 [38].
- 286 Ibid 14 [39].
- 287 Ibid 15 [40].
- 288 Ibid 15 [41], [42], [43].
- 289 See Chapter 24.
- 290 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 193, 748.
- 291 See, eg, Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, Submission 164, 6; Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 10; Confidential, Submission 575, 5; Justice Connect, Submission 889, 5; Community Housing Federation of Victoria et al, Submission 550, 31; and Quantum Support Services Inc, Submission 371, 4.
- 292 Justice Connect, Submission 889, 22.
- 293 Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, Submission 164, 2–3.
- 294 Confidential, Submission 575, 2.
- 295 We note that magistrates currently have jurisdiction in relation to residential tenancy matters which involve a monetary claim for an amount exceeding $10,000: see Residential Tenancies Act 1997 (Vic) ss 509, 510 and 447.
- 296 Statement of Cooney, 30 July 2015, 13 [61]
- 297 Ibid 14–15 [72].
- 298 Justice Connect, Submission 889, 29.

22 Restorative justice for victims of family violence

Introduction

This chapter considers whether a restorative justice approach to family violence should be introduced in Victoria.

The Commission heard that many victims of family violence find current court processes dissatisfying and at times traumatic, often because they fail to adequately meet their needs for participation, having a voice, validation, offender accountability and restoration. A number of organisations that work with family violence victims urged the Commission to consider a restorative justice approach to family violence, in addition to making essential reforms to the court system, to address these concerns.

The first section of this chapter outlines what the Commission heard about the limitations of court responses to family violence and the emergence of restorative justice as an additional response to family violence.

The second section of this chapter reviews the evidence before the Commission from a number of stakeholders who asked the Commission to consider introducing restorative justice programs in Victoria. The Commission was told that a restorative justice approach has the potential to deliver better outcomes for women than the adversarial justice system because of its ability to provide a forum for women to be heard on their own terms, and offer a process that is tailored to individual women's needs. It also heard that a restorative justice approach has the capacity to result in practical outcomes, such as agreements in relation to joint utilities and bank accounts and that it may be particularly relevant in cases where the victim wishes to remain in her relationship but wants the abuse to stop. Proponents of a restorative justice model also considered that this approach may facilitate better acknowledgment, and even genuine accountability, on the part of the perpetrator.

The Commission examined this issue closely, in light of concerns that a restorative justice approach might be manipulated by perpetrators, and could undermine the important gains that have been made in ensuring family violence is treated as a public issue rather than simply a private matter between individuals. The Commission also reviewed a number of restorative justice programs in other jurisdictions, which are outlined in this chapter.

After careful consideration of the evidence and the submissions received on the issue, the Commission is persuaded that, provided robust safeguards are in place and it is offered as an additional option (not as a substitute or precondition) to pursuing action through the courts, a restorative justice process should be made available to those victims who wish to pursue such an option. The Commission agrees that restorative justice processes have the potential to meet a broad range of victims' needs that might not always be available through the courts, and to assist victims to recover from the impact of the abuse they have suffered. In the final section of this chapter, the Commission recommends the development of a framework and pilot program for the delivery of restorative justice options for victims of family violence that are victim-driven and incorporate robust safeguards.

Context

Limitations with court responses to family violence

As discussed in Chapter 16, the justice system plays a fundamental role in protecting victims' safety and promoting perpetrator accountability in both the civil and criminal jurisdictions. Not only is a court able to make orders that demonstrate that violent behaviour has consequences for perpetrators, its involvement also signals that family violence is a matter of public importance and not something that should be left to be resolved privately. For some women, invoking the jurisdiction of the court is a turning point in their lives. This may mark the moment when they finally have the opportunity to talk openly about the abuse they have suffered, the perpetrator must face the prospect of public disapproval and the imposition of sanctions, and responsibility for managing the violence is transferred from the victim to the state. In this respect the court process can be affirming and empowering for victims of family violence.¹

However, the Commission heard that many women find the reality of the court process to be deeply dissatisfying and even re-traumatising, such that, far from being a process that helps them to recover from the violence, it instead compounds its effects. This is discussed in Chapter 16.

A strong theme to emerge from consultations held by the Commission was the need for victims to understand the options available to them, and the processes involved, and to be empowered to make their own decisions about what steps and outcomes are appropriate.² The Commission heard many stories about victims who, after a sustained period of abuse, took action to protect their own and their children's safety, only to be propelled into a confusing, complex and unsupportive system.³

Once in the justice system, victims often feel they have not been heard by the court, either because their matter has been dealt with so quickly, because their lawyers have spoken on their behalf, or because their story has not been believed or validated by the court.⁴ The relatives of family violence homicide victims with whom the Commission met also described the limited focus on the victim's 'voice' in any subsequent criminal trial or inquest.

Justice system processes can prolong contact with the perpetrator with the potential for extended victimisation.⁵ This can re-traumatise victims and counteract their attempts to diminish the effects of family violence on their lives.⁶ On the other hand, while wanting the violence to stop and seeking accountability from the perpetrator, some victims of family violence may wish to remain on reasonable or even intimate terms with the perpetrator, objectives which may be alien to a system that primarily aims to achieve and maintain separation of the parties.⁷

It has also been argued that the criminal justice system focuses on the legal view of individual offences instead of a more holistic understanding of patterns of abuse, and can encourage denial rather than admissions of offending.⁸

In its submission, Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre reported on the results of a research project involving 190 victims of family violence with cases before a number of central Victorian magistrates' Courts. Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre concluded that there were five elements the women identified as being important to their sense of justice:

- ▷ participation—for example, for the decision-making to be more in their hands
- ▷ voice—to be heard, for legal actors to listen and for those experiencing family violence to be empowered to say what is their truth; for them to define clearly what is safety and justice for them
- ▷ validation—for their feelings, behaviour and experiences to be understood; to be believed, not judged or made to feel ashamed
- ▷ offender accountability—for the offender to acknowledge the harm he has caused; for him to apologise and change his behaviour; and for the community and justice system to monitor his behaviour and hold him accountable
- ▷ restoration—for the justice process to be the beginning not the end; for healing to occur for the women and their children and their community.⁹

Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre's conclusions reflect many of the justice concerns of victims of crime generally. Drawing on the research literature about what victims of crime seek from the justice system, the Victorian Law Reform Commission has summarised those concerns as: participation and voice; information; trust, neutrality and respectful treatment; punishment and retribution; deterrence, protection and community safety; material and emotional reparation and restoration.¹⁰

These concerns also reflect international research findings about the motivations of victims of sexual and domestic violence when seeking justice outcomes: the most important of which are validation; vindication from the community¹¹ (including by exposing the perpetrator's conduct to friends and family members);¹² and preventing the perpetrator from committing further crimes, however that might be achieved.¹³ Victims of sexual violence also consider their sense of control, and not having to continually relive the crime, as important elements of achieving justice.¹⁴ As a result, some commentators suggest that the requirements imposed on victims through legal proceedings do not cater for victims' needs and are fundamentally opposed to their perceptions of justice.¹⁵ In the context of responding to sexual assault, the provision of a 'menu of options' for victims has been suggested, including alternative or informal justice approaches that provide victims with a greater degree of participation, voice, validation and vindication.¹⁶

Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre told the Commission that the results of their research project showed that none of the women surveyed felt that their 'justice needs' for offender accountability or restoration were met by the justice system response.¹⁷ Some of the women who participated in the research project identified restorative processes, such as opportunities to be heard in a more empowering and less adversarial forum, as having the potential to address their unmet needs.¹⁸

Definition of restorative justice

Restorative justice has been defined as a process:

... to involve, to the extent possible, those who have a stake in a specific offence and to collectively identify and address harms, needs and obligations, in order to heal and put things as right as possible.¹⁹

and as a process:

... whereby all parties with a stake in a particular offence come together to resolve collectively how to deal with the aftermath of the offence and its implications for the future.²⁰

Restorative justice focuses on the personal harm caused by a crime, rather than on a violation of the law committed solely against the state.²¹

Restorative justice processes can take different forms. Some involve direct contact between the victim and perpetrator (such as victim-offender mediation and group conferencing), while others involve just the victims in processes that aim to be restorative, for example by giving them a forum in which to be heard (these are referred to as truth-telling models).²²

The group conference model involves a scheduled, mediated encounter between a consenting victim and perpetrator, as well as other participants such as their representatives, police members, family members or friends.²³ The meeting provides an opportunity for the victim to describe what impact the crime has had on them, for the perpetrator to acknowledge the harm they have caused, and for the parties to decide what actions might be taken to repair the harm. Participants first negotiate a shared understanding (the 'truth-telling stage') and then a mutually acceptable plan (the 'problem-solving stage') to address the reparation of harm, prevention of harm and promotion of wellbeing.²⁴ Ideally the process should be complemented by a clear structure for continuing oversight and support.²⁵

A conference need not have tangible outcomes, but if it does, outcomes might include an apology, financial compensation, an agreement about managing future contact, or a commitment on the part of the perpetrator to address the underlying causes of their offending behaviour. Some restorative justice programs are linked to the sentencing phase of a criminal prosecution, with the judicial officer invited to take the conference outcome into account in imposing a sentence. Others take place after sentencing, or entirely outside the criminal justice system.

Restorative justice processes used in cases of general, that is non-family violence-related, offences have been found to increase victim satisfaction and offender responsibility, and in some cases to reduce reoffending.²⁶

Concerns about restorative justice

The use of restorative justice processes in family violence matters has long been controversial.

In its publication Time for Action, the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children summarised the major concerns about restorative justice as relating to:

- the unequal power relationships between victims and perpetrators of gendered violence, and the capacity of the perpetrator, through subtle forms of intimidation, to exert power over their victim and therefore the restorative justice process
- the assumption of a uniform set of community values that condemns violence against women
- the appeal to apology and forgiveness, which are characteristics of the cycle of abuse in intimate partner violence
- a concern that restorative justice will be favoured by governments because it may be seen as a cheaper option.²⁷

While acknowledging that restorative models were worth exploring, Helen Fatouros, Director of Criminal Law Services at Victoria Legal Aid, said in evidence:

... there is a very significant role for the State to play, particularly around serious offending like sexual offending around children, where the accountability function of the criminal law and the symbolic role of punishment is vitally important and that cannot be left to just restorative models.²⁸

In light of concerns of this nature, previous reviews by the Victorian Law Reform Commission in 2005, the Law Reform Committee of the Victorian Parliament in 2009 and the Australian Law Reform Commission in 2010 recommended that further research be undertaken before restorative justice practices are considered for use in family violence matters.²⁹

However, in 2011 the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children recommended that trials be undertaken, with necessary caution, 'to explore the utility and suitability of restorative justice for cases of domestic and family violence and sexual assault'.³⁰

Introducing restorative justice processes in Victoria

A number of individuals and organisations asked the Commission to consider whether restorative justice processes should be introduced in Victoria as an additional way of supporting family violence victims, including in relation to children and young people,³¹ to overcome the effects of the abuse they have experienced and to overcome the limitations of the justice system response.³² We heard that the use of restorative justice in family violence matters remains contentious, but that it has the potential to meet the needs of victims in ways that the justice system may not currently be able to achieve.

Women's Legal Service Victoria urged the Commission to recommend that a restorative justice pilot be developed.³³ In its submission to the Commission, the Victorian Government expressed an interest in innovative justice solutions, including restorative justice, noting that the 'expansion of specialist courts focused on restorative justice for victims and perpetrators is an opportunity for government in the area of crisis response'.³⁴

Proponents of a restorative justice model note that such an approach does not preclude holding perpetrators to account and taking serious action against them through formal justice mechanisms.³⁵

One woman who gave evidence at a public hearing reflected on her experience of the justice system and the approach she believes may have been more useful for her:

... for me experiencing trial was horrendous. To be pointed at by his barrister and told, 'It did not happen,' it was so confusing for me because I have been taught since I was young to respect authority, to do as you're told, and here's someone with intelligence and power telling me, 'It did not happen,' and I came this close to saying, 'Okay, you're right.' I was spinning. If that could have been avoided with restorative justice so much time could have been [saved]—and I feel the result would have been the same ...³⁶

... if there was such restorative justice where he could admit he's done something wrong if he was willing to, and I could express the level of hurt and open his eyes to the layers of hurt from self-doubt ... the nightmares ... [He] was initially my high school friend. I know there's a soul in there somewhere. I feel if I was face-to-face with him and tell him ... if it was in an environment that was safe, if he could hear it, surely it would pull at his heartstrings to change ... Restorative justice would have eliminated ... having to tell the children that their father is in jail. I would have much preferred to sit face-to-face and tell him how his actions—the long-term effects [they] have on me. That would be therapeutic ... For him to hear it and to apologise would be justice. The effect is the same, that he won't do it to someone else.³⁷

The Commission was told that a restorative justice approach to family violence cases could deliver better outcomes for women than the adversarial justice system because it would offer a process that is tailored to an individual woman's needs and be informed by her own choices:³⁸

There should be more time and more resources allocated to allow women to have the agency to make the most appropriate decision for their circumstances. Currently, there are no alternatives [for] women who do not want state intervention and would prefer a restorative justice approach.³⁹

Professor Leigh Goodmark from the University of Maryland in the United States gave evidence at the Commission's hearings and argued that:

Restorative justice places a great deal of power in the hands of the victim survivor, including the power to decide whether restorative processes are appropriate, to confront their partners, and to have their partners admit responsibility and seek reparations.⁴⁰

Professor Goodmark has argued that in the United States, domestic violence law and policy rely almost exclusively on separation-based remedies and reflect the assumption that women always have, or should have, the goal of leaving the relationship.⁴¹ She states that this ignores women's calculations about the merits of staying in the relationship and the reality that, in many instances, separation serves women poorly, if at all.⁴² Professor Goodmark told the Commission that 'studies show us that a fairly large number of people intend to continue their relationship with their partner'.⁴³

Professor Goodmark saw a particular role for restorative justice options in those cases where the victim does not wish to separate from the perpetrator but wants the abuse to stop, or for victims whose contact with their ex-partner will continue:

For people who are going to be co-parenting, and for people who are living in the same small geographic or ethnic or religious communities, figuring out how to re-order relationships after intimate partner violence, knowing that there will be ongoing contact between the parties, is particularly important. I think there's a real place for restorative justice there.⁴⁴

InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence pointed out that available legal avenues do not cater for those clients who want to continue their relationships:

... [InTouch] regularly sees its clients stay in violent relationships without pursuing the civil or criminal remedies that are currently available to them because neither would help them to achieve what they want, which is to continue in their relationship without the violence. The implementation of a best practice restorative justice process for family violence might assist women to achieve this aim.⁴⁵

Such an approach might also have benefits for children. Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre observed:

In assisting children with their recovery from family violence, a restorative process could provide a forum where children are better heard by the offenders and/or significant agencies. Such an environment may allow women and children to more actively participate in discussions about their safety and well-being, facilitated by people they trust rather than by the authorities.⁴⁶

The Commission heard that a restorative justice approach could provide better opportunities for the victim to be heard by the perpetrator.⁴⁷

I think there is a place in the criminal justice system for restorative justice, where, in some cases, a victim can face their perpetrator and the perpetrator can apologise for their destructive and damaging behaviour. The perpetrator could make it clear that they will never repeat the actions which have led to the offence. They could be forced, in a closely monitored way, to do courses, programs, practical active things that could help to change their thinking for good. The victim could explain the effect that the family violence has had on them so that the perpetrator can have some understanding of the consequences of their actions. This might even take the place of a lengthy prison term, providing no further abuse occurs. Of course, if the abuse occurred again, none of this could apply.⁴⁸

It could also facilitate a better acknowledgment, and even genuine accountability, by the perpetrator of the harm they caused, rather than denial.⁴⁹ A woman who attended the Commission's community consultations whose sister had committed suicide following a number of abusive relationships, spoke about the limitations of the criminal justice system in this respect:

I still don't know how can we bring them to account now. The most overwhelming thing is for justice to happen now. These men aren't going to change by going to jail. They have to accept it in themselves. They are not facing themselves.⁵⁰

It is said that restorative justice has the potential to increase the likelihood of family violence being reported because it offers more flexibility and an alternative to the criminal justice system.⁵¹ In Chapter 23 and Chapter 27 we outline how older people experiencing abuse, for example by an adult child, and the parents of adolescents who use violence towards them or their siblings can be reluctant to report violence because they wish to maintain their family relationships, and may be fearful of the consequences for their children of reporting the abuse to the police.

A similar point was made by participants in the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission's recent Independent Review into Sex Discrimination, Sexual Harassment, including Predatory Behaviour in Victoria Police who stated that Victoria Police's 'punitive' and 'adversarial' response to formal complaints dissuaded them from reporting relevant behaviour.⁵²

The Centre Against Violence submitted that a restorative justice model could also address power imbalances in a way that other mediated forums, such as couples counselling, would not.⁵³

The Commission also heard that:

- ▷ A restorative justice conference might result in a set of very practical outcomes, such as agreements in relation to joint utilities and bank accounts, as well as a commitment on the part of the perpetrator to seek assistance to change his behaviour.⁵⁴
- ▷ As an alternative to traditional criminal justice processes, a restorative justice process could be particularly beneficial where relationships between communities and police or courts are strained, or where women have experienced an inadequate or damaging response from the criminal justice system in the past.⁵⁵
- ▷ A restorative justice process would expand the network of people able to provide continuing support and oversight,⁵⁶ and supplement and strengthen justice, health and human services interventions.⁵⁷ Including other family members or peers in the conference process may also increase the visibility of the perpetrator's violence,⁵⁸ and repair broader family relationships, for example, between children and parents.⁵⁹

There is support for the use of restorative models of justice within Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, due to the models' capacity to incorporate elements of healing and self-determination and to avoid the re-victimisation frequently associated with the criminal justice system.⁶⁰ However, some victims' advocates caution against applying restorative justice models in cases involving sexual and family violence in those communities, and urge in-depth consultation and community development of any relevant programs.⁶¹

A number of submissions listed conditions that would need to be in place for a restorative justice approach in a family violence context to be successful. In particular, submissions noted that it was important that victims requested the process,⁶² consented to it,⁶³ or led it.⁶⁴ Other submissions highlighted the importance of ensuring that victims feel safe during the process and that any process would hold perpetrators to account, be accessible to all victims, including culturally and linguistically diverse victims, and use skilled and experienced conveners.⁶⁵

The submissions the Commission received listed a number of factors that would need to be considered to implement a restorative justice approach. These included guidelines on the types of cases a restorative justice program would accept, systems of case management, the format of the conferencing process and arrangements for monitoring and evaluation.⁶⁶ Other variables included timing (for example, whether it would occur before or after a perpetrator's conviction and/or sentencing) and whether parties who were in a continuing relationship would be eligible.⁶⁷

Women's Legal Service Victoria submitted that a pilot be developed first for approaches with the lowest level of complexity and risk and, subject to the success of those, approaches with greater complexity and risk could then be trialled.⁶⁸

A first approach to trial might be limited to cases where:

- the victim requests the restorative process, and
- the parties do not have a continuing relationship, and
- the perpetrator has been convicted and sentenced.

A slightly more complex approach, might be to extend restorative approaches to cases where:

- the victim requests the process, and
- there is a continuing relationship, or
- the perpetrator has not yet been sentenced.⁶⁹

The Commission also heard about the therapeutic value of truth-telling exercises that do not necessarily involve the perpetrator.⁷⁰ One option that has been tested is Victim Impact Panels in which a small panel of volunteer victims address a larger group of offenders who are not known to them. The panels aim to provide victims with a forum to express their feelings and provide perpetrators with an understanding of the consequences of their violence. They have been trialled in the context of family violence in the United States with positive responses from victims.⁷¹

Restorative justice programs in other jurisdictions

During its consideration of the issues surrounding the use of restorative justice for family violence matters, the Commission reviewed information about several restorative justice programs currently being operated in Australia, New Zealand and some European Union countries.

Australia

While there are numerous restorative justice programs operating around Australia, and in the youth justice context in Victoria (discussed further in Chapter 23), there are only a few examples of programs for family violence or sexual assault-related matters in Australia.⁷² In Victoria, the South Eastern Centre Against Sexual Assault has established a pilot restorative justice conferencing program for victims of sexual assault, many of whom were abused by family members.⁷³ The Commission was also told that, based on its experience in facilitating youth group conferences, and in close consultation with family violence specialists, CatholicCare Sandhurst is exploring the possibility of establishing a program that offers victims of family violence restorative justice options.⁷⁴

The Australian Capital Territory is expanding its legislated restorative justice scheme to include adults and more serious crimes from 2016, and to address family violence from 2018.⁷⁵

While it is not a restorative justice program, the Commission heard that the Victoria Legal Aid Family Dispute Resolution Service can offer restorative outcomes to participants in the family law context, provided there is adequate screening, risk assessment and preparation.⁷⁶ The process allows the parties to have their say, and the confidentiality rules that apply in that process can encourage perpetrators to acknowledge past wrongs. Similarly, Women's Legal Service Queensland developed its Coordinated Family Dispute Resolution model to provide specialised dispute resolution for families where there had been a history of family violence.⁷⁷ This service featured specialist risk assessment and counselling support, legal advice and representation at the session for both perpetrators and victims.⁷⁸

New Zealand

Restorative justice conferencing in family violence matters is reasonably widespread in New Zealand. Research has indicated that participants have found these processes satisfying and that they would recommend participation to other victims and perpetrators in response to family violence.⁷⁹ The New Zealand Ministry of Justice issues detailed standards for restorative justice in family violence cases which make victims' safety a paramount consideration.⁸⁰

The Victorian Association for Restorative Justice referred in its submission to a specific program from New Zealand, the Whanganui Family Violence Integrated Services Project, which involves collaboration between 17 statutory, iwi and community organisations.⁸¹ The professionals involved in the program meet weekly to coordinate and monitor the support to the families involved. Health and human services agencies provide constructive interventions while the justice agencies act as a safety net, providing reactive interventions when necessary.⁸²

Project Restore, based in Auckland, conducts restorative justice conferences for victims of sexual offences and is regarded as being a best-practice approach due to the extensive and specialised preparation involved and the support workers allocated to the victim and offender throughout the process.⁸³

European Union

The use of restorative justice processes in cases of family violence in the European Union is fairly established.⁸⁴ A 2015 European Forum for Restorative Justice paper canvassing best-practice examples of existing programs noted that most European countries have experience with voluntary forms of restorative justice interventions in family violence cases.⁸⁵ The paper examined programs in Austria, Denmark, Finland, Greece, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. Although it concluded that the practices and regulatory environment differ between countries, it examined the following features, which exist to varying degrees across jurisdictions:

- ▷ the legislative framework, if any, underpinning the program, and its relationship to the criminal justice system
- ▷ referral pathways, and access and eligibility criteria for participation (consent of the victim and the perpetrator is a precondition in all jurisdictions)
- ▷ the safeguards adopted, such as providing victims upfront with advice about all available options, detailed preparation and intake procedures, exclusion of certain types of case, the involvement of victim support agencies and support people
- ▷ the organisations that conduct the conferences (in some cases they are police or prosecuting agencies, in others community-based organisations)
- ▷ the family violence-specific training undertaken by facilitators
- ▷ guidelines for the types of outcome that might result
- ▷ procedures for monitoring and supervising any agreements reached
- ▷ complaint mechanisms.⁸⁶

A subsequent report, which discussed the outcomes of interviews with participants from the various programs, articulated the advantages of participation but also identified some weaknesses and limitations of existing practices, and opportunities for improvement.⁸⁷

The Criminal Justice Programme of the European Union has commissioned the development of practitioner guidelines for the use of restorative justice in family violence cases.⁸⁸ Guidelines published in 2016 discuss the need for specially trained and highly experienced facilitators, and set standards for risk assessment processes and preparation for, conduct of, and follow-up from a restorative justice conference.⁸⁹

The way forward

The Commission has considered the role of restorative justice processes in family violence matters carefully. In light of the support such approaches have from organisations that work directly with victims of family violence (such as Women's Legal Service Victoria, Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, the Centre Against Violence and, to a degree, InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence), which is in turn based on the views and experiences of their clients, we are persuaded that the time has come to progress work on a restorative justice approach to family violence in Victoria.

The Commission agrees that restorative justice processes have the potential to assist victims to recover from the impact of the abuse they have suffered, and to mitigate the limitations of the justice system by providing them with greater scope to meet their needs for participation, voice, validation, offender accountability and restoration. The versatility of restorative justice processes means that they can be adapted to address the complexity and diversity associated with the experience of family violence. They may be of particular benefit for parents of adolescents or adult children who have used violence, who wish to preserve family relationships or avoid a criminal justice response.

It is important to emphasise that a restorative justice process cannot and should not preclude a victim from seeking redress through the court system, nor should it be stipulated as a precondition to taking court action, nor a process that victims are pressured to undertake in preference to other more formal options. It should be offered as an additional option for victims to consider. Further, introducing restorative justice options must not provide a reason to avoid addressing the existing shortcomings of the justice system. Rather, restorative justice options should serve to supplement the outcomes available from the justice system. Given that a restorative justice engagement can only proceed if a victim has identified it as an option that will address their needs, and only in circumstances where the perpetrator is willing to participate and to take responsibility for the harm caused, it is likely that any future program will only cater to a relatively small proportion of family violence cases. This means it is essential that justice system responses are improved in the ways we have recommended in Chapter 16.

The Commission acknowledges that concerns and uncertainties remain about introducing a restorative justice approach, and that there are situations where restorative justice processes will be appropriate, and situations where they will not be. The victim must be central to these decisions; her control and choice is central to the success of any restorative justice initiative.

For this reason, we recommend that a framework for a restorative justice approach be developed with utmost care, in consultation with victims' representatives, and that it encompass robust safeguards. Of primary importance is that victims who are invited to participate are fully informed about the process and their options, and that their consent is a precondition to any conference.

In addition to the support expressed for restorative justice options in the submissions we received and in our hearings and consultations, we are conscious of the emerging Australian and international literature and evidence about the value of, and challenges associated with, the use of restorative justice in family violence and sexual assault matters. The development of options in Victoria can draw on the available analysis and experience in other jurisdictions to structure conferences in ways that most effectively address victims' needs, identify and manage risks, and define and set standards for program implementation.

We also note that there is a cohort of experienced youth group conferencing conveners in Victoria, some of whom are likely to be able to undertake further training on the dynamics of family violence to equip them to facilitate conferences in these matters.

The Commission recommends that the Department of Justice and Regulation develop a framework and a pilot program for the delivery of restorative justice options for victims of family violence. Development of the framework should take place in consultation with restorative justice experts, family violence specialists and victim representatives and other relevant stakeholders.

The development of the framework and pilot program should consider:

- ▷ the gateway into the restorative justice process and the criteria for eligibility (for example, the level of offending that such an approach would apply to, and whether a provider should be able to decline to offer a restorative justice intervention for safety reasons)
- ▷ the standards and guidelines that should govern the process; and the safeguards that would need to be in place, including risk assessment processes and preparation processes
- ▷ the timing of the process (for example, whether it would take place before, during or after the court process, bearing in mind that the aim of the program should be to provide the greatest benefit to the greatest number of victims and that victims should have a choice about when to engage); and the interaction with ongoing or anticipated court proceedings, whether in the civil or criminal jurisdictions, the Children's Court or the Family Court
- ▷ the associated support services that would be required for both victims and perpetrators, in particular the involvement of people with expertise in behaviour change strategies
- ▷ the need for any program to be inclusive of the diversity of people affected by family violence, and to take account of their individual cultural and other needs
- ▷ the consequences and outcomes of the process; and how outcomes would be monitored
- ▷ the level of accreditation, skill, experience and training required for facilitators
- ▷ how a pilot program would be evaluated.

Recommendation 122

The Department of Justice and Regulation, in consultation with victims' representatives and experts in restorative justice, develop a framework and pilot program for the delivery of restorative justice options for victims of family violence. The framework and pilot program should have victims at their centre, incorporate strong safeguards, be based on international best practice, and be delivered by appropriately skilled and qualified facilitators [within two years].

Endnotes

- 1 See, eg, Statement of 'Smith', 4 August 2015.
- 2 See, eg, Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015; Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015; Crystal Bruton, Submission 137, 1–2; Sally Ruth, Submission 888, 2; Benalla Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 131, 3.
- 3 See, eg, Statement of 'Jones', 13 July 2015; Statement of 'Jones', 7 August 2015; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 17.
- 4 Victim restoration roundtable discussion, Melbourne, 25 September 2015.
- 5 Isla Evans, 'Battle Scars: Long-Term Effects of Prior Domestic Violence' (Monash University, Centre for Women's Studies and Gender Research, February 2007) 7.
- 6 Ibid.
- 7 Leigh Goodmark, A Troubled Marriage: Domestic Violence and the Legal System (New York University, 2012) 82–83, 96.
- 8 Sarah Curtis-Fawley and Kathleen Daly, 'Gendered Violence and Restorative Justice: The Views of Victim Advocates' (2005) 11(5) Violence Against Women 603, 609 (8).
- 9 Carolyn Neilson and Bonnie Renou, 'Will Somebody Listen to Me? Insights, Actions and Hope for Women Experiencing Family Violence in Regional Victoria' (Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, April 2015) 9–10; See also, Statement of Goodmark, 30 July 2015, 9 [41]–[42]; Transcript of Goodmark, 6 August 2015, 2076 [11]–[22].
- 10 Victorian Law Reform Commission, 'The Role of Victims of Crime in the Criminal Trial Process: Who Are Victims of Crime and What Are Their Criminal Justice Needs and Experiences?' (Information Paper 2, May 2015) 14–25.
- 11 Judith L Herman, 'Justice from the Victim's Perspective' (2005) 11(5) Violence Against Women 571, 585.
- 12 Ibid 593.
- 13 Ibid 597.
- 14 Kathleen Daly, 'Conventional and Innovative Justice Responses to Sexual Violence' (Issue No 12, Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, 2011) 8.
- 15 Ibid.
- 16 Ibid 26–27. See also Centre for Innovative Justice, 'Innovative Justice Responses to Sexual Offending—Pathways to Better Outcomes for Victims, Offenders and the Community' (RMIT University, May 2014).
- 17 Neilson and Renou, above n 9, 17.
- 18 Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, Submission 236, 5 [17].
- 19 Howard Zehr, The Little Book of Restorative Justice (Good Books, 2002) 37.
- 20 Tony F Marshall, 'The Evolution of Restorative Justice (1996) 4(4) European Journal on Criminal Policy and Research 21, 37.
- 21 Jacqueline Joudo Larsen, Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth), 'Restorative Justice in the Australian Criminal Justice System' (AIC Reports Research and Public Policy Series No 127, 2014) 2.
- 22 See generally Victorian Association for Restorative Justice, Submission 839. See also Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 16, 12.
- 23 Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 76.
- 24 Victorian Association for Restorative Justice, Submission 839, 6.
- 25 Ibid 5, 9.
- 26 Larsen, above n 21, 22–28.
- 27 National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs (Cth), 'Time for Action: The National Council's Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children' (March 2009) 106 (citations omitted). See also Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 76; ibid 33.
- 28 Transcript of Fatouros, 6 August 2015, 2113 [4]–[9].
- 29 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence—A National Legal Response: Final Report, ALRC Report No 114, NSWLRC Report No 128 (2010) 1093–4; Victorian Law Reform Commission, Review of Family Violence Laws, Report (2006) 84–5; Law Reform Committee, Parliament of Victoria, Inquiry into Alternative Dispute Resolution and Restorative Justice (2009) 333. See also Success Works, 'Sexual Assault Reform Strategy Final Evaluation Report' (January 2011), 212, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 30 National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, above n 27, 122.
- 31 Jesuit Social Services, Submission 875, 16. See also Law Reform Committee, Parliament of Victoria, above n 29, 330.
- 32 See, eg, Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 40; Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, Submission 236, 5; Centre Against Violence, Submission 760, 5; Goulburn Valley Community Legal Centre, Submission 495, 4; Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 10; Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 78; Human Rights Law Centre, Submission 928, 9.
- 33 Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 43.
- 34 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 52.
- 35 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, 'Independent Review into Sex Discrimination and Sexual Harassment, Including Predatory Behaviour in Victoria Police: Phase 1 Report' (December 2015) 329.
- 36 Confidential transcript of 'Jones', 13 July 2015, C34 [7]–[15].
- 37 Ibid C33 [13]–[23], [25]–[31], C34 [1]–[3].
- 38 See, eg, Centre Against Violence, Submission 760, 5; Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 77.
- 39 Statement of Goodmark, 30 July 2015, 3–4 [20].
- 40 Ibid 9 [42].
- 41 Goodmark, above n 7, 82–83, 96.
- 42 Ibid 105.
- 43 Transcript of Goodmark, 6 August 2015, 2075 [7]–[9].
- 44 Ibid 2075 [10]–[16].
- 45 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 41.
- 46 Neilson and Renou, above n 9, 121.
- 47 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 40; Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 77.
- 48 Statement of 'Jones', 13 July 2015, 17 [87].
- 49 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 40; Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 77.
- 50 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015, 7.
- 51 Lois Presser and Emily Gaarder, 'Can Restorative Justice Reduce Battering? Some Preliminary Considerations' (2000) 27(1) Social Justice 175, 186; Anne Hayden, 'Perpetrators' and Victims' Views of Restorative Justice and Intimate Partner Violence' in Anne Hayden et al (eds), A Restorative Approach to Family Violence: Changing Tack (Ashgate, 2014) 159, 167.
- 52 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 35, 329.
- 53 Centre Against Violence, Submission 760, 6; State of Victoria, Submission 717, 52.

- 54 Victim restoration roundtable, Melbourne, 25 September 2015.
- 55 Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 77. See also, Transcript of Goodmark, 6 August 2015, 2075 [27]–2076 [6].
- 56 Victorian Association for Restorative Justice, Submission 839, 1.
- 57 Ibid 2; Victim restoration roundtable, Melbourne, 25 September 2015.
- 58 Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 77.
- 59 Victim restoration roundtable, Melbourne, 25 September 2015.
- 60 See, eg, Harry Blagg, Nicole Bluett-Boyd and Emma Williams, 'Innovative Models in Addressing Violence Against Indigenous Women' (Landscapes: State of Knowledge No 8, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, August 2015) 16, 26; ibid.
- 61 Blagg, Bluett and Williams, above n 60, 16, 26.
- 62 Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 43.
- 63 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 41.
- 64 Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, Submission 236, 5; Goulburn Valley Community Legal Centre, Submission 495, 5.
- 65 Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, Submission 236, 5; Goulburn Valley Community Legal Centre, Submission 495, 5; Victorian Association for Restorative Justice, Submission 839, 1; InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 41; Victorian Association for Restorative Justice, Submission 839, 10.
- 66 Victorian Association for Restorative Justice, Submission 839, 10.
- 67 Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 43.
- 68 Ibid.
- 69 Ibid.
- 70 Victim restoration roundtable, Melbourne, 25 September 2015. See also Goodmark, above n 7, 179–184.
- 71 Andrew Fulkerson, 'The Use of Victim Impact Panels in Domestic Violence Cases: A Restorative Justice Approach' (2001) 4(3/4) Contemporary Justice Review 355, 365–367.
- 72 Larsen, above n 21, viii, 8–9, 19. See also Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 16, 25, 28, 34; Centre for Innovative Justice—01, Submission 93, 77.
- 73 Victim restoration roundtable, Melbourne, 25 September 2015; Melissa Davey, 'Victims Face their Molester in Victoria's World-First Restorative Justice Program' (17 June 2015) The Guardian <<http://www.theguardian.com/australia-news/2015/jun/17/victims-face-their-molester-in-victorias-world-first-restorative-justice-program>>.
- 74 Email from Katrina Robinson, CatholicCare to Mary Polis, Royal Commission into Family Violence (19 January 2016).
- 75 ACT Government, 'Restorative Justice Scheme Enters Phase 2' (Media Release, 16 July 2015) <http://www.cmd.act.gov.au/open_government/inform/act_government_media_releases/corb/2015/restorative-justice-scheme-enters-phase-2>.
- 76 Victim restoration roundtable discussion, Melbourne, 23 September 2015.
- 77 Women's Legal Service QLD, Submission 783, 16.
- 78 Ibid.
- 79 Venezia Kingi, 'The Use of Restorative Justice in Family Violence: The New Zealand Experience' in Hayden et al, above n 51, 145, 152, 167.
- 80 Ministry of Justice (New Zealand), 'Restorative Justice Standards for Family Violence Cases' (2013) 22, 24.
- 81 Victorian Association for Restorative Justice, Submission 839, 9.
- 82 Ibid.
- 83 For discussion about Project Restore, see Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 16, 31–33.
- 84 See, eg, Lisanne Drost et al, 'Restorative Justice in Cases of Domestic Violence: Best Practice Examples Between Increasing Mutual Understanding and Awareness of Specific Protection Needs' ((JUST/2013/JPEN/AG/4587) WS1. Comparative Report, European Forum for Restorative Justice, January 2015) 9–10.
- 85 Ibid.
- 86 Ibid 18–26.
- 87 Katinka Lunnemann and Annemieke Wolthuis, 'Restorative Justice in Cases of Domestic Violence: Best Practice Examples Between Increasing Mutual Understanding and Awareness of Specific Protection Needs—Victim Offender Mediation: Needs of Victims and Offenders of Intimate Partner Violence' ((JUST/2013/JPEN/AG/4587) 2nd Comparative Report, European Forum for Restorative Justice, October 2015).
- 88 IARS International Institute, 'Restorative Justice and Domestic Violence: A Practitioner's Guide' (IARS Publications, January 2016).
- 89 Ibid.

23 Adolescents who use family violence

Introduction

This chapter considers the issues that arise when young people use violence in the home against their parents, siblings and other family members. It is important to note that adult children may also be violent to family members. However, the focus of this chapter is the use of violence by adolescents. This chapter uses the phrase 'adolescents who use violence in the home' to refer to young people's use of violence against family members noting that not all family violence occurs in the home.

Adolescent violence in the home is a distinct form of family violence. It exists across all communities and geographic areas.¹ Reporting of use of violence in the home by young people has increased in recent years, at a similar rate of increase to adult family violence.

In this chapter the Commission examines the different forms of adolescent violence in the home that exist, including child on parent violence, sibling violence and problem sexual behaviour. Commonalities and differences between adolescents' use of violence in the home and family violence perpetrated by adults are also examined.

Adolescent violence against family members is less gendered than adult family violence, however the majority of victims are women and the majority of those using violence are young men. Around two-thirds (64 per cent) of those aged 17 years or younger who are violent towards their parents are male.² This compares to 77 per cent of perpetrators of all family violence who are men.³ It has been reported that young males are more likely to use physical aggression than young females.⁴

Like other types of family violence, adolescent violence in the home can involve physical, emotional, psychological, sexual, financial and other types of abusive behaviours intended to harm, control, threaten or coerce parents, siblings or other family members.⁵ It can have a devastating impact on family members, including physical injury and poor mental health (such as stress, anxiety and depression), economic hardship, for example, through damage to property, theft of property, or being coerced to hand over money, and eviction from their home because of damaged property.⁶

The Commission was told that lack of awareness and understanding of this particular type of family violence among the community, family violence prevention and support services, youth services, and the justice system, are obstacles for victims who need support. Most devastating of all are the stigma and shame associated with this form of violence, which arises from unfair assumptions about the victim's ability to be a good parent and the shock that their child (or grandchild or sibling) has used violence against them. Shame is exacerbated by lack of community awareness about this form of violence. All these factors create enormous barriers to seeking help.

Use of violence in the home by adolescents may co-exist with family violence perpetrated by others, including intimate partner violence against the mother that the young person has witnessed, as well as direct violence against children.⁷ This has important ramifications for practice, including that programs working with young people using violence need to be prepared to deal with the presence of family violence in the home beyond that being used by the young person.

This chapter also surveys the current system response—in particular what the Commission heard about police and justice responses and the availability of early intervention programs that are specifically targeted at working with young people and their families as an alternative to the criminal justice system.

At the end of this chapter, the Commission articulates policy and practice principles for a more comprehensive response to this form of family violence, which will include the recognition that a therapeutic response is more appropriate than increasing police powers.

Currently there is no systemic response to the needs of these young people and their families, though a number of positive initiatives operate in local areas. The Victorian Government is currently trialling Adolescent Family Violence Programs in three locations. Based broadly on the United States Step Up program, the initial evaluation findings are positive. The Commission recommends that if the final evaluation demonstrates success in improving victim safety and changing behaviour, this program should be expanded across the state. Other promising initiatives, including joining Youth Justice Group Conferencing with Adolescent Family Violence Programs for young people and their families should also be trialled and, if successful, should be supported.

In recognition that requiring a young person to leave home should always be the last resort, we also make recommendations to provide supported accommodation to them. We also recommend that family violence applicant and respondent worker positions be established at the Melbourne Children's Court of Victoria to assist young people and families.

Context

Incidence of adolescent violence in the home

Notes on data

There are various limitations around data that need to be acknowledged. In addition to the general limitations of family violence data discussed in Chapters 3 and 39 of this report, there are also the following limitations:

- ▷ Lack of consistency around the definition of 'adolescent'. Some agencies record adolescents as being from 0 to 17 years old, others from 15 to 19 years old. In service settings a 'young person' is a person up to the age of 25 years old.
- ▷ Some Victoria Police data is broken down by age range 0 to 17 years, whereas other data is broken down by age range 10 to 14 years and 15 to 19 years. Children's Court data has similar inconsistencies. Data has been provided in age ranges that are consistent with the way this data has previously been reported, and to align with the different definitions of 'youth'. In some cases, the age of a user of violence or a victim will not be recorded and so they will be excluded from the analysis. (Thus, in the following discussion, some graphs will include 18 and 19 year-olds and others will not.)
- ▷ Different data sets have different counting rules and capture different forms of violence.⁸ The Magistrates' Court and Children's Court data was extracted from the Courtlink database. The data includes all finalised applications for family violence intervention orders where the final hearing occurred between 1 July 2009 and 30 June 2014. All of the graphs below utilise only original applications and exclude applications for variation, extension and revocation, in order to avoid counting individuals multiple times.⁹

Victoria Police data shows that over the last five years, the total number of family violence incidents reported to police where the person using violence was 19 years or less, grew from 4516 to 7397.¹⁰ The growth in reported incidents is commensurate with the wider growth of family violence reporting over the last five years. The proportion of total reported family violence incidents where the person using violence was 19 years or under actually fell in that timeframe, from 12.7 per cent to 11.4 per cent.¹¹ Nevertheless, family violence incidents where a young person is the reported user of violence represent around one in 10 family violence incidents reported to police.

The number of adolescent respondents to FVIO applications across the Children’s Court and the Magistrates’ Court also increased in the five year period from 2009–10 to 2013–14,¹² keeping pace—approximately—with the increase for adults, as can be seen in Figure 23.1. In 2009–10, the proportion of the total number of applications across both courts that had child (0 to 17 year-old) respondents was 3.7 per cent (n=912) and in 2013–14 it was 4.2 per cent (n=1325), with minor variations in the intervening years.

Figure 23.1 Respondents aged 0–17 years on family violence intervention order applications compared to adult respondents 2009–10 to 2013–14

Source: Crime Statistics Agency, An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14 (January 2016), Children’s Court data source, Tab 6, Table 6: Respondents on original FVIO applications by gender and age group, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015; Magistrates’ Court data source, Tab 6, Table 6: Respondents on original FVIO applications by gender and age group, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.

Adolescent child-parent violence data

The child-parent violence data shown here is a subset of the total number of police incidents involving an ‘other party’ (the person who used the violence) aged 17 years or younger.

During the five year period from July 2009 to June 2014, police recorded 11,861 family violence incidents where the person who used the violence was aged 17 years or younger and the affected family member (the victim) was an adult parent.¹³ Of these:

- ▷ Sixty-four per cent (n=7608) of those who used violence aged 17 years or younger, where the victim was an adult parent, were male and 36 per cent (n=4253) were female.¹⁴
- ▷ Of the victims, 80 per cent (n=9542) were female parents and 20 per cent (n=2319) were male parents.¹⁵

The proportion of females aged 17 years or younger who use violence against their parents as recorded in police incidents has remained consistent over the last five years.¹⁶ Children’s Court data paints a similar picture of the gender breakdown between respondents aged 0 to 17 years old on FVIO applications.¹⁷

Sibling violence data

- ▷ Data shows that young people aged 10 to 19 years are the reported users of violence in just under 20 per cent of Victoria Police family violence incidents against victims aged 17 and younger.¹⁸ Due to the age patterns, the majority of these family members are likely to be siblings; however, it is noted that the data does not distinguish between sibling and other family member victims.
- ▷ For this group, the gender profile has also remained fairly consistent. Over the five years to June 2014, male other parties accounted for between 81 and 84 per cent of incidents.¹⁹
- ▷ Children's Court data shows that in nine per cent ($n=162$) of family violence applications in 2013–14, the affected family member was a sibling of the respondent. This proportion has remained fairly steady over the last five years.²⁰ It should be noted that this data is not confined to users of violence under the age of 18, as the Children's Court deals with a number of adult family violence perpetrators.²¹
- ▷ From 2009–10 to 2013–14, males made up between 70 and 76 per cent of respondents in applications where both the affected family member and the respondent were aged 17 years and younger.²²

Forms of family violence

Child on parent violence

The majority of adolescent family violence is perpetrated against mothers, particularly sole mothers, mostly by male adolescents:

Mothers who are sole parents are particularly at risk from their adolescent sons, many describing how the language and behaviour of their sons bears a chilling similarity to that of their violent fathers.²³

Abuse of fathers is also usually by sons.²⁴ Other vulnerable family members include parents with disabilities, younger siblings, grandparents and family pets.²⁵

The literature indicates that severity of the violence depends on age and gender, with the severity of abuse by sons increasing incrementally between the ages of 10 and 17, whilst parental abuse by daughters increases between the ages of 10 and 13 years, and falls after that age.²⁶ This suggests that whereas young women cease using family violence as they get older, young men are more likely to continue using violence.

As with all family violence, it is likely that adolescent violence in the home is under-reported. Parents may be reluctant to report their children's violent behaviour to the police for various reasons, including:

- ▷ social isolation, feelings of self-blame, shame and denial²⁷
- ▷ 'lack of acknowledgement from [and understanding by] community agencies of the types, severity and frequency of violence and impact on family'²⁸
- ▷ minimisation of abuse (for example, excusing the adolescent's violence on the basis of 'typical male behaviour', 'inherent traits' or having learnt the behaviour from their father)²⁹
- ▷ fear of how the adolescent might react upon discovering the report³⁰
- ▷ fear their child may get a criminal record if the violence is reported to police.³¹

The Commission consistently heard that victims of adolescent family violence also experience parental guilt, finding it particularly difficult to articulate their experiences due to 'cultural expectations of unconditional parental love'.³² Adolescent violence was also described as a 'hidden and shameful' subject, resulting in parents not seeking support until at crisis point.³³ There is also a lack of awareness amongst parents of the support services that are available to them.³⁴ Daly and Wade comment that these barriers to reporting are 'similar to those that inhibit adult females from reporting male partner violence'.³⁵

Despite the violence, victims face the dilemma that they remain responsible for caring for the young person who is using violence against them.³⁶ Family members, particularly parents, are often concerned about their adolescent child and want to maintain their relationship with them.³⁷ Although parents may have economic power in the relationship, their children may have emotional and psychological power over them.³⁸

Adolescents may also be highly vulnerable and, if under the age of 18, are still children and in need of protection.³⁹ They may have poor health or have experienced trauma themselves; in addition, they commonly lack resources and life experience.⁴⁰

When young adult children are perpetrators of violence it's very difficult. People don't want to get involved so help is hard to get. The police seem to blame me for my son's behaviour and yet he is not well. I need them to help me help my son. I need protection from my son and yet I love him and want him to be well. It's very difficult. This experience places me more at risk as it impacts my mental health illness at times.⁴¹

Parents may view calling the police as a last resort and may only contemplate it after the violence has been ongoing for some time.⁴² The Commission heard that when parents do call the police, they may simply want assistance to address their child's behaviour, rather than to trigger a criminal justice response.⁴³ They may therefore understate their level of victimisation.⁴⁴ Individuals experiencing adolescent family violence described such situations to the Commission:

[My daughter] got very drunk and tried to kill me ... I didn't want to charge my daughter because she needs help but the police put the intervention order on her. The neighbours called the police because she was out of control.⁴⁵

Sibling violence

My son's violent against women. The way he treats his sister. Because of his dad. He hates women, they're all nothing ... It's an everyday struggle.⁴⁶

Research demonstrates the seriousness of sibling conflict, including aggression and violence, which has been linked 'to a wide range of negative youth outcomes'.⁴⁷

It was noted that this form of family violence often receives inadequate recognition.⁴⁸ One victim told us:

Sibling violence often flies under the radar and I believe it is too often put down to kids just being kids, but violence is violence and the effects, regardless of who is inflicting it, are the same. As [a] child victim of persistent sibling violence coupled with inappropriate responses to it from the adults around me, I feel that my own life has been impacted.⁴⁹

Professor Mark Feinberg, Research Professor at the Prevention Research Centre, Pennsylvania State University, claimed that sibling relationships have 'the highest levels of violence of any family relationship'.⁵⁰ In their joint submission, the Centre for Behavioural Science and Forensicare noted that US studies have shown that sibling violence is a common form of family violence.⁵¹

In its submission, the Centre for Multicultural Youth highlighted the problem of sibling violence within culturally and linguistically diverse communities, for example, where 'an older male sibling takes on a disciplinary role towards younger siblings, particularly in the context of culturally-driven concerns around his sister's behaviour'.⁵²

Problem sexual behaviour

Sexual abuse by children and young people is less common than sexual abuse by adults, however, it has similar devastating effects for victims. While some young people with problem sexual behaviour target adults, younger siblings may be common targets due to proximity and vulnerability.⁵³ There are no identified direct causes of problem sexual behaviour by young people, however there are a number of risk factors that can contribute to it including childhood experience of family violence and being a victim of sexual abuse.⁵⁴ However, 'most young people with sexually abusive behaviours do not go on to become adult offenders'.⁵⁵

The Criminal Division of the Children's Court decides cases where sexual offence charges have been brought against children and young people aged 10 to 17 years. The Children's Court told the Commission that the majority of victims in these cases are also children and adolescents, with many being younger family members of the accused.⁵⁶

A number of Victoria's centres against sexual assault and other regional agencies provide interventions for 10 to 14 year olds with problem sexual behaviour, through Sexually Abusive Behaviours Treatment Services. Evaluations show that these programs achieve positive outcomes.⁵⁷ This program and the current response to adolescent sexual offending in the context of family violence is discussed in more detail in Chapter 12.

Commonalities and differences with adult family violence

Parent victims of a young person's violence 'consistently report that the emotional and psychological impacts have a more profound and long lasting impact than the physical violence itself, with the most significant effects relating to the shock, incredulity and disbelief that their own child is using violence against them'.⁵⁸ The ongoing cyclical nature of the violence—violence, apology and forgiveness—is a feature of both adult and adolescent family violence.⁵⁹

While fear and control is present in both adult intimate partner violence and adolescent violence in the home, parent victims tend to have greater control and freedom than victims of intimate partner violence; they are more easily able to maintain privacy and confidentiality and are likely to have greater economic and social resources than their child.⁶⁰

The young person's legal status as a child affects how the justice system responds, with an appropriate focus on rehabilitation. However, 'the competing needs of family safety, protecting children and adults and rehabilitating young offenders mean that the criminal justice system struggles with how best to juggle these'.⁶¹

A further difference between adult and adolescent family violence is that most parents view reconciliation as the ideal outcome in adolescent violence situations, whereas this is less often the case for victims of intimate partner violence.⁶²

Risk factors

There is no single cause of adolescent violence in the home; instead, as with other forms of family violence, it is the result of 'a range of multifaceted and interconnected dynamics'.⁶³

Adolescent violence in the home can be exacerbated by factors such as mental illness, the use of drugs and alcohol, and acquired brain injuries.⁶⁴ Local studies have shown that existing violence escalates with drug and or alcohol use, and that escalation is also associated with school refusal or being removed from school because of behavioural issues, particularly in the transition to secondary school.⁶⁵

Victoria Legal Aid told the Commission that young people using violence in the home often present with a number of complex behavioural, mental, physical and emotional issues:

There is usually, but not always, at least one of the following factors involved: neurobiological harm caused by developmental trauma (exposure to family violence or neglect), emotional harm caused by recent exposure to family violence or abuse, abandonment or chronic neglect, substance abuse, family breakdown, unresolved grief and loss. These experiences may manifest themselves in challenging adolescent behaviours. Children and young people are also still developing and can be experiencing undiagnosed mental health issues.⁶⁶

An interim evaluation of the Ballarat Adolescent Family Violence Program (Step Up), discussed below, shows the following proportion of co-occurring risk factors for the 39 adolescents participating in the program:

- ▷ 59 per cent had a history of experiencing family violence
- ▷ 46 per cent had experienced childhood trauma
- ▷ 49 per cent had behavioural or learning difficulties
- ▷ 28 per cent had mental health challenges
- ▷ 28 per cent had alcohol or other substance misuse
- ▷ 21 per cent had a disability (including acquired brain injury).⁶⁷

Children and young people with disabilities

The Commission heard that many young men who use violence in the home have an intellectual disability and their families have not received appropriate support to address issues associated with that disability.⁶⁸ Other disabilities identified in the research as present where adolescent violence has been used include autism spectrum disorder, attention deficit hyperactive disorder and various mental health disabilities.⁶⁹

Lack of support for parents of children with disabilities can have profound consequences. For example, a 2012 study found that parents may be forced to surrender care of their child after (usually a series of) violent incidents towards parents or siblings, which result in parents having to call the police:⁷⁰

This was not the first time I had called the police. Experience told me that child protection would not do anything about it because it was not a child being hurt, it was me. I knew that to get help I would have to say, 'I am going to kill him unless I get some help'. So that is what I told them.⁷¹

National Disability Services reported that:

It can be particularly challenging for families supporting children (mainly boys) with severe autism who exhibit behaviours of concern on a regular basis. These behaviours often become more violent from about 12 years onwards as they enter puberty and become physically stronger. The need for behaviour intervention programs can increase at this stage, and these are often not available.⁷²

Parents may surrender care of their children in response to 'seemingly insurmountable barriers' to support and as an attempt to protect the safety of the young person, and their family.⁷³ The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission reported that these children 'end up living in respite facilities, in transitional houses and in out-of-home care settings such as residential or foster care'.⁷⁴ In its submission, the Youth Affairs Council of Victoria explained that as a result of limited access to therapeutic supports, young people with intellectual disabilities are ending up homeless when intervention orders are taken out against them.⁷⁵

In regards to adolescent mental health, Professor Patrick McGorry AO, Executive Director of Orygen National Centre of Excellence in Youth Mental Health, explained that adolescence is a high-risk period for mental ill-health, yet our current response can leave young people vulnerable.⁷⁶ He told the Commission that there is an absence of an effectively-resourced therapeutic response when a young person is in crisis, including when they are using family or other forms of violence. He observed that if mental ill-health is present, this is often not identified and violent situations typically result in a purely criminal justice response, rather than a health response.⁷⁷ Professor McGorry described the value of having specialist youth mental health practitioners to support first responders such as police:

We did have that operating through our youth access team. It still does exist, but it doesn't function in that optimal way anymore. But I definitely think that would be the optimal thing. I worked on that team myself, and when it was working well it was just an absolutely optimal way to work. The sort of people that were attracted to work in that mode were very special people as well. They had tremendous skills. They had great decision-making ability. They knew how to work with police. The police were very happy to work with them. The ambulances were the same. So I think it would be an excellent sort of state-wide model to build in.⁷⁸

In relation to the broader cohort of young people in contact with the justice system (not specifically family violence offending), Magistrate Jennifer Bowles proposed that Victoria should establish secure therapeutic residential facilities for young people suffering substance abuse and/or mental illness, based on programs operating in Sweden, Scotland, England and New Zealand.⁷⁹ She recommended that such a facility should be well located; employ highly competent staff; offer effective after-care programs and transition back into the community; and include external scrutiny/checks and balances in its design.⁸⁰

The current police and justice response to adolescent use of violence in the home is considered further below.

Link to previous experience of family violence

My son even ended up knocking me out ... DHHS took him from us. He learnt from his dad.⁸¹

The Commission was told that adolescents who use violence in the home are often victims (or have been victims) of family violence themselves.⁸² Experiencing family violence as a child is a strong predictor of adolescent male abusive behaviour.⁸³ In its submission, Victoria Police stated that a high percentage of children who used violence against a parent in 2014 had previously been victims of family violence.⁸⁴

The correlation between experiencing family violence during childhood and later perpetration of adolescent family violence means that the victims may experience violence at the hands of more than one person:

Women and children are re-traumatised by male adolescent violence in the home. Children may have experienced their father's violence, only to have their brother 'step into' this role when their father leaves.⁸⁵

The Commission was also told that children who experience family violence perpetrated by their father may blame their mother. This can contribute to their later use of violence against their mother, especially after separation:

When parents separate following violence, many children blame the victimised parent for the family break-up (frequently, this is actively encouraged by the perpetrating parent who tells his children "it's all your mother's fault") ... many such perpetrators have relationships with their children that are good in at least some respects. As such, children ... may genuinely miss their fathers, and blame their mothers for their fathers' absence in their lives.⁸⁶

In addition, where adolescent family violence occurs 'within a broader familial context of violence and disharmony', different types of family violence may co-occur and 'mutually shape' one another.⁸⁷ It may therefore be impossible to identify any linear cause and effect for adolescent family violence in these circumstances.⁸⁸

Even though adolescents who use violence in the home may have also been the victims of family violence, the majority of children who experience family violence will not go on to perpetrate family violence and some are 'especially critical of violence' as a result of their childhood experiences.⁸⁹ In addition, many adolescents who do use violence in the home do not go on to use violence in their later adult relationships.⁹⁰

Current responses and challenges

An important challenge identified in current responses to the use of violence in the home by adolescents is the broad lack of awareness and understanding of this particular type of family violence that currently exists. This section discusses what the Commission heard about this knowledge gap and the barriers victims experience when dealing with support services, police and the justice system. It also discusses police responses to adolescent violence in the home, and the conflicting views presented to the Commission about the effectiveness of police initiated FVIOs when dealing with children and young people in family violence incidents.

This section concludes with a discussion on the response of the Children's Court and the range of Children's Court and community programs currently available to adolescents who use violence in the home and their families.

Awareness of adolescent violence in the home

Mothers have identified isolation and lack of understanding by friends, family, the helping professions, and the justice system, as the most common obstacles in trying to address their child's violence.⁹¹ Literature on adolescent violence often highlights the importance of raising awareness in the community and amongst parents of this kind of family violence.⁹²

A consistent theme raised in submissions before the Commission and in relevant literature, is that the family violence, youth services, family services and justice sectors generally have limited understanding of adolescent family violence and are ill-equipped to address it.⁹³ Victoria Legal Aid noted in its submission that although there has been increased attention on adolescent family violence, 'the policy and legal response has not yet accommodated the different considerations that arise in this context'.⁹⁴

A 2012 scoping study of support services for adolescent violence in the home found that family violence prevention and support services are oriented towards adult-partner violence and rarely have capacity to respond to adolescents who use violence in the home.⁹⁵ Use of violence in the home by adolescents does not fall within the conventional definitions of family violence and services are often not alert to its prevalence.⁹⁶

Services that are oriented toward adult-partner violence often cannot provide an appropriate response to [adolescent violence in the home]. While much ground has been made in Victoria concerning the police, legal and social service response to family violence as a whole, the needs of victims, their families and the perpetrators of [adolescent violence in the home] often do not fit the mould that the service was built to address. As the perpetrators are also minors, the legal parameters of this issue are unclear and standard police procedures to family violence no longer apply.⁹⁷

In 2013, Victoria Legal Aid, Peninsula Health and the City of Greater Dandenong's Youth Services conducted a study into the experiences of adolescents whose use of violence in the home resulted in a criminal justice intervention. The study concluded that those working in the family violence and justice systems have limited understanding of the impact of adolescent family violence on family members and how to address such behaviour.⁹⁸

Kildonan UnitingCare recently consulted with parents who had experienced violence by their children, and found that:

The parents reported having nowhere to turn for help. Parents reported that family violence agencies would not help parents where the violence was committed by a child, youth services would not act against what they considered were the adolescents' interests, and parenting services lacked the skill to respond ...⁹⁹

Lack of awareness and understanding of adolescent violence in the home can leave parents feeling isolated and without help. Parents who attempt to rectify their adolescent's behavioural issues through involvement with services also report that these services did not address the abusive behaviour, which continued to escalate.¹⁰⁰

The Commission was also informed that simply addressing adolescent violence as part of a general response to adult family violence can impact negatively on young people.¹⁰¹ The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria stated in its submission that:

Victoria's recent moves towards a stronger, consistent justice response to family violence have (inadvertently) led to poorer results in relation to young people's use of violence in the home. Some services have reported a reduction in referrals of young people to programs which might have provided them with age-appropriate therapeutic case work to address their behaviour. Instead, incidents of violence by young people which are reported to the police tend to trigger a generic 'family violence' intervention ...¹⁰²

This may create further challenges when the young person has themselves been, or continues to be a victim of family violence. Kildonan UnitingCare submitted:

The family violence sector struggles with a 'both/and' approach – that children can be victims of family violence as well as offenders ... This struggle and the methodology of separating 'perpetrators' from 'victims' means families where an adolescent is violent frequently struggle to access any form of service support.¹⁰³

The Commission was also told that the seriousness of sibling violence is not recognised. The Commission heard evidence from Professor Feinberg that parents often believe it is normal or expected for siblings to fight.¹⁰⁴ Parents may not seek help for sibling abuse because of their desire to preserve the family.¹⁰⁵ The Commission also heard that if police are called they are sometimes reluctant to intervene in this type of violence because they view it as 'just a kid's fight'.¹⁰⁶

Police responses

Police responses to adolescent family violence reflect the legal status of children and young people as minors.

Section 2.4.2 of the Victoria Police Code of Practice into the Investigation of Family Violence recognises that use of violence in the home may largely be due to the previous victimisation of the child through exposure to family violence, bullying, mental health or substance abuse, and instructs police to consider these issues.¹⁰⁷ While the Code prioritises the safety of victims, the wellbeing of children is a key principle. Accordingly, police are required to consider these possible contributing factors when determining a course of action.¹⁰⁸

Under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), police may only issue a family violence safety notice where they have reasonable grounds for suspecting that the respondent is an adult (18 years or older).¹⁰⁹ Similarly, police can only exercise their holding powers under the Act if the respondent is an adult.¹¹⁰

The options available to police when a report is made of adolescent violence in the home are to:

- ▷ issue an informal or formal warning to the adolescent
- ▷ make a referral to a family violence service, Child FIRST or to Child Protection (for example, where there is sibling abuse)
- ▷ take out a family violence intervention order against the young person
- ▷ charge the young person with a criminal offence.¹¹¹

Police discretion and intervention orders

Conflicting views were put to the Commission about the effectiveness of police-initiated family violence intervention orders that direct removal of the child from the home. Removing a child can be devastating for the young person and adversely affect their development, wellbeing and financial security, as well their ability to continue schooling.¹¹² FVIOs may also alienate a young person from their family, which can increase risk factors and decrease important protective factors.¹¹³

A 2013 Victorian study shows that police attendance was most positive for parent victims when this attendance resulted in a 'firm' result, such as an application for an FVIO, or removal of the adolescent from the family home for a limited period of time (even just a few hours).¹¹⁴ The study also shows that parents were most positive about the outcome where the adolescent was linked to and engaged with a support service to address the violence.¹¹⁵

Case study example

Victoria Legal Aid provided the following case study to demonstrate typical circumstances experienced by their young clients:

Ali is 16 years old and has been displaying concerning behaviour both at school and in the home over the last 12 months. His parents found some cannabis in his school bag, and attribute his drug use and behaviour to new class mates. Ali's parents have discussed this with the school principal, and have requested that Ali be moved to a different home class, but the school principal doesn't think there is a basis for this. Ali has been disruptive at school and been suspended a few times and he is now at risk of being asked to leave.

Ali is smoking cannabis after school most days with new classmates, and when he gets home he is aggressive and abusive to his parents and younger brother, and has thrown a toaster and intentionally broken a plate. Ali's mother takes him to see their local doctor to see if Ali can be assisted either with some counselling, or assessments, or even a mental health plan of some sort. The general practitioner provides Ali's mother with the Kids Helpline number and gives Ali a lecture about drug use. That week Ali's dad is able to collect him straight after class so that Ali can't smoke cannabis with his class mates.

In the following weeks, Ali's dad has to work afternoon shifts and can no longer collect him from school. Ali resumes smoking cannabis with his mates, who also talk him into experimenting with ICE. Ali comes home one day after school and sees his younger brother going through his room. He becomes angry and pins him against the wall by his neck, punches him in the head and threatens to kill him. Ali's mum is able to break up the incident, but calls the local police station to get some advice about what she can do. Police attend the home and apply for a family violence intervention order against Ali so that he doesn't commit family violence against his brother. Ali's mother only wanted advice from the police about how to manage his behaviour and drug use, and tries to reason with police not to take out a family violence intervention order but police say they have no choice.¹¹¹

The Commission heard that there is potential for police to play a positive role in addressing adolescent violence in the home, simply by attending the home and speaking to the young person. One individual explained the role that police played in addressing her nephew's violent behaviour:

The police were fantastic ... They explained to him that even though he feels he's defending himself when he damages items in the home or hits his sister or swears at his mother, Family Violence is a criminal offence and when he turns 16 it becomes even more dire legally ... this visit from the police was a godsend ... The violent outbursts have stopped. The visit from the police served not only to educate him about his actions, but also to show him the value of what is good in his life.¹¹⁶

By way of example, Taskforce Alexis, which is described in Chapters 13 and 15, includes a family violence response team (including an embedded family violence worker/social worker, a mental health response team and a youth crime prevention victimisation response (more commonly known as a proactive policing team)).¹¹⁷ In evidence Senior Sergeant Fiona Alexander, Officer in Charge, Integrated Response Team Initiative Taskforce Alexis, explained that where a police incident involves a young person using violence in the home, the response would be led by the family violence team but they would work in collaboration with the youth resource officers.¹¹⁸ These officers would 'get involved with the ongoing case management of that youth and see what services they can provide, provide some case management and then also make sure that they were involved in the appropriate services'.¹¹⁹

Victoria Legal Aid also expressed the view that initial police contact, if done well, can result in adolescents changing their behaviour.¹²⁰ However it raised concerns regarding police pursuing FVIO applications when this is not supported by the victim.¹²¹ It expressed the view that it is preferable for police to delay pursuing final intervention order applications to allow the adolescent to access support services as, during this period, the family situation may settle and the need for an FVIO may disappear (although an interim intervention order may remain in place during this time).¹²²

Victoria Police Assistant Commissioner for Family Violence Command, Dean McWhirter gave evidence that the significant shortage of crisis accommodation for adolescents using violence in the home 'represents a real challenge for police'.¹²³ Parents may be reluctant for the police to lay charges against their child but also want the violence to stop.¹²⁴ However, without any crisis accommodation options, police 'often need to leave the young person and parent in the home together'.¹²⁵

To get around current limitations, Assistant Commissioner McWhirter told the Commission that some police stations are doing 'voluntary time out' with young people in police stations by consent 'as an option of last resort but this is not ideal'.¹²⁶

In its written submission, Victoria Police recommended allowing police to respond immediately to those under the age of 18 years during an initial callout, through a 'range of options.' Victoria Police did not specify what these options might be.¹²⁷

Family violence intervention orders and young people

In regards to the making of FVIOs, the court may order that the young person is excluded from the home, but the court can only do so if satisfied that if the child is excluded from the residence the child will have appropriate alternative accommodation and appropriate care and supervision.¹²⁸ In considering these factors, the court may request a report from the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services¹²⁹ and must inform the Secretary if such a condition is made. This must occur even if the Secretary was not requested to provide a report to the court.¹³⁰

Children's Court

As discussed in Chapter 16, although either the Magistrates' or Children's Court may hear and determine an FVIO, where practicable applications involving a child—as an affected family member, protected person or respondent—are heard in the Children's Court.¹³¹

The Criminal Division of the Children's Court hears criminal matters against a child arising from a family violence incident. There are a range of sentencing options available including the following:

- ▷ dismissal and accountable undertaking
- ▷ good behaviour bond
- ▷ fine
- ▷ probation order

- ▷ youth attendance order
- ▷ youth supervision order
- ▷ youth residential centre order
- ▷ youth justice centre order.¹³²

In sentencing, a child's rehabilitative prospects and the need to preserve a child's familial relationships are priority considerations.¹³³

The Gain Respect Increase Personal Power program

This was an early intervention program funded through the (then) Department of Justice and available through the Children's Court for young males aged 13–17 years who had engaged in violent behaviour, including in the home (though the program was not specifically targeted at adolescent family violence).¹³⁴

The program was voluntary and available to young males who lived in certain local government areas and who were placed on a bond or order with conditions attached.¹³⁵ The program involved 12 counselling sessions, including aggression replacement therapy.¹³⁶ A family intervention was also available for parents, siblings and carers. An evaluation of the program found that it improved family and intimate relationships and reduced violent behaviour.¹³⁷ However, the program has now been defunded.¹³⁸

Victoria Legal Aid told the Commission that the Children's Court sometimes adjourns FVIO applications so that the young person can be assessed by the Children's Court Clinic.¹³⁹ This clinic undertakes psychological and psychiatric assessments of children and families. The clinic also conducts assessments relating to the impact of drug use on a young person and may make recommendations about appropriate treatment.

Diversion from court

Victoria does not have a legislated court-based youth diversion scheme for children charged with a criminal offence. Instead this currently occurs through police cautioning and referral to an informal diversion program—for example the ROPES program. The Commission heard that this informal system results in inconsistency across the state, with availability being largely dependent on a young person's geographic location.¹⁴⁰

The ROPES program

The ROPES program is a pre-plea diversion scheme for first-time offenders under 17 years of age. The program is not specific to family violence. It is a one-day program where the young offender and charging officer complete a ropes activity course together.¹⁴¹ The charging officer needs to give their consent before a young person is eligible to participate in the program, and will 'often only give this consent if the young person has admitted that they are guilty of the offence'.¹⁴² The court will dismiss all the charges against a young person following the successful completion of the program. Evaluations have found that 88 per cent of young people who have participated in the ROPES program do not re-offend.¹⁴³

To address this gap, the Children's Court received funding to deliver a 12-month Youth Diversion Pilot Program, which commenced in June 2015 in seven court locations across Victoria.¹⁴⁴ Jesuit Social Services is delivering the program in partnership with the Youth Support and Advocacy Service.¹⁴⁵

The diversion program is not specific to family violence. It targets those who have little or no history of offending and seeks to:

- ▷ provide support and intervention to young people who may be starting out on a path of offending
- ▷ divert these young people away from the criminal justice system
- ▷ assist young people to address any underlying problems that may lead to further offending.¹⁴⁶

The Children's Court refers young people for assessment of suitability for the program and the Court then receives a recommendation about an appropriate diversion plan, including any program components necessary to address the particular circumstances or needs of the young person.¹⁴⁷ The plans are 'broad-ranging to fit the circumstances of the accused and the offending behaviour, and will focus on links to family, school and community'.¹⁴⁸ The Court receives a report in relation to the young person's compliance and completion of the program.¹⁴⁹ Young people who successfully complete the program avoid having a finding of guilt recorded against them.¹⁵⁰

Judge Peter Couzens, former President of the Children's Court, has stated that the program is 'long overdue' and 'will offer young people an opportunity to address underlying causes contributing to their criminal behaviour with a view to diverting them from further offending'.¹⁵¹

Youth Justice Group Conferencing

Youth Justice Group Conferencing is a process that accompanies court proceedings involving young offenders. It has a rehabilitative focus and so is distinct from diversion schemes. If a child is found guilty of an offence, they may be eligible to participate in a group conference before the magistrate imposes a sentence.¹⁵² This involves the young person attending a conference with their lawyer, a police officer, and the convenor. Members of the young person's family, persons of significance to the child, the victim of the offence, and a representative or supporter of the victim.¹⁵³ The group conference provides the opportunity for all participants to discuss the offence and how it has affected them. Participants then discuss how the young person might repair the harm caused by their offending and prevent further offending.¹⁵⁴ The outcomes are documented in an outcomes plan which is attached to a report provided to the court. The magistrate then takes the report into account when sentencing the young person. If the court accepts the outcome plan, the young person is supported to implement the plan.¹⁵⁵

Youth Justice Group Conferencing is not a family violence-specific intervention; however, the Commission understands that existing youth justice group conferencing programs in Victoria include some cases of adolescent violence in the home.¹⁵⁶

Current programs for adolescents who use violence in the home and their families

Adolescent Family Violence Program

In 2011, Peninsula Health established the Keeping Families Safe program, using a grant from the Legal Services Board. This was the first program of its kind in Victoria. In November 2012, the Ian Potter Foundation provided funding to Child and Family Services Ballarat to develop a program called 'Step Up Victoria—Preventing Adolescent Violence in the Home'.¹⁵⁷ The program was piloted with 60 adolescents and their families in the Ballarat region.¹⁵⁸

As noted above, there are now three sites for these specialist adolescent and family services in Victoria—Geelong, Ballarat and Frankston funded by the Department of Health and Human Services. Each of these have different names.¹⁵⁹ For ease of reference we call these 'Adolescent Family Violence Programs' in the remainder of this chapter and in our recommendations.

These are therapeutic approaches that operate on a case management and group-work model, with each program aiming to deliver services to 48 young people and their families each year.¹⁶⁰ Each program runs for approximately four to six months, depending on the organisation and the group requirements.¹⁶¹ Police can make a L17 referral to these three programs.

The target group for the program is young people aged between 12 and 17 years of age and their families living within the designated program catchment area where:

- ▷ the young person is using violence against a parent or carer that is frequent and ongoing, resulting in the young person being at increased risk of homelessness, criminal justice involvement, disengagement from education and mental health vulnerability, and
- ▷ the parent/carers are likely, without additional support, to experience an increase in the frequency and severity of family violence, resulting in reduced safety and wellbeing (for themselves and other children living in the family home).¹⁶²

Priority is given to families being parented by a sole female parent or carer, Indigenous families, and families in which the young person has younger siblings.¹⁶³

The program uses cognitive behavioural and skill development strategies and involves adolescent group work, parent group work and multi-family group work.¹⁶⁴ It aims to increase the safety of all family members by preventing the escalation of family violence, supporting parents and assisting adolescents to improve their communication and problem solving skills.¹⁶⁵ The program is broadly based on the US court-mandated program Step Up.¹⁶⁶ The Commission was told that the US program has been evaluated several times and has been found to contribute to preventing violence and restoring family relationships.¹⁶⁷

The Victorian program has a number of features that differentiate it from other services such as Youth Support Service, men's behaviour change programs, Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services, namely a 'specific focus on adolescent family violence, and whole-of-family and integrated service delivery model using Victoria Police as the primary referral source'.¹⁶⁸ Unlike the US program, attendance is voluntary and is not linked to a court process such as an intervention order.¹⁶⁹

In a video submission to the Commission from a program, young males told of their experiences:

Most of the time when I was angry I used to take it out on Mum or I used to just go in my room and just smash it up I guess ... It used to happen a lot too because of what was going on in the house.¹⁷⁰

I started working with [Removed] probably a year and a half ago I think. He's really helped me a lot. Before I started seeing [Removed] I was really angry and used to fight with Mum a lot ... I met [Removed]. One day he took me for a kick of the footy and we started talking and I really opened up to him about what was going on. He's really helped me a lot with all my anger issues.¹⁷¹

An independent evaluation of Victoria's Adolescent Family Violence Program is currently being conducted by the Australian Institute of Criminology.¹⁷² An interim evaluation report, providing initial process review findings, was provided to the Commission. Initial findings suggest that the program is having a positive impact on family relationships. The main outcomes had been:

- ▷ improving adolescents' understanding of their violent behaviour, including identifying and managing triggers for violent or aggressive behaviour
- ▷ parent's increased confidence in managing the young person's behaviour
- ▷ a reduction in the nature and frequency of violence and aggression¹⁷³

Other positive initial findings include improved education, work and health outcomes for young people.¹⁷⁴

Participants attributed many of these positive changes to the support of their case manager, while some parents and carers reported difficulty in maintaining these positive outcomes over time. The Australian Institute of Criminology reports that 'this reflects the complex nature of adolescent family violence and the need for effective transition processes and ongoing support'.¹⁷⁵

Other community programs

A number of community programs have been developed to address the issue of adolescent violence in the home. The existence of these programs shows that community organisations are responsive to the issue of adolescent family violence. However, it is also apparent that there is no comprehensive system to assist families and young people using family violence; instead ad hoc programs have attempted to fill the gap.

Table 23.1 below lists programs that were raised in submissions.

Table 23.1 Examples of community programs that address adolescent violence in the home

Program	Provider	Scope	Location
Rebound ¹⁷⁶	EACH, in partnership with Victoria Police	Eight week program for young people aged 13–15 years experiencing instability in multiple environments (eg family, justice system, education). Covers positive choice-making, respectful relationships, identity and anger management. Uses outdoor activities to frame key messages.	Eastern Melbourne
Out of Bounds/ Who's in Charge/ Who's the Boss/ Parent Power ¹⁷⁷	Various providers run this program under different names Monash Youth and Family Services, and Connections Uniting Care offer a Who's in Charge program. As do Family Life Sandringham and Chelsea and Camcare Camberwell	A nine-session program for parents experiencing adolescent violence.	Various
Youth Services Mentor program ¹⁷⁸	Wyndham City Council	A program for young people aged 12–25 years who may be victims or users of family violence. Referrals are made by schools and parents.	South-western Melbourne
Breaking the cycle ¹⁷⁹	Anglicare Victoria	Group work program for parents of adolescents behaving in violent and abusive ways.	Across Anglicare Victoria's Victorian locations
Meridian ¹⁸⁰	Anglicare Victoria	Family counselling to families experiencing adolescent/child perpetrated family violence	Eastern Melbourne
Teenage Aggression Responding Assertively program ¹⁸¹	Berry Street	A free support group for parents experiencing adolescent violence in the home.	Local government areas of Banyule, Nillumbik, Whittlesea and Darebin
MATTERS program ¹⁸²	Berry Street	A service for families experiencing conflict. Involves children from age 8 and their families meeting together to work through issues in a safe environment.	Local government areas of Banyule, Nillumbik, Whittlesea and Darebin

The Commission heard positive feedback about these programs: for example, Anglicare Victoria's Meridian Program which provides family counselling in Melbourne's metropolitan east, and the Breaking the Cycle program, which is a group work program for parents offered across Anglicare Victoria's various locations.¹⁸³ Anglicare Victoria reported that these programs have been effective and that the group work model works best when run in parallel with family counselling (or as an alternative to it).¹⁸⁴

By using a family-therapy-based counselling approach that is informed about the causes and dynamics of A/CFV [adolescent/child-perpetrated family violence], Meridian has worked effectively with many families over nearly two decades. This work has enabled a great many adolescents to cease their use of violence against their family members, and helped families repair relationships between parents and children, and children and siblings. In the history of Anglicare Victoria's provision of this counselling service, though, we quickly came to understand that A/CFV presents particular challenges for intervention that are in many ways best met via a group work model that can either be run in parallel with family counselling for individual families, or even as an alternative to it ...

Working directly with parents in a group format ... is responsive to the fact that attempting to engage adolescents directly is usually unsuccessful, and that it is not only possible but indeed advisable to work to change adolescents' behaviour through the proxy of their parents, who hold responsibility for raising them.¹⁸⁵

Anglicare Victoria told the Commission that bringing parents together also helps to address feelings of shame and isolation and provides them with support networks.¹⁸⁶

Some programs have run as pilots only. Others have developed additional components, again on a trial basis. For example, in 2010, Inner South Community Health Service trialled an SMS pilot for parents attending their 'Who's the Boss' program. Those parents who consented were sent weekly or bi-weekly text messages reiterating the key message from that program that week.¹⁸⁷ Parents reported that the messages supported them to 'make changes and address their adolescent's abuse and violence.'¹⁸⁸ Parents felt that the support throughout the week helped them to remain firm as a parent, and brought affirmation to them.¹⁸⁹

The trial noted some limitations, for example for those who have low English proficiency and for those in rural areas with unreliable phone reception. It also noted that SMS support may not be appropriate in intimate partner violence 'as the violent partner may have access to victims' phones, as distinct from adolescent violence in the home where parents tend to have more control than their children over their own property'.¹⁹⁰

The way forward

Currently the family violence system struggles with how best to juggle the competing needs of protecting the best interests of young people and the safety of their family, when an adolescent is using violence in the home.

Adolescent violence has some similarities with adult family violence, including that the majority of victims are female, and the significant barriers victims face seeking help.¹⁹¹ It can be just as terrifying and harmful. However, adolescent violence in the home also has unique characteristics and requires different responses.

Young people who use violence often experience a range of complex problems, which require a consistent and coordinated response from all relevant services, including youth services, Integrated Family Services, family violence services, police, courts, schools and health services.¹⁹² Without this 'parents, adolescents and families involved will continue to fall through the cracks in a system that has yet to acknowledge their unique needs'.¹⁹³ Current responses can exacerbate the violence and leave victims vulnerable.

All parts of the family violence system need to recognise that young people can be both victims and users of violence in the home, sometimes at the same time. Young people should not be stigmatised; nor should their parents and family members, whose safety is paramount. The underlying causes of the violence should be addressed to prevent any further violence and involvement in the criminal justice system. To achieve this, a much more comprehensive approach compared to the current patchwork of supports is required. This also means that family violence services need to become more responsive to adolescent use of violence in the home, and adolescent and family services need to be cognisant that intimate partner violence may be co-occurring in the home where the young person is using violence.

The Commission considers that priority should be given, wherever possible, to therapeutic and diversionary responses to adolescent violence. It should not be assumed that a young person will use violence forever, however if they and their families are not supported, families are left at risk and young people may continue their violent behaviours into adulthood. Nor should the harm that such violence causes to family members, including parents and siblings, be minimised, or victims blamed for the young person's use of violence.

The Commission makes findings below on the way forward in addressing adolescents' use of violence in the home.

Principles that should be applied to adolescent violence against family members

Having regard to the submissions and evidence put to the Commission and to the scholarship in this area, the Commission finds that adolescent violence in the home must be better recognised as a form of family violence, and so better resourced across all systems—including police, courts, youth justice, human services and specialist family violence, integrated family mental health, and disability services.

The Commission believes that the following principles should guide Victoria's approach to addressing adolescent violence in the home.¹⁹⁴

- ▷ There is a need to raise awareness about adolescent violence in the community, along with easy to find information about the options and services available to address adolescent violence.
- ▷ Adolescent violence in the home should be recognised by the family violence system as different from adult-perpetrated family violence.
- ▷ Involvement with the criminal justice system for adolescents who use violence in the home should be a last resort—therapeutic responses should be adopted. Priority should be given to specialist therapeutic responses that work with the young person and their families as early as possible. The underlying causes of the violence should be addressed to prevent any further violence and involvement in the criminal justice system.
- ▷ Responses should be flexible and tailored to the particular circumstances of each family. For example, the intensity of any intervention should be appropriate to the level of risk posed to family members.
- ▷ There is a need for an immediate response to adolescent violence in the home so that young people understand the consequences of their actions and family members can be protected.
- ▷ Removal of the young person from the family home should be avoided as much as possible. Where there is no other option but for the young person to leave the home, appropriate supported accommodation should be provided to them.
- ▷ Improvements need to be made to our justice system so that greater use can be made of diversionary and restorative options when the family wants this.

The importance of public awareness

The Commission heard that there is limited awareness of adolescent family violence within the broader community and that the causes and dynamics of this form of violence are often misunderstood. Parents have reported feeling blamed for their child's behaviour, which is often attributed to 'poor parenting'.¹⁹⁵ The Commission is concerned that such responses risk re-victimising parents by minimising the violence, and fail to address the young person's needs. The Commission is also concerned that the seriousness of sibling violence is not recognised.

Increasing community awareness could help change widely-held perceptions that discount adolescent violence as a way that adolescents 'act out', as well as general social resistance to viewing adolescent violence as a complex issue rather than a result of poor parenting.¹⁹⁶ In turn, this could help reduce feelings of guilt and blame felt by parents of adolescents who are violent.¹⁹⁷

The Commission considers that there are many ways to raise community awareness about adolescents' use of violence in the home that could be explored. These include:

- ▷ adapting existing information and awareness initiatives in the media, social media and online environments
- ▷ existing websites, such as Parentline,¹⁹⁸ Domestic Violence Lookout, 1800 Respect, Victoria Legal Aid, Victoria Police, Department of Health and Human Services and others, could provide more explicit information that identifies adolescent family violence, including violence against siblings, and recognises the differences between this type of violence and intimate partner violence.

In keeping with the Commission's recommendations elsewhere regarding online information, it is important that any awareness-raising activities, including websites or information campaigns, publicise the options available to family members and adolescents who use violence and assist them to find help.¹⁹⁹

Adolescent violence against family members is different to family violence perpetrated by adults

Adolescent violence in the home deserves dedicated policy, research and practice effort.

The Centre for Innovative Justice recently reported that adolescent violence against family members requires increased attention, 'both as a standalone subject and as a consideration in family violence policy'.²⁰⁰ The Commission agrees. There is limited research on the experiences of the victims of adolescent family violence and even less about the experiences of the adolescents themselves.²⁰¹ This is an area where greater policy attention and focus on interventions is clearly required.

The Commission notes that one of the contributing factors to services' limited understanding of adolescent violence in the home is the lack of practice frameworks to guide family violence workers and other practitioners in this area. For example, the current Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF) was not designed to assess risk in this context.²⁰² Although the CRAF contains a definition of adolescent violence in the home, none of the examples used in the CRAF relate specifically to this. Similarly, the Family Violence Referral Protocol between the Department of Human Services and Victoria Police (2012–14) does not specifically mention adolescents who use violence in the home.²⁰³

This is a significant gap when effective risk assessment and management lies at the heart of Victoria's family violence response. The Commission makes recommendations regarding improvements to the CRAF in Chapter 6. As part of the review of the CRAF, appropriate risk assessment guidance should be developed, with accompanying workforce development, to assess risk and safety planning in relation to adolescent violence in the home.

A therapeutic response is required

Adolescence is a key life stage and early interventions for adolescents using violence in the home are crucial to prevent further violence and the risk of intergenerational violence.²⁰⁴

Rather than a criminal justice approach, a therapeutic approach is required. Research shows that young people who are diverted from the justice system are less likely to reoffend than those who go through the court system. In addition, 'the later a young person enters the criminal justice system, the less likely they are to have continued involvement'.²⁰⁵

The Commission considers that adopting a therapeutic approach is likely to better align with victims' wishes and recognise the status of young people as children before the law. A therapeutic approach is more likely to improve identification of individual risk factors, such as previous exposure to family violence, trauma, mental health, disability and other factors that have been linked to this form of family violence.

The Commission is also of the strong view that a much more deliberate effort by government is needed to ensure that young people with disabilities and their families, are supported where these issues are present in family violence.²⁰⁶ The Department of Health and Human Services should ensure that families with children with disabilities, including those with mental health disabilities, have the services they need so that the earliest possible interventions are available in response to young peoples' violence in the home.²⁰⁷

Research shows that targeted counselling and family therapy services are the most effective means of addressing adolescent family violence.²⁰⁸ The Commission heard that while there is 'a core of effective support groups, family therapy and specific family counselling' that address the issue of adolescent violence in the home, these services are limited in number and are at capacity.²⁰⁹ As with other responses to family violence, services are particularly limited in rural, regional and remote areas.²¹⁰

This represents a significant service gap in Victoria.²¹¹ As a result, adolescents do not always receive necessary interventions to prevent further violence and victims do not always receive appropriate support, placing their safety and wellbeing at risk.²¹²

The Victorian Government has recognised that specialist programs are required. The government's draft Adolescent Family Violence Program Service Model (2014) states that parents need 'a specific service to respond to adolescent family violence which, given its complexity and the need for attention to family safety, is not adequately addressed by parenting programs or youth-focused support services'.²¹³ The three pilot sites for programs are welcome, although statewide coverage has not yet been achieved.

Victoria Police and the courts face the same dilemma with a 'concerning absence of youth specific behavioural change programs available to young people, particularly young men'.²¹⁴

Adolescents are not eligible for men's behaviour change programs in Victoria. Although this can cause frustration for services and families seeking to find a program for a young person, the Commission considers that such programs targeted at adults perpetrating intimate partner violence are inappropriate and ineffective for young people using violence in the home against parents and/or siblings.

Adolescent violence against family members occurs in a specific context and requires interventions that treat it differently from adult-perpetrated family violence. Given young people's need for care and protection, services responding to adolescent family violence require a specialist approach.²¹⁵ This is complex work. However, the current ad hoc approach cannot continue—there is a need to expand on current services in order to develop a comprehensive statewide approach.

Extending Adolescent Family Violence Programs across Victoria

The Commission notes that a preliminary evaluation of the current Adolescent Family Violence Program demonstrates promising outcomes. The Commission recommends that if the outcomes of the final evaluation of the program are successful, then further extension of the program should be supported. Programs need to be geographically accessible and age, culture and gender appropriate.

Extending availability of programs for adolescents who use violence in the home would be an important achievement for Victoria as it would provide relief for families, police and the courts which currently have few options. In considering expansion of the program however, there are a number of practice issues that need to be considered.

Although it was intended that the program would include a specialist response to Aboriginal families, it has not been possible to deliver or evaluate this component of the program.²¹⁶ Given the over-representation of Aboriginal people in experiences of family violence generally, and the feedback the Commission heard from communities that use of violence in the home by Aboriginal young people was a growing problem, this is a significant gap.²¹⁷ If the Adolescent Family Violence Program is to be expanded then it will be necessary to dedicate resources for culturally safe, whole of family interventions adapted to the Aboriginal context and delivered by, or at the very least in effective partnership with, Aboriginal controlled community organisations.

At this stage, the Australian Institute of Criminology evaluation does not include data from Victoria Police collected from the program participants and a comparison group in regards to police attendance at incidents of adolescent violence against family members. Information about the numbers and nature of subsequent family violence call outs to police will be important in assessing the program's effectiveness.

Further, while these family-focused interventions have been shown to help divert young people from the criminal justice system and restore family relationships, such interventions have only been developed relatively recently and workers are still gaining experience in this area.²¹⁸

The program guidelines state that the program should not be offered if it is identified that adult family violence is also present, until this issue has been 'adequately addressed'.²¹⁹ However, an interim evaluation has found that violence between adult family members was frequently detected among families referred to the programs. Further 'the presence of violence between adult family members would not always be apparent at time of referral to the program, making it a difficult criterion to apply consistently'.²²⁰

This is an important consideration for practice. On the one hand it is particularly important to engage with families experiencing violence between adult family members because the programs could mitigate the impact of witnessing violent behaviours in the home on young people.²²¹ On the other hand, it may work against what the program is trying to achieve with the young person.

The Commission is of the view that, rather than excluding families where there is adult intimate partner violence, the prevalence of adult family violence highlights the need for specialist family violence capacity to be more effectively integrated into the program.²²² One way to facilitate this is by ensuring referrals (including police L17 referrals) to this program go through the Support and Safety Hubs recommended in Chapter 13.

As of 1 July 2018, these hubs will be the entry point to specialist family violence services and Integrated Family Services in local areas. The intake team at the hub will undertake a risk and needs assessment for both the young person using violence and other family members, and take responsibility for linking them into the range of services they need, including Adolescent Family Violence Programs and mental health, legal, disability and youth services.

The Commission would expect that the hubs would have strong links with providers of Adolescent Violence in the Home programs to facilitate assessment and placement into programs as quickly as possible. As Support and Safety Hubs will also be the intake point into specialist family violence services, family services and adult perpetrator programs, a more integrated suite of help should also be provided to families, including where necessary to mental health, disability and drug and alcohol services.

For this to be viable, however, Adolescent Family Violence Programs need to be available. We recommend that these programs be rolled out across the state within two years so that they are in place before the commencement of the hubs by 1 July 2018.

Recommendation 123

The Victorian Government, subject to successful evaluation of the Adolescent Family Violence Program, extend the program across Victoria [within two years].

An immediate response when adolescents use violence against family members

The Commission heard that, for most families, calling the police when a young person has used violence is an absolute last resort due to fear of the long-term consequences for the child. Parents and adolescents also report not understanding court processes or the outcomes for the adolescent if an intervention order is made.²²³

Police responses can have a significant influence on whether the violence continues. Attendance by police can help the young person to understand the seriousness of the violence, however if 'no action is taken, the adolescent may interpret police inaction as having legitimised their use of violence'.²²⁴

Victoria Police told us that 'there are few options' for police when responding to adolescent violence in the home.²²⁵ The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence notes this and includes very limited guidance for police who attend family incidents involving adolescent violence.²²⁶

As described above, family violence safety notices and police holding powers may only be applied to adults.²²⁷ This means that unless both the parents and the young person consent, the police cannot remove an adolescent from the family home.²²⁸ Victoria Police told us that in light of this, often the only real protective mechanism in response to adolescent family violence is for police to apply for an intervention order.²²⁹

Even where the young person and parents give permission for the young person to be removed from the home, there are very limited accommodation options for the young person, unless a friend or family agrees to have them.²³⁰ In some cases Child Protection might be involved and arrange accommodation through another family member or other form of out-of-home care.²³¹

If a young person is cast into homelessness—either couch surfing, living in a rooming house or staying with relatives—it is unreasonable to expect that they will get their lives back on track. The Commission heard that lack of suitable accommodation options for young people pervades our homelessness system, both for adolescents who use violence and the many more young victims of family violence.²³²

In addition, it should be noted that removing the young person from the family home can have adverse impacts on the young person's siblings, who may be traumatised by the separation from their brother or sister, particularly if their sibling has a disability and ends up in a poor-quality disability setting.²³³

Providing accommodation to these young people is vital to ensuring victim safety. However this must be provided in a context where the young person's legal status as a child is acknowledged and work can begin on providing therapeutic and practical support necessary to work towards the young person being able to return home safely. This is often what families want, but a circuit breaker is needed.

The Commission believes that investment is needed in supported accommodation options for these young people that can run alongside adolescent family violence programs and provide an immediate option for police and families. We do not consider that out-of-home care/residential care is an appropriate option for many of these children as this brings its own risks in terms of the wellbeing of children.²³⁴ Nor is the youth refuge system likely to be an option, as refuges are over-subscribed and the mix of children and young people who themselves are escaping violence, with a young person who is a user of violence, is inappropriate. Instead, creativity needs to be shown by government in developing alternative supported housing options. This might include rapid rehousing schemes for older adolescents into transitional housing stock managed by housing associations with support provided by a youth specialist, lead-tenant schemes or other longer term accommodation options, again with support from a youth specialist.

Recommendation 124

The Victorian Government develop additional crisis and longer term supported accommodation options for adolescents who use violence in the home. This should be combined with therapeutic support provided to end the young person's use of violence in the family [within two years].

Should Victoria Police be able to issue family violence safety notices?

An option for addressing adolescent family violence is to extend police powers to issue FVSNs to those under 18 years of age. The Commission is of the view that unless there are sufficient and accessible services to support the young person, then such an option is likely to be counter-productive, especially if we consider that children engaging in violent behaviour may sometimes be as young as 10 or 11 years old.

Giving these additional powers to police may intensify risk to the parent or other family members who may be even more reluctant to report the behaviour if they know the young person is likely to be removed from the home. At a bare minimum it would be necessary to have appropriate supported crisis accommodation for these young people. Victoria Police notes that even without expanded powers, alternative accommodation options would give police greater opportunity to intervene in incidents.²³⁵

On balance, the Commission considers that FVSNs and holding powers should not be extended to young people under 18 years of age. A preferred option is that Victoria Police retain their existing powers and investment is made in therapeutic supports to assist the young person to address their behaviour and keep the family safe.

Victoria Legal Aid suggests that youth police liaison officers could be trained in the specialist response necessary for supporting a young person and their family during this time. Even where such liaison officers do not attend the incident themselves:

... they could complete a formal interview with the young person and the family to assess the needs of the young person and the family, and to assess risk and the family dynamic and what, if any, referrals, supports and interventions may be appropriate.²³⁶

Such a role could potentially be attached to a family violence team, or at least linked with them, noting that family violence teams are increasingly focused on higher risk cases. Taskforce Alexis is one model where dedicated youth resource officers provide support to young people and their families following a police attendance at an incident where an adolescent has used violence in the home. There may be other models that can also achieve a similar result.

The Commission recognises that such a role can only achieve good outcomes if appropriate support services are available. This is not necessarily the case currently, due to demand pressures across various human services. Victoria Police suggests that a statewide network of youth-specific support options to which police could refer adolescents and their families would assist in addressing the underlying factors contributing to adolescent violence in the home.²³⁷ This is a sensible suggestion. Our view is that this could be achieved through the expansion of the Adolescent Family Violence Program.

To support this, we consider that the Victoria Police Code of Practice should be amended to include guidelines about police initiated intervention order applications against children and referral pathways for families experiencing adolescent violence in the home. The Code should prioritise cautions and diversion.

Recommendation 125

Victoria Police determine its baseline model for family violence teams and consider appointing dedicated youth resource officers to provide support to young people and their families following police attendance at an incident in which an adolescent has used violence in the home [within 12 months].

Improving justice system responses

Using court processes as an opportunity

As noted in Chapter 16 Children's Court applications for FVIOs are heard in children's court specific venues, such as the Melbourne Children's Court, and across magistrates' court venues (where the magistrate exercises his or her Children's Court jurisdiction in those venues). Depending on the court, there are separate lists for Children's Court FVIO hearings for children at each magistrates' court. This normally occurs on either a Children's Court listing day, or as part of the FVIO list. At smaller courts, Children's Court FVIOs may be heard in the general FVIO list or mention list. The Melbourne Children's Court (which is solely a children's court) has a listing day for police initiated applications.

Currently there are no court funded family violence specific services in the Children's Court, however applicant and respondent workers may work with young people as well as adults in those specialist courts where these positions are currently located and where magistrates are exercising the jurisdiction of the Children's Court in those venues. These services are currently available at Ballarat, Heidelberg, Frankston, Moorabbin, Sunshine, Werribee and Melbourne Magistrates' Courts. However, there is no similar role at the Melbourne Children's Court, which is a distinct venue.

Children's Court data shows that, of 1682 finalised original FVIO applications across Victoria in 2014–15, 307 (18 per cent) were finalised at the Melbourne Children's Court. In 2014–15, in the 307 original FVIO applications finalised at the Melbourne Children's Court, 199 respondents were aged 17 and under and a further 12 respondents were aged 18 or 19.²³⁸ In 2013–14 there were 422 Affected Family Members in FVIO applications heard in the Melbourne Children's Court.²³⁹

The Children's Court Clinic is available at the Melbourne Children's Court and is an example of the court's involvement as a trigger for a pathway into support. The Commission endorses this approach. However the clinic only applies in the criminal and family divisions of the court. It is not available in FVIO proceedings. Further, in criminal matters, referral to the clinic is reliant on the magistrate making a request for a Children's Court Clinic assessment, which may not occur if mental health and drug use issues are not in the mind of the magistrate or are not immediately present in the family violence incident. For these two reasons it is likely that the Children's Court Clinic is utilised in a relatively small number of cases where a young person is using violence in the home.

The Commission is of the firm view that where adolescents using violence against appear before the Children's Court in either the civil or criminal jurisdiction, the young person and their family must be provided with appropriate information about legal, community and case management options, counselling for both the young person and their family members, and referrals to other services.²⁴⁰ Currently however, if a young person is not already linked in with these sources of assistance, there is no dedicated staff member with family violence expertise at the Melbourne Children's Court to help facilitate this. Court Network may provide valuable support; however, these are voluntary positions with two people providing assistance²⁴¹ in what is a very busy court, dealing with a wide range of matters.

This is a significant gap that could be filled at relatively low cost. For example, the Children's Court could be funded to provide applicant and respondent workers at the Melbourne Children's Court, to assist applicants and respondents to manage the court process, understand the conditions of an order, and access necessary supports including through Support and Safety Hubs recommended in Chapter 13 and referral to Adolescent Family Violence Programs recommended above. These two staff would need to possess capability in working with young people and with those affected by family violence and would form part of a wider network of applicant and respondent workers in the specialist family violence magistrates' courts, effectively closing the loop on a current system gap and working in partnership with Court Network to provide comprehensive services at our state's busiest children's court.

This approach would be consistent with many families' wishes to get young people the help they need, as well as giving magistrates and police confidence that action is being taken to address the violent behaviour. Again, this is dependent upon scaling up adolescent-specific program responses and family violence capability in key areas, including drug and alcohol, mental health, family and youth services.

A further action that may assist those young people who use violence in the home where a mental health or substance misuse issue is also present, would be to expand the scope of the Children's Court Clinic to include FVIO respondents. This would require modelling to determine the resource implications of this change. It will also be important to consider any unintended consequences of such an extension of jurisdiction. The Commission encourages the Children's Court to undertake such a review.

Recommendation 126

The Melbourne Children's Court establish family violence applicant and respondent worker positions to assist young people and families in situations where adolescents are using violence in the home [within 12 months].

Greater use of diversion

Victoria is the only Australian state that does not have a legislated court-based youth diversion scheme, despite significant evidence about the benefits of diversion and its role in preventing criminalisation of children and young people.²⁴²

As noted earlier, without a legislative scheme, diversion currently occurs via a police referral, with a magistrate's consent to an informal diversion program, such as the ROPES program. The Commission is concerned that this has led to inconsistent practice across the state, geographic inequity and heavy reliance on police discretion.

The Commission welcomes the current 12-month Youth Diversion Pilot Program. This program should provide important insights into the operation of a comprehensive diversion scheme for young people.

The program will be independently evaluated in May 2016.²⁴³ The Victorian Government has not yet committed to expanding the program across the state.²⁴⁴ If the pilot is favourably evaluated then the Commission recommends that the scheme should be continued and implemented in a broader range of locations. Although the scheme is not family-violence specific, it may have a positive impact on addressing the use of violence in the home by young people and prevent future violent behaviour. The Commission also recommends that the program be established by legislation to ensure consistency with other Australian jurisdictions and to afford youth diversion the same status of adult diversion.

The Commission considers that before introducing any legislative diversion scheme for young people in Victoria, the findings of the recent review of the adult Criminal Justice Diversion Program by Magistrate Doherty should be considered.²⁴⁵

A feature of the adult scheme is that magistrates cannot grant diversion unless the prosecution consents.²⁴⁶ This effectively makes Victoria Police the gatekeepers of the scheme and affords them considerable discretion when deciding whether or not to recommend diversion. This raises a concern if some police choose not to utilise the scheme on the basis of their subjective opinions about the accused or the value of diversion.²⁴⁷ In considering this issue, Magistrate Doherty recommended that if appropriate, the Chief Magistrate should commence discussions with appropriate stakeholders with a view to amending the legislation to enable judicial officers to be the ultimate decision-maker about whether diversion will be allowed.²⁴⁸

It should also be noted that while criminal diversion may be appropriate and effective for adolescents using violence in the home, diversion for adult perpetrators of family violence has been criticised on the basis that it undermines the perpetrator's personal responsibility and the seriousness of family violence.²⁴⁹ Magistrate Doherty's review considered this issue and recommended that the adult scheme guidelines be amended to exclude family violence and personal safety order breaches 'generally, but not exclusively', from diversion.²⁵⁰ The same criticisms may not be applicable to young people using violence in the home, because they are children, and because of the unique circumstances that surround this type of family violence.

Recommendation 127

The Victorian Government, subject to successful evaluation of the Youth Diversion Program Pilot, establish a statutory youth diversion scheme [within two years].

Linking restorative justice with specialist adolescent violence programs

Adolescent violence against family members is an area that may also be suited to restorative justice approaches, as family members are more likely to be seeking a reparative response.²⁵¹

To date, Youth Justice Group Conferences have not had a specific focus on family violence. Linking Youth Justice Group Conferences with Adolescent Family Violence Programs could potentially provide a good model for the future for those young people who have been found guilty of an offence and where the family felt that this was a safe option.

As described earlier in this chapter, Youth Justice Group Conferencing is a process where prior to a magistrate imposing a sentence, a young person participates in a group conference, which for the purposes of this Commission would include the family as victims. The group discusses how the young person might repair and prevent further harm and develop an outcomes plan, which the magistrate would take into account when sentencing.

The Commission recognises that a Youth Justice Group Conference alone may not be sufficient to identify and or address underlying issues. Previous studies looking at youth justice conferencing and adolescent violence in the home have shown that cases require more than the standard youth justice conferencing model. They also require access to victim professional counselling and support, and therapeutic work with the young person.²⁵²

There are also specific risks of re-victimisation if youth group conferencing is not conducted carefully. However, a well prepared and facilitated group conference 'can challenge pro-violence and victim-blaming behaviors and model respectful behaviors. This would be reliant upon involving family support services before, during and after a group conference'.²⁵³

The Commission understands that preliminary work is under way on developing a pilot program to link Youth Justice Group Conferencing with some of the Adolescent Family Violence Programs currently being trialled in Victoria in recognition that effective intervention requires mutually reinforcing justice and therapeutic elements. This is a very positive development.

The Commission understands that such a program would involve more intense work when the Youth Justice Group Conference is convened, by adding a preliminary step of the young person engaging with an Adolescent Family Violence Program prior to the conference and subsequent attendance of the service provider at the conference. The program would then provide ongoing work with the young person and family as part of a typical outcome plan. Such a pilot could include elements of case management, individual and family therapeutic intervention, and a group program.

The Commission recognises that the development of such a pilot is in very preliminary stages and that important factors need to be resolved, including referral processes and protocols, and consent provisions to ensure that the participants (young people and families) understand the process and implications of participating or not. Training and support for both Youth Justice Group Conference convenors and practitioners in the Adolescent Family Violence Program would also be required. Given demand for programs, consideration of how to prioritise these cases in relation to other referrals to programs is required. These should not be insurmountable challenges however, and the Commission considers that efforts to combine therapeutic and justice processes through such a pilot would be a sound investment for the Victorian Government.

Recommendation 128

The Victorian Government trial and evaluate a model of linking Youth Justice Group Conferencing with an Adolescent Family Violence Program to provide an individual and family therapeutic intervention for young people who are using violence in the home and are at risk of entering the youth justice system [within two years].

Endnotes

- 1 Mary McKenna and Rosalie O'Connor, 'Walking on Eggshells: Child and Adolescent Violence in the Family' (Flinders University and Southern Junction Community Services, 2012) 2.
- 2 Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14' (January 2016), 32, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency on 8 January 2016.
- 3 Ibid 110.
- 4 Sarah Broadhead and Rita Francis, 'The Making of Good Men and Women: Responding to Youth Violence in the Home and its Harmful Impacts on Families and Communities in Western Australia—Summary Report' (Women's Health and Family Services, 2015) 8.
- 5 McKenna and O'Connor, above n 1.
- 6 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 24.
- 7 Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, 13 [60], Attachment 2, 8.
- 8 For example, police incident data counts incidents rather than individuals, which means that a particular individual might be counted multiple times as a victim or perpetrator. Victoria Police data includes adolescent violence against parents as well as sibling to sibling violence. This data also captures all reported violence by children towards parents, including where the 'children' are adults. On the other hand, Children's Court and Magistrates' Court data counts respondents on original applications to avoid double-counting individuals.
- 9 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 2, 20.
- 10 Ibid Victoria Police data source, Tab 6, Table 6: Other parties by sex and age, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.
- 11 Ibid.
- 12 Ibid 58, Children's Court data source, Tab 6, Table 6: Respondents on original FVIO applications by gender and age group, July 2009 to June 2014.
- 13 Ibid Victoria Police data source, Tab 14, Table 14: Parents as the affected family member where the other party is 17 years or younger, by gender of OTH and gender and age of AFM, July 2009 to June 2014 combined.
- 14 Ibid.
- 15 Ibid.
- 16 Ibid 27.
- 17 From 2009–10 to 2013–14 the Children's Court heard matters involving 3343 parents and step parents. Males were respondents in between 70 to 75 per cent of applications across a five year period: ibid 58, Children's Court data source, Tab 13, Table 13: Number of affected family members who were a Parent/Step-Parent to a respondent aged 17 years and younger, by gender, July 2009 to June 2014.
- 18 In the five year period to 30 June 2014, police recorded 4351 family violence incidents by young people aged 10 to 19 years (inclusive) against family members aged 17 years and younger. This analysis excludes incidents where the respondent's age is unknown. In 2009–10, recorded incidents of this type of family violence numbered 543 (19.8 per cent of total reported incidents that year involving affected family members aged 17 and younger). This increased to 1094 by 2013–14 (18.9 per cent of total reported incidents for that year involving affected family members aged 17 and younger): ibid Victoria Police data source, Tab 8, Table 8: Sex and age of other parties where affected family member is aged 17 years and younger, July 2009 to June 2014.
- 19 This analysis excludes incidents where the respondent's age or gender is unknown: ibid.
- 20 Ibid Children's Court data source, Tab 10, Table 10: Primary affected family members on original applications by relationship to respondent, July 2009 to June 2014.
- 21 For example, in 2013–14, the Children's Court finalised 475 original Family Violence Intervention Order (FVIO) applications against adults, compared with 1253 applications against child respondents (under 18 years of age): ibid Children's Court data source, Tab 6, Table 6: Respondents on original FVIO applications by gender and age group, July 2009 to June 2014.
- 22 Those aged 12 years and under accounted for 17 applications in 2013–14: ibid Tab 12, Table 12: Gender and age of respondent where the affected family member is 17 years and younger, July 2009 to June 2014.
- 23 Centre for Innovative Justice, 'Opportunities for Early Intervention: Bringing Perpetrators of Family Violence into View' (RMIT University, March 2015) 30. See also Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 23; Kathleen Daly and Dannielle Wade, 'Gender and Adolescent-to-Parent Violence: A Systematic Analysis of Typical and Atypical Cases' in Amanda Holt (ed), Working with Adolescent Violence and Abuse Towards Parents: Approaches and Contexts for Intervention (Routledge, 2016) 1.
- 24 Jo Howard, 'Adolescent Violence in the Home: The Missing Link in Family Violence Prevention and Response' (Stakeholder Paper 11, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, September 2011) 3.
- 25 Jo Howard and Lisa Abbott, 'The Last Resort: Pathways to Justice—Adolescent Violence in the Home' (Peninsula Health, November 2013) 10.
- 26 Howard, above n 24, 4.
- 27 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Improving Victoria's Response to Adolescent Violence in the Home: Discussion Paper—July 2015' (1 June 2015), 15, provided to the Commission by the Department of Justice and Regulation, 21 October 2015. Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 13; Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 59.
- 28 Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 11.
- 29 Daly and Wade, above n 23, 4.
- 30 Ibid 4.
- 31 Anglicare Victoria, Submission 665, 4–5; Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 45; Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11; Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 13.
- 32 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 15 (citations omitted); Jo Howard et al, 'Use of SMS to Support Parents who Experience Violence from their Adolescents' (2010) 16(2) Australian Journal of Public Health 187, 191; Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11.
- 33 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11.
- 34 Leanne Sinclair, 'Adolescent Violence in the Home: Implications for Practice' (Speech delivered at the Launch of The Last Resort: Pathways to Justice Research Report, Website and Animation, Melbourne, 11 February 2014).
- 35 Daly and Wade, above n 23, 4.
- 36 Abby Horsburgh, 'Adolescent Violence in the Home: A Scoping Study and Mapping of Victorian Services' (RMIT University, Good Shepherd Youth & Family Service, Social Policy and Research Unit, 2012) 4.
- 37 Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 30.
- 38 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 37.
- 39 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11.
- 40 Ibid.
- 41 Women's Mental Health Network Victoria Inc, Submission 417, 12.
- 42 Daly and Wade, above n 23, 4.
- 43 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11.

- 44 Howard, above n 24, 4. See also, Jo Howard and Naomi Rottem, 'It All Starts at Home: Male Adolescent Violence Towards Mothers' (Inner South Community Health Service and Child Abuse Research Australia, August 2008) 64.
- 45 Community consultation, Shepparton 1, 18 May 2015.
- 46 Community consultation, Werribee 1, 11 May 2015.
- 47 Statement of Feinberg, 9 July 2015, 2 [9].
- 48 Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science—Swinburne University; Victorian Institute of Forensic Mental Health (Forensicare), Submission 649, 13.
- 49 Anonymous, Submission 693, 1.
- 50 Statement of Feinberg, 9 July 2015, 2 [9].
- 51 Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science—Swinburne University; Victorian Institute of Forensic Mental Health (Forensicare), Submission 649, 6.
- 52 Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 3.
- 53 Linette Etheredge, Submission 220, 6; Russell Pratt, Robyn Miller and Cameron Boyd, 'Adolescents with Sexually Abusive Behaviours and their Families: Best Interests Case Practice Model—Specialist Practice Resource' (Department of Human Services, June 2012) 13.
- 54 Russell, Miller and Boyd, above n 53, 12.
- 55 Ibid 14.
- 56 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 64.
- 57 Department of Human Services, 'Evaluation of the Sexually Abusive Behaviours Treatment Services: Final Report' (April 2013) 4, 6, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 58 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 15, citing Jo Howard et al, above n 32, 187.
- 59 Kathleen Daly and Heather Nancarrow, 'Restorative Justice and Youth Violence Towards Parents' in James Ptacek (ed), Restorative Justice and Violence Against Women (Oxford University Press, 2009) 9.
- 60 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 15.
- 61 Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 11.
- 62 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 16.
- 63 Horsburgh, above n 36, 16.
- 64 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11.
- 65 Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 30–1.
- 66 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 37.
- 67 Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, 13 [60], Attachment 2, 8.
- 68 Young People's Legal Rights Centre—Youthlaw, Submission 539, 2.
- 69 See Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 11 (in relation to Conduct Disorder, Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder and Oppositional Defiance Disorder). See also Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, 'Desperate Measures: The Relinquishment of Children with Disability into State Care in Victoria' (May 2012) 28 (in relation to Autism Spectrum Disorder).
- 70 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 69, 41–2.
- 71 Ibid 68.
- 72 Ibid 28 citing National Disability Services Victoria, Submission to Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission (2011) 2.
- 73 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 69, 51.
- 74 Ibid 6.
- 75 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11–12.
- 76 Statement of McGorry, 20 July 2015, 3 [14].
- 77 Ibid 9 [40]–[43].
- 78 Ibid 1114 [26]–1115 [6].
- 79 Jennifer Bowles, 'What can be done? Residential Therapeutic Treatment Options for Young People Suffering Substance Abuse/Mental Illness' (The Winston Churchill Memorial Trust of Australia, February 2015) 6.
- 80 The report recommends that the Children's Court be able to make a new type of order following a relevant assessment: a Youth Therapeutic Order which would place the young person in a secure therapeutic community facility to detoxify and engage in treatment. There would be judicial oversight of the mandated treatment, and the young person would have access to education and training. The order could only be made as part of bail provisions, rather than as a substantive sentence. Such a regime would require legislative amendments: Bowles, above n 79, 6, 40–3, 52–3.
- 81 Community consultation, Ravenhall, 11 May 2015.
- 82 Grampians Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 399, 10; Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 5; Grampians Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 399, 10.
- 83 Association of Child and Family Development, Submission 221, 2; Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 30. See also MacKillop Family Services, Submission 895, 3; Horsburgh, above n 36, 4.
- 84 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 35.
- 85 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 23.
- 86 Anglicare Victoria, Submission 665, 5. See also Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 33.
- 87 Daly and Wade, above n 23, 2.
- 88 Ibid 2.
- 89 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 10.
- 90 Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 30.
- 91 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 18, citing Natasha Bobic, 'Adolescent Violence Towards Parents' (Topic Paper No 14, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2004) 10.
- 92 Bobic, above n 91, 10–11; Ashleigh Haw, 'Parenting over Violence: Understanding and Empowering Mothers Affected by Adolescent Violence in the Home' (The Patricia Giles Centre, 2010) 8.
- 93 See, eg, the Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11 which described adolescent violence in the home as 'complex and little-understood'. See also Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 59; Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 9, 24.
- 94 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 36.
- 95 Horsburgh, above n 36, 34, cited in Caraniche, Submission 456, 4. See also Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 3; Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science—Swinburne University; Victorian Institute of Forensic Mental Health (Forensicare), Submission 649, 5.
- 96 Howard, above n 24, 2.
- 97 Horsburgh, above n 36, 5. See also Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 59.
- 98 Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 59–60.
- 99 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 24.
- 100 Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 5.
- 101 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 11–12.
- 102 Ibid 11.
- 103 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 9.

- 104 Statement of Feinberg, 9 July 2015, 2 [9].
- 105 Pratt, Miller and Boyd, above n 53, 13.
- 106 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 107 Victoria Police, 'Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence—Edition 3' (2014) 10.
- 108 Ibid 9–10.
- 109 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 24(a).
- 110 Ibid s 13(b).
- 111 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 40.
- 112 Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 19.
- 113 Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 3.
- 114 In that study of the 15 Family Violence Intervention Orders taken out, only two excluded the young person from the home. Two adolescents subsequently breached the order resulting in one then being excluded from the home. The other outcome is unclear: Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 6.
- 115 One third of parents in the study 'noted the positive impact of their adolescent engaging with a support service as contributing to their reduction in abusive behaviour': Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 55.
- 116 Anonymous, Submission 25, 1.
- 117 Statement of Alexander, 5 August 2015, 2 [7].
- 118 Transcript of Alexander, 5 August 2015, 2002 [30]–2003 [6].
- 119 Ibid 2003 [6]–[10].
- 120 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 41.
- 121 'We consider that there a range of actions short of a final family violence intervention order which may be more appropriate in these circumstances and may be more consistent with the interests of the parent (or sibling) who want the violence to stop but want the relationship with the young respondent to continue': Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 40–1.
- 122 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 41.
- 123 Statement of McWhirter, 27 July 2015, 37 [159].
- 124 Ibid 37 [160].
- 125 Ibid.
- 126 Ibid.
- 127 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 15.
- 128 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 82–83.
- 129 Ibid s 84.
- 130 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 83. If the young person who is a respondent to a family violence intervention order is aged over 16 years 11 months and under 18, the Youth Justice Service will manage the request for an assessment report unless the young person is a current Child Protection client: Department of Health and Human Services, 'Youth Justice Community Practice Manual,' 1, provided by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015. See also Department of Health and Human Services, 'Family Violence Intervention Orders and Personal Safety Intervention Orders: Child Respondent Exclusion Condition—Advice Number 1578' (1 December 2013), 2, provided by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 131 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 146(1)–(2). A child respondent is a person aged under 18 years: Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 4.
- 132 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 6–7.
- 133 Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 362.
- 134 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 18.
- 135 Ibid.
- 136 Ibid.
- 137 Ibid citing Sylvia Marov and Julia Ottobre, 'Gain Respect and Increase Personal Power' (Presentation to the No To Violence Conference, Melbourne, November 2012) 4.
- 138 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 18.
- 139 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 41.
- 140 Eleni Martakis, 'Appropriate Legal Interventions for Children and Young People in Victoria: Research Brief' (Victoria Legal Aid, 2015) 3.
- 141 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 9.
- 142 Ibid.
- 143 Ibid.
- 144 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 17.
- 145 Children's Court of Victoria, Youth Diversion (18 December 2015) <<http://www.childrenscourt.vic.gov.au/jurisdictions/criminal/youth-diversion>>.
- 146 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 17; ibid.
- 147 Children's Court of Victoria, above n 145.
- 148 Children's Court of Victoria, 'Commencement of Youth Diversion Pilot Program' (Media Release, 13 April 2015) 1.
- 149 Children's Court of Victoria, above n 145.
- 150 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 17.
- 151 Children's Court of Victoria, above n 148.
- 152 See Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 41–5.
- 153 Ibid s 415(6)–(7).
- 154 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Youth Justice Group Conferencing: Factsheet' (10 March 2015) 3 <<http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/for-service-providers/children,-youth-and-families/youth-justice/group-conferencing-information/youth-justice-group-conferencing-fact-sheets>>.
- 155 Ibid.
- 156 David Moore, 'YJGC & Family Support: A Possible Pilot Program' (19 November 2015) provided to the Commission by David Moore, 19 November 2015.
- 157 Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, Attachment 2, 14.
- 158 Ibid.
- 159 'Adolescent Family Violence' in Geelong, run by Barwon Child, Youth and Family; 'Step Up' run by Child and Family Services Ballarat and 'Keeping Families Safe' run by Peninsula Health. Department of Health and Human Services, 'Evaluation of the Adolescence Family Violence Program: Interim report—June 2015' (1 June 2015), 27, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 2 September 2015.
- 160 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 8.
- 161 Ibid.
- 162 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Adolescent Family Violence Services 31265', 2, provided by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

- 163 Ibid.
- 164 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 159, 8. See also Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 79.
- 165 Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 79.
- 166 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 159, 9–10.
- 167 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 24.
- 168 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 159, 9.
- 169 Ibid 43–44.
- 170 Time for Youth, Submission 698.
- 171 Ibid.
- 172 Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, 14 [64].
- 173 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 159, 72–4.
- 174 Similarly, a 2014 evaluation of Ballarat Child and Family Services found that the program helped to reduce the frequency of family violence incidents, increase perception of family wellbeing and safety and improve parenting skills and family relationships: Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, 13–14 [62], Attachment 2, 14.
- 175 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 159, 72–4.
- 176 EACH Social and Community Health, Submission 569, 30–1.
- 177 Horsburgh, above n 36, 38–9.
- 178 Wyndham City Council, Submission 518, 22.
- 179 Anglicare Victoria, Submission 665, 110–11.
- 180 Ibid 5–6.
- 181 Horsburgh, above n 36, 36; Berry Street, Matters (2010) <<http://www.berrystreet.org.au/Matters>>.
- 182 Horsburgh, above n 36, 38–9; Berry Street, above n 181.
- 183 Anglicare Victoria, Submission 665, 4.
- 184 Ibid 6–7.
- 185 Ibid 6.
- 186 Ibid.
- 187 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 11.
- 188 Howard et al, above n 32, 187.
- 189 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 11.
- 190 Ibid.
- 191 The Commission notes that use of violence by adolescent girls was also raised in community consultations: see, eg, Community Consultation, Shepparton 1, 18 May 2015.
- 192 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 13.
- 193 Horsburgh, above n 36, 6.
- 194 Based on similar principles identified by Victoria Legal Aid: Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 36–7, 44–5.
- 195 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 59. See also Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 5.
- 196 Amanda Holt, 'Adolescent-to-Parent Abuse as a Form of "Domestic Violence": A Conceptual Review' (2015) Trauma, Violence & Abuse, 4–6 (forthcoming).
- 197 Bobic, above n 91, 10–11.
- 198 The Commission notes that Parentline telephone counsellors are provided with guidance in talking to parents about adolescent use of violence in the home: Department of Education and Training, 'Guidelines for Response by Parentline Counsellors to Adolescent Violence', provided by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 199 Leanne Sinclair, above n 34, 3. See also Howard and Rottem, above n 44, 68; Haw, above n 92, 47.
- 200 Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 30.
- 201 Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 5. See also Daly and Wade, above n 23, 3.
- 202 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 9.
- 203 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 27, 8.
- 204 Connections UnitingCare, Submission 398, 5.
- 205 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 44 citing Youth Connect, 'A Step in the Right Direction: Diverting Young People from the Victorian Justice System—Pilot Evaluation Report' (October 2012) 9; Victoria Police, 'Child and Youth Strategy 2009–2013' (2009) 10.
- 206 The Commission notes that where a parent is considering surrendering ('relinquishing') their child, guidance to departmental employees states that a referral to Child FIRST should be considered: Department of Health and Human Services, 'Children, Youth and Families and Disability Services: Operating Framework—Supporting Integrated Practice' (November 2012), 7, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 207 See findings of and recommendations made by the Victoria Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission in relation to Autism Spectrum Disorder: Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 69, 12, 55–66.
- 208 Horsburgh, above n 36, 5, 34.
- 209 Ibid 34; Connections UnitingCare, Submission 398, 5; Wesley Mission Victoria, Submission 908, 12; Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 30.
- 210 Ovens Murray Goulburn Integrated Family Violence Services, Submission 444, 14.
- 211 Anglicare Victoria, Submission 665, 4.
- 212 Council of Single Mothers and Their Children Victoria Inc, Submission 368, 10.
- 213 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Adolescent Family Violence Program Service Model: Draft—February 2014' (1 February 2014), 4, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 214 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 37.
- 215 Howard, above n 24, 9.
- 216 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 159, 77.
- 217 See Chapter 26 for further discussion.
- 218 Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, 14 [65]; Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 79.
- 219 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 159, 34.
- 220 Ibid.
- 221 Ibid.
- 222 Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, 14 [65].
- 223 Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 6.
- 224 Ibid 13 citing Lynette Robinson, 'Interventions and Restorative Responses to Address Teen Violence Against Parents' (The Winston Churchill Memorial Trust of Australia, January 2011).
- 225 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 14.
- 226 Victoria Police, above n 107, 13–14 [2.5.5].

- 227 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 13(b), 24(a).
- 228 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 24.
- 229 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 14.
- 230 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 24.
- 231 In relation to exclusion from the home under a Family Violence Intervention Order and responsibilities of the Department of Health and Human Services, see Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 82–4.
- 232 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 24. See also Statement of McWhirter, 27 July 2015, 37 [159].
- 233 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 69, 62.
- 234 See, eg, Commission for Children and Young People, “...as a good parent would...” Inquiry into the Adequacy of the Provision of Residential Care Services to Victorian Children and Young People Who Have Been Subject to Sexual Abuse or Sexual Exploitation Whilst Residing in Residential Care’ (August 2015) 11–13.
- 235 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 15.
- 236 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 43.
- 237 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 15.
- 238 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria and Children’s Court of Victoria, ‘160122 Children’s Court FV Data’ (27 February 2016), Tab 2, Court Breakdown: FV Original Applications Only, Children’s Court Only, Tab 3, Child Respondents: Melbourne Children’s Court, FV Only, provided to the Commission by the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria.
- 239 Includes all types of applications (Original, Extension, Variation and Revocation): Crime Statistics Agency, above n 2, Children’s Court data source, Tab 17, Table 17: Number of Affected Family Members on Applications Heard at Selected Courts, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.
- 240 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria and Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 37.
- 241 Children’s Court of Victoria, Court Network (18 December 2015) <<http://www.childrenscourt.vic.gov.au/about-us/support-services/court-network>>.
- 242 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 43–4 citing Laurence Steinberg, ‘Adolescent Development and Juvenile Justice’ (2009) 5 Annual Review of Clinical Psychology 459, 477–80.
- 243 Children’s Court of Victoria, above n 145; Children’s Court of Victoria, Youth Diversion Pilot Program (18 December 2015) <<http://www.childrenscourt.vic.gov.au/youth-diversion-pilot-program>>.
- 244 Jane Lee, ‘Andrews Government to Introduce Youth Diversion Program’, The Age (online), 2 February 2015 <<http://www.theage.com.au/victoria/andrews-government-to-introduce-youth-diversion-program-20150201-1334h0.html>>.
- 245 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, ‘Criminal Justice Diversion Program Review’ (2015), 17, provided by the State of Victoria in response to the Royal Commission’s request for information dated 20 November 2015.
- 246 Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) ss 59(2)(c).
- 247 Juliet Sironi et al, ‘Criminal Justice Diversion Program: Discussion Paper’ (Springvale Monash Legal Service, November 2006); Nino Bucci, ‘Victoria’s Chief Magistrate Orders Diversion Review’, The Age (online), 12 January 2015 <<http://www.theage.com.au/victoria/victorias-chief-magistrate-orders-diversion-review-20150107-12jnb5.html>>.
- 248 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, above n 245.
- 249 Sarah Curtis-Fawley and Kathleen Daly, ‘Gendered Violence and Restorative Justice: The Views of Victim Advocates’ (2005) 11(5) Violence Against Women 603, 627 states that diversion programs for abusive men send a powerful message that gendered violence is less deserving of legal sanction than other offences and that we must guard against practices which allow for the ‘privileging of men who abuse women and children’.
- 250 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, above n 245.
- 251 251 Centre for Innovative Justice, above n 23, 79.
- 252 252 Howard and Abbott, above n 25, 15, citing Daly and Nancarrow, above n 59, 35–6.
- 253 253 David Moore, above n 156.

24 Family violence and the family law system

Introduction

The immediate response to family violence is predominantly a matter for state courts, which hear applications for family violence intervention orders, criminal matters and matters involving Child Protection. However, the family law system, which is a federal responsibility, oversees disputes arising from the breakdown of relationships. This includes parenting and property disputes. Family violence is a common feature of family law disputes, particularly those that end up in court.

The relationship between the family law courts and the state courts is therefore an important one for anyone navigating the court system as a result of the ending of a marital or de facto relationship that involves family violence.

The first section of this chapter provides an overview of the family law system as it relates to family violence and the interaction between the federal family law courts and the state courts. It also discusses the jurisdiction that some state courts have under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

The next section of this chapter canvasses some of the key issues raised in evidence before this Commission about the relationship between the federal family law system and the state courts' response to family violence. The most consistent issue raised with the Commission was that navigating the state and federal systems is often confusing for court users, and that this can jeopardise the safety of people affected by family violence.

Reforms to overcome the problems caused by having to navigate different systems and difficulties in navigation have already been examined in several inquiries. The results of these inquiries include, but are not limited to, the Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions' 2010 report,¹ the 2015 interim report of the Family Law Council,² the 2015 evaluation of the 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act³ and most recently the Coronial Inquest into the death of Luke Batty.⁴ Recommendations in this area also date back to recommendations made in 2006 by the Victorian Law Reform Commission in its review of family violence laws.⁵

This Commission does not seek to revisit the work of previous bodies. The focus of our inquiry is on state laws and practices. We do, however, refer to some recommendations made in earlier inquiries and make recommendations to build upon or supplement their proposals for reform.

The Commission recommends a number of changes to the practice of the state courts to clarify the interaction between the state courts and the family law system, and to assist parties and their representatives to understand that interaction. We also make recommendations that the Victorian Government pursue with the Commonwealth Government the creation of a single database for family violence, child protection and family law matters for all state and commonwealth courts and agencies; a nationally consistent approach to family violence risk assessment; and formal information-sharing arrangements between the state courts and the federal family courts to coordinate the responses to family violence at a state and federal level.

Context and current practice

This section provides an overview of the family law system as it relates to family violence. It then outlines the circumstances in which state courts exercise jurisdiction under the Family Law Act.

The interaction between the federal family law system and the state courts in relation to family violence is a complex one. The division of responsibility between the Victorian courts and the federal family courts is a result of the division of legislative power between the states and the Commonwealth in the Australian Constitution.⁶ The state courts are responsible for making family violence intervention orders (FVIOs)⁷ and hearing and determining applications relating to the protection of children as part of Victoria's child protection system.⁸

As this first section outlines, family law disputes about parenting and property division are generally decided in the federal family system, but the state courts also have limited jurisdiction to determine property and parenting disputes under the Family Law Act. The challenges raised by this are canvassed in the Challenges and opportunities section that follows.

The federal family law system and family violence

Family violence is 'core business' in the federal family courts⁹ and research suggests that 'people affected by family violence and/or child abuse are the core client base of the formal parts of the federal family law system: family dispute resolution services, lawyers and courts'.¹⁰

The Commonwealth Family Law Act governs divorce, disputes regarding parental responsibility for children, and financial matters (such as the division of property) arising out of the breakdown of a relationship.

In Victoria, powers under the Family Law Act are exercised by:

- ▷ the Federal Circuit Court of Australia (FCC)
- ▷ the Family Court of Australia (Family Court)
- ▷ the Magistrates' Court of Victoria (Magistrates' Court).

The Children's Court of Victoria may also be able to exercise family law jurisdiction in certain circumstances: this is discussed further below.

The Family Court has been operating since 1976, and is a specialist court.¹¹ The FCC, which was formerly known as the Federal Magistrates' Court, opened in 2000.¹²

The Family Court and FCC, which are referred to collectively in this chapter as 'federal family courts', have registries in central Melbourne and Dandenong. All applications to the Family Court and the FCC are filed in the same location, and the courts have a common enquiry centre to provide information about both courts.¹³ In Victoria, the FCC's family law list operates in Melbourne, Dandenong, Ballarat, Bendigo, Castlemaine, Cobram, Geelong, Morwell, Hamilton, Mildura, Shepparton and Warrnambool.¹⁴

Since the creation of the FCC, the balance of family law work has shifted from the Family Court to the FCC.¹⁵ The FCC now hears approximately 85 per cent of family law disputes that come before the family law courts.¹⁶

The division of work between the Family Court and the FCC is governed by a protocol between the two courts.¹⁷ The protocol provides that the FCC ordinarily deals with all matters falling within its jurisdiction unless one of a number of specified criteria applies. These criteria include a serious allegation of sexual or physical abuse of a child, or allegations of serious controlling family violence. The Family Court hears cases where these allegations are made.¹⁸

Family law services

There are a number of ways for people to make parenting and financial arrangements following a separation that do not require involvement of the federal family courts.

If required, Commonwealth-funded services are available to assist with resolving disputes about care and contact arrangements for children. These include:

- ▷ family relationship centres which provide services such as family dispute resolution (FDR), information and referrals, counselling and parenting education
- ▷ FDR/mediation to resolve disputes, which is compulsory in parenting disputes before applying to a court to determine the dispute, with an exemption for cases of family violence¹⁹
- ▷ children's contact centres, which enable children of separated parents to have safe contact with the parent they do not live with where family violence or child abuse is an issue
- ▷ the Parenting Orders Program, which helps high conflict separated families to work out parenting arrangements
- ▷ family law counselling to help families discuss any issues to do with children and family during a relationship, separation or divorce
- ▷ Supporting Children After Separation programs, which provide counselling and support to children, young people, and their families.²⁰

There are also a range of pre-court processes used by parties to reach resolution of property disputes following separation. These include lawyer-to-lawyer negotiation, collaborative law processes, mediation and arbitration.²¹

FDR (usually mediation) is an important part of the family law process. It is compulsory for couples who have a parenting dispute to participate in FDR before applying to a court to determine the dispute,²² but an exemption applies where the court is satisfied there has been, or is a risk of abuse of a child or family violence.²³ A person who wants to rely on this exemption must also indicate to the court, in writing, that they have received information from a family counsellor or family dispute resolution practitioner about available services and options (including alternatives to court action) in circumstances of abuse or violence.²⁴

Where a person does not seek to rely on the family violence exemption from the outset of proceedings and embarks on compulsory FDR, a family dispute resolution practitioner must be satisfied that an assessment of the parties has been conducted and that dispute resolution is appropriate.²⁵ The practitioner must consider whether the ability of any party to negotiate freely in the dispute is affected by one of the following:

- ▷ a history of family violence (if any) among the parties
- ▷ the likely safety of the parties
- ▷ the equality of bargaining power among the parties
- ▷ the risk that a child may suffer abuse
- ▷ the emotional, psychological and physical health of the parties
- ▷ any other relevant matter.²⁶

If the family dispute resolution practitioner is not satisfied that it would be appropriate to commence or continue dispute resolution, the practitioner must not provide family dispute resolution²⁷ and may issue a certificate to that effect.²⁸

Family law reforms relevant to family violence

Major changes to the Family Law Act²⁹ and the practice of family courts came into effect in June 2012. The aim of these 2012 reforms was to improve the response of the family law system to family violence and, as a consequence, the ability of federal family law to protect children from harm.³⁰

The reforms were introduced in response to research that demonstrated the need for changes to the handling of family violence and child safety matters.³¹ Under previous reforms (in 2006), the Family Law Act had placed equal importance on promoting a meaningful relationship between a child and both parents and protecting the child from any harm.³² The 2012 amendments³³

- ▷ require the court to give greater weight to 'the need to protect the child from physical and psychological harm from being subjected or exposed to abuse, neglect or family violence', than to the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both parents³⁴
- ▷ expand the definition of 'family violence' to include coercion and control and capture the full range of behaviour that constitutes family violence³⁵
- ▷ introduce obligations for advisers (including lawyers and other support service professionals)³⁶ to encourage a parent to act on the basis that the best interests of the child requires the child's protection from abuse, neglect or violence³⁷
- ▷ require a party to proceedings to advise the court of family violence orders and care arrangements made under child welfare laws³⁸
- ▷ impose an obligation on courts to actively inquire about the risk of family violence or abuse;³⁹ to ensure that orders are consistent with any family violence order and do not expose any person to an unacceptable risk of violence;⁴⁰ and to deal promptly with matters involving family violence allegations⁴¹
- ▷ remove the 'friendly parent' provision, which required courts to take into account the 'willingness and ability of each of a child's parents to facilitate and encourage a close and continuing relationship between the child and the other parent'.⁴² This provision had been criticised for failing to recognise that action may need to be taken by one parent to protect themselves and their child from family violence, for example, by avoiding contact with a violent ex-partner⁴³
- ▷ require a court, when assessing a child's best interests, to consider any state or territory family violence order that applies to the child or a member of the child's family.⁴⁴ Previously, a court was only required to consider these orders if they were final or contested orders.

In 2015, the Australian Institute of Family Studies evaluated the effect of these amendments by surveying judicial, legal and non-legal professionals across the family law system, asking parents about their experiences of the family law system, and extracting information from court files and published judgments.⁴⁵ The evaluation found that the reforms led to more professionals (including family dispute resolution practitioners/mediators, lawyers and court staff) asking parents about family violence and safety concerns. However, in 2014 close to three in 10 parents reported never being asked about these issues. The evaluation also found that the reforms resulted in a small increase in the proportion of parents disclosing family violence and/or safety concerns to family dispute resolution services, lawyers and courts, with a particular increase in fathers disclosing family violence and safety concerns to lawyers. Professionals also reported increased confidence in their ability to identify violence.⁴⁶

The evaluation also found that parents' perceptions of professional responses to family violence had not improved since the 2012 reforms.⁴⁷ This was mirrored by the views of professionals who doubted the capacity of the family law system to deal adequately with cases involving family violence.⁴⁸ The evaluation report observed that the addition of section 60CC(2A) to the Family Law Act, which requires the court to give greater weight to protecting a child from the risk of family violence, has had limited effect, especially where there was any ambiguity associated with the allegations of family violence or child abuse.⁴⁹ The evaluation also revealed concerns about the risk-screening tool used in the family law system.⁵⁰

Overall, the evaluation indicated that the 2012 reforms had a greater influence on identification and screening practices than they had on patterns in parenting arrangements.⁵¹

The 2015 Australian Institute of Family Studies noted:

The evidence of poorer wellbeing for children where mothers have safety concerns—across the range of parenting arrangements, but particularly acutely in shared care-time arrangements—highlights the importance of identifying families where safety concerns are pertinent and assisting them to make arrangements that promote the wellbeing of their children.

This evaluation has highlighted the complex and varied issues faced by separating parents and their children and the importance of having a range of services that can effectively respond. This requires a family law system that operates in a coordinated, timely and child-focused manner. Ultimately, while there are many perspectives within the family law system and, many conflicting needs, it is important to maintain the primacy of focusing on the best interests of children and protecting all family members from harm.⁵²

Family consultants

Family consultants are social workers or psychologists who are appointed by the family courts to assist the court in making decisions about children.⁵³ In cases involving children, family courts may order parties (and/or their children) to attend an appointment with a family consultant.⁵⁴ The court may also direct a more detailed report on any particular matters relevant to the proceedings.⁵⁵

The functions of the family consultant include assisting and advising people and courts in proceedings, as well as giving evidence in proceedings.⁵⁶ Their functions also include screening for family violence.⁵⁷ Family reports are admissible as evidence in court, as are records of all the family consultant's dealings with the family.⁵⁸

The 2012 reforms introduced new obligations for family consultants. In particular, if family consultants give advice or assistance to a person about matters concerning a child, the consultant must inform the person that they should regard the best interests of the child as the paramount consideration.⁵⁹ Family consultants must then encourage the person to act in a way that meets the child's best interests by giving priority to protection of the child from physical or psychological harm over the aim of ensuring the child has a meaningful relationship with both of his or her parents.⁶⁰

Family law injunctions

As discussed in Chapter 16, a victim of family violence can apply to the Magistrates' Court for an FVIO. An alternative to seeking an FVIO is an injunction for personal protection made under the Family Law Act.

A person who has experienced family violence can commence proceedings in a court exercising federal family law jurisdiction and seek an injunction for personal protection. The court may grant an injunction for the personal protection of a child, a parent, or a person who is to spend time with, or communicate with a child, or with whom the child is to live under a parenting order, or a person who has parental responsibility for the child.⁶¹ The orders that may be made under the Family Law Act are similar to an FVIO, for example, they may prohibit a person entering a home or workplace, or entering or remaining in a specified area.⁶²

If a police officer believes, on reasonable grounds, that an injunction for personal protection has been breached, the Family Law Act gives a state, territory or federal police officer⁶³ the power to arrest the respondent without a warrant.⁶⁴ The power to arrest provides relief to victims of family violence in limited circumstances. Once arrested, the police must bring the person before the federal family court by the close of business on the day following the arrest, or the first day after a weekend or public holiday.⁶⁵ The effect of the injunction is that once at court, the protected person makes an application to seek contravention of the injunction.⁶⁶ If they do not, the person who is the subject of the injunction will be released. The effect of an injunction can result in a range of sanctions, including imprisonment for serious breaches.⁶⁷

The Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions have recognised that there are benefits to FVIOs over federal injunctions, including that police are more familiar with enforcing state protection order proceedings (FVIOs).⁶⁸ Research also suggests that injunctions for personal protection are 'inaccessible and ineffective, and therefore rarely used'.⁶⁹

In its submission, the Family Law Council noted that injunctions made by the federal courts are rarely enforced by state police,⁷⁰ despite the benefit to victims of seeking protective orders in one court rather than two:

... in situations where parties are already involved in litigation in the Family Court or Federal Circuit Court and they then need a family violence order, we suggest that it is of benefit to those parties and their children, and of benefit to the efficient administration of justice, that personal protection injunctions are made under the Family Law Act, and that they are capable of enforcement by State police. To do so avoids people experiencing family violence in this situation from having to issue new proceedings in the State Court.⁷¹

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence does not reflect the fact that state police have the power to arrest for breach of an injunction. It states:

Use of Family Law Act injunction or restraining orders

If there are proceedings under way in the Family Court, the AFM [affected family member] may seek an injunction or restraining order under ss.68B or 114 of the Family Law Act 1975. However, due to jurisdictional boundaries between State and Commonwealth legislation and the complications in investigating Commonwealth offences, the preferred course of action is the seeking of an order under the FVPA [Family Violence Protection Act].

What police do if there is a contravention of a Family Law Act order

Victoria police can only investigate Commonwealth offences that are incidental to State offences. Therefore when any contravention of a Family Law Act 1975 order occurs, Victoria Police refer the contravention to the Australian Federal Police. The Australian Federal Police do not enforce Family Law Act orders without process by the Family Court or Federal Magistrates' Court.⁷²

The Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions have previously recommended that the Family Law Act be amended to provide that a breach of an injunction for personal protection is a criminal offence,⁷³ so as to clearly indicate to state authorities the need to enforce such orders.

The creation of this criminal offence would remove the onus from the victim of family violence to bring the application for contravention of the injunction. It would relieve the victim of having to undertake possibly costly family law proceedings to enforce the injunction and reinforce the message that family violence is not a private matter, but a criminal offence of public concern.⁷⁴

To date, the Commonwealth Government has opted not to implement this recommendation.

The Australian and NSW Law Reform Commissions also suggested that training for police in relation to their powers and duties under the Family Law Act would be beneficial, as would including injunctions for personal protection in the national personal protection order registration scheme to help make state and territory police aware of the existence of Commonwealth orders.⁷⁵

Victorian courts and the family law system

Magistrates' Court powers under the Family Law Act

Under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), if a victim of family violence applies for an FVIO in the Magistrates' Court, they may be granted an FVIO with conditions regarding the respondent's contact with their children⁷⁶ and conditions directing the respondent to return the protected person's personal property.⁷⁷ Under the Family Law Act, the Magistrates' Court has limited jurisdiction to determine family law matters, including determining disputes regarding children⁷⁸ and property and financial matters.⁷⁹

As described in Chapter 16, the Magistrates' Court is challenged by high demand and limited resources. As a consequence, in recent years the court has significantly reduced the exercise of its family law jurisdiction. The number of family law matters finalised in the Magistrates' Court declined between 2000–01 and 2013–14, from just over 3000 to 1211.⁸⁰ The number of family law matters transferred to the family courts has also decreased over the same period.⁸¹

Figure 24.1 Family law matters, Magistrates' Court of Victoria, 2000–01 to 2013–14

Source: Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 23.

Parenting orders

Parenting orders set out care arrangements for children.⁸² People can agree to the court making consent orders about parenting matters.⁸³ If agreement cannot be reached, the dispute can be heard by a federal family court or, in limited circumstances, the Magistrates' Court.

The Magistrates' Court has the power to make final and interim parenting orders under the Family Law Act. These powers include:

- ▷ Final parenting orders. A magistrate has the power to make parenting orders by consent and has the power to hear contested matters if the parties consent to the matter being heard and determined in the Magistrates' Court.⁸⁴ Parties must first be informed that if they do not consent, the Magistrates' Court will be required to transfer the matter to the Family Court or FCC.⁸⁵
- ▷ Interim parenting orders. In the absence of consent, a magistrate has the power to make any order they consider necessary, such as an interim parenting order, before the matter is transferred to the Family Court or FCC.⁸⁶
- ▷ Parenting plans. In circumstances where the Magistrates' Court does have jurisdiction to make a parenting order, the Family Law Act provides that the court must have regard to the terms of the most recent parenting plan (if any) that has been entered into between the child's parents if doing so would be in the best interests of the child.⁸⁷ Parenting plans are written agreements between parents that are not legally enforceable,⁸⁸ but can be taken into account by the courts in making parenting orders.⁸⁹

Where the Magistrates' Court decides to make an FVIO, and the protected person or respondent is a parent of a child, the court must ask whether there is a Family Law Act order in place in relation to the child.⁹⁰ If the magistrate is satisfied that there is a parenting order in place, the magistrate is required to revive, vary, suspend or (in the case of final FVIOs only) discharge the parenting order to the extent that the parenting order is inconsistent with the FVIO,⁹¹ provided that there is new material before the Magistrates' Court that was not before the court at the time the existing parenting order was made.⁹² For example, a magistrate may suspend the operation of a parenting order that provides for the child to spend time with the respondent to the FVIO (the perpetrator), if there has allegedly been violence since the parenting order was made.

Currently, the Family Law Act limits the effect of an interim family violence order made by a magistrate to revive, vary or suspend a parenting order, to a maximum of 21 days.⁹³ Because of the time limitation, a person who believes their child is unsafe must go to a federal family court to have the earlier parenting order altered within the 21-day period.

When there is no parenting order under the Family Law Act, the Magistrates' Court can impose conditions about a child's contact with a respondent parent in an FVIO, if the court decides that contact with the parent will or may jeopardise the safety of the child.⁹⁴ Conditions in an FVIO may relate to arrangements for the child to live with, spend time with or communicate with the respondent, handover arrangements, and conditions relating to how care and contact arrangements can be negotiated.⁹⁵ FVIOs can remain in force for a period as specified in the order.⁹⁶ It is open to a parent to apply to a federal family court for a parenting order while an FVIO is in place. If a parenting order is made, conditions of that order will override any inconsistent conditions in an existing FVIO.⁹⁷

Property orders

The Magistrates' Court also has the power to hear cases relating to the division of property in family violence cases, both under the Family Law Act and the Family Violence Protection Act.

The Family Violence Protection Act permits magistrates to include personal property conditions in an FVIO.⁹⁸ Those conditions can include the return of property, and conditions requiring furniture and appliances to remain at a residence.⁹⁹ The Family Law Act gives magistrates the power to hear cases relating to division of property, up to a total value of $20,000 or to an unlimited value with the parties' consent.¹⁰⁰ The monetary limit of the Magistrates' Court family law property jurisdiction increased from $1,000 to $20,000 in 1988.¹⁰¹

In their study of economic abuse, Camilleri, Corrie and Moore found that despite this power, magistrates often leave property matters to the family law courts:

There was no evidence of these mechanisms being used in the case studies. All financial and/or property matters were characterised as property issues which were left to the Family Court of Australia to deal with ...¹⁰²

It is not clear how many applications are brought in the Magistrates' Court for property settlements under the Family Law Act. However, given that the number of family law orders being made in the Magistrates' Court decreased overall from 2000–01 to 2013–14,¹⁰³ it is likely that fewer property settlement applications are being made to the Magistrates' Court.

Children's Court powers

The Family Division of the Children's Court of Victoria has jurisdiction to deal with both applications for FVIOs¹⁰⁴ and matters relating to Child Protection.¹⁰⁵

The Commission heard that there is uncertainty in Victoria as to whether the Children's Court also has power to make orders under the Family Law Act and whether the Court is a 'court of summary jurisdiction for the relevant provisions in the Family Law Act'.¹⁰⁶ The Magistrates' Court Bench Book and Family Law Manual both express some uncertainty as to whether the Children's Court has jurisdiction to hear Family Law Act matters.¹⁰⁷

In 2006, the Victorian Law Reform Commission recognised that:

It may be the case that the Children's Court decides that grounds for an intervention order are present for the adult, but not for the child. In this case, it may be necessary for the court to make an order about any child contact arrangements that may occur between the applicant and respondent. Alternatively, if the court makes an order on behalf of a child, it may be necessary to suspend a Family Court contact order if one already exists.¹⁰⁸

The Victorian Law Reform Commission recommended a legislative amendment to declare the Children's Court a court of summary jurisdiction so that it could exercise powers under the Family Law Act in the same way that the Magistrates' Court can exercise these powers.¹⁰⁹ This recommendation was not implemented by the Victorian Government.

Subsequent commissions and bodies have also made recommendations to give state children's courts Family Law Act jurisdiction. The Australian Law Reform Commission and the NSW Law Reform Commission's 2010 report recommended a variation to the Family Law Act,¹¹⁰ and the 2015 Family Law Council's interim report recommended that sections 69J and 69N of the Family Law Act be amended to remove doubt about the power of the Children's Court to make Family Law Act orders.¹¹¹ The Commission notes that despite many recommendations to amend the legislation, the Commonwealth Government has not yet made these amendments.

The Magistrates' Court and Children's Court in their joint submission, suggested that the amendments should be made.¹¹² They recommended that the Commission:

clarify the capacity of the Children's Court to exercise federal family law jurisdiction as a court of summary jurisdiction for the purposes of s69J of the Act (and associated amendments to the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 to facilitate this).¹¹³

Challenges and opportunities

This section discusses the challenges raised in evidence about the interaction of the family law system and the state courts. These range from high-level concerns about the difficulty in navigating the dual systems, to practical concerns about aspects of their operation.

The Commission heard many criticisms of the federal family law system's response to family violence. While it is appropriate to acknowledge these criticisms, the Commission cannot investigate the accuracy of accounts of particular cases. The Commission also recognises that some submissions made to the Commission about experiences of the family law system may relate to experiences prior to the 2012 Family Law Act reforms.

Navigating multiple legal systems

The purpose of the federal family law system is to resolve private disputes arising out of the breakdown of relationships, including disputes about parental responsibility for children and financial matters.¹¹⁴ In family violence proceedings, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria focuses on maximising safety for 'children and adults who have experienced family violence', preventing and reducing risk and promoting 'the accountability of perpetrators of family violence'.¹¹⁵ The Victorian child protection system provides, among other things, for state intervention when a child is in need of protection.¹¹⁶

More than one court may be involved when there are children. A victim of family violence can apply for an FVIO in the Magistrates' Court and may be granted an FVIO with conditions regarding the respondent's contact with the children. The respondent (the perpetrator) may then file proceedings in the FCC for a parenting order. At the same time, Child Protection may file proceedings in the Children's Court on the basis that it has care and protection concerns for the children. The applicant, the respondent, and their children may all experience three separate courts and jurisdictions.

The issue of ‘fragmentation’ between court systems was a common theme in evidence before the Commission. The Family Law Council has commented that for families with complex legal needs, multiple court involvement is ‘confusing, repetitive and incoherent’.¹¹⁷

Disputes cannot be neatly divided into private and public areas of law and parties will often have to institute or be engaged in proceedings in various legal forums to have all of their issues determined ... The overlapping jurisdictions cause significant angst for the parties involved and considerable difficulties for the courts.¹¹⁸

Many people who made submissions and spoke to the Commission talked of the difficulties they have experienced as the result of having to deal with more than one court. In addition to the complexity, expense and confusion they experienced, their engagement with different courts required them to re-tell their story and re-justify their position. As expressed in an anonymous submission to the Commission:

The family court can’t know about proceedings in criminal courts. Police intervention orders are somehow handled separately from magistrates’ intervention orders, which are in turn handled separately from family court orders. Psychological and psychiatric assessments of both [Removed] and her children, obtained for one court, are not presentable in the next court; no, they have to be done again. Imagine how much time this takes and the stress this causes. Imagine getting [Removed] children, traumatised and intimidated by their father, to again and again re-tell their story.¹¹⁹

The involvement of so many parts of the justice system may also result in victims ‘falling into the gaps’. As observed by the Australian and NSW Law Reform Commissions:

the problems faced by victims required engagement with several parts of the system. Consequently ... these people could be referred from court to court, and agency to agency, with the risk that they may fall into the gaps in the system and not obtain the legal solutions—and the protection—that they require.¹²⁰

Other inquiries have considered various proposals to overcome the need for victims of family violence to navigate multiple legal systems. These include:

- ▷ establishing a single federal court to hear all matters relating to family violence¹²¹
- ▷ expanding the jurisdiction of family courts to include the power to make child protection orders¹²²
- ▷ giving some courts corresponding jurisdictions so they can decide cases under both systems.¹²³

Ultimately the Australian and NSW Law Reform Commissions recommended that jurisdictional fragmentation was best addressed by working within constitutional and practical limits and using the powers of federal and state courts dealing with family violence, child protection and family law matters, to create a more seamless system.¹²⁴

Magistrates’ exercise of family law powers

In their joint report, the Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions observed that:

State and territory magistrates courts are often the first point of contact with the legal system for separating families who have experienced family violence. As such, the Commissions consider that it is important that state and territory magistrates courts can deal with as many issues relating to the protection of victims of family violence as possible.¹²⁵

The Commission heard that magistrates are reluctant to exercise their powers under the Family Law Act. Women's Legal Service Victoria submitted that:

There are a number of potential implications of a 'hands off' approach by the Magistrates' Court to family law issues. A culture of deference to FLA orders can result in Magistrates referring applicants to the Federal Circuit Court for matters that could be dealt with by the lower court. While we support the principle that the specialist family law jurisdiction is best placed to make orders relating to children this results in a 'revolving door' for women seeking protection, and the stress, cost and potential for re-traumatisation that flows from constant court appearances.¹²⁶

The reluctance of magistrates to exercise these powers may be due to:

- the complexity of the provisions and uncertainty about some aspects of both the FLA [Family Law Act] and FVPA [Family Violence Protection Act] provisions;
- a lack of time in busy family violence lists for Magistrates to adequately deal with issues related to parenting arrangements;
- lack of family law expertise of some Magistrates and
- inadequacy of the 21 day time limit applying to s68R variations in interim family violence matters.¹²⁷

The Springvale Monash Legal Service (SMLS) submitted that magistrates may be reluctant to use their powers under the Family Law Act because they believe that the family courts are better able to deal with parenting matters:

In one case in the Magistrates' Court, SMLS argued that the Court should use its power to vary a parenting order because the respondent was using a communication book required under the order to continue committing family violence. The magistrate refused to exercise that power indicating it was a 'family law matter'. This is not an isolated incident; indeed, in our experience, magistrates are frequently reluctant to use their powers based on an assumption or belief that such matters are best dealt with in either the Family Court or Federal Circuit Court. It is costly and time consuming for a victim to make a further application in the Family Court to limit or prevent a violent parent from spending time with a child.¹²⁸

Deputy Chief Magistrate Felicity Broughton of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria told the Commission:

The reality is we have family law jurisdiction. We have power to make interim orders, and we do, primarily in the country because of lack of access to Family Courts ... Clearly in metropolitan Melbourne you have the Dandenong registry and the Melbourne registry. So people don't come to the Melbourne Magistrates' Court in particular for parenting orders, which is the main sort of orders that are involved. We do get child support matters coming to our court. But really in this area that's probably the main reason. Can I also say the court does not get a cent to exercise its family law jurisdiction, but we recognise it's incredibly important in this area. So, notwithstanding that, we do the work where we can.¹²⁹

The Commission heard that more time, not just more resources, is needed for magistrates to exercise their powers under the Family Law Act, or to ensure that people are appropriately referred to a federal family court. Duty lawyers also need more time to advise people on these matters.¹³⁰

In order to simplify the decision-making process in disputes relating to children, the Family Law Council in its interim report recommended amendments to the Family Law Act to allow magistrates to prepare short-form judgments in support of interim parenting orders.¹³¹

Family law resources for magistrates

In Victoria, the Judicial College of Victoria publishes the Family Violence Bench Book, a resource funded by the Department of Justice.¹³² The Bench Book provides guidance to magistrates and other judicial officers on family violence and the exercise of their powers under the Family Violence Protection Act. It also contains content relating to the exercise of the Magistrates' Court's powers under the Family Law Act in family violence cases.¹³³ In its submission to the Commission, the Judicial College recommended that funding be made available to update this resource.¹³⁴

A National Family Violence Bench Book was announced by the Commonwealth Government, as recommended by the Australian and the NSW Law Reform Commissions.¹³⁵ The resource is expected to be available in June 2017.¹³⁶

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the Children's Court of Victoria told the Commission:

To respond to the complexity of family violence proceedings; magistrates, court staff and legal practitioners must have access to comprehensive and accessible cross jurisdictional specialist family violence professional development. A significant barrier has been that individual jurisdictions have been approached in silos. The impact is felt in different ways. For instance, in relation to magistrates and court staff, there are no dedicated federal resources to support the exercise of the family law jurisdiction in the state MCV and CCV. All professional development, including the creation of dedicated written materials is essentially produced from within existing resources. The court also understands that the JCV is not funded to provide professional development for the federal Family Law jurisdiction.¹³⁷

The Magistrates' Court is further assisted by the comprehensive Family Law Manual, developed by the Court to assist magistrates to exercise their limited jurisdiction to determine family law matters.¹³⁸ The Commission notes that this manual is yet to be updated regarding magistrates' powers to make property orders.

Further discussion regarding judicial education can be found in Chapter 40.

Application forms

To empower parties to FVIO proceedings to ask the Magistrates' Court to exercise its family law jurisdiction, the Australian and NSW Law Reform Commissions recommended that application forms for FVIOs should include an option for the applicant to seek the revival, variation, discharge or suspension of a parenting order.¹³⁹ A similar recommendation was made by former State Coroner, Judge Ian Gray, in the Luke Batty inquest:

I recommend that the Magistrates' Court of Victoria revise the form and content of FVIOs to ensure they are written in clear and unambiguous language. This should include clarity in relation to the operation of section 68R of the Family Law Act 1975.¹⁴⁰

The Australian and the New South Wales Law Reform Commissions also made recommendations about the exercise of state courts' jurisdiction to make property orders:

Recommendation 16–10 Application forms for protection orders under state and territory family violence legislation should clearly seek information about property orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) or any pending application for such orders.

This recommendation has not been implemented in Victoria.¹⁴¹

The Commission notes that currently, if an applicant wishes to seek a parenting or property order in the Magistrates' Court, he or she may institute proceedings in that court by filing the same initiating application form that would be filed for equivalent proceedings in any federal family court. The initiating application form includes an option for the applicant to select or indicate that the form is being filed in a court 'other' than the Family Court, the FCC or the Family Court of Western Australia. The Commission further notes that neither the initiating application form or its information kit indicates that the applicant may seek the making of a parenting order or property order in a state magistrates' court.

Time limit on parenting orders

The Commission received several submissions regarding the inadequacy of the 21-day limit on orders made by the Magistrates' Court to revive, discharge, vary or suspend a parenting order upon the making of an interim FVIO.¹⁴²

Essentially, the onus is placed on the victim of family violence to apply to the federal family courts as soon as possible before the 21-day period expires, if they wish the effect of the order (for example, the variation or suspension of a Family Law Act order) to continue.¹⁴³

Judge Gray recommended to the Family Law Council that the 21-day time limit be removed, and that a magistrate's order to revive, discharge, vary or suspend a parenting order should operate until further order of the court.¹⁴⁴

Judge Gray's recommendation is reflected in the Family Law Amendment (Financial Agreements and Other Measures) Bill 2015. The Bill, which was introduced on 25 November 2015, proposes to remove the 21-day time limit and allow for orders to last until either the interim intervention order expires; a date specified in the order; or by further order of the court.¹⁴⁵ This effectively places the onus on the respondent to initiate the application to the Family Court to vary the terms of the order.

Property orders

The consequences of delayed property settlements for victims of family violence can be highlighted by the following case study provided to the Commission:

Issues to do with property settlement escalated Sean's violence. Katie wanted to buy Sean's share of the property from him and take over the mortgage so that she could stay in the home with their children. This was a real challenge given Katie's limited income and the fact that she is the primary carer for her children. Katie's brother offered to co-sign the mortgage so she could continue to live in the home. Sean also wanted this to happen, but had not sought any external advice and continued to drag out the process. Katie's lawyers needed to deal directly with Sean, which took more time and cost Katie more money.

In the meantime, Sean continued to harass Katie for money. Although Katie generally refused to give him money, he continued to harass her. The protracted nature of this property settlement caused Sean's violence against Katie to escalate.¹⁴⁶

Resolving property disputes in the federal family courts can be expensive. The Commission heard that 'the process in the Family Court and the [FCC] is excessively legalistic and onerous',¹⁴⁷ that it involves substantial costs, long delays and that many victims of family violence are simply not able to navigate it without legal assistance.¹⁴⁸

While Victoria Legal Aid can assist victims of family violence with resolving underlying family relationship issues relating to property, it is constrained in doing so.¹⁴⁹ Ms Nicole Rich, Director, Family, Youth and Children's Law Services at Victoria Legal Aid, noted that Victoria Legal Aid's 'guidelines focus principally on parenting matters. So there's very limited funding available for resolving property matters'.¹⁵⁰ Many submissions addressed these legal aid funding constraints.¹⁵¹

These barriers often result in victims foregoing their right to property, especially if the asset pool is small.¹⁵² A recent study on legal responses to economic abuse found that:

When settlement amounts were quite small, it was not worth spending the additional money to seek justice. Costs could be further compounded by abusers intentionally delaying settlement. This meant that women were further marginalised financially. The less they had, the less they ended up with.¹⁵³

Ms Helen Matthews, Principal Lawyer, Women's Legal Service Victoria, noted:

Private practitioners would not recommend taking on a matter unless the client was likely to gain a property settlement (non-superannuation) of not less than $50,000. Many women are seeking the apportionment of debt rather than assets.¹⁵⁴

The high cost of litigation was also highlighted to the Commission:

... in my situation $20,000 was admitted to by my ex-husband in total assets in Court, I settled for $10,000, approximately $8,700 was taken by legal fees leaving me with just under $1,300, no house and no car. With only $1,300 I had to re-establish a home for my children and myself. Within 12 months of separating my ex-husband had "found" $150,000 to purchase an apartment.¹⁵⁵

In its submission, Women's Legal Service Victoria advocated the resolution of small property claims in the Magistrates' Court:

[WLSV] would support a court model that also allows for determination of small property pool claims (where the property pool is, for example, less than $50,000). The reason for enabling a one court model to determine small property pool claims is that for women that experience significant disadvantage, the cost of pursuing a family law case for a car or access to a bank account with a small pool of savings or a share of their former partner's superannuation is simply not realistic. Yet, access to a small amount of money or a car or superannuation may well be critical to their recovery (particularly their financial recovery) from family violence.¹⁵⁶

Explaining orders

The Commission heard that court users were often confused about how an FVIO interacts with a Family Law Act order. A parenting order that provides for a child to spend time with a person, or expressly or impliedly requires or authorises a person to spend time with a child, overrides an FVIO to the extent of any inconsistency.¹⁵⁷ An exception to this is where a magistrate has power to revive, vary, discharge or suspend the parenting order.¹⁵⁸ A mother of three children who told the Commission she had endured 13 years of violence from her former husband, said:

Family Court orders overriding IVOs puts families at risk. Having to face an abuser each week in order to act within the law is a hideous experience and a practice only ordered in family matters. It is unnatural for a child to be driven to his father at the front of a police station by a scared and stressed mother. This is court ordered I was bound to do this. At these access visits he has suffered emotional, psychological and alleged physical and sexual abuse. My son was groomed and coerced by his father to attend these visits. He is now older and wise to this and no longer wants to see his father and at [removed] years old is frightened of him. Due to this court ordered unsupervised access my son now suffers from depression and anxiety and is unable to attend secondary school due to this.¹⁵⁹

The difficulties that people had in understanding the effect of orders were canvassed by Judge Gray. The inquest heard that Magistrate Goldsbrough issued a 'no contact' FVIO against Mr Greg Anderson, in relation to Ms Rosie Batty and her son Luke.¹⁶⁰ The FVIO conflicted with a parenting order made by consent in the Family Court over seven years earlier, which provided that Luke should have weekly contact with his father.¹⁶¹ Magistrate Goldsbrough suspended the operation of the Family Court order.¹⁶² Issues which arose in relation to this suspension included:

- ▷ for reasons that are unclear, the terms of the FVIO suspending the operation of the federal order were not reproduced in the FVIO¹⁶³
- ▷ Ms Batty was confused about how the suspension worked¹⁶⁴
- ▷ the suspended order and the FVIO were not served on Mr Anderson until after the 21-day suspension period and so the FVIO had no effect in relation to Luke¹⁶⁵
- ▷ as proceedings were not filed in a federal family court to have the parenting order amended, it was legally open to Mr Anderson to argue that he could rely on the Family Court order and the contact provisions in that order, despite any restrictions on his contact in the FVIO.¹⁶⁶

In its 2006 report, the Victorian Law Reform Commission recommended that:

When magistrates make an intervention order for a child or including a child, the magistrate should make it clear to the respondent that there must be no contact between the child and the respondent unless the Family Court or the Federal Magistrates' Court later decide otherwise. If there is a contact order in place, such orders should be suspended pursuant to section 68T of the Family Law Act 1975. This should be clearly stated on the intervention order.¹⁶⁷

The Commission notes that under the Family Law Act, when a court makes a parenting order, it has a duty to include in the order particulars of the obligations that the order creates and the consequences that may follow if a person contravenes the order.¹⁶⁸ The Act also requires the court to explain to a person who is not legally represented, the availability of programs to understand their responsibilities under the parenting order.¹⁶⁹

Under the Family Violence Protection Act, when a magistrate makes an interim FVIO, the appropriate registrar of the court has an obligation to provide the parties with a written explanation of the FVIO in a prescribed form, that includes how the order interacts with a Family Law Act order, or an order made under the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic).¹⁷⁰ The prescribed form also requires a written explanation of the purpose, terms and effect of the interim FVIO,¹⁷¹ when a court varies or suspends a family law order.¹⁷²

The Commission notes that when a final FVIO is made by the court, the court is required to explain to the protected person and the respondent, if they are before the court, the terms and effects of the FVIO, among other things.¹⁷³ There is no specific requirement that the court explain how that final order interacts with an existing Family Law Act order.

Access to comprehensive legal advice

Submissions received by the Commission argued that it was essential that victims and respondents to FVIOs receive legal advice on family law issues. Both parenting and property law matters may be complex and people affected by family violence may have difficulty in navigating these issues without legal assistance. As the Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice found:

Often survivors were unaware of the available legal channels, and women and workers alike emphasised the need for greater access to affordable legal advocacy, not only preceding and on the court appearance date, but also to address women's unmet legal needs surrounding family violence and family law matters more generally, as well as property issues.¹⁷⁴

When parties appear in the Magistrates' Court in relation to FVIO proceedings, they may be unrepresented or represented by a duty lawyer or a community legal centre lawyer, who does not have the time or expertise necessary to provide them with comprehensive legal advice about family law matters. Victoria Legal Aid told the Commission:

Currently, duty lawyers at the Magistrates' Courts do not have the resources or time to screen all applicants and respondents for possible family law issues and provide advice or arrange warm referrals to a family lawyer. As part of our Family Law Legal Aid Services Review, Victoria Legal Aid is exploring ways to assist duty lawyers to identify family law issues, provide referrals to parenting dispute lawyers, and provide better continuity of service to these clients.

However, it is already clear that the pace of the current court environment and the demand pressures on our duty lawyer services mean the service cannot systematically accommodate the additional time that needs to be spent with applicants and respondents to undertake routine screening for family law and related legal issues. Additional resource investment in duty lawyer services will be required to enable the additional time required to be spent with each client to undertake an assessment and if appropriate make referrals without reducing existing services.¹⁷⁵

The Commission heard that the current demands on the Magistrates' Court make it untenable to effectively advise people about all their family law issues on the day they attend court:

You can't expect to resolve parenting arrangements on the day when you're trying to resolve the safety issues, and safety issues are paramount, so you have to resolve those first. At the same time, if you just then let people go and, they can figure it out for themselves, do they apply or not, et cetera, that's the problem, things can escalate because people get frustrated, people don't understand—people don't understand what's going on on both sides.¹⁷⁶

Victoria Legal Aid, in its 2015 Family Law Legal Aid Services Review, identified the need to make better use of the Magistrates' Court for client intake into family law services. The review recognised that the Magistrates' Court is a point of intervention to screen for family law issues and to provide effective referrals.¹⁷⁷ Victoria Legal Aid concluded that it:

... will review the way in which family violence duty lawyer services are provided with a view to enhancing intake opportunities at the Magistrates' Court for clients with family law legal need by supporting lawyers to screen more consistently for family law need.¹⁷⁸

The Commission also heard that very few lawyers practice across both federal and state courts. Magistrate Dotchin, Regional Coordinating Magistrate at Moorabbin Children's Court, told the Commission:

I [can] only think of two lawyers who regularly appear in the Children's Court who have got a family law practice. So they are mutually exclusive jurisdictions for the practitioners as a rule.¹⁷⁹

Lawyers who work only in one court may have an incomplete understanding of matters heard in other courts. Mr Andrew McGregor, Principal, Dowling McGregor Pty Ltd, told the Commission:

One of the criticisms that has been made about the current Children's Court model is the extent to which Children's Court lawyers do nothing but Children's Court work and associated criminal work. Similarly, there is a sense that family lawyers are unfamiliar with the Children's Court jurisdiction. As a result, when cases move between jurisdictions, there is often a need for new representation.¹⁸⁰

He suggested that:

One of the reasons that, at times, there has to be an outcome of new personnel is if the matter has come from the Family Court in which the Independent Children's Lawyer has argued for an outcome which is at odds with what the young person wants. The legal representative can't then come to the Children's Court and act on instructions, because the young person will not have confidence in that person performing in that different model.¹⁸¹

In my experience, the Children's Court work is fairly all-consuming and in most cases, where a matter [is] moved to the Family Court, I would not continue to act for the client but would instead provide a referral.¹⁸²

Hanover Welfare Services and HomeGround Housing Services (now Launch Housing) submitted that:

Some lawyers gave incorrect information based on the Family Law Act (FLA) Part VII, 2006 'Shared Parental Responsibility' clauses about 'hostile' parenting and the illegality of relocating with children—which do not apply in cases involving violence.¹⁸³

The Family Law Council interim report stated:

Many submissions called for joint training for staff and professionals from the different jurisdictions. Stakeholders generally suggested this should incorporate knowledge of processes and practice, not just law ... Others suggested a need for cross-professional development centred on increasing understanding of child abuse, family violence and trauma related issues, in addition to an understanding of the requirements of practice in the different jurisdictions.¹⁸⁴

Cross-examination in federal family court proceedings

The issue of cross-examination of victims of family violence by alleged perpetrators during federal family court hearings was raised with the Commission. The Family Court and FCC's joint submission to the Commission acknowledged that a lack of adequate legal aid funding means that parties, who may be victims of family violence, may have to conduct family law litigation on their own, against the perpetrator of family violence.¹⁸⁵

The Commission heard about the trauma victims of family violence can experience as a result of being cross-examined by the perpetrator:

... we had a four-day trial set with the Federal Circuit court in [Removed] for custody. I had a Barrister set to represent me though Legal Aid. At 5pm on the Friday before the Monday start date, I was advised that Legal Aid had pulled my funding for the Barrister so I had to represent myself in court. There was simply no time to find another legal representative so I found myself at 10am on the Monday morning in court with two large folders in front of me, having no idea what I had to do. I was in shock and dismay at this happening.

As my ex-husband had chosen to represent himself, he was allowed to cross-examine me on the witness stand. I believe that this day on the stand was possibly the most traumatic day that I have ever been through. He attempted to bribe me in the court room by saying to the judge 'I will be prepared to negotiate for custody of the children, if my wife drops the rape charges'.

I was exhausted and suffering from extreme anxiety and negotiated for custody on the second day of the trial. I was not able to cross-examine him, the witnesses I had called were sent home and the court reporter and psychiatrist were not called up. At the end of the two days, my ex-husband demanded that I pay for his court costs.¹⁸⁶

Unlike in the federal family courts,¹⁸⁷ in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria there are provisions to protect applicants in FVIO proceedings if a respondent wishes to cross-examine them in a hearing. The Family Violence Protection Act provides special rules for cross-examination of a 'protected witness'.¹⁸⁸

Where a respondent has not obtained their own legal representative and has been given reasonable opportunity to do so, 'the court must order Victoria Legal Aid to offer the respondent legal representation for this purpose'.¹⁸⁹ If a respondent refuses representation, and is not otherwise permitted to cross-examine the protected person, there are restrictions on the evidence the respondent can give in FVIO proceedings.¹⁹⁰

The court will also order Victoria Legal Aid to offer legal representation to applicants in FVIO proceedings for the purpose of cross-examination in cases where the respondent is prohibited from cross-examination, is legally represented, when the applicant witness is not represented, or the police have not brought the application to the court.¹⁹¹

Victoria Legal Aid told the Commission that in 2013-14, it provided 'court ordered representation for the cross examination only to 308 applicants and 192 adult respondents' in proceedings under the Family Violence Protection Act.¹⁹²

Responses to allegations of family violence

Victims of family violence told the Commission that allegations of family violence are given insufficient weight and consideration by the courts (predominantly the federal family courts), by lawyers, and by family court consultants. The Commission heard that people using both the federal and state court systems experience confusion when courts take different approaches to family violence:

Across the system, there are different approaches to how family violence is regarded and this is the by-product of the existence of different court cultures. This can be extremely confusing and distressing to the client whose journey through the separation may entail interaction with a number of courts. The client may experience how one court weighs, views and manages the issue of family violence. The client's matter may then progress through other courts or jurisdictional avenues such as a criminal case or through to the Family Courts. From the client perspective when they experience that different court culture, it is challenging for lawyers to help that individual understand why their personal experience is being, at best, homogenised or at worse, ignored, in another Court setting, why their very real fears and concerns are not being acknowledged or do not seem to factor into the decision making of that court.¹⁹³

The Commission heard that one of the reasons that different approaches to family violence are taken is that addressing family violence is 'segmented' in the court system, with the family courts assuming that family violence has (or will be) effectively dealt with in the Magistrates' Court.¹⁹⁴ Some victims of family violence told the Commission that the federal family courts and lawyers presume that alleged perpetrators of family violence should have contact with their children:

In what is effectively a 'mentions' hearing, I found it virtually impossible to tell my story. Having heard a handful of details in the limited time available, the judge quickly set her attention to the question of 'access', a word that is thrown around frequently in custodial and family violence matters. Rather than considering the best outcome for my son, I found that the judge's focus centred on the father's rights. She expressed concern that he had not had contact with his son for approximately two months. This fact was given precedence over my son's safety. The father of my child had previously threatened to kill him, had made a potential attempt to kill the day he drove towards us both and had the means to kill with his firearm. Yet here I was being forced to accept his 'right' to see his son, denying my son the right to safety.¹⁹⁵

The starting point of ... conferral between the lawyers was 50/50 custody. I considered this completely unacceptable. I wanted a no contact arrangement, but my barrister advised me not to ask the judge for no contact, implying that I would never be successful because my case was not 'bad' enough. I was advised that the consequences could be severe if I asked for no contact, including a result that my ex-husband would be awarded majority custody. I felt that not only was I battling the court system, but I was battling my own barrister. I refused to agree to 50/50 custody but constantly felt that I was pushing my barrister to follow my instructions.¹⁹⁶

Other submissions received by the Commission recounted that:

The first thing a woman is being told by the lawyer is 'you have to be careful you should not come across as a parent who does not want him to have contact—he can get full custody or shared custody' Straight away the woman is on the back foot and every decision she makes is based on fear. No one listens to the abuse and violence committed on her and the children—women are forced to agree to 'consent orders' by being threatened that if ... they don't agree it will go to trial and it will cost up to fifty thousand or more.¹⁹⁷

After telling my solicitor about the family violence my kids and I were put through, he told me "it can't have been that bad you stayed there [removed] years, it's not like he was knocking your teeth out when you conceived your kids", none of my evidence was ever looked at properly if at all and I was just left sitting in the court house corridors month after month to be told if I didn't agree to [removed] demands my kids would be tak[en] off me, and intimidated into signing orders I did not want to.¹⁹⁸

Fathers who have experienced the family court system also expressed concerns to the Commission:

In the early days we were both ordered to attend separate parenting courses, I attended mine, she did not. Later, when [removed] was about [removed], we were both ordered again to attend Parenting courses, again separately? In these sessions it became evident that there was an underlying assumption that both parents needed to wake up to themselves and learn to work together for the sake of the child and that the course would give us the tools to do this. The facilitators did not take into account the possibility that the mother could be a partner abuser and an active skilled alienator. I did my best to get across this point without pursuing the truth aggressively but they just didn't get it. I slipped back into deep depression during this period and had to seek some personal counselling—I was being abused again via the Family Court System.¹⁹⁹

The Commission also heard of the need for the courts and lawyers to manage parties' expectations of the family law system. For example, in FVIO proceedings, a magistrate may not allow contact for the respondent with a child but that may be a short-term arrangement and not necessarily indicative of the long-term care arrangements determined in the family law system. This can cause confusion about what to expect in each court.²⁰⁰

Some submissions to the Commission suggested that family consultants and family report writers do not understand the nature and dynamics of family violence and therefore do not give reports of violence sufficient consideration. It was put to the Commission that when victims spoke of family violence and expressed concerns for the safety of a child, they were sometimes regarded suspiciously:

Many women report that they are regarded suspiciously by court assessment report writers, and by lawyers, if they raise allegations of domestic violence or child abuse. Even if they have evidence, there are difficulties in making sure it is conveyed to decision makers, and some report that their lawyers warn them about making false allegations. It is very difficult to establish you are acting protectively in not wanting your child to have contact with an ex-partner. For the child, this is a no-win situation. This is even more the case if the allegations raised are about child sexual abuse.²⁰¹

In its submission, Women's Legal Service Victoria suggested that the lack of training in family violence has led to family consultants minimising or not believing the victim's story and using inappropriate and unsafe processes to interview children who have witnessed family violence.²⁰²

We have cases of family consultants requesting both parents attend an interview at their offices at the same time, despite the existence of an intervention order illustrating a lack of risk assessment and safety planning in high risk cases.²⁰³

The way to challenge the contents of a family report is to call the consultant as a witness and cross-examine them.²⁰⁴ Women's Legal Service Victoria believes there is scope for the introduction of an accreditation process for minimum standards for family consultants, which includes an oversight mechanism and an independent complaints process for review of the conduct of family consultants.²⁰⁵

The Commission notes that in 2015, the Family Court, the FCC, and the Family Court of Western Australia produced the Australian Standards of Practice for Family Assessments and Reporting, which are designed to promote good practice in conducting and reporting family assessment by family consultants.²⁰⁶

The standards require family consultants²⁰⁷ to have appropriate training, qualifications and experience to assess the impact and effects of family violence and exposure to family violence.²⁰⁸ In writing reports, family consultants are also required to conduct a full risk assessment relating to family violence and provide safety plans if necessary.²⁰⁹ Where family violence is established, the standards require family consultants to report on the violence, including the effect of the violence on the victim and children, any steps taken to protect the children from family violence, any acknowledgment, of or responsibility for the violence by the perpetrator, and whether a perpetrator who wishes to spend time with the children can 'reliably sustain that arrangement and how it will occur so that the child feels safe'.²¹⁰ Women's Legal Service Victoria submitted that these standards are a good first step but remain problematic because they are not binding on family consultants.²¹¹

The Family Court and FCC in their joint submission told the Commission of measures that are being taken in relation to family consultants' screening of family violence:

The family consultants are presently testing the use of a behaviourally based family violence screening questionnaire. It is an adaption of the Mediators' Assessment of Safety Issues and Concerns, Practitioner Version 2 (MASIC – 2P; Beck, Hotlzworth-Munroe and Applegate 2012) (MASIC). This is a questionnaire submitted by each party prior to an interview with the family consultant. Trials of the questionnaire were commenced in April 2015 by the courts at Melbourne and Brisbane. An evaluation will be completed by late 2015.²¹²

Claims of false allegations of family violence

The Commission was told that some people make unfounded allegations of family violence and that applications for FVIOs may be made to obtain a tactical advantage in the federal family courts. The Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia said that:

In some circumstances, applications are made to gain a time or tactical advantage in an associated family law dispute. Because interim orders are obtained on an ex parte basis, and because they are quicker to obtain than orders in the Family Court or Federal Circuit Court (because of the delays in those courts), the Family Violence Protection Act process can be used to more quickly obtain sole use and occupation of a home, or to create a tactical advantage in relation to parenting matters.²¹³

At a community consultation, the Commission was told that the first awareness some men have of marital problems is 'when the police turn up to cart the man away' and suggested that this was a 'pre-emptive strike' to gain the tactical advantage in court proceedings.²¹⁴ The organisation 'Dads in Distress' made a similar claim in its submission.²¹⁵

It is a commonly held belief that women make false allegations about their male partner's use of violence. In the 2009 National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey (NCAS), people were asked if they agreed with the statement 'women going through custody battles often make up or exaggerate claims of domestic violence in order to improve their case'. Fifty-one per cent of respondents said 'yes'.²¹⁶ In the 2013 NCAS, 53 per cent of respondents replied in the affirmative to this question.²¹⁷

Although some allegations of family violence may be misconceived or made for tactical reasons, there is little empirical evidence that people deliberately make false allegations of violence to obtain favourable dispositions in the federal family courts. The Commission notes that it is not easy to test whether allegations are false, partly because there are different ways to define and measure what a false allegation is, and because it is not always possible to distinguish deliberately false allegations from those which cannot be substantiated, or from allegations which contain inaccuracies or honest errors, but where there has not been deliberate deception.²¹⁸ Nonetheless, a 2013 review of a range of Australian and international studies on false allegations of family violence indicated that they are neither common, nor more likely to be made by women.²¹⁹

Claims that women make false allegations of family violence must also be evaluated in light of the fact that in 2013–14, around 66 per cent ($n=23,216$) of finalised FVIO applications to the Magistrates' Court of Victoria were initiated by the police.²²⁰ Further, the majority of FVIO matters heard by the Magistrates' Court of Victoria between 2000–01 and 2013–14 were consented to by respondents, with no admissions of the allegations made.²²¹ The assertion that false claims are made must also be considered in light of the context of significant under-reporting of family violence and evidence that seeking help from the legal system is a traumatic experience.²²²

The recent Australian Institute of Family Studies evaluation of the effect of the 2012 reforms of family law to give greater weight to family violence in parenting matters,²²³ also casts doubt on the allegation of widespread fabrication of family violence claims. The evaluation showed that since the reforms, there has been minimal change in the number of parents who took out orders from state courts to protect themselves against violence:

Notably, the analysis in the [Experiences of Separated Parents Study] of the extent to which parents reported taking out personal protection orders shows minimal change since the 2012 family violence amendments. There are two areas where statistically significant change has occurred. They are not consistent with the view that the use of personal protection orders for tactical reasons has increased since the 2012 family violence amendments. The biggest change has occurred in relation to mothers who experienced family violence since separation: in 2014 99% reported not having a personal protection order compared with 90% in 2012 ... For mothers who experienced family violence before, during and since separation, there was a 2 percentage point increase (to 4% overall) in the proportion of mothers who reported obtaining personal protection orders before and since separation. This indicates an increased reliance on personal protection orders for a small proportion of mothers reporting obtaining personal protection orders before and since separation ... The analysis does not show any statistically significant increases in fathers reporting taking out personal protection orders.²²⁴

Abuse of the family law system

No To Violence submitted that the family law system can be used by perpetrators to victimise women and children:

The family law system is a source of horrible victimisation for women and children experiencing family violence. Perpetrators frequently manipulate family law and child contact systems to cause enormous difficulties for and impacts on women and children. Family law processes can be used by the perpetrator to accentuate tactics of financial abuse (driving her further into debt through elongating family law contests), sabotage the children's relationship with their mother (through manipulation tactics during unsupervised child access), monitor the mother's movements and social connections, and much more.²²⁵

This accords with what the Commission heard from some victims of family violence in submissions and during community consultations:

I made the application to the family court. I endured [removed] years and [removed] trials in the family court and was subjected to the worst behaviour by barristers for and against my case, my ex husband and his family members. I believe that my ex husband attempted to control me and 'see' me [by] pushing the legal case for as long as possible, often refusing to make an agreement in respect to the children. If the children felt unsafe or didn't want to spend time with their father, my ex-husband would apply for a breach of contact orders against me, repeatedly attempting to drag me back to court and have me 'punished' by the court. He made repeated threats to my family members in person and via phone, stating he would not stop until he 'rubbed my face in the dirt'.²²⁶

A 2013 Deakin University study of women's experiences in the Magistrates' Court in Geelong, observed that it was common practice for respondents to appear at the first mention date requesting that a parenting plan be made by the court before they would consent to the making of an FVIO.²²⁷ The study found that this practice led to women feeling they had to negotiate arrangements to keep their children safe shortly after separation, when they were often frightened of the perpetrator.

Springvale Monash Legal Service referred to pressures placed on victims to agree to family law orders too soon before the court appearance:

In our experience a respondent can pressure the applicant to agree to contact under a written agreement that day. Sometimes the written agreement is drafted and signed hastily by the parties before the court decides whether a child is at risk. This makes little sense because if the court decides there is a risk then section 93 of the FVPA applies and the court cannot include a condition for contact between a child and the respondent.²²⁸

In its report, the Wyndham Legal Service and Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand state that 'abusers [can use] property settlement processes to continue to control their partners and former partners, including intentionally delaying settlement and offering unreasonable settlement amounts.'²²⁹ Wyndham Legal Service and Good Shepherd found that this is compounded by the prohibitive costs of legal representation in the Family Court to resolve economic abuse issues.²³⁰

Some of the tactics described in relation to property settlements included threatening violence unless partners dropped their claim; prolonging settlements; withholding relationship property information in order to drag out settlement; and cutting women off from assets so that they are not able to afford litigation.²³¹

The Commission notes that the Family Law Amendment (Financial Agreements and Other Measures) Bill introduced in November 2015, proposes an amendment to the Family Law Act to strengthen the court's powers to dismiss unmeritorious applications. That Bill proposes a new section in the Family Law Act²³² to allow the court to make a 'summary decree' in favour of a party, if it is satisfied that a party has no reasonable prospect of success in prosecuting or defending a proceeding.²³³ Such an amendment may go some way to help courts dismiss applications where it is clear that parties are using proceedings merely as a means to further perpetrate violence.

Information sharing

This section provides an overview of what the Commission heard about information-sharing issues which can arise between the federal family law system, Victorian state courts and the Victorian child protection system.

Access to court orders is not routinely or automatically shared between courts.²³⁴ In its submission to the Commission, the Victorian Government acknowledges the consequences for victims of family violence when information is not shared between jurisdictions:

There is also no data system in place that could capture both family violence intervention orders and family law orders. Therefore, victims who are involved in both intervention order and family law proceedings are often required to tell their story repetitively to different courts, lawyers, and counsellors working across the jurisdictions, and re-litigate the same issues in different forums. This results in duplication and re-traumatisation of victims.²³⁵

Magistrates may be unaware of federal family court proceedings

A magistrate who is hearing an FVIO application may not always be aware of orders, such as parenting orders, made by a federal family court.

Where a magistrates' court decides to make an FVIO and the protected person or respondent is a parent, the court must enquire as to whether there is a Family Law Act order or child protection order in force in relation to the child,²³⁶ but the magistrates' court may not have access to family court orders unless they are provided by the parties.²³⁷ The court is able to request copies of orders from the federal family courts but the information flow between the courts is currently a manual one, relying on court staff or a party to source the right documentation.²³⁸

Dr Karen Gelb's research, undertaken for the Commission (see Volume VII), highlights that:

... the lack of adequate information in some applications—especially around the associated orders—was a source of particular frustration for every magistrate interviewed and for many of the police prosecutors. Magistrates bemoaned the problem of 'silo data', and often had to ask about related family law or child protection matters, experiencing significant frustration when told the police did not know. The concern for magistrates was two-fold: they did not want to issue an order that would be contrary to an order already in place (especially with regard to child contact orders made under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)), and they felt they could not adequately tailor an order without knowing what else was happening with the family. According to one magistrate, this lack of information means that 'it takes too long to work out what's going on'.²³⁹

Magistrate Kate Hawkins, Joint Supervising Family Violence Magistrate, Magistrates' Court of Victoria, told the Commission that, when hearing an application, magistrates 'don't have any way of directly accessing whether there's any family law orders'.²⁴⁰ Instead, that information is only provided to magistrates if a registrar or bench clerk makes further enquiries. Magistrate Hawkins explained that the process of information sharing with the Family Court or the Federal Circuit Court is 'quite an ordeal'.²⁴¹

Dr Gelb notes that:

The Magistrates' Court asks people who apply for a family violence intervention order whether they have previously sought or been granted any family law orders. Where a person discloses such an order, it is recorded in Courtlink. When the police apply for the family violence intervention order, however, this information is not available. The data relating to orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) are therefore not a complete count of all people who have previously had family law orders; rather, they are an undercount to some (unknown) extent.²⁴²

Magistrates in the Children's Court may not be aware of proceedings or orders in other jurisdictions. Magistrate Dotchin told the Commission:

I talked about in the morning when I'm at Moorabbin and I open my file and I have really just two documents in front of me, the summary and the formal piece of paper about the grounds of the application. I do not have a copy of an intervention order that may be in existence that may be relevant. I don't have a copy of any reports from the Family Court or any reports at all from any other jurisdictions. I have none of that material before me. So the dissemination of this material does not occur at an early stage in the proceedings in the Children's Court. You are really bereft of that sort of information.²⁴³

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the Children's Court of Victoria suggested the following to improve information sharing between the courts:

14. Investment in a new case management system for the Magistrates' and Children's Courts to support the delivery of modern court services, enable fast and accurate exchange of information between agencies and replace resource intensive manual processing.
15. Develop systems that enable appropriate information to be shared across courts, family violence and justice agencies to manage risk and enable informed decision making, incorporating:
 - (a) single database for family violence, child protection and family law orders that can be accessed by each of the relevant courts
 - (b) access to reports used in other court jurisdictions.²⁴⁴

In its June 2015 interim report, the Family Law Council recommended the creation of a national database:

The development of a national database of court orders to include orders from the Family Court of Australia, the Family Court of Western Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, state and territory children's courts, state and territory magistrates courts and state and territory mental health tribunals, so that each of these jurisdictions has access to the other's orders.²⁴⁵

Information sharing is also part of The Second Action Plan: Moving Ahead of the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children 2010–2022, which requires governments to improve information sharing across court processes.²⁴⁶

The federal family courts may be unaware of state court proceedings

The Commission also heard that judges in the federal family court system may not have information about proceedings in Victorian courts:

... the FCCA does not have before it all the evidence that the Magistrates' Court had when making an interim or final intervention order. This can create the perception and experience among clients that family violence is not given appropriate weight.²⁴⁷

The Victorian Bar and the Family Law Bar Association noted in their submission that the federal family courts need information about the nature of the family violence alleged, especially where the order has been made without admissions.²⁴⁸ The Law Institute of Victoria submitted that it is very difficult for family court judges to make parenting decisions without having a transcript of the evidence in a FVIO case in the Magistrates' Court:

Providing the federal family courts with the orders and a transcript of ex parte proceedings before the Magistrates' Court for an intervention order would reduce costs and delay for family law litigants in their family law proceedings and ensure the court has all the relevant information required to make parenting orders that are in the best interests of the children.²⁴⁹

Under section 60CF(1) of the Family Law Act, if a party to proceedings about a child is aware that a family violence order applies to the child or a member of the child's family, the party must inform the court of the order.²⁵⁰ However, a party to proceedings who is not legally represented may not be aware of that requirement or may fail to comply with it.

Family courts are also required to ask each party to the proceedings whether they consider that the child concerned, or the party, has been, or is at risk of being, subjected to family violence.²⁵¹ Unless the parties provide the information, federal family courts do not have direct access to FVIOs or access to transcripts of Magistrates' Court proceedings. Access to these documents is unlikely to occur if the parties do not have legal representation.²⁵²

The Family Law Council's interim report discussed the extent to which information sharing is permitted, in the context of prohibitions under the Family Law Act about the sharing of information between the courts, especially the provision for sharing of family consultant reports.²⁵³ This issue was also discussed in a roundtable hosted by the Commission.²⁵⁴

The Family Law Act prohibits publication of any account of Family Court proceedings which identifies a party or a witness to family law proceedings, or a person associated with²⁵⁵ or related to a party. The Family Law Act does not prevent communication with people concerned in any proceedings in any court, of any transcript of evidence or other document for use in connection with those proceedings.²⁵⁶

In considering the matters that must be taken into account in determining the best interests of the child for the purposes of making a family law order, such as a parenting order,²⁵⁷ if an FVIO has been made, family court judges must consider the inferences which can be drawn from the order, having regard to, among other things, its nature, the circumstances in which the order was made, evidence admitted in proceedings for the order and the court order itself.²⁵⁸

Information sharing between the child protection system and federal family courts

Information-sharing procedures between Child Protection and the federal family courts are formalised in legislation and a formal protocol.

Information sharing: Child Protection and the federal family courts

The Family Law Act imposes an obligation on a party to proceedings relating to a child to inform the court of a notification or report to Child Protection,²⁵⁹ a Child Protection investigation, or if the child is in the care of someone as a result of Child Protection proceedings.²⁶⁰ Where a family court has been informed of these matters, it can make an order requesting that Child Protection provide documents or information specified in the order.²⁶¹ Such information could include information about notifications to Child Protection of suspected abuse or family violence affecting the child, any assessments by Child Protection of investigations into notifications and the outcome of those investigations, and any reports commissioned by Child Protection in the course of investigating a notification.²⁶²

In 2011, the Department of Human Services (now DHHS) and the Family Court and FCC (then known as the Federal Magistrates' Court) entered into a protocol to facilitate information sharing between them.²⁶³ The protocol articulates both the statutory and non-statutory responsibilities of the courts and DHHS, so as to aid cooperation and effective communication.²⁶⁴

The protocol allows DHHS to obtain information about various matters, including the court orders which have been made and those which are being sought, by contacting the registry manager. The protocol allows for DHHS to access federal family court information when a child's family cannot provide the relevant information themselves.²⁶⁵

The protocol also details information exchange procedures for the federal family courts to access information from DHHS.²⁶⁶

Referrals from the federal family courts to Child Protection

In the Family Court, the Magellan case-management system deals with cases involving allegations of serious sexual or physical abuse of a child.²⁶⁷ The Magellan system involves strict timelines for managing the case, the provision of information from the child welfare authority to the Family Court and close liaison between external information providers, Child Protection and court personnel.²⁶⁸

In Victoria, the protocol's information-sharing provisions require DHHS to provide written reports to the Family Court regarding a child who is the subject of proceedings in a Magellan list. Upon receiving a request from the Family Court, Child Protection:

- (i) make a decision regarding the investigation of the notification in accordance with normal practice, and this protocol
- (ii) determine whether the department should intervene in the Family Court proceedings.²⁶⁹

Another way of providing information to the Family Court is the Notice of Risk procedure. Since 1995 there have been provisions in the Family Law Act to identify cases involving abuse of children²⁷⁰ and to impose an obligation on court personnel and other professionals associated with family court proceedings to notify the relevant child welfare authority if they suspect that a child has been abused or is at risk of abuse.²⁷¹ The current provisions came into effect in 2012.²⁷²

Under the Family Law Act 'an interested person' (including a party to the proceedings or an independent children's lawyer²⁷³ who is representing the interests of the child in the proceedings) is required to file a Notice of Risk if they allege the child has been abused or is at risk of being abused, and is to serve the notice on the other party to the proceedings (section 67Z reports).²⁷⁴ Additionally, if an interested person alleges that there has been family violence by one of the parties or a risk of family violence that is relevant to the court making or refusing to make an order, then they too must file a notice.²⁷⁵

If a notice is filed, the court must take certain actions promptly²⁷⁶ and if the notice includes allegations of child abuse, or risk of abuse, the registry manager must as soon as practicable notify the Secretary of DHHS.²⁷⁷ Child Protection treats this as a report that the person has significant concern about the wellbeing of a child, and then considers what action should be taken.²⁷⁸ This may include taking protective action, or deciding not to intervene further.

There are also provisions for voluntary reporting. Where a court officer, family counsellor, or family dispute resolution practitioner has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the child is or at risk of being abused, the person may notify DHHS (section 67ZA reports).²⁷⁹

There is also a discretionary power under the Family Law Act for the federal family law courts to request that the Secretary of a state child protection authority become a party to proceedings that affect, or may affect, the welfare of a child (section 91B requests).²⁸⁰

In her statement to the Commission, Ms Leeanne Miller, Director of Child Protection West Division in DHHS, commented on the decrease in the number of section 91B requests to Child Protection:

It is possible that the reduction in the number of such requests is attributable to the increased presence of a Child Protection worker in court and the more timely sharing of information between courts and Child Protection. It is also possible that the increase in the use of s 67Z and s 67ZA reports means that Child Protection are invited to provide input via other channels.²⁸¹

In their joint submission, the Family Court and the FCC, noted:

Effective communication of information between the courts and child protection agencies also means that the courts can avoid unproductive s 91B requests that a child protection agency intervene in family law proceedings. Collaboration between the courts and the Victorian Department of Human Services has led to innovations such as the co-location of a Departmental Officer at the Melbourne and Dandenong registries. This has dramatically improved the ability of the courts to receive and exchange information in relation to family violence and child abuse.²⁸²

In 2015, the FCC made it compulsory for all parties to parenting cases to fill in a Notice of Risk form.²⁸³ Because of concerns that notices were not filed when they should have been, the FCC has required filing and service of a Notice of Risk with every application for a parenting order, regardless of whether it is alleged there is a risk to the child.²⁸⁴

The Family Court and FCC submitted that:

It is the experience of the Federal Circuit Court that by imposing an obligation on all parties to answer questions about risk issues has resulted in disclosures that might not have been given in their affidavits.²⁸⁵

It could be argued that the nature of this form and the model of reporting matters from the federal family courts to Child Protection may deter victims of family violence from raising safety concerns themselves for their children. Indicating family violence on the form will trigger an immediate report to Child Protection. This may have the effect of deterring notifications of family violence and may unnecessarily increase the number of family violence-related reports to the child protection system.

Nevertheless, there has been an increase in the number of reports to Child Protection from both the FCC and the Family Court over the past five years, with the total number of reports growing from 459 in 2010–11 to 2045 in 2014–15, an increase of about 450 per cent.²⁸⁶

Table 24.1 shows the number of reports from the federal family courts to Child Protection since 2009–10. It is noted that these reports apply to all forms of abuse and are not confined to children affected by family violence.

Table 24.1 Federal Family Courts Reports to Child Protection in Victoria

Year	Section 67Z (e.g. parties or independent child's lawyer, in family law proceedings)	Section 67ZA (e.g. family law professionals)	Section 91B (e.g. court requests for intervention in family proceedings)	Total
2009–10	304	5	188	497
2010–11	276	2	181	459
2011–12	471	5	241	717
2012–13	927	19	119	1065
2013–14	1174	32	74	1280
2014–15	1943	49	53	2045
Total	5095	112	856	6063

Source: Based on Statement of Miller, 26 July 2015, 18 [63].

The need to make information-sharing easier between Child Protection and the courts so as to support parents to obtain protective orders is further discussed in Chapter 11.

Co-location of a child protection practitioner in the family courts

In December 2012, the position of Child Protection Practice Leader (Family Law Liaison) was created in Victoria for a fixed term of two years.²⁸⁷ As part of the DHHS Office of Professional Practice, there are co-located senior child protection practitioners at Victoria Police and at the Melbourne and Dandenong registries of the federal family courts.²⁸⁸ The role supports the operation of the protocol which exists between DHHS and the federal family courts.²⁸⁹

The role was created jointly by the Family Court, the FCC and DHHS as a means of assisting courts in cases where child protection issues are raised and also to provide advice and leadership to child protection staff in relation to family law matters.²⁹⁰

The purpose of co-location is to:

... facilitate the exchange of timely, relevant information about child protection matters where families and children were engaged with the two systems: the Victorian state child protection system and the Commonwealth family law system. The facilitation of improved information sharing was aimed at enhancing decision-making about the best interests of children subject to action in the family law jurisdiction.²⁹¹

The Australian Institute of Family Studies evaluation of the co-located practitioner in the federal family courts found, among other things, that the co-located practitioners had a significant impact on fostering collaborative relationships and practices and on improving information sharing between the family law and child protection systems.²⁹² Some observations made by the AIFS include:

- ▷ The role of the co-located practitioner was highly valued by family law and child protection professionals.²⁹³
- ▷ The initiative led to improved timeliness and quality of information for both the family courts and DHHS, which in turn supported earlier and more informed decision making.²⁹⁴
- ▷ In particular, the Melbourne role provided an effective point of access to the other system for both family law professionals (mostly judge's associates, family consultants, registrars and independent children's lawyers) and child protection practitioners.²⁹⁵
- ▷ Improved timeliness of information, a benefit of which included fewer court adjournments which had positive results for parties.²⁹⁶
- ▷ The quality of information provided by DHHS has been improved through the co-located role, including by providing child protection practitioners with templates to respond to family courts notifications and with feedback on the information practitioners have provided.²⁹⁷

The evaluation also found that there was a need to strengthen processes for directing information flow between the family law system and the child protection system at organisational level, particularly in relation to information in child protection files that had been closed.²⁹⁸

The evaluation said that further clarity was needed to define the boundaries of the co-located Child Protection role, in order to ensure that seeking advice from the practitioners did not contribute to an excessive workload.²⁹⁹ One problem with the role was the lack of legislative authorisation for necessary information sharing.³⁰⁰

AIFS made several recommendations to strengthen systems and processes and to better facilitate and support information sharing. Those recommendations included reviewing the legislative barriers to information sharing.³⁰¹ The evaluation also recommended amendments to court rules, to enable reports and information from experts such as family consultants and independent children's lawyers to be routinely shared with the child protection system.³⁰²

Since the July 2015 AIFS evaluation, no legislative amendments have been made to either the Children, Youth and Families Act or the Family Law Rules as was recommended.³⁰³ DHHS has not indicated whether it intends to continue the placement of a child protection practitioner at the family law courts.

Further discussion about information sharing in Victoria can be found in Chapter 7.

Risk assessment

The risk assessment tool developed for use in family law processes is the DOORS (Detection of Overall Risk Screen).³⁰⁴ DOORS is an empirically-based, standardised screening framework for frontline workers, which uses a broad definition of risk.³⁰⁵

An AIFS evaluation of this tool found that many family law professionals, and particularly lawyers, had no exposure to DOORS and had never used it:

Methods and approaches used are a significant consideration when examining the issues associated with adequate screening. The data from participants in the current study suggest the DOORS screening tool—a practice strategy implemented to support better identification of family violence, child abuse and other risks—had a mixed reception and limited take-up. The evidence in this report suggests that a substantial proportion of professionals, particularly lawyers, reported that they had not had exposure to DOORS. Among those who reported that they had, only a small number reported using it in their day-to-day practice, with a majority of lawyers (51%) and non-legal professionals (69%) indicating that they rarely or never used it.³⁰⁶

The evaluation also found that family violence risk assessment practices across the family law system are inconsistent and require improvement.³⁰⁷

The Commission also notes that there is not a common risk assessment approach used across the federal family courts and state family violence system.

In its submission to the Commission, Eastern Access Community Health (now EACH), which operates family dispute resolution and other services under the federal Families and Communities Programme, notes that some programs are required to use the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (commonly known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or CRAF) and others to use DOORS.³⁰⁸

The Commission also heard criticism of inconsistent use of the screening processes for family dispute resolution between practitioners and that there is an emphasis on screening for physical violence over psychological abuse.³⁰⁹

One of the goals of the Family Court and FCC's Family Violence Plan 2014–2016 is to continue the development of a best-practice risk assessment tool for use by Child Dispute Services.³¹⁰ Additionally, supporting integrated systems is a national priority under the Second Action Plan 2013–2016, a stage of the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children. The plan is looking at strengthening 'systems and service integration', through 'collaborative models of service delivery and information sharing protocols and risk assessment tools'.³¹¹

The Commission also notes that the Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia provides continuing professional development to family lawyers, including in the area of family violence, and that it 'continually explores innovative and practical ways of raising awareness about family violence'.³¹² The professional development opportunities it has offered family lawyers in respect of family violence over recent years include sessions on family violence risk assessment screening tools and a two-part training session on the DOORS framework.³¹³

The need for a revised CRAF to be used throughout the Victorian family violence sector, including in the court system, is explored in Chapter 6.

Child contact centres

Some submissions to the Commission emphasised that demand for child contact centres far outstrips supply.³¹⁴ The Commission was told that in some cases, delays in accessing child contact centres meant that victims of family violence are forced to agree to unsafe contact arrangements in order to meet the terms of family law agreements or orders.³¹⁵

The Australian Children's Contact Service Association noted its concern that 'courts and post separation services are referring vulnerable family members to services where there is no assurance that baseline, safe service delivery is provided'.³¹⁶ The Association recommended that the Commonwealth Government regulate all child contact centres (not just those that are publicly funded), including an accreditation process incorporating the baseline standards in the Children's Contact Service Guiding Principles Framework for Good Practice.³¹⁷

The way forward

Various commissions of inquiry and advisory boards have made recommendations to improve the responsiveness of the family law system to family violence and to overcome the problems caused by the intersections between state and federal courts. Many of these recommendations have not been implemented.

We acknowledge the frustrations of those working within the court system who are confronting high demand with limited resources and who must navigate barriers to information sharing across jurisdictions. We also acknowledge the concerns of victims who have to navigate the complex intersection between state and federal jurisdictions.

It is disappointing that much of what has been recommended in past inquiries, which could substantially improve the experience of family violence victims and their children, has not been implemented and has had to be reiterated to the Commission. We urge the Victorian Government to recognise the need for reform in this area and to pursue the implementation of recommendations made by other inquiries in partnership with the Commonwealth Government. For that reason, we have recommended that the Victorian Government take up family law reforms with the Commonwealth Government.

It is important to note the limitations on the scope of this Commission's inquiry. Section 123 of the Inquiries Act 2014 (Vic) provides that the Commission cannot enquire into, or exercise powers in relation to, courts. We therefore did not examine the outcomes of particular cases in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, the Children's Court of Victoria, or the federal family courts. Nonetheless, we were grateful for submissions from individuals, organisations and the courts, and participation by family court representatives in this inquiry.

The recommendations below focus, as our terms of reference require, on making 'practical recommendations' to assist victims of family violence. For reasons we have explained, this chapter focuses on state laws and practices. However, substantial changes to federal law are needed to overcome the problem of system fragmentation which results in many people having to bring proceedings in both state magistrates' courts and federal family law courts.

The reforms required are complex because they may involve the interaction of state and federal laws. To bring about reform in this area, we believe that advocacy at state government level is required. In our view, the Victorian Department of Justice and Regulation would be well equipped to undertake the necessary work to pursue implementation of these recommendations. We consider it desirable that there be a delegated role created in the policy section of the Department of Justice and Regulation, to focus on the necessary federal and state negotiations required to bring about the relevant legislative changes.

Additionally, in Chapter 38 we have recommended that the Victorian Secretaries Board take responsibility for the planning and oversight of the family violence system. The Secretary of the Department of Justice and Regulation is a member of that board and should report to the VSB on the progress of efforts to ensure further reforms are made to the family law system at a Commonwealth level, to overcome the problems identified in this chapter.

Enforcing personal protection injunctions

The Commission agrees with the Australian and NSW Law Reform Commissions that breach of an injunction for the personal protection of an adult or child under the Family Law Act should be a criminal offence.

Victoria Police officers will be more likely to act on their power to arrest and to charge respondents for breaches of personal protection injunctions if a breach is a criminal offence. This will require amending the Family Law Act, which falls within the power of the Commonwealth Government alone.

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence should be amended to reflect the ability of police to arrest for a breach of an injunction, as opposed to the matter simply being referred to federal police. This would help victims of family violence by overcoming the need for them to seek an FVIO if they have obtained an injunction in a family court. If police training is required to provide understanding about the amendment to the Code of Practice, then this should be undertaken by Victoria Police.

It may also be necessary for there to be a discussion between Victoria Police and the Australian Federal Police about their respective responsibilities in responding to family violence and family violence orders made in either state or federal courts.

Supporting state courts to exercise family law jurisdiction

Magistrates' Court

Parenting orders

As the first point of contact with the legal system for many victims, the Magistrates' Court should be able to deal with as many issues as possible relating to their protection. Magistrates should be encouraged and supported to exercise their family law jurisdiction, and parties should be advised that magistrates have the power to make some family law orders. We note that the exercise of federal jurisdiction by magistrates will have significant resource implications. The Victorian Government should negotiate how the Commonwealth Government might compensate the state for hearing federal cases.

Magistrates' exercise of their power to resolve parenting disputes in the Magistrates' Court will make it easier for families to resolve such matters without having to navigate both state and federal courts. We believe that magistrates should also be encouraged to exercise their Family Law Act jurisdiction and family law matters should be listed in the Magistrates' Court, whenever possible.

We acknowledge the concerns raised regarding magistrates exercising their powers to confirm parenting arrangements by consent in the Magistrates' Court too soon after an incident of violence or after separation. We caution against this. Magistrates should usually refrain from making parenting orders or sealing parenting plans by consent at a first mention date in FVIO proceedings. It will usually be inappropriate for parenting issues to be dealt with during the immediate crisis that follows separation after family violence, when the victim is having to cope with multiple problems. That being said, it will often be appropriate for the court to make a parenting order by consent as long as that consent is not obtained very shortly after a family violence incident, or without the parties receiving appropriate legal advice.

Property orders

The Commission received submissions and evidence and considered research which suggested that victims of family violence are put at a disadvantage when dividing property:

The share of property these women receive appears to reflect the practical difficulties they face in trying to negotiate a fair settlement with a violent former spouse—a situation where safety may be given precedence over the right to a fair share of the matrimonial property.³¹⁸

This is unfortunate because property settlements can assist victims of family violence to regain economic stability. Timely property settlements are 'fundamental to economic equality'.³¹⁹

Increasing the jurisdiction of the Magistrates' Court to determine the division of small amounts of property would enable victims and perpetrators to resolve property disputes quickly and in one court, if they have previously appeared in FVIO proceedings. This may help to ensure that victims of family violence will not abandon their claims. We consider that encouraging a court to determine small property claims will go some way to helping victims of family violence to become economically independent without being drawn into long and expensive federal property disputes.

We note that the monetary limit of the Magistrates' Court family law property jurisdiction has only been changed once—it was increased from $1000 to $20,000 in 1988.³²⁰ Accounting for inflation, $20,000 in 1988 is equivalent to approximately $45,000 today.³²¹ The Magistrates' Court of Victoria currently has jurisdiction to determine disputes over money or property up to the value of $100,000,³²² which suggests a need for the Commonwealth Government to revisit the jurisdictional limit.

Support for magistrates

Magistrates need support to exercise their limited powers to make Family Law Act orders. Some magistrates may lack expertise in family law and are not confident in dealing with these issues. We consider that magistrates should have sound and up-to-date knowledge of federal family law in addition to knowledge and skills in the area of family violence, so that they are equipped to exercise their jurisdiction under both state laws and the Family Law Act.

We note that there are already comprehensive resources available to magistrates to exercise their Family Law Act jurisdiction, including the Family Law Manual and Family Violence Bench Book.

There are also practical constraints and features of the 'working culture' of magistrates' courts which need to be addressed to better assist magistrates to exercise their powers. These include addressing:

- ▷ the high case volume of cases, which give magistrates limited time to spend on each case and require them to give priority to immediate safety issues
- ▷ if a person is represented by a duty lawyer in FVIO proceedings, the lack of time to permit the lawyers to advise on, or screen for, family law issues.

The Commission makes recommendations in other chapters to help ease the burden on magistrates' courts that face high demand. These include:

- ▷ capping lists of family violence matters (see Chapter 16)
- ▷ ensuring all headquarter courts have the functions of Family Violence Court Division courts within two years (see Chapter 16). This will ensure that such courts will be well-equipped to handle family law matters
- ▷ requiring the Victorian Attorney-General to take into account, when appointing magistrates, the potential appointee's knowledge, experience, skills and aptitude for hearing cases involving family violence, including knowledge of relevant family law (see Chapter 40).

The Magistrates' Court should consider simplifying processes to enable magistrates to determine small claims more efficiently, so as to enable them to effectively hear Family Law Act property disputes. Consideration should be given to better incorporating federal dispute resolution processes.

Providing family law information to parties in FVIO proceedings

We note the difference in roles that the federal family courts and state magistrates' courts play in our justice system. The federal family courts have the role of determining a child's best interests as the paramount consideration when making a parenting order.³²³ In determining those best interests, they are required to consider the need to protect a child from physical or psychological harm and exposure to abuse, neglect or family violence.³²⁴ The Family Court and FCC are assisted in their decision-making by their Family Violence Best Practice Principles.³²⁵

On the other hand, the focus of the Family Violence Protection Act is to maximise safety for children and adults, prevent family violence and promote accountability of perpetrators.³²⁶ The role of the magistrate is to provide an immediate safety response to victims of family violence rather than to determine long-term care arrangements for children.

The existence of dual jurisdictions in the Magistrates' Court and the federal family courts is a source of confusion for people involved in FVIO proceedings. For example, a woman may have obtained an FVIO protecting her and her children, with conditions prohibiting contact for the children with the perpetrator. She may then have proceedings in a federal family court and leave that court with a parenting order that allows the respondent to have unsupervised contact.

People who access the Magistrates' Court may not know:

- ▷ that they can apply for a Family Law Act order in the Magistrates' Court
- ▷ what information they need to provide to obtain a family law order
- ▷ what a family law order means or how it relates to conditions under a FVIO
- ▷ that FVIO conditions may only operate for a short period, because long-term care arrangements may be dealt with, or overridden by, family law orders.

The joint Australian and NSW Law Reform Commissions have previously recommended that application forms for FVIOs should include an option for the applicant to seek the revival, variation, discharge or suspension of a parenting order.³²⁷ We agree with that recommendation, and further recommend that information about the Magistrates' Court's family law jurisdiction should be included in the application form for an FVIO (FVIO1). For example, in the 'Further Information' section of the form, applicants could be asked whether they are seeking a parenting order and told that such an order may be made with the consent of the other party. We consider that it is also necessary to provide information to both parties if they come to court as the result of a police-issued family violence safety notice.

Recommendation 60 in Chapter 16 discusses online material about the FVIO process. That online material and the Magistrates' Court website should also include comprehensive information about the ability to have some family law matters resolved in the Magistrates' Court.

The FV101 form and other information provided online and/or in hard copy should also direct applicants and respondents to the form they need to complete in order to make a federal family court application. Over time, it may be possible for the Magistrates' Court and the federal family courts to develop a common form for both purposes, or amend the federal family court initiating applications to make it clear that applications can be filed in state courts.

The FVIO could also include information about methods of resolving disputes about children and property outside court processes, for example, through the use of legally assisted family dispute resolution services.

Lack of understanding of orders made in the Magistrates' Court may lead to an escalation of violence, particularly when a respondent mistakenly believes that the effect of the order is to prevent him from having any contact with his children. Where orders have been made under both the Family Violence Protection Act and the Family Law Act, parties need to know how those orders interact, otherwise they may unintentionally breach the obligations that apply to them.

In the inquest into the death of Luke Batty, Judge Gray recommended that the Magistrates' Court revise the form and content of FVIOs to ensure they are written in clear and unambiguous language. This should include clarity in relation to the operation of section 68R of the Family Law Act.³²⁸ We support that recommendation.

We also recommend that the Family Violence Protection Act be amended to require magistrates to explain the effect of any orders they make under the Family Law Act and how those orders interact with FVIOs. Clear communication from the court is required to help parties understand the effect of orders. Magistrates are best placed to provide that explanation when they are able, or in situations where they cannot, lawyers should be required to provide that explanation. Currently the Family Violence Protection Act places that onus on registrars and only at the time that an interim FVIO is made. We consider it necessary for magistrates to explain how interim and final FVIOs interact with any Family Law Act orders.

Finally, we note the concerns expressed in relation to the 21-day time limit placed on orders made by a magistrate to revive, vary or suspend a parenting order.³²⁹ The Family Law Amendment (Financial Agreements and Other Measures) Bill 2015, which has been introduced into Federal Parliament, will address these concerns.

Children's Court

Although the Magistrates' Court has limited power to exercise Family Law Act jurisdiction, there are some doubts about whether the Children's Court also has that power. The Commission heard strong support for the need to clarify the Children's Court jurisdiction and allow it to exercise Family Law Act jurisdiction.

The Victorian Law Reform Commission, in its 2006 report, recommended that this could be achieved by amending the Children, Youth and Families Bill 2005 (as it was then) to enable the Children's Court to make, vary or discharge parenting orders.³³⁰ In our view, the Victorian Government should take immediate steps to make that amendment to the Children, Youth and Families Act.

We believe that it would also be desirable to also amend the Family Law Act to put the jurisdiction of the Children's Court of Victoria beyond doubt. A recommendation to this effect was recently made in the Family Law Council interim report.³³¹

Legal advice and representation

It is unsatisfactory that victims of family violence often have to negotiate parenting or property matters or appear in court without legal representation.

The Commission recognises the pressures on duty lawyers in the Magistrates' Court, because of the high volume of FVIO applications. We make recommendations in Chapter 16 to help alleviate that pressure. However, we do not envisage that duty lawyers will have the time to provide the in-depth legal advice applicants and respondents need to resolve family law issues.

We consider that legal assistance regarding family law advice, whether provided by Victoria Legal Aid, a community legal centre, or a private practitioner, should be connected to the FVIO process and should be available to parties to FVIO proceedings throughout the process. Ideally, this advice would occur off site and outside the court setting, which is focused more on the crisis response to family violence than on the additional 'wrap-around' services that a family also needs.

As discussed above, Victoria Legal Aid, in its 2015 Family Law Legal Aid Services Review, identified the need to make better use of the Magistrates' Court for client intake into family law services, and are reviewing the way that they enhance opportunities in family violence cases at the Magistrates' Court to screen better for family law needs.³³² It should be established practice for duty lawyers at the Magistrates' Court in FVIO proceedings to screen for family law needs and to refer parties to Victoria Legal Aid, community legal centres, private practitioners, dispute resolution services and other relevant services, so that parties can get advice on family law issues.

The provision of adequate legal services is crucial, and Victoria Legal Aid and community legal centres must be resourced. In Chapter 16, we make recommendations for increased funding for legal services.

The Commission also heard that a lack of access to legal representation across both the state and federal courts can put victims of family violence in a situation where they have to cross-examine perpetrators. Whether amendments should be made to the Family Law Act, similar to those provisions regarding cross-examination in Victorian FVIO proceedings, so as to better protect victims of family violence during cross-examination in court hearings, is a matter for the Commonwealth Government.

A shared understanding of family violence

A belief among lawyers and the wider legal system that allegations of family violence are commonly made in order to gain advantage in negotiating disputes about parenting may imperil the safety of victims of family violence and their children. Such attitudes minimise the extent of family violence in our community and the harm it causes. Understanding by the court and legal profession of the tactics used by perpetrators of violence to further perpetrate abuse is essential.

The Commission understands that there are few private lawyers who practise in both the family law and child protection jurisdictions. Family lawyers (other than independent children’s lawyers appointed to represent children) may have limited understanding of family violence, while lawyers who act in child protection matters may have limited understanding of family law issues.

Lawyers who practise across jurisdictions can provide valuable knowledge and explanation to clients of what they can expect when they enter a new court process.

Best practice would see uniformity in approach amongst all courts—the family courts, the Magistrates’ Court and the Children’s Court—when responding to allegations of family violence. This would address the real concern that when ‘a matter moves from one jurisdiction to another, the import of violence is not lost’, that victims are safer and that perpetrator accountability is better assured.³³³ Our recommendation is designed to encourage lawyers to practise across jurisdictions.

The Commission acknowledges the concerns raised that family consultants do not always respond appropriately to allegations of family violence and the effect this has upon victims. Further education and training and accreditation of family consultants about the dynamics of family violence is a matter for the federal family courts, as are any processes to monitor and review their conduct.³³⁴ However, the Commission notes the importance of ensuring that parties to proceedings who have been affected by family violence have a clear understanding of the role of the family consultant. Family consultants are not there to make a determination as to whether violence occurred or not. That is a matter for a court to determine.

Improved information sharing

Information sharing is especially important in enabling federal and Victorian courts to identify and manage risks for victims of family violence and their children and to issue orders that are informed by orders issued or agreements made in other jurisdictions. We understand that another key benefit of information sharing is holistic service provision.³³⁵ Information sharing supports informed decision-making and helps reduce the effect of jurisdictional fragmentation. Information sharing may also help to reduce the need for victims of family violence to retell their story to multiple service providers.³³⁶

Over the past five years, numerous proposals have been made to improve information sharing between federal family courts, state courts and DHHS. The Family Law Council, in its interim report, supported the development of a national database of court orders to include federal family court orders, children’s court orders and magistrates’ court orders.³³⁷

The Commission supports the creation of a national database for state and federal courts. However, information exchange and access to the database in Victoria should extend further than providing access to court orders. It is also important that Victoria Police and Child Protection can access orders made in other jurisdictions, subject to appropriate qualifications to their access.

Though the streamlining of information regarding orders is important, so is access to information that supports the making of those orders. A national database should apply to relevant courts, police and Child Protection and should include the following information-sharing capabilities:

- ▷ The ability for each body to assess the status of proceedings that are currently being heard, or have previously been heard in other courts.
- ▷ The ability for each body to obtain copies of all court orders made in each jurisdiction, including interim orders and copies of family violence safety notices.
- ▷ The ability for each body to access copies of all judgments made in relation to orders, including short-form judgments and other judicial directions.
- ▷ The ability for each body to obtain copies of transcripts.
- ▷ The ability for each body to obtain copies of court applications and supporting documentation filed in proceedings, including copies of family violence safety notices, Child Protection disposition reports, reports filed as part of proceedings in the Magistrates’ Courts Criminal Division, and family consultant reports made in the federal family courts.

The Commission acknowledges there may be natural justice implications when reports, prepared for a specific court, are being shared between courts for a different purpose. The Commission supports a greater information exchange between courts and the family violence system in general, as explained in Chapter 7, but acknowledges that if reports are shared between courts and there is evidence relevant to a court's determination, then parties may have to call a report writer for cross-examination purposes. Understanding of that process would be difficult for self-litigants. Careful thought would need to be given to the sharing of this information, with appropriate qualifications.

We acknowledge that the development of such a database may continue to take some time, so interim measures are needed in Victoria to improve information flow between the Magistrates' Court, the Children's Court, DHHS, the federal family courts and police. In Chapter 7, we recommend implementation of a new information-sharing regime to be included in the Family Violence Protection Act. This will go some way to addressing information sharing between these bodies.

However, we consider that a formal information-sharing arrangement should be agreed between the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, the Children's Court and each of the federal family courts as a priority. Additionally, the protocol³³⁸ between DHHS, the Family Court and the FCC should be updated. Each of these formal instruments should include reference to the information-sharing regime in the Family Violence Protection Act, once it has been enacted. Court protocols should be regularly reviewed.

The Commission also agrees with the Family Law Council recommendation³³⁹ that there be regular meetings between stakeholders. We suggest that stakeholders include representatives of the state and federal courts, DHHS, Integrated Family Services, family violence services, and service providers from the federal family relationship services program, to consider how information sharing difficulties can be resolved.

Although confidentiality requirements impose restrictions on the exchange of information between DHHS and the family courts, the co-location of child protection practitioners at the Melbourne and Dandenong registries of the Family Court and FCC has helped to ensure that Children's Court orders are brought to the attention of the family courts. DHHS should continue funding and supporting the co-location initiative.

Neither protocols nor legislative changes will bring about changes in practice unless child protection workers and court staff in state and federal jurisdictions are supported by information and training. Further recommendations on these matters are made in Chapters 7 and 40.

Risk assessment

Inconsistent risk assessment practices may increase the risk of harm and require victims of family violence to re-tell their stories many times. Recommendation 1 in Chapter 6 proposes that the CRAF be revised to include an actuarial tool and that the revised CRAF include evidence-based risk factor indicators that are specific to children.

It is both confusing and undesirable for federal family courts to use different risk assessment tools from the tools used by state bodies. This problem should be addressed at a Commonwealth level.

Child contact centres

The Commission acknowledges the concerns raised about the funding and accreditation of child contact services. While this is a Commonwealth matter, we wish to emphasise that access to supervised contact centres is important to ensure that victims of family violence, and children affected by family violence, have a safe environment in which to have contact with an alleged perpetrator where contact is ordered by the court.

Recommendations

Recommendation 129

The Secretary of the Department of Justice and Regulation liaise with the Secretary of the Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department on a continuing basis to advocate for the adoption of family law reforms that reduce fragmentation of jurisdictions in cases involving family violence.

Recommendation 130

Victoria Police amend the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to refer to the existence of the Victoria Police power to arrest for breach of an injunction for personal protection under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and to encourage police to exercise that power. Victoria Police should provide training in relation to the existence of that power [within 12 months].

Recommendation 131

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments Law, Crime and Community Safety Council, pursue amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ provide that a breach of an injunction for personal protection is a criminal offence
- ▷ increase the monetary limit on the jurisdiction of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria to divide the property of parties to a marriage or a de facto relationship (section 46)
- ▷ make it clear that the Children's Court of Victoria can make orders under Part VII of the Family Law Act in the same circumstances as the Magistrates' Court of Victoria (sections 69J and 69N).

Recommendation 132

The Victorian Government amend sections 57 and 96 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ require magistrates to give an applicant, and a respondent if the respondent appears before the court, an explanation of how a family violence intervention order interacts with any existing or new Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) order or an order under the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic). This explanation should be given on the making of both an interim family violence intervention order and a final family violence intervention order
- ▷ if the court has varied, suspended, revoked or revived a Family Law Act order, require magistrates to explain the purpose, terms and effect on the family violence intervention order
- ▷ permit the court to request that the legal practitioner provide the requisite explanations when a person to whom the family violence intervention order is directed is legally represented
- ▷ if the parties do not appear before a magistrate, require the relevant court registrar to provide information in writing on the interaction between either an interim or final family violence intervention order and any applicable orders under the Family Law Act or the Children, Youth and Families Act.

Recommendation 133

The Victorian Government amend the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) to clarify that the Children's Court of Victoria has the same jurisdiction to make Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) parenting orders as the Magistrates' Court of Victoria [within 12 months].

Recommendation 134

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments Law, Crime and Community Safety Council, pursue [within two years]:

- ▷ the creation of a single database for family violence, child protection and family law orders, judgments, transcripts and other relevant court documentation that is accessible to each of the relevant state, territory and Commonwealth courts and other agencies as necessary
- ▷ the development of a national family violence risk assessment framework and tool and consistent use of such a framework or tool by state, territory and Commonwealth courts, lawyers, government and non-government service providers.

Recommendation 135

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria consider revising the form and content of family violence intervention order court applications and documentation [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ ensure that when proceedings are filed with the court both the affected person and the respondent are informed of the Magistrates' Court's jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). Such information should be available to parties in self-initiated applications and in proceedings initiated by a police family violence safety notice
- ▷ inform the applicant that the court may revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order pursuant to section 68R of the Family Law Act.

Recommendation 136

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the Children's Court of Victoria consider pursuing a formal information-sharing arrangement or protocol with the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia that is consistent with the new information-sharing regime in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), as recommended by the Commission [within 18 months]. The protocol should clearly set out the purpose of and principles for information exchange and allow communication between the jurisdictions in relation to process. Among the information to be exchanged between courts should be relevant court documents such as court orders, judgments, court reports and transcripts. The protocol should be regularly reviewed.

Recommendation 137

The Department of Health and Human Services support on a continuing basis the co-located child protection practitioner initiative in the Victorian registries of the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Endnotes

- 1 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence—A National Legal Response: Final Report, ALRC Report No 114, NSWLRC Report No 128 (2010).
- 2 Family Law Council, 'Interim Report to the Attorney-General: In Response to the First Two Terms of Reference on Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems' (June 2015).
- 3 Rae Kaspiew et al, Australian Institute of Family Studies (Cth), 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments: Synthesis Report' (October 2015).
- 4 Coroners Court of Victoria, 'Finding into Death with Inquest: Luke Geoffrey Batty' (28 September 2015).
- 5 Victorian Law Reform Commission, Review of Family Violence Laws: Report (2006).
- 6 Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act 1990 (Cth) s 51.
- 7 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 42. The Children's Court of Victoria also hears applications for family violence intervention orders.
- 8 The Family Division of the Children's Court of Victoria hears these applications: Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 515.
- 9 Lawrie Moloney et al, 'Allegations of Family Violence and Child Abuse in Family Law Children's Proceedings: A Pre-Reform Exploratory Study' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2007) 110; Thea Brown, 'Magellan's Discoveries: An Evaluation of a Program for Managing Family Court Parenting Disputes Involving Child Abuse Allegations' (2002) 40 Family Court Review 320, 322.
- 10 Belinda Fehlberg et al, Australian Family Law: The Contemporary Context (Oxford University Press, 2nd ed, 2015) 130.
- 11 For discussion of the origins of the Family Court of Australia as a specialist and 'helping' court see Helen Rhoades, 'The Helping Court: Exploring the Therapeutic Justice Origins of the Family Court of Australia' (2011) 2(1) Family Law Review 17, 18–19.
- 12 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Submission 999, 2.
- 13 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, 'Family Violence Plan 2014–16' (2014) 7.
- 14 Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Victoria: Circuit Court Dates <<http://www.federalcircuitcourt.gov.au/wps/wcm/connect/fccweb/court-lists-and-circuits/daily-court-lists>>.
- 15 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Submission 999, 3.
- 16 Ibid.
- 17 Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Protocol for the Division of Work between the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court (12 April 2013) <<http://www.federalcircuitcourt.gov.au/wps/wcm/connect/fccweb/about/corporate-information/protocol-for-division-of-work-fcoa-fcc>>.
- 18 Ibid.
- 19 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60I(7), (9)(b).
- 20 Family Relationships Online: Helping Families Build Better Relationships, Family Law Services <<http://www.familyrelationships.gov.au/Services/FamilyLawServices/Pages/default.aspx>>.
- 21 Fehlberg, above n 10, 479.
- 22 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60I(7).
- 23 Ibid s 60I(9)(b).
- 24 Ibid s 60J(1). Under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60J(2) this requirement does not apply if the court is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that there would be a risk of child abuse if the application for the order was delayed, or that there is a risk of family violence by one of the parties to the proceedings.
- 25 Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008 (Cth) reg 25(1).
- 26 Ibid reg 25(2).
- 27 Ibid reg 25(4).
- 28 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60I(8)(aa), (d).
- 29 Family Law Legislation (Family Violence and Other Measures) Amendment Act 2011 (Cth).
- 30 Attorney-General's Department, Family Violence <<http://www.ag.gov.au/FamiliesAndMarriage/Families/FamilyViolence/Pages/default.aspx>>.
- 31 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1; Richard Chisholm, Attorney-General's Department (Cth), 'Family Courts Violence Review' (November 2009); Monash University, University of South Australia, James Cook University, 'Family Violence and Family Law in Australia: The Experiences and Views of Children and Adults from Families who Separated Post-1995 and Post-2006' (prepared for the Attorney-General's Department (Cth), April 2010) Vol 2; Family Law Council, 'Improving Responses to Family Violence in the Family Law System: An Advice on the Intersection of Family Violence and Family Law Issues' (December 2009); Rae Kaspiew et al, Australian Institute of Family Studies (Cth), 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (December 2009).
- 32 Adiva Sifris and Anna Parker, 'Family Violence and Family Law: Where to Now?' (2014) Family Law Review 3, 5.
- 33 For a useful overview see Rae Kaspiew, 'Family Violence and Family Law Parenting Matters: the 2012 Family Law Reforms' (2012) 11(1) CDFVRe@der 3, 3.
- 34 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC(2), (2A).
- 35 Ibid s 4AB.
- 36 Ibid s 60D(2).
- 37 Ibid s 60D(1)(b)(ii).
- 38 Ibid ss 60CF(1), 60CH(1).
- 39 Ibid s 69ZQ.
- 40 Ibid s 60CG.
- 41 Ibid s 67ZBB.
- 42 This provision was formerly at s 60CC(3)(c) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). See also Sifris and Parker, above n 32, 5.
- 43 Sifris and Parker, above n 32, 5.
- 44 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC(3)(k).
- 45 Kaspiew et al, above n 3, vii.
- 46 Ibid ix–x, 44.
- 47 Ibid 35.
- 48 Ibid 51.
- 49 Ibid xi.
- 50 Ibid 37–8.
- 51 Ibid 81.
- 52 Australian Institute of Family Studies, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms: Executive Summary <<https://aifs.gov.au/sites/default/files/publication-documents/executivesummary.pdf>>.
- 53 Family Court of Australia, Family Consultants (1 March 2013) <<http://www.familycourt.gov.au/wps/wcm/connect/fcoaweb/reports-and-publications/publications/child+dispute+services/family-consultants>>.
- 54 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 11F.
- 55 Ibid s 62G(2).
- 56 Ibid s 11A.

57 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Submission 999, 15 [52].

58 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 11C, 62G(8).

59 Ibid s 60D(1)(a).

60 Ibid s 60D(1)(b).

61 Ibid s 68B(1)(a)–(b). See also s 114 of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) which relates to injunctions for the personal protection of a party to a marriage, which includes a void marriage.

62 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68B(1)(c)–(d).

63 Ibid s 4 (definition of ‘police officer’).

64 Ibid ss 68C, 114AA.

65 Ibid s 114AA(3)(a)(i). See also Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 114AA(7).

66 Ibid s 114AA(5).

67 Ibid ss 112AD(1), (2), (2A), 112AE.

68 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 59.

69 Sara Peel and Rosalind Croucher, ‘Mind(ing) the Gap: Law Reform Recommendations Responding to Child Protection in a Federal System’ (2011) 89 Family Matters 21, 28.

70 Family Law Section—Law Council of Australia, Submission 863, 9.

71 Ibid.

72 Victoria Police, ‘Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence—Edition 3’ (2014) 42 [5.14.2.2]–[5.14.2.3].

73 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 29.

74 Ibid 809.

75 Ibid 811.

76 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 92.

77 Ibid s 86.

78 Ibid ss 69J, 69N. The Magistrates’ Court of Victoria can determine children’s matters ‘including parenting orders, parenting plans, location and recovery of children, child maintenance and injunctions’: see Judicial College of Victoria, Family Law Manual, 1.2.

79 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), ss 39(2)–(6), 39B(2); Judicial College of Victoria, above n 78, 1.2.

80 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria and Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 23.

81 Ibid.

82 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 64DB.

83 Consent orders, although usually drafted by the parties, must be approved by the court. The Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth) r 10.15 sets out the procedure for applying for consent orders.

84 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 69J, 69N. See also Family Law Council, above n 2, 17.

85 Ibid s 69N(2).

86 Ibid s 69N(4).

87 Ibid s 65DAB.

88 Ibid s 63C(1).

89 Ibid ss 65DAB, 64D.

90 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 89(a).

91 Ibid s 90(2). See Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68R(4).

92 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68R(3)(b).

93 Ibid s 68T(1).

94 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 91–2.

95 Ibid s 92.

96 Ibid s 99. If no period is specified in the order, a final order remains in force until it is revoked by the court or set aside on appeal.

97 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68Q(1).

98 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 86.

99 Ibid.

100 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 46(1).

101 The original limit of $1000 was set by the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 46 when the original Act was introduced in 1975. The limit of $20,000 was later introduced by the Family Court of Australia (Additional Jurisdiction and Exercise of Powers) Act 1988 (Cth) s 26, as repealed by Amending Acts 1980 to 1989 Repeal Act 2015 (Cth).

102 Owen Camilleri, Tanya Corrie and Shorna Moore, ‘Restoring Financial Safety: Legal Responses to Economic Abuse’ (A Joint Project of Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand and Wyndham Legal Service, 2015) 15.

103 As mentioned earlier in this chapter, the number of family law matters finalised in the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria decreased from just over 3000 in 2000–01 to 1211 matters in 2013–14: Magistrates’ Court of Victoria and Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 23.

104 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 146–9.

105 Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 515.

106 Transcript of Chambers, 7 August 2015, 2243 [5]–[12].

107 Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (at 11 November 2014) 2.6.3; Judicial College of Victoria, above n 78, 1.7.

108 Victorian Law Reform Commission, above n 5, 259, 826.

109 Ibid xxxvii.

110 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 31.

111 Family Law Council, above n 2, 103–4.

112 Magistrates’ Court of Victoria and Children’s Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 64.

113 Ibid ix.

114 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) Long Title.

115 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 1.

116 Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) ss 1, 162.

117 Family Law Council, above n 2, 87.

118 Family Law Council, ‘Improving Responses to Family Violence in the Family Law System: An Advice on the Intersection of Family Violence and Family Law Issues’ (Commonwealth of Australia, Attorney-General’s Department, December 2009) 56.

119 Anonymous, Submission 683, 1.

120 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 52.

121 Ibid 144.

122 Family Law Council, above n 2, 102; Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 146.

123 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 148–50. For discussion of this option, see Family Law Council, above n 2, 72.

- 124 Peel and Croucher, above n 69, 24.
- 125 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 57.
- 126 Women's Legal Service Victoria—02, Submission 940, 12.
- 127 Ibid.
- 128 Springvale Monash Legal Service, Submission 807, 12.
- 129 Transcript of Broughton, 5 August 2015, 1967 [5]–[20].
- 130 Family law and Victorian family violence system roundtable discussion, Melbourne, 21 September 2015.
- 131 Family Law Council, above n 2, 104.
- 132 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 11.
- 133 Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (at 11 November 2014) <<http://www.judicialcollege.vic.edu.au/eManuals/FVBBWeb/index.htm#34143.htm>>.
- 134 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 5.
- 135 Senator The Hon George Brandis QC and Senator The Hon Michaelia Cash, 'National Family Violence Bench Book' (Media Release, 9 June 2015) <<https://www.attorneygeneral.gov.au/MediaReleases/Pages/2015/SecondQuarter/9-June-2015-National-Family-Violence-Bench-Book.aspx>>; Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 46.
- 136 Senator The Hon George Brandis QC and Senator The Hon Michaelia Cash, above n 135.
- 137 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 55 (citations omitted).
- 138 Judicial College of Victoria, above n 78.
- 139 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 28.
- 140 Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 4, 110.
- 141 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Recommendations in the Australian Law Reform Commission and the New South Wales Law Reform Commission Report: Family Violence—A National Legal Response' (October 2015), 18, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 13 October 2015.
- 142 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68T(1). Women's Legal Service Victoria—02, Submission 940, 12.
- 143 Women's Legal Service Victoria—02, Submission 940, 13.
- 144 Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 4, 107.
- 145 Family Law Amendment (Financial Agreements and Other Measures) Bill 2015 (Cth), Schedule 2, pt 1 div 1 cls 1–2.
- 146 Wyndham Legal Service Inc—02, Submission 83, 40.
- 147 Statement of Smallwood, 10 July 2015, 8 [40].
- 148 See, eg, Transcript of Smallwood, 16 July 2015, 521 [4]–[12]; Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, Attachment 2, 117; Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 102, 39–42; Emma Smallwood, 'Stepping Stones: Legal Barriers to Economic Equality After Family Violence' (Women's Legal Service Victoria, September 2015) 36–47.
- 149 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 2.
- 150 Transcript of Rich, 7 August 2015, 2297 [29]–[31]. See also Statement of Rich, 6 August 2015, 12–15 [50]–[58].
- 151 See, eg, Community consultation, Sandringham, 29 April 2015; Anonymous, Submission 54, 2; Anonymous, Submission 466, 4; Bethany Community Support, Submission 434, 19–20; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission 447, 14; Victorian Bar Inc, Submission 985, 7.
- 152 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 102, 39. See also Smallwood, 'Stepping Stones', above n 148, 37. Smallwood also notes that: 'There is a risk that victims of violence will not pursue their property entitlements after leaving a violent relationship due to the fear of being directly cross examined by their abusive ex-partner. This impediment to obtaining a property settlement is likely to have a negative impact on a woman's prospects of recovery from family violence' (Smallwood, 'Stepping Stones', above n 148, 43).
- 153 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 102, 42.
- 154 Statement of Matthews, 5 August 2015, 6 [26]. See also Smallwood, 'Stepping Stones', above n 148, 37.
- 155 Anonymous, Submission 414, 13.
- 156 Statement of Matthews, 5 August 2015, 12 [61].
- 157 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68Q(1).
- 158 Ibid s 68R(1)(a).
- 159 Anonymous, Submission 420, 3.
- 160 Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 4, 35.
- 161 Ibid 23.
- 162 Ibid 35.
- 163 Ibid 98 [544].
- 164 Ibid 35.
- 165 Ibid 41 [223]–[224].
- 166 Ibid 41 [225].
- 167 Victorian Law Reform Commission, above n 5, xlii.
- 168 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 65DA(2).
- 169 Ibid sub-s 65DA(3)(a). There are additional obligations under sub-s 65DA(3)(b) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) to explain the availability of location and recovery orders to ensure compliance with parenting orders. Subsection 65DA(5) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) dictates that where a party is legally represented, the court may request that the practitioner carry out the requirements under sub-ss 65DA(2)(a), (b), (3)(a) and (b).
- 170 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 57(1)(f).
- 171 Ibid s 57(1)(a).
- 172 Ibid s 57(1)(g).
- 173 Ibid s 96.
- 174 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 116.
- 175 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 71 (citations omitted).
- 176 Family law and Victorian family violence system roundtable discussion, Melbourne, 21 September 2015.
- 177 Victoria Legal Aid, 'Family Law Legal Aid Services Review—Final Report' (June 2015), 21, produced by Victoria Legal Aid in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 178 Ibid 22.
- 179 Transcript of Dotchin, 7 August 2015, 2244 [5]–[8].
- 180 Statement of McGregor, 6 August 2015, 8 [38].
- 181 Ibid 8 [39].
- 182 Ibid 9 [40].
- 183 Hanover Welfare Services and HomeGround Housing Services, Submission 652, 17.
- 184 Family Law Council, above n 2, 91 (citations omitted).

185 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Submission 999, 13 [43]. For wider discussion about the difference between criminal and family law proceedings and cross-examination in those two contexts, see Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Submission 999, 13 [44]–[55]. Also note the availability of duty lawyers in the federal family courts, including from Victoria Legal Aid, to provide representation on the day of hearing provided the party meets the eligibility test for a grant of legal aid: Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 61.

186 Anonymous, Submission 54, 2.

187 Note the court's ability under the Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) s 41 to disallow improper questions put to a witness in cross-examination.

188 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 70.

189 Ibid s 71 (emphasis added). See also Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 60.

190 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 71(4). Also note the court's ability to disallow improper questions or questioning put to a witness in cross-examination: Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 41.

191 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 72. See also Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 60.

192 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 60.

193 Statement of Counsel, 5 August 2015, 3 [11].

194 Ibid 3 [12].

195 Statement of 'Jones', 7 August 2015, 3 [15].

196 Ibid 3 [17].

197 Anonymous, Submission 739, 2.

198 Anonymous, Submission 100, 1.

199 Anonymous, Submission 234, 6.

200 Family law and Victorian family violence system roundtable discussion, Melbourne, 21 September 2015.

201 Doncaster Community Care and Counselling Centre Inc—Doncare, Submission 742, 15–16.

202 Women's Legal Service Victoria—02, Submission 940, 20.

203 Ibid.

204 Family Court of Australia, Federal Court of Australia, Child Dispute Services: Fact Sheet—Family Reports (1 November 2013) <<http://www.federalcircuitcourt.gov.au/wps/wcm/connect/fccweb/reports-and-publications/publications/publications/family-law/family-reports>>.

205 Women's Legal Service Victoria—02, Submission 940, 20.

206 Family Court of Australia, Federal Circuit Court of Australia and Family Court of Western Australia, 'Australian Standards of Practice for Family Assessments and Reporting' (February 2015) 6, 11.

207 Referred to as 'family assessors' under the standards. These standards cover family reports under Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 62G. See ibid 6.

208 Family Court of Australia, Federal Circuit Court of Australia and Family Court of Western Australia, above n 206, 9.

209 Ibid 23.

210 Ibid 24.

211 Women's Legal Service Victoria—02, Submission 940, 20.

212 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Submission 999, 15 (citations omitted).

213 Family Law Section—Law Council of Australia, Submission 863, 4.

214 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 22 May 2015.

215 Dads In Distress Support Services, Submission 493, 1.

216 VicHealth, 'Australians' Attitudes to Violence Against Women: Findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey' (September 2014) 13. There is no statistically significant difference between the responses to this question in 2009 and 2013. More than 10,000 people were interviewed in 2009 and more than 17,500 were interviewed in 2013.

217 Ibid.

218 See Richard Chisholm, 'Family Courts Violence Review' (prepared for the Attorney-General's Department (Cth), 27 November 2009) 47–48.

219 Michael Flood, False Allegations of Sexual Assault and Domestic Violence (prepared for VicHealth in August 2013) XY Online <<http://www.xyonline.net/content/false-allegations-sexual-assault-and-domestic-violence>>.

220 Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14' (January 2016), 43, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 8 January 2016.

221 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 20. The Commission notes that respondents may consent without admission to FVIOs for various reasons.

222 Fehlberg et al, above n 10, 163–4 (citations omitted).

223 These are discussed in the next section.

224 Kaspiew et al, above n 3, 69.

225 No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 50.

226 Anonymous, Submission 17, 1.

227 Lucinda Jordan and Lydia Phillips, 'Women's Experiences of Surviving Family Violence and Accessing the Magistrates' Court in Geelong, Victoria: Phase 1 of the Family Violence and the Victorian Regional Magistrates' Courts Research Project' (Deakin University, Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice, November 2013) 28.

228 Springvale Monash Legal Service, Submission 807, 10 (emphasis altered).

229 Camilleri, Corrie and Moore, above n 102, 39.

230 Ibid 15. Further issues were listed in the report. The issue of economic recovery of a victim of family violence is addressed in Chapter 21 of this report.

231 Wyndham Legal Service Inc—02, Submission 83, 42.

232 The Bill proposes a new s 45A be inserted into the Family Law Act: Family Law Amendment (Financial Agreements and Other Measures) Bill 2015 (Cth) cl 15.

233 Family Law Amendment (Financial Agreements and Other Measures) Bill 2015 (Cth) cl 15. These requirements are set out in sub-ss 1, 2, 3 of the proposed new s 45A of the Family Law Act.

234 See Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 20–2.

235 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 48.

236 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 89.

237 Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 20.

238 Magistrates roundtable discussion, Melbourne, 23 September 2015; Transcript of Hawkins, 4 August 2015, 1853 [26]–1854 [5].

239 Karen Gelb, 'Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria' (Report prepared for the Royal Commission into Family Violence, Karen Gelb Consulting, November 2015) 65.

240 Transcript of Hawkins, 4 August 2015, 1853 [26]–[28].

241 Ibid 1853 [26]–1854 [5].

242 Gelb, above n 239, 19.

243 Transcript of Dotchin, 7 August 2015, 2244 [10]–[21].

244 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, viii.

245 Family Law Council, above n 2, 106.

246 Council of Australian Governments, 'Second Action Plan 2013–2016: Moving Ahead of the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children 2010–2022' (June 2014) 29.

247 Statement of Counsel, 5 August 2015, 5 [20].

248 Victorian Bar Inc, Submission 985, 7 [19].

249 Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 21.

250 A person who is not a party to the proceedings 'may' inform the court of a family violence order: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 60CF(1)–(2).

251 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 69ZQ(1)(aa). The court must also ask whether the party considers that the child concerned has been, or is at risk of being, subjected to, exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence.

252 Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 20–1.

253 Family Law Council, above n 2, 88–9. See, eg, Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 121.

254 Family law and Victorian family violence system roundtable discussion, Melbourne, 21 September 2015.

255 See, eg, Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 121.

256 Ibid s 121(9)(a).

257 For the matters which must be taken into account see Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC.

258 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CC(3)(k).

259 If a non-party is aware of these matters the person may inform the Court: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CI.

260 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 60CI(1), 60CH(1).

261 Ibid s 69ZW(1).

262 Ibid s 69ZW(4).

263 See Department of Human Services, 'Protocol Between the Department of Human Services, the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Magistrates Court' (May 2011).

264 Ibid 6.

265 Ibid 18 [10.2].

266 See, eg, ibid 19 [10.3].

267 Ibid 12.

268 Ibid.

269 Ibid.

270 The definition of 'abuse' in relation to a child under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) includes assault, including sexual assault of a child or involving a child in sexual activity, serious neglect of the child, or causing a child to suffer serious psychological harm, including when that harm is caused by exposing a child to family violence: s 4.

271 See Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ss 67Z–67ZB.

272 See Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 (Cth) s 2.

273 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67Z(4). Regulations can add other people to those required to notify a child welfare authority: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67Z(4)(c).

274 Ibid s 67Z(2).

275 Ibid s 67ZBA. If a notice is filed under this section, 'the Registry Manager must deal with the notice as if it had been filed under s 67Z(2)': Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67ZBA(3)(b).

276 See Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67ZBB(3).

277 Ibid s 67Z(3).

278 Statement of Miller, 26 July 2015, 14 [46]–[48].

279 See Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 67ZA.

280 Ibid s 91B.

281 Statement of Miller, 26 July 2015, 20 [72].

282 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Submission 999, 19 [63].

283 Ibid 16 [57].

284 Ibid 16 [57]–[58].

285 Ibid 16 [57].

286 Statement of Miller, 26 July 2015, 18 [63]. The family courts can request the Secretary of DHHS to intervene in parenting proceedings: Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 91B.

287 Fehlberg et al, above n 10, 70.

288 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Submission 999, 19 [63].

289 Statement of Beaton, 12 October 2015, 5 [21.6(b)].

290 Fehlberg et al, above n 10, 70.

291 Liz Wall et al, Australian Institute of Family Studies (Cth), 'Evaluation of the Co-located Child Protection Practitioner Initiative' (July 2015) 6.

292 Ibid 80.

293 Ibid 98.

294 Ibid 103.

295 Ibid 60.

296 Ibid 62.

297 Ibid 65.

298 Ibid 102.

299 Ibid 97.

300 Ibid.

301 Ibid 102.

302 Ibid.

303 Section 205 and 206 of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) have not been amended, nor has the Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth), as has been the case with the inclusion of rule 23.01A(5) of the Federal Circuit Court Rules 2001 (Cth).

304 Fehlberg, above n 10, 149.

305 The Family Law Doors, Detection Of Overall Risk Screen <<http://www.familylawdoors.com.au/>>.

306 Kaspiew et al, above n 3, 45. Note the evaluation report does not specify how many people these percentages equate to. It provides that 653 professionals working across the family law system contribute to the data collection, but it is unclear how many answered this particular set of questions: Kaspiew et al, above n 3, 72.

307 Ibid 45.

308 EACH Social and Community Health, Submission 569, 15.

- 309 Sifris and Parker, above n 32, 12.
- 310 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, above n 13, 14.
- 311 Council of Australian Governments, above n 246, 29.
- 312 Family Law Section—Law Council of Australia, Submission 863, 10.
- 313 Ibid 10–12.
- 314 Cobaw Community Health, Submission 396, 5; Connections UnitingCare, Submission 398, 7; Wyndham City Council, Submission 518, 12; Family Life, Submission 758, 21.
- 315 Anonymous, Submission 782, 3; Family Life, Submission 758, 21.
- 316 Australian Children's Contact Services Association, Submission 194, 8.
- 317 Ibid 4.
- 318 Belinda Fehlberg and Christine Millward, 'Family Violence and Financial Outcomes after Parental Separation' in Alan Hayes and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policy and the Law: Selected essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies (Cth), 2014) 235.
- 319 Transcript of Smallwood, 16 July 2015, 521 [25]–[27]; Smallwood, 'Stepping Stones', above n 148, 37.
- 320 The original limit of $1000 was set by the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 46 when the original Act was introduced in 1975. The limit of $20,000 was later introduced by the Family Court of Australia (Additional Jurisdiction and Exercise of Powers) Act 1988 (Cth) s 26, as repealed by Amending Acts 1980 to 1989 Repeal Act 2015 (Cth).
- 321 Reserve Bank of Australia, Inflation Calculator <<http://www.rba.gov.au/calculator/annualDecimal.html>>.
- 322 Magistrates' Court Act 1989 (Vic) ss 3, 100.
- 323 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 60CA.
- 324 Ibid s 60CC(2)(b).
- 325 Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, 'Family Violence Best Practice Principles' (Edition 3.2, December 2015).
- 326 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 1.
- 327 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 28.
- 328 Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 4, 110.
- 329 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) s 68T(1).
- 330 Victorian Law Reform Commission, above n 5, xxxvii.
- 331 Family Law Council, above n 2, 103.
- 332 Victoria Legal Aid, above n 177, 22.
- 333 Statement of Counsel, 5 August 2015, 6–7 [24].
- 334 Women's Legal Service Victoria—02, Submission 940, 21.
- 335 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 1, 1398.
- 336 Ibid.
- 337 Family Law Council, above n 2, 106.
- 338 Department of Human Services, above n 263.
- 339 Family Law Council, above n 2, 106.

25 Review of family violence-related deaths

Introduction

Family violence-related deaths are the most extreme and tragic manifestations of family violence. In recent years, those working in the family violence system and the community as a whole have been deeply shocked and saddened by a number of family violence-related homicides. They have been increasingly focused on finding ways to better respond to and prevent these deaths. The jurisdiction of the Coroners Court has provided a significant opportunity to review the ways in which services respond to family violence and to identify the improvements that can be made. The inquest into the death of 11 year old Luke Batty, for example, resulted in a series of recommendations to prevent family violence and family violence-related deaths.

The Commission heard from a number of family members of people who have been killed by perpetrators of family violence.¹ Most of these victims were women killed by their partners. We reflect on the experiences of these families in Chapter 2. We acknowledge their terrible loss and their exceptional courage and generosity in helping us with our work.

The purpose of this chapter is to provide an overview of what we know about family violence-related deaths, and to consider the processes by which family violence-related deaths are investigated, and how those processes might be strengthened and supported. Other chapters in this report deal with particular aspects of family violence-related deaths and ways to prevent family violence.

The first section of this chapter outlines what is known about family violence-related deaths, including intimate partner homicide, the killing of a child by a parent or guardian ('filicide'), and suicide. Research shows that intimate partner violence is the most common cause of family violence-related deaths, followed by filicide. Intimate partner homicides often involve a recorded history of family violence. The data also shows a link between suicide and family violence. A substantial number of suicide deaths each year involve women with a reported history of family violence and men who are perpetrators of family violence. The section then considers the function of the Coroners Court in reviewing family violence-related deaths, and of the Commission for Children and Young People in reviewing the deaths of children who have had involvement with Child Protection.

The second section of this chapter considers particular issues raised by stakeholders about the way in which the current framework for the review of family violence-related deaths operates. Some of these issues relate specifically to inquests and investigations conducted by the Coroners Court. Other issues concern the need for additional funding to support data and research collection, as well as the scope of the Commission for Children and Young People's power to conduct child death inquiries.

It is the Commission's view that although there is scope for improvement, the overall framework for the review of family violence-related deaths in Victoria is sound. In the final section of this chapter the Commission recommends that the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths should be statutorily established and allocated funding that is adequate to achieve its aims. The review can place a unique focus on specific cases and contribute to our understanding of family violence. It can also address gaps in research to ensure that opportunities for the prevention of family violence-related deaths are identified and pursued.

Context and current practice

This section outlines what is known about family violence-related deaths. It also briefly considers the mechanisms in Victoria to investigate family violence-related deaths, namely: coronial investigations and inquests by the Coroners Court; the Systematic Review of Family Violence Deaths by the Coroners Court; and Child Death Inquiries by the Commission for Children and Young People.

Much of the information about family violence-related deaths is expressed in statistics and figures. Information of this kind is obviously invaluable. Yet it is important to remember that these numbers and figures represent human lives that have been tragically lost in violent circumstances.

Family violence-related deaths

'Domestic homicides'² are recorded by the Australian Institute of Criminology's National Homicide Monitoring Program.³ The NHMP relies primarily on police offence records and state coronial findings. The most recent NHMP report covers the period from 1 July 2010 to 30 June 2012.

As shown in Table 25.1, of the 96 homicide incidents in Victoria during the reporting period, almost a third were domestic homicides. As shown in Figure 25.1, across Australia intimate partner incidents were most common, followed by filicide.

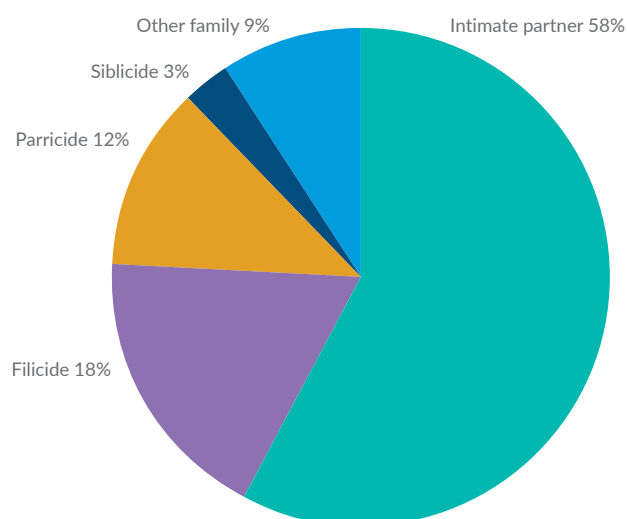

Table 25.1 Homicide: relationship to perpetrator, by jurisdiction, 2010–12 (percentages)

Type of homicide	NSW (n=148)	Vic (n=96)	Qld (n=96)	WA (n=66)	SA (n=36)	Tas (n=9)	NT (n=24)	ACT (n=4)	National (n=479)
Domestic	39	31	49	30	36	22	67	50	39
Acquaintance	33	44	27	47	36	78	29	0	37
Stranger	12	9	8	11	17	0	4	50	11
Unclassified	16	16	16	12	11	0	0	0	14

Note: Percentages might not add to 100 due to rounding.

Source: Australian Institute of Criminology, National Homicide Monitoring Program 2010–12.⁴

Figure 25.1 Australia-wide domestic homicide incidents, by sub-classification, 2010–12

Source: Australian Institute of Criminology's National Homicide Monitoring Program.⁵

In May 2015, the Australian Institute of Criminology published a research note on 'domestic/family homicide in Australia' which provides deeper analyses of this specific homicide type.⁶ The following results are of particular note:

- ▷ Of the 2631 homicide incidents across Australia documented by the NHMP over the 10 years from 2002–03 to 2011–12, 1088 (41 per cent) were domestic/family homicides, involving 1158 victims and 1184 offenders.⁷
- ▷ Intimate partners accounted for 23 per cent of all homicide victims recorded since 1 July 2003.⁸
- ▷ Most victims of domestic/family homicide (60 per cent) were female; they accounted for 75 per cent ($n=488$) of all intimate partner homicides. However, males were more likely to be victims of filicides (56 per cent, $n=132$), homicides committed by their child ('parricides') (54 per cent, $n=73$), sibling killings ('siblicides') (80 per cent, $n=32$) and homicides in other family relationships (70 per cent, $n=64$).⁹
- ▷ One-third ($n=366$) of domestic/family homicides and 44 per cent ($n=289$) of intimate partner homicides involved a recorded history of domestic/family violence that may have included a current or former protection order.¹⁰

The Australian Institute of Criminology also explored the prevalence of associated factors (see Table 25.2).¹¹ These included a prior history of domestic or family violence; the offender being on bail, parole or probation; perpetrator suicide before or after arrest; and the involvement of drugs or alcohol in a particular incident.¹² In Chapter 6 we discuss improvements to risk assessment and management, including recommendations made by the Coroner in this regard.

Table 25.2 Additional characteristics in homicide incidents, 2002–03 to 2011–12

Characteristic	Intimate partner		Filicide		Parricide		Siblicide		Other family		All other homicides
	n	%	n	%	n	%	n	%	n	%	n	%
Prior history of domestic violence	289	44	41	22	23	18	3	8	10	12	n.a.
Offender on bail, parole or probation at time of incident	40	6	5	3	6	5	1	3	4	5	112	9
Offender suicided prior to or following arrest	75	11	29	16	5	4	0	0	2	2	25	2
Incident involving presence of alcohol—victim	226	35	2	1	30	23	21	57	25	30	627	41
Incident involving presence of alcohol—offender	235	36	20	11	27	21	17	46	35	42	509	40
Incident involving presence of alcohol—victim and offender	180	28	2	1	17	13	17	46	23	28	379	30
Incident involving presence of drugs—victim	122	19	12	7	10	8	10	27	13	16	405	26
Incident involving presence of drugs—offender	78	12	34	18	16	13	3	8	5	6	213	17
Incident involving presence of drugs—victim and offender	51	8	4	2	1	1	3	8	3	4	102	8

Note: Offender n relates to the primary offender in each incident. For relationship category 'all other homicides' only 1268 incidents involved an identified offender.

Source: Tracy Cussen and Willow Bryant, 'Domestic/Family Homicide in Australia' (Research in Practice No 38, May 2015) 7 citing Australian Institute of Criminology, National Homicide Monitoring Program 1989–90 to 2011–12.

The Commission was also told that family violence-related homicides tend to be more common post-separation.¹³

The NHMP adopts a constrained definition of homicide.¹⁴ By contrast, the first report of the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths carried out through the Coroners Court, which counts family violence-related deaths in Victoria over an 11-year period, adopts a more nuanced definition; it includes instances of criminal negligence, and cases where criminal responsibility did not arise, for example, because of mental impairment or circumstances of self-defence.¹⁵

The VSRFVD published a report in 2012. As outlined in Table 25.3, it identified 288 'relevant' deaths in Victoria between 1 January 2000 and 31 December 2010. Consistent with national data, the largest group of these deaths (136 deaths or 47.2 per cent) were intimate partner homicides, with the next most common category being filicides (75 deaths or 26 per cent).

Table 25.3 VSRFVD-relevant homicides by sex of deceased and nature of relationship with offender

Nature of relationship	Sex of deceased
	Female		Male		Total
	n	%	n	%	n	%
Intimate partner	103	68.7	33	23.9	136	47.2
Parent-child	26	17.3	49	35.5	75	26.0
Other familial	12	8.0	22	15.9	34	11.8
Non-familial (bystander)	0	0.0	22	15.9	22	7.6
Sexual relationship	9	6.0	12	8.7	21	7.3
Total	150	100.0	138	100.0	288	100.0

Source: Coroners Court of Victoria, Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths: First Report (2012) 25.¹⁶

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples and family violence-related deaths

The research shows that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people are over-represented as victims and perpetrators in intimate partner homicides.¹⁷ A further research note by the Australian Institute of Criminology centred on 'Indigenous and non-Indigenous homicide in Australia'.¹⁸ The note highlighted that between 1989-90 and 2011-12:

- ▷ Domestic/family homicides accounted for 67 per cent ($n=511$) of all homicide incidents where both victim and offender were Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander persons.¹⁹
- ▷ Thirty-eight per cent of all homicide incidents where both victim and offender were Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander persons were intimate partner homicides, compared with 20 per cent for non-Indigenous homicides.²⁰
- ▷ Seventy-eight per cent of all female Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander homicide victims, and 44 per cent of all male Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander homicide victims were victims of domestic/family homicide.²¹ By comparison, the rates for non-Indigenous women and men in the same period were 64 per cent and 22 per cent respectively.²²

Filicide

Filicide, or the killing of a child by a parent or guardian, is a form of family violence.²³ Approximately 27 children are killed by a parent in Australia each year.²⁴ Professor Margarita Frederico, Associate Professor and Graduate Research Coordinator in Social Work and Policy at La Trobe University, gave evidence that this is a high rate of filicide compared to the UK and Canada.²⁵ Based on the data in the 2015 Australian Institute of Criminology analysis of family violence homicides, filicide was the only category of family violence homicides in which women accounted for the majority (52 per cent) of perpetrators.²⁶

The Monash University Filicide Project undertook a study into the issue of filicide in Victoria and found that in the decade 2000 to 2009 there were an average of 5.7 filicide deaths per year in Victoria.²⁷

The most common factor present in perpetrator groups in cases of filicide was mental illness.²⁸ The study also found that parental separation was a key factor in many cases of filicide and that most perpetrators had had prior contact with community services, suggesting the need for services to improve their capacity to identify and support families at risk of filicide.²⁹ The third most common factor was family violence.³⁰

'Retaliatory' filicide can occur in the post-separation period, where perpetrators who are motivated by anger against an intimate partner project that onto the child.³¹ The Supreme Court of Victoria told the Commission that:

The Court has in recent years seen a number of murders of children following the end of the parents' relationship, each motivated by the resentment of the father about that event and some in the midst of an ongoing family law dispute.³²

There have been a number of filicides perpetrated by fathers in recent years following separation from the child's mother.³³

The Monash University Filicide Project told the Commission that family violence often co-exists with filicide, although research into filicide is 'embryonic'.³⁴ One study found that for those children killed by their step-father, family violence was often present, with many of these children and their mothers having suffered abuse before the child was killed.³⁵ Some mothers who had committed filicide had been victims of family violence perpetrated by the child's father.³⁶ Some fathers who had committed filicide had perpetrated violence against the children's mother, and even more had abused the child before their death.³⁷

The Monash University Filicide Project also told the Commission that filicide is generally considered within the child protection framework instead of the family violence framework.³⁸ In addition, although the individual tragedies of child deaths as a result of filicide are recognised by the community when they occur and investigated by a coroner, the deaths are often not examined beyond that and there is no adequate development of policies, programs or professional expertise to address the issue of filicide.³⁹ The issue of the uptake of recommendations from death reviews is discussed further below.

Other issues relating to family violence perpetrated by parents towards their children are considered in Chapters 10 and 11.

Suicide

There is a link between suicide and family violence. An examination by the Coroners Court of Victoria of the Victorian Suicide Register showed that about a quarter of 550 suicide deaths each year from 2009 to 2012 involved women and of these, nearly 35 per cent (or approximately 50 deaths) had a reported history of family violence.⁴⁰ Studies have shown that women who are sexually abused by an intimate partner are more likely to suffer suicidal thoughts and depression compared with women who have experienced other physical violence.⁴¹ Sexual assault in the context of family violence is discussed in greater detail in Chapter 12.

The Coroners Court also found that a significant number of men who committed suicide during that period had a history of family violence (as perpetrators).⁴² Many would have had contact with the police within 12 months of their deaths.⁴³ The Commission notes the recent finding by the Coroners Court in the Inquest into the Death of Andrew Stanyer, which discussed prevention opportunities within Victoria Police.⁴⁴

Reviews of family violence–related deaths

The Commission heard about the following mechanisms to investigate family violence–related deaths in Victoria:

- ▷ coronial investigations and inquests
- ▷ the Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths by the Coroners Court
- ▷ child death inquiries by the Commission for Children and Young People.

These mechanisms are discussed below.

Coronial investigations and inquests

The Coroners Court of Victoria is a specialist court empowered to investigate certain types of death. The purpose of these investigations is to consider ways that similar deaths may be prevented in the future. The Coroners Act 2008 (Vic) provides that a coroner has jurisdiction to investigate a family violence death and to make recommendations to any Minister, public statutory authority or entity, relating to issues of public health and safety and the administration of justice.⁴⁵

The Coroners Court can hold an inquest into any death it is investigating.⁴⁶ In exercising the discretion to hold an inquest, a coroner may take into account a number of factors; for example, whether the cause of death cannot be established without an inquest, the efficient use of resources by the coroner and whether an inquest is likely to uncover systemic defects or risks not already known.⁴⁷

A person may request an inquest; the coroner must respond in writing, providing reasons for their decision.⁴⁸ Guidelines on when inquests are held have recently been published by the court.⁴⁹

In certain circumstances the Coroners Court must hold an inquest into a death (subject to exceptions, such as where a person has been charged with an indictable offence in relation to the death). These include where:

- ▷ the coroner suspects the death was the result of homicide, or
- ▷ the deceased was, immediately before death, a person placed in custody or care, or
- ▷ the identity of the deceased is unknown.⁵⁰

Roughly five per cent of all coronial investigations (including those not involving family violence) proceed to an inquest.⁵¹ Even where a matter does not proceed to an inquest, it is still subject to investigation.⁵² During the inquest, the coroner may call on witnesses and interested parties may provide the coroner with statements or documents.⁵³ At the end of the inquest the coroner completes a finding, which sets out the identity of the person who died, where and when the death occurred and the circumstances of the death, if possible.⁵⁴ The finding can also include recommendations to improve public health or safety or the administration of justice.⁵⁵ Where a recommendation is made to a private or public organisation, that organisation is required to respond to the coroner within three months.⁵⁶

The Coroners Court publishes a breakdown of statistics on the responses it receives to its recommendations in its annual report.⁵⁷

To support families during the process, the Coroners Court has family liaison officers who can also provide referral information for relevant agencies.⁵⁸ In addition, its website has information on the coronial process.⁵⁹

Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths

In 2009 the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths began running in the Victorian Coroners Court to assist with coronial investigations into family violence-related deaths. The aims of the VSRFVD are to:

- ▷ examine the context in which family violence-related deaths occur
- ▷ identify risk and contributory factors associated with family violence
- ▷ identify trends or patterns in family violence-related deaths
- ▷ consider current systemic responses to family violence
- ▷ provide an evidence base for coroners to support the formulation of recommendations aimed at preventing and reducing family violence.⁶⁰

The Coroners Court told the Commission:

... the VSRFVD seeks to improve the understanding of the human and systemic factors specific to a death to identify opportunities to improve systems, policies and service responses for both victims and perpetrators of family violence ... efforts are expended to engage with stakeholders, experts and the wider community for the purpose of informing the VSRFVD and connecting it to relevant family violence initiatives in Victoria.⁶¹

The first report of the VSRFVD considered case reviews of deaths attributable to homicide, homicide-suicide and suicide in the context of family violence. In addition, incidents in which family violence was identified as a contributory factor without being the immediate cause of death, were examined.⁶²

The Coroners Court recently received $1.2 million in funding to support the VSRFVD, beginning in July 2015 for four years.⁶³ This funding has allowed the court to re-establish resourcing at the level it had when the review was first established.⁶⁴ It had received initial funding to set up the process and another block in 2014 but there has not been a consistent funding stream.⁶⁵

The VSRFVD is part of the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, which is aligned to the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children.⁶⁶ A central component of the VSRFVD involves data collection and analysis of family violence-related deaths. The VSRFVD receives expert advice and consultative support from a Reference Group, which is comprised of members from both government and non-government organisations.⁶⁷

Recently a panel was established to allow representatives from the family violence sector to contribute to coronial family violence case reviews and to strengthen the recommendations given to coroners.⁶⁸

The Coroners Prevention Unit supports coroners in their prevention role and the work of the VSRFVD.⁶⁹ In particular, the CPU:

- ▷ draws on a range of material (e.g. literature, legislation, policies and guidelines) to apply to the death under investigation⁷⁰
- ▷ records standardised information, including information on contributing factors, in a surveillance system in the areas of suicide (the Victorian Suicide Register), drugs and homicide (the Victorian Homicide Register)⁷¹
- ▷ performs quantitative and qualitative analyses based on this information in combination with policy analysis and stakeholder consultation, to provide advice to coroners on recommendations.⁷²

Child death inquiries by the Commission for Children and Young People

The Commission for Children and Young People is required by the Commission for Children and Young People Act 2012 (Vic) to conduct inquiries in relation to a child who has died in certain circumstances.⁷³

The CCYP must conduct inquiries in relation to a child who has died and who was a child protection client at the time of their death or within 12 months before their death.⁷⁴ The inquiry must relate to the 'services' provided or which failed to be provided to the child before their death.⁷⁵

The CCYP also has a discretionary power to conduct inquiries concerning the safety and wellbeing of any vulnerable child or young person, including those who have died.⁷⁶ Again, the inquiry must relate to the 'services' provided or which failed to be provided to the vulnerable children or young persons.⁷⁷

The purpose of these inquiries is to improve policies and practices relating to child protection and the safety and wellbeing of children and young people.⁷⁸ Recommendations are made to the relevant Minister and Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services.⁷⁹

The power of the CCYP to conduct these inquiries is additional to the powers of the police or coroner to investigate the death of the child.⁸⁰

The CCYP told the Commission that of the 54 inquiries it conducted between 2013 and 2014, family violence was a theme in 32, or nearly 60 per cent, of inquiries, which demonstrates the intersection between family violence and child abuse and neglect.⁸¹ Ms Brenda Boland, Chief Executive Officer at the Commission for Children and Young People, gave evidence that inquiries are generally carried out where there has been substantial involvement by Child Protection or serious errors in risk assessment that are likely to have resulted in the death of the child.⁸²

Child death inquiry reports are not made publicly available.⁸³ However, they are sent to relevant agencies and are discussed with the parents involved.⁸⁴ The Commission was told that limiting the release of the reports encourages cooperation and candour by the parties involved in the inquiry and is respectful of the family's situation.⁸⁵ General themes and statistics are identified in annual publications.⁸⁶

Challenges and opportunities

This section discusses the evidence given to the Commission about the importance of family violence-related death reviews. Some stakeholders also raised particular issues about the way in which the current framework operates. Some of these issues relate specifically to inquests and investigations conducted by the Coroners Court. Other issues concern the need for additional funding to support data collection and research as well as the scope of the CCYP's power to conduct child death inquiries. These are discussed in turn.

Importance of family violence-related death reviews

The Commission heard how a strong family violence-related death review process can identify the risk factors that led to the deaths and how these risks could be addressed.⁸⁷ In particular, the Commission was told that a strong review process can generate information that could inform the risk assessment framework, including the refinement of the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or (CRAF), which is discussed in more detail in Chapter 6.⁸⁸

The Coroners Court submitted that the VSRFVD's first research report identified the people who had contact with the service system six months prior to their death.⁸⁹ The Commission heard how information from death review processes could help better identify intervention points in situations of family violence⁹⁰ and lead to the development of strategies that reduce the incidence of family violence.⁹¹

The Coroners Court

The Federation of Community Legal Centres noted the importance of ensuring that all family violence-related deaths are thoroughly investigated, especially for the families of the deceased.⁹²

The Commission heard from the former State Coroner, Judge Ian Gray that an inquest is only one means to further a coronial investigation.⁹³ Judge Gray explained that the provisions in the Coroners Act are designed to avoid unnecessary duplication of investigations and to take account of the emotional burden that holding an inquest would place on interested parties.⁹⁴

The Federation also told the Commission about delays in the police conduct of coronial investigations and perceived conflicts of interest when police investigate deaths with which their colleagues have been involved.⁹⁵

Dr Lyndal Bugeja, Manager of the Coroners Prevention Unit at the Coroners Court, gave evidence about coronial investigations taking time, for example due to a pending criminal proceeding and/or the CPU having to follow up and review information, including medical records and statements.⁹⁶ Dr Bugeja stated that where a death does not involve a criminal process, there are stringent timelines around investigations by the police and a process of following up briefs that are not provided promptly.⁹⁷ Dr Bugeja also noted other steps the Coroners Court is taking to expedite the process; for example, by ensuring that the court is provided with briefs of evidence earlier.⁹⁸

The Commission also heard about challenges for bereaved families because of delays, a lack of information on their right to participate and difficulty accessing legal aid or advice.⁹⁹ The Federation submitted that support for such families should be improved.¹⁰⁰ The Federation recently started a project to help families bereaved by family violence-related deaths to access legal and other assistance during the coronial process.¹⁰¹

The Federation also told the Commission that there is a lack of monitoring of whether, or how, services respond to coronial recommendations, particularly those made before 1 November 2009 (after which responses to coronial recommendations became mandatory).¹⁰²

In Chapter 38 the Commission proposes the establishment of the Family Violence Agency, and articulates the functions of the agency, which include monitoring family violence-related reforms and developments. Monitoring the adoption and implementation of the Coroners Court recommendations could be part of that function.

Funding for the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths

The Commission heard from both the Federation of Community Legal Centres and the Coroners Court that insufficient funding for the VSRFVD is hampering its efforts. The Federation stated that the potential of VSRFVD has not been realised, due largely to a lack of resources; for example, it has not produced a research report since 2012.¹⁰³ It also noted that a lack of funding has affected the role of the CPU.¹⁰⁴ It submitted that the VSRFVD should be statutorily established with secure, adequate funding.¹⁰⁵

The Coroners Court also indicated that ongoing research support would help the Coroners Court to realise the potential for its Victorian Suicide Register to contribute to a reduction in deaths related to family violence. The Coroners Court said that the Register could generate the information necessary to develop a better understanding of men who have perpetrated family violence and commit suicide.¹⁰⁶ It also stated that the Register could contribute more broadly to a reduction in family violence-related deaths.¹⁰⁷ A better understanding of the precipitants of violent behaviour together with investigating solutions and better access to services might mitigate this risk.¹⁰⁸ The Commission notes that the Victorian Suicide Register's current funding expired in October 2015.¹⁰⁹

The Coroners Court also told the Commission that given its family violence resources have been focused on coronial investigations, the development of its surveillance system for family violence homicide has not progressed as quickly as it could have.¹¹⁰ The Coroners Court stated that at this stage, its system contains basic descriptive statistics on the frequency and nature of family violence homicide but that substantial work needs to be done on the risk factors associated with these deaths. The Coroners Court submitted that gathering this information and linking it to other sources of data across the health, legal, community welfare and specialist family violence services is critical to formulating family violence interventions in Victoria and has the potential to reduce the number of family violence-related deaths.¹¹¹ It recommended that the court be provided with additional resources to lead a prevention-oriented research program, through an expansion of the VSRFVD.¹¹²

Child death inquiries by the Commission for Children and Young People

The Commission heard some support for extending the statutory requirement to conduct child death inquiries. Currently if a child was not a child protection client (or was not a child protection client in the 12 months prior to their death) the CCYP is not required to inquire into their death. For example, children who are in contact with Child FIRST are not included in the requirement.¹¹³

An inquiry by the CCYP must also relate to the 'services' provided or that have failed to be provided to the child before their death.¹¹⁴ The Commission heard that the CCYP takes the view that police and courts are excluded from the inquiries concerning the death of child protection clients because they are not defined to be services.¹¹⁵ In cases where a child dies more than 12 months after being a client of Child Protection, and the involvement of Child Protection (and indeed other agencies) may be relevant to their death, it is open, however, to a coroner to consider the role and responsibilities of these agencies.

Professor Chris Goddard, Director of Child Abuse Prevention Research at Monash University, discussed the importance of reviewing cases to find out why children were not known to Child Protection.¹¹⁶ Professor Goddard suggested that such reviews would also provide an opportunity to examine practices by other parties besides Child Protection, such as the police.¹¹⁷ He expressed support for having a review process for all child deaths due to abuse and neglect.¹¹⁸

Concern was also expressed about expanding these inquiries. The then Commissioner for Children and Young People, Mr Bernie Geary OAM cautioned that such inquiries could lose their focus on Child Protection if they were extended to other cases.¹¹⁹

Enhancing national data collection in family violence-related deaths

The Commission heard about gaps in data collection on family violence-related deaths. For example, the Royal Australasian College of Surgeons noted that there was no flag for family violence-related deaths in the National Coronial Information System.¹²⁰ The National Coronial Information System is an internet-based data storage and retrieval system for Australian and New Zealand coronial cases.

During the preparation of this report, the Commission was told by the Australian Human Rights Commission that it had started work on a project to help standardise family violence death data and reporting across Australian jurisdictions.¹²¹ The project has a particular focus on addressing violence against women as a matter of human rights and sex discrimination, and reviewing the impact of laws, policies and programs in this area on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples. The project's stakeholders include Commonwealth, state and territory ministers, coroners, family violence death review teams and specialist family violence service providers.

Part of the project's aim is to help redress current gaps in data collection. A further role for the project is to raise awareness of the need to record, monitor and make recommendations about family violence-related deaths in the Commonwealth jurisdiction, and the need for a system to monitor coronial recommendations directed to Commonwealth agencies. At the date of writing, the final report is forthcoming.

The way forward

Prevention of family violence-related deaths is the responsibility of the whole system. Our discussion in other chapters about risk assessment and risk management; the need to focus on perpetrators as well as victims; the need for improved data collection and research, and careful and timely information sharing between courts, police and specialist services; as well as the need for improvement within these organisations, is grounded in an awareness that failing to prevent the occurrence and escalation of family violence can result in death.

Reviews of family violence-related deaths have the potential to actively contribute to solutions that reduce family violence in all its forms. Investigations of family violence-related deaths can produce critical information through data collection and analysis that helps to identify intervention points, inform responses and ultimately improve safety. While there is scope to improve aspects of the current approach to reviewing family violence-related deaths, the Commission is of the view that the current framework is sound.

The Coroners Court

In relation to the Federation of Community Legal Services' concerns about what matters proceed to inquest, the Commission considers that the current criteria for requiring an inquest are sufficient to ensure that all family violence-related deaths are thoroughly investigated. As noted by Judge Gray, an inquest is only one means to further a coronial investigation. Even when a matter does not proceed to an inquest, it is still subject to investigation. The Commission notes that guidelines recently published by the court on when inquests are held should provide greater transparency in the process.

Concerns were expressed to the Commission about delays in the conduct of coronial investigations. It is important that coronial investigations be conducted in a timely manner. Delay in the conduct of investigations can cause bereaved family members additional distress. The Commission heard that there can be various reasons for delay, including a pending criminal proceeding and the Coroners Prevention Unit having to follow up and review information. The Commission notes that the Coroners Court is taking steps to expedite the process; for example, by ensuring that the court is provided with briefs of evidence earlier. The Commission hopes these efforts will have a positive impact.

The Commission also notes that the Federation of Community Legal Centres has recently started a project to help families bereaved by family violence-related death to access legal and other assistance during the coronial process, and that the Coroners Court has family liaison officers who provide assistance and information to families. The Commission encourages the Coroners Court to consider any other opportunities for proactive engagement with bereaved family members.

Child death inquiries by the Commission for Children and Young People

The Commission heard some support for extending the statutory requirement for the Commission for Children and Young People to conduct child death inquiries. However, in our view, broadening the criteria for child death inquiries may mean conducting inquiries into situations that involve a determination of whether other agencies or factors have played a role in a child's death. This is complex, multi-faceted work which, in the Commission's view, requires the broader focus and expertise of the Coroners Court's family violence death investigation process. We consider that the existing process is already sufficient for the investigation of child deaths, and there is no necessity to expand the nature of child death inquiries by the Commission for Children and Young People.

Funding for the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths

The Commission considers that the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths process has clear benefits. It can bring a high level of skill and expertise to examining the deaths of children and adults who die in the context of family violence, adding to our knowledge of family violence and encouraging continuous improvement. The Commission heard about gaps in current research and data collection on family violence-related deaths. The VSRFVD has the potential to address gaps in research and data collection to ensure that opportunities to prevent family violence-related deaths are identified and pursued. The Commission also welcomes the Australian Human Rights Commission's project to help standardise family violence death data and reporting across Australian jurisdictions.

The Commission anticipates that with adequate and certain funding the VSRFVD will be able to ensure the most efficient and meaningful approach to examining family violence-related deaths in Victoria.

We recommend that the VSRFVD should therefore be statutorily established with funding that is sustained and adequate to achieve its aims. Funding should ensure that the Coroners Court is able to lead a prevention-orientated research program through an expansion of the VSRFVD.

Recommendation 138

The Victorian Government establish a legislative basis for the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths and provide adequate funding to enable the Coroners Court of Victoria to perform this function [within 12 months].

Endnotes

- 1 See, eg, Phil Cleary, Submission 470; Wendy and John Thompson, Submission 1000; Chawla Family, Submission 422; Jesse O'Donnell, Submission 380; Craig O'Donnell, Submission 657; Kerryn Robertson, Submission 219; Del and Veronica St Clair, Submission 155; Natalie Suleyman—Member for St Albans, Submission 733.
- 2 An incident involving the death of a family member or other person from a domestic relationship. This includes intimate partner homicides, filicides (children being killed by custodial or non-custodial parents, including step-parents), parricides (where a child kills a custodial or non-custodial parent), sibling homicides and 'other family' homicides (cousins, aunt/uncle, grandparent, etc). Willow Bryant and Tracy Cussen, 'Homicide in Australia: 2010-11 to 2011-12: National Homicide Monitoring Program Report' (Monitoring Reports No 23, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2015) 5.
- 3 Ibid.
- 4 Ibid 8.
- 5 Ibid 7.
- 6 Tracy Cussen and Willow Bryant, 'Domestic/Family Homicide in Australia' (Research in Practice No 38, Australian Institute of Criminology, May 2015) 2-3, 6-7.
- 7 Ibid 2.
- 8 Ibid.
- 9 Ibid 3.
- 10 Ibid 6.
- 11 Ibid 7.
- 12 Ibid.
- 13 Transcript of Miller, 14 July 2015, 135 [3]-[4]; Transcript of Plunkett, 23 July 2015, 1300 [15]-[20]. See also Coroners Court of Victoria, 'Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths: First Report' (November 2012) 32; Alison Wallace 'Homicide the social reality' (New South Wales Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research, Attorney General's Department, 1986) 112.
- 14 All cases resulting in charges of murder or manslaughter; all murder-suicides classed as murder by police; and all other deaths classed by police as homicides, whether offender apprehended or not: Bryant and Cussen, above n 2, 1.
- 15 Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 13, 7, 13.
- 16 Ibid 25.
- 17 Tracy Cussen and Willow Bryant, 'Indigenous and Non-Indigenous Homicide in Australia' (Research in Practice No 37, Australian Institute of Criminology, May 2015) 1.
- 18 Ibid 2, 5, 7.
- 19 Ibid 2, 3.
- 20 Ibid.
- 21 Ibid 5.
- 22 Ibid.
- 23 Monash Filicide Project—Monash University, Submission 167, 3.
- 24 Debbie Kirkwood, 'Just Say Goodbye'—Parents Who Kill Their Children in the Context of Separation' (Discussion Paper No 8, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, January 2012) 15.
- 25 Transcript of Frederico, 14 October 2015, 3635 [12]-[18].
- 26 Cussen and Bryant, Homicide in Australia, above n 2, 3.
- 27 Monash Filicide Project—Monash University, Submission 167, 3, 21.
- 28 Transcript of Brown, 14 October 2015, 3636 [2]-[14].
- 29 Monash Filicide Project—Monash University, Submission 167, 10-11 citing Thea Brown, Danielle Tyson and Paula F Arias, 'Filicide and Parental Separation and Divorce' (2014) 23(2) Child Abuse Review 79, 84-5.
- 30 Transcript of Brown, 14 October 2015, 3636 [2]-[14].
- 31 Kirkwood, above n 24, 37; see also, Myrna Dawson, 'Canadian Trends in Filicide by Gender of the Accused, 1961-2011' (2015) 47 Child Abuse & Neglect 162, 173.
- 32 Supreme Court of Victoria, Submission 705, 4 (citations omitted).
- 33 See R v Farquharson [2010] VSC 426 [43]; R v Freeman [2011] VSC 139 [17]; R v Acar [2011] VSC 310 [61]; R v Mihayo [2014] VSC 652 [82]-[83].
- 34 Monash Filicide Project—Monash University, Submission 167, 7.
- 35 Ibid citing Brown, Tyson and Arias, above n 29, 79.
- 36 Ibid.
- 37 Ibid.
- 38 Ibid 3.
- 39 Ibid.
- 40 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 7.
- 41 See, eg, Rochelle Braaf, 'Preventing Domestic Violence Death: Is Sexual Assault a Risk Factor?' (Research & Practice Brief 1, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, October 2011) 3.
- 42 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 7.
- 43 Coroners Court of Victoria, 'Finding into Death with Inquest: Andrew Stanyer' (16 December 2015) 12 [65].
- 44 Ibid 14-15 [71]-[75].
- 45 Coroners Act 2008 (Vic) ss 1(c), 72(2), pt 4, div 1—Investigation of Deaths; Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 5.
- 46 Coroners Act 2008 (Vic) s 52(1).
- 47 Coroners Court of Victoria, Guidance on when Inquests are Held (24 February 2015) <http://www.coronerscourt.vic.gov.au/resources/ecc3cddf-a96c-48c6-9846-233c427ac633/guidance+on+when+inquests+are+held_march+2014.pdf>.
- 48 Letter from State Coroner to Commissioner Neave, 3 July 2015, 2.
- 49 Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 47.
- 50 Coroners Act 2008 (Vic) s 52(2), (3).
- 51 Coroners Court of Victoria, Death Investigation Process (11 December 2015) <<http://www.coronerscourt.vic.gov.au/home/coronial+investigation+process/death+investigation+process/>>.
- 52 State Coroner, above n 48, 1.
- 53 Coroners Court of Victoria, Inquests Coroners Court <<http://www.coronerscourt.vic.gov.au/resources/f669f163-7d0e-4ab9-aabc-cdb5fbd831a0/inquests+6pp+dl+2013+lr.pdf>>.
- 54 Coroners Act 2008 (Vic) s 67(1).
- 55 Coroners Court of Victoria, '2013-14 Annual Report' (2014) 6.

56 Coroners Act 2008 (Vic) s 72(3).
57 See, eg, Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 55, 40.
58 Ibid 25.
59 Coroners Court of Victoria, Welcome to the Coroners Court of Victoria (4 January 2016) <<http://www.coronerscourt.vic.gov.au/home/>>; Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 53.
60 Coroners Court of Victoria, Family Violence Investigations (15 January 2015) <<http://www.coronerscourt.vic.gov.au/home/coronial+investigation+process/family+violence+investigations>>. See also, Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 5–6.
61 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 6.
62 Coroners Court of Victoria, 'Victorian Systematic Review of Family Violence Deaths' (First Report, November 2012) 31–2.
63 Transcript of Bugeja, 14 October 2015, 3605 [31]–3606 [8]; Department of Treasury and Finance, '2015–16 Budget Paper No 3: Service Delivery' (2015) 5.
64 Transcript of Bugeja, 14 October 2015, 3616 [1]–[10].
65 Ibid 3615 [25]–3616 [10].
66 Council of Australian Governments, 'Second Action Plan 2013–2016: Moving Ahead of the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children 2010–2022' (June 2014) 39–40.
67 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 6–7.
68 Transcript of Bugeja, 14 October 2015, 3616 [11]–3617 [2]; Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 58.
69 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 19–20; Transcript of Bugeja, 14 October 2015, 3605 [31]–3606 [8].
70 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 19–20.
71 Ibid.
72 Ibid 9.
73 Commission for Children and Young People Act 2012 (Vic) s 34; Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 25.
74 Commission for Children and Young People Act 2012 (Vic) s 34(1).
75 Ibid s 34(2).
76 Ibid s 37(1), (3).
77 Ibid s 37(2).
78 Ibid s 31.
79 Transcript of Boland, 14 October 2015, 3689 [19]–[31].
80 Commission for Children and Young People Act 2012 (Vic) s 33.
81 Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 25.
82 Transcript of Boland, 14 October 2015, 3686 [5]–[10].
83 Ibid 3690 [3]–[18].
84 Ibid.
85 Ibid 3691 [12]–[22]; Transcript of Geary, 14 October 2015, 3691 [23]–[26].
86 Transcript of Geary, 14 October 2015, 3690 [16]–[18].
87 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 36.
88 Ibid.
89 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 10.
90 Ibid.
91 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 56.
92 Ibid 59.
93 State Coroner, above n 48, 1.
94 Ibid 2.
95 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 58–9.
96 Transcript of Bugeja, 14 October 2015, 3621 [20]–3622 [3], [10]–[29].
97 Ibid 3622 [4]–[9].
98 Ibid 3621 [20]–3622 [3].
99 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 59.
100 Ibid.
101 Ibid.
102 Ibid 60.
103 Ibid 57–8.
104 Ibid 57.
105 Ibid 11.
106 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 13.
107 Ibid 7.
108 Ibid. The Commission understands that ANROWS will be publishing a report on the health and wellbeing implications of domestic violence, including in relation to depression and suicide.
109 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 13.
110 Ibid 9.
111 Ibid 9, 20.
112 Ibid 20.
113 Transcript of Boland, 14 October 2015, 3687 [1]–[7].
114 Commission for Children and Young People Act 2012 (Vic) ss 34(2), 37(2).
115 Transcript of Boland, 14 October 2015, 3688 [13]–[16].
116 Transcript of Goddard, 14 October 2015, 3668 [14]–[23], 3672 [27]–3673 [7].
117 Ibid 3675 [11]–[20].
118 Ibid 3668 [31]–3669 [7], 3675 [11]–[20].
119 Transcript of Geary, 14 October 2015, 3692 [5]–[19].
120 Royal Australasian College of Surgeons, Submission 381, 3.
121 Australian Human Rights Commission, Deaths from family and domestic violence (18 September 2015) <<https://www.humanrights.gov.au/our-work/family-and-domestic-violence/projects/deaths-family-and-domestic-violence>>.

Glossary

Affected family member	A person who is to be protected by a family violence intervention order. This terminology is also used by Victoria Police to describe victims of family violence.
Affidavit	A written statement made under oath or affirmation.
Applicant	A person who applies for a family violence intervention order (or other court process). This can be the affected family member or a Victoria Police member acting on behalf of the affected family member.
Applicant support worker	A worker at some magistrates' courts who advises and assists an applicant with court procedures (for example, applying for a family violence intervention order).
Bail	The release of a person from legal custody into the community on condition that they promise to re-appear later for a court hearing to answer the charges. The person may have to agree to certain conditions, such as reporting to the police or living at a particular place.
Breach	A failure to comply with a legal obligation, for example the conditions of a family violence safety notice or family violence intervention order. Breaching a notice or order is a criminal offence. In this report the terms 'breach' and 'contravention' are used interchangeably.
Brokerage	A pool of funds allocated to a service provider to purchase goods and/or services for its clients according to relevant guidelines. For example, brokerage funds could be used to pay for rental accommodation, health services and other community services.
Child	A person under the age of 18 years.
CISP	The Court Integrated Services Program is a case-management and referral service operating in certain magistrates' courts for people who are on bail or summons and are accused of criminal offences.
Cold referral	A referral to a service where it is up to the client to make contact, rather than a third party. For example, where a phone number or address is provided to a victim.
Committal proceeding	A hearing in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, to determine if there is sufficient evidence for a person charged with a crime to be required to stand trial.
Contravention	A breach, as defined above. In this report, the terms 'breach' and 'contravention' are used interchangeably.
Crimonogenic	Producing or leading to crime or criminality.
Culturally and linguistically diverse	People from a range of different countries or ethnic and cultural groups. Includes people from non-English speaking backgrounds as well as those born outside Australia whose first language is English. In the context of this report, CALD includes migrants, refugees and humanitarian entrants, international students, unaccompanied minors, 'trafficked' women and tourists. Far from suggesting a homogenous group, it encompasses a wide range of experiences and needs.
Culturally safe	An approach to service delivery that is respectful of a person's culture and beliefs, is free from discrimination and does not question their cultural identity. Cultural safety is often used in relation to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.
Directions hearing	A court hearing to resolve procedural matters before a substantive hearing.

Duty lawyer	A lawyer who advises and assists people who do not have their own lawyer on the day of their court hearing and can represent them for free in court.
Ex parte hearing	A court hearing conducted in the absence of one of the parties.
Expert witness	A witness who is an expert or has special knowledge on a particular topic.
Family violence intervention order	An order made by either the Magistrates' Court of Victoria or the Children's Court of Victoria, to protect an affected family member from family violence.
Family violence safety notice	A notice issued by Victoria Police to protect a family member from violence. It is valid for a maximum of five working days. A notice constitutes an application by the relevant police officer for a family violence intervention order.
Federal Circuit Court	A lower level federal court (formerly known as the Federal Magistrates' Court). The court's jurisdiction includes family law and child support, administrative law, admiralty law, bankruptcy, copyright, human rights, industrial law, migration, privacy and trade practices. The court shares those jurisdictions with the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Court of Australia.
First mention	The first court hearing date on which a matter is listed before a court.
Genograms	A graphic representation of a family tree that includes information about the history of, and relationship between, different family members. It goes beyond a traditional family tree by allowing repetitive patterns to be analysed.
Headquarter court	In the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, there is a headquarter court for each of its 12 regions at which most, if not all, of the court's important functions are performed. All Magistrates' Court headquarter courts have family violence intervention order lists.
Heteronormative/heteronormatism	The assumption or belief that heterosexuality is the only normal sexual orientation.
Indictable offence	A serious offence heard before a judge in a higher court. Some indictable offences may be triable summarily.
Informant	The Victoria Police officer who prepares the information in respect of a criminal charge. The informant may be called to give evidence in the court hearing about what they did, heard or saw.
Intake	A point of entry or 'doorway' into a service or set of services.
Interim order	A temporary order made pending a final order.
L17	The Victoria Police family violence risk assessment and risk management report. The L17 form records risks identified at family violence incidents and is completed when a report of family violence is made. It also forms the basis for referrals to specialist family violence services.
Lay witness	A witness who does not testify as an expert witness.
Mandatory sentence	A sentence set by legislation (for example, a minimum penalty) which does not permit the court to exercise its discretion to impose a different sentence.
Other party	A term used by Victoria Police to describe the person against whom an allegation of family violence has been made (the alleged perpetrator).

Prescribed organisation	An organisation empowered to share information relevant to risk assessment and risk management under the Commission’s recommended information-sharing regime to be established under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) . Such organisations could include, for example, Support and Safety Hubs, specialist family violence services, drug and alcohol services, mental health services, courts, general practitioners and nurses. The proposed regime is discussed in Chapter 7.
Protected person	A person who is protected by a family violence intervention order or a family violence safety notice.
Recidivist	A repeat offender who continues to commit crimes despite previous findings of guilt and punishment. In this report this term is also used to describe perpetrators against whom more than one report of family violence has been made to Victoria Police, including where no criminal charge has been brought.
Registrar	An administrative court official.
Respondent	A person who responds to an application for a family violence intervention orders (or other court process). This includes a person against whom a family violence safety notice has been issued.
Respondent support worker	A worker based at some magistrates’ courts who advises and assists respondents with court procedures, (for example, a family violence intervention order proceeding).
Risk assessment and risk management report	A Victoria Police referral L17 form, completed for every family violence incident reported to police.
Risk Assessment and Management Panels	Also known as RAMPs, these are multi-agency partnerships that manage high-risk cases where victims are at risk of serious injury or death. These are described in Chapter 6.
Summary offence	A less serious offence than an indictable offence, which is usually heard by a magistrate.
Summons	A document issued by a court requiring a person to attend a hearing at a particular time and place.
Triable summarily	Specific indictable offences that can be prosecuted in the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, subject to the consent of the accused and the magistrate.
Universal services	A service provider to the entire community, such as health services in public hospitals or education in public schools.
Warm referral	A referral to a service where the person making the referral facilitates the contact—for example, by introducing and making an appointment for the client.
Young person	A person up to the age of 25 years.

If you would like to receive this publication in an accessible format, including large print or audio, please call the Victorian Government Contact Centre on 1300 366 356.

Royal Commission
into Family Violence

www.rcfv.com.au

ISBN 978-0-9944439-4-6

Royal Commission
into Family Violence

Volume V

Report and recommendations

March 2016

Royal Commission into Family Violence

Volume V

Report and recommendations

The Hon. Marcia Neave AO – Commissioner
Patricia Faulkner AO – Deputy Commissioner
Tony Nicholson – Deputy Commissioner

ORDER TO BE PUBLISHED

Victorian Government Printer
March 2016

Volume V Report and recommendations
978-0-9944439-5-3

Published March 2016

ISBN

Summary and recommendations

978-0-9944440-1-1

Volume I Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-1-5

Volume II Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-2-2

Volume III Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-3-9

Volume IV Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-4-6

Volume VI Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-6-0

Volume VII Commissioned research

978-0-9944439-0-8

Suggested citation: State of Victoria, Royal Commission into Family Violence: Report and recommendations, Vol V, Parl Paper No 132 (2014–16).

Contents

Family violence and diversity	1
26 Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples	7
27 Older people	67
28 Culturally and linguistically diverse communities	99
29 Faith communities	131
30 Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities	141
31 People with disabilities	167
32 Male victims	205
33 Rural, regional and remote communities	215
34 Women in prison	237
35 Women working in the sex industry	251
Glossary	259

Family violence and diversity

Introduction

The Royal Commission's terms of reference require it to consider the needs and experiences of people affected by family violence, having particular regard to, among others:

- ▷ children
- ▷ seniors
- ▷ Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples
- ▷ people within culturally and linguistically diverse communities
- ▷ lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people
- ▷ people living in rural, regional and remote communities
- ▷ people with a disability.¹

The Commission welcomed the opportunity to explore the experiences and needs of people in these communities. The terms of reference did not refer to male victims of family violence. Nor did they refer to women in prison or women working in the sex industry, both of which may have been victims of family violence. Nevertheless the Commission considered it important to take into account their experiences and needs as well.

The Commission's approach

The Commission received many written submissions that dealt with the particular experiences and needs of people in these diverse communities. It also conducted a number of community consultations designed to explore these experiences and needs. These included consultations with:

- ▷ children and youth workers
- ▷ older women
- ▷ Aboriginal women and workers in their communities
- ▷ women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds
- ▷ faith leaders, Muslim women and community leaders
- ▷ lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people, and workers in these communities
- ▷ women with disabilities
- ▷ male victims of family violence
- ▷ women in custody at the Dame Phyllis Frost Centre
- ▷ women who are or have previously worked in the sex industry.

Consultations were also held throughout regional and rural Victoria—in Bairnsdale, Benalla, Bendigo, Colac, Echuca, Geelong, Horsham, Maryborough, Mildura, Morwell, Sale, Shepparton, Traralgon and Warrnambool.

The Commission concluded that for people in some of these groups, family violence is less visible and less well understood than family violence in other parts of the Australian community.

While there can be similar dynamics to family violence across all communities, people from these diverse communities can also experience family violence differently.

In addition, some people in these diverse communities face barriers to reporting family violence and in finding appropriate help and support. A comprehensive family violence policy must address these barriers.

Of course many factors combine to create an individual's identity and experience, with a combination of different factors sometimes being described as 'intersectionality'. The Commission is conscious of this complexity and the importance of avoiding categorising people by simply referring to one aspect of their identity.

The entirety of the Commission's report is relevant to people from these diverse communities, and their experiences and needs are discussed across many chapters.

The following chapters seek to give specific consideration to the different experiences of people within these communities, and explore their distinct needs. The experiences and needs of children are discussed in Chapter 10. In doing so we recognise that the significance of the multiple and intersecting barriers many victims face cannot be adequately captured in these summaries.

The Commission hopes that its recommendations will result in better services for all people who experience family violence, regardless of their background, identity or membership of a particular community.

The Commission's recommendations

The Commission's main objectives in the chapters that follow are to:

- ▷ build and ensure accessible, inclusive and non-discriminatory service delivery
- ▷ expand understandings of the different forms and complexity of family violence across a range of communities
- ▷ foster a recognition that family violence is a human rights issue and that responses to it must also be consistent with human rights.

The Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) protects certain human rights, including:

- ▷ the right to recognition and equality before the law, encompassing the right to equal and effective protection against discrimination. It also specifically protects cultural rights, including those of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples²
- ▷ the right to freedom of expression, including the right to seek, receive and impart information and ideas in various formats (for example, orally, in writing or in other selected mediums).³ This would include accessible formats, such as AUSLAN (Australian sign language) and Braille, as well as in relevant languages.

The Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) also creates legal obligations not to engage in discrimination and requires reasonable and proportionate measures to eliminate discrimination.⁴

In other parts of this report, we make recommendations that are relevant to these objectives. In Chapter 40, the Commission recommends the development of an industry plan for family violence prevention and response, covering all government and non-government agencies and services which are responsible for preventing and responding to family violence. This plan will require agencies and service providers to engage in learning and development to achieve inclusive and non-discriminatory practices. Agencies and service providers should also improve the diversity of their own workforces. This could be done by employing workers with diverse backgrounds and experiences, in both leadership and frontline positions.

General recommendations

The Commission makes recommendations below that are relevant to all of the people considered in the following chapters and which seek to achieve these objectives.

The Commission recommends that the Department of Health and Human Services review and update standards for specialist family violence services (including men's behaviour change programs). The updated standards should be developed in consultation with relevant communities. In particular, these standards should:

- ▷ specify a requirement to deliver services that are culturally safe for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples
- ▷ deal with culturally appropriate practice for working with children and young people, older Victorians, people with disabilities, and people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities, faith communities, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities
- ▷ specify an obligation to make reasonable adjustments for people with disabilities
- ▷ recognise the flexibility required in delivering services in rural, regional and remote communities.

The Commission also recommends that the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission issue a guideline under section 148 of the Equal Opportunity Act to guide service providers in meeting their obligations to act inclusively and avoid discrimination.

Finally, the Commission recommends that any family violence community awareness and prevention programs and activities are inclusive of the diversity of the Victorian community and that the proposed Victorian Family Violence Index measures (as far as possible) the extent and response to family violence within these diverse communities.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples should have the opportunity to participate in family violence prevention and response initiatives through Aboriginal controlled organisations. If people from these communities seek services through non-Aboriginal controlled organisations, such organisations should be capable of providing culturally safe services.

In Chapter 26 the Commission recommends that adequate resources be made available to enable Aboriginal controlled organisations to support family violence prevention and response initiatives and to enable mainstream family violence organisations to provide culturally safe services.

The Commission further recommends that current Indigenous family violence governance structures continue.

Older people, people with disabilities and people from culturally and linguistically diverse and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities

In the case of older Victorians, people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities and people with disabilities, Seniors Rights Victoria, InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence and Women with Disabilities Victoria are specialist organisations that have relevant expertise in best practice responses to family violence within these communities. As recommended below, the Victorian Government should further fund these organisations to provide expert advice and training to all family violence service providers.

At present, there is no statewide organisation in Victoria that is solely focused on family violence within lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities. In Chapter 30, the Commission recommends that the Victorian Government should fund the development of resources and programs to support family violence and LGBTI service providers in responding to the needs of people in these communities.

Recommendations

The Commission makes the following recommendations, which apply to people in all of the communities identified above.

Recommendation 139

The Victorian Government fund Seniors Rights Victoria, InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence and Women with Disabilities Victoria [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ provide training to equip specialist family violence service providers and providers of universal services to recognise and provide appropriate services to older Victorians, people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities and people with disabilities who experience family violence
- ▷ build partnerships with and provide advice to specialist family violence service providers and providers of universal services to enable them to respond effectively to the needs of people in these communities.

Recommendation 140

The Department of Health and Human Services review and update standards for family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs) [within two years]. The standards should specify providers' obligation to develop suitable services for diverse communities, consistent with their obligation to provide non-discriminatory services under the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) and the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic).

Recommendation 141

The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission issue a guideline under section 148 of the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) to guide service providers in meeting their obligation to act inclusively and avoid discrimination when delivering services to all people who are affected by family violence. The guideline should apply to family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs), as well as to universal and mainstream organisations [within 12 months].

Recommendation 142

The Victorian Government ensure that family violence community awareness and prevention programs and activities use language, imagery and messaging that reflect the diversity of the Victorian community [within two years]. Prevention work should be developed in consultation with relevant communities and be evaluated in order to refine future practice. Inclusiveness of diversity should also be an important consideration for corporate and philanthropic funders of such programs and activities.

Recommendation 143

The Victorian Government ensure that the proposed Victorian Family Violence Index measures, as far as possible, the extent of and response to family violence in different communities.

Endnotes

- 1 Royal Commission into Family Violence, Letters Patent—Terms of Reference (22 February 2015) 3 <<http://www.rcfv.com.au/MediaLibraries/RCFamilyViolence/UploadedDocs/Terms-of-Reference.pdf>>.
- 2 Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) ss 8, 19.
- 3 Ibid s 15.
- 4 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) s 15.

26 Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples

Introduction

The Commission's terms of reference directed consideration to the needs and experiences of particular groups of people affected by family violence, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, especially women and children, are disproportionately affected by family violence. Not only are they more likely to be affected by family violence, they also face unique barriers to obtaining assistance—whether from a mainstream or culturally appropriate service. It is clear that the injustices experienced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, including the dispossession of their land and traditional culture, and the grief and trauma associated with policies leading to the wrongful removal of children from their families, have had a profound impact on these communities.

In the first section of this chapter we discuss the prevalence and incidence of family violence within Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and the policy and service responses developed to address the unacceptable over-representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples living with family violence. This includes community-based education and prevention initiatives, through to justice system responses. We also describe some of the devastating impacts that family violence has on women and children and the over-representation of children in out-of-home care.

The second section of this chapter explores the key challenges and opportunities relating to the experience of family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. We learn of some of the unique barriers experienced by Aboriginal people in accessing services and seeking help. The Commission heard of the understandable apprehension and reluctance many Aboriginal people have in seeking assistance from government agencies (particularly Child Protection) and the racism and lack of understanding some people experience when doing so.

The importance of Aboriginal community controlled organisations, and tailored justice system responses and perpetrator interventions that recognise the history and culture of Aboriginal people, was strongly emphasised. Stakeholders also emphasised the need for early intervention and prevention initiatives (particularly those targeting children and young people), and the necessity for greater investment in long-term service delivery and evaluations of Aboriginal family violence programs and support services.

Finally, the Commission discusses the way forward in addressing the overwhelming impact of family violence on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples. The Commission's view builds on the comprehensive and considered report of the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force in 2003 and the Indigenous Family Violence 10 year plan Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families (the 10 year plan),¹ both of which we support. It is disappointing that the evidence before the Commission revealed that the efforts applied to reducing the unacceptable levels of family violence and its devastating impacts in Aboriginal communities have not been realised over a decade later, despite these influential policy pronouncements. Recognising this, the Commission makes a number of recommendations for additional investment in targeted prevention and early intervention initiatives for Aboriginal communities, as well as culturally sensitive services to respond to Indigenous families in crisis.

The Commission is grateful for the assistance received from representatives of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander organisations, who have extensive experience in working within Indigenous communities to prevent and respond to family violence. We are also particularly indebted to the Aboriginal victims of family violence who shared their stories with us.

The information provided to the Commission relates mainly to family violence in Victorian Aboriginal communities. For this reason we usually refer to Aboriginal peoples and communities rather than to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples. This also reflects the language of the majority of the submissions made to the Commission. In doing so we do not intend to exclude Torres Strait Islanders from our deliberations and recommendations.

Acknowledgements

The Commission recognises that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples have one of the oldest continuing living cultures on earth, and a unique status as Australia's First Peoples.

The Commission also recognises the ongoing impact of colonisation, dispossession and discrimination on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, and understands that the high rates of family violence within Aboriginal communities and the reluctance to report family violence reflect this traumatic history.

In preparing this part of the report the Commission has benefited from the comprehensive work performed by the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force in 2003. Their report was a landmark in Victorian Aboriginal policy, vividly describing the scale and impact of family violence in Aboriginal communities and establishing sound principles for prevention and response based on community ownership and action.² The Commission has drawn on the findings and principles contained in that report, and in the subsequent 10 year plan, to distil the key issues and inform our recommendations.

The Commission was also assisted by the many suggestions made to the Commission by Victorian elders based on their practical experience and knowledge of what works in their communities. Consultation with Aboriginal organisations; members of the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum; members of various Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups; and participation at the Aboriginal Justice Forum was also invaluable.

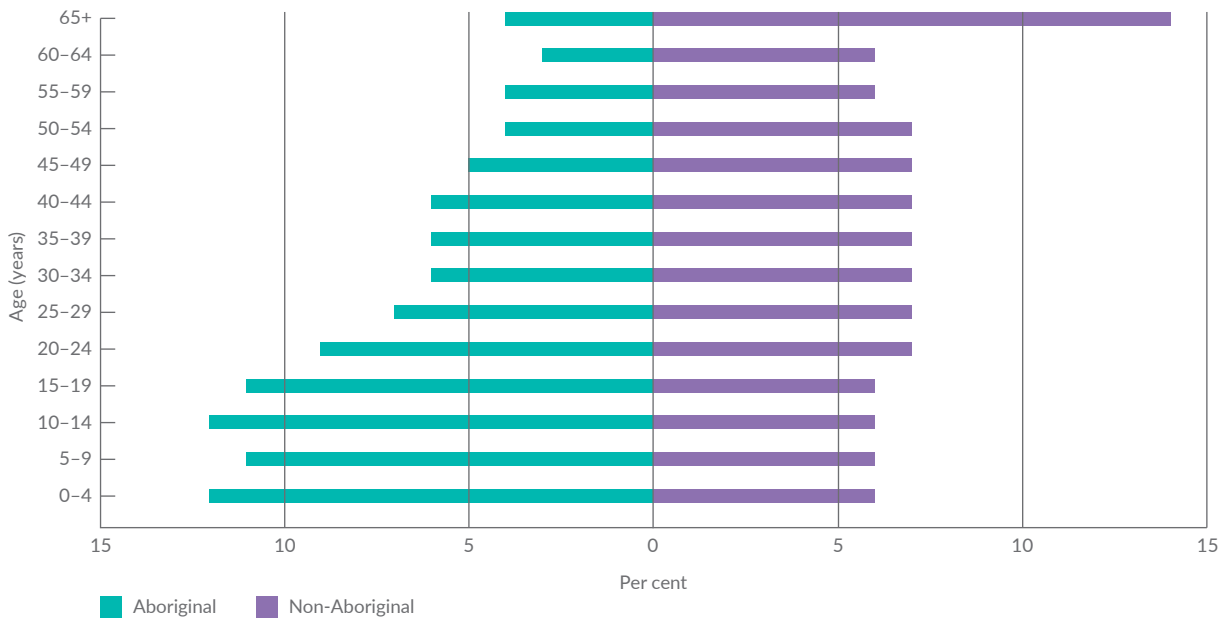

Context and current policy

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in Victoria

The 2011 census recorded 37,991 Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people living in Victoria: 0.7 per cent of the population.³ Fifty-five per cent were under the age of 25 years, and the median age was 22 years (compared to 37 years for non-Indigenous Victorians).⁴ Victoria's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander population is not only young but is growing fast: based on annual growth rates it is estimated that there will be over 80,000 Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people in Victoria by 2021.⁵ Figure 26.1 illustrates the age distribution of Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal populations in Victoria.

The Victorian Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander population is also highly urbanised, with almost half living in Melbourne (47.4 per cent).⁶ These are important factors when considering the impact of family violence on communities, and in planning for prevention and response.

Figure 26.1 Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal people, by age group: Victoria, 2011

Source: Australian Bureau of Statistics Census of Population and Housing 2011, cited in Department of Planning and Community Development, 'Victorian Aboriginal Affairs Framework 2013-2018. Building for the Future: A Plan for 'Closing the Gap' in Victoria by 2031' (2012).

Family violence in Victorian Aboriginal communities

Aboriginal communities' definitions of the 'nature and forms of family violence are broader and more encompassing than those used in the mainstream'.⁷ The use of the term 'family violence' (rather than 'domestic violence') in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) reflects this, and includes violence within kinship networks and against extended family members, not just those living together.⁸ The definition of 'family member' specifically includes a person who, under Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander tradition or contemporary social practice, is the person's relative.⁹

The Commission has also been informed by the definition of family violence offered by the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force (and incorporated into the 10 year plan). In that wide-reaching definition family violence is:

An issue focused around a wide range of physical, emotional, sexual, social, spiritual, cultural, psychological and economic abuses that occur within families, intimate relationships, extended families, kinship networks and communities. It extends to one on one fighting, abuse of Aboriginal community workers as well as self-harm, injury and suicide.¹⁰

For example, an individual can be both a perpetrator and a victim of family violence and the violence may take place in public and can involve a number of people.¹¹ There may be physical violence towards victims who report family violence.¹² Intergenerational violence and abuse involving violence against Elders has also been identified as an emerging issue, as has use of violence by young people (including Aboriginal young women) against older women and grandparents.¹³

Context of family violence in Victorian Aboriginal communities

One of the 11 guiding principles set out in the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force report is the recognition that ‘from an Indigenous perspective the causes of family violence are located in the history and impacts of white settlement and the structural violence of race relations since then’.¹⁴ This is consistent with the material presented to this Commission in consultations, submissions and evidence,¹⁵ which highlights the importance of understanding family violence in Victorian Aboriginal communities within the context of:

- ▷ dispossession of land and traditional culture
- ▷ breakdown of community kinship systems and Aboriginal lore
- ▷ racism and vilification
- ▷ economic exclusion and entrenched poverty
- ▷ alcohol and drug abuse
- ▷ the effects of institutionalism and child removal policies
- ▷ inherited grief and trauma
- ▷ the loss of traditional Aboriginal male roles, female roles and status.¹⁶

As noted by the Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service in its submission:

Family violence within Indigenous communities is complex because Indigenous communities, family structures and the issues faced are complex. With a history of colonisation, dispossession, break down of cultural practices and language and denial of expressions of identity, this means that the traditional factors that feature in a person’s resilience (identity, family supports, kinship) are absent. The ‘normalising’ behaviours that are set out in Western nuclear families with traditional roles of a male and female parent does not apply neatly to Aboriginal families, where the importance of uncles, aunties and cousins (related by blood or not) are held paramount. There are often specific expectations of what relations are required to do for each other which clash with non-Aboriginal organisations and their method of service delivery.¹⁷

It is also important to recognise that a higher proportion of Aboriginal people in Victoria ‘have been directly affected by the Stolen Generations than in any other state or territory’:¹⁸

Aboriginal communities carry great trauma experiences that are transferred from one generation to the next. When the cumulative trauma of intergenerational poverty and marginalisation by society are untreated, other complexities such as drug and alcohol abuse and the violence experienced by the community escalate. These issues create particular challenges for addressing family violence in Aboriginal communities ...¹⁹

Overwhelmingly, the evidence to the Commission was that these traumatic experiences have contributed to the prevalence of family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities:

There are multiple complex and diverse factors contributing to the high levels and severity of family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. It must be clearly understood that the causes do not derive from Aboriginal culture. Family violence is not part of Aboriginal culture. However, the disadvantage, dispossession and attempted destruction of Aboriginal cultures since colonisation have meant that family violence has proliferated in Aboriginal communities.²⁰

Prevalence and incidence

Family violence may not have been part of our traditional culture, but it is certainly part of our current culture. A very negative part, but still part. I say this based on the currency, regularity and commonality of practices across the state and across communities.²¹

The available data shows that Aboriginal peoples—women and children in particular—experience family violence at significantly higher levels than other Victorians.

Police reports

Before discussing Victoria Police family violence incident data it is important to note that information on Indigenous status is not considered sufficiently reliable for general use because of the significant proportion of records where the Indigenous status is recorded as 'unknown'. It is important to be aware that low reliability in the recording of Indigenous status can mean that changes from year to year in the number of Indigenous people affected by family violence may be related to a change in the quality of recording of Indigenous status. With this in mind, the data shows that:

- ▷ Using Victoria Police data, the Department of Justice and Regulation reports that between 2008–09 and 2013–14 the number of police family violence incidents relating to those identifying as Aboriginal doubled from 1064 to 2135, an increase of 100.6 per cent, compared to a 53.6 per cent increase in non-Aboriginal family violence incident reports.²²
- ▷ The number of family violence incidents where children were recorded as present is also increasing. Out of the 2135 family incident reports made by Aboriginal people in 2013–14, around a third ($n=704$) had children recorded as present. The number of family violence incidents at which at least one child was recorded as present increased approximately 66 per cent between July 2008 and June 2014, from 424 to 704.²³
- ▷ The number of family violence-related assaults involving an Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander person as the offender increased by 243 per cent in the same period.²⁴

While the rate of growth in family violence reports has increased for both Indigenous and non-Indigenous Victorians, the increase is much higher within Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. It is the Victorian Government's view that while this 'indicates further prevention and early intervention work needs to be done, it also reflects growing awareness and confidence in reporting of family violence by the community'.²⁵

Over-representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people in family violence

Given that the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander population accounts for less than one per cent of the Victorian population, comparison of absolute numbers of family violence incidents with incidents involving non-Indigenous Victorians provides 'little insight into the relative magnitude of the problem'.²⁶ Prevalence data is more useful because it shows the extent of over-representation.

In 2006–07, there were 19 reported Aboriginal family members affected in family violence incidents for every 1000 of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander population in Victoria. This increased to 43 per 1000 in 2013–14, compared to an increase from three to six per 1000 for non-Aboriginal Victorians. This means that an Aboriginal person was 7.3 times more likely than a non-Aboriginal person to be an affected family member in a family violence incident.²⁷

Figure 26.2 Family violence incidents per 1000 population: Indigenous and non-Indigenous affected family members, 2006–07 to 2013–14

Source: Crime Statistics Agency, 'Affected Family Members in FDV incidents by Indigenous status by year'; Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Estimates and Projections, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians, 2001 to 2006' (Catalogue No 3238.0, 'Australian Bureau of Statistics', April 2014); Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Australian Demographic Statistics' (Catalogue No 3101.1, Australian Bureau of Statistics, June 2015) cited in Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Mid-term evaluation of the Indigenous Family Violence 10 Year Plan' (September 2015), 33, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

There is a similar over-representation in involvement as either an affected family member (victim) or other party (perpetrator): 91.4 Aboriginal persons per 1000 population, compared to 11.4 per 1000 non-Aboriginal population in 2013–14.²⁸ Thus, in that year, an Aboriginal person in Victoria was eight times more likely to be involved as either a victim or perpetrator in a reported family violence incident than a non-Indigenous person.

Impacts of family violence on women and children

The effects of family violence in Aboriginal communities are far reaching.

The Commission heard that family violence is a leading contributor to Aboriginal child removal, homelessness, poverty, poor physical and mental health, drug and alcohol misuse and incarceration.²⁹ These issues were extensively canvassed in the report of the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force and are reflected in the 10 year plan.³⁰

Aboriginal women and children are the primary victims

The evidence presented to the Commission was that Aboriginal women and children are the primary victims of family violence in Aboriginal communities.³¹ The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria is the only service set up to exclusively represent Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander victims in Victoria. Its Chief Executive Officer, Ms Antoinette Braybrook, gave evidence that while that service is not gender exclusive, 93 per cent of its clients are women:³²

While men can certainly be victims and their needs must not be overlooked, women and children represent the vast majority of victims/survivors within Aboriginal communities. It is vital that Aboriginal communities acknowledge this fact and ensure that sufficient resources are obtained and made available to keep women and children safe, and that Aboriginal communities support women in their decisions to leave a violent relationship, and to create safe but separated families, rather than bear the burden associated with keeping a violent family relationship together.³³

It has been estimated that Victorian Aboriginal women are 45 times more likely to suffer family violence than non-Aboriginal women.³⁴ Nationally they are 35 times more likely to be hospitalised than non-Indigenous women due to family violence-related assaults. Indigenous males are 22 times more likely than non-Indigenous males to be hospitalised as a result of family violence-related assaults.³⁵

Australian Indigenous respondents in the International Violence Against Women Survey reported three times as many incidents of sexual violence in the previous 12 months compared to non-Indigenous women.³⁶

A recent study also found that, where violence occurs, Aboriginal children are much more likely to have witnessed physical violence against their mother or stepmother than non-Aboriginal children (42 per cent in that study compared to 23 per cent of all children).³⁷

It was submitted that where violence occurs Aboriginal women are 25 times more likely to be killed or injured because of family violence than non-Aboriginal women.³⁸

The Commission also heard that perpetrators of violence against Aboriginal women are both Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal men, for example the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria reported that it:

... routinely sees Aboriginal clients, mostly women, who experience family violence at the hands of men from a range of different backgrounds and cultures, Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal. The only certainty in the existing data is that Aboriginal women are at disproportionately higher risk of family violence.³⁹

Children and out-of-home care

The impact of family violence on Aboriginal children is profound, with a clear connection between the high rates of family violence and the high numbers of Aboriginal children in out-of-home care. There is a much higher rate of removal of Aboriginal children from their families than of other Australian children. Productivity Commission data reveals that in 2014–15, there were 81.4 per 1000 Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children subject to care and protection orders, compared to 6.6 per 1000 for non-Indigenous children.⁴⁰

According to the Victorian Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People, Mr Andrew Jackomos, Aboriginal children now represent one in six Victorian children or young people being placed in care.⁴¹ The Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency submitted to the Commission that family violence is 'one of the predominant contributing factors driving child protection intervention and the removal of children from family'.⁴²

We discuss child removal in further detail below as this was a major issue identified in evidence before the Commission.

The link between exposure to family violence and the high incarceration rates of Aboriginal women is also becoming increasingly clear. A study of female prisoners examining drug use and offending found that of the 470 female prisoners surveyed, 87 per cent were victims of sexual, physical or emotional abuse, with most having suffered abuse in multiple forms.⁴³ A NSW study found that 69 per cent of Aboriginal women prisoners surveyed reported they were abused as children, and 73 per cent reported they were abused as adults, 42 per cent of whom experienced sexual assault. It also found that at least 80 per cent of the female prisoners surveyed said their victimisation was an indirect cause of their offending.⁴⁴ The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria identified similar levels of victimisation through its experience of working with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women prisoners in Victoria.⁴⁵ We discuss the link between family violence victimisation and imprisonment in more detail in Chapter 34.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander family violence policy in Victoria

In response to the unique historical context in which family violence occurs, the Indigenous community has called for a holistic approach to family violence that addresses the legacy of the past and seeks to heal individuals, families and communities. There is a shared recognition between the Victorian Government and the Indigenous community that solutions to family violence lie within Indigenous communities themselves and that Indigenous people must lead the strategy which will prevent and eliminate family violence in the Indigenous community.⁴⁶

A considerable amount of work has already been done in Victoria, both by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander community leaders and the Victorian Government, to address family violence. In 2001, under the Framework for the Development of the Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Strategy: a partnership approach between the Indigenous community and Government, the Victorian Government appointed the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force.⁴⁷ The task force was chaired by Noongar woman Ms Daphne Yarram and included key Indigenous leaders. Its role was:

- ▷ to engage Indigenous communities throughout the state in the development of 'community-led' strategies for addressing Indigenous family violence issues
- ▷ to provide a final report to the Victorian Government making recommendations in relation to a culturally appropriate statewide strategy for addressing family violence issues in an integrated and holistic manner.⁴⁸

Indigenous Family Violence Task Force Report

The task force delivered its final report to the Victorian Government in 2003.⁴⁹ At the start of its report the task force acknowledged the challenge presented to it in breaking the 'silence of acceptance' about family violence in Aboriginal communities. The report sets out in detail the scale, nature and dynamics of family violence in Aboriginal communities in Victoria. It makes 28 recommendations, affirming the need to build on the strengths of Aboriginal communities and to encompass Aboriginal concepts of social, emotional, cultural and spiritual wellbeing. The Victorian Government was seen to have a role in developing an integrated policy framework to support a holistic, community-driven response. Ownership of the process and outcomes by Indigenous communities was considered essential. As stated in the report:

The work of the Task Force was not about directly addressing family violence with individuals and families but about facilitating a process whereby communities begin to take ownership of the issue of family violence through the establishment of Regional IFV Action Groups.⁵⁰

As a result of the work of the task force, in 2005 the Victorian Government established the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum which is informed by the work of the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups: see the box that follows.

Governance of the Indigenous Family Violence Strategy

The Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum meets twice a year to oversee the coordination and implementation of the Indigenous Family Violence Strategy, including the 10 year plan. The forum is made up the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Group (IFVRAG) coordinators, along with chief executive officers or chairpersons of key Aboriginal organisations and senior representatives from Victorian government departments.

The regional IFVRAGs are the first contact point for community members, providing ‘an opportunity for individuals, families and groups in communities to receive the support they need to come together, discuss and develop solutions for family violence.’⁵¹ There are 11 IFVRAGs across the state. Membership includes Elders, individual community members and local Aboriginal organisations and service providers. The IFVRAGs lead community efforts to address family violence, developing regional plans based on consultation within their local community about how best to reduce, prevent and respond to Aboriginal family violence.⁵²

There are 10.5 IFVRAG coordinators employed by the Department of Health and Human Services and one statewide coordinator employed to support each of the regional coordinators.⁵³ Each IFVRAG also has an Aboriginal Chairperson.

Departmental responsibility for the 10 year plan is shared between the Department of Premier and Cabinet which has oversight of the plan, and the Department of Health and Human Services which has core responsibility for implementation.⁵⁴

A major outcome of the forum is the 10 year plan discussed below.

The 10 year plan

In 2008, the Indigenous Family Violence 10 year plan Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families was signed by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander leaders, key Victorian Aboriginal agencies and government departments including five Ministers and the Deputy Premier. It ‘explicitly frames the understanding and response to family violence through an Aboriginal lens ... by acknowledging the influence of dispossession on Aboriginal people that occurred from European colonisation, and its inter-generational impacts.’⁵⁵

The 10 year plan contains nine guiding principles, reproduced in the box on the next page.⁵⁶

Guiding principles of the Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families 10 year plan

To guide all elements of the plan towards the vision, the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum established nine principles for developing and implementing policies and programs:

1. Family violence is not part of Indigenous culture. As stated in our Vision: 'Families are our heart and soul. They generate dreams and values, ideals and visions for our children.' Family violence is a crime and is unacceptable within the Indigenous community. Safety and security for victims of violence is our number one priority.
2. Complex nature of family violence within Indigenous communities. In an Indigenous community context, family violence includes a wide range of physical, emotional, sexual, social, spiritual, cultural and economic abuses that can occur within families, extended families, kinship networks and communities.
3. Indigenous culture. Indigenous Victorians are the First Peoples of our state. We recognise the uniqueness and diversity of Indigenous culture, society and history in Victoria and promote reconciliation that gives proper recognition and respect to the Indigenous people of Victoria. We acknowledge Elders as the keepers of this rich history and we value, respect and protect them. The Indigenous community and the Victorian Government agencies work together in a respectful manner to effectively develop integrated and culturally competent responses to family violence in Indigenous communities that incorporate Indigenous history, values and parenting experience.
4. Partnership, transparency and accountability. Honesty, mutual respect, trust, accountability, transparency in decision making and shared recognition of each partner's role and responsibilities enables the partnership between the Victorian Government and Indigenous community. To maximise the effectiveness of all service provider and partnership arrangements, members of the Partnership Forum actively promote transparency and accountability in all work on Indigenous family violence.
5. Adequate resources. The provision of adequate funding and resources is an essential element in the prevention and elimination of family violence in the Indigenous community. We ensure these resources achieve long term, sustainable improvements in the Indigenous community and Victorian Government practice.
6. Empowering Indigenous communities. In recognition of the principle of Indigenous self management and self-determination, we recognise, advocate and promote the need for Indigenous people to lead the process at all levels.
7. Local solutions to local problems. We recognise the requirement to support, empower and enable communities to develop solutions to prevent, reduce and respond to family violence in Indigenous communities through the core leadership of the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups and the Partnership Forum.
8. Holistic healing approach to family violence in Indigenous communities. We appreciate the importance of a holistic healing approach to family violence in Indigenous communities based around family and Indigenous community strengthening, collaborative approaches, appropriate resources and flexible program and service delivery arrangements.
9. Early intervention, prevention and education. Indigenous community and Victorian Government responses to family violence in the Indigenous community are based on our support for early intervention, prevention and education.

The objectives of the 10 year plan were shaped by the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum. These eight objectives are:

1. Cultural safety: make Victoria a safer place for all Indigenous Victorians.
2. Healthy families: support strong, robust and healthy families that provide a safe nurturing environment.
3. Education, awareness, prevention: intervene early to improve education, awareness and prevention of family violence.
4. Safety for victims: increase the safety of Indigenous families and individuals, especially women and children.
5. Accountability: Increase the accountability and personal responsibility of perpetrators of family violence within Indigenous communities.
6. Healing: increase opportunities for healing for victims and perpetrators.
7. Service capability: increase the cultural competency and capacity of the service system to improve responses to Indigenous family violence.
8. Research and evaluation: Improve the effectiveness and efficiency of responses to Indigenous family violence through ongoing research and evaluation.⁵⁷

The plan then sets out a series of 17 key strategies and 45 actions against each of these objectives.

The Victorian Aboriginal Affairs Framework 2013–2018 contains a commitment to the 10 year plan and to focus efforts on reducing Aboriginal family violence.⁵⁸ Other important policy documents include the Aboriginal Justice Agreement, now in its third phase, with its associated governance structure through the Aboriginal Justice Forum.⁵⁹

Evaluation of progress under the 10 year plan

The recent mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan is generally positive, finding that '[t]he 10 Year Plan's objectives continue to be relevant in the current policy context' and that:

The community led, family centred holistic approach integral to the 10 Year Plan ... is an example of leading practice in reducing family violence. Such practice should inform broader system reforms.⁶⁰

Among the achievements of the 10 year plan, the evaluation finds that the 11 IFVRAGs have been effective in breaking down the 'shame factor' in discussing family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities.⁶¹ The Community Initiatives Fund has assisted IFVRAGs to initiate small-scale family violence projects and establish partnerships within local communities which has raised awareness about family violence.

Since 2006–07, reporting of Aboriginal family violence incidents has increased at a higher rate than reporting in non-Aboriginal communities. The evaluation suggests that this may reflect the greater awareness of family violence in Aboriginal communities as a result of the work of the IFVRAGs, and/or greater confidence in reporting to police.⁶² It also notes that the growth in reporting is likely to continue to increase, and that an explicit commitment from the Victorian Government, along with increased resourcing, is required to ensure the sector is able to respond.⁶³

Other achievements of the 10 year plan include the development of a draft Aboriginal contextualised Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF) discussed further in Chapter 6, continuation of the four healing services and four time out services,⁶⁴ and Koori Family Violence Police Protocols which have been piloted in three sites.⁶⁵ Cultural competency guidelines for family violence services have also been developed.⁶⁶

Resourcing of the plan was identified as an area of concern, with the evaluation noting that:

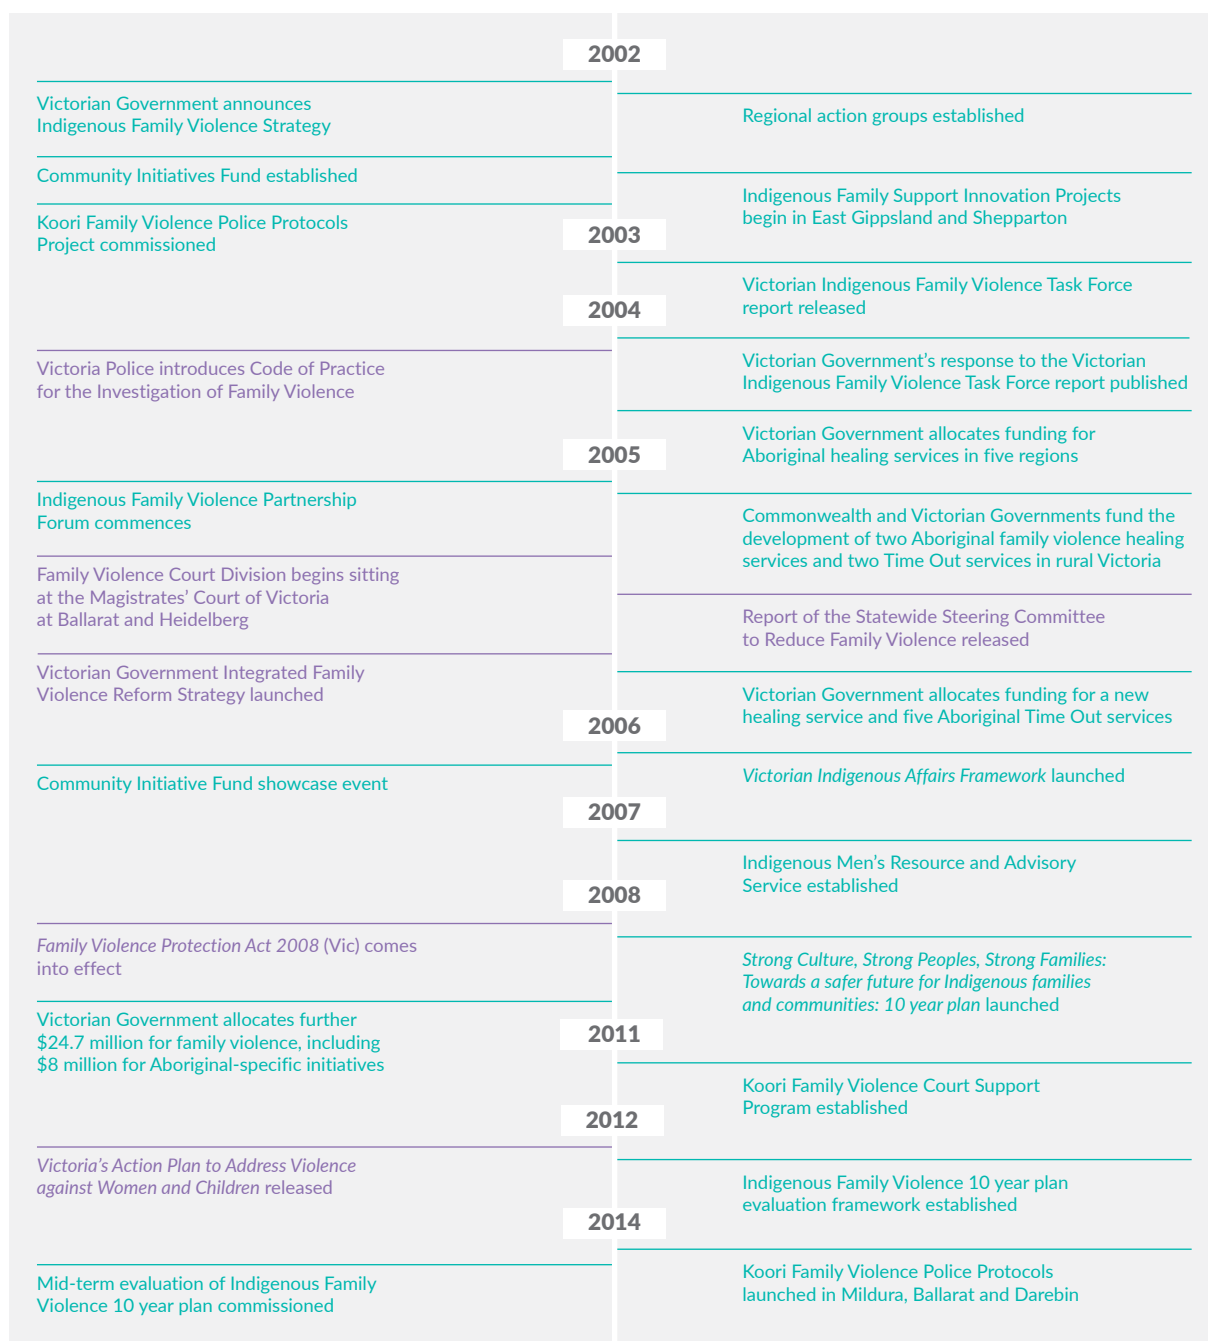

The implementation and oversight function has been significantly disadvantaged by a lack of allocated resources in comparison to other strategies resulting in limited capacity to leverage broader activities and influence better outcomes on behalf of the Victorian Aboriginal community.⁶⁷

Governance is also an area requiring some attention, with the evaluation reporting that additional oversight is required by government and more resources are required to support the Victorian Government Secretariat.

The evaluation makes four recommendations, with subsets under each main recommendation. The four recommendations are:

- ▷ the Victorian Government commit to providing high level oversight of the implementation of the 10 year plan objectives and reporting on achievements annually to the Family Violence Cabinet Committee
- ▷ invest in the implementation, monitoring and oversight of the 10 year plan
- ▷ improve data collection and analysis mechanisms to drive system responses to Aboriginal family violence
- ▷ invest in the community-led approach to Aboriginal family violence.⁶⁸

Figure 26.3 Family violence policy reform in Victoria: Aboriginal-specific and general, 2002 to 2014

■ Aboriginal-specific ■ General

Source: Based on Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Mid-term Evaluation of the Indigenous Family Violence 10 Year Plan' (September 2015), 3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's notice to produce dated 5 June 2015.

Community education, prevention and early intervention

Family and Community is the cornerstone of Aboriginal people's way of life. Community education is the key to raising awareness of Family Violence and the impact it has on our families and community. We believe it is imperative to build a positive vision in Aboriginal communities, based on strong family values and cultural practices and to use holistic approaches to address family violence.⁶⁹

The 2003 report of the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force begins with an acknowledgment of the challenge in speaking up, and breaking the 'silence of acceptance' about family violence in Aboriginal communities. Twelve years later, the mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan identified the reduction of stigma through education and prevention programs as one of its key achievements.⁷⁰

According to the evaluation, the education, awareness and prevention projects supported by the Community Initiative Fund and the Community Prevention Initiative Fund and administered by the IFVRAGs have been 'very effective at a local level to create awareness and understanding of family violence'.⁷¹

All partners identified that this was the strongest achievement since the commencement of the 10 year plan. The 10 year plan, and the work of agency stakeholders and Aboriginal communities, was seen as reducing the 'shame factor' associated with Aboriginal family violence.⁷²

As the evaluation states, '[a] growth in awareness and concern about Aboriginal family violence is a critical foundation for change'.⁷³

Also under the 10 year plan, an Indigenous-specific prevention framework was developed and released in 2012.⁷⁴ The Indigenous Family Violence Primary Prevention Framework identified the features of best practice in primary prevention in Indigenous communities: see the box that follows.

Best practice in primary prevention activities in Indigenous communities

The activities must:

- ▷ be led by Aboriginal communities
- ▷ include a whole of community approach and community strengthening
- ▷ be grounded in cultural respect and cultural strengthening
- ▷ promote non-violent social norms and strengthen protective factors in communities
- ▷ improve access to resources and systems of support
- ▷ include time lines, accountability and evaluation.⁷⁵

Examples of successful education, prevention and early intervention initiatives

The Commission was presented with information about numerous education, prevention and early intervention programs. Ms Jill Gallagher AO, Chief Executive Officer, Victorian Aboriginal Community Controlled Health Organisation, echoed the sentiments of many when she stated:

These preventative and early intervention programs are actually the most important part, if we truly want to get violence out of our community, keep families together and give kids the best start in life that we can.⁷⁶

This section discusses the evaluation findings of some of the more successful programs. They are grouped together as they have common aims, and the delineation between education, prevention and early intervention is not strongly made by services or communities.

Aboriginal Family Violence and Prevention Legal Service Victoria's Early Intervention Prevention Program

Many people cited the 'Sisters Day Out', 'DillyBag' and 'DillyBag: The Journey' programs run by FVPLS Victoria as part of its Early Intervention Prevention Program as good examples of effective prevention and early intervention programs for women.⁷⁷ The Commission understands that these programs have reached over 6500 Aboriginal women since 2007.⁷⁸

The Sisters Day Out is a one-day workshop for Aboriginal women to participate in a range of activities including beauty therapies, relaxation therapies, exercise activities and an information session about family violence prevention, presented by FVPLS Victoria.⁷⁹ The workshop is attended by a range of local service providers with the purpose of informally interacting and sharing information relating to family violence in a culturally welcoming and safe environment.⁸⁰ FVPLS Victoria lawyers and a counsellor are also in attendance to provide advice and support to participants.⁸¹ The 100th Sisters Day Out was held in February 2016.

The Dilly Bag program is an intensive workshop delivering personal development and group activities to Aboriginal women that emphasise self-nurturing and healing from trauma, promote cultural identification, and assist women to strengthen their resolve and resilience.⁸² The workshops are also intended to help reduce Aboriginal women's vulnerability to family violence, and enhance their capacity to take on a leadership role in their community regarding family violence prevention.⁸³ Dilly Bag is a one day program and Dilly Bag: The Journey is an extended program where participants stay together over three days at a private and culturally appropriate location.⁸⁴

These three programs were evaluated in 2014. The evaluation reported that the programs had significant beneficial impacts on participants' immediate wellbeing and access to services,⁸⁵ and important medium and long-term impacts, including that 'participants feel motivated and empowered to make real and significant changes to their lives'.⁸⁶

A further interim evaluation of these programs as a component of Koori Community Safety Projects by the Australian Institute of Criminology (discussed below) found that they demonstrated leading practice in design of Aboriginal family violence prevention programs such as cultural grounding, and inclusive community approaches.⁸⁷ For example, participant feedback from Sisters Day Out showed 'more than one-third of participants said the most valuable thing about the event was learning more about family violence services'.⁸⁸ Participants also reported 'increased awareness of the causes and impacts of family and community violence, and improved knowledge of legal assistance services'.⁸⁹ Dilly Bag participants reported that participation 'would help them make strong choices in their lives'.⁹⁰

These programs have always been reliant on one-off funding. At the time of making its submission to this Commission in June 2015, FVPLS Victoria had not secured funding to staff these programs beyond 30 June 2015. In December 2015, the Victorian Government announced a funding contribution of $50,000 which the Commission understands is non-recurrent funding.⁹¹

Koori Community Safety Grants

In 2013 the Victorian Government granted $2.4 million for four three-year projects in Koori communities (the Koori Community Safety Grants). This was part of an overall allocation of $7.2 million under the Reducing Violence against Women and their Children grants program.⁹² The grantees were the:

- ▷ Lakes Entrance Aboriginal Health Association—Strong Men, Strong Communities
- ▷ Mallee District Aboriginal Services—Family and Community Violence Prevention Project
- ▷ Rumbalara Aboriginal Cooperative—Aboriginal Family Harmony Project
- ▷ Victorian Aboriginal Health Service—Strong Relationships, Strong Community.

The Australian Institute of Criminology has reviewed progress to date on these four projects. There were a number of activities within each project, which included Dilly Bag programs, Sisters Day Out workshops, Dardi Munwurro youth camps, men's groups, harmony days and mediation training.⁹³ The evaluation (which is interim), highlighted that the projects demonstrated a number of elements of best practice.⁹⁴ The projects included close liaison and culturally appropriate engagement with Koori communities and their leaders, leading to keen community support and higher than expected levels of attendance at community events.⁹⁵

Mallee District Aboriginal Services' Community Safety Project TV advertisements

As part of the Family and Community Violence Prevention Project, a series of six television advertisements were developed and designed by community members from Mildura, Robinvale and Swan Hill. NBS Productions filmed and produced the commercials at locations across Mildura, Swan Hill, Mungo and Robinvale using local community members as actors and production assistants.⁹⁶

The commercials were developed as part of Mallee District Aboriginal Services' Community Safety Project, and funded by a Koori Community Safety Grant.⁹⁷

They can be viewed at <http://www.mdas.org.au/familyviolence>

Healing programs

In its 2003 report the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force called for holistic family healing centres 'to strengthen and heal individuals, families and communities affected by family violence'.⁹⁸ It was envisaged that these centres would work with victims and families by providing a range of services, including referral to time out services for men.⁹⁹

The Task Force also presented a strategy developed from Men's Forums, which called for Men's Resource Centres with crisis response teams, family violence intervention officers, time out centres, and integrated service provision. It also called for research into the causes of family violence, with a focus on causes and prevention strategies specific to Indigenous men.¹⁰⁰

Healing for both victims and perpetrators is one of the eight objectives of the 10 year plan.¹⁰¹ The focus in the plan on healing for all family members derives from the understanding that Indigenous male perpetrators have experienced inequity, violence and transgenerational trauma that contribute to the current levels of Indigenous family violence.¹⁰²

Submissions to this Commission reiterated the importance of the principle of healing in working with perpetrators, as well as the importance of a whole-of-family approach to healing trauma.¹⁰³ Examples of integrated services for the whole family, including the male perpetrator, were also identified by witnesses as approaches that require further investment.¹⁰⁴

The complexity that arises where perpetrators may themselves have been victims as children was described, where 'people with incredibly complex histories who now exhibit a behaviour that needs to be addressed'.¹⁰⁵ A number of submissions noted that despite some investment there remained a paucity of culturally safe, holistic and therapeutic interventions for Aboriginal men¹⁰⁶ and the inappropriateness of mainstream behaviour change programs for this community:

The foundation of our work is community and culture. The Aboriginal men we work with often feel disconnected from themselves and from their community and culture. It is critical that there are culturally appropriate programs for Aboriginal men as the vast majority don't want to access mainstream services.¹⁰⁷

A number of submissions to the Commission stated a preference for healing and time out approaches.¹⁰⁸ Common themes underlying the healing approach included:

- ▷ the importance of pride in, and connection to, culture as protective factors¹⁰⁹
- ▷ a recognition of the impacts of grief, trauma and dispossession¹¹⁰
- ▷ the importance of involving the whole family¹¹¹
- ▷ a focus on respect for self and respect for family¹¹²
- ▷ an approach that deals with multiple complex issues, which can include entrenched poverty, drug and alcohol use and homelessness in addition to use of violence¹¹³
- ▷ an emphasis on increasing strength and resilience to deal with conflict
- ▷ a capacity to be flexible and responsive.¹¹⁴

The Commission heard evidence about a number of healing and time out programs that are running in various parts of Victoria. The Indigenous Men's Resource and Advisory Service stated that:

We provide a positive environment for Aboriginal men who want to learn how to actively show respect for the interests of women and children ... A culturally strong Aboriginal family exists when men are living fulfilling lives and are responsible for their actions as father and-or husbands [this] will nurture the success and wellbeing for the whole family.¹¹⁵

Other examples described in submissions and evidence included: Dardi Munwurro 'Strong Spirit' Building Strong Communities Program; Boorndawan Willam Aboriginal Healing Service; Wiimpatja Healing Centre; Victorian Aboriginal Health Service counselling (family violence groups and men's camps and the Minajalku Healing Centre); Yoowinna Wurnalung Healing Service (including a time out service); Aboriginal Centre for Males and Indigenous Men's Case Management Support Programs. This list is not exhaustive as there are a number of time out, healing services and family violence men's group provided by other organisations.¹¹⁶

In Victoria, there are only a few evaluations available examining Indigenous specific healing programs.¹¹⁷ This reflects both the small number of programs and their recent emergence in a field which itself is only about ten years old.¹¹⁸ However, despite limited published research, within the literature there is a growing body of evidence that 'healing centres and the practice of "healing" can be a sustainable vehicle to engaging Aboriginal men in behavioural change and taking greater accountability for their actions'.¹¹⁹

Issues regarding the cultural appropriateness of mainstream men's behaviour change programs are further discussed in Chapter 18.

The justice response

There are a range of justice system policies, support services and interventions that have been specifically designed to recognise and support Aboriginal people in the justice system.

Koori Family Violence Police Protocols

The Koori Family Violence Police Protocols are agreements between local Aboriginal communities and Victoria Police that document how local police must respond to family violence incidents. Their purpose is to strengthen the police response in the short-term, and to reduce the number of family violence incidents in Aboriginal communities in the longer term.¹²⁰

The protocols guide police to determine whether the affected family member(s) or perpetrator identify as Aboriginal and, if so, to offer them the choice of referral to Aboriginal services or non-Aboriginal services. The protocols specify that police members should receive cultural awareness training delivered by members of the local Aboriginal community and that local communities, police and support services should develop and sustain strong local partnerships.¹²¹

Reflections on the protocols highlight that they have two main functions: most obviously they set out and explain the importance of the actions expected of police at the scene of family violence in the Aboriginal community. They also outline what needs to happen to make it normal for all front-line police to ask about Aboriginal identity in a culturally sensitive way and to respond appropriately to the answer. In other words, the protocols commit local police, local Aboriginal communities, and family violence networks and services to mutual engagement, steps towards better understanding, and strong, multifaceted working partnerships.¹²²

Aboriginal legal services

In Victoria, the major provider of legal services to Aboriginal victims of family violence is the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria (FVPLS Victoria). In 2013–14 this organisation worked with approximately 4000 people, providing legal advice, casework and representation to more than 500 clients (involving more than 800 children) and provided community legal education, early intervention and prevention activities to around 1700 community members and over 1000 mainstream services staff.¹²³ Its systemic policy and law reform work is supported through philanthropic funding.¹²⁴

The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service provides legal advice, assistance and representation in the areas of criminal, civil and family law. It also undertakes community legal education, law reform and policy work.¹²⁵

The vast majority of VALS' work (95 per cent in 2012–13) is in criminal law.¹²⁶ Every time an Aboriginal person is taken into custody by Victoria Police, VALS must be notified. Client services are available 24 hours a day seven days a week.¹²⁷

VALS assists those who have been accused of family violence in criminal and/or civil proceedings, and can also assist victims. However, if a person comes to VALS and the other party is currently or has previously been assisted by VALS, they will be referred to another legal service (such as Victoria Legal Aid, community legal centres or FVPLS Victoria).¹²⁸

Koori Family Violence and Victims Support Program

The Koori Family Violence and Victims Support Program (formerly the Koori Family Violence Court Support Program) began as a 12-month pilot program in July 2011 at the Melbourne Magistrates' Court. The program employed a Program Manager, Aboriginal Men's Family Violence Support Worker and Aboriginal Women's Family Violence Support Worker to provide support and information about the court process and available family violence services. The program accepted referrals from court registry staff and magistrates, other court programs, Victoria Police, and external agencies.¹²⁹

When the pilot was evaluated in 2012 it was found to have generally positive results although its client service function had only been operating for approximately nine months at the time. Clients reported an improved court experience and court staff reported that clients were more receptive to court orders and accepting of referrals to service providers. Service providers reported an enhanced ability to make timely referrals and progress cases. Increased cultural awareness among court staff was also reported.¹³⁰

The main challenges identified in the evaluation related to retention of staff, the complexity associated with staff seeking to manage their dual role as both court staff and community members and the impact of uncertainty about ongoing program funding on client engagement.¹³¹

Court-based programs

Submissions described one-off court-based initiatives that included Aboriginal-specific components. One example was the Family Violence Integration Project at Ringwood Magistrates' Court, which was funded by the Legal Services Board between 2011 and 2015. Boorndawan Willam Aboriginal Healing Service joined the partnership and arranged for a Koori Support Worker to provide culturally-specific advice, make referrals and conduct risk assessments for members of the Aboriginal community.¹³² The evaluation of the project found that the initiative strengthened pathways for referrals across and between agencies for Aboriginal clients. Additionally, Boorndawan Willam successfully advised member agencies on culturally safe and respectful policies and practices, through information sessions and workshops.¹³³

Eastern Community Legal Centre, which auspiced this project, stated that the pilot was 'critical in identifying and providing a holistic response to Aboriginal victims and perpetrators of family violence'.¹³⁴

Challenges and opportunities

This section describes the key issues raised in evidence and in submissions. The staggering over-representation of Aboriginal children in out-of-home care, and the correlation between child removal and family violence, were put to the Commission as matters of urgent concern. Prevention and early intervention initiatives, particularly those targeting children and young people, were identified priorities.

The Commission heard of the barriers Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people experience in accessing services (particularly safe accommodation) and the role that Aboriginal controlled organisations play in providing culturally sensitive services to their communities. However, the importance of mainstream organisations providing a culturally safe environment for Aboriginal people to access help was also emphasised.

The Commission heard the frustrations of Aboriginal service providers regarding the difficulties experienced in securing stable funding, which creates inefficiencies and limits the ability to consolidate successful interventions. While the existing data reveals a dramatic over-representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people in the family violence system, limited and inconsistent data collection means that this proportion may be even greater.

Family violence and child removal

... to Victoria's shame we have the highest overrepresentation of Aboriginal children in out-of-home care; not the numbers, but the overrepresentations. So 14 per cent of Aboriginal children are in the child protection system. That's far too many. We are struggling in Victoria.¹³⁵

The link between family violence and child removal was consistently identified in submissions, consultations and evidence as an area where urgent attention is required.¹³⁶ The Victorian Aboriginal Childcare Agency submitted that family violence is 'one of the predominant contributing factors driving child protection intervention and the removal of children from family'.¹³⁷

Commissioner Jackomos is currently investigating the circumstances of Victorian Aboriginal children in care through the Taskforce 1000 inquiry.¹³⁸ This has found a strong correlation between family violence and entry into out-of-home care:

Specific data on the drivers has been collected by the DHHS, but at this stage has not been made publically available. As an illustrative figure, approximately 80 per cent of children reviewed have experienced family violence, and this is often co-existing with other key factors such as alcohol and drug misuse, parental mental illness and neglect. In the cases reviewed by Taskforce 1000 to date, the majority of cases involve male perpetrated violence against women and children. Taskforce 1000 data also identifies family violence as a key reason why children cannot be reunified with their parents.¹³⁹

From June 2013 to June 2014 there was a 42 per cent increase in the number of Victorian Aboriginal children in out-of-home care, which was the highest increase in an Australian state or territory for that period.¹⁴⁰ Commissioner Jackomos gave evidence that:

Aboriginal children and young people are significantly over-represented in Victoria's statutory child protection system and are around seven to eight times more likely to be the subject of a report to the DHHS than non-Aboriginal children. Aboriginal children now represent one in six Victorian children or young people being placed in care. Aboriginal children are ten times more likely to have an out of home care experience. I anticipate that without serious resources and effort being put into strengthening families and addressing the key drivers, 1500 Victorian Aboriginal children will be in State care by the end of 2015.¹⁴¹

Funding data provided by the Victorian Government shows that in 2013–14 around $280,000 was allocated for Aboriginal-specific Integrated Family Services, which represents approximately 0.3 per cent of total funding for that program across Victoria.¹⁴² These services work with vulnerable children and young people and those families including those at risk of becoming involved with Child Protection.¹⁴³

The Commission also notes that while overall rates of entry of Victorian Aboriginal children into out-of-home care have been increasing year by year, the figures vary considerably between regions with some regions (Outer Gippsland, Mallee and Goulburn) experiencing substantial declines between the periods 2000–03 to 2009–12.¹⁴⁴ It was submitted that this may be due to the influence of established Aboriginal community controlled organisations in those regions.¹⁴⁵

Other areas, such as Inner Gippsland, had rates of out-of-home placements for Aboriginal children that were much higher than the national average (55 per 1000); or even the Victorian average (62.5 per 1000) sitting at the highest Victorian rate of 116 per 1000.¹⁴⁶ Of the children in out-of-home care in this region, 86 per cent had been exposed to family violence.¹⁴⁷ The lack of adequate services (including strong Aboriginal community controlled organisations) in the Latrobe Valley, an area of such great need, was cited as a concern by multiple witnesses. Ms Jacquelyn Turfrey, Director of the Koori Justice Unit, Department of Justice and Regulation described the challenges for this region:

What we have noticed there from service mapping is that there's a big hole in service delivery across the board, including in family violence. What that creates then is there's no services to refer people to. So you end up getting courts tied up, police tied up; they just can't deal with their population in the way that you can when you have a good service provider. There is no strong Aboriginal community controlled organisation in the Latrobe Valley. The ones that service that area are outside.¹⁴⁸

Deep concern was expressed by witnesses that without appropriate culturally sensitive and trauma-informed support for children in out-of-home care, the high rate of child removal will contribute to the next wave of family violence. Commissioner Jackomos gave evidence that:

... the current group of Koori children in the care of the State are potentially our next cohort of family [violence] offenders and victims, if we don't provide timely and appropriate counselling and support, if we don't provide them warm and loving homes in the interim whilst we work with their families for early reunification or, where that is not possible, to provide them with stability, preferably within the family network. We need to be working with our children so that they know what is a healthy, responsible and respected relationship. We need to be working with our young boys so that they are [respectful] of women, their mothers, their sisters and their partners.¹⁴⁹

Commissioner Jackomos called for a dedicated strategy addressing the impact of family violence on Aboriginal children, to complement and support the 10 year plan.¹⁵⁰ He proposed:

... the development of a state-wide strategic response to improving the lives of vulnerable Aboriginal babies, children and young people with child protection, youth justice and child homelessness as well as children's trauma and mental health at its core ... The strategic response should be an initiative agreed between the broad Aboriginal community and government, with governance arrangements on par with the Aboriginal Justice Agreement. The response at a minimum should include; principles, protocols, targets and measureable outcomes monitored through a partnership forum.¹⁵¹

Victorian Aboriginal Child Forum

In August 2015 participants at the Aboriginal Children's Summit, convened by Victorian Children and Families' Minister The Hon. Jenny Mikakos and co-chaired by Adjunct Professor Muriel Bamblett AM, Chief Executive Officer of Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, resolved to establish the Victorian Aboriginal Child Forum to address the over-representation of Aboriginal children in out-of-home care. The forum provides ongoing policy direction and monitoring of outcomes for Aboriginal children in out-of-home care. It is based on a partnership between community and government and will meet quarterly. The terms of reference do not refer specifically to family violence but include:

- ▷ strengthening families' and communities' capacity to care for children to reduce the rates of entry into out-of-home care
- ▷ ensuring that every Aboriginal child and family, regardless of where they live in Victoria, has full access to a continuum of prevention, early intervention and placement services delivered through the Aboriginal community controlled organisation sector
- ▷ building the life skills and cultural identity of Aboriginal children in care.¹⁵²

Fear of child protection authorities

The Commission heard that these high rates of child removal and child protection intervention deter some Aboriginal women from disclosing family violence or seeking assistance:¹⁵³

... I think we cannot underestimate the fear of Aboriginal communities, particularly members of our communities who live in poverty and disadvantage, their absolute paralysing fear of the government intervening and taking their children. This is just huge. Our people will not report when they should report.¹⁵⁴

In particular there is a general 'mistrust in mainstream services because our women, our people see that they are the very organisations that take your children away'.¹⁵⁵

The Commission heard that Aboriginal women's overwhelming fear of having their children removed was not sufficiently understood by child protection workers, who it was submitted 'adopted punitive and victim-blaming responses towards Indigenous women experiencing family violence'.¹⁵⁶

What we see within the child protection system is there is a victim blaming mentality. We also see a competing interest where child protection workers are telling our women to leave, otherwise they risk losing their children, and community and family are asking our women to stay and do whatever it takes to make that work.¹⁵⁷

FVPLS Victoria stated that a 'fundamental attitudinal shift is required within the Department [of Health and Human Services] to reform the way the system responds to Aboriginal victims-survivors of family violence.'¹⁵⁸ Specifically, it stated that 'workforce development must include wide-spread, compulsory training for all child protection workers in order to improve cultural respect and awareness along with family violence sensitivity training'.¹⁵⁹

FVPLS Victoria also suggested implementing a Child Protection Notification Referral System for Aboriginal families whereby the primary parent is immediately referred to FVPLS Victoria or another appropriate legal provider.¹⁶⁰ We discuss this further in Chapter 11.

Disconnection from culture

In a related issue, the Commission heard from a number of organisations that there is a widespread failure to abide by statutory obligations towards Aboriginal children in out-of-home care, leading to children becoming disconnected from their community and culture.¹⁶¹

Section 176 of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) requires the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to prepare a cultural plan for each Aboriginal child placed in out-of-home care under a guardianship to Secretary order or long-term guardianship to Secretary order. Legislative amendments to this section, due to commence on 1 March 2016, will broaden this requirement to all Aboriginal children in out-of-home care.¹⁶² The cultural plan must set out how the child will retain connection to their community and culture.¹⁶³ A joint submission to the Victorian Government from Aboriginal community controlled organisations, mainstream providers and the Centre for Excellence in Child and Family Welfare Inc. claimed that these statutory requirements were routinely not met.¹⁶⁴ It cites a 2013 audit showing that of those Aboriginal children to whom the statutory obligation applied only eight per cent ($n=15$) had a completed cultural support plan.¹⁶⁵

The Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency submitted:

For Aboriginal children placed in out of home care due to family violence this all too often results in removal from kinship groups, community, culture and land; these are factors that contribute to resilience and healing. Aboriginal children are also removed younger and for longer periods of time than non-Aboriginal children exacerbating loss and disconnection ... Given the high prevalence of children and young people in OOHC having experienced family violence, the State, as their parent, has a responsibility to implement strategies to support young people to recover from their experiences and to make healthier choices for themselves so as to reduce the incidence of violence and break the intergenerational patterns.¹⁶⁶

The Commission also heard that there were many instances where Aboriginal children were not identified as such (and therefore, a cultural plan was not considered). The failure to identify Aboriginal children can occur because child protection workers fail to ask (or ask in an inappropriate manner or without providing adequate context for the question), or women are reluctant to disclose due to prior experiences with Child Protection.¹⁶⁷ The Commission notes that one of the priority issues for the newly formed Victorian Aboriginal Child Forum is to develop a comprehensive outcomes framework that is inclusive of cultural needs and rights of Aboriginal children and young people in out-of-home care, and to monitor accountability of outcomes.¹⁶⁸

Aboriginal people are less likely to access support services

The Commission heard that there are a number of reasons why many Aboriginal people who experience family violence do not access support services. These include the fear of the consequences of reporting, lack of access to support services and discrimination and racism.

Reluctance to report

It can take someone, a victim or a perpetrator, a very long time to ask for help to deal with their experience of family violence. When that courage is found, the responses from service providers needs to be immediate, supportive, and above all, culturally appropriate to the needs of the individual, and their family.¹⁶⁹

Some national studies indicate that as much as 90 per cent of family violence against Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people goes unreported.¹⁷⁰ The Victorian Government submission noted that Aboriginal people are less likely to report family violence than non-Aboriginal people for a range of reasons including 'fear about the consequences of disclosure, distrust of government agencies and service providers, historical and cultural factors and a lack of access to support services'.¹⁷¹ As noted previously, the Commission heard that the fear of having children taken away is a huge impediment to reporting.

This issue was well described by the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force in its report where it identified that:

... the community needs to be able to trust somebody to tell their "secrets" to. The community has identified that there is no safe way to disclose, so communities are fearful of the consequences and what the impact will be on people the disclosure is about. There is also concern about the current level of support available to individuals who do disclose and the guarantee of their safety. Those individuals that do disclose are also burdened with the concern that 'will they be blamed for family breakdown or will they be believed.'¹⁷²

In relation to women's fears that they will be blamed for family breakdown, Ms Braybrook, from FVPLS Victoria, gave evidence that the multiple obligations women have within communities can prevent them from reporting family violence:

... because of this model of community and family, keeping community together, keeping family together, that does place enormous pressure on the women that are experiencing the violence and they are less likely to disclose and they are essentially silenced because of that.¹⁷³

The Commission heard that reconciling these obligations may be enormously challenging given the many issues victims face, including fear of homelessness, fear of child removal, loss of relationship and the physical and psychological trauma of the violence itself:

Given the relationship between Aboriginal people and authority organisations such as the police or government welfare departments, it is understandable that Aboriginal people are wary of making reports that, whilst may have the immediate impact of safety, have the longer term of impact of breaking up a family, putting children into out of home care, sending someone into custody, becoming homeless or other impacts.¹⁷⁴

Access

The Commission heard that in some rural areas women cannot find either a mainstream or community-controlled service nearby. A participant in a community consultation reflected on meeting a woman in a workshop who had disclosed family violence and left the perpetrator, but she had to travel 200 kilometres to find help.¹⁷⁵

Other practical barriers include the requirement that people attend a service, rather than services being delivered in the home when transport barriers limit access.¹⁷⁶ This was said to be exacerbated in rural areas where lack of public transport meant people cannot get into town to see a service.¹⁷⁷ Delays in getting an appointment can also lead to the moment of intervention or support being lost. The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service reflected:

Immediate and prompt responses are more likely to be successful when dealing with victims of family violence. Aboriginal clients are less likely to engage with services if they do not receive a quick response. They are more inclined to let the matter go thinking that it is going to take considerable time to get an appointment.¹⁷⁸

Discrimination and racism

Evidence was given that when Aboriginal people do access mainstream services, they can be met with a number of impediments including actual and perceived discrimination by service providers; language and cultural barriers; lack of trust in services and organisations; and lack of awareness of and engagement with local Aboriginal communities.¹⁷⁹

The Commission was informed that this can range from:

... anything from overt racism and being made to feel uncomfortable going to mainstream organisations, to simply feeling that, whilst good intentioned, non-Aboriginal service providers do not understand the cultural and social factors that impact upon and have very specific outcomes for Aboriginal people. This feeling is multiplied when interacting with complex systems in criminal, civil and family law.¹⁸⁰

The importance of ensuring that mainstream organisations provide culturally safe services is discussed in more detail below.

The Commission heard that mainstream services sometimes assume that if a victim is an Aboriginal person they should use a community-specific service,¹⁸¹ even though this may amount to discrimination under Victorian law:¹⁸²

If you are a First Nations people, you are treated completely separately to any other cohort in government systems and processes, and I don't know why. But when people try and access a service, they can get blocked quite easily and then they will feel rejected and they won't try and reengage again. So we have to send our staff with people to mainstream appointments to make sure, if there is a blocker, we help that person work out their service delivery.¹⁸³

The Commission was also asked to consider racism as a barrier to accessing mainstream services. For example, a 2012 survey of 755 Aboriginal Victorians found that 18 per cent witnessed racism against other Aboriginal Victorians almost every day.¹⁸⁴ Twenty six per cent witnessed racism at least once a week, and 97 per cent had experienced racism in the previous 12 months.¹⁸⁵ Sixty-two per cent of participants reported that they sometimes, often or very often avoided situations because of racism, while another 17 per cent avoided such situations on occasion.¹⁸⁶

Funding

Current investment

As noted in Chapter 41, the Victorian Government has been unable to provide the Commission with an overall estimate of the cost of family violence across its programs, including universal services such as health. However, the Victorian Government submission advised that $80.6 million was budgeted for 2014–15 for expenditure on programs and services addressing family violence.¹⁸⁷

Separately, the Victorian Government advised that in relation to family violence involving Aboriginal people, 'approximately $10 million was spent directly on Aboriginal family violence in 2014–15. Of this 25 per cent was for prevention through broader programs and 75 per cent on responses to family violence'.¹⁸⁸ It noted however that the majority of services accessed by Aboriginal people are available to all Victorians and that the direct cost of family violence-specific programs and services is an estimate, as it is difficult to isolate 'family violence' programs from broader programs.¹⁸⁹

Funding for Aboriginal services in the 2015–16 Victorian Budget included $1.3 million for projects that improve Victoria's immediate response to Aboriginal family violence, particularly in high risk communities, including targeted statewide and regional education and awareness campaigns. A further $0.6 million was provided to Aboriginal support services and $1.8 million was allocated to help Aboriginal community controlled organisations to respond to the findings of Taskforce 1000, including addressing some complex safety and wellbeing issues identified by the Taskforce. All funding was for 2015–16 only. The budget also announced that existing programs assisting vulnerable Aboriginal families will be reviewed in consultation with Aboriginal organisations and Aboriginal communities, to maximise placement prevention and reunification efforts.¹⁹⁰

The Commission was told that an additional $2.54 million was sourced from the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness which expires on 30 June 2017. This includes funding for Aboriginal legal support, Indigenous men's case management and intensive case management for women and children.¹⁹¹

Funding is distributed across a large number of providers.¹⁹²

As noted in Chapter 41, the overall amount of funding provided by the Victorian Government to address family violence is difficult to quantify. This is also the case in relation to Aboriginal family violence: see the box on this page. However, the Commission heard from key agencies and a number of witnesses that current funding levels for the main elements of Aboriginal family violence prevention and response are inadequate, and that the gap is widening as both population size and the rate of reporting increase.¹⁹³ The mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan found that lack of resources had hampered the implementation and oversight of the plan, and recommended that funding be increased to improve governance and oversight, and support the Partnership Forum.¹⁹⁴ In addition, concerns were expressed in evidence about the short-term nature of funding and the lack of provision for evaluation of programs.

Short-term funding

The Commission heard that funding for family violence is often one-off or short-term which does not allow for sustained approaches. A heavy emphasis on pilots was a common concern:

The problem is there's a lot of great pilots that happen across the State ... The problem is the lack of access to ongoing funding to deliver these programs on a much broader scale, such as the ad that was done by MDAS was done on the smell of an oily rag and with the assistance from the broadcasters who I think gave them free airtime, it was voluntary.¹⁹⁵

They are fantastic. But you need for them to be delivered across the state and preferably with local players.¹⁹⁶

Short-term funding has been described as disdainful to clients and as a disincentive for people in need of assistance to use services because of lack of continuity.¹⁹⁷ Adjunct Professor Bamblett, described it as follows:

I think it's short-term funding for communities to do very small things without visioning, and I think that we need to start to look at what are the bigger issues. I get concerned that that small bucket of money is seen by government as addressing the issue of Aboriginal family violence.¹⁹⁸

In the absence of recurrent funding we were told that organisations use one-off grant money, then re-apply for funds year after year, or seek other sources:

So, we do talk about tiny little pieces of money. We do spend an enormous amount of time justifying why we should get that funding and then evaluating the output of that funding. Even when those two things work exceptionally well, as they do with the Sisters Day Out, the program itself still won't get picked up by government as core business to be funded permanently as they would with any other program.¹⁹⁹

In some cases the stated purpose of funding is to trial new approaches. The Community Initiatives Fund is an example of this, under which IFVRAGs are allocated $59,000 per annum to initiate small-scale projects.²⁰⁰ The majority of these have focused on cultural strengthening and building awareness of family violence.²⁰¹ While it is important to have dedicated funds for innovation, there was frustration that these activities cannot be repeated, even when they are effective.²⁰² This limitation was also noted in the mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan, where short-term funding was found to have 'limited the scope of innovation and weakened the reach and spread of promising initiatives.'²⁰³ The evaluation proposed a review of the CIF guidelines and additional resources both for the CIF and for a new stream of funding to enable longer term projects and the continuation of successful programs piloted under the CIF.²⁰⁴

In some cases, three year funding has been provided for prevention projects. These Koori Community Safety Grant Projects are discussed earlier in this chapter.

Insufficient funding for evaluation

An associated concern was that small amounts of funding on a one-off basis does not allow for evaluation of initiatives over time.

Broadly there is a lack of formal evaluation evidence on primary prevention programs targeted towards Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. The Australian Institute of Family Studies reports that the diversity of programs delivered, combined with the limited evidence base, makes it challenging to clearly articulate effective practice.²⁰⁵ Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS) makes a similar finding in a 2016 state of knowledge review which posits that:

Information sharing about positive progress made in Indigenous communities should be encouraged through the appropriate resourcing of program evaluation. Policies and interventions, as well as evidence building on the effectiveness of those approaches, need to involve Indigenous perspectives. In a time when evidence-based practice is necessary for funding, governments also need to be open-minded to evaluative approaches that include Indigenous viewpoints and the inappropriateness of randomised control trials for small scale culturally sensitive programs.²⁰⁶

In relation to service delivery to Aboriginal peoples generally, in 2014 the Victorian Auditor-General reported that there is 'significant scope' for departments to improve monitoring, evaluation and reporting of outcomes of Aboriginal service delivery strategies and programs. He found that save for the (then) Department of Health 'there is little evidence that departments undertake robust evaluations to assess the achievement of outcomes for Aboriginal Victorians'.²⁰⁷

It was also noted in submissions to this Commission that the absence of funding for research and evaluation means that organisations are being required to bear the financial burden for these activities.²⁰⁸ This is particularly onerous for smaller organisations.²⁰⁹

The Commission notes that the cultural safety of practices used by consultants engaged in consultations with Aboriginal communities in relation to family violence (which might include evaluation) have previously been identified as an area for improvement and guidelines have been issued.²¹⁰

Inadequate data collection by mainstream agencies and departments

Another criticism frequently expressed was that while some progress has been made, collection of data about Aboriginal family violence by agencies is generally poor. This was an issue that was identified as a priority by the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force which recommended in 2003 that:

Government should consider the strategic advantages that can be achieved by putting in place integrated processes and mechanisms for gathering, compiling and distributing data and other useful information. This would create a common platform on which Departmental staff, Indigenous organisations and Regional Indigenous Family Violence Action Groups can make decisions about Indigenous family violence matters.²¹¹

Some 12 years later poor data collection was a strong theme in submissions to this Commission.²¹² Adjunct Professor Bamblett recounted her experience:

I go to family violence forums and there's no data. DHS has no obligation to report on data, how many families are presenting with family violence, and we don't have a from-to. So how are you going to reduce family violence when you haven't got measurable targets?²¹³ ... So how do you actually address violence when you don't know what the data is saying?²¹⁴

Others also noted the importance of specific attention on data collection and reporting of the disability status of Aboriginal clients using the family violence sector, as well as data on Aboriginal children affected by family violence.²¹⁵

Problems with the collection of data regarding Indigenous status were also noted in evidence by Ms Fiona Dowsley, Chief Statistician at the Crime Statistics Agency, who reported that Aboriginal identification is 'quite often of reasonably poor quality'.²¹⁶ This is despite such information being highly desirable for policy making and to operations. The CSA further reports '... [T]here is significant room to improve the quality of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander data before coverage will be sufficient to enable robust statistical and research use across datasets'.²¹⁷

The Australian Bureau of Statistics recommends that a person's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status be sought each time they come into contact with a service provider (as their understanding of it, or their willingness to report it, may change), and that they be asked to specify whether they are Aboriginal, Torres Strait Islander, both Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander or neither Aboriginal nor Torres Strait Islander.²¹⁸ However the CSA observed that these standards have not been uniformly adopted by agencies, departments and service providers. They were particularly concerned that a person's identification as an Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander person should be confirmed by that person and not simply assumed by others.²¹⁹

The mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan also noted problems with data collection and recording of Indigenous status. Improving data collection and analysis was one of the four recommendations made in the evaluation, including that '[a]ll agencies and departments with implementation responsibilities develop a strategy to reduce the number and percentage of cases where Aboriginality is recorded as unknown or not stated'.²²⁰

At a national level, the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey which is the most comprehensive quantitative study of interpersonal violence in Australia, with over 17,000 women and men completing the 2012 survey, does not currently collect demographic information regarding Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.²²¹ This limitation is discussed further in Chapter 39.

Choice of organisation

Aboriginal community controlled organisations

The Commission consistently heard that most Aboriginal people have a strong preference for receiving services from Aboriginal community controlled organisations because, among other things, they are much more likely to deliver services in a culturally appropriate way.²²²

The Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency submitted:

Our practice approaches incorporate understandings of the impact of past policies on families today, understand how intergenerational trauma and racism must be addressed as part of effective responses. We know that providing Aboriginal services for the Aboriginal community is what works.²²³

A 2015 Australian Institute of Families review of the literature identified the following common factors for successful community-managed programs:

- ▷ community has ownership of and control over decision-making
- ▷ culture is central to the program, including an understanding of local context, history and community leaders
- ▷ local Indigenous staff work on the program or in the organisation
- ▷ good corporate governance exists
- ▷ Indigenous staff are working on programs and existing capacity is harnessed
- ▷ trusting relationships with partners are established²²⁴
- ▷ there is flexibility in time lines.²²⁵

There was a very strong call for investment in Aboriginal services to address prevention of family violence, early intervention strategies and responses to violence. Aboriginal community controlled services were seen to be consistent with the policy intent behind the 10 year plan. It was argued that these services are well connected to communities, and are better able to engage community members and to understand and respond to trauma.²²⁶

People also spoke of the value of integrated, one-stop services where the various needs of families can be met.²²⁷ This reflects the principle of healing for the whole family as well as an attempt to make services as easy to access and flexible as possible.

Ms Gallagher reiterated the value of one-stop shops for meeting primary health care and other needs, stating:

A client can come in and speak to the GP, the financial advisor and the housing officer all in one visit. I can see no better way of making sure that the Aboriginal community has access to, and actually uses, these kinds of critical services. If services are provided at multiple different locations, it is highly likely that the client will only access the service that they need immediately and will not seek out other services or will be lost between services.²²⁸

One-stop services were also called for to reduce fragmentation between different systems—for example drug and alcohol, family support and family violence:²²⁹

What we do know, talking more general, is that where we have strong Aboriginal community controlled organisations delivering one door programs is where we have the strongest outcomes.²³⁰

There was, however, some caution expressed about the one-stop shop approach that provides services to the whole family being the only service model. In her evidence Ms Braybrook outlines three reasons why women may not feel comfortable accessing Aboriginal-controlled services that work with both victims and perpetrators:

- ▷ lack of confidence that the service will support them to leave the perpetrator
- ▷ concerns about privacy and relationships between workers and the community, and resulting pressure to remain within the family unit
- ▷ lack of trust in a service that also works with perpetrators.²³¹

Ms Braybrook stressed the importance of specialist Aboriginal women's family violence services that women can access safely and privately, and provide support to women, 'to ensure that they don't continue to be silenced and that they are kept safe.'²³²

Accessing mainstream services

While the clear message was that most Aboriginal people prefer to use services established by and for their own community, the Commission heard that this was not always the case:

Whilst we believe that a holistic approach to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander client's issue based needs are the way forward. [O]ur research found that one of the primary reasons given for choosing to not use an Indigenous service was explained in the context of the interconnectedness of our families and communities confidentiality cannot be assured when using Indigenous services and this can compromise the safety of victims.²³³

It was acknowledged that not all Aboriginal people wish to use an Aboriginal-specific service for a range of reasons including privacy and confidentiality, or to minimise the 'shame' of disclosure.²³⁴ Some women may feel that by reporting family violence to a community controlled organisation, they may experience community pressure to not report the violence in order to avoid criminalising the perpetrator, or be otherwise pressured to stay in the relationship.²³⁵ These issues are not unique to Aboriginal communities, however for some women these are a deterrent to using an Aboriginal-specific service.

Cultural safety within mainstream services

What is cultural safety?

A culturally safe environment is one where services are provided in manner that is respectful of a person's culture and beliefs, and that is free from discrimination.²³⁶

To ensure that an environment is culturally safe, mainstream service providers and governments are required to analyse their organisational culture and ensure that it does not have a negative impact on the cultural rights of Indigenous communities. This right is supported by Victorian, national and international legal instruments which uphold the rights of Indigenous people.²³⁷

Cultural safety has a very practical application when it comes to mainstream services delivering programs because 'understanding, working with and providing services to Aboriginal people requires ongoing communication and a willingness to work in different ways'.²³⁸

The Commission received submissions about the importance of ensuring that mainstream services provide culturally appropriate and safe services to those Aboriginal people who choose to access them. As noted by Ms Angela Singh, Executive Director, Office of Aboriginal Affairs Victoria:

We absolutely see the need for our Aboriginal organisations to be at the forefront in terms of delivering services because they are culturally appropriate, but we also acknowledge that where services are delivered by mainstream organisations they absolutely need to be culturally safe and culturally respectful ... So one of the things that we encourage mainstream services to do is to try to be culturally inclusive and culturally respectful of Aboriginal people, and that way when an Aboriginal person walks through the door they feel supported, they feel their needs are being identified and they feel that their needs can be addressed over the longterm.²³⁹

All DHHS funded organisations are required to be accredited against service standards which include requirements to improve cultural competence.²⁴⁰

However, an important distinction between cultural safety and cultural competency or awareness was highlighted in evidence. The Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service explained that 'while cultural awareness is not a new concept, cultural safety is not as widely known. It refers to an environment in which people feel safe and respected for who they are and what they need, and where their cultural identity is unchallenged.'²⁴¹

There was clear frustration expressed in submissions that cultural competency was seen by many mainstream organisations as the required standard that service providers should be striving for, and that more is required:

Note that we do not use the term 'cultural competency'. This is because the term represents the idea that there is an endpoint of competency and the perception that if you've done training once, you don't need to do it again. The same as professional training for lawyers or health practitioners is accepted as ongoing, so too is cultural awareness.'²⁴²

We are forever talking about cultural awareness training to build trust for women in the services – particularly the police – it is not there at all. These need to be ongoing things, not just one off – need to work with judiciary, so they are more culturally aware.²⁴³

There was also a warning that care must be taken to avoid the risk of token or ineffective 'add-on' attempts to cater for Aboriginal clients: 'cultural safety cannot be achieved by simply employing a handful of Aboriginal staff', with concern expressed that Aboriginal staff can become over-burdened by expectations to 'represent 'Aboriginality' within the organisation, service Aboriginal clients and continually educate non-Aboriginal colleagues about cultural matters.'²⁴⁴

The Commission also heard that there is often a 'dichotomy of inaction or overreaction' to reports of violence involving Aboriginal people:

Whether it's a lack of follow up shown when reporting an instance of family violence, or a heavy handed response from a government agency when a family seeks help, Aboriginal people find they are either facing a lack of support in the most serious of cases, but excessive interventions in other situations.²⁴⁵

It was noted that Aboriginal community controlled organisations are already working cooperatively with mainstream organisations to assist them to improve and that this is done on top of already significant demands.²⁴⁶ The Commission heard that there is little capacity for Aboriginal organisations to provide secondary consultations to mainstream services due to the high demand for their core services, and that developing and maintaining partnerships is demanding and time consuming.²⁴⁷

One option discussed was for Aboriginal family violence services to be given additional funding to provide secondary consultations, in the way that the Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency currently does through its Lakidjeka Aboriginal Child Specialist Advice and Support Service (ACSASS). This service provides culturally appropriate advice and consultation on decisions that determine the future of at-risk Aboriginal children.²⁴⁸

Strengthening culture in the early years

Early intervention initiatives

Focusing on families and particularly on children in their first five years of life was highlighted as key to preventing family violence. The Commission heard in evidence that there are approximately 800 Aboriginal children born in Victoria each year and that an 'intensive response'¹²⁴⁹ is necessary to ensure they have every opportunity to develop in a positive, nurturing and respectful environment, free from family violence:²⁵⁰ '[There's] no hope unless we can maintain who we are. What is right for our children and our people.'²⁵¹

The Commission heard that a much more focused effort on programs for families with young children is required; programs that do not stigmatise but rather support and strengthen their sense of culture.²⁵² This is consistent with Victorian government policy which recognises how important being strong in culture is for Aboriginal people's wellbeing.²⁵³ This is particularly so for young people.²⁵⁴

For example, Mallee District Aboriginal Services, a one-stop shop Aboriginal service in Mildura, made a conscious decision to invest in services focused on the first five years of life:

We consider that investing in children is key to interrupting and reversing the intergenerational nature of family violence as well as a whole range of other areas of health in which Indigenous people experience considerable and disproportionate disadvantage.²⁵⁵

There was a strong preference for investment in young families and families in general, 'to build their capacity to be good parents prior to even considering removal.'²⁵⁶ Existing examples, such as the Bumps to Babes and Beyond program in Mildura, were cited as positive models.²⁵⁷

Bumps to Babes and Beyond

The Bumps to Babes and Beyond program delivers a range of services to young expectant mothers from one central location. Services include family violence advocacy, accommodation, health, prenatal help and antismoking programs.²⁵⁸ Consistency is an important part of the program, with the same staff member working with the mother from the time she first registers with the co-op until her child is a few years old.²⁵⁹

Other programs that have an intensive focus on infants and young children, such as Cradle to Kinder and Stronger Families, were described as working well but are not available in all areas. Adjunct Professor Bamblett gave evidence that there are 'only two Aboriginal Cradle to Kinders that are funded in Victoria.'²⁶⁰ She also identified that while some Aboriginal-specific Child FIRST components have been developed, these are not offered consistently across the state.²⁶¹

Aboriginal Cradle to Kinder

Cradle to Kinder is a targeted antenatal and postnatal support service that provides intensive and long term parenting support to vulnerable mothers. The target groups for the Aboriginal Cradle to Kinder program are young pregnant Aboriginal women or women under 25 pregnant with an Aboriginal child.²⁶²

The rationale for focusing on younger mothers is 'intervening earlier in the life of the mother/parents provides an opportunity to break the intergenerational cycle of disadvantage before behaviours become entrenched'.

The program provides support to families from before birth up until the child reaches the age of four.²⁶³

Across the whole Cradle to Kinder program it is estimated that 65 per cent of women are currently or have recently experienced family violence.²⁶⁴

Cradle to Kinder, including Aboriginal Cradle to Kinder is currently being evaluated by the Australian Institute of Family Studies.²⁶⁵

Young people

The Koorie Youth Council noted that strategies and services aimed at preventing Aboriginal family violence should not focus exclusively on infants and small children, but should also examine the needs of young people within the community.²⁶⁶ Overall, the importance of young people being targeted in prevention and early intervention strategies was a key priority in submissions, not least because roughly one in three Aboriginal Victorians is under 15 years of age.²⁶⁷ The 2013 National Community Attitudes Survey also provides evidence of the need to target early adulthood as a life stage involving particular vulnerability to violence for both young men and women.²⁶⁸ Ms Gallagher stated:

... we need to run programs in our local schools that teach our young men and young women about what respectful relationships are. Already, as teenagers, we see that our young men are displaying behaviours that are disrespectful and we are seeing our young women accepting that behaviour, they think that it's normal but [it] is not part of Aboriginal culture.²⁶⁹

The Koorie Youth Council stressed that to be effective, strategies and services must be culturally relevant, taking into account the role that Koorie young people have within their families and communities.²⁷⁰ It is important that Aboriginal young people lead the design of these prevention strategies, as well as strategies for responding to violence when it occurs. The Koorie Youth Council submitted that Aboriginal young people:

... need to be able to access 'youth friendly'-developmentally appropriate and accessible information about family violence and how to get support if they are experiencing family violence. When young people are experiencing family violence, the support services that they come into contact with (either as individuals or accompanying a parent) need to be well equipped to engage them in ways that are age-appropriate and address their specific needs. Any strategies, services or other responses to family violence, need to respect young people - as both holders of rights and as actively engaged in the development of solutions or mapping of pathways that impact upon them.²⁷¹

In consultations and submissions there was a strong theme that 'sporting and cultural events and programs are critical to build strong communities, culture and families, and prevent domestic and family violence, but there is little funding for these events'.²⁷²

The value of sport as an activity which can influence young people's attitudes was also identified in research commissioned by the Commonwealth Government to inform a national primary prevention campaign to reduce violence against women. That research found that community leaders have influence over all younger Australians, but are particularly important for Aboriginal young people. Similarly, while sport, sporting coaches and sports people are important influencers generally for 10–14 year olds, they have a particularly strong impact on Aboriginal young people.²⁷³

Sporting initiatives

The North-West IFVRAG in partnership with the Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Ltd and the Fitzroy Stars Football, Netball Club developed a project targeted at Aboriginal young people and their families living in the north-west metro region. The project supported five netball teams and four football teams from the north west metropolitan region to attend the VACSAL statewide junior football/netball carnival held in Shepparton on the 2nd and 3rd of October 2013.²⁷⁴

North-West IFVRAG was responsible for the delivery of the family violence/strengthening family messages throughout the duration of the project. The overwhelming participation in the event enabled sport to be used as a platform to deliver proactive family violence messages supporting cultural safety, positive parenting practices and strong families as the foundation for stronger communities.²⁷⁵

The Northern Metropolitan IFVRAG submission reported that while there was no formal evaluation or survey undertaken, the value of the project was 'clearly evident' through anecdotal evidence of community cohesion that had an emphasis on cultural safety; encouraging positive parenting practices through involvement from parents in their children's sporting activities and positive comments and praise given to the organisers regarding the success of the project in effectively supporting the engagement of Aboriginal young people and their families in family strengthening activities.²⁷⁶

Responses to family violence

Gender and family violence

The Commission heard a range of views regarding the primacy of gender in family violence in Aboriginal communities.

Throughout the literature the centrality of family and community is stressed. This 'fundamentally alters the desired approaches to caring for women who have been victims of violence and working with men who have been perpetrators'.²⁷⁷ Many submissions placed primacy on keeping the family together, stating that 'a holistic approach to families is required, including the perpetrators—a gendered approach to domestic and family violence doesn't suit the Aboriginal community'.²⁷⁸ A participant in a community consultation stated 'Our men need to be strong, we need to give power back to the men so they can make the decisions for their family. Men are no longer man of the house. The men have fallen away and the women have taken over'.²⁷⁹

The Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group submitted:

Our belief is the mainstream heavily gendered power and privilege approach does not fit for Aboriginal perpetrators of Family Violence and therefore it is no surprise that programs through this lens do not result in any change in those perpetrating Family Violence.²⁸⁰

The Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Ltd submission states that the safety of children and women is paramount and in its view 'isolating them from the perpetrators appears to have limited results'.²⁸¹ Other providers told us:

We provide a positive environment for Aboriginal men who want to learn how to actively show respect for the interests of women and children ... A culturally strong Aboriginal family exists when men are living fulfilling lives and are responsible for their actions as father and-or husbands [this] will nurture the success and wellbeing for the whole family.²⁸²

However, others told the Commission that family violence in Aboriginal communities is gendered, just as it is in non-Aboriginal communities, and that taking a gender neutral focus on the family and on the community's voice may overlook the 'lived experiences of women and children as the primary victims/survivors of male perpetrated violence' and lead to a silencing of women.²⁸³ Ms Braybrook stated in her evidence:

Our organisation [FVPLS Victoria] strongly believes that we must have a gendered response to family violence. We must acknowledge this in our community if we have any chance of moving forward ... We see firsthand the systemic and racial discrimination and violence, the social disadvantage and gender inequity that our women experience every day in their life.²⁸⁴

She went on to say: 'There is a call in our community to keep family violence gender neutral, but we do not support that. I believe that the response has to be first and foremost the safety of Aboriginal women and children'.²⁸⁵ Commissioner Jackomos stated 'I want to have it acknowledged, that by the evidence, Aboriginal children and their mothers, along with Aboriginal women, are the primary victims of family violence in our community'.²⁸⁶ He further cautioned that:

... there is a falsehood in our culture that the black man has fallen from the top of the patriarchal tree and he needs to be re-installed before we can find balance in our community. I'm not in favour of initiatives or programs that promote a renaissance of young warriors and male alter egos. However, I am in favour of growing young and [respectful] men who are good boyfriends, good partners, good fathers and good grandfathers.²⁸⁷

The justice system

Insufficient funding of legal services

Concerns about the impact of insufficient or restrictive funding were raised by the two primary legal services representing victims and perpetrators of family violence: the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria and the Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service.

VALS notes in its submission that 'there is significant under funding for legal services which address both the immediate and flow on legal impacts of family violence'.²⁸⁸ It was particularly concerned that respondents have proper legal advice in order to understand their responsibilities under a family violence intervention order so that the victim is not put at further risk. It submitted that respondents often do not fully understand such orders.²⁸⁹

FVPLS Victoria stated that despite being the only specialist service for Aboriginal victims of family violence in the state, it has only one child protection lawyer (who experienced a 66 per cent increase in her caseload in the twelve months between 2013 and 2014) and two family violence lawyers for the whole of Melbourne.²⁹⁰ The service is unable to extend its services to all parts of Victoria including major regional centres where rates of violence in Aboriginal communities are high; for example Shepparton, Echuca, Bendigo, Swan Hill, or are confined only to outreach services (such as in the case of Morwell in the Latrobe Valley).²⁹¹

As a result, it was submitted, the service is unable to meet the growing demand, and 'many civil legal issues (such as family law and family violence matters) go unresolved and can escalate'.²⁹² A recent legal needs survey of Aboriginal women conducted by FVPLS Victoria found that almost half (46 per cent) of the participants had experienced a family violence-related legal issue in the previous 12 months. More than half of these women (53 per cent) had received no legal assistance for that issue.²⁹³

Victoria Police

As described above, the Koori Family Violence Police Protocols were developed under the 10 year plan and were piloted in Mildura, Ballarat and Darebin between 2011-13. The Commission heard that the protocols had led to improvements including better communication between police and Aboriginal people and improved understanding and awareness by police of culturally appropriate services.²⁹⁴ However there was also frustration expressed that the protocols were not always followed by police,²⁹⁵ and that they have only been trialled in three of the six sites identified in 2008.²⁹⁶ This was seen as a lost opportunity for improving responses to family violence and to community/police relationships generally.²⁹⁷

The 2015 evaluation of the protocols found that all three pilot regions faced barriers in putting the protocols into place, including police members failing to identify the Aboriginal status of affected family members and perpetrators when attending family violence incidents.²⁹⁸ Additionally, the evaluation highlighted concerns about the availability and capacity of local Elders, specialist external trainers and Victoria Police Aboriginal Liaison Officers to deliver initial, regular and follow up training, and noted that the steering committees had not been sustained at the local level.²⁹⁹

The short to medium-term outcomes had been met, however, with police being more aware of Aboriginal culture and community, and having improved relationships with agencies. The evaluation also found that L17s are, with some variation across sites, reaching Aboriginal organisations, which indicates police are understanding and implementing processes under the protocols.³⁰⁰

An important issue raised in the evaluation was the resource implications for Aboriginal organisations who were receiving more L17 referrals due to increased reporting levels.³⁰¹

Overall, the evaluation reported that 'protocols were still a necessary tool for improving and sustaining the relationship between the police and Aboriginal communities and an essential complement to standard practice guidelines'.³⁰²

Despite some positive developments arising from the Koori Family Violence Police Protocols, the Commission heard about numerous ongoing challenges in the relationship between Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples and Victoria Police. Examples were provided of police minimising violence, blaming the victim, and failing to issue family violence safety notices:

... one in particular stands out to me where a woman went to report the violence again and the police officer said to her, 'He's just whacked you in the head this time. It's getting better. Last time it was worse'.³⁰³

There's not enough support from police – they respond to women but are very judgemental. Their attitude is that 'every Aboriginal woman is a victim', 'it's normal', 'this has happened all your life – deal with it'.³⁰⁴

The Commission heard that poor treatment by police may be further exacerbated for those women who have become offenders in the criminal justice system as an indirect result of family violence. By way of example, Flat Out Inc submitted that:

At times, police have failed in their responsibility to investigate family violence reports and take appropriate steps to ensure the ongoing safety of these women because they view them as criminals rather than victims. In several case studies, women have been arrested for outstanding warrants when police have been called to respond to family violence. In many of these cases, police have taken no action in relation to the family violence that has clearly occurred.³⁰⁵

Some reported that the police take too long to respond to calls, and then fail to conduct themselves appropriately once they do attend.³⁰⁶ Others said that in some cases 'police are reluctant to step in because they are trying to be culturally sensitive'.³⁰⁷ There was concern that where protocols do exist they are not consistently followed. A community consultation in Mildura noted:

The police don't always follow the Koori Police protocol/code of conduct—they often speak to the respondent and ignore the applicant on the call out. The Koori Police protocol was launched in 2007 but is still not fully operational in 2015.³⁰⁸

Further concerns related to the operation of the L17 system, under which police make referrals to specialist family violence services, men's behaviour change providers, Child Protection or Child FIRST.³⁰⁹ These are primarily mainstream/non-Aboriginal services, however a number of Aboriginal specific services, including men's services, are referral points for L17s. The Commission understands the process for these services receiving L17 referrals 'is working well in some places however work is still needed around getting police to question on Aboriginality'. It has also been reported that 'in places where cultural awareness training for police had been conducted there was an increase in L17 referrals to these services.'³¹⁰ The suggestion was also made that family violence L17s from police should always be referred directly to Aboriginal services for Aboriginal people.³¹¹

There was a particular criticism expressed about the large number of 'unknowns' in police data, and concern that police were not asking people if they identified as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander. This was a significant concern in a number of submissions because if the question does not get asked, then culturally appropriate practice cannot follow:³¹²

Because the question has not been asked or it has not been asked in an appropriate manner we are having children spend much longer in outofhome care because we are missing opportunities for reunification. It also misses out us tapping those children into valuable culturally rich programs and culturally rich counselling programs for our children. So having children being identified through L17s and having child protection asking the question in a Koori friendly manner and explaining why they are asking will ensure that, one, our children hopefully won't go on to be further victims and offenders of family violence because we have tapped them into culturally rich programs right from the start.³¹³

Police practices in relation to Aboriginal people and family violence are also discussed in Chapter 14.

Court programs and Aboriginal liaison workers

In its 2003 report, the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force noted substantial barriers for women dealing with the family law system, as well as poor experiences when seeking intervention orders in state courts. These concerns included:

- ▷ inadequate security for victims attending court, 'who may be harassed by the perpetrator and his supports'
- ▷ lack of confidential space at the registrar counter when making an application
- ▷ lack of confidentiality of the court hearing as a disincentive to taking legal action.³¹⁴

As a result, the Task Force recommended research into the feasibility of establishing an Indigenous Family Violence Court to 'provide a culturally safe and secure environment'.³¹⁵ This is discussed further below.

The Task Force further reported concerns about the absence of support and information regarding intervention orders, inconsistencies in police and court responses to intervention order applications and enforcement, and the impact on victims of needing to re-apply for a full order after an interim order and to re-tell their story. Community members participating in the Task Force process suggested that there be a Koori support worker at court to explain the court processes to Aboriginal people.³¹⁶

A number of submissions to this Commission similarly described the value of having Aboriginal liaison officers at court to assist people to understand the family violence intervention order process. The importance of understanding the details, conditions and the effect of orders was stressed by the Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service:

Where we find breaches of IVOs, more often than not it is because people didn't truly understand the nature of the IVO that was served against them ... So, having somebody who can explain that to somebody at the point they get the order served on them is really useful.³¹⁷

Various submissions described the value of the Koori Family Violence and Victims Support program at the Melbourne Magistrates' Court.³¹⁸ The program was initially piloted in 2011 and positively evaluated in 2012.³¹⁹ In May 2013 program operations were suspended due to positions becoming vacant. Further funds were made available to re-establish the program, and services recommenced in December 2013. The program was revised to also include Koori VOCAT (Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal) and became known as the Koori Family Violence and Victims Support Program.³²⁰

The program supported 196 Aboriginal clients at the Melbourne, Heidelberg, Ringwood and Sunshine Magistrates' Courts and the Neighbourhood Justice Centre between December 2013 and May 2015.³²¹

The Commission was advised that funding for the program ceased on 30 June 2015.

The need for specialist family violence courts

There were a number of suggestions made to the Commission about the benefits of specialist courts for family violence matters involving Aboriginal people. Some Aboriginal organisations submitted that community-based courts with enhanced cultural awareness and responsiveness to the nuances of Aboriginal family violence may be more effective at keeping victims safe.³²² For instance, orders endorsed by respected Elders may encourage perpetrators to take them more seriously and provide victims with the confidence to take orders out when necessary.³²³ Some suggested the creation of specialist Aboriginal family violence courts (based on the Koori Courts model) with jurisdiction to deal with both civil and criminal family violence matters.³²⁴ Alternatively, it was suggested to the Commission that the existing jurisdiction of the Koori Courts be extended to hear breaches of FVIOs.³²⁵

The Commission understands that in 2014 the Aboriginal Justice Forum requested that the Victorian Government investigate whether such breaches should be heard by the Magistrates' and County Koori Courts and whether sexual offences should be heard in the Children's Koori Court.³²⁶ Over 300 consultations were undertaken and after analysis, it was recommended to the Courts Koori Reference Group that the jurisdiction of the Magistrates' and County Koori Courts be expanded to include breaches of FVIOs, but that sexual offences not be included. A proposed model to extend the jurisdiction to breaches of orders has been developed which includes legislative reform, organisational operation of the Koori Courts, working with community agencies and forums, and strengthening the Koori community.³²⁷ The Commission understands the Aboriginal Justice Forum will consider this proposal in April 2016.³²⁸

The Koori Court

The Koori Court is a division of the Magistrates' Court. It sentences Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander defendants in all criminal matters other than those involving sexual offences or family violence. The aim of the Koori Court is to have more community involvement in sentencing, reduce recidivism and breaches of orders, and provide more culturally appropriate sentences.³²⁹ Defendants can choose whether to have their cases heard by the Koori Court.

The Koori Court was piloted in 2002 and now operates from Bairnsdale, Broadmeadows, Latrobe Valley, Mildura, Shepparton, Swan Hill and Warrnambool Magistrates' Courts. The Children's Koori Court was established in 2005 and the County Koori Court in 2008, based on the original Koori Court model.³³⁰ The Children's Koori Courts are located in Melbourne and Mildura, and the Koori County Court sits in the Melbourne County Court and in Gippsland at the Morwell Law Courts and Bairnsdale Law Courts.

Under the model, the court set up is less formal. The Magistrate sits at a large table with all other participants in the case, not at the bench. The defendant sits with his or her family at the table, not in the dock; and participants are encouraged to talk in 'plain' English rather than using technical legal language. Koori Elders or Respected Persons, the Koori Court Officer, Koori defendants and their families can contribute during the court hearing. This helps to reduce perceptions of cultural alienation and to ensure sentencing orders are appropriate to the cultural needs of Koori offenders. It also allows issues relating to their offending behaviour to be addressed.

The objectives of the Koori Court are to:

- ▷ increase Koori ownership of the administration of the law
- ▷ increase positive participation by Koori offenders
- ▷ increase the accountability of the Koori offenders, families, and community
- ▷ encourage defendants to appear in Court
- ▷ reduce the amount of breached court orders
- ▷ deter offenders from re-offending
- ▷ increase community awareness about community codes of conduct and standards of behaviour
- ▷ explore sentencing alternatives prior to imprisonment.³³¹

Family violence, homelessness and affordable housing

Family violence is a major cause of homelessness in Australia. Recent analysis by the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare of specialist homelessness service data over the three years to 30 June 2014 found that, across Australia, more than a third of all adults and children seeking assistance from homelessness services did so due to family violence.³³²

The Australian Institute of Health and Welfare found that, 'Indigenous domestic and family violence clients were more likely than non-Indigenous clients to be female (74 per cent) and live in a sole parent household (41 per cent)'. They were also more likely to be children than non-Indigenous clients, with 38 per cent being under the age of 15 (compared with 31 per cent for non-Indigenous clients).³³³

In 2013–14 approximately 10 per cent of female clients of specialist homelessness services in Victoria were Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander, although Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people make up less than one per cent of the Victorian population.³³⁴ Again, this is almost certainly an under-estimation, as Indigenous status may not always be recorded.

The Commission heard that there is also a shortage of affordable housing, with Victoria experiencing long public housing waiting lists and an inflated private rental market.³³⁵

I would like to state clearly that the housing shortage in Mildura is ridiculous ... we have had to resort to putting people in tents. MDAS currently pays $300-400 per week for a tent site in local campgrounds. This situation is untenable, and more must be done to secure appropriate housing, especially for people fleeing family violence.³³⁶

As well as being an important issue for women and children, lack of appropriate housing can result in perpetrators staying in the family home. This is discussed later in this section.

Accommodation for women and children

The evidence before the Commission was that housing unavailability and the prospect of homelessness acts as a 'dangerous deterrent' to leaving violent relationships.³³⁷ Women may be more vulnerable to entering into or staying in relationships in order to keep a roof over their heads. It can also drive women back to a relationship when crisis accommodation is unsuitable, not available, unsupported or denied.³³⁸

Aboriginal Housing Victoria reported that:

... there may be as many as 10 to 30 percent of approximately 300 applicants who are on our priority waiting list who have identified that family violence is a direct or indirect cause of their current unsafe or insecure housing. However, with over 1100 clients on our waiting list, and an annual turnover of approximately 150 tenancies, and with no transitional housing, it is not possible for AHV to accommodate all applicants at risk of harm from family violence. There is no doubt that there are many Aboriginal people who are exposed to violence that AHV cannot accommodate. These victims may be in refuges, sleeping on couches, sleeping rough or remaining in volatile circumstances where they are at risk of harm. If they are fortunate they will be able to find safe and secure housing from other transitional housing providers ...

The situation is no better where it is our tenants that are experiencing family violence. With little turnover in tenancies, many ultimately may have no choice but to abandon their quest for tenancy with us in order to find safety ... Based on reports from Housing Officers it is estimated that approximately ten percent of our tenancies at some point in time involve severe family violence and that there are many more tenancies where there is some indications of family violence ... AHV's Housing Officers observe that many victims of family violence are survivors. They themselves have previously been victims and/or are merely surviving the violence without being able to move ahead. Some flee the violence to refuges or to other family members. Many stay, endure and survive.³³⁹

The Commission heard that for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children, homelessness arising from family violence may be particularly devastating as it can also lead to dissociation from community, kin and a disconnection to country if a woman has to leave her local area. Despite this, 'culturally safe, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander specific crisis housing is very rare'.³⁴⁰

In Victoria there are 31 refuge sites made up of 54 individual properties.³⁴¹ Three of these refuges are specifically for Aboriginal women and their children.³⁴²

Aboriginal-specific women's refuges in Victoria

Elizabeth Morgan House Aboriginal Women's Service is located in metropolitan Melbourne. Central to its work is 'the provision of support and advocacy for the empowerment of Aboriginal women. Along with providing safe and secure accommodation, support and counselling services to Aboriginal women and children experiencing family violence, this organisation undertakes advocacy and advisory work to other service providers, organisations and government.'³⁴³

Using National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness funding two new crisis accommodation and support services were established in recent years.

Orana Gunyah in Morwell started delivering services in January 2014. Run by the Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, 'Gunyah is a best-practice model where women and children can stay and be connected into a range of services during their stay.'³⁴⁴

The Mildura facility, Meminar Ngangg Gimba, (meaning 'a group of women dwell here') was opened in September 2012 and forms part of a range of services delivered to Aboriginal families by Mallee District Aboriginal Services. It is a cluster style facility where women, children and sometimes other members of a woman's family, for example a mother or a sister, can be accommodated as a family unit. There is no limit to the length of time women and their children can stay at Meminar Ngangg Gimba. Services, such as health, housing and Centrelink, are provided on site and women and children are able to maintain relationships with external support organisations and caseworkers. The Commission visited Meminar as part of its community site visits.

Meminar Ngangg Gimba employs male staff. The Commission heard this was a deliberate choice; as Aunty Janine Wilson, family violence advocate at Mallee District Aboriginal Services explained:

When we first suggested this to DHS, they cringed. They said we couldn't do it, but we wanted to take this approach for important reasons. Firstly, we wanted to show women in crisis that there are men, both Indigenous and non-Indigenous, out there who don't condone violence in any way, shape or form. Secondly, we wanted them to be positive role models for children at Meminar Ngangg Gimba, because often the only male role model in the children's lives is the one hurting their mum. Having male staff builds trust and a sense of safety across the whole community. We have never regretted this decision.³⁴⁵

The Commission heard evidence in community consultations that the approach at Meminar Ngangg Gimba had been successful, but was unable to cope with demand:

One positive thing is Meminar. But it's overflowing at the moment. It takes women from all over Australia. Women are being turned away and sent to Mallee Housing now because Meminar is too full.³⁴⁶

Currently if there is no Aboriginal service available and mainstream refuges or other crisis accommodation options are full or otherwise inaccessible, Aboriginal women and their children will most likely be accommodated in hotels or caravans. These options may not be available for safety reasons, or due to discriminatory treatment. In a community consultation in Mildura it was noted that:

The use of hotels is a very vexed issue. Lots of motels and caravans won't accept Aboriginal clients. There's only one motel that does, and sometimes victims and perpetrators both get placed there.³⁴⁷

It was also submitted that homelessness associated with family violence has an additional layer of complexity because both can be catalysts for child protection intervention.³⁴⁸ Further, the Commission heard that 'through Taskforce 1000 we know that homelessness of mothers is preventing children returning home'.³⁴⁹ Finally, family violence was identified as a significant cause of Aboriginal women coming into contact with the criminal justice system, and lack of post-release accommodation and support for women who have experienced family violence was identified as a factor driving women back to violent relationships.³⁵⁰

Accommodation for perpetrators

There was consensus that there is a need to increase efforts to keep women safely at home. Some submissions also raised the issue of accommodation for the perpetrator, pointing out that if there is nowhere for the perpetrator to go this increases the pressure on the victim to let him remain in the home, which may compromise her safety.³⁵¹

Allowing the perpetrator to stay in the home also influences decisions about child protection. Commissioner Jackomos reported that '... 52 per cent of the children can't be returned home because the current perpetrator of family violence is still in the family home'.³⁵²

Ms Annette Vickery, Deputy Chief Executive Officer of the Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, stated in evidence:

I believe a victim of family violence should be able to stay in their home and be safe. If that were the case, and we agree that that's the program response that's required, then the perpetrator of family violence needs to live somewhere where they can maintain contact with their children in a safe and secure way but also where they can have supported accommodation so that they can continue with employment or education or whatever else they have going on in their life in order to continue to contribute to their family's wellbeing. That's a really complex program build, but that would be the sort of thing that would be required.³⁵³

On the ground however, services reported major barriers to securing accommodation for perpetrators:

I had a client who wanted to offend to go back inside so he would have accommodation. He had an IO [intervention order] so he couldn't go to one part of town.³⁵⁴

The Commission heard that around 11 per cent of clients of specialist homelessness services are Aboriginal men,³⁵⁵ but that many more are reliant on motels and rooming houses. These were described as inadequate for a number of reasons; for example, if the perpetrator is trying to maintain contact with children and a rooming house is a dangerous place, or if drugs and alcohol are present and this increases the risk of family violence.

Some other services will put men in motels. But we find that that's a little bit too risky for us because there's not really any supports around that, and he may well decide that he wants to go home, which would then breach the order which then causes a whole other heap of issues. So we actually have people who volunteer their houses and will give us a room, a spare bedroom in their house, where people can go and stay ... We call it the adult foster care support system ... It would be lovely if it was funded. It's not. It is done on goodwill at the moment.³⁵⁶

One suggestion offered by the Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Ltd was that time out programs be given an accommodation component by converting transitional housing stock to crisis accommodation for use as a time out facility.³⁵⁷ It argued that this would provide Aboriginal 'men with meaningful time out whilst the family can be maintained and supported in their family home'.³⁵⁸

Lack of accommodation for men leaving prison was highlighted as another gap. A community consultation noted the importance of post-prison programs for men on release that synchronise with women's programs so that a whole of family approach is adopted:

Accommodation should be provided for the men after they get out of prison. The mother needs help too, help raising the kids. She calls up the bloke and asks him to come back and help.³⁵⁹

Accommodation options for those affected by drugs or alcohol

The limited availability of culturally appropriate residential rehabilitation for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people (both victims and perpetrators) who are affected by drugs or alcohol was identified as a 'big challenge in addressing family violence'.³⁶⁰ Ms Turfrey stated in evidence: 'we need more options around the state because of the lack of those [detox] facilities that puts a lot of pressure on the family violence space'.³⁶¹

The Commission heard evidence about some small scale examples of such facilities for women funded through phase three of the Aboriginal Justice Agreement. For example, Odyssey House Victoria was initially funded by the Department of Justice in a one-year pilot to provide diversion and alternative initiatives to imprisonment. The pilot provided four residential treatment beds targeted to Aboriginal women (and their children) who are referred from the Victorian justice system, with priority given to women who are at risk of incarceration. This includes women on remand, on community-based orders, completing the program prior to sentencing or as a transition option post-release from prison including on parole.³⁶² The Commission heard that:

There is already quite a good setup. Odyssey House is drug and alcohol rehabilitation, but they have a suite of about six units which looks a lot like Meminar, in that families can actually live together while they are receiving therapeutic intervention in the family situation. Then there's a community meeting room as well so that families can interact with each other. The joy I think of these particular setups is that children still get to play together. They still get to have something of a normal childhood, which is really where we are aiming our program and service delivery, or at least we would hope that we are.³⁶³

It was announced at the 40th Aboriginal Justice Forum that this program had been provided additional funding to continue and provide additional beds.³⁶⁴

The way forward

The Commission recognises that family violence has far reaching, multiple and multi-generational effects on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in Victoria. It contributes to and is caused by individual, familial and community trauma and contributes to homelessness and physical and mental illness. Aboriginal women and children are the primary victims of family violence.

None of this is new. Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in Victoria have been dealing with these issues for many years and the solutions have been articulated clearly and consistently through many inquiries and reports, most notably the report of the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force in 2003 and the subsequent 10 year plan. The Commission supports those findings and the recommendations and actions contained in those documents.

Given the depth of its analysis and scale of participation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in its development, the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force report and the principles contained in it continue to be enormously influential in driving policy and practice. It is therefore sobering to reflect on the evidence provided to this Royal Commission some 12 years later.

At the time the Task Force delivered its final report to the Victorian Government in 2003 it estimated that one in three Indigenous people were the victim, had a relative who was the victim or witnessed an act of violence on a daily basis.³⁶⁵ Today the numbers remain just as shocking, with Aboriginal Victorians nearly eight times more likely to be involved in a police family violence incident than non-Aboriginal Victorians.³⁶⁶

Further, while it is clear that progress has been made, particularly in relation to increasing awareness and reducing stigma in relation to family violence, the foundational issues identified by the Task Force remain. In particular the need for greater provision of culturally safe and comprehensive options for women, more responsive and respectful police and justice system practice, provision of healing-based options for perpetrators and an end to the trajectory of Aboriginal children and young people into out-of-home care.

Below we describe actions the Commission considers are necessary to make progress on these fundamental issues. In doing so we recognise that many of these are contained in the 10 year plan.

Our intention is not to repeat that work but to bring some of the key issues into sharper focus for government and for the non-Aboriginal community in Victoria.

The Commission also notes the findings of the mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan and considers that the recommendations of that evaluation should be implemented.

We recognise that in attempting to address family violence within Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, it is crucial to understand family violence as emerging within the context of deep intergenerational trauma as a result of colonisation, dispossession and the destructive impact of policies and practices such as the forced removal of children. There is no doubt that for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, culture is the foundation upon which everything else is built and that strong cultural identity and connection is key to better outcomes. We have made our recommendations based on this understanding, informed by the following conclusions:

- ▷ Family violence has a disproportionate impact upon Aboriginal communities, in particular Aboriginal women and children.
- ▷ Family violence is driving the over-representation of Aboriginal children in child protection.
- ▷ Prevention and early intervention initiatives need sustained resourcing.
- ▷ Under-investment is jeopardising safety when women and children return to the perpetrator because of lack of suitable crisis and long term accommodation.
- ▷ Cultural safety is the foundation for an effective response.
- ▷ While progress has been made the justice response needs concerted effort.
- ▷ Lack of data and culturally appropriate evaluation is hampering effort.

Recommendation 144

The Victorian Government implement the recommendations of the mid-term evaluation of the Indigenous Family Violence Ten Year Plan [within two years].

Removal of children due to family violence

There is compelling evidence that family violence is one of the predominant drivers of over-representation of Aboriginal children in the Victorian child protection system. This causes harm and also leaves Aboriginal women with a 'paralysing fear' of reporting family violence out of concern that their children will be removed.³⁶⁷

This was the strongest theme from Aboriginal people participating in this Commission. Of particular note was the evidence provided by Commissioner Jackomos arising from the Taskforce 1000 inquiry. This found that eight out of 10 Aboriginal children whose cases had been reviewed had experienced family violence.³⁶⁸

The rate of Aboriginal child removal in Victoria is now higher than at any time since white settlement.³⁶⁹ This is unacceptable. It is also preventable.

It is clear that there are greater opportunities for both government and community to work with young families and families in general, 'to build their capacity to be good parents prior to even considering removal'.³⁷⁰ The emphasis must be on stopping the trajectory into child protection. This is the case across the community but particularly for Aboriginal communities given the devastating legacy of the Stolen Generations policies and the impact on Aboriginal children of being disconnected from family and culture.

Connection to culture is critical for Aboriginal children's emotional, physical and spiritual wellbeing. We share the concerns expressed by many who contributed to this Royal Commission that 'unless children and young people are able to heal from their own experiences of trauma, many will go on to recreate these conditions and the cycle of intergenerational trauma will continue'.³⁷¹

The Commission accepts the evidence that where there are strong Aboriginal families with strong networks and a strong cultural base, children thrive.³⁷² This provides lessons for how to address the over-representation of Aboriginal children living with family violence.

The Commission also found that while overall rates of entry into Child Protection have been increasing year by year, there are regional variations in those patterns. In some areas there has been a reduction in the prevalence rate. We consider that an important step forward is to review actions taken in those local areas to contribute to our knowledge of what helps to reduce the number of children taken into care.³⁷³

Investing in children and families

The future picture of family violence in Victorian Aboriginal communities is dependent on urgent action being taken now to ensure that Aboriginal children and young people grow up in strong families and communities free from violence. Accordingly we consider that a significant focus is required, particularly in the child's early years, to reduce the risk of family violence and turn the current trajectory into Child Protection around. This is a sound investment, with good examples of family programs already operating that could be expanded and adapted to local communities.

Examples include the Bumps to Babes and Beyond program and the Aboriginal Cradle to Kinder program, both of which work with young Aboriginal mothers and provide long term support across the child's early years.³⁷⁴ Currently these types of programs that do have an intensive focus are only available in some areas. These types of programs should be scaled up and adapted to other local areas. Similarly, expanding Aboriginal-specific Child FIRST components to more locations would reflect needs in these communities and also enhance the cultural responsiveness of Child FIRST.³⁷⁵

The intensive, early years approach being taken by Mallee District Aboriginal Services through its one-stop shop model is also worthy of expansion based on local needs and preferences.

We also note the evidence of the Commissioner Jackomos that:

Given the prevalence and consequences of family violence in Aboriginal communities spending on Aboriginal family violence is minimal. There is value in locally led initiatives however a gap still remains in investment in whole of state strategic responses to what has become an entrenched issue. There needs to be a targeted response to children as victims of family violence, not just bystanders or witnesses.³⁷⁶

We consider there is value in the Commissioner's proposal that the Victorian Government, working in partnership with Aboriginal communities, develop, implement and resource a statewide strategic response addressing the impact of family violence on Aboriginal children to complement and support the 10 year plan.³⁷⁷ We consider the establishment of the Aboriginal Child Forum as an important first step in that process and warmly welcome its establishment.³⁷⁸

Meeting obligations to children and young people in out-of-home care

The Commission reflected on the scale and impact of family violence and child removal practices and the trauma this is causing communities. In doing so we recognise that Aboriginal children entering out-of-home care as a result of family violence can suffer trauma as a result of cultural loss.

We are therefore disturbed to hear evidence that the current statutory obligation to prepare a cultural plan for Aboriginal children under a guardianship to Secretary order or long-term guardianship to Secretary order is routinely not met.³⁷⁹ In addition to this being potentially unlawful under the Children, Youth and Families Act, failing to prepare a cultural plan as required might also be unlawful under the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) if such failure were found to constitute the denial of Aboriginal persons' distinct cultural rights to enjoy their identity and culture and maintain their kinship ties.³⁸⁰ The Commission expects that the new amendments, which will require all Aboriginal children in out-of-home care to have a cultural plan, will prompt greater compliance with, and commitment to, this important statutory requirement.

We encourage the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to take urgent action to remedy this shortfall, noting the commitment made by the Victorian Government at the Aboriginal Children's Summit in August 2015 to ensure compliance with the Children, Youth and Families Act as it relates to Aboriginal children and young people and to make recommendations to strengthen the Act.³⁸¹

Recommendation 145

The Victorian Government [within two years]:

- ▷ continue to work in partnership with Aboriginal communities to develop a statewide strategic response to improving the lives of vulnerable Aboriginal children and young people
- ▷ increase investment in programs that provide 'wrap-around' support to parents and children, especially in the first five years of life, so that the trajectory into child protection for these vulnerable families is interrupted and reversed
- ▷ expand the Aboriginal component of Child FIRST to reduce the high rates of removal of Aboriginal children and provide consistency across Victoria
- ▷ examine factors that influenced the decline in admissions into out-of-home care in Outer Gippsland, Mallee, Goulburn and North Eastern Melbourne so that lessons can be learnt and applied to future policy and practice.

Sustained and increased investment

Long standing under-investment, combined with increasing demand for services due to population growth and increased levels of reporting, means that Aboriginal organisations and communities are struggling to deliver their own solutions.

Currently the capacity of Aboriginal communities and organisations to take preventative action and to respond to need is hampered because of a lack of sustained resourcing for actions that have been shown to work. Positive initiatives that work in one area are not available in other places. This relates to the nature and uncertainty of funding which the Commission considers to be problematic in the whole area of family violence. Such uncertainty undermines the potential that can be gained by working in a sustained way on what are very complex issues. It is also inefficient, contributes to loss of staff and expertise, and increases the risk that clients will disengage with the services and supports that can assist because of lack of certainty.

In examining government funding data it is apparent that there is a pattern of relatively small allocations of funding spread widely across a number of organisations. This occurs both in short-term and ongoing funding streams.³⁸² This may reflect responsiveness on a geographic basis, the emergence of particular projects over time, a high degree of fragmentation or potentially all three.

Currently however, under-investment is jeopardising safety. There is a significant resource gap between demand for, and supply of, key family violence services, particularly at a time of crisis. Overall a far greater investment is required for culturally appropriate responses to family violence as foreshadowed in the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force report and the 10 year plan.

The Commission is concerned that the current shortage of services is leading to poor outcomes including entrenched homelessness, with victims and perpetrators returning to the family home when it is not safe to do so. We found through our site visits and observations that where examples of best practice in accommodation and support exist, such as cluster-style refuge accommodation for women and children escaping violence, these are small scale and heavily over-subscribed. We also found increasing demand for men to access culturally appropriate, long term healing support.

Disturbingly, legal services for victims are not funded to provide assistance in areas where there are large Aboriginal communities, and are stretched across metropolitan Melbourne with few resources and significant gaps in areas of high need, such as the Latrobe Valley. Unsurprisingly this leaves victims without advice which in turn may jeopardise their safety. Clearly we are failing these women and children.

Similarly, without timely and effective legal advice perpetrators may not fully understand the nature of orders, be fully engaged with the court process or take action to stop their use of violence, including through time out and healing programs.

Given the disproportionate effect of family violence upon Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women it is vital that investment decisions and the models of services available reflect their needs. Specialist services for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women must be provided as well as one-stop-shop models that work with the whole family.

As the rate of family violence reporting in Aboriginal communities increases it can only be expected that this resource gap is likely to grow. We make recommendations regarding immediate priorities below, based on our findings.

In doing so it should be noted that we have recommended that all funding decisions in the medium-term regarding family violence should be determined through accurate demand forecasting so as to ensure a better fit between need and delivery. We have recommended that this demand forecasting be completed within two years. This is discussed in Chapter 41.

Consistent with the recommendations of the mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan we also recommend that major elements of the response to Aboriginal family violence (healing and time out services) should be evaluated so that learnings can inform future investment.³⁸³

Recommendation 146

The Victorian Government give priority to providing adequate funding to Aboriginal community controlled organisations [within 12 months] for:

- ▷ culturally appropriate family violence services for Aboriginal women and children
- ▷ family centred services and programs—including programs that focus on cultural strengthening—therapeutic child-centred programs, and one-door integrated services where family members can obtain a range of supports
- ▷ culturally appropriate legal services for victims and perpetrators, to meet the increased demand for services and the need for statewide coverage
- ▷ crisis accommodation and support options for Aboriginal women and children based on core and cluster-style and best practice models with access to longer term housing
- ▷ culturally appropriate services for Aboriginal men who perpetrate family violence—including access to suitable accommodation
- ▷ early intervention and prevention actions in Aboriginal communities—including whole-of-community activities and targeted programs.

Recommendation 147

The Victorian Government, on the basis of the advice of the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum, give priority to major service models for evaluation using culturally appropriate outcome measures, methodologies and providers [within three years]. The Victorian Government should also ensure that all Aboriginal family violence interventions are evaluated in a culturally appropriate manner and that this is adequately resourced to ensure that Aboriginal service providers have the capacity to support such an evaluation [within 12 months].

Prevention and early intervention

The Commission is concerned that many positive prevention initiatives are not funded to scale, or are reliant on one-off or short-term funding. This diverts organisational effort into chasing what are relatively small amounts of funding compared to the costs of family violence to government overall. It also dilutes trust in the stated commitment the Victorian Government has made to working with Aboriginal communities to end family violence.

Various examples were provided in evidence. The most frequently mentioned were Sisters Day Out, Dilly Bag and Dilly Bag the Journey. The Commission observed a Dilly Bag session while conducting this inquiry and witnessed first-hand the value of this program. We note previous evaluations that have found positive results. It is of great concern that programs that clearly support women are left to such uncertainty.

The Commission is of the view that these sorts of programs show the way that family violence early intervention can be creative, non-judgemental and effective. These are the ways of working that we need to see more of, not less.

As a priority the Victorian Government should ensure that early intervention and prevention programs that have the confidence of the community and have been positively evaluated receive ongoing funding so that this work can be undertaken with certainty and scaled up to the level required.

We also note that while the Community Investment Fund currently provides funding of $59,000 per year to each Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Group (IFVRAG) and these groups have been creative in using those funds for whole-of-community prevention activities, feedback from the IFVRAGs and in the mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan indicates that this model has some flaws. The most significant is the requirement that these funds be used for a new activity each year. The mid-term evaluation recommended that the Community Investment Fund guidelines should be reviewed to ensure alignment with the priorities of the 10 year plan; that the Community Investment Fund funding allocation be increased and that an additional stream of ongoing funding be established to support longer term investment in Aboriginal family violence responses including the continuation of projects that have been tested through the Community Investment Fund grant funding process. The Commission supports these recommendations.³⁸⁴

The Commission also notes that it is important that we, as a community, do not forget the children who have already been removed from their parents and placed in out-of-home care. We have a collective responsibility to ensure that their out-of-home care experience does not cause them further harm, including cultural harm, or contribute to their possible trajectory into the youth justice or adult justice systems as perpetrators of family violence. Out-of-home care also provides an important intervention opportunity to address the trauma that those children may have previously experienced. The Commission supports the work of Taskforce 1000 and the efforts of the Commissioner for Aboriginal Children and Young People in addressing the inadequacies of the current out-of-home care system. The broader need for improved services addressing the trauma of children who have experienced family violence is considered in Chapter 10.

Cultural safety

The Commission supports the directions contained in the 10 year plan and agrees that efforts to prevent and respond to family violence in Aboriginal communities are best led by Aboriginal people. We consider that Aboriginal leadership in program planning, design and implementation is a critical factor for success.

The Commission also considers that current governance structures through the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum and Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups should continue and be strengthened in line with the recommendations contained in the mid-term evaluation of the 10 year plan.

The Commission finds that there are distinct barriers to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander community members reporting family violence. These include actual and perceived discrimination by service providers; language and cultural barriers; lack of trust in services and organisations; and low levels of engagement by mainstream agencies with local communities leading to lack of awareness of services by Aboriginal people. Day-to-day racism, experienced across all areas of life, contributes to mistrust in mainstream organisations.

It is clear the majority of Aboriginal people prefer to use an Aboriginal organisation as these are more likely to provide a culturally safe service. Providing Aboriginal services for the Aboriginal community is what works.³⁶⁵ Accordingly, Aboriginal community controlled organisations should have primacy in response and prevention. As stated above, to respond to the scale of need, more investment will be required.

Some Aboriginal people may prefer not to use an Aboriginal organisation. The Commission believes that the minimum standard across the entire family violence system should be that culturally appropriate services are easy to access and people have a choice of provider. This means that mainstream services must ensure that all Aboriginal clients are provided with the option of having an Aboriginal service provider and facilitating referrals accordingly, and if not, that they deliver a culturally safe service to the person themselves.

Cultural safety means that Aboriginal clients, employees and stakeholders are treated with dignity and respect and that their culture is valued and understood by mainstream organisations. It not only includes cultural safety for service users, but also for Aboriginal employees and in relationships with Aboriginal organisations. This is not always the case at present.

Creating a responsive service requires upholding and securing the cultural rights of Aboriginal people, protected through the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities, in a practical way. This requires systematically prioritising cultural values in policy, processes and the way programs are delivered as well as how staff interact with Aboriginal clients. Changing this requires a concerted commitment by each organisation in the areas of governance, policy, workforce, service delivery, practice and relationships with community.

To do this well, the Commission found that strong relationships need to be forged with Aboriginal providers, and time, effort and resources need to be dedicated to these relationships. We found that Aboriginal community controlled organisations are already doing this work on top of their funded role through secondary consultation and other support. The Commission considers that this work needs to be recognised by government and resourced effectively. This is a sound investment towards building a culturally appropriate mainstream service response that is not reliant on individual relationships to guide mainstream practitioners, but has this function built in.

Recommendation 148

The Victorian Government ensure that funding agreements for mainstream family violence organisations incorporate a requirement for services to undertake cultural safety reviews and action plans in all areas of operations, governance, workforce and relationships with community. Investment in Aboriginal service providers will be necessary to support this [within 12 months].

Effect of the Commission's other recommendations for mainstream family violence response

In Chapter 13 we recommend establishing 'Support and Safety Hubs' in the 17 local Department of Health and Human Services areas by 1 July 2018. These will be a new, area-based, entry point into family violence services and Integrated Family Services, consolidating the current L17 police referral points for victims, perpetrators and the Child FIRST intake points.

To be established by 1 July 2018, these hubs will provide:

- ▷ a single intake for specialist family violence services (for women and children and also perpetrator interventions) and Integrated Family Services. Intake includes triage, risk assessment and needs assessment
- ▷ case coordination for the women, children and perpetrator until each is placed into appropriate services (including booking and warm referral).

Each will have resources to access secondary consultation from Aboriginal community controlled organisations.

The Commission is mindful that Koori Family Violence Police Protocols need to be considered and honoured. Accordingly Support and Safety Hubs will need to make arrangements with local Aboriginal organisations to ensure where a person wishes to receive a service from an Aboriginal community controlled organisation, this occurs quickly and safely. Where a person does not, culturally safe services must be offered by the hub. This will require all Support and Safety Hubs to have in place:

- ▷ agreements with relevant local Aboriginal organisations to facilitate their involvement in intake and assessment, either as part of the centre intake team/joint triage or through consultation and warm referral
- ▷ secondary consultation arrangements with relevant Aboriginal organisations. We have recommended that this be built into the funding model in recognition that such work by Aboriginal organisations should be recognised and resourced
- ▷ the capacity to deliver a culturally safe service if the person does not wish to engage with an Aboriginal-specific agency.

In other parts of this report, the Commission also makes recommendations to improve the accessibility of specialist family violence services (for women and children and also perpetrator interventions) and other agencies, and to support organisations with the workforce learning and development required to achieve inclusion. Central to this is the provision of culturally safe services to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people who wish to use mainstream services.

Police and courts response

The Commission heard some disturbing evidence of poor attitudes and treatment by individual police. Such practices are contrary to the Victoria Police Code of Conduct on the Investigation of Family Violence, contradict the leadership shown elsewhere in the organisation and may amount to unlawful discrimination. They have no place in modern policing.

Where Koori Family Violence Police Protocols have been implemented these are beginning to make a difference to police practice.³⁸⁶ The Commission is persuaded by the findings of a recent evaluation that these protocols are worthy of further support, and consideration should be given to enacting protocols in all police areas. In the meantime, we encourage the roll out of protocols in the remaining identified sites. In doing so, the recommendations of the evaluation to share the learnings from the pilots across the state and to effectively resource cultural awareness and ongoing development for police members should be implemented. It is unreasonable to expect local Elders and community members to provide this cultural education without adequate resources to meet the needs of Victoria Police in a sustainable way.

We also consider that the Koori Family Violence and Victims Support Program has the potential to make a 'significant contribution toward the long term goal of improved Koori community confidence in the courts and justice system'.³⁸⁷ Based on the pilot evaluation of the program and recognising the specific barriers that Aboriginal people face engaging with the magistrates' courts, the Commission is of the view that this program should be resumed at the Melbourne Magistrates' Court. In order for this to occur funding issues need to be resolved.

As discussed in Chapter 16 applicant support workers and respondent support workers are now being rolled out to all headquarter magistrates' courts. We do not consider however, that this results in duplication for the following reasons. First, Melbourne Magistrates' Court is a high volume court. Having a specialist resource reflects this volume as well as the complexities of the issues to which workers need to respond. Secondly, a key finding of the pilot evaluation was that the Koori support workers did much more than work directly with clients. Crucially they built cultural awareness and confidence across the court, particularly with registry staff. This is of great value. Finally, Aboriginal people need a choice between an Aboriginal-specific and mainstream provider. This element of choice is as important in our courts as anywhere else in the family violence system.

In regard to the proposal to extend the jurisdiction of the Koori Court to hear breaches of FVIO matters, we note that this has recently been investigated by government, and that this review included a consultation process with over 300 people. We understand that a recommendation to extend the Koori Court's jurisdiction will soon be considered by the Aboriginal Justice Forum. Subject to that forum approving the proposal and to any safeguards the Aboriginal Justice Forum considers necessary to protect the safety and wellbeing of Aboriginal women and children who are victims of family violence, the Commission supports this proposal.

Recommendation 149

The Melbourne Magistrates' Court resume the Koori Family Violence and Victims Support Program [within 12 months].

Recommendation 150

The Victorian Government, subject to the approval of the Aboriginal Justice Forum and inclusion of any necessary safeguards, extend the jurisdiction of the Koori Magistrates and County Courts to include offences where it is alleged that the defendant has contravened a family violence intervention order [within 12 months].

Recommendation 151

The Victorian Government ensure that Koori Family Violence Police Protocols are implemented in the remaining identified sites, with adequate resources and support provided to Elders and other community members providing cultural education to police in all sites (including those where protocols currently operate) [within two years].

Better data collection

The Commission is concerned that there has been limited investment in evaluations of major elements of our current response to family violence in Aboriginal communities. For example healing services and time out services have not been evaluated although they form an important part of the community response.³⁸⁸ In other cases programs have been evaluated with positive results but have not attracted ongoing investment.

Limited research and data on interventions—successful or otherwise—impedes effective and meaningful work. Evaluation of key programs and approaches needs to be undertaken as a priority to inform future investment decisions.

Research and evaluation comes at a cost and agencies, particularly small organisations, need to be resourced for this to occur. This should be built into funding for programs.

The Commission is of the firm view that evaluation methodologies need to be designed in true partnership with Aboriginal communities at all stages—including setting terms of reference, designing the evaluation framework and reviewing findings.

The Commission also finds that collection of data on Indigenous status is lacking in key areas, particularly in relation to police L17 reports. This is of significant concern as it has a direct flow-on effect to service provision: if a police member does not ask the question then this important information will not be included in the formal referral to a specialist family violence service, or to Child FIRST and/or Child Protection when children are present. This means that existing mechanisms to notify Aboriginal community organisations cannot be deployed, for example in locations where Koori Family Violence Police Protocols operate, or where joint triage of Child FIRST/Child Protection L17s is undertaken in partnership with the Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, which currently occurs in the northern metropolitan region.

Measurement of outcomes for Aboriginal peoples in relation to family violence interventions and related human services also appears to be lacking. This information gap is working against effective service planning and weakens the capacity of local communities to develop solutions. The Commission is concerned that this chokes innovation and undermines shared effort between government and communities.³⁸⁹

Issues relating to data collection, including measures to improve the recording of Indigenous status across departments and agencies are discussed further in Chapter 39. We make a number of recommendations to improve statewide family violence data collection and research, including performance indicators on the collection of demographic information, in particular Indigenous status, for use across Victorian Government agencies. We also note the importance of national surveys including the ABS Personal Safety Survey and encourage the inclusion of demographic information and data capture in that instrument to support prevention and response policy and planning.

We also recommend that the proposed Victorian Government Family Violence Index includes measures that reflect family violence in different communities, including measures around Aboriginal experience of family violence.

In addition to those recommendations, we reiterate here that Victoria Police, the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Justice and Regulation, the Department of Education and Training and others should improve the collection of Indigenous specific data relating to family violence, including its impact on Child Protection, so that this can be shared with communities, organisations and governance forums to inform local, regional and statewide responses.

Recommendation 152

Victoria Police, the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Justice and Regulation and the Department of Education and Training improve the collection of Indigenous-specific data relating to family violence so that this can be shared with communities, organisations and governance forums to inform local, regional and state-wide responses [within 12 months].

Endnotes

- 1 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, 'Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families: Towards a Safer Future for Indigenous Families and Communities—10 Year Plan' (Department of Planning and Community Development, October 2008).
- 2 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, 'Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force: Final Report' (Department for Victorian Communities, December 2003).
- 3 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Census of Population and Housing – Counts of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians, 2011' (Catalogue No 2075.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, June 2012).
- 4 Department of Planning and Community Development, 'Victorian Aboriginal Affairs Framework 2013–2018—Building for the Future: A Plan for "Closing the Gap" in Victoria by 2031' (2012) 8, citing Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 3.
- 5 Ibid.
- 6 The proportion of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Victorians living in the rest of the state is 51.8 per cent, and those with no usual address is 0.7 per cent (out of the total Aboriginal population of 37,990 persons). The proportion of non-Aboriginal Victorians living in Greater Melbourne is 74.8 per cent, in the rest of the state is 25.1 per cent, and those with no usual address is 0.1 per cent (out of total non-Aboriginal population of 5,069,155). This excludes 246,895 people whose Indigenous status was not stated. Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 3.
- 7 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, above n 1, 11.
- 8 Department of Human Services, What is Family Violence? (13 January 2015) <<http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/for-individuals/children,-families-and-young-people/family-violence/what-is-family-violence>>.
- 9 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 8, 10.
- 10 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 123.
- 11 Janet Phillips and Penny Vandebroek, 'Domestic, Family and Sexual Violence in Australia: An Overview of the Issues' (Research Paper Series 2014–15, Parliament of Australia, Department of Parliamentary Services, 14 October 2014) 9.
- 12 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 14 May 2015.
- 13 Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 7. In relation to Aboriginal girls, see Department of Health and Human Services 'Addressing Violence against Women and Their Children: Action Plan Consultation Framework—Status Update—Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum' (May 2012), 4, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 14 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 6.
- 15 See, eg, Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 24; Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 9; Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 5; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 3; Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 4.
- 16 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 6.
- 17 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 3.
- 18 Department of Planning and Community Development, above n 4, 7.
- 19 Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 20.
- 20 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 22.
- 21 Transcript of Jackomos, 14 July 2015, 169 [19]–[24].
- 22 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Aboriginal Justice Forum Agenda Paper: How Does the Justice System Respond to Aboriginal Family Violence?' (23–24 April 2015), 3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 23 Ibid.
- 24 Ibid 5.
- 25 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Mid-term evaluation of the Indigenous Family Violence 10 Year Plan' (September 2015), iii, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 26 Ibid 32.
- 27 Even if all affected family members of 'unknown' Indigenous status were non-Aboriginal, an Aboriginal person was still four times more likely than a non-Aboriginal person to be reported as an affected family member in relation to a family incident in 2013–14: Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, 32.
- 28 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, 36.
- 29 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 15.
- 30 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, above n 1, 12; Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 147–192.
- 31 Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 12 [56].
- 32 Transcript of Braybrook, 20 July 2015, 743 [18]–[20].
- 33 Statement of Braybrook, 16 July 2015, 2 [10].
- 34 Department of Human Services, 'Working with Families where an Adult is Violent: Best Interests Case Practice Model' (2014) 7. See also Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 13.
- 35 Fadwa Al-Yaman, Mieke Van Doeland and Michelle Wallis, 'Family Violence Among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Peoples' (Cat No IHW 17, Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, November 2006) 71. Victorian Emergency Department Admissions data shows that the proportion of patients that presented with an injury deemed to be either 'Child neglect, maltreatment by parent, guardian' or 'Maltreatment, assault by domestic partner' that were recorded as Indigenous in each of the years from July 2010 to June 2014 remained stable at approximately five per cent: Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14' (January 2016), 82, 84, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 8 January 2016.
- 36 Melanie Heenan, 'International Violence Against Women Study: Findings from the Australian Component' (Australian Institute of Family Studies (Cth), Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, Newsletter No 6, April 2005) 2. This data may include sexual assault outside of family violence, however as noted in Chapter 12, familial sexual assault is recognised as family violence. The survey was conducted in 2002–03.
- 37 Kelly Richards, 'Children's Exposure to Domestic Violence in Australia' (Trends & Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice No 419, Australian Institute of Criminology, June 2011) 2, citing Michael Flood and Lara Fergus, 'An Assault on our Future: The Impact of Violence on Young People and Their Relationships' (White Ribbon Foundation, 2008).
- 38 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 8.
- 39 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 22.
- 40 Steering Committee for the Review of Government Service Provision, 'Report on Government Services 2016' (Productivity Commission (Cth), 2016) Table 15A.8, 2.
- 41 Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 4 [21].
- 42 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 10.
- 43 Indigenous women comprised 27 per cent of the offenders interviewed in the study: Holly Johnson, 'Drugs and Crime: A Study of Incarcerated Female Offenders' (Research and Public Policy Series No 63, Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth), 2004) xiv, 19.
- 44 New South Wales Aboriginal Justice Advisory Council, 'Holistic Community Justice: A Proposed Response to Aboriginal Family Violence' (2001) 7.

45 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 19.

46 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, above n 1, 10.

47 The Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force held its inaugural meeting in October 2001 and was formally launched by the Minister for Aboriginal Affairs and Minister for Community Services at a meeting held at Parliament House in May 2002: Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 23.

48 Ibid 23.

49 Ibid.

50 Ibid.

51 Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 6.

52 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, 6.

53 Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 7.

54 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, 4.

55 Ibid 2.

56 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, above n 1, 8–9.

57 Ibid 32.

58 See, eg, Department of Planning and Community Development, above n 4, 32.

59 See, eg, Koori Justice Unit, 'Victorian Aboriginal Justice Agreement Phase 3 (AJA3): A Partnership between the Victorian Government and the Koori Community' (2013), 9, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

60 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, iii.

61 Ibid iv.

62 Ibid iii.

63 Ibid iii.

64 Healing Services in Outer Gippsland, Loddon, North East Melbourne and Outer Eastern Melbourne. Time Out services in Outer Gippsland, Mallee, North East Melbourne and Goulburn areas. Men's Family Violence Group programs are also located in Inner Gippsland, Mallee and North East Melbourne. Department of Health and Human Services, 'DHHS Response in Relation to Part A: Items 2(a)(iii) and 2(a)(iii)', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 20 August 2015.

65 This involved 'the development of training materials to better equip professionals and practitioners to identify risk factors associated with family violence and respond appropriately to Aboriginal people experiencing family violence. The materials were piloted in Dandenong, Geelong and Mildura throughout 2013–14': Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 12, 19.

66 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, iii–iv.

67 Ibid iv.

68 Ibid v–viii.

69 Northern Metropolitan Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Group, Submission 934, 11.

70 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, 24.

71 Ibid 71.

72 Ibid 24.

73 Ibid 73.

74 Department of Human Services, 'Indigenous Family Violence Primary Prevention Framework' (June 2012). In June 2015 it was noted 'It is now timely that in 2015 a review and update is undertaken on the framework to test: whether the framework has met the original aims and objectives in supporting primary prevention; capacity building, effective and sustainable activities; and assess its usefulness in understanding primary prevention': Department of Premier and Cabinet, '24th Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: Projects Report' (June 2015), 1342, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

75 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 74, 11.

76 Statement of Gallagher, 10 August 2015, 7 [33].

77 See, eg, Transcript of Jackomos, 14 July 2015, 8 [38]; Statement of Turfrey, 16 July 2015, 16 [63]–[65].

78 Information about these programs is contained in Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 12, 35–36.

79 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Prevention and Education (2016) <<http://www.fvpls.org/Prevention-and-Education.php>>.

80 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 35.

81 Ibid.

82 Ibid 36.

83 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, above n 79.

84 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 36.

85 Ibid 12.

86 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, 'Evaluation Report of the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria's Early Intervention and Prevention Program' (July 2014) 24. Evaluations conducted for the (then) Department of Justice reported similar results: see Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 22, 15.

87 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Reducing Violence Against Women and their Children, Victorian Grants Program: Review of Progress and Interim Evaluation Reports' (2014), 14–15, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

88 Ibid 15.

89 Ibid.

90 Ibid.

91 Fiona Richardson, 'Victoria Against Violence Campaign Spreads Across the State' (Media Release, 1 December 2015).

92 The grant recipients were: Lakes Entrance Aboriginal Health Association—Strong Men, Strong Communities; Mallee District Aboriginal Services—Family and Community Violence Prevention Project; Rumbalara Aboriginal Corporative—Aboriginal Family Harmony Project; Victorian Aboriginal Health Service—Strong Relationships, Strong Community: Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 87, 3.

93 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 87, 13–14.

94 Ibid 14–15.

95 Ibid.

96 A review of documentation from the Victorian Government indicates that public awareness campaigns were developed in relation to sexual assault in other regions in partnerships between Victoria Police and Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups and Regional Aboriginal Justice Advisory Committees. These were completed in 2012. Victoria Police, 'TV Campaign to show no room for violence' (23 May 2012), produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015. See also Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Interim Implementation Plan Snapshot for the Indigenous Family Violence Strategy' (27 April 2012), 7, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

97 MDAS: Mallee District Aboriginal Services, Ending Family Violence (2013) <<http://www.mdas.org.au/familyviolence>>.

- 98 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 153, 176.
- 99 Ibid.
- 100 The Task Force recommended the establishment of Time Out Centres in communities 'to provide Indigenous males and others with a place to go to calm down so that they do not commit a violent act against another person': ibid.
- 101 'We appreciate the importance of a holistic healing approach to family violence in Indigenous communities based around family and Indigenous community strengthening, collaborative approaches, appropriate resources and flexible program and service delivery arrangements': Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, above n 1, 9, 45.
- 102 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, above n 1, 12; Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 81, 145.
- 103 See, eg, Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 27; Indigenous Men's Resource and Advisory Service, Submission 771, 11; Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 3-4; Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 3.
- 104 Transcript of Bamblett, 20 July 2015, 799 [6]-800 [1]; Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015; Statement of Kirby, 10 August 2015, 11 [47].
- 105 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 814 [17]-[19].
- 106 Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 3, 5-6. See also Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 11-12.
- 107 Statement of Byrne and Brown, 22 July 2015, 4 [19].
- 108 See, eg, Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 27; Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 6-7.
- 109 Indigenous Men's Resource and Advisory Service, Submission 771, 2.
- 110 Indigenous Men's Resource and Advisory Service, Submission 771, 11; Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 3.
- 111 Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 13.
- 112 Statement of Byrne and Brown, 22 July 2015, 4 [20].
- 113 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 11-12; Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 16.
- 114 See, eg, Statement of Byrne and Brown, 22 July 2015, 4 [20].
- 115 Indigenous Resource and Men's Advisory Service, Submission 771, 14. The Commission acknowledges that the Indigenous Men's Resource and Advisory Service and the Aboriginal Centre for Males are programs of the Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Ltd: Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Ltd, Aboriginal Centre for Males Referral Service (2014) <<http://www.vacsal.org.au/programs/aboriginal-centre-for-males-referral-service.aspx>>; Aboriginal Community Services Association Ltd, IMRAS (2014) <<http://www.vacsal.org.au/programs/indigenous-mens-resource-advisory-service.aspx>>.
- 116 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Royal Commission into Family Violence: Request for Information on Aboriginal Specific Program Funding' (18 August 2015), produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August and 20 October 2015). See also Boorndawan Willam Aboriginal Healing Service, Home (2013) <<http://www.bwahs.org.au/>>; Miajalku Healing Centre, <<https://www.facebook.com/pages/Minajalku-Healing-Centre/444824155547532>>; Gippsland Lakes Community Health, Yoowinna Wurnalong Healing Service (2014) <<http://glch.org.au/aboriginal-services/yoowinna-wurnalong-healing-service/>>. See also Aboriginal Fathers Group at Minajalku: Children's Protection Society, Submission 505, 7.
- 117 The Dardi Munwurro Strong Spirit program is also delivered on behalf of Corrections Victoria to those on community correction orders and in prison. In 2010 the Koori Justice Unit funded the implementation of three program sessions run across Victoria over a period of 12 months. Each consisted of an initial one-day community introduction and engagement session, a three day live-in workshop, four half-day post workshops and four half-day monthly follow up sessions. An independent evaluation using a Most Significant Change methodology was commissioned to review the use of this program by Corrections Victoria in 2012. This included interviews with program participants to capture their personal stories of change and drawing themes from this data. The evaluation though small in scale identified positive results. Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Dardi Munwurro Most Significant Change Report' (2012), 13, produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 118 A paper prepared for the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum in 2014 described the key successes of Healing and Time Out Services as including partnership development with a range of services including health, mainstream family violence services and police; individual support and group work contributing to better outcomes for individuals and families and community strengthening; contributing to the development of regional prevention of violence against women action plans. Key challenges identified were the need for education about Aboriginal family violence with the broader service system; capacity take referrals after hours and accreditation processes and the impact on smaller organisations. Department of Premier and Cabinet, '23rd Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: Time Out and Healing Services' (October 2014), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 119 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Cathy Humphreys et al)-01, Submission 840, Briefing Paper 2, 8-9.
- 120 Victoria Police, 'Evaluation of the Koori Family Violence Police Protocols: Ballarat, Darebin and Mildura' (Clear Horizon Consulting) (2015), 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 121 Ibid.
- 122 Ibid.
- 123 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 11.
- 124 They are also members of the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum, Aboriginal Justice Forum and other state forums. In addition they host the National Secretariat of the National Family Violence Prevention Legal Services Forum and have special consultative status to the United Nations Economic and Social Council: Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 11.
- 125 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, 'VALS Annual Report 2012-2013' (December 2013) 3, 6.
- 126 In 2012-13 of 11,616 clients, 10,992 related to criminal matters: ibid 10.
- 127 Ibid 3.
- 128 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 1.
- 129 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 12, 27.
- 130 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Evaluation of the Koori Family Violence Court Support Program Pilot: Final Report' (Clear Horizon Consulting) (18 June 2012), 18-24, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 131 Ibid 28.
- 132 Eastern Community Legal Centre, Submission 582, Attachment 1, 17.
- 133 Ibid.
- 134 Ibid 11.
- 135 Transcript of Bamblett, 20 July 2015, 781 [29]-782 [3].
- 136 See, eg, Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 10; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 18; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 3; Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 803 [8]-[14].
- 137 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 10.

- 138 Taskforce 1000 is a project between the Department of Health and Human Services and the Commission for Children and Young People. It commenced in 2014 and involves reviewing the current circumstances of the approximately 1000 Aboriginal children and young people in out-of-home care: Department of Human Services, Taskforce 1000 (14 September 2015) <<http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/about-the-department/plans,-programs-and-projects/projects-and-initiatives/children,-youth-and-family-services/taskforce-1000>>. A review of the Taskforce 1000 process found that it is 'successfully enabling immediate improvements for Aboriginal children and young people in care': Department of Health and Human Services, 'Review of Taskforce 1000 Process: Prepared for the Department of Health and Human Services' (KPMG) (26 February 2015), 5, produced by the State of Victoria in response to Commission's Notice to Produce 5 June 2015.
- 139 Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 5 [23]. Commissioner Jackomos subsequently advised the Commission this figure may be closer to 90 per cent.
- 140 Based on figures for the number of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders in care at 30 June 2013 and 30 June 2014: Productivity Commission (Cth), 'Report on Government Services 2015' (2015) Chapter 15: Child Protection Services, Table 15A.18.
- 141 Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 4 [21].
- 142 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Royal Commission into Family Violence SAMS data request (2009–2014)' (1 July 2015), Tab 31245, Tab 31246, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 143 Victorian Auditor-General's Office, 'Early Intervention Services for Vulnerable Children and Families' (May 2015) 8.
- 144 Victorian Aboriginal Community Controlled Organisations and Community Service Organisations, 'Koorie Kids—Growing Strong in Their Culture: Five Year Plan for Aboriginal Children in Out of Home Care—Joint Submission from Victorian Aboriginal Community Controlled Organisations and Community Service Organisations' (November 2013) 15.
- 145 Ibid.
- 146 Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 4 [22].
- 147 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Taskforce 1000: Inner Gippsland Area Report' (May 2015), 10, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 148 Transcript of Turfrey, 20 July 2015, 885 [10]–[19].
- 149 Transcript of Jackomos, 14 July 2015, 171 [31]–172 [13].
- 150 'So my suggestion is that the Victorian Government needs to work with the local community, Aboriginal community, they need to work with agencies, statewide agencies such as VALS and VACCA and Aboriginal family violence, and local communities to develop a strategy as a highest priority of this government to address women being sexually abused and children in record numbers. Sadly, that's not on this government's agenda at the moment': Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 804 [26]–805 [2]. See also Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 10 [47].
- 151 Andrew Jackomos, 'Open Letter in Response to 2015 Report on Government Services' (3 February 2015).
- 152 Victorian Aboriginal Children's Forum, 'Aboriginal Children's Summit: Communiqué' (August 2015) <<http://www.ccyp.vic.gov.au/downloads/aboriginal-childrens-forum-2015-communication.pdf>>. The Commission also notes that a number of programs have operated to support Aboriginal families in contact with the child protection system where removal may be imminent and/or to facilitate return home. Programs identified in documentation provided by the Victoria Government include Aboriginal Family Preservation and Restoration programs and Stronger Families services (including Aboriginal Stronger Families). See Department of Premier and Cabinet, '23rd Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum, Progress Updates against 10 Year Plan' (October 2014), 3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 153 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 17. See also Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 12.
- 154 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 803 [10]–[15].
- 155 Transcript of Braybrook, 20 July 2015, 801 [1]–[3]. See also Statement of Gallagher, 10 August 2015, 7 [35].
- 156 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 53.
- 157 Transcript of Braybrook, 20 July 2015, 783 [8]–[14].
- 158 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 54.
- 159 Ibid.
- 160 Victorian Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 7.
- 161 Ibid 53; Koorie Youth Council, Submission 906, 12; Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 18.
- 162 Children, Youth and Families Amendment (Permanent Care and Other Matters) Act 2014 (Vic) s 98.
- 163 Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 176(2).
- 164 Victorian Aboriginal Community Controlled Organisations and Community Service Organisations, above n 144, 3.
- 165 'An audit completed in August 2013 of 194 Aboriginal children in out-of-home care and subject to cultural support planning legislative requirements found that only 15 children (eight per cent) had a completed Cultural Support Plan. The data shows growing numbers of Aboriginal children in care, Aboriginal children staying in care longer and a failure to meet basic legislative and practice requirements. In blunt terms, the current approach to the protection of Aboriginal children in Victoria is failing': ibid.
- 166 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 10–11.
- 167 Transcript of Jackomos, 14 July 2015, 175 [14]–[20].
- 168 See Victorian Aboriginal Children's Forum, above n 152.
- 169 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 5.
- 170 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 13; Matthew Willis, 'Non-disclosure of Violence in Australian Indigenous Communities' (Trends & Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice No 405, Australian Institute of Criminology, January 2011) 1.
- 171 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 14.
- 172 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 142.
- 173 Transcript of Braybrook, 20 July 2015, 754 [20]–[24].
- 174 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 3.
- 175 Community consultation, Bairnsdale, 28 May 2015.
- 176 Ibid.
- 177 Ibid.
- 178 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 6.
- 179 'Many Indigenous women do not access mainstream domestic violence services because they do not feel comfortable with the organisation itself and don't feel that the staff understand their culture, values and needs': Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 25. See also Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 4–6; Victorian Auditor-General's Office, 'Accessibility of Mainstream Services for Aboriginal Victorians' (May 2014) 2.
- 180 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 5.
- 181 Department of Premier and Cabinet, '23rd Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: Social Housing Presentation' (October 2014), 18, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

182 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, 'Guideline for General Practices: Complying with the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 When Providing Services' (January 2014) 18, 22.

183 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 763 [26]-764 [3].

184 VicHealth, 'Mental Health Impacts of Racial Discrimination in Victorian Aboriginal Communities: Experiences of Racism Survey—A Summary' (November 2012) 5.

185 Ibid 1, 5.

186 Ibid 6.

187 State of Victoria, Submission 717, Attachment 2, 3.

188 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 116, 1.

189 'The definition of Aboriginal family violence and nature of Aboriginal services increases this difficulty as, by their very nature, Aboriginal services seek to respond to clients in a holistic manner and are hence multifaceted': ibid.

190 Victorian Government, '2015-16 Budget Paper No 3: Service Delivery' (Department of Treasury and Finance, 2015) 10.

191 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 116, 2.

192 State of Victoria, Submission 717, Attachment 2, 12.

193 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 28-32; Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 22-3; Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 14. See also Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 5; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 32-3.

194 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, iv.

195 A participant in a community consultation reported that '[t]here was a series of six TV ads on local TV in Mildura. They used local people in Mildura, Robinvale, got the attention of those communities because people knew someone on TV. They were run during primetime. They were about elder abuse, younger relationships, early indicators, cyber abuse. They were funded by the Koori Justice Unit as a community safety grant. Makes the community proud. Like anti-smoking ads. There should be more ads on TV for community, posters': Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 14 May 2015.

196 Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 756 [3]-[4], [12]-[19].

197 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 130, 28.

198 Transcript of Bamblett, 20 July 2015, 769 [26]-[31].

199 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 761 [25]-762 [1].

200 A total of $650,000 is available under the fund. Thirty-nine projects were funded across the state in 2013-14. Guidelines for the program are published by the Department of Health and Human Services in each annual funding round. Department of Premier and Cabinet, '22nd Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: Community Initiative Fund (CIF) 2014-15' (May 2014), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

201 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, iv.

202 'What the partnership forum has told us very clearly is that there are very good initiatives that are supported through the community initiative fund that if they want to be repeated have nowhere to go': Transcript of Singh, 20 July 2015, 864 [9]-[17].

203 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, iv.

204 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, vii.

205 Sarah Tayton et al, 'Groups and Communities at Risk of Domestic and Family Violence' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) 47.

206 Anna Olsen and Ray Lovett, 'Existing Knowledge, Practice and Responses to Violence Against Women in Australian Indigenous Communities' (Landscapes: State of Knowledge No 2, Australian National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, January 2016) 3.

207 Victorian Auditor-General, above n 179, x.

208 This criticism also applied in the case of funding for non-Aboriginal organisations.

209 National Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Alliance, Submission 912, 6.

210 The 'Aboriginal Family Violence: Consultant's Guideline' was developed 'in response to concerns raised by Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Group and Indigenous Family Violence Coordinators regarding the manner in which consultants are engaging with Aboriginal people around policy and programs relating to Aboriginal family violence': Victorian Government, 'Aboriginal Family Violence: Consultants' Guidelines' (May 2015) 2.

211 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 237.

212 See eg, National Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Alliance, Submission 912, 6; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 7; Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 5; Koorie Youth Council, Submission 906, 5-6; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 6; Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 29.

213 Transcript of Bamblett, 20 July 2015, 771 [19]-[23].

214 Ibid 771 [28]-[29].

215 Koori Women Mean Business, Submission 873, 3.

216 Transcript of Dowsley, 14 October 2015, 3582 [8]-[9].

217 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 35, 144.

218 Ibid.

219 Ibid.

220 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, vii.

221 Peta Cox, 'Violence Against Women in Australia: Additional Analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012' (Horizons: Research Paper No 01, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, October 2015) 2, 4.

222 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 5; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 24-5; Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 28; Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 4, 6; Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 12.

223 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 20.

224 For example between Indigenous and non-Indigenous organisations: Sam Morley, 'What Works in Effective Indigenous Community-Managed Programs and Organisations' (Paper No 32, Australian Institute of Family Studies, May 2015) 7.

225 Ibid 2.

226 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 20.

227 Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.

228 Statement of Gallagher, 10 August 2015, 4 [22].

229 See eg, Transcript of Bamblett, 20 July 2015, 827 [27]-828 [2]; Statement of Kirby, 10 August 2015, 2 [14].

230 Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 780 [12]-[15].

231 Statement of Braybrook, 16 July 2015, 4 [17]. See also Transcript of Braybrook, 20 July 2015, 833 [20]-[23].

232 Transcript of Braybrook, 20 July 2015, 833 [20]-[30].

233 Koori Women Mean Business, Submission 873, 4.

234 Community Consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.

235 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 23.

- 236 See also National Aboriginal Community Controlled Health Organisation, 'Creating the NACCHO Cultural Safety Training Standards and Assessment Process: A Background Paper' (May 2011) 10–12.
- 237 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, above n 1, 11.
- 238 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 6.
- 239 Transcript of Singh, 20 July 2015, 857 [23]–[28], 858 [12]–[18].
- 240 In 2015 the Department of Human Services developed an addendum to the DHHS Standards evidence guide that 'is culturally informed, includes practice advice and examples to support improved service delivery to Aboriginal people': Department of Premier and Cabinet, '24th Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: 10 Year Plan Departmental Progress Report' (June 2015), produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015, 10. A copy of the guide can be found at Department of Health and Human Services, Human Services Standards Evidence Guide and Resource Tool (4 March 2016) <<http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/about-the-department/documents-and-resources/policies,-guidelines-and-legislation/human-services-standards-evidence-guide-and-resource-tool>>.
- 241 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 5–6.
- 242 Ibid 6.
- 243 Community consultation, Melbourne, 19 May 2015.
- 244 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 26.
- 245 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 4.
- 246 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 240, 2. See also Statement of Allen, 13 July 2015, Attachment 24, 20–1. The progress report on the 10 Year Plan to the 24th Indigenous Partnership Forum also notes that 'Indigenous Men's Resource and Advisory Service provides consultation to other organisations to provide more culturally sensitive and responsive information, advice and support to Indigenous workers. This helps to ensure organisations are up to date and linked with culturally appropriate referral options for Aboriginal perpetrators': Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 240, 10.
- 247 Koori Women Mean Business, Submission 873, 4.
- 248 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 4.
- 249 Transcript of Bamblett, 20 July 2015, 781 [16]–[20].
- 250 Ibid 781 [16]–[20]; Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 5.
- 251 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 14 May 2015.
- 252 Transcript of Bamblett, 20 July 2015, 781 [16]–[20]; Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 3.
- 253 For example, in regards to early childhood services Aboriginal Best Start projects (in six sites) 'have been established to make sure that local Aboriginal communities and organisations are given every possible opportunity to influence outcomes for their children and families. These projects are designed to empower communities and families and develop broad cross-sectoral partnerships across all early years services to improve outcomes for Aboriginal children and their families': Department of Education and Training, Aboriginal Best Start (18 October 2015) <<http://www.education.vic.gov.au/about/programs/aboriginal/Pages/aboriginalbeststart.aspx>>.
- 254 'Being strong in culture builds the resilience, skills, participation and wellbeing of Aboriginal people, and is especially vital to young people, who make up a significant and growing part of the Aboriginal community': Department of Planning and Community Development, above n 4, 13.
- 255 Statement of Kirby, 10 August 2015, 3 [20].
- 256 Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 830 [1]–[5].
- 257 Statement of Gallagher, 10 August 2015, 6 [31]. Ms Gallagher also noted 'lost opportunities', citing Bubup Wilam (meaning 'the children's place') creche and kindergarten, funded by the Commonwealth, was able to provide child care but due to funding limitations was not able to provide 'family violence screening and intensive case management: at 7–8 [36]. The National Partnership Agreement on Indigenous Early Childhood Development funded two Victorian Aboriginal Child and Family Centres one in Bairnsdale (Dala Yooro) and one in Whittlesea (Bubup Wilam). The agreement expired on 30 June 2014: Council of Australian Governments, 'National Partnership Agreement between the Commonwealth of Australia and the State and Territory Governments regarding Indigenous Early Childhood Development'; IECD, 'Evaluation of the National Partnership Agreement on Indigenous Early Childhood Development: Final Report' (July 2014) 62, 64; Department of Health (Cth), National Partnership Agreement on Indigenous Early Childhood Development (19 December 2014) <http://www.health.gov.au/internet/main/publishing.nsf/Content/oatsih-nga_iecd>.
- 258 Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 779 [26]–780 [7].
- 259 Ibid 780 [7]–[11].
- 260 Transcript of Bamblett, 20 July 2015, 781 [2]–[9].
- 261 Ibid 830 [25]–831 [5].
- 262 See also Department of Health and Human Services, 'Victorian Cradle to Kinder and Aboriginal Cradle to Kinder: Practice Guide' (October 2013).
- 263 Statement of Allen, 13 July 2015, 34 [174]–[179].
- 264 Ibid 35 [182].
- 265 See Australian Institute of Family Studies (Cth), Cradle to Kinder Program Evaluation (2016) <<https://aifs.gov.au/projects/cradle-kinder-program-evaluation>>.
- 266 Koorie Youth Council, Submission 906, 3.
- 267 That is, 35.2 per cent: Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Census of Population and Housing—Counts of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians' (Catalogue No 2075.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2011).
- 268 VicHealth, 'Australians' Attitudes to Violence Against Women: Findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey' (September 2014) 90.
- 269 Statement of Gallagher, 10 August 2015, 7 [34].
- 270 Who is considered a 'young person' within Aboriginal communities may not always reflect the clear delineation between 'adolescents' and 'adults' accepted in mainstream western cultural frameworks: Koorie Youth Council, Submission 906, 4–5.
- 271 Koorie Youth Council, Submission 906, 7.
- 272 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 14 May 2015. See also Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 9–10.
- 273 TNS Australia, 'Reducing Violence Against Women and Their Children: Research Informing the Development of a National Campaign' (Commonwealth of Australia, Department of Social Services, November 2015) 16–17.
- 274 Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 9.
- 275 Ibid 9–10.
- 276 Ibid 10.
- 277 Olsen and Lovett, above n 206, 4.
- 278 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 14 May 2015. See also Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 7, 12–14.
- 279 Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.
- 280 Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 4.
- 281 Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 3.

282 Indigenous Men's Resource and Advisory Service, Submission 771, 14.

283 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 22.

284 Transcript of Braybrook, 20 July 2015, 744 [1]–[12].

285 Ibid 744 [19]–[22].

286 Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 12 [56].

287 Transcript of Jackomos, 14 July 2015, 172 [16]–[24].

288 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 7.

289 Ibid 6.

290 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 30–1, 44.

291 Ibid 14, 32. For more detail about the history of funding, see ibid 28–31.

292 Ibid 24.

293 Ibid 24.

294 Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 13. See also Victoria Police, above n 120, 1–2.

295 'The police don't always follow the Koori police protocol—code of conduct—they often speak to the respondent and ignore the applicant on the call out': Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.

296 A stakeholder meeting in Bairnsdale to progress the protocols was held in February 2015. Consultation in additional sites (City of Shepparton and Dandenong/City of Casey) also took place in March 2015. Department of Premier and Cabinet, '24th Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: Koori Family Violence Police Protocols' (June 2015), 1382, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

297 'The Koori Police protocol was launched in 2007 but is still not fully operational in 2015': Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.

298 Victoria Police, above n 120, 13–14, 18.

299 Ibid 9.

300 Ibid 2.

301 Ibid 8.

302 Ibid 2.

303 Transcript of Braybrook, 20 July 2015, 800 [26]–[29].

304 Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.

305 Flat Out Inc, Submission 980, 8.

306 Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.

307 Ibid.

308 Ibid.

309 Victoria Police, 'Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence—Edition 3' (2014) 43–8. See Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 52 setting out concerns.

310 Other examples included: 'Boorndawan Willam Indigenous Healing Service highlighted the successful trial Eastern Domestic Violence Service is undertaking with police around asking the question of Aboriginality. The EDVOS worker is re-asking the question if missing from the L17 report. This is resulting in an increase in referrals to the Healing Service ... St Kilda Crisis Service has an Aboriginal worker and women are given the option of either an Aboriginal or mainstream service referral. This ensures women are offered a choice and it is the responsibility of the L17 provider to facilitate the referral pathway': Department of Premier and Cabinet, '24th Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: Healing and Time Out Services' (June 2015), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

311 Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 13.

312 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 29; Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 8.

313 Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 798 [11]–[24].

314 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 150.

315 See ibid 150, Recommendation 14.

316 Ibid 151 citing Elizabeth Hoffman House Inc and Victorian Aboriginal Health Service Mother and Children's Unit, 'Consultation Report on Aboriginal Women & Children's Experiences of Family Violence within Victorian Aboriginal Communities' (29 June 2003).

317 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 823 [21]–[23], 823 [31]–824 [2].

318 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 41; Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 20. This program is distinct from the Court Integrated Services Program which currently operates at Latrobe Valley, Melbourne and Sunshine Magistrates' Courts: Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Court Integrated Services Program (CISP) (17 July 2013) <<https://www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au/jurisdictions/specialist-jurisdictions/court-support-services/court-integrated-services-program-cisp>>.

319 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 130, 18–24.

320 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 12.

321 Ibid 41.

322 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 805 [12]–[30]; Aboriginal Housing Victoria, Submission 587, 5.

323 Aboriginal Housing Victoria, Submission 587, 5.

324 Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 28.

325 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 805 [12]–[30]; Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 28.

326 Department of Premier and Cabinet, '23rd Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: Koori Courts Access and Issues' (October 2014), 2, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

327 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Jurisdiction Services: Minutes of Meeting—Courts Koori Reference Group' (10 December 2015), provided to the Commission by the Department of Justice and Regulation, 14 January 2016.

328 Ibid.

329 Department of Justice, 'Koori Court: Information for Legal Representatives' <https://www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au/sites/default/files/Default/kc_legal%2Bprac%2Bguide.pdf>.

330 County Court of Victoria, Court Services Victoria and Victorian Aboriginal Justice Agreement, 'Can My Matter Be Heard in the County Koori Court' <<http://www.countycourt.vic.gov.au/sites/default/files/forms/County%20Koori%20Court%20-%20Can%20my%20matter%20be%20heard%20%28February%202015%29.pdf>>.

331 Department of Justice, 'Koori Court: Information for Legal Representatives' <https://www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au/sites/default/files/Default/kc_legal%2Bprac%2Bguide.pdf>.

332 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare (Cth), Domestic and Family Violence and Homelessness 2011–12 to 2013–14 (2016) <<http://www.aihw.gov.au/homelessness/domestic-violence-and-homelessness>>. See also Australian Institute of Health and Welfare (Cth), 'Over one-third of specialist homelessness clients seek domestic and family violence support' (Media Release, 3 February 2016).

333 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare (Cth), The intersection of domestic violence and homelessness (2016) <<http://www.aihw.gov.au/homelessness/domestic-violence-and-homelessness/intersection/>>.

- 334 'The proportion of female clients who identified as Indigenous is almost the same as that of male clients, with 10 per cent (n=5940) of female clients and 11 per cent (n=1293) of male clients identifying as Indigenous': Crime Statistics Agency, above n 35, 105; Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'above n 25, 16.
- 335 Council to Homeless Persons et al, Submission 920, 1.
- 336 Statement of Kirby, 10 August 2015, 13 [53].
- 337 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 18.
- 338 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 11; ibid 18.
- 339 Aboriginal Housing Victoria, Submission 587, 3–4. In 2014–15 the number of households on the Aboriginal Housing Victoria waiting list was 1143. In the same year 136 allocations were made: Department of Health and Human Services, 'Aboriginal Housing Victoria information' (5 August 2016), 2–3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August 2015 and 20 October 2015).
- 340 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 18.
- 341 Statement of Rogers, 20 July 2015, 12 [78].
- 342 Ibid 25 [152].
- 343 Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 9.
- 344 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 27.
- 345 Statement of Wilson, 13 August 2015, 3 [15]. See also Transcript of Wilson, 13 August 2015, 2884 [4]–[11].
- 346 Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.
- 347 Ibid.
- 348 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 18.
- 349 Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 792 [12]–[13].
- 350 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, 'Unfinished Business: Koori Women and the Justice System' (August 2013) 23, cited in Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 11.
- 351 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 11.
- 352 Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 796 [25]–[27].
- 353 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 796 [9]–[20].
- 354 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 14 May 2015.
- 355 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 35, 101; Statement of Rogers, 20 July 2015, 27 [167].
- 356 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 791 [3]–[11], [19]–[23].
- 357 Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 6; Confidential, Submission 730, 13.
- 358 Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 6. See also Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 23.
- 359 Community consultation, Bairnsdale, 28 May 2015.
- 360 Transcript of Turfrey, 20 July 2015, 881 [13]–[14].
- 361 Ibid 881 [20]–[22].
- 362 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 10.
- 363 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 797 [17]–[28].
- 364 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 10.
- 365 Victorian Indigenous Family Violence Task Force, above n 2, 4.
- 366 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, 36.
- 367 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 803 [9]–[15].
- 368 Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 5 [23]. Commissioner Jackomos subsequently advised the Commission this figure may now be closer to nine out of ten of this group of children.
- 369 Commission for Children and Young People, 'Commission for Children and Young People: Annual Report 2013–2014' (September 2014) 37.
- 370 Transcript of Jackomos, 20 July 2015, 830 [1]–[5].
- 371 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 10.
- 372 Ibid 7.
- 373 Victorian Aboriginal Community Controlled Organisations and Community Service Organisations, above n 144; Koorie Youth Council, Submission 906, 17.
- 374 The Cradle to Kinder program is currently being evaluated with a report due in early 2016: Statement of Allen, 13 July 2015, 36 [80]–[81].
- 375 The target group for Integrated Family Services—Indigenous is 'vulnerable Aboriginal children and young people and their families who are: likely to experience greater challenges because the child or young person's development has been affected by the experience of risk factors and cumulative harm; at risk of concerns escalating and becoming involved with child protection if problems are not addressed. Integrated Family Services—Indigenous services may be provided by the local Aboriginal community controlled organisation or a mainstream funded community service organisation where an ACCO is not located in the catchment, or by agreement': Department of Health and Human Services, 'Integrated Family Services—Indigenous 31246' (July 2013), 2, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015. Documentation provided by the Victorian Government indicates that the proportion of new referrals to Child FIRST and family support services to Indigenous Integrated Family Services with an Aboriginal status in 2013–2014 was 7.1 per cent (an increase of 0.2 per cent): Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 240, 4.
- 376 Statement of Jackomos, 9 July 2015, 10 [47].
- 377 Commissioner Jackomos called for 'the development of a statewide strategic response to improving the lives of vulnerable Aboriginal babies, children and young people with child protection, youth justice and child homelessness as well as children's trauma and mental health at its core ... The strategic response should be an initiative agreed between the broad Aboriginal community and government, with governance arrangements on par with the Aboriginal Justice Agreement. The response at a minimum should include; principles, protocols, targets and measureable outcomes monitored through a partnership forum': Jackomos, above n 151.
- 378 Victorian Aboriginal Children's Forum, above n 152.
- 379 Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic) s 176.
- 380 Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) s 19(2).
- 381 Victorian Aboriginal Children's Forum, above n 152.
- 382 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 116.
- 383 The mid-term evaluation recommended that service fragmentation and consistency of access to culturally responsive programs should be addressed by expanding the following initiatives, informed by program evaluations: healing services (evaluation required); Time Out Services (evaluation required); Koori Family Violence Police Protocols (evaluation completed) and Koori Family Violence Court Support Model) evaluation completed): Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, vii.
- 384 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, vii.
- 385 Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 21.
- 386 Victoria Police, above n 120, 1–2.

³⁸⁷ Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 130, 6.

³⁸⁸ The Commission understand that an evaluation of healing and Time Out services was planned to align with the mid-term evaluation of the Indigenous Family Violence Strategy: see Department of Premier and Cabinet, '22nd Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: Healing and Time Out Services Update' (29 April 2014), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015. However, the evaluation states that these services have not been evaluated: Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 25, vii.

³⁸⁹ We make recommendations regarding improving data collection, data sharing, research and evaluation in Chapter 39 where we recommend that Victoria Police, Department of Health and Human Services, Department of Justice and Regulation, Department of Education and others should improve the collection of Indigenous specific data relating to family violence so that this can be shared with communities, organisations and governance forums to inform local, regional and statewide responses. We also recommend that the proposed Victorian Government Family Violence Index includes measures that reflect the lived experience of family violence in different communities, including Aboriginal communities.

27 Older people

Introduction

The Commission's terms of reference require it to consider the needs and experiences of people affected by family violence, having particular regard to, among others, older people.

In some ways, family violence experienced by older people is no different to that experienced by younger people. It can be of a physical, sexual, emotional or psychological nature and be committed by an intimate partner or other family member. Like many other forms of family violence, women are over-represented as victims and men as perpetrators.

However, family violence against older people also has some unique characteristics, which warrant particular attention and a tailored response. While women are over-represented as victims in prevalence data, the proportion of older men who experience family violence is higher than for younger men. Older people can also be at particular risk of economic or financial abuse. The perpetrator is often the victim's son or daughter.

In the first part of this chapter, we explore the nature and prevalence of family violence experienced by older people, and existing service responses. The second part of this chapter considers in greater detail some of the specific issues faced by older people who experience family violence. These include barriers to reporting family violence. Older people may be reluctant to take action that may be to the detriment of a close family member, they may not know where to go for help or they may conform to generational expectations that family violence is a private matter. For some older people, reliance on others for care can also make them isolated and at risk of family violence.

In addition to this, there is a significant lack of understanding within the community and by service providers of the nature and dynamics of elder abuse, which can create missed opportunities to intervene and provide support to victims. Most existing family violence services and perpetrator interventions are not geared towards the unique dynamics of elder abuse, or to the needs of certain groups.

In the final part of this chapter, the Commission identifies ways to improve awareness of the responses to family violence perpetrated against older people and proposes improvements to the identification and reporting of family violence for this group. This includes improving education and prevention initiatives, strengthening service responses and improving alternative accommodation options for older people, recognising that aged care facilities are not an appropriate option for many people. Proposals to expand the definition of family violence to more explicitly capture elder abuse and mandatory reporting are also considered.

Our recommendations aim to overcome difficulties that arise in identifying and responding to abuse and to secure the safety and wellbeing of older people who are at risk of, or are experiencing, family violence.

Context and current practice

This section outlines the limited data and information on the prevalence and nature of family violence and elder abuse experienced by older people. It goes on to describe the key service providers that support older people affected by family violence, the framework for reporting and investigating abuse in institutional and non-institutional settings, and the existing justice and health system responses to the specific experiences of older victims of family violence.

When referring to 'older people' the Commission uses the definition most commonly used in developed countries—a person aged 65 years or over.¹ However, some services for older people may start providing support and services to people below this threshold, particularly for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.²

It is important to understand the difference between family violence and elder abuse. Like family violence,³ elder abuse can be physical, sexual, emotional, psychological, or economic in nature, and can also take the form of neglect.⁴ Elder abuse occurs within a relationship where there is 'an expectation of trust which causes harm or distress to an older person',⁵ but is broader than family violence as it can also occur outside the family context (for example, by a carer or a friend). Where the perpetrator is a family member (or in some circumstances a carer or other person who could reasonably be regarded as being like a family member), the abuse will constitute family violence under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).⁶ The terms elder abuse and family violence are, however, often used interchangeably in policy documents and statistics. We do so when referring to these documents.

Older people in Victoria

In Victoria, approximately 761,580 people are aged 65 years and over, representing 14 per cent of the state population.⁷ Of this group, 45 per cent are male and 55 per cent are female.⁸

The following data is useful to understand the circumstances and needs of older people in addressing family violence:

- ▶ Approximately 56 per cent ($n=461,000$) of Victorians aged 65 years and over have a disability, compared with 13 per cent ($n=653,900$) of those aged under 65 years.⁹ Of the 461,000 older Victorians with a disability, 38 per cent ($n=175,300$) have a profound or severe disability. This includes people who reach very old age.
- ▶ A further 33 per cent ($n=268,200$) of Victorians aged 65 years and over have a long-term health condition, compared with 18 per cent ($n=899,500$) of those aged under 65 years.¹⁰
- ▶ Approximately 46 per cent ($n=381,600$) of Victorians aged 65 years and over need assistance with at least one activity. Approximately six per cent ($n=50,600$) of older Victorians live in cared-accommodation.¹¹
- ▶ Of 37,991 Victorians who identified as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander, only four per cent ($n=1,626$) are aged 65 years or over.¹²

The extent and nature of family violence against older people

This section outlines what the Commission heard about the nature and dynamics of family violence perpetrated against older people and how it can differ from family violence against younger people.

Prevalence

The Commission was told that there is very limited evidence on the prevalence of elder abuse in Australia. It has been estimated to affect five to six per cent of older people in Australia, while international studies contain disparate estimates of between one to ten per cent of older people.¹³ There is no prevalence data for Victoria.¹⁴ As with many forms of family violence, some older people do not recognise their experience as constituting elder abuse or family violence and as a result there is considerable under-reporting.¹⁵

Victoria Police incident reporting data shows that in 2013–14, 1359 women and 878 men who were affected family members (that is, victims) in family violence incidents were over the age of 65. This represents 2.8 per cent of all female, and 5.5 per cent of all male, affected family members.¹⁶ By comparison, in the general population as at the last census (2011) 15 per cent ($n=417,033$) of all female Victorians and 13 per cent ($n=344,547$) of all male Victorians were aged 65 years and over. It has been suggested that family violence may be reported at a lower rate by people over 65 years than by younger people. Factors that may contribute to this are discussed further below.

Forms of family violence

In common with people of other age groups, family violence against older people can be physical, psychological, emotional or sexual. Older people can be at particular risk of economic or financial abuse, which is discussed in greater detail in Chapter 21.¹⁷ When older people are reliant on others for care, they can be victims of neglect¹⁸ and can be deprived of the basic necessities of life.¹⁹ All these forms of abuse can constitute family violence under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).

Gender of victims and perpetrators

Seniors Rights Victoria data demonstrates that older women are more likely to be victims of family violence than men.²⁰ This is consistent with Victoria Police data which shows that more women than men are victims in the older age brackets, as is the case in all age brackets.²¹

Victoria Police data does, however, show that among people aged 65 and over, a higher proportion of victims are men than the proportion of male victims in the younger population: 39 per cent ($n=878$) compared to 24 per cent ($n=14,735$) in 2013–14.²² This is also consistent with the Seniors Rights Victoria study results discussed in detail below.

The Commission was told that elder abuse can involve stereotypical assumptions that women, particularly older women, are less capable than men. As one person explained, '[s]ome children assume that an older woman, particularly a woman who has not been the family's breadwinner, is unable to manage her own finances after her husband dies'.²³ She concluded that '[m]y brothers' perspectives of power, entitlement and gender roles led them to financially abuse their mother'.²⁴

In relation to perpetrators, Victoria Police data shows that men are the majority of perpetrators in each age bracket.²⁵ Data from a Seniors Rights Victoria study is similar. Seniors Rights Victoria analysed calls made to its helpline for advice by 755 older people over a two-year period (from 2012–2014). These calls covered both elder abuse and family violence. Figure 27.1 sets out information about the age and gender of the alleged perpetrators behind this elder abuse.

Figure 27.1 Elder abuse: age and gender of alleged perpetrator

Source: Profile of elder abuse in Victoria – Summary report.²⁶ Note: this data is based on victims to whom Seniors Rights Victoria provides services, who are people aged 60 years and above (or 45 years and above for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people).

As Figure 27.1 shows, even taking into account that there are more women than men aged 65 years and over, the majority of perpetrators aged 65 years and over were men (38 men to 14 women). However the majority of perpetrators of elder abuse aged 50–54 years were women (31 women to 27 men).

Family violence by adult children

The Commission received evidence that family violence against older people is often perpetrated by someone younger than the victim—most commonly their children.²⁷

My son was a gambler from the age of 17. In 2009, my husband became ill and was placed in high-care, my son took control of every single aspect of my life. He always ran the business books. I never questioned my son, I never doubted him. He brought a friend to our home with a document saying the house was going to be sold and become his property. He stole my car. He also verbally abused me and later physically abused me—he nearly killed me—fractured my ribs, concussion.²⁸

Ms Jenny Blakey, Manager, Seniors Rights Victoria, told the Commission that the ‘defining characteristic’ of family violence against older people is the difference in ages between the victim and perpetrator.²⁹

Seniors Rights Victoria submitted that its study showed that over two-thirds of elder abuse incidents were perpetrated by a son or daughter of the older person.³⁰ Almost 28 per cent of older people reporting abuse stated they lived with their son or daughter, compared to less than seven per cent of older people overall.³¹

The Seniors Rights Victoria study showed that:

- ▷ the majority of elder abuse incidents were reported by people aged 70 to 84
- ▷ the majority of alleged perpetrators were aged 35 to 54 years
- ▷ 92.3 per cent of alleged perpetrators were related to the older person:
 - ▷ 40 per cent were sons and 26.8 per cent were daughters
 - ▷ 4.8 per cent were husbands, 3.3 per cent were wives and 3.1 per cent were de facto partners
 - ▷ 4.4 per cent were grandchildren
 - ▷ 3.3 per cent were sons-in-law and 3.1 per cent were daughters-in-law.³²

A substantial number of perpetrators of all abuse types were described by the older person as having substance misuse, mental health or gambling issues.³³

Unrelated carers or co-residents

Older people may reside in a variety of settings, including living in their own home, living with family members, living in a retirement village or in an aged care facility. In each of these settings, they may receive care from and be exposed to violence perpetrated by family members or non-related carers. If living in a retirement village or an aged care facility, they may also be exposed to violence perpetrated by co-residents. As noted above, the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) applies to instances of family violence committed where the victim and perpetrator are considered to be family members, including where family-like relationships exist.³⁴ The relationship dynamics between an older person and non-related carers or co-residents may give rise to a family-like relationship, due to the duration of the relationship, the social and emotional ties between the victim and perpetrator and the levels of dependence.³⁵ Whether such a family-like relationship exists and gives rise to the application of the Act will depend upon the facts of each individual case.³⁶

Ageism as a contributing factor

The Commission heard that ageism—stereotyping or discriminating against a person because of their age—can be an important factor in family violence against older people.

The Eastern Elder Abuse Network submitted:

There is no doubt that ageism is one of the fundamental social determinants of elder abuse. Ageist attitudes and behaviors cause older people to feel less valued, burdensome and intimidated. Ageist attitudes and behaviors also allow the younger person to feel a sense of righteousness, entitlement and/or control in ways which can easily turn into elder abuse.³⁷

Ageism includes a lack of respect for older people or societal attitudes which view older people as incapable or a burden.³⁸ The World Health Organization observes that '[o]lder people are often depicted as being frail, weak and dependent, something that has made them appear less worthy of ... family care than other groups, and has presented them as ready targets for exploitation'.³⁹

The Council on the Ageing points out that '[c]ommon myths about ageing – particularly assumptions around capacity – often ignore the economic and social contribution older people have made and continue to make as workers, as carers and in volunteering'.⁴⁰ Despite this, 'many [older people] encounter embedded and systemic inequalities in a pervasive culture of ageism'.⁴¹ Some feel that '[t]here is ... criticism of older people, as if we are taking something from the community, rather than contributing as we do'.⁴²

Older people can feel that they become 'invisible':

Once a person reaches a point in their life where they are perceived as 'older', they somehow seem to become transparent to younger people, as though they don't exist, don't matter, don't have anything important worth listening to, or it's out of date and irrelevant.⁴³

Most older people become invisible after 60 ...⁴⁴

Adult children may feel a sense of entitlement to their parent's assets.⁴⁵ Another submission explained that:

Financial elder abuse may begin with the best intentions – with a child acting as their mother's financial power of attorney thereby managing her finances. This can quickly progress to a sense of entitlement, particularly when adult children have mortgages or debts ... The children may justify their actions by saying: 'Mum doesn't need money now, and it's going to be mine anyway'.⁴⁶

Referring to family violence against older people in the United States, one researcher questioned the near-invisibility of this type of family violence, asking:

Why has there been no public outrage? Perhaps the twin culprits of ageism and denial are to blame. Perhaps the constellation of phenomena that make up elder abuse ... are so disparate that the problem lacks a coherent public identity. Perhaps, although millions of Americans are grappling with the challenge of protecting themselves, their parents and others, elder abuse remains relegated to a family predicament rather than a national one. Which brings us to this question: How do we as individuals and as a nation measure the value of life in old age? And why have we not done more to protect and defend our most vulnerable elders?⁴⁷

The Commission heard suggestions that the effect of an older person's poor health on family carers may give rise to 'caregiver stress'.⁴⁸ It is sometimes suggested that 'caregiver stress' can be a cause of elder abuse, but research has not found it to be a causative factor:

... an old person's dependency on the carer and resulting stress has not been found to predict the occurrence of elder abuse in most studies to date. Case-comparisons studies have failed to find either higher rates of dependency in the old person or greater carer stress in elder abuse situations.⁴⁹

Impact of family violence on older people

The consequences of family violence for older people can be severe. The Commission was told of the terrible impact that such violence can have:

In the last 18 months [my son] became violent. He sold his house to pay off debts and moved into my place. He had plans to get a power of attorney, telling people that I had dementia. He started becoming aggressive, throwing things at me, throwing me against the glass sliding doors in [the] kitchen, threw things everywhere, and I had to lie to the insurance agency 'because you just don't say anything' ... It became worse, he started getting angry, especially when he found out that I wanted to sell the house to downsize. Said he would do things if I did.⁵⁰

[Her son] dragged her down 3 concrete steps into the garage where he threw her to the floor and proceeded to kick her and hit her with her walking stick. She said she "thought she was going to die". She begged him to stop promising not to call the police. After the assault was over he called the ambulance stating she had fallen. She ... suffered shock, extensive bruising, cuts and grazes. In hospital she remained adamant that the police, social workers and authorities were not to be informed. She said she was afraid of her son's reaction. She also divulged that she had been physically assaulted on many occasion by her son over many years. She said he also stole medications at times and regularly took her pension.⁵¹

The Commission was told by nurses from a Melbourne hospital's emergency department that over the last three years they had seen older people living at home present with a wide range of injuries, including:

Falls—due to pushing and assault by family members—causing fractured bones and exacerbating existing health conditions requiring hospital admissions.

Dog bites—an elderly man was set upon by his son's dog causing multiple bites to his legs.

Punches to the face—elderly wife assaulted by her husband whilst on the toilet.

An elderly women with a fractured femur [had] been kept two weeks at home bedridden, covered in faeces and urine and been fed Weetabix with whiskey.

73yo lady punched and pinched by her daughter requiring wound dressings and IV antibiotics.

Elderly lady drugged by a "friend" and had her alter her will and bank details whilst influenced by diazepam (police informed with patients consent).

Elderly been 'stood over' for medications and pensions by family members.

Unexplained frequent falls with bruises and cuts—consistent with [being] assaulted.⁵²

Current supports and services for older people

Service providers

Seniors Rights Victoria

Seniors Rights Victoria is the key statewide service that provides 'leadership across Victoria by addressing and responding to older people experiencing abuse, operating under principles of empowerment of older people and recognition of their rights'.⁵³

Seniors Rights Victoria assist people who:

- ▷ are 60 years of age or older (45 years and over for Indigenous clients), or people approaching 60 years of age with age-related disabilities and illnesses
- ▷ are experiencing (or are at risk of experiencing) elder abuse, mistreatment and/or financial exploitation within a relationship of trust
- ▷ have issues relating to ageing
- ▷ have capacity to give legal instruction (capacity is presumed unless demonstrated otherwise).⁵⁴

Seniors Rights Victoria's services include:

- ▷ a helpline
- ▷ specialist legal services
- ▷ short-term support and advocacy for individuals
- ▷ community education.⁵⁵

Seniors Rights Victoria also provides 'leadership on policy, systemic advocacy and law reform and works with other organisations and groups to better identify, address and prevent elder abuse'.⁵⁶

Seniors Rights Victoria is funded by the Department of Health and Human Services, the Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department and Victoria Legal Aid and works in partnership with Justice Connect, Eastern Community Legal Centre and Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre.⁵⁷

The Department of Health and Human Services has provided Seniors Rights Victoria with $0.64 million in 2014–15 to fund its Helpline and pro bono legal services. Seniors Rights Victoria will deliver information to at least 2000 callers over this period and provide over 550 pieces of legal and advocacy advice.⁵⁸

Justice Connect Seniors Law

Justice Connect Seniors Law provides free legal services to older people who are unable to afford it so they can make informed decisions and ensure that their rights are protected. The objective of Seniors Law is to 'improve the ability of older Victorians to age with dignity and respect'.⁵⁹

Justice Connect Seniors Law assist clients with legal issues including guardianship and administration, powers of attorney and arrangements to live with family, including where these arise in the context of elder abuse.

It works closely with the health and community sector, providing free appointments at hospitals and health centres across Melbourne through pro bono lawyers, as well as training on elder abuse and other legal issues to health, community and legal professionals.⁶⁰ Seniors Law also has a project lawyer based at cohealth, a community health organisation, in Footscray.⁶¹

Government initiatives and guidelines

The Victorian Government has sought to address family violence against older people in a number of ways. Following the 2005 Strengthening Victoria's Response to Elder Abuse: Report of the Elder Abuse Prevention Project report, the Victorian Government established the Elder Abuse Prevention Advisory Group and developed the Elder Abuse Prevention Strategy based on principles that enable and empower older people.⁶²

The Department of Health and Human Services also produced guidelines about elder abuse, such as *With Respect to Age—2009: Victorian Government Practice Guidelines for Health Services and Community Agencies for the Prevention of Elder Abuse*⁶³ and Elder Abuse Prevention and Response Guidelines for Action 2012–14,⁶⁴ both of which are available online.

The With Respect to Age guidelines recommended that community education programs be developed to raise awareness of elder abuse, delivered on an ongoing basis and conducted sensitively.⁶⁵

The Victorian Government's submission stated that DHHS has allocated funding for the following organisations and programs across the 2014–15 period:

- ▶ Seniors Rights Victoria's elder abuse prevention online professional education training, designed to build the capacity of the Victorian workforce to identify and respond to elder abuse⁶⁶
- ▶ Raising Awareness of Elder Abuse in Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Communities, a program run by the Ethnic Communities Council of Victoria, focusing on elder abuse in six communities.⁶⁷

Existing elder abuse training material has also been adapted to ensure that it is culturally safe for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and culturally and linguistically diverse communities. For example, the DHHS elder abuse prevention training manuals have been revised to include 'more culturally specific information relating to Aboriginal communities'.⁶⁸

A range of community education programs and resources have been developed, including elder abuse prevention awareness sessions delivered to over 2300 participants⁶⁹ and professional education and training involving 7000 participants statewide.⁷⁰

Ms Frances Diver, Deputy Secretary of Health Service Performance and Programs at DHHS, gave evidence that the department has released an online version of the elder abuse prevention course which she reported has attracted strong participation from people working in aged care and general practice. The department is also working with the Royal Australian College of General Practitioners to develop training materials on elder abuse.⁷¹

Health care professional education and training is discussed in greater detail in Chapter 19.

Reporting and investigating abuse

Many forms of elder abuse are crimes and require police investigation.⁷² This is true both in institutional settings (for example, aged care facilities and hospitals) and non-institutional settings (for example, an older person's home). The With Respect to Age guidelines developed under the Elder Abuse Prevention Strategy apply to institutions and to workers within the home who may suspect or be told of abuse of an older person.

Reporting elder abuse in institutional settings

The With Respect to Age guidelines encourages institutions to review or develop elder abuse (including family violence) policies and procedures aligned to the Victorian Government Elder Abuse Prevention Strategy.⁷³

Under the strategy, service response frameworks are to be used by institutions to manage day-to-day care requirements of older people. These frameworks are to contain procedures for identifying, investigating and responding to reports or evidence of elder abuse.⁷⁴

The strategy contemplates that once elder abuse has been identified, an interagency protocol for reporting and investigation in institutional settings is to be followed. The protocol, which is to be adapted to individual providers in their local setting, provides instruction on internal and external reporting and referral requirements, such as to management, police and Seniors Rights Victoria.⁷⁵

The With Respect to Age guidelines advise that for reports of elder abuse requiring police investigation, the victim should first be consulted by the institution for consent to report the incident.⁷⁶ Where, however, there is a 'significant risk to the safety of the older person or others', the victim's confidentiality is not unconditional⁷⁷—it may be necessary to report it to police despite the victim's wishes.

Reporting elder abuse in non-institutional settings

An older person may experience family violence in their own home or in another non-institutional setting. They may report the abuse to family, friends or health care professionals such as general practitioners, or these professionals may identify it themselves.

In-home health services, community agencies or other service providers

The With Respect to Age guidelines are intended to apply when a worker from a health service, community agency or another relevant service visits the older person's home and suspects or is told of elder abuse.⁷⁸

Those workers may include general practitioners and nurses, aged care assessment teams and community workers and volunteers, such as those providing meals on wheels.⁷⁹ The Commission was told that although home visitors make older people more visible, it was really the 'potential to build trust and relationships through regular contact that offered critical conduits' to eliciting disclosures of abuse. Without this, 'it's unlikely that [the victim will] just blurt out something'.⁸⁰

There was an older woman and her husband accessing ... [home support] services over a period of years. The woman was frail and struggling to care for her husband who had dementia. Her own health issues and carer status meant her social withdrawal and weepiness was put down to stress and ill health by workers who saw her regularly. It was only when a new worker had started ... who probed a little further ... that the wife disclosed that she was being sexually assaulted by her husband. The dementia had rendered her husband incapable of determining her consent or willingness and she was afraid to tell anyone as she felt she needed to protect her husband.⁸¹

Helplines and the community

Victims may also contact helplines such as the Seniors Rights Victoria helpline, or the police.⁸² The Commission heard that often victims are reluctant to report abuse particularly to the police, and reports may instead be made by concerned family, members of the community or health care professionals.⁸³

To encourage reporting by the community, Seniors Rights Victoria suggested that people reporting concerns about elder abuse be treated anonymously.⁸⁴ For example, the New South Wales Elder Abuse Helpline accepts anonymous reports, such as notifications from concerned neighbours and friends, and can then take appropriate steps to ensure that the older person is safe.⁸⁵

Justice system

When family violence is identified, there may be complexities surrounding information and evidence gathering. Substantiating and gathering information may occur over time and involve multiple service providers and resources.⁸⁶ Justice Connect Seniors Law submitted that investigations should always:

... proceed ... very carefully and where possible involve other health care professionals, drawing on their perceptions, judgement and experience ... Health care providers may not have the confidence, compounded by a lack of professional expertise, to take the matter further.⁸⁷

Victoria Police

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence currently recognises that abuse of older people is 'insidious and easily concealed'.⁸⁸ The Code of Practice states that Victoria Police will take 'all reports of elder abuse seriously and will investigate all matters and make referrals where required'. Older people with dementia or neurological disease are noted as being particularly at risk of elder abuse. Where evidence is limited, the Code advises police officers to 'continue to search for other indicators to substantiate what has occurred'.⁸⁹ Behaviours that indicate elder abuse are listed as:

- ▷ withdrawal
- ▷ depression
- ▷ other hints of helplessness.

The Code identifies that carers may be considered family members under the Family Violence Protection Act, and that where an accused carer is also a guardian, the police should 'ensure that a reassessment of the guardianship order is facilitated through [the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal]'.⁹⁰

The courts

The Judicial College of Victoria, which has the task of educating Victorian judicial officers, outlined in its submission a family violence core curriculum for judges and magistrates. One of the topics is 'understanding groups with specific needs'.⁹¹

Where elder abuse (including family violence) is considered by the courts, judges have the benefit of a Family Violence Benchbook which explains what elder abuse is and why it often goes unreported. Forms of elder abuse, the range of perpetrators and barriers to reporting are outlined.⁹²

Attention is also given to the issue of 'caregiver stress'. The Benchbook advises that caregiver stress is often mistakenly relied upon by aged care professionals as an excuse for the perpetrator's behaviour, rather than recognising it as a 'choice motivated by issues of power and control'.⁹³

Health service responses

St Vincent's Hospital model

St Vincent's Health Australia told the Commission about its new hospital-wide policy of care and education to respond to elder abuse (including family violence). Ms Meghan O'Brien, social work team leader at St Vincent's Hospital, Melbourne, conducted research into contemporary best practice from other jurisdictions and developed a model for the hospital with the following key features:⁹⁴

- ▷ high-level governance arrangements—a senior Vulnerable Older People Coordination and Response Group reviews all data relating to suspected cases and advises on policy and continuous improvement
- ▷ a model of care which supports staff to identify pathways for intervention and escalation based on risk, patient choice and safety planning
- ▷ tiered education—the framework is underpinned by three levels of competency training for hospital staff
- ▷ data collection and notification—all cases of confirmed, witnessed or suspected elder abuse are notified to the Coordination and Response Group. The data informs performance measurement, service improvement and workforce training.⁹⁵

The Commission heard that the framework has already delivered significant improvements to practice, and could be adapted for use in other hospitals and by other health-care and aged care service providers.⁹⁶

Ms O'Brien also discussed risk assessments and safety planning that respected the wishes of older people who are experiencing family violence:

... we obviously have situations where we have got patients over 65 who are competent and very much their choice, their wish ... is to return to [living at home]. So in some situations discharge may not stop [the family violence], but what we may do is actually just implement a revised care plan based on the risk or what that older person actually wants and what the risk factors are.⁹⁷

Aboriginal community controlled health organisations

Ms Jill Gallagher AO, Chief Executive Officer, Victorian Aboriginal Community Controlled Health Organisation stated that '[t]o me, family violence is a health issue, so in my opinion we should absolutely have services at all of our [Aboriginal community controlled health organisations] that deal with it'.⁹⁸

The Commission heard of compulsory family violence and elder abuse training run by Aboriginal Community Elders Services. Ms Gallagher stated that ACCHO workers:

should be trained and supported to be able to identify and respond to family violence issues. A number of our services have taken the initiative with this, for example, Aboriginal Community Elders Services (ACES) has made it compulsory for their staff to undertake training to address Elder abuse, annually.⁹⁹

Ms Gallagher suggested that '[t]his sort of response to family violence should happen across the board at all services'.¹⁰⁰

Health-Justice Partnerships

Justice Connect Seniors Law's submission advocated the Health-Justice Partnership model of service, which has been used in both the United States and Australia.¹⁰¹ In 2014, the Victorian Legal Services Board provided funding for nine such partnerships, including a three-year partnership involving Justice Connect Seniors Law and cohealth.¹⁰² The stated aims of this were:

- improved collaboration between legal and health professionals and greater internal capacity to identify and respond to elder abuse
- provision of legal assistance with a focus on early intervention
- development of relationships with local communities and an increase in the capacity of those communities to identify and respond to elder abuse through facilitating the development of community-specific screening tools.¹⁰³

Both the St Vincent's Hospital model and Health Justice Partnerships are discussed further in Chapter 19.

Education, training and practice initiatives

The Commission was told of several initiatives which focus on education, training and practice. Some of these initiatives include:

- ▷ A professional training program—developed by Justice Connect Seniors Law, aimed at engaging and educating health and community organisations. The program is delivered in three phases: 'hidden' legal issues for older people, a legal health check and a training package. In 2013–14, the training was delivered to over 500 professionals.¹⁰⁴
- ▷ Training videos—developed by the Eastern Elder Abuse Network one of which has won both international and local awards.¹⁰⁵ The Eastern Elder Abuse Network also established an electronic case-conferencing facility so that members of the network can collaborate and support one another with elder abuse cases.¹⁰⁶
- ▷ An online elder abuse tool kit—developed by Seniors Rights Victoria, which addresses signs of abuse, how to work respectfully with older men and women and when and how to report elder abuse.¹⁰⁷ The Maroondah City Council has also developed an elder abuse tool kit, available for anyone working with older at-risk people which also comes with elder abuse prevention guidelines for staff in aged and disability services to assist with the identification and response to elder abuse.¹⁰⁸
- ▷ A series of short films raising awareness of elder abuse—developed by the Bendigo District Aboriginal Cooperative, funded by Indigenous Family Violence-Community Initiative Fund.¹⁰⁹

In addition, 'Norma's Project' was established in December 2011 as a research study into the sexual assault of older women. The study was conducted by the Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society, La Trobe University, with the final report published in June 2014.

Norma's Project

Norma's Project aims to increase awareness of sexual assault of older women 'within the community and amongst service providers, and to strengthen the community's ability to prevent, respond to and speak out about the sexual assault of older women'.¹¹⁰ Norma's Project produced a research study into the sexual assault of older women in Australia involving surveys and interviews of older women who had experienced sexual assault, their friends, carers and service providers.¹¹¹

The project found that despite a lack of prevalence data, there is sufficient evidence to suggest that women remain vulnerable to sexual assault into old age, with the impacts of sexual assault on older women remaining largely unexplored or documented.¹¹²

A framework for prevention of sexual assault of older women was proposed,¹¹³ involving information, education and training and public policy development. Norma's Project found that education and training strategies should:

- promote sexual rights and access / avenues to support services
- promote gender equality and challenge pervasive ageism
- improve service responses to the needs of older women, particularly those with cognitive impairment.¹¹⁴

The report also recommended effective sector-wide responses, including strategies for aged care, health and welfare services and police and judicial responses.¹¹⁵

The study acknowledged that the *National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022*¹¹⁶ envisages grants to assist diverse groups, including older women, although it does not expressly refer to their specific needs.¹¹⁷

Challenges and opportunities

This section reviews some challenges many older people face when seeking to report family violence, as well as issues with the current system response. These include a lack of understanding and awareness about family violence and how it affects older people, and inadequacies in the current oversight regime.

Definition of family violence

Some submissions suggested that the definition of family violence in the Family Violence Protection Act should specify that it covers neglect and more subtle forms of financial abuse; for example, refusing to contribute to living expenses when living with an older person.¹¹⁸

Neglect may be active (such as deliberately withholding basic care or necessities) or passive (failing to provide proper care).¹¹⁹ It may be possible to address passive neglect through additional support for both the carer and the older person.¹²⁰

Moreland Community Legal Service offered the following justifications for specifying neglect in the definition of family violence:

... there can be no doubt that there is an expectation that people in a marriage-like relationship have an obligation to care and support each other and so a failure to meet the standard should be properly described as family violence. In a similar way, it could be argued that if adult children live with parents, they thereby assume the obligations of support and care of a close relationship, and that falling short of the standard of support and care should also be defined as family violence.¹²¹

Barriers to older people reporting family violence

Family violence against older people tends to be under-reported.¹²² Some older people may not recognise their experience as family violence and may regard abusive behaviour as a 'normal' part of their intimate partner or family relationships or of ageing.¹²³

In the past, women were not supported to report or leave abusive relationships:

[30 years ago] I don't think many women thought they had much choice ... they spoke to their minister or priest or they spoke to their doctor and none of those professionals had the appropriate response. They gave them advice about how to be a better wife or how to keep the peace ... And they were called things like difficult marriages or demanding husbands. There were all sorts of labels around what were obviously very violent and abusive relationships.¹²⁴

Therefore, older people may not be culturally empowered to report family violence, because:

Societal/cultural and gender conditioning as well as different generational expectations mean that older victims may have a higher tolerance for some abusive behaviours or be less likely to seek help.¹²⁵

Reliance on the abuser can make it difficult for an older person to seek help or leave their home; for example, they may be financially reliant upon the perpetrator or have concerns about who will care for them if they do leave. Other reasons for not reporting included concerns about stigma¹²⁶ and lack of knowledge about the organisations or services available to assist the victim.¹²⁷ A community consultation participant noted:

One of the things with elder abuse is knowledge ... a woman told somebody about what was happening to her. [T]hey told her [it] was called family violence. And she went on to access [relevant] services and they changed her life. She had put up with that abuse for 47 years. Older people don't know about services and they don't label what is happening as family violence.¹²⁸

The Commission was told that older people are often reluctant to report abuse inflicted by an adult child, because they want to preserve family relationships.¹²⁹ Ms Blakey noted a reluctance to become involved in legal processes:

People say, 'I don't want the police involved. I don't want my son and daughter to be charged by the police.' There is a reluctance to engage in legal solutions. There is a sense of protecting and supporting the son or daughter in whatever way they can. So there's a sense, I guess, of ... what we call a protective love as a parent in being very reluctant to then take action against the family member, usually the adult child.¹³⁰

For these reasons, the Eastern Elder Abuse Network submitted that 'a punitive or retaliatory approach is seldom the appropriate response'.¹³¹ Such an approach could cause further anxiety and stress to the older victim.¹³² Instead, 'responses to family violence against older victims should be sensitive to their familial relationships and their choices'.¹³³

The Commission is aware that barriers to reporting could be addressed in a number of ways. Dr John Chesterman, Manager of Policy and Education at the Office of the Public Advocate, recommended the establishment of clear non-police contact points where older people (or members of the community concerned about the wellbeing of at-risk adults) can seek help, without the immediate connection to a criminal justice response.¹³⁴

More broadly, if a range of other options were available to address family violence against older people, they might feel more comfortable seeking help. For example, in Canada members of the Waterloo Region Committee on Elder Abuse (which consists of both government and community partners¹³⁵) designed a dual education and intervention approach, developed with input from older people and based on principles of restorative justice. Restorative justice seeks to 'restore social relationships rather than just to punish offenders', which was seen as important in cases of elder abuse where the victim wanted the abuse to stop, but also wanted to maintain a relationship with, for example, their adult child.¹³⁶

A key element of restorative justice is the involvement of the victim and other members of the community ... Victims, who play a very limited role in the normal court system, are very involved in the restorative justice process. They are able to tell their story and describe the impact that the offense has had upon their lives in an environment where they are supported and protected. The restorative justice process is intended to ensure that the perpetrator is aware of the consequences of his or her actions and has the chance to acknowledge what he or she has done and to have the opportunity to apologize and make a commitment to change. While restitution is often a part of the process, the main purpose is to transform the relationship between the offender and the victim into a healthy and equal one.¹³⁷

Restorative justice is discussed further in Chapter 22.

The Waterloo project evolved to include an Elder Abuse Response Team, or EART, which provides a victim-centred, coordinated community response. The EART comprises health care workers (for example, nurses and home therapists) and justice workers. The team works collaboratively via the Inter-Agency Elder Abuse Working Group, providing 'a forum for information sharing and problem-solving related to suspected and confirmed elder abuse situations'.¹³⁸ The assigned lawyer determines whether restorative justice is appropriate, on a case-by-case basis. The EART became part of the Waterloo Regional Police Service domestic violence unit and is co-located with other relevant agencies such as the Sexual Assault Domestic Violence Treatment Centre.¹³⁹

Lack of understanding and awareness of family violence experienced by older people

The Commission heard that there is a lack of understanding of older people's experiences of family violence among many mainstream service providers and within the community generally.

Various people may be able to refer victims to family violence services, including other family members, general practitioners, social workers, case managers, Centrelink, home and community care workers, police and court staff.¹⁴⁰ However, submissions identified the difficulty on the part of those providing services to older people in knowing how to identify and respond to older people who may be experiencing family violence.¹⁴¹

This lack of understanding limits the ability to identify indicators of family violence, to develop trusting relationships with older victims to encourage disclosures of violence and to provide support to those victims.¹⁴²

The Commission heard that it is necessary to provide mainstream service providers including health and aged care professionals, lawyers and finance professionals with relevant information, including information about sources of support.¹⁴³

Institutions such as aged care facilities and hospitals play ‘an important role in identifying, reporting and preventing elder abuse’.¹⁴⁴ This is especially true of health professionals as they are best placed to identify family violence since most older people trust them.¹⁴⁵ Despite this, the Commission was told that they ‘they often fail to recognise [cases of elder abuse]’, including because of:

- ▷ limited consensus and understanding of what constitutes elder abuse
- ▷ lack of knowledge of reporting or referral frameworks
- ▷ concerns about confidentiality
- ▷ concerns referral may compromise therapeutic relationships
- ▷ consequences for the older person
- ▷ impact of the legal process on the older person
- ▷ reluctance to become involved in legal process
- ▷ outside scope of professional responsibility
- ▷ dissatisfied with authorities response to elder abuse
- ▷ lack of conviction that referral would improve outcomes
- ▷ older person has denied mistreatment
- ▷ abuse only involved subtle signs
- ▷ difficulties in obtaining necessary evidence.¹⁴⁶

The Commission heard examples of such lack of understanding of elder abuse and family violence amongst health care professionals:

A disturbing case in the eastern metropolitan region involved a 78 year old woman experiencing sexual abuse at the hands of her husband who had Alzheimer’s Disease. When encouraged to speak to her GP, he advised her that this was common and that in any case men with this disease who are exhibiting these behaviours usually pass through this stage “in a year or so”. No support or referral was offered.¹⁴⁷

As a result, the Commission was told of the importance of training health care and other professionals specifically about elder abuse to increase detection rates.¹⁴⁸ One researcher found that health care professionals who had received some professional training relating to elder abuse were twice as likely to suspect physical abuse and were more likely to ‘record, report and discuss elder abuse’.¹⁴⁹

Justice Connect Seniors Law told the Commission that health care professionals are more likely to detect elder abuse if they:

- ▷ routinely asked older people about abuse
- ▷ had an elder abuse protocol
- ▷ knew about the relevant law on abuse.¹⁵⁰

Justice Connect Seniors Laws’ submission detailed the professional training programs it delivers to community and health organisations on elder abuse.¹⁵¹

Justice Connect Seniors Law submitted that one opportunity to improve identification of family violence is through a Health-Justice Partnership.¹⁵² Based on the success of the Justice Connect Seniors Law and cohealth partnership and encouraging research from the United States, Justice Connect Seniors Law recommended government funding be provided for the expansion of the Health-Justice Partnership model of service.¹⁵³

The Commission was also told about the importance of improving communication coordination and collaboration between various sectors (such as the aged care, health, family violence, legal and accommodation sectors).¹⁵⁴ Information sharing is discussed further in Chapter 7.

Mandatory reporting

A number of submissions noted the lack of a mandatory requirement or framework to report the abuse of older people.¹⁵⁵ While there are reporting obligations in certain circumstances, these are not universal. For example, under the Aged Care Act 1997 (Cth), aged care staff members are required to report a 'reportable assault' (which includes unlawful sexual contact and unreasonable use of force).¹⁵⁶ This obligation does not apply to older people who do not live in these facilities.¹⁵⁷

Health care workers who encounter elder abuse can be placed in a difficult situation if the victim says that they do not want to report the abuse. Staff may be faced with deciding whether to breach medical confidentiality and disregard the patient's wishes or report the abuse.¹⁵⁸ The Commission was told there is a lack of guidance about what should be done to protect the patient in these circumstances.¹⁵⁹

The dilemma for nurses and doctors in this case were frustrating. Because [the victim] clearly stated she did not want police or government agencies involved; they were conflicted about reporting this situation. There was no guideline or identified pathway that the staff could follow in order to ensure this event was clearly identified and services required; actioned. This caused confusion and uncertainty. No staff member was identified as who should do what – "is it my responsibility or someone else's". Are we breaking confidentiality, are we allowed to report this? Who do we refer this patient to for follow up?¹⁶⁰

In that case, no report was made and the victim moved to an aged care facility while the perpetrator continued to live in her home. With proper community support, the victim could have remained at home for some years if the perpetrator been reported and removed.¹⁶¹

Knox City Council submitted that a statewide legislative mandatory reporting framework, similar to the child protection reporting system, would enhance the safety of older people experiencing abuse and would provide a better basis for assessing the extent of the problem.¹⁶² Macedon Ranges Shire Council submitted that reports should only be made with the consent of the victim, and that if the victim did not have the capacity to consent, a report should only be made if it was in their best interests.¹⁶³

Other organisations argued against a mandatory reporting requirement, except perhaps where physical or sexual violence is involved, to ensure that the rights and wishes of older people continue to be respected.¹⁶⁴

Seniors Rights Victoria did not support mandatory reporting but acknowledged that there were ways in which the government could better assist older people experiencing family violence, such as by expanding the investigative powers of the Public Advocate in suspected cases of neglect,¹⁶⁵ and recognising scope to explore additional ways in which the government could assist older people. Similarly, the Victorian Government has previously not supported mandatory reporting.¹⁶⁶

Increasing public awareness

Prevention was identified as a key area of focus to reduce elder abuse. Many submissions suggested that education and raising public awareness is crucial to addressing family violence against older people.¹⁶⁷

To address attitudes which may lead to elder abuse, several submissions pointed to school-based early intervention programs, similar to or expanding upon the current Respectful Relationships Education program.¹⁶⁸ One submission stated that '[i]t is vital to implement programs to educate children on the harmful effects of this violence, in both primary and secondary schools around Australia' particularly targeting 'negative attitude[s] toward elders'.¹⁶⁹

Macedon Ranges Shire Council submitted that 'educational "respect" campaigns should begin in primary schools'.¹⁷⁰

Community-wide awareness and education programs like media campaigns were also suggested. The Eastern Elder Abuse Network recommended that such a campaign could be 'aimed at long-term attitudinal changes so that ageism is seen as unacceptable in modern society'.¹⁷¹

It has been suggested that:¹⁷²

Just as addressing gender inequality and ensuring respect for women are central to stopping violence against women, so is overcoming ageism. Promoting the dignity and inherent value of older people is a crucial component of elder abuse prevention.¹⁷³

Norma's Project noted that the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022 focuses on primary prevention, aiming to achieve 'attitudinal and behavioural change', particularly among younger people.¹⁷⁴ While Norma's Project strongly supported primary prevention, it noted that this by itself does not address current abusive behaviours and the experience of victims today, meaning that a 'broader spectrum of actions is required that places greater emphasis on interventions'.¹⁷⁵

Risk assessment issues

The Commission was told that there are risk factors relevant to family violence against older people that are not covered by the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Assessment Framework (known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF).¹⁷⁶ Moreland Community Legal Service noted that some risk factors are relevant to assessing risk to both older and younger cohorts (for example, previous violence) while others, such as 'recent pregnancy' are generally unhelpful to older people.¹⁷⁷

Some risk factors that are more specific to older people include:

- ▷ the recent loss of a spouse¹⁷⁸
- ▷ ongoing or resumed co-habitation with adult children¹⁷⁹
- ▷ diminished capacity from age-related diseases (for example, dementia)¹⁸⁰
- ▷ living alone, social isolation and dependence on others¹⁸¹
- ▷ poverty or, conversely, the accumulation of substantial assets¹⁸²
- ▷ language or financial literacy barriers.¹⁸³

The absence of appropriate risk factors in the CRAF may mean that some instances of family violence against older people are not identified. The value of family violence risk assessment as a lens through which to identify elder abuse was also noted. It was submitted that:

Understanding the power and control issues in regard to [e]lder [a]buse is essential in breaking down the barriers for fearful, isolated victims and to ensure that service system responses recognise these issues when confronted by them. Rather than responding how wonderful to an [elderly person's] statement of "oh I owe him everything", consider why would a person make that statement. For those of us who have worked within a Domestic Violence Framework they signal alarm bells. However for the less skilled or exposed systems such as Aged Care Services they may not recognise triggers, statements or cues of abuse for what they are.¹⁸⁴

Criminal investigations

Dr Chesterman has argued that police should have the expertise to investigate perpetrators of crimes against at-risk adults, including crimes involving financial abuse.¹⁸⁵ Victoria Police's Blue Paper recognises the need for changes to respond to growth in crimes such as fraud.¹⁸⁶

Seniors Rights Victoria identified a promising initiative of the Seattle police department aimed at reducing instances of abuse of older people.¹⁸⁷ The department has two detectives who specialise in identifying and stopping abuse of at-risk adults. Investigations involve meeting victims and obtaining records, and can result in bank accounts being frozen or seized.¹⁸⁸ The department's website provides information on elder abuse, including information on financial exploitation.¹⁸⁹

As discussed, one of the barriers to older victims reporting family violence is their relationship with the perpetrator and a potential desire to preserve family relationships. The Commission was told that older victims generally prefer informal or civil remedies, rather than police investigation and criminal proceedings where family members are concerned.¹⁹⁰ The Victoria Police Code of Practice does not directly address an older victim's possible preference for an alternative, non-criminal response.

Dr Chesterman highlighted one initiative in Nova Scotia, Canada that seeks to achieve a balance between criminal and alternative responses.¹⁹¹ Under this approach, the sheriff must not make or enforce a protection order if the victim has not consented to the order or its enforcement. However, in some cases, this refusal may be overruled. This includes where the victim has been 'unduly pressured' or where there are no less restrictive means of responding to the abuse.¹⁹² Justice Connect Seniors Law submitted that Victoria Police should engage in a similar approach in balancing whether or not to prosecute instances of elder abuse.¹⁹³

Oversight

The Commission heard that the current framework for investigating elder abuse is inadequate. Dr Chesterman observed:

When it comes to the investigation of situations of concern, Victoria's adult protection system has some notable gaps. As mentioned, Victoria's emergency services tend to play a limited role outside of situations where there is a medical emergency or where there is obvious evidence of a crime having been committed. Other agencies do have investigatory powers, but while in combination these can result in significant positive outcomes, many situations of concern do not automatically come within the purview of any particular agency.¹⁹⁴

No single organisation has a general investigative role across the community.¹⁹⁵ The Victorian Ombudsman focuses on 'administrative actions' by public authorities. The Office of the Public Advocate focuses on circumstances where a guardianship or administration order may be appropriate.¹⁹⁶ The Office of the Public Advocate also oversees community visitors who visit:

- ▷ designated mental health services, residential services that provide 24-hour nursing care and other types of residential services (under the Mental Health Act 2014 (Vic))¹⁹⁷
- ▷ registered disability service providers and department-managed disability services where residential services are being provided (under the Disability Act 2006 (Vic)).¹⁹⁸

In its 2012 Guardianship report, the Victorian Law Reform Commission found that the Office of the Public Advocate does not have a 'comprehensive range of powers to carry out these functions'.¹⁹⁹ Recommendations made by the VLRC, not yet implemented by the Victorian Government, include:

- ▷ that the Office of the Public Advocate should have the function of receiving and investigating complaints and conducting investigations on its own motion in relation to the abuse, neglect or exploitation of people with impaired decision-making ability due to a disability²⁰⁰
- ▷ that guardianship laws should be amended to allow for greater flexibility to accommodate different levels of cognitive ability and decision-making needs—rather than the current regime which contemplates only capacity and incapacity, it proposed that the regime should accommodate a spectrum of cognitive abilities, and allow different models of assistance depending on where the person sits on the spectrum²⁰¹
- ▷ the introduction of 'supporters' and 'co-decision makers' who could be appointed to assist with decision-making, but would not become substitute decision makers
- ▷ investigations should be able to be undertaken in relation to supporters, co-decision makers and substitute decision makers, broadening the range of people over which the Office of the Public Advocate is able to undertake investigations beyond those who are the subject of a guardianship order.

Other initiatives to improve safeguards for people with disabilities (noting that older people are more likely to have a disability than younger people) include:

- ▷ the development of a national framework of quality and safety standards in the disability services sector as part of the National Disability Insurance Scheme, which will include services standards, complaint mechanisms and management of critical incidents²⁰²
- ▷ recent recommendations by the Victorian Ombudsman in relation to oversight of the disability sector, including the creation of an independent oversight body.²⁰³

These are discussed further in Chapter 31. The Victorian Government has said it will consider the Ombudsman's recommendation in the context of the Victorian Parliament Family and Community Development Committee's Inquiry into Abuse in Disability Services final report and development of the National Disability Insurance Scheme Quality and Safeguards Framework.²⁰⁴

While these recommendations and initiatives may go some way to assisting older Victorians with disabilities or impaired decision-making capacity, there is still a substantial number of older people who do not fall within these categories and so will not be assisted by the reforms.

Accessing accommodation and services

Barriers to access

A number of submissions referred to specific barriers faced by some groups of older people when trying to access relevant services.²⁰⁵

These include older people from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, for whom culturally safe services are important. The Commission heard that barriers for this group include actual and perceived discrimination by service providers; language and cultural barriers; lack of trust in services and organisations; and lack of awareness of and engagement with local Aboriginal communities.²⁰⁶

Older people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities may also find it difficult to gain access to services in a relevant language and/or that are culturally appropriate.²⁰⁷ Older women from CALD communities are at increased risk of elder abuse, especially financial abuse, because of limited English language skills and reliance on family members to help them navigate the service system.²⁰⁸ In some CALD communities, there is a stigma attached to having a parent live in residential care, which may lead to people not disclosing elder abuse.²⁰⁹

The Commission was also told that family violence against older lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex victims is likely to be under-reported.²¹⁰ Older lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people can be particularly at risk. Many have faced a lifetime of discrimination and feel reluctant to seek help from services for fear of further discrimination.²¹¹

Older people in rural, regional and remote communities also face difficulty in gaining access to services due to isolation and limited access to specialist family violence services, crisis accommodation, legal services and other general services.²¹² In many rural, regional and remote communities the proportion of seniors is increasing as younger people leave to pursue study and employment opportunities elsewhere,²¹³ further compounding their isolation and social exclusion.

Finally, while experiences of older people who acquire a disability can be different from people with disabilities who are ageing, both groups may face some similar barriers in accessing services—such as a lack of wheelchair or mobility aide access.²¹⁴

These experiences are discussed in greater detail in Chapters 26, 28, 30, 31 and 33.

Lack of accommodation for victims and perpetrators

Homelessness and family violence

Family violence can cause homelessness for older victims, particularly older women. A study by the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse and Older Women's Network NSW, which drew on 31 qualitative interviews with women who were homeless and over the age of 45, indicated that most older women who were homeless 'had endured relationships that were abusive and difficult'.²¹⁵ Many disclosed stories of abuse during their lifetime, including by family and partners.²¹⁶ A number were in poor physical health from causes including family violence-related injuries.²¹⁷

Analysis of specialist homelessness service data undertaken by the Australia Institute of Health and Welfare confirms the link between family violence and homelessness of older women. They report that in the period 2010–11 to 2013–14, of 144,710 women accessing specialist homelessness services across Australia that were experiencing family violence, 16 per cent or 23,154 women were aged 45 years and over.²¹⁸ Data for Victoria is consistent with these findings.²¹⁹

Remaining at home

Many older people prefer to remain in their own homes and community.²²⁰ This allows them to remain close to family and friends, upon whom they may be reliant for support. If an older person becomes a victim of family violence in these circumstances, especially if the family member providing the care is the perpetrator, they may not have ready access to alternative accommodation or care. Justice Connect Seniors Law explained that the 'availability of health and community services to support older people to remain in their home without having to rely on the abusive family member is critical'.²²¹

The Victorian Government currently funds a number of services that support older people remaining in their homes, including the home and community care program.²²²

Economic gender inequality

Seniors Rights Victoria observed that victims over 60 years of age were born before 1955, when 'lifestyles and values were different from what they are today'.²²³ Relevantly, gender roles were more firmly entrenched, with 'traditional breadwinner/homemaker stereotype[s]'.²²⁴ Accordingly, there were fewer paid employment opportunities for women, especially once they started a family. Older women live with the consequences of this economic gender inequality.

The gender gap in retirement savings and retirement incomes is a consequence of events across a woman's lifecycle. It stems from deep and systemic gender inequality – ingrained attitudes towards gender roles and caring; women's vulnerability to violence; the gender pay gap; constrained choices and decisions about paid work and care; the impact of divorce; discrimination and harassment. Each of these experiences affects subsequent opportunities and finally leads to women accumulating poverty instead of financial security.²²⁵

Older, single women are one of the most disadvantaged population groups in Australia.²²⁶ Such women can include victims of intimate partner violence who may have left the relationship. It can also include women who have been exposed to the violence of adult children. Many may have limited savings and earning capacity.

Accessing the private rental market

Older victims who seek to leave their home are likely to find that the private rental market is beyond their reach, putting them at risk of homelessness.²²⁷

Older people experience a range of difficulties accessing the rental market, including discrimination and limited means. The Housing for the Aged Action Group identify that:

... in addition to the age related discrimination that is faced by all older people in the private rental market, [older people must also] compete for a limited number of affordable properties with younger people who may have one or two full incomes.²²⁸

The history of economic gender inequality makes this particularly difficult for older women, especially those also fleeing family violence and seeking alternative accommodation.

Crisis accommodation

The Commission was told that there was a need for better crisis accommodation options for both older victims and perpetrators of family violence.²²⁹ Ms Colleen Pearce, the Victorian Public Advocate, as well as Ms Blakey, noted that the current family violence system (including crisis accommodation) was designed for women and children and may not recognise the specific needs of older people; for example, most refuges are not fully accessible to people with mobility difficulties.²³⁰ The Commission was told this was especially true in rural, regional and remote areas.²³¹

Similarly, a need for suitable accommodation for perpetrators was also identified.²³² This includes older perpetrators of intimate partner violence who may have mobility issues as well as younger perpetrators, such as adult children.²³³

The Commission heard that older people may be at risk when an adult child, who has been excluded from their own home, possibly because of intimate partner violence, seeks to return to their parents' home:

Their adult child has gone through some crisis. They have separated from their partner. Maybe there has been family violence within that relationship. Maybe there are alcohol and drug issues or financial problems, they have lost their job, their business has gone broke, and they turn up and they need somewhere to live. So they return home. There is no accommodation for them, and it comes to the family and mum and dad to take them back. For a lot of families that works really well; families manage that. But for some families it's just not appropriate and there is not alternative accommodation for the perpetrator or the person who may become the perpetrator.²³⁴

The Commission was also told about violence experienced by older parents who live with an adult child with a mental illness.²³⁵

Ms Blakey suggested that access to safe crisis housing within more appropriate facilities, such as aged care facilities, would better meet the needs of older victims.²³⁶ However, the Public Advocate noted that not all older people want to end up in an aged care facility, particularly those who are active and competent.²³⁷ As discussed, elder abuse can also occur in aged care facilities, perpetrated either by family members or non-related carers and co-residents.

Lack of support and perpetrator programs

The Eastern Elder Abuse Network have stated that:

The absence of age-specific services for older people experiencing elder abuse means that the abuse will continue to go unnoticed, unreported and unaddressed.²³⁸

It submitted that '[t]his is a significant gap in the government's response to family violence'.²³⁹ No To Violence submitted this also requires appropriate responses from the family violence sector.²⁴⁰

Although older male victims can and do seek help from men's services, these:

... generally concentrate on change-behaviour programs or counseling, which are not relevant to older men who are victims of elder abuse, most of whom are from a culture of "keeping quiet" about their personal problems, particularly outside the family.²⁴¹

The Commission discusses the support services for male victims in Chapter 32.

The Commission was also told there were very few services for perpetrators of family violence against older victims,²⁴² with most programs designed for men committing violence against their intimate partner. As perpetrators are often adult children, programs which are suitable for these perpetrators are needed. Seniors Rights Victoria suggested that because similar themes underlie family violence and elder abuse (such as power and control), behaviour change programs could be developed to assist perpetrators of elder abuse.²⁴³ No To Violence recommended that consultation should occur to develop minimum standards for perpetrator programs to address issues such as elder abuse.²⁴⁴

Seniors Rights Victoria suggested that counselling and behavioural-change programs to address situations of family violence against older people should be made available to the broader community.²⁴⁵

The way forward

It is clear that there is a lack of understanding of older people's experiences of family violence among mainstream service providers and within the community generally. People who work in services who come into contact with older victims of family violence often have difficulty identifying and responding to family violence, particularly when the older person is reluctant to report the violence to police. Older victims can be reluctant to report family violence for a range of reasons. They may want to retain their relationship with the perpetrator, who may be an intimate partner or adult child, or they may fear the loss of a carer, even though they want and need the violence to stop.

The Commission believes that responses to older people who have experienced family violence should be informed by key principles, which recognise the particular experiences and needs of older victims. These key principles are:

- ▷ Public awareness of family violence against older people must increase, so that family and friends can identify abuse and provide support.
- ▷ Older victims should be encouraged to seek help and know where it can be found.
- ▷ All service providers who may come into contact with older victims should be able to identify when family violence is occurring and know what to do in response. Aged care and health care workers should be able to obtain advice and support to resolve the ethical tension between patient/client wishes and protecting their safety.
- ▷ Older victims should be supported to remain in their homes. If they choose to leave, they should be supported to obtain appropriate accommodation.
- ▷ Older victims from Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander backgrounds should be able to receive culturally safe services.
- ▷ Older victims from particular communities—including culturally and linguistically diverse communities, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender communities and people with disabilities—should be able to access services that understand and can respond to their different experiences and needs.
- ▷ When responding to family violence against older people, the response should be sensitive to their choices about family relationships; for example, instead of relying on a criminal justice response, greater support could be given to parents who are carers of adult children with mental health issues.
- ▷ Responses between various sectors (and particularly aged care, health and family violence services) should be coordinated and collaborative.

The Commission's recommended priority areas for action are set out below. These recommendations should be read together with the general recommendations in 'Family violence and diversity', located at the start of this volume of the report.

Education to increase awareness and prevention

The Commission recognises the need to increase public awareness of family violence against older people. This needs to extend to older people themselves to help them find assistance.

One way of increasing awareness would be to include information on elder abuse, family violence and available support services as part of existing information distribution processes; for example, when information is sent out with Victorian Seniors Cards. We recognise that some material on elder abuse (including the recognition that it is a form of family violence) is already included on the Seniors online website. However, some older Australians have limited access to or familiarity with use of online resources. This means that it is important to continue to provide hardcopy information to this community.

There is a need for expansion of existing awareness and preventative strategies. Just as prevention of family violence requires a focus on gender, prevention of family violence against older people also needs to expose and address ageism. For as long as older people are viewed as less capable and dependent, and are not valued for their contribution to our community, this form of abuse will continue. Sometimes it will be disguised as 'caregiver stress' or justified as actions taken in the 'best interest' of the older person.

The Commission recognises that the existing Respectful Relationships Education program in Victorian schools seeks to educate students on gender, violence and respectful relationships to prevent violence against women. There is scope to ensure this program addresses violence against older people (for example, mothers, fathers and grandparents) as well as addressing ageism more generally, as part of preventing family violence.

Recommendation 153

The Victorian Government resource the development and delivery of information on family violence using channels such as seniorsonline, information distributed with Victorian Seniors Cards, Seniors Week and the Seniors Information Centre [within 12 months].

Building the service response

Work already done by the Commonwealth and Victorian Governments and others including Seniors Rights Victoria, Justice Connect Seniors Law, the Royal Australian College of General Practitioners and other service providers, to increase knowledge about elder abuse among service providers, is an important step towards improving the response to family violence directed at older people. The Commission recognises that more needs to be done to ensure that relevant policies are put into practice and that the reach of current programs is extended.

The Victorian Government should continue to develop and implement policies directed at ensuring that people who work with older victims are able to identify elder abuse and know what to do in response. Training on the issue should be made available for:

- ▷ health professionals
- ▷ home and community care workers
- ▷ the aged care workforce, including aged care assessment teams
- ▷ the Office of the Public Advocate's community visitors
- ▷ Victoria Police
- ▷ other service providers
- ▷ banking and financial services staff
- ▷ lawyers
- ▷ counsellors.

Ensuring that the aged care workforce, including Aged Care Assessment Services, receives training in family violence and the Common Risk Assessment Framework would greatly strengthen identification of and response to family violence against older people.

Professionals who work with older people should be supported with guidelines and procedures to resolve ethical dilemmas where elder abuse is identified but the victim does not wish to report it.

It is necessary that people providing aged care services in all settings, including an older person's family home, are equipped to identify and respond to family violence. The Commission notes that a new Community Service Training Package was released in December 2015.²⁴⁶ The training package includes courses on disability, ageing and individual support (for example, Certificate IV in Disability, Certificate IV in Ageing Support and Certificate III in Individual Support). Each of these courses has as an elective unit titled 'respond to suspected abuse'.²⁴⁷ This unit covers a broad range of abuse but could be developed to cover family violence. Alternatively, the relevant courses could be mandated to include a unit or units on family violence. Units on family violence currently exist as either mandatory or elective units in other courses, such as community services, social housing, alcohol and other drugs, mental health and family dispute resolution.²⁴⁸

The Victorian Government should work with the Commonwealth Government to ensure that a unit addressing family violence is made a core, rather than elective unit in these courses. The Victorian Government should also require through its accreditation, contracting and funding arrangements with relevant aged care service providers that all of their workers, both current and future, have undertaken appropriate family violence training. As the Victorian and the Commonwealth Governments have a dual role in relation to different service providers, the Victorian Government should work with the Commonwealth Government to encourage it to adopt a similar approach to its accreditation, contracting and funding arrangements with those aged care service providers for which it has responsibility.

We make recommendations on general and targeted training on family violence against older people as part of an industry plan in Chapter 40.

In order to more accurately identify and manage family violence risks, service providers will need to improve their sharing of information. In Chapter 7, it is envisioned that certain organisations (including those providing services to older people) will be prescribed in order to empower them to share information to manage the risk of family violence. This is also described in Chapter 6. For this to be effective, staff in these organisations will require training on family violence.

In Chapter 6 we recommend a review and development of the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or CRAF. As part of this review, research and consultation should be undertaken to ensure that the CRAF can respond effectively to the risks of family violence against older people. As discussed, prescribed organisations, such as those that provide home and community care programs and aged care assessment services, will need to use this revised CRAF (or a CRAF consistent tool).

The Commission also notes and supports initiatives such as the St Vincent's Hospital model. A model such as this should be adapted for use in other hospitals and other environments, such as aged care facilities.

Recommendation 154

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government [within 12 months] to:

- ▷ ensure that the Human Resource Management Standard in the Community Care Common Standards Guide specifies that workers delivering services must have successfully completed certified training in identifying family violence and responding to it
- ▷ review the existing Community Services Training Package courses relevant to providing ageing support to ensure that each course has a core, rather than elective, unit that adequately covers all manifestations of family violence.

Building the capacity of specialist family violence services

Although better training of service providers will improve their response to family violence against older people, education programs are not a complete solution. There is a need for increased government investment in workforce development and greater support for statewide services that are currently seeking to address these needs, for example, by building the capacity of Seniors Rights Victoria to provide expertise to support other service providers including family violence services. This would facilitate better referrals, mutual learning and ultimately better outcomes for older people who are experiencing family violence. In 'Family violence and diversity', we recommend that Seniors Rights Victoria should be supported with ongoing additional funding, to reflect Victoria's ageing population.

In Chapter 22 we recommend that the Victorian Government develop a restorative justice pilot program for victims of family violence. This may be of particular benefit to older victims of family violence, who wish to preserve their family relationships or avoid a criminal justice response.

In Chapter 32 we discuss male victims, who include older men who are victims of elder abuse. Older male victims should have access to appropriate help and support.

In 'Family violence and diversity', we recommend that the Department of Health and Human Services should review and update standards for family violence (including men's behaviour change programs). In particular, standards should address the behaviour of perpetrators of family violence against older people, including where these perpetrators are older and may be affected by age-related issues. In addressing the behaviour of men and women who abuse an older family member, behaviour change programs should take into account the attitudes and behaviours which contribute to it, including ageism.

Accommodation

There is a need for more accommodation options for older victims of family violence. Crisis accommodation designed for women and children may not be appropriate to meet the needs of older victims. Consideration must be given to the needs of older victims. It cannot be assumed that their needs can simply be met by accommodation in aged care facilities. The preference of many older victims to remain in their homes and community must be respected. With appropriate support they should be empowered to stay at home safely, if they choose.

Meeting the accommodation needs of older women (and some older men) with limited financial resources may be the only effective way of protecting them from violence. For those who choose to leave their homes, an increase in appropriate and affordable housing is needed.

In Chapter 9, we make recommendations to improve crisis accommodation and to address the longer-term housing needs of family violence victims, including a proposal for individual packages of support, encompassing long-term rental subsidies and other supports. This proposal may be particularly appropriate for older women who are economically disadvantaged and currently face the dual barriers of age discrimination and unaffordable rents in the private rental market. Part of our proposal is for support around employment assistance, which will be relevant to older people of working age who again face age discrimination. For those of non-working age, or otherwise are on a low income, the Commission notes that where private rental is not affordable, other housing options, including social housing, will be required.

Strengthening investigation processes

While there are gaps in investigative processes for family violence perpetrated against older people, we do not consider that a mandatory reporting regime is the best way to deal with this problem. Mandatory reporting would impinge upon the autonomy of older people to make decisions about what is in their own best interests and would be inconsistent with the idea that people should have choices about the types of care and services they wish to receive. It may also make victims more reticent to disclose violence. Any mandatory reporting regime would have to be supported by a comprehensive system to investigate and respond to reports.

In relation to abuse in aged care facilities, we note that providers should have mechanisms in place to prevent and identify abuse of residents and take action promptly to address any that occurs. The culture and processes must support identification and reporting of abuse by carers and co-residents. Where a family-like relationship exists, the Family Violence Protection Act may apply. Otherwise, the Personal Safety Intervention Orders Act 2010 (Vic) and the criminal and civil law are available. In all circumstances, however, the aged care provider remains responsible for the care of the victim and should adopt victim-centred responses.

In Chapter 31, we discuss the Ombudsman's recommendation that an independent oversight body be established. This oversight body would not be relevant to the substantial number of older people who do not have a disability.

To this end, we recommend that Victoria Police should increase its capacity to address family violence against older people. This should encompass strengthening its capacity to respond to allegations of elder abuse, including investigating financial abuse. In order to achieve this increased capability, greater training for police on family violence against older people will be important.

Recommendation 155

Victoria Police, with advice from the Priority Community Division, scope options for a trial of a dedicated family violence and elder abuse response team in one Victoria Police local service area. The team should have the capacity to investigate financial abuse [within 2 years].

Expanding the definition

While neglect can be a form of family violence, we do not consider that the Family Violence Protection Act needs to expressly refer to it. Many forms of neglect, such as withholding an older person's medication or restricting their mobility, would be caught by the current definition of family violence (which includes behaviour that is physically abusive, coercive or in any other way controls or dominates a family member).²⁴⁹ Such behaviour may also be covered by the criminal law; for example, offences of causing injury intentionally or recklessly.²⁵⁰ In our view, making explicit reference to neglect in the Act is not necessary.

Endnotes

- 1 World Health Organization, Definition of an older or elderly person <<http://www.who.int/healthinfo/survey/ageingdefnolder/en/>>. This definition is also used by the Australian Bureau of Statistics: Australia Bureau of Statistics, Disability, Ageing and Carers, Australia: Summary of Findings, 2012' (Catalogue No 4430.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, November 2013) Glossary.
- 2 For example, Seniors Rights Victoria assists people aged 60 years or over, or people approaching that age if they have age-related disabilities or illnesses and assists Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people from the age of 45: Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 11.
- 3 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), s 5(1).
- 4 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 12–15.
- 5 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 9.
- 6 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), s 8(3).
- 7 Australian Bureau of Statistics, '2011 Census Community Profiles: Basic Community Profile' (Australian Bureau of Statistics, March 2013) Victoria Table B01.
- 8 Ibid.
- 9 Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 1, Victoria Table 3.1.
- 10 Ibid.
- 11 Ibid Victoria Table 27.
- 12 A total of 246, 894 people did not state whether they were Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander and 41,622 of these people were aged 65 years and over: Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 7, Victoria Table B01, B07.
- 13 Transcript of Blakey, 11 August 2015, 2595 [25]–2596 [2].
- 14 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 16.
- 15 Transcript of Blakey, 11 August 2015, 2596 [6]–[9].
- 16 Crime Statistics Agency, An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14 (January 2016), Figure 4: Sex and age of affected family members—Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014, 31, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 8 January 2016.
- 17 Frankston City Council, Submission 473, 6–7.
- 18 National Ageing Research Institute, Submission 79, 1.
- 19 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 13.
- 20 Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 8 [28].
- 21 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 16, Figure 4: Sex and age of affected family members – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014, 31.
- 22 Ibid.
- 23 Anonymous, Submission 462, 1.
- 24 Ibid 14.
- 25 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 16, Victoria Police data source, Tab 7, Table 6: Other parties by sex and age, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.
- 26 Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, Attachment 2, 35.
- 27 Transcript of Blakey, 16 July 2015, 463 [16]–[23], [28]–464 [1].
- 28 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015.
- 29 Transcript of Blakey, 11 August 2015, 2596 [19]–[24].
- 30 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 6.
- 31 National Ageing Research Institute in partnership with Seniors Rights Victoria, 'Profile of Elder Abuse in Victoria: Analysis of Data about People Seeking Help from Seniors Rights Victoria—Summary Report' (June 2015) 12.
- 32 The remaining 3.5 per cent were by other family members: Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 7 [25]–8 [28].
- 33 National Ageing Research Institute in partnership with Seniors Rights Victoria, above n 31, 14.
- 34 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 5, 8.
- 35 Ibid s 8(3)(a), (e) and (g).
- 36 Ibid s 8(3).
- 37 Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 7.
- 38 Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015; National Ageing Research Institute, Submission 79, 1; Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 12–13.
- 39 Etienne G Krug et al, 'World Report on Violence and Health' (World Health Organization, 2002) 131.
- 40 Myfan Jordan, 'Inequality and Older Victorians' (May 2015) Autumn, Community Information and Support Victoria.
- 41 Ibid.
- 42 Ibid.
- 43 COTA, 'Voices of Older People: Feeling Invisible—You Really Start to Look in the Mirror and Ask 'Am I Really Here?'' (2015) 2.
- 44 Jordan, above n 40.
- 45 Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015; Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 13; Christopher King et al, 'For Love or Money: Intergenerational Management of Older Victorians' Assets—Protecting Elders Assets Study' (Monash University, Eastern Health Clinical School, May 2011) 7, 9–10.
- 46 Anonymous, Submission 462, 1.
- 47 Bonnie Brandl and Jane A Raymond, 'Policy Implications of Recognizing That Caregiver Stress Is Not the Primary Cause of Elder Abuse' (2012) 36(3) Generations 32, 36–7 citing Marie-Therese Connolly, A Hidden Crime, The Washington Post (Online), 27 January 2008 <<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/01/25/AR2008012502774.html?sid=ST2008012801239>>.
- 48 National Ageing Research Institute, Submission 79, 2.
- 49 Brandl and Raymond, above n 47, 34 referring to Mark S Lachs and Karl Pillemer, 'Elder Abuse' (2004) 364(9441) The Lancet 1263, 1265.
- 50 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 24 April 2015.
- 51 John Clarkson and Joanne McArthur, Submission 119, 12.
- 52 Use of the term 'elderly' within the submission: ibid 13–14.
- 53 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 11.
- 54 Ibid.
- 55 Ibid.
- 56 Ibid.
- 57 Ibid.
- 58 State of Victoria, Submission 717, Attachment 2, 13.
- 59 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 8.
- 60 Ibid 31.

- 61 Ibid 8.
- 62 Department of Human Services, 'With Respect to Age—2009: Victorian Government Practice Guidelines for Health Services and Community Agencies for the Prevention of Elder Abuse' (June 2009) iii.
- 63 Ibid.
- 64 Department of Health, 'Elder Abuse Prevention and Response Guidelines for Action 2012–14' (2012).
- 65 Department of Human Services, above n 62, 96.
- 66 State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix B, 5.
- 67 Ibid.
- 68 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 24th Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum: 12.3 'Older People Experiencing Abuse' (17–18 June 2015), 2, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 69 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 22.
- 70 Statement of Diver, 3 August 2015, 36 [134].
- 71 Ibid 37 [136].
- 72 Department of Human Services, above n 62, 45.
- 73 Department of Health, above n 64; ibid 39.
- 74 Department of Human Services, above n 62, 19–38.
- 75 Ibid 42–8.
- 76 Ibid 45.
- 77 Ibid Ibid.
- 78 Ibid 1.
- 79 Ibid 76; Rosemary Mann et al, 'Norma's Project: A Research Study into the Sexual Assault of Older Women in Australia (Research Study, La Trobe University, June 2014) 27; Knox City Council, Submission 227, 16; Sarah Wendt et al, 'Seeking Help for Domestic Violence: Exploring Rural Women's Coping Experiences' (Landscapes: State of Knowledge Paper, No 04, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, July 2015) 18.
- 80 Mann et al, above n 79, 27.
- 81 Ibid.
- 82 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 11.
- 83 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 21; Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 39; John Clarkson and Joanne McArthur, Submission 119, 11–12.
- 84 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 39.
- 85 Ibid.
- 86 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 31.
- 87 Ibid.
- 88 Victoria Police, 'Code of Practice for the Investigation Family Violence—Edition 3' (2014), 13, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 89 Ibid.
- 90 Ibid.
- 91 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 14.
- 92 Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Benchbook 5.10—Abuse of Older People (14 April 2011) <<http://www.judicialcollege.vic.edu.au/eManuals/FVBBWeb/index.htm#34634.htm>>.
- 93 Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Benchbook 5.10.3.1—Stressed Care-Giver Theory (14 April 2011) <<http://www.judicialcollege.vic.edu.au/eManuals/FVBBWeb/index.htm#34634.htm>>.
- 94 St Vincent's Health Australia, Submission 833, 14.
- 95 Ibid 15.
- 96 Ibid 16.
- 97 Transcript of O'Brien, 12 August 2015, 2818 [3]–[10].
- 98 Statement of Gallagher, 10 August 2015, 8 [41].
- 99 Ibid.
- 100 Ibid.
- 101 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 34–7.
- 102 Ibid 36.
- 103 Ibid 37.
- 104 Ibid 33.
- 105 Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 7.
- 106 Ibid.
- 107 Seniors Rights Victoria, 'Online Elder Abuse Tool Kit' <<http://www.seniorsrights.org.au/toolkit/toolkit/>>.
- 108 Maroondah City Council, Submission 180, 4.
- 109 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 68, 3.
- 110 Mann et al, above n 79, 1.
- 111 Ibid.
- 112 Ibid 2.
- 113 Ibid 61.
- 114 Ibid.
- 115 Ibid 2.
- 116 Council of Australian Governments, 'National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010-2022' (2011) 16.
- 117 Mann et al, above n 79, 63, citing Council of Australian Governments, above n 116.
- 118 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 6. See also Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 26.
- 119 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 13–14.
- 120 Ibid.
- 121 Moreland Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission 932, 13–14.
- 122 Inner East Community Health, Submission 438, 2.
- 123 Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 1; Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 5; Moreland Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission 932, 10; Wyndham City Council, Submission 518, 23; Transcript of Blakey, 16 July 2015, 464 [23]–[31].
- 124 Mann et al, above n 79, 21.
- 125 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 17.
- 126 Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015, 4; Inner East Community Health, Submission 438, 2.

- 127 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 28–9; St Kilda Legal Service Co-op Limited—02, Submission 171, 8; Transcript of Blakey, 16 July 2015, 464 [23]–465 [1].
- 128 Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015, 3.
- 129 Tanvir Ahmed and Glenys Bransgrove, Submission 871, 3; Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 1.
- 130 Transcript of Blakey, 16 July 2015, 464 [1]–[16].
- 131 Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 6.
- 132 Ibid.
- 133 Ibid.
- 134 Dr John Chesterman, 'Responding to Violence, Abuse, Exploitation and Neglect: Improving Our Protection of At-Risk Adults' (Report for the Winston Churchill Memorial Trust of Australia, 2013) 5.
- 135 Other partners included the Waterloo Regional Police Service, the Kitchener-Waterloo Multicultural Centre, White Owl (an association of urban Aboriginal people) and the Community Justice Initiatives of Waterloo Region: Arlene Groh and Rick Linden, 'Addressing Elder Abuse: The Waterloo Restorative Justice Approach to Elder Abuse Project' (2011) 23(2) Journal of Elder Abuse and Neglect 127, 128.
- 136 Ibid 128–9.
- 137 Ibid.
- 138 Ibid 127.
- 139 Ibid.
- 140 See, eg, Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015.
- 141 See, eg, John Clarkson and Joanne McArthur, Submission 119, 7–9; Anonymous, Submission 403, 5, 11; National Ageing Research Institute, Submission 79, 2.
- 142 Anonymous, Submission 403, 7; National Ageing Research Institute, Submission 79, 2.
- 143 Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 12 [41]; Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 9; Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 7–8, 20; Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 6; Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 2; National Ageing Research Institute, Submission 79, 3; Elder Rights Advocacy, Submission 488, 2; Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 8, 28–29.
- 144 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 30.
- 145 Ibid 31 referring to A Almoguet al, 'Attitudes and Knowledge of Medical and Nursing Staff Towards Elder Abuse' (2010) 51 Archives of Gerontology and Geriatrics 86.
- 146 Ibid 31.
- 147 Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 6.
- 148 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 32. See also Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 9.
- 149 Claudia Cooper, Amber Selwood and Gill Livingston, 'Knowledge, Detection and Reporting of Abuse By Health and Social Care Professionals: A Systematic Review' (2009) 17(10) The American Journal of Geriatric Psychiatry 826, 834–5.
- 150 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 32.
- 151 Ibid 33–4.
- 152 Ibid 37.
- 153 Ibid.
- 154 Transcript of Chesterman, 11 August 2015, 2606 [1]–[31]; Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 12 [42]; St Kilda Legal Service Co-op Limited—02, Submission 171, 10; Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 29; Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 9.
- 155 John Clarkson and Joanne McArthur, Submission 119, 4; Knox City Council, Submission 227, 18; St Kilda Legal Service Co-op Limited—02, Submission 171, 5; Moreland City Community Legal Service, Submission 932, 13.
- 156 Aged Care Act 1997 (Cth) s 63-1AA, 63-1AA (9).
- 157 Aged Care Act 1997 (Cth) s 63-1AA; John Clarkson and Joanne McArthur, Submission 119, 5; St Kilda Legal Services Co-op Limited—02, Submission 171, 6.
- 158 John Clarkson and Joanne McArthur, Submission 119, 7–9; Anonymous, Submission 403, 11.
- 159 John Clarkson and Joanne McArthur, Submission 119, 8–9.
- 160 Ibid.
- 161 Ibid.
- 162 Knox City Council, Submission 227, 17.
- 163 Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 2.
- 164 Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 8; Department of Human Services, above n 62, 2; Transcript of Blakey, 16 July 2015, 482 [19]–[22].
- 165 Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 13 [44].
- 166 Department of Human Services, above n 62, 2.
- 167 National Ageing Research Institute, Submission 79, 3; Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 5; Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 35; City of Melbourne, Submission 798, 19; Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015.
- 168 Tanvir Ahmed and Glenys Bransgrove, Submission 871, 17; Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 1; Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 9.
- 169 Tanvir Ahmed and Glenys Bransgrove, Submission 871, 16–17.
- 170 Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 1.
- 171 Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 9.
- 172 Briony Dow, Why Are We Abusing Our Parents? The Ugly Facts of Family Violence and Ageism (3 February 2016) Australian Institution of Family Studies <<https://aifs.gov.au/cfca/2015/12/08/why-are-we-abusing-our-parents-ugly-facts-family-violence-and-ageism>>.
- 173 Ibid.
- 174 Council of Australian Governments, above 116; Mann et al, above n 79, 63.
- 175 Mann et al, above n 79, 61.
- 176 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 6. See also Moreland Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission 932, 1.
- 177 Moreland Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission 932, 2.
- 178 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 18; Anonymous, Submission 462, 1.
- 179 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 25, 37.
- 180 Ibid 25.
- 181 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 25; Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 18.
- 182 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 18.
- 183 Ibid.
- 184 Anonymous, Submission 403, 10.
- 185 Chesterman, above n 134, 5.
- 186 Victoria Police, 'Victoria Police Blue Paper: A Vision for Victoria Police in 2025' (May 2014) 6.

187 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 8, 36 referring to Chesterman, above n 134, 7, 32.

188 Chesterman, above n 134, 34.

189 Seattle Police Department, Financial Exploitation, Seattle Police Department <<http://www.seattle.gov/police/safety/elderabuse/financial.htm>>.

190 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 21.

191 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 21 referring to Chesterman, above n 134, 48.

192 Ibid.

193 Ibid 21.

194 Chesterman, above n 134, 22.

195 Ibid 23.

196 Ibid 22.

197 Mental Health Act 2014 (Vic) ss 213–17.

198 Disability Act 2006 (Vic) ss 3, 28–30.

199 Chesterman, above n 134, 22 referring to Victorian Law Reform Commission, Guardianship (Final Report, 2012) 447.

200 Victorian Law Reform Commission, Guardianship (Final Report, 2012) 455.

201 Ibid 54–5.

202 ARTD Consultants, 'National Disability Insurance Scheme Quality and Safeguarding Framework: Consultation Report' (prepared for Department of Social Services (Cth), 31 August 2015) iv–v.

203 Victorian Ombudsman, 'Reporting and Investigation of Allegations of Abuse in the Disability Sector: Phase 2--Incident Reporting' (December 2015).

204 Ibid 140.

205 See, eg, Ethnic Communities' Council of Victoria, Submission 879, 8; Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566; Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 55.

206 'Many Indigenous women do not access mainstream domestic violence services because they do not feel comfortable with the organisation itself and don't feel that the staff understand their culture, values and needs': Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941. 25. See also Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 4–6; Victoria, Accessibility of Mainstream Services for Aboriginal Victorians, Parl Paper No 325 (2014) 2.

207 Ethnic Communities' Council of Victoria, Submission 879, 8.

208 Ibid.

209 Ibid.

210 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 18.

211 Ibid 10.

212 Richard Coverdale, 'Postcode Justice: Rural and Regional Disadvantage in the Administration of the Law in Victoria' (Deakin University, Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice, July 2011) 77-78.; Bridget Harris, 'Family Violence in the Rural Landscape' (2015) (Autumn/Winter) Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria Advocate 1, 5.

213 Transcript of Blakey, 11 August 2015, 2601 [13]–[16].

214 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 14.

215 Ludo McFerran 'It Could Be You: Female, Single, Older and Homeless' (Report, Homelessness NSW, Older Women's Network NSW, St Vincent de Paul Society and Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, August 2010) 4.

216 Ibid 24.

217 Ibid 34.

218 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare (Cth), The Intersection of Domestic Violence and Homelessness <<http://www.aihw.gov.au/homelessness/domestic-violence-and-homelessness/intersection/>>.

219 In the same period in Victoria, 15.49% were aged 45 years and over: Crime Statistics Agency, above n 16, Specialist Homelessness Service Collection data source, Tab 2, Table 2: Number of support periods for clients seeking assistance for family violence by gender and age of client, July 2011 to June 2014 provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.

220 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 25; Anglicare Australia, 'Rental Affordability Snapshot' (April 2015) 22.

221 Justice Connect Seniors Law, Submission 566, 39.

222 Department of Health & Human Services, Supporting Independent Living, <<https://www2.health.vic.gov.au/ageing-and-aged-care/supporting-independent-living>>. See also Aged Care Guide, Consumer Directed Care (CDC) Flexibility and Choice in the Direction of your Future, Aged Care Guide (21 September 2015) <<https://www.agedcareguide.com.au/consumer-directed-care>>.

223 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 17.

224 Committee for Economic Development in Australia, 'Women in Leadership: Understanding the Gender Gap' (June 2013) 17.

225 McFerran, above n 215, 12 referring to Somali Cerise et al, 'Accumulating Poverty? Women's Experiences of Inequality Over the Lifecycle: An Issues Paper Examining the Gender Gap in Retirement Savings' (Australian Human Rights Commission, September 2009) 27.

226 Helen Kimberley and Bonnie Simons, 'The Brotherhood's Social Barometer: Living the Second Fifty Years' (Brotherhood of St Laurence, December 2009) 47.

227 McFerran, above n 215, 4.

228 Housing for the Aged Action Group and Ethnic Communities' Council of Victoria, 'At Risk of Homelessness: Preventing Homelessness in Older Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Communities' (2015) 10.

229 Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 11 [37]. See also Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 35.

230 Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 11 [38]; Transcript of Pearce, 11 August 2015, 2603 [19–30].

231 Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 2.

232 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 9; Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 11 [37]–[38].

233 See, eg, Department of Human Services, above n 62, 34, 87.

234 Transcript of Blakey, 11 August 2015, 2604 [2]–[31].

235 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 37, 41.

236 Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 11 [38].

237 Transcript of Pearce, 11 August 2015, 2603 [19]–[30].

238 Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 5.

239 Ibid.

240 No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 39.

241 Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 5.

242 Ibid, 5; No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 39.

243 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 41, 51.

244 No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 39.

245 Statement of Blakey, 10 July 2015, 10 [35].

- 246 Community Services and Health Industry Skills Council (Cth), 'CCH Community Services' (Release 3.0, 8 December 2015).
- 247 Ibid.
- 248 Ibid.
- 249 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5(1).
- 250 Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 18.

28 Culturally and linguistically diverse communities

Introduction

The Commission's terms of reference require it to consider the needs and experiences of people affected by family violence, having particular regard to, among others, people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities.

Although family violence occurs across all cultural and socio-economic groups, the experience of violence and the service response to it can vary markedly for different ethnic and cultural communities. This chapter provides an overview of the information the Commission received about the experiences of people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities and makes recommendations to improve responses to people affected by family violence in these communities. In doing so we recognise that there is a diversity of communities within the broad umbrella term of 'CALD'. The experiences of CALD children and young people are discussed in Chapter 10.

The literature shows that people from CALD communities are disproportionately affected by family violence and are more likely than people of Anglo-Australian background to face barriers to obtaining help. Evidence before the Commission supports the view that the social and economic marginalisation experienced by many people from CALD backgrounds and especially those who have recently arrived in Australia, adds a further layer of complexity to their experience of family violence.

Faith can also play an important role in the experiences of family violence for some people in CALD communities, and can affect their access to services. The Commission explores the role of faith communities in preventing and responding to family violence in Chapter 29.

Women from CALD backgrounds experience the same forms of family violence as the broader community, namely violence based on domination and control by their intimate partners. Family violence can also manifest differently and can have different effects in specific cultural settings.

The risk of people from CALD backgrounds experiencing family violence can also be exacerbated if they live in rural, regional and remote areas where they are isolated and there is a lack of appropriate support services.

The meaning of 'culturally and linguistically diverse'

The term 'culturally and linguistically diverse', or 'CALD', refers to people from a range of countries and ethnic and cultural groups. It includes people of non-English speaking background as well as people born outside Australia but whose first language is English. For the purposes of this report, CALD refers to migrants, refugees and humanitarian entrants, international students, unaccompanied minors, trafficked women and tourists. Far from suggesting a homogenous group, it encompasses a wide range of experiences and needs.

The first section of this chapter explores the prevalence of family violence in CALD communities. This section also considers prevention programs in CALD communities.

The second section of this chapter recounts the experiences of CALD victims, including experiences of social isolation and cultural attitudes that facilitate family violence in their communities. Particular forms of family violence experienced by some CALD women, including forced marriage, female genital mutilation and dowry-related abuse, are considered. The impacts of a lack of knowledge and understanding of the Australian legal and support systems, trauma associated with pre-arrival experiences and immigration status vulnerabilities are explored. Issues with accessing services and interpreters are also considered.

In the final section of this chapter, the Commission recommends that the capacity of universal and specialist services to respond to family violence in CALD communities be improved. This should include ensuring professional and independent interpreting services. The Commission further recommends that there be legislative reform to better recognise the ways in which the current definition of ‘family violence’ encompasses forms of family violence that may be experienced by people from CALD backgrounds.

Context

This section briefly explores Victoria’s cultural diversity and the prevalence of family violence in CALD communities. It then considers current family violence prevention and early intervention programs targeted to CALD communities.

Cultural diversity in Victoria

Victoria has one of the most culturally diverse populations in Australia. The 2011 census found:

- ▷ 26.2 per cent of Victorians were born overseas in one of more than 200 countries—an increase from 23.8 per cent in 2006¹
- ▷ 46.8 per cent of Victorians were either born overseas or had at least one parent born overseas—an increase from 43.6 per cent in 2006²
- ▷ 23.1 per cent of Victorians spoke a language other than English at home—an increase from 20.4 per cent in 2006.³

The table below shows the top 10 languages other than English spoken at home in Victoria.

Table 28.1 Top 10 languages other than English spoken at home: Victoria, 2006 and 2011

Language	2006			2011			Change 2006 to 2011
	No.	(%)	Australia (%)	No.	(%)	Australia (%)
Italian	133,328	2.7	1.6	124,857	2.3	1.4	-8,471
Greek	117,871	2.4	1.3	116,825	2.2	1.2	-1,046
Mandarin	64,384	1.3	1.1	103,793	1.9	1.6	+39,409
Vietnamese	72,154	1.5	1.0	86,596	1.6	1.1	+14,442
Cantonese	66,858	1.4	1.2	72,904	1.4	1.2	+6,046
Arabic	55,927	1.1	1.2	68,416	1.3	1.3	+12,489
Turkish	29,748	0.6	0.3	32,849	0.6	0.3	+3,101
Hindi	18,175	0.4	0.4	32,739	0.6	0.5	+14,564
Punjabi	8,212	0.2	0.1	31,052	0.6	0.3	+22,840
Filipino/Tagalog	21,942	0.4	0.5	30,995	0.6	0.6	+9,053

Note: profile.id uses data collected from the Australian Bureau of Statistics census.
 Source: Victoria: Language Spoken at Home (21 January 2016), profile.id,
<http://profile.id.com.au/australia/language?WebID=110>

Within Victoria and nationally there is considerable diversity between different CALD communities, including the length of time people have been established in Australia, their pre-arrival experiences, and the conditions in their countries of origin.

Categories of immigration entry also vary, along with immigration experiences before permanent settlement, particularly for asylum seekers subject to detention.

Birthplace data also masks important differences within communities, including factors such as social status or background, education level, gender, age, disability, sexuality and faith.⁴

Prevalence of family violence in CALD communities

Evidence regarding the prevalence of family violence in CALD communities is inconclusive.⁵ There is no reliable data available to provide a clear picture of the scale of the problem.⁶ The deficiencies in prevalence and incidence data⁷ (discussed in Chapter 3) are exacerbated in CALD communities. As noted in a recent paper by Australia's National Research Organisations for Women's Safety (ANROWS), 'the available large-scale, population-based data sets rarely enable analysis of the specific [family violence] experiences of immigrant and refugee women as compared to other women in countries of resettlement'.⁸ Furthermore, family violence data is likely to significantly understate the extent of the problem as conceptions of what constitutes family violence differ and language barriers often inhibit communication and disclosure.⁹

On 7 August 2015 the Commonwealth Government announced $160,000 in funding for a 'diversity data' project to be carried out by ANROWS.¹⁰ The project will examine how CALD women, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and women with disabilities experience violence and identify options for improving future data collection.¹¹

Survey data

Survey data suggests there is a slightly higher rate of violence in the Australian born population. The 2012 Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey found that Australian-born women were more likely to report experiencing violence since the age of 15 years than those born overseas.¹² In the Australian component of the 2004 International Violence against Women Survey, women from English-speaking backgrounds reported higher levels of violence compared with women from non-English speaking backgrounds.¹³ It is, however, important to note the limitations of this survey: CALD women might be both less likely to participate in a survey and less likely to openly discuss violence with a survey interviewer.¹⁴

Specialist family violence services data

There is inconsistent data regarding the representation of CALD women in the client group of specialist family violence services in Victoria. This may reflect access barriers as well as limitations of and differences in data sets.

Demographic data from the Integrated Reporting Information System (IRIS) on clients accessing women and children's family violence services in 2013–14 shows that 84 per cent of clients were born in Australia and 13 per cent identified that they were born in another country. In three per cent of cases the client's country of birth could not be ascertained.¹⁵

Individual service data, however, paints a different picture and more closely reflects patterns of settlement on a regional and local basis. For example, Women's Health West Inc. reports that in 2013–14, 47 per cent of women who received case management support identified themselves as coming from a CALD background and 44 per cent of residents in their crisis accommodation service did not speak English as their first language and required an interpreter to communicate.¹⁶

Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre data

At a statewide service level, Safe Steps data indicates that in 2014:

- ▷ one third of all supported clients were born outside Australia
- ▷ twenty-one per cent identified as culturally and linguistically diverse
- ▷ five per cent required an interpreter.¹⁷

The Safe Steps submission further advised the Commission that in the period January–April 2015 eleven per cent of their clients did not have permanent residency.¹⁸

Statistics collated by the Domestic and Family Violence Crisis Lines of Australia Network captured the number of calls received by the network's member services (including Safe Steps in Victoria) from women without permanent residency. The member services recorded contact from 421 women without permanent residency from October to December 2014; 328 of these cases involved children.¹⁹ The network reported that the patterns of abuse among women without permanent residency were broadly consistent with those among women who do have permanent residency, although instances of economic abuse were proportionally higher, as were death threats.²⁰

Preventing family violence in CALD communities

The need for a focus on preventing family violence was identified in both the Second Action Plan of the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022 and the National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey report.

The Commission heard that a 'one-size-fits-all' approach to preventing family violence is not successful for CALD communities. As the Whittlesea Community Futures Partnership submission noted, 'The experience of family violence in CALD communities is complex and requires an appropriate mix of tailored prevention and early intervention strategies to be adopted'.²¹ This includes strengthening the capacity of CALD communities themselves to identify and respond to family violence. For example, a recent paper published by ANROWS highlighted the importance of consulting and involving community elders and leaders in developing culturally appropriate prevention strategies.²²

AMES report

AMES Australia and VicHealth recently published a report focusing on actions to prevent violence against women in CALD communities. Based on national community consultations, the report noted:

This focus is important to ensure the safety and wellbeing of women from CALD backgrounds, to meet policy commitments to multiculturalism, access and equity, gender equality and human rights, and to ensure that the economic and social benefits of migration for all are realised.²³

The report argued that redressing social exclusion, stigma, and racism affecting CALD communities is a crucial foundation for prevention:

These conditions can increase the risk of violence against women in CALD communities by isolating communities, working against acculturation and negatively affecting responses to and by CALD women affected by violence. This in turn undermines the prospects of men being held accountable for violence and therefore of establishing social norms against this behaviour.²⁴

The report found that, although many CALD communities will be effectively reached by initiatives delivered to the population as a whole, the communities and groups most likely to require tailored approaches and needing to be given priority in prevention efforts, are CALD groups with large proportions of recent arrivals, new and emerging communities, and longstanding migrant groups affected by social exclusion.²⁵

The importance of involving CALD men is also noted:

The majority of CALD men do not use violence, and they are important allies and partners in prevention. Engaging non-violent men can help prevent 'backlash' and deal more effectively with it should it arise ... In most forms of [violence against women] the majority of perpetrators are men and certain aspects of masculine roles, identities and peer associations are well established risk factors for this violence. Addressing these by working with CALD men and boys, and the contexts shaping their responses to violence is a critical component of prevention efforts.²⁶

The report concludes that prevention in CALD communities involves a two-pronged approach:

- ... activities tailored to and engaging specific communities and the contexts affecting their practices and norms
- ensuring that approaches designed to reach the general population are relevant to people from CALD backgrounds.²⁷

The report also reviewed projects conducted between 2004 and 2014 with the aim of preventing violence against women. It found few such projects in the years up until 2007. The report stated:

CALD communities responded to campaigns that are run at community levels, developed within a cultural framework they understand, and rather than having a particular focus on violence, are positive about families and the behaviours and conditions likely to support healthy family relationships.²⁸

Prevention initiatives

The Commission was also told about a number of important prevention and early intervention initiatives in CALD communities in Victoria. Some examples are set out in the box below.

Prevention and early intervention initiatives in CALD communities in Victoria

- ▷ The CALD Communities Leading the Way to Respectful Relationships project has sought to raise awareness about gender equality and respectful relationships in Croatian, Indian, Sudanese and Vietnamese communities.²⁹
- ▷ The Whittlesea CALD Communities Family Violence Project has brought together a range of local agencies to design, deliver and evaluate an integrated place-based model for reducing and preventing family violence in Whittlesea's CALD communities.³⁰
- ▷ The Stronger Healthier Indian Families Together, or SHIFT, project, implemented by cohealth in partnership with the Jagriti Forum, works with Indian men and women living in Wyndham and Brimbank.³¹
- ▷ The CALD Community Engagement Project led by Minerva Community Services works to empower the Karen and Karenni communities to deal with family violence from within the community.³²
- ▷ The Living in Harmony project, auspiced by cohealth, provides training to CALD community members living in Collingwood's housing estates so that they can facilitate respectful relationships events in their communities.³³
- ▷ The Health Justice Partnership between InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence and Dandenong Hospital will see InTouch establish an outreach clinic at Dandenong Hospital and provide hospital staff with training in identifying and helping CALD victims of family violence.³⁴ Chapter 19 discusses health justice partnerships.
- ▷ With funding from the Legal Services Board, Victoria Legal Aid delivered the Settled and Safe community education program, providing training to settlement workers on family violence, plus community education with newly arrived communities.³⁵

Community awareness and information

A number of submissions noted the importance of involving community media, such as local newspapers, radio and television.³⁶ Information about family violence and support services should be delivered by means of community networks, culturally-specific media services, and other familiar sources of information and assistance in CALD communities.³⁷

The vital role that culturally-specific media can play in disseminating family violence information has previously been acknowledged.³⁸ One consultation participant stated:

Use AMES and other English language programs. You have a captive audience. You can talk about family violence laws, child protection laws. We can't let 'I didn't know that was against the law' be an excuse.³⁹

Another matter raised in the community consultations and submissions concerned the provision of information to women before their arrival in Australia. On 7 August 2015 the Australian Government launched a pre-departure information pack for women moving to Australia to be with their partner.⁴⁰ The pack contains information about family violence, sexual assault, forced and early marriage, and family violence associated with partner visas. It also gives women information about their rights under Australian law and provides details of who to contact if a woman needs assistance.⁴¹

Women told the Commission there should be follow-up by case workers as part of settlement programs.⁴² The Commission also heard that the Department of Immigration and Border Protection should offer its front-line officers training in identifying and responding to family violence, so that they can refer women to suitable services.⁴³

Helping victims recover

As discussed in Chapters 20 and 21, because of the serious and long-term effects of family violence, it is important that support is provided to all victims to help them recover after the immediate crisis.

An InTouch initiative offers culturally appropriate group counselling for CALD women. The counselling program is developed in response to the needs of the specific community and is delivered by bilingual workers (with interpreters where necessary) together with partner agencies in the community.⁴⁴

The Commission was advised that InTouch also provides opportunities for CALD women to participate in the community and enjoy time with friends and family in a supportive environment. It recently ran a three-day camp for Turkish women and their children with the aim of offering families who had experienced family violence an 'opportunity to spend an enjoyable and therapeutic time together in a safe and engaging environment'.⁴⁵ It reported that the camp allowed women to re-connect with their children, make friends, realise they 'were not alone' and that the violence was not their fault.⁴⁶

Economic participation through education and employment is also an important part of successful migrant settlement. Helping CALD women move towards economic recovery and preventing the violence from occurring in the first place have both personal and social benefits:

Violence against CALD women undermines their economic and civic participation both within communities and in the wider community. This ultimately compromises the strength of CALD communities, and the broader social and economic benefits of migration for Australia. This is of particular concern given Australia's increasing dependence on women migrants to fill certain skill gaps such as in the caring sector.⁴⁷

Challenges

The Commission received a variety of evidence recounting the specific experience and challenges that CALD victims face. This section explores these issues and challenges.

CALD people's experiences

Although each person has a different experience of family violence, there were consistent themes in the evidence presented to the Commission about the particular challenges CALD victims face.

Social isolation

Isolation from family and community was a common feature of many CALD people's experience. One woman told the Commission, 'I felt that all of Australia belonged to my husband and I didn't belong'.⁴⁸

CALD women might be living far from their family and have limited access to support within the community because they are dependent on their partner for money, transport and language. This is especially the case if a person's partner has been in Australia for some time and so has better English language skills, greater knowledge of culture, and more contacts in the community. As one woman said, 'The men are so clever in making a gap between the girl and the community'.⁴⁹

In many cases men deliberately isolated their partners from contact with their family and friends.⁵⁰ Victims spoke of their partners and extended family denying them access to telephones, the internet, employment opportunities and transport:

I was abused not just by my husband but also by my mother-in-law and sister-in-law and my father-in-law. Initially they stopped me from getting out of the house. I wasn't aware that I could apply for a bank account by myself. He said that because he was a resident and I was a 'visitor' ... I wasn't allowed and I believed him. I wasn't allowed to talk to anyone. He wouldn't let me use the phone and I didn't know what I could do.⁵¹

In particular, some men exerted control over their partners by not allowing them to attend English language classes; in this way the men remain the 'gatekeepers' of all information. Such a situation compounded the victim's isolation and greatly restricted their access to information and support in the community.⁵²

Social isolation—especially lack of access to transport—made it difficult for those seeking to leave an abusive relationship:

One woman called the police and her husband was taken away. After three days where she hadn't been able to take her kids to school, she couldn't do the shopping. She ended up calling up and asking her husband to come home.⁵³

Deciding to leave an abusive relationship also resulted in some people, particularly women, being ostracised by their family and community, exacerbating their distress and leading some to return to violent relationships. After being granted a family violence intervention order designed to exclude her husband from the family home, one woman had the following experience:

X came to Australia ... to live with her new husband. Since coming to Australia she has very rarely left the house. She knows very little English and doesn't know how to drive or use public transport. After the birth of their son, her husband has become increasingly violent towards her. During the most recent incident, her husband punched her repeatedly in the head. A neighbour heard screaming and called the police. They attended and assisted X to take out an intervention order against her husband which excluded him from the property. X presented at [a legal service] seeking assistance to have the order removed. She was worried about having adequate financial support and was struggling to look after her son on her own. Her husband had always driven her to the supermarket, the doctor and other services and she did not know how to get to these services by herself. She felt isolated and alone as neighbours from her community had stopped speaking to her. She said it would just be easier if he could come home, even if it meant that she would be subjected to further violence.⁵⁴

Attitudes to family violence and the role of culture

Factors influencing attitudes to family violence in CALD communities include broader social norms relating to both gender and violence.⁵⁵ The 2013 National Community Attitudes toward Violence Against Women Survey found that people born overseas in non-main English speaking countries are among the groups which have a lower understanding of violence against women and are less likely to reject violence-supportive attitudes.⁵⁶ The survey report noted, 'This is most likely to be due to differences in beliefs and practices regarding violence and relationships between men and women in the countries people come from'.⁵⁷ VicHealth, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates further stated:

Among respondents from non-English speaking countries, country of birth had a stronger influence on attitudes than factors such as education, employment or living in a disadvantaged area ... These differences were still apparent when other factors such as occupation and education were taken into account. However ... both knowledge and attitudes improved with length of time in Australia.⁵⁸

The Commission notes that culture is 'neither fixed nor an inherent feature of particular individuals or groups. Rather it is shaped and therefore can be changed by social and economic forces'.⁵⁹

Ms Joumanah El Matrah, Executive Director of the Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights, gave the following evidence:

... men who are violent against their spouses and children ... often themselves use the cultural defence. It's really typical for men who are violent to have excuses for their violence, anything else other than accepting responsibility. So it's really important at that point that people are well versed in exactly what violence is about and that it's not about culture.⁶⁰

One woman commented, 'It was, and still is, unhelpful when people just dismiss [the violence] as "that's just his cultural background". Dad's behaviour was abusive and I believe it needs to be named as so ...'⁶¹

There is also concern that citing 'culture' as a factor in CALD women's experience of family violence can lead to stereotyping and a 'failure to recognise the existence of diversity of views and beliefs about family violence between and within cultures'.⁶²

Cultural attitudes and practices—such as respect for elders and an obligation to assist community members—can also protect against violence.⁶³

While different cultural backgrounds may not be a cause of family violence, it remains relevant to understanding and responding to family violence within CALD communities.⁶⁴

Reluctance to disclose

The Commission notes that people from CALD backgrounds are generally less likely than members of other groups to speak out about family violence.⁶⁵ Among the main reasons for this are the following:

- ▷ language and literacy barriers⁶⁶
- ▷ social isolation and financial dependence resulting from the absence of established social networks, primary carer responsibilities, unemployment and social, emotional and economic control exercised by their spouse or other family members⁶⁷
- ▷ cultural norms relating to gender roles, sexuality, marriage and divorce⁶⁸
- ▷ shame and stigma associated with seeking help outside the family and community—including contacting police and having them attend at home⁶⁹
- ▷ lack of knowledge about the legal services and support available in Australia⁷⁰
- ▷ fear and mistrust of government, the police and the justice system, as a result of experiences in their country of origin or negative past experiences in Australia—including actual or perceived racism⁷¹

- ▷ a perception that mainstream services will not understand their situation and so will fail to respond appropriately⁷²
- ▷ lack of culturally-specific support services including access to and availability of interpreters⁷³
- ▷ fear of cultural, ethnic or religious misrepresentation, leading to negative stereotyping of their community and culture⁷⁴
- ▷ pre-existing trauma⁷⁵
- ▷ immigration status—for example, women who are living in Australia on Contributor Aged Parent visas may fear deportation⁷⁶
- ▷ logistical difficulties associated with finding a path through what is already a complex system—for example, difficulties caused by having no birth certificate or not knowing one's birth date.

Research by InTouch into barriers for CALD women seeking access to support services found a 'tendency to minimise the seriousness of family violence': one participant said she thought yelling and sexual abuse were 'part of being married ... [he] kept telling me I am his property'.⁷⁷

People from a CALD background might not feel empowered to speak out about the abuse they have suffered because there is a perception that family violence is a 'private' matter and should be kept within the home.⁷⁸ One woman told the Commission, 'If there is a big hit or blood this is out of family—you have to call the police. But if it is a small problem it is better to solve it within the family'.⁷⁹

Research indicates that some CALD people may be less inclined to disclose family violence for 'fear of escalating racist responses' to their communities.⁸⁰ The Commission heard that some women felt judged and not listened to when the violence they had experienced was 'blamed' on their culture and that there was a common perception among police, lawyers and judges that family violence was the 'norm' in some cultures when it is not.⁸¹ For example, a recent report from the Department of Social Services noted, 'Some Muslim women do not want to discuss or report family violence or sexual assault in case the issues are framed as specifically Muslim problems and increase prejudice against them'.⁸²

Economic dependence was cited as another reason for failing to speak out: 'If we separate from our husbands, how will we survive financially? We don't have any choice but to stay in silence'.⁸³

A recent paper published by ANROWS reported that CALD women tend to endure family violence for many years. If they eventually seek help this is usually because of the increased severity of the violence, their coping strategies no longer being effective and growing concerns for the welfare of children.⁸⁴

Difficulties with leaving a violent relationship

A number of women told the Commission of the difficulties they experienced when leaving a violent relationship because divorce was not acceptable in their community.⁸⁵

Because in my culture if you are separated from your husband your family members will disown you ... they don't want to help you. They say go back to your husband. So in that case, women just keep themselves quiet.⁸⁶

Women who have been raised in patriarchal societies in which traditional gender roles are upheld can have little autonomy and can be subject to the decision making of their husbands, fathers or other male members of the community. One woman told the Commission:

I've been in an abusive relationship all my life, from childhood. Mine was more culture because I come from Afghanistan and it's normal that men have the power and you should just be quiet.⁸⁷

Shakti Australia noted, 'Asian, African and Middle Eastern cultures are honour-based cultures and as such seeking access to family violence services and leaving marital relationships is seen as bringing shame on the family'.⁸⁸

Ms El Matrah told the Commission:

... some women they do experience a range of restrictions that are tied to their cultural [identity]. One may be a generalised prohibition within their community around not breaking the family apart and the blame that targets women when they try and leave a violent situation. Often their families actively try to restrict them from accessing assistance and help.⁸⁹

During a community consultation the Commission was told that one woman had been married since the age of 14 years, and each of her sexual encounters had amounted to rape. She said she hoped her husband would marry someone else without having to divorce her, so that she could 'avoid the shame and loss of status'.⁹⁰ She added that 'women are going to choose violence every time rather than being shamed by their community'.⁹¹

Some women also experienced difficulty leaving because of attitudes towards divorce in their faith community; this is discussed in Chapter 29.

In addition, the Commission heard that leaving a violent home can be especially difficult for young CALD people because alternative accommodation options such as refuges and foster care might not be culturally appropriate and there might be a lack of culturally competent staff.⁹² The absence of viable alternatives can aggravate the isolation these young people already feel and cause them to return to their violent home.⁹³

Some CALD women might also be fearful of separating from their violent partner if they come from a culture in which the father traditionally takes sole custody of the children after a separation. They might fear that their ex-partner will remove the children from Australia or that a court may order that the children live with their father.⁹⁴

Lack of information

CALD victims often lack knowledge of what constitutes family violence and the support services available for victims. Organisations that provide services for newly arrived communities reported it was not commonly understood that family violence is prohibited in Australia and that such violence includes psychological, sexual and financial abuse as well as physical abuse.⁹⁵

Some CALD women come from countries where family violence is not a crime or where there are weak legal sanctions. Indeed, there remains a perception in some communities that a husband has a 'right' to discipline his wife.

Research with CALD women indicates that the concept of sexual assault within marriage is not widely understood in some communities.⁹⁶ Many CALD women believe it is their duty as wives to engage in sexual intercourse with their partner and are unaware that they can consent to some sexual activities and refuse others.⁹⁷

A lack of understanding about their rights and limited knowledge of the availability of support services and the ability of police and the courts to intervene in family violence matters present barriers to CALD victims seeking safety. In particular, CALD women often do not know who to contact after experiencing family violence, even if they have been living in Australia for many years:⁹⁸

And when [women experiencing family violence] approach the legal system, it is not cultural and they get another knock back and then they go back to their husbands and get more family violence. They don't know anything. Not even to know how to ring 000. The boy is often living here for five years and he knows Australia and the girls don't know anything.⁹⁹

As noted, some husbands can deliberately isolate their wives and contribute to their ignorance about the law: 'He knew too much about the law ... here. I lived in fear because I knew nothing'.¹⁰⁰

Pre-arrival trauma

Pre-migration experiences have [a] big impact on issues around family violence and when they happen once families arrive in Australia.¹⁰¹

Settlement is not a moment in time, or a period in time, it is a life long journey and even if a person has a very smooth migration experience, it is still traumatic.¹⁰²

Among the traumatic pre-arrival experiences of members of CALD communities—especially refugees and asylum seekers—can be the following:

- ▷ exposure to violence and abuses of human rights—including death, torture and sexual violence
- ▷ forced displacement
- ▷ prolonged periods in refugee camps
- ▷ loss and separation from family members
- ▷ deprivation of cultural and religious institutions and practices
- ▷ periods of extreme poverty—including limited access to shelter, food and safe drinking water
- ▷ prolonged uncertainty about the future
- ▷ severe constraints on access to health services, education, employment and income support.¹⁰³

The trauma can be exacerbated by difficulties encountered on arrival in a new country—including adjusting to different values and expectations, financial pressures, lack of social networks and supports, and changes in family dynamics, such as young people shouldering more responsibility and advocating on behalf of their family because they have better English language skills.¹⁰⁴

Pre-arrival experiences can increase the incidence of family violence. Some CALD families come to Australia to escape war and other violence in their home countries.¹⁰⁵ Foundation House's work with refugees led it to submit that 'the psychological effects of experiencing the normalization of violence in countries at war may be contributing factors for intimate partner violence'.¹⁰⁶ Frustration, anxiety and anger arising from traumatic pre-arrival experiences can be directed at family members, including children.¹⁰⁷

These experiences can also prevent victims from reporting the violence to police and gaining access to support services.

Refugees and asylum seekers have often experienced ill-treatment or have been inadequately protected from authorities in their country of origin and so can be apprehensive about reporting matters to the police or seeking assistance from other authorities.¹⁰⁸

Immigration status

Many submissions the Commission received emphasised the particular vulnerability of CALD victims who do not have permanent residency.¹⁰⁹ They can be dependent on their partner for their visa status—for example, women on partner visas or those whose partners are the primary visa holder on working, student or tourist visas.¹¹⁰ Uncertainty about visa status can increase the risk of violence in a number of ways.

People from CALD backgrounds without permanent residency can feel they are unable to leave an abusive relationship because doing so will have consequences for their visa status—for example, possible deportation to their country of origin and loss of their children. Uncertain visa status can be used by abusive partners or other family members to threaten and control women: a considerable power differential arises when a woman's partner has permanent residency and she does not.¹¹¹ A CALD victim can also be threatened by potential withdrawal of sponsorship of their permanent residency application, having their visa cancelled or having other family members deported. Additionally, they can face harm or ostracism from their family and community if they leave their relationship and return to their country of origin.¹¹²

Some women who sponsored their male partners reported that their partners became abusive once they had obtained permanent residence and no longer required sponsorship.¹¹³

The situation is aggravated by the fact that those without permanent residency have limited access to crisis accommodation, Centrelink benefits, and some health and education services.¹¹⁴

Immigration-related policies that restrict eligibility for welfare support create significant barriers for women seeking to leave situations of family violence, as they have few options for supporting themselves and their children, or to pay for legal and other services that may be required.¹¹⁵

The Commission heard that some refuges are unable to support women who do not have permanent residency because of the cost of full support.¹¹⁶ Although it is Victorian Government policy that women who do not have permanent residency status are eligible for refuge, crisis and transitional accommodation, the cost of providing such support to these women presents significant difficulties.¹¹⁷ The Commission understands that funding of refuges covers operational costs and some basics but does not cover food and other consumables.

As Safe Steps explained, it accommodates women without permanent residency and their children for much longer than other clients because of the difficulties they have gaining access to other services.¹¹⁸ The Commission was told that services with the capacity to support women who do not have an income (such as women without permanent residency status) are 'overburdened and cannot meet the level of demand'.¹¹⁹ In many cases, agreeing to accept these clients imposes significant costs on already-stretched support services.¹²⁰

The Commission also heard that some women who seek and gain refuge accommodation can be required for safety reasons to discontinue study and work while at the refuge, which can result in them breaching the requirements of their visa and facing possible deportation.¹²¹

Furthermore, because of the complexities of migration law, women might need intensive specialist support to prepare visa applications, and such support is limited and available only in urban areas, compounding the disadvantage CALD women living in rural and regional areas can experience.¹²²

Another problematic area identified in submissions concerns those people on Contributory Aged Parent visas, which allow older parents to live in Australia for two years if their children are Australian citizens or permanent residents.¹²³ Older parents may be brought to Australia under these visas to look after grandchildren.¹²⁴ Men and women holding this type of visa are ineligible for Centrelink assistance for 10 years after their arrival and can be dependent on abusive family members because they have no alternative source of income.¹²⁵

Family violence exception for visa applicants

Under the Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth), a woman may be granted permanent residency even if the marriage or de facto relationship on which her immigration status depends has ended, if she can prove that:

- ▷ she and/or a member of her family unit (such as her child) have been victims of family violence¹²⁶
- ▷ she was married to or in a de facto relationship with the perpetrator at the time the violence occurred.¹²⁷

The purpose of these provisions is to ensure that a person does not have to stay in a violent relationship to remain in Australia.¹²⁸

Applicants under this family violence exception must provide evidence to support their claim of violence,¹²⁹ such as an intervention order or criminal conviction or a statutory declaration from the victim or another person on their behalf—for example, a general practitioner, social worker or psychologist.

A review by the Department of Immigration found that the majority of applicants seeking to rely on the exception were in genuine need of assistance.¹³⁰

The family violence exception applies only to specific visa classes; in particular, it does not apply to holders of Prospective Marriage visas. In its report entitled Family Violence and Commonwealth Laws—improving legal frameworks, the Australian Law Reform Commission recommended an extension of the family violence exception to account for vulnerability in various visa streams, including Prospective Marriage visa holders and secondary applicants for onshore permanent visas.¹³¹

A woman is also unable to invoke the family violence exception if the violence is perpetrated by a family member other than her partner. The InTouch submission noted that violence committed by members of the extended family is 'particularly prevalent' in CALD communities; it has had clients who are ineligible for permanent residency under this exception because the violence against them was perpetrated by their mother-in-law, father-in-law, sister-in-law or brother-in-law—even in cases where their partner was aware of and facilitated the violence.¹³²

Specific forms of family violence

The Commission heard that women in some CALD communities experience specific forms of family violence, among them '[d]owry-associated violence, forced marriage, honour killings and, female genital mutilation' and dowry-related violence.¹³³ Some CALD women are also more likely than women from non-immigrant backgrounds to experience violence at the hands of members of their husband's extended family.¹³⁴ In some cultural groups, the expectation that a couple will live with the husband's family and that the wife will be subservient to her in-laws, increases exposure to a wider range of familial violence (beyond intimate partner violence).¹³⁵ Gender inequality and the assertion of male privilege in some cultures can also mean that violence is intergenerational, with boys being socialised to act in controlling and coercive ways towards their mothers and sisters: 'My son is in his 20s. He exactly copies his dad—he says to me most of the time 'shut up'—he treats his sister the same as me.'¹³⁶

A particular concern raised in a number of submissions was elder abuse in CALD communities.¹³⁷ Older women from CALD communities may be at increased risk of elder abuse, especially financial abuse, because of a lack of English language skills and consequent reliance on family members to translate documents and help them negotiate their way through the service system.¹³⁸ In some CALD communities, there is particular stigma attached to residential aged care, which may lead to a refusal to disclose family violence.¹³⁹ Family violence against older people is discussed in Chapter 27.

Religious law and practice, such as a refusal to grant a divorce, can also be vehicles for abuse. This is discussed in Chapter 29.

Forced marriage

Forced marriage occurs when a person marries without free and full consent. It can happen both in Australia (including when a person is brought into the country in order to be married) and when a person is taken to an overseas country for the purpose of a forced marriage.¹⁴⁰ Forced marriages can represent an 'intersection between family violence, sexual exploitation and child protection'.¹⁴¹

The Centre for Multicultural Youth described the practice as a 'unique and important' form of family violence for some young CALD women.¹⁴² People also spoke about forced marriage during the Commission's community consultations:

It's so common here among my relatives to not even ask the young people and to go to Afghanistan and get a person to marry them.¹⁴³

Forced marriage is to be distinguished from arranged marriage, in which a marriage is organised by the families, but the individuals concerned have the right to accept or reject the arrangement.¹⁴⁴

Although it has been reported that 42 cases of forced marriage were referred to the Australian Federal Police between March 2013 and May 2015,¹⁴⁵ little is known about the prevalence of this practice in Australia.

The Centre for Multicultural Youth submitted that 'young women are extremely fearful of refusing [to marry] for fear of losing their family's love and support'.¹⁴⁶ It said women involved in forced marriages are at high risk of mental health problems and suicide, as well as family violence perpetrated by fathers, brothers and mothers to force the woman to cooperate with the marriage.¹⁴⁷

The Commission heard that some young women facing forced marriages who turned to the authorities or professionals for help did not receive appropriate assistance because those from whom it was sought lacked knowledge of the law and the support that is available.¹⁴⁸

The InTouch submission reported:

... an increase in human trafficking for sexual and domestic servitude in recent years, especially in regional areas. Typically, a foreign woman enters into what she believes is an arranged marriage with an Australian citizen, but upon arrival is treated as a slave by her husband, and repeatedly subjected to physical, sexual and other forms of abuse.¹⁴⁹

In Australia, human trafficking, slavery and slavery-like offences (including a specific forced marriage offence) are prohibited under Divisions 270 and 271 of the Criminal Code 1995 (Cth).

A recent report by the Australian Institute of Criminology confirmed that 'marriage and partner migration have been used to facilitate the trafficking of people into Australia', which has resulted not just in labour and sexual exploitation of women but also in exploitation of their 'very personhood'.¹⁵⁰

Female genital mutilation

Female genital mutilation refers to 'all procedures involving partial or total removal of the external female genitalia or other injury to the female genital organs for non-medical reasons'.¹⁵¹ It is sometimes called 'female cutting' or 'female circumcision'.

The practice has been documented in 28 countries in Africa and a few countries in Asia and the Middle East.¹⁵² Migration has led to an increase in the number of women and girls living outside their country of origin who have undergone FGM or are at risk of being subjected to it.¹⁵³ It is known to be harmful and to have both immediate and long-term health impacts.¹⁵⁴

FGM has been illegal in Victoria since 1996.¹⁵⁵ There is no data on its prevalence in the state, although it has been reported that between 600 and 700 women each year seek the assistance of the Royal Women's Hospital de-infibulation clinic because they have been subjected to some form of FGM.¹⁵⁶ Some research suggests a decline in support for, and the relevance of, FGM in migrant and refugee communities who have resettled in Victoria.¹⁵⁷

No FGM Australia told the Commission that the practice is a form of family violence that is culturally motivated and used as a means of controlling women and girls.¹⁵⁸ However, a recent paper published by ANROWS noted that 'while some women who have experienced genital cutting would describe it as a form of family violence many others would not'.¹⁵⁹ Evidence before the Commission suggests that parents are sometimes pressured to subject their daughters to FGM for a variety of reasons, among them to curb a girl's sexual feelings, a belief that a girl will not be able to marry without undergoing FGM, the notion that a girl subjected to the practice will be 'pure' and not bring shame on her family, and a belief that the procedure constitutes an 'initiation' into the community.¹⁶⁰

The need to raise awareness in CALD communities about the negative health and legal consequence of FGM was raised with the Commission. Participants in the Department of Social Services' 'kitchen table conversations' identified the need to raise awareness in CALD communities that FGM is an illegal practice with negative health consequences, including obstetric, gynaecological and mental health problems.¹⁶¹ Similarly, No FGM Australia called for public education, safeguards for children and support for survivors so that the practice is not hidden as a cultural practice and should be taken out from 'behind closed doors within communities'.¹⁶²

Financial abuse

The Commission heard that financial abuse was of particular concern in CALD communities. The social isolation some people from CALD backgrounds experience can create an environment in which financial abuse is more likely to occur and have a disproportionate impact on a woman's ability to support herself.¹⁶³

The Commission was told of instances of men controlling all household finances (including Centrelink payments), not allowing a woman to open a bank account in her own name or use a jointly held account, coercing women into signing loan and other bank documents they do not understand, and forcing a woman to work for other family members without payment. In one case, a woman was forced to deposit all her wages into her husband's bank account, to which she had no access. Her husband decided to leave his job and she became the sole income earner, but he remained in control of her access to her money. He later spent it, despite her efforts to save, so she could retrain as a nurse.¹⁶⁴

Dowry-related violence

'Dowry' refers to money, property or gifts transferred by a woman's family to her husband upon marriage. Sometimes, dowry demands can be for substantial amounts of money which are multiple times the annual income of a bride or the groom's family.¹⁶⁵ The Commission heard that misuse of dowry was a 'substantial problem'¹⁶⁶ and a particular concern in Indian, Pakistani, Sri Lankan and, increasingly, Middle Eastern communities.¹⁶⁷ The Commission also heard that a demand for dowry is unlawful in some of these overseas jurisdictions.¹⁶⁸ Socio-economic status affects the amount of dowry to be paid.

Dowry-related violence commonly involves claims that dowry was not paid and coercive demands for further money or gifts from a woman and her extended family.¹⁶⁹ In some cases a man will use a prospective entitlement to permanent residency in Australia as a bargaining tool to attract a higher dowry price from his future spouse and her family.¹⁷⁰

This abuse can be aggravated by a woman's uncertain visa status. Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand and Wyndham Legal Service noted that dowry-related violence 'typically co-existed with visa and migration challenges for women who were often in Australia on spousal visas and more limited in their options'.¹⁷¹

During the community consultations the Commission heard directly from women who had experienced dowry-related abuse.

One woman said her husband had threatened to report her to immigration authorities if she did not give him money from her parents:

The fact was I was being [pressured] to get money from my parents. He said he needs some dowry. He had a huge house but because I couldn't work because of visa restrictions, I was told to get money from my parents. I have some photos of how much gifts my parents gave—the rings, the gold ... All these gifts were exchanged during the marriage ceremony but they were not happy with this. When I said my parents couldn't afford it and he said then he'd write to the Department of Immigration and I'd be asked to go back to India.¹⁷²

Women who sought assistance experienced difficulty because there was a lack of understanding about dowry and its misuse:

Dowry is a main issue and it's not being recognised here. You go to the police and they have no idea what you're talking about ... here it's hard because the police don't know what it means.¹⁷³

For some women the money their families have spent on dowry also acts as a barrier to their leaving their abusive partners.¹⁷⁴

The Australasian Centre for Human Rights and Health submitted that dowry plays a 'significant adverse role' in leading to emotional and physical abuse¹⁷⁵ and has harmful impacts on mental health.¹⁷⁶ The centre highlighted the need for greater awareness and education¹⁷⁷ and called for the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to be amended to include misuse of dowry as an example of economic abuse¹⁷⁸ or to make the 'taking and giving of dowry illegal'.¹⁷⁹

Access to services

Chapter 40 describes current workforce gaps that are holding Victoria back from having an effective approach to preventing and responding to family violence. This includes shortcomings in bicultural and culturally-appropriate practice that have been caused by demand pressures, skills gaps and in some cases discriminatory practice.

The Commission heard that people from CALD communities face cultural and linguistic barriers when seeking access to both specialist family violence services and mainstream universal services that intersect with family violence, such as health, Child Protection, police, legal services and the courts.

Universal services

Health clinicians have a valuable role to play in identifying family violence;¹⁸⁰ more than one in five women experiencing family violence will make their first disclosure about it to a health professional.¹⁸¹ Apart from appointments with general practitioners, CALD women are rarely alone with a professional in whom they can confide.¹⁸² The Commission heard that services, including general practitioners, maternal and child health nurses and hospitals and others, need to be equipped to recognise family violence in CALD communities and respond in culturally appropriate ways.¹⁸³

It is expected that maternity and early childhood services can provide a setting within which women can disclose if they are subject to family violence which may adversely affect their health and that of their babies. However a recent study of new Afghan mothers and fathers undertaken by Murdoch Children's Research Institute and Foundation House found that there were a number of barriers to this occurring. For example, 'Some providers had limited awareness of the experiences that refugees may have had prior to and after settling in Australia, and the impact of those experiences on their capacity to voice their concerns, or ability to access services' ... Each of these findings has strong implications regarding a woman's willingness and ability to disclose family violence to a health care provider.¹⁸⁴

The Centre for Multicultural Youth submitted that fears about the role and powers of Child Protection in the context of family violence were often amplified in migrant and refugee families, which resulted in families preferring to keep professional help at a distance.¹⁸⁵ The Centre for Multicultural Youth discussed the complexity of child protection involvement with CALD families:

Family support and child protection workers are often ill-equipped or not confident in working with families from migrant and refugee backgrounds. A lack of understanding around language barriers, correct use of interpreters, the centrality of building trust and rapport before meaningful work can be achieved, and a lack of knowledge around cultural issues which may require a different approach or intervention are some of the key areas that need to be addressed.¹⁸⁶

The Commission was told of examples of mainstream services successfully running programs for CALD women. Merri Community Health Services ran an Arabic Speaking Women's Family Violence Program facilitated by an Arabic-speaking counsellor and a family violence counsellor.¹⁸⁷ It reported that the program was promoted and facilitated in a culturally-appropriate way that attracted women who would not have attended a mainstream group. The women who participated in the program reported that they developed an awareness of their rights and a knowledge of community support options. They appreciated the opportunity to have 'a culturally safe space to interact socially' and to just 'be together and share experiences and stories'.¹⁸⁸

Another example is the Safe from Harm project run by the Moonee Valley Legal Service; it aims to raise awareness about family violence in CALD communities living in public housing estates in Flemington and Ascot Vale through the provision of legal advice, assistance and education.¹⁸⁹

Submissions noted that CALD-specific community organisations also need support to build their response to family violence and to work in the community to respond to it:

Government and other funding bodies should, at a minimum, make funding available to community organizations, ethno-specific and multicultural organization[s] to train and develop staff to improve responses to clients presenting with issues relating to family violence. Many services, for established and new and emerging communities, are the first and sometimes the only contact a person may make on this serious issue.¹⁹⁰

Clients and workers from Australia's settlement services have suggested that family violence awareness-raising could also be reinforced through settlement services:

[O]rientation programmes for new arrivals and the Adult Migrant English Program could provide an appropriate setting to further explain Australian law and cultural norms in relation to family violence and sexual assault. Programmes could also support discussion of differing expectations regarding gender roles and ensure that clients understand how to access support services.¹⁹¹

Specialist family violence services

Shakti Australia told the Commission the 'culture neutral' stance of specialist family violence services was problematic and did not adequately respond to the particular needs of CALD women.¹⁹² The Commission also heard directly from CALD victims, including refugees, about the difficulties they had experienced when trying to gain access to services. Some women encountered discriminatory or unhelpful attitudes; for example, in one refuge a staff member repeatedly asked one woman why she 'didn't just go back to India'.¹⁹³

Mainstream services face serious challenges in effectively addressing family violence in immigrant communities. Multiple factors have contributed in creating these challenges, but primarily the differences in the conceptualization of violence against women between mainstream services and immigrant communities. Mainstream service providers, based on a model of individual rights, perceive violence and abuse against women as non-negotiable, and the safety of abused women is the priority in these situations. While immigrant cultures also see abuse as unacceptable, the approach tends to differ. Family violence against women is often seen as a family matter, which implies that only family can and should resolve it without intervention from anyone outside the family. There are particular challenges facing communities from collective societies. There is an expectation that personal needs will be subordinated to those of the collective. Women are expected to maintain harmony in order to uphold the family's status and reputation. In summary, there are many barriers that prevent women from CALD backgrounds from accessing services or assistance relating to family and domestic violence.¹⁹⁴

Many submissions emphasised that specialist family violence services need further support to strengthen their capacity to identify and respond to the needs of CALD communities.

The additional needs and complex presentations among many victims and perpetrators of family violence are widely understood as challenges for the service system. The multiplicity of issues represented here across a range of incident types means that no single prevention strategy is likely to prove effective in this area. However, it reflects the need for both mainstream and specialist services to give adequate weight to the contributions of vulnerability factors (i.e. CALD background, disability, mental health issue or substance dependence) when assessing risk, undertaking safety planning or formulating intervention strategies.¹⁹⁵

There is a general need for all service providers to be culturally sensitive to the community and their needs ... There needs to be culturally sensitive support for victims prior to seeking an intervention order, and once the intervention order is given, the woman needs to be supported to feel safe. There is insufficient housing and help available to women in emergency situations ... More refuges are needed along with a reassessment of how refuges are used and help to provide support. CALD communities in particular are not comfortable sharing houses with multiple families as is the model in the west. Lack of refuge housing often means that women will return to the abusive situation rather than seek help. Domestic violence in this community is severely under reported because of the public knowledge of violence and death that women have suffered for separating or reporting violence in the community.¹⁹⁶

The failure of specialist family violence services to provide culturally appropriate information and assistance can cause CALD victims to disengage from such services at an early stage.¹⁹⁷

CALD-specific family violence services

Studies have found that CALD women would prefer 'ethno-specific' family violence services.¹⁹⁸ Currently, InTouch is the only family violence service in Victoria that provides services specifically for CALD women. It provides case management and access to legal advice, migration advice, counselling and court support. Ms Maya Avdibegovic, Chief Executive Officer of InTouch, gave evidence that 12 case workers provide services in 25 different languages across Victoria. She added that the case workers' ability to directly develop a trusting rapport with clients without the need for an interpreter makes 'a huge difference':¹⁹⁹

... making that first initial contact with a client, it makes [an] enormous difference when it's done in a language by someone who understands the culture and the whole understanding of family violence in that culture.²⁰⁰

Although the availability of CALD-specific services and community supports is crucial, there are also benefits to be gained if CALD communities use mainstream family violence services. Mainstream services may offer benefits such as neutrality, a greater assurance of confidentiality and an 'outside' perspective in situations of family violence, sexual assault, community pressure and harassment:²⁰¹

... there are also risks associated with [CALD] services that serve specific cultural groups. These include safeguarding service recipients' privacy and confidentiality and ensuring that prominent community members do not exert undue influence in organisations in ways that privilege men over the safety and rights of women.²⁰²

Culturally appropriate programs for men

A number of submissions referred to the lack of culturally appropriate men's behaviour change programs for perpetrators of family violence.²⁰³ In particular, perpetrators who do not speak English have limited access to such programs.

At present very few culturally specific men's behaviour change programs are offered—Kildonan Uniting Care runs a program delivered in English for men from South Asia and Relationships Australia delivers a program for Vietnamese-speaking men. A behaviour-change program for Arabic-speaking men is being developed.²⁰⁴ Each of these programs is designed in accordance with the No To Violence minimum standards and quality practice guidelines (see Chapter 18).

Kildonan Uniting Care submitted that its general program failed to take into account the 'cultural norms, beliefs and identity of men from South Asia, the social and economic implications of the migration and resettlement experience, and the lived experience of their communities'.²⁰⁵ Some men participating in the program viewed 'disciplining' their partner as appropriate and their responsibility, did not understand what family violence meant in Australia, and used the threat of deportation as a means of controlling their partner.²⁰⁶

The programs currently offered for South Asian and Vietnamese men cover pre-migration and settlement experiences, gender equality in Australia, understanding attitudes, values and behaviours that underpin family violence, and understanding that family violence consists not just of physical violence and that family violence is a crime.²⁰⁷

A number of submissions expressed support for the development of specific behaviour-change programs for CALD communities that are delivered in the relevant language and respond to the needs of that community, including dealing with family dynamics, pre-migration experiences and trauma.²⁰⁸ Others highlighted the need for further research into effective strategies for engaging with perpetrators of family violence from CALD communities,²⁰⁹ including directly engaging with these communities.²¹⁰

Overcoming language barriers

Many submissions noted the lack of interpreters throughout the family violence system and in intersecting health, and justice services as a major barrier for CALD communities.²¹¹

Failure to provide an interpreter may constitute discrimination and amount to a breach of the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) and the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic).

Accordingly, the Victorian Government's policy on the use of interpreters states that clients who cannot communicate through spoken or written English should have access to professional interpreting services in three situations:

- ▷ when required to make significant decisions concerning their lives
- ▷ when being informed of their rights
- ▷ when essential information needs to be communicated to aid decision-making—including obtaining informed consent.²¹²

The policy also provides that family members or friends (including children) should not be used to interpret in situations involving critical information and decision making.²¹³ Particular risks arise when this occurs in the context of family violence, especially in the case of children.

The Commission was informed that this policy is not being consistently applied. For example, the Federation of Chinese Associations submitted:

It is important for women and their children in a life threatening situation for their calls for help [to be] dealt with immediately. Unfortunately, a number of our clients have expressed their disappointment with the system as they have had problems in find[ing] an online interpreter or person to help with the lifesaving call. During our day to day work we have found that [the] TIS service for Chinese especially for Mandarin speaking services have a long wait times, ... [I]magine people who have been subjected to domestic violence desperately needing help having to struggle to find an interpreter to connect them with crisis services at the same time in fear of their safety.²¹⁴

The Translating and Interpreting Service

The Translating and Interpreting Service is a national 24-hour, seven-days-a-week service operated by the Department of Immigration and Border Protection. TIS provides services to government agencies as well as businesses. It provides immediate, voice-prompted and pre-booked phone interpreting services and onsite interpreting services.

The Victorian Interpreting and Translating Service is a professional interpreting and translating service which provides services to businesses and government departments across Australia, 24-hours a day, seven-days-a-week. VITS provides certified translators and interpreters for a range of services including document translation, telephone translation and onsite interpretation. A telephone interpreter is provided for 95 per cent of all calls within three minutes.

Emergency responses

The Commission heard that 000 and crisis hotlines do not use interpreters as a matter of course, which can have tragic consequences for victims. As the Coroners Court of Victoria submitted:

A broad range of cultural groups have been represented among the fatal incidents investigated by the Coroners Court of Victoria, and cultural and linguistic diversity has been a particularly salient feature. Here, cultural and language barriers; traditional views of marriage; social isolation and a reluctance to speak out about abuse due to the negative perceptions of others were identified as relevant factors that shaped the victim's experience of violence. By way of example is Judge Gray's recent comments made in his finding into the death of Ms Marzieh Rahimi[:]

"With respect to Ms Rahimi's inability to make contact with police when she telephoned 000 on 1 November 2007, I reiterate the concerns raised by Her Honour Justice King and note that, currently, the 000 emergency call service does not have the facilities to translate different languages at the point of answer. If a caller to 000 is unable to speak English, their call is transferred to the capital city police in the state they are calling from, and an interpreter will then be arranged. In Ms Rahimi's case, it appears that she ended the call before this could occur."²¹⁵

Victoria Police

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence states '[T]he police response to CALD communities needs to be sensitive to their diverse needs' and should involve 'interpreters being used at the earliest opportunity and at every stage while providing assistance'.²¹⁶ The Commission received evidence about initiatives designed to improve Victoria Police's response to family violence in CALD communities—among them cross-cultural training, the provision of cultural awareness guidelines, and the use of multicultural liaison officers who are full-time, sworn police officers located in areas with particularly large populations of CALD people.²¹⁷

Although some submissions commended Victoria Police for the improvements in its response to family violence in CALD communities,²¹⁸ the Commission did hear of cases in which police officers failed to respond to family violence incidents in a culturally sensitive way.

The Commission heard of problems with police practices in relation to interpreters, including not using interpreters, not notifying the court of the need for an interpreter when the police are applying for a family violence intervention order, relying on an interpreter from a different language group and inappropriately using children, people known to the perpetrator or the perpetrator themselves.²¹⁹ The Code of Practice expressly contemplates using an independent interpreter as soon as practicable following an incident.²²⁰ Children can be further traumatised by acting as interpreters after witnessing family violence.²²¹

As Superintendent Charles Allen, Priority Communities Division, explained, police can have difficulty arranging a face-to-face interpreter, especially if called out late at night or early in the morning, and so will make use of telephone interpreting services:

[It is] ... difficult to get an interpreter on their feet at a scene in a timely manner. So second best is telephone interpreting services or reliance on networks, which is less than best because that could be bringing another community member which could create a barrier to a safe place to have a conversation.²²²

Superintendent Allen went on to say that police sometimes use family members as interpreters if no other options are immediately available and information needs to be obtained quickly:

[Use of family members as interpreters is] not ideal ... [but] if the situation is very dynamic, police need to be able to draw out information quickly to be able to deal with the dynamics of a situation, hence why on occasions other approaches will be taken to try to get a sense of the issues at play.²²³

The Commission was also told that policing approaches in non-family violence-related matters can lead to general mistrust, such that community members, including victims, will not contact police for assistance with family violence. An example was that poor police relationships with young African Australian people have affected their parents' confidence in police.²²⁴

Former Victoria Police Chief Commissioner Mr Ken Lay APM noted in his foreword to Victoria Police's Equality is not the Same report and action plan:

We understand that public confidence is significantly impacted by both the experience and perception that police perform their duties in a manner that is procedurally just and fair, and that at all times we uphold individual rights and treat all persons with dignity and respect. Every interaction between a member of Victoria Police and a member of the community therefore matters, whether as a victim, offender, participant in community activities or in the course of routine daily activities. Therefore, where actions that so critically undermine confidence in policing such as racism or racial profiling remain a concern for communities, it is incumbent on us to be explicit in our zero tolerance of these and to demonstrate this commitment through action.²²⁵

At court

The difficulties victims of family violence can experience in the courts are discussed in Chapter 16. The situation is even more difficult for members of CALD communities, particularly if a person does not speak English, is unfamiliar with the Australian legal system, or has had negative experiences with government agencies in their country of origin.

The Commission was told that, although there have been some positive developments—for example, a full-time Vietnamese interpreter at Sunshine Magistrates' Court and translated directional signs at Heidelberg Magistrates' Court—the magistrates' courts remain 'highly inaccessible and disorientating for CALD women, which often exacerbates their trauma'.²²⁶

The Neighbourhood Justice Centre has developed an audio guide for making family violence intervention order applications that is available in various languages.²²⁷

Problems with access to interpreters at court was a strong theme. The Magistrates' Court currently arranges and pays for interpreters for accused persons in criminal proceedings (including paying for appointments with support services), applicants and respondents in intervention order proceedings and applicants in Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal proceedings.²²⁸

In 2013–14 there were 1210 cases in which interpreters were requested by applicants and respondents in family violence intervention order applications.²²⁹ The number of respondents requesting interpreters in the Magistrates' Court has nearly doubled since 2004–05 from 235 to 417 in 2013–14.²³⁰ Requests for interpreters for family violence intervention order proceedings now account for about half of the Magistrates' Courts' total interpreter expenditure.²³¹

It was reported that interpreters sometimes had not been booked at court in advance of hearings or only one interpreter had been booked, resulting in long waiting times for an available interpreter.²³² The Magistrates' Court and the Children's Court described the problems in their submission:

Sometimes courts will only be able to secure one interpreter for a case, meaning that interpreter must provide assistance to both the applicant and respondent to an intervention order. This is highly unsatisfactory.²³³

Court Network submitted that generally interpreters are booked only until 1.00 pm, which can result in matters being rushed through before the interpreter leaves or the matter being adjourned.²³⁴ Other submissions noted that magistrates' courts are not uniformly equipped with multilingual signage and that forms, orders and information provided to parties may be unavailable in languages other than English. Family violence intervention orders are provided in English only, increasing the possibility that the parties will not understand what the orders mean.

The Magistrates' Court and the Children's Court called for additional funding to be provided to courts for adequately qualified legal interpreters for all family violence cases, and for information and materials on family violence to be available in a range of languages and delivered using modern best-practice communication approaches in a culturally appropriate manner.²³⁵

Women's Legal Service Victoria and Court Network submitted specific funding should be allocated for family violence interpreters in the Magistrates' Court and court guidelines should be developed that set out the process for booking interpreters in family violence matters—including:²³⁶

- a practice of booking two interpreters if both parties require an interpreter
- a presumption that a female interpreter be booked for a female party.²³⁷

These matters are discussed further in Chapter 16.

Improving family violence competency of interpreters

Professionals Australia's submission, made on behalf of the National Association of Translators and Interpreters Australia, reported a range of acute problems, among them the following:

- ▷ interpreters representing both parties to a family violence intervention order application because a second interpreter was not available
- ▷ interpreters displaying a lack of impartiality—including trying to persuade applicants to withdraw their application or return to a violent relationship, and criticising applicants for drawing negative attention to a particular community
- ▷ ad hoc use of family members and friends to act as interpreters
- ▷ use of interpreters with a history of family violence.²³⁸

An associated concern is lateral violence that female interpreters can face if they do family violence-related work in their own community and it is a community where such violence is tolerated, condoned or regarded as community business.

The Magistrates' Court and the Children's Court submitted:

Competent, ethical and highly skilled interpreters are an essential element in meeting some of the significant safety risks which exist for families from CALD communities living with family violence. An independent governance structure for interpreters, such as an improved accreditation process, would give the court greater confidence.²³⁹

The Commission is not aware of any compulsory training in relation to family violence being provided as part of the process of gaining a qualification as an interpreter. Professionals Australia submitted that interpreters should be provided with specialised training and support to deal with unique issues in the family violence context.²⁴⁰

The way forward

Conceptions of what constitutes family violence can differ across cultures. In some cultures, there can be a lack of institutional prohibition of the use of violence within families. It is clear, however, from the evidence presented to the Commission that attitudes, values and practices that at some level fail to recognise or condemn, or that promote, family violence exist in all cultures including Anglo-Australian culture. When considering the interplay between 'culture' and family violence, it is important to note that culture is not a cause of family violence. Nor does culture excuse violent and abusive behaviour. Culture is multi-layered, and the ways people view themselves through their cultural background can differ.

The effects of family violence experienced by people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities including recent arrivals, are compounded by a range of factors associated with the experience of migration and resettlement, as well as systemic barriers to seeking and obtaining help. The impact of family violence on CALD women who do not have permanent residency is particularly severe because they may have very limited or no access to support and can be at greater risk of coercion and control by sponsoring spouses and other family members.

In addition to forms of family violence experienced in all communities, women in some CALD communities experience some specific forms—for example, forced marriage, female genital mutilation, and dowry-related violence. These forms of abuse are not readily recognised as family violence by some within these communities.

Both mainstream universal services and specialist family violence services struggle to provide culturally appropriate services for victims. The services designed specifically for victims from CALD backgrounds are limited. There are also limited opportunities for men from CALD communities to participate in behaviour change programs that are culturally specific or in their own language. While exposure to pre-arrival violence and trauma does not excuse the perpetration of family violence in relationships, it does reveal the importance of understanding the experiences of some CALD communities and developing appropriate behaviour-change programs.

Mainstream universal and specialist services must be more responsive to the needs of people from CALD communities who are affected by family violence. They should be supported by organisations with the requisite expertise to build the services' capacity to respond appropriately.

The availability of professional and independent interpreting and translating services is inadequate. Professional accreditation standards for interpreters should be amended to incorporate minimum requirements relating to understanding the nature and dynamics of family violence. This will require a national effort.

The Commission acknowledges and agrees that more needs to be done to improve the prevention and response to family violence in CALD communities. Initiatives aimed at promoting the prevention of family violence should reflect the diversity of the Victorian community and be tailored in consultation with CALD communities to meet their specific needs. It is important to encourage and support women in these communities to express their views.

The Commission's recommended priority areas for action are set out below. These are in addition to the recommendations we make elsewhere in this report to improve the responsiveness of the family violence system to the diverse experiences of victims.

Strengthening mainstream services

CALD communities face difficulties gaining access to mainstream services. These services need to develop their capacity to provide adequate culturally-specific services to meet demand.

Service providers such as general practitioners, maternal and child health nurses, and hospitals need to improve their capacity to recognise family violence in CALD communities—including female genital mutilation, forced marriage and dowry-related abuse—and to respond in a culturally appropriate way. This may be assisted if the Family Violence Protection Act were to contain statutory examples of such abuse.

CALD-specific community organisations need support in building their response to family violence and in working within communities to redress it. In particular, settlement services require greater Commonwealth government support in working with people affected by family violence.

Recommendation 156

The Victorian Government amend section 6 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) to expand the statutory examples of family violence to include forced marriage and dowry related abuse [within 12 months].

Strengthening specialist family violence practices

Specialist family violence services need support in strengthening their capacity to identify and respond to the needs of CALD communities and providing culturally appropriate services.

There are two important elements to developing this capacity. First, services should seek to employ workers with relevant bicultural and bilingual skills to meet the needs of specific communities. There are many people in CALD communities whose skills and expertise could be drawn upon. The industry plan recommended in Chapter 40 will facilitate this.

Secondly, the secondary consultation model should be strengthened. As a dedicated statewide CALD-specific family violence organisation, InTouch is ideally placed to offer its expertise (and if required, a secondary referral pathway) to other specialist family violence services, as well as mainstream services. The Commission understands this service is already offered but is overstretched.

This approach encourages specialist family violence services to build their own culturally-appropriate practice, with the ability to call on specialist help where required, without having to establish multiple new organisations and services. In view of the increased demand for such services, InTouch will require increased investment and support from government if it is to do this effectively.

There should be greater collaboration between mainstream, specialist family violence and ethno-specific services to respond to the needs of population groups at the local level; this entails, among other things, direct engagement with new and emerging communities in order to improve responses to them, and the inclusion of CALD community members on the boards, and in the management and staff of service providers. Similarly, organisations providing services to CALD communities, for example refugee support organisations, should seek to develop their understanding of and capacity to address family violence through such collaboration.

Overcoming language barriers

Access to interpreting services must be improved throughout the family violence system and in intersecting health, human and justice services.

As a front-line responder to family violence, Victoria Police needs to improve compliance with its Code of Practice in relation to the use of interpreters and avoid using perpetrators, children or other family members as interpreters, or using the same interpreter for both perpetrator and victim.

Victoria Police should continue its cross-cultural training to improve its response to family violence incidents in CALD communities as well as to build the confidence of and relationship with these communities generally.

The number of adequately qualified legal interpreters for family violence cases must be increased to ensure access to justice for CALD communities. The Commission agrees with the submissions from Court Network and the Magistrates' Court and Children's Court calling for additional funding in this regard. Listing and other administrative practices could also be improved to promote as much efficiency as possible in the use of interpreting services. In addition, information and materials on family violence should be made available in a range of languages and delivered using modern best-practice communication approaches in a culturally appropriate manner. The Neighbourhood Justice Centre's audio guide should be used more widely.

In view of the special vulnerabilities of CALD communities, the Commission is concerned that there is no compulsory family violence training for interpreters. Interpreters should receive training in the dynamics of family violence.

Recommendation 157

The Victorian Government update its guidelines on policy and procedures in using interpretative services to specifically deal with family violence—in particular, the risks of using perpetrators, children and other family members as interpreters, as well as using the same interpreter for both perpetrator and victim [within 12 months].

Recommendation 158

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria allocate specific funding for family violence interpreters and develop court guidelines for booking interpreters in family violence matters [within 12 months]. Among other things, the guidelines should take account of the following:

- ▷ an early process for checking whether parties require an interpreter
- ▷ a practice of booking two interpreters if both parties require an interpreter
- ▷ a presumption that wherever possible a female interpreter will be booked for a female party.

Recommendation 159

Victoria Police [within 12 months]:

- ▷ amend the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to emphasise the risks associated with using children as interpreters and using the same interpreter for both perpetrator and victim, as well as to provide practical guidance to officers on the use of interpreters
- ▷ provide training at all appropriate levels on the amended Code of Practice requirements relating to interpreters.

Recommendation 160

The Victorian Government, as a member of the National Accreditation Authority for Translators and Interpreters Ltd, work with the other members of the authority to ensure that accreditation and testing processes and approval of translator and interpreter courses require an understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence [within two years].

Assisting recovery

Culturally appropriate therapeutic programs and counselling—for both individuals and groups—should be supported. It is especially important that these programs are sensitive to any previous trauma people from CALD backgrounds might have experienced as a consequence of pre-migration events and settlement in their new country. Recovery is not just limited to counselling: it also calls for opportunities to participate in the community and enjoy time with friends and family in a supportive environment.

Initiatives such as those organised by InTouch are an important part of the healing process and should be supported, as should dedicated efforts to facilitate financial recovery and economic security through education and employment support, financial literacy and debt recovery initiatives.

Prevention and early intervention

A sustained focus on prevention and early intervention is as important in CALD communities as it is in other communities. Prevention work in communities requires a rights-based approach that gives priority to safety, choices and empowerment of victims and responds to the increasing diversity in the composition and geographic settlement patterns of migrants in Australia. Prevention of family violence in CALD communities requires targeted initiatives with particular communities and sub-populations.

The Commission supports initiatives that are designed in collaboration with CALD communities themselves, involve women and respond to the particular community's needs. This should form part of a prevention strategy for Victoria.

The Commission is encouraged by the role that school-based respectful relationship programs can play in preventing family violence in CALD populations, if the programs are tailored to meet the needs of specific communities. This is discussed further in Chapter 36.

Community awareness and information

The greater use of audio material to explain and provide family violence intervention orders, should be explored.

Most order conditions are standard and could be pre-recorded in a number of languages. Access to audio information that accommodates differing literacy levels would allow for a better understanding of orders for all parties and potentially reduce the number of breaches resulting from misunderstanding what an order entails. An audio format would also be of use for people with poor literacy (who could additionally benefit from access to Easy English resources) and those with visual impairments.

The Commission welcomes the Commonwealth Government's initiative to provide information packs to migrants, although it recognises that migrants can be overwhelmed with information when they arrive. Consideration should be given to developing pre-arrival packs for migrants, covering Australian laws and expectations around family violence, including the potential for criminal sanctions and deportation.

The Commission agrees that there is a need to develop a strategy to raise awareness in some CALD communities that female genital mutilation is an illegal practice with negative health consequences.

Recommendation 161

The Department of Health and Human Services, in collaboration with the Victorian Multicultural Commission, community organisations and other relevant bodies, develop a strategy for informing service providers, specialist family violence services and other community organisations about the health impacts of female genital mutilation, emphasising that it can be a form of family violence and a criminal offence [within 12 months].

Family violence exception for visa applicants

The Commission considers that the Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth) should be amended to allow a person who experiences violence perpetrated by a family member other than the person's spouse to apply for the family violence exception. Unlike the Family Violence Protection Act and other equivalent state and territory legislation, the current approach does not encompass other forms of family violence (for example, parent-on-child, child-on-parent and sibling-on-sibling violence).

The range of people entitled to Commonwealth crisis payments on account of family violence should be enlarged to reflect all forms of family violence (and be available regardless of their visa status).

Recommendation 162

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government to broaden the definition of family violence in the Migrations Regulations 1994 (Cth) so that it is consistent with the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and to ensure that people seeking to escape violence are entitled to crisis payments (regardless of their visa status) [within 12 months].

Endnotes

- 1 See Victorian Multicultural Commission, 2011 Census: A Snapshot of Our Diversity <<http://www.multicultural.vic.gov.au/population-and-migration/victorias-diversity/2011-census-a-snapshot-of-our-diversity>>.
- 2 Ibid.
- 3 Ibid.
- 4 VicHealth, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates, 'Understandings and Actions to Prevent Violence Against Women in CALD Communities' (2015) (unpublished, copy on file with author) 37–8.
- 5 Cathy Vaughan et al, 'Promoting Community-led Responses to Violence Against Immigrant and Refugee Women in Metropolitan and Regional Australia: The ASPIRE Project' (Landscapes: State of Knowledge No 12, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, October 2015) 6; Department of Social Services (Cth), 'Hearing Her Voice: Report from the Kitchen Table Conversations with Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Women on Violence Against Women and Their Children' (September 2015) 9.
- 6 See, eg, Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 9.
- 7 As discussed in Chapter 3.
- 8 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 20.
- 9 In the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, the notes on data collection indicate that restricted access to bi-lingual interviewers make it likely that the survey 'may under represent those from a non-English speaking background': Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Personal Safety, Australia, 2012' (Catalogue No 4906.0, Australia Bureau of Statistics, 2013); Vaughan et al, above n 5, 6.
- 10 Minister for Social Services, the Hon Scott Morrison MP, Minister Assisting the Prime Minister for Women, Senator The Hon Michaelia Cash, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Social Services, Senator The Hon Concetta Fierravanti-Wells, 'National Roundtable To Discuss Violence Against Culturally Diverse Women' (Media Release, 7 August 2015).
- 11 Ibid.
- 12 Janet Phillips and Penny Vandenbroek, 'Domestic, Family and Sexual Violence in Australia: An Overview of the Issues' (Research Paper Series, 2014–15, Parliamentary Library, Parliament of Australia, 14 October 2014) 12.
- 13 Ibid 32.
- 14 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 13.
- 15 Crime Statistics Agency, An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14 (January 2016), 80.
- 16 Women's Health West Inc, Submission 239, 34.
- 17 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, Appendix 2, 6.
- 18 Ibid.
- 19 Alison Howarth, 'Domestic and Family Violence Crisis Lines of Australia Network (DFVCLAN)—Statistics Report 2015: An Examination and Analysis of Female Victims of Domestic and Family Violence in Australia without Australian Permanent Residency Contacting the State-wide Crisis Lines of Australia for the Period October to December 2014' (Domestic and Family Violence Crisis Lines of Australia Network, April 2015) 5.
- 20 Ibid.
- 21 Whittlesea Community Futures Partnership, Submission 392, 10.
- 22 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 2.
- 23 VicHealth, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates, above n 4, 8.
- 24 Ibid 10.
- 25 Ibid 12.
- 26 Ibid.
- 27 Ibid.
- 28 'Of the 44 specific projects identified, the majority were located in Victoria. The work conducted and supported by VicHealth during this ten-year period is likely to have contributed to the higher level of activity in primary prevention with CALD communities. Of the projects in Victoria, the primary strategies in descending order were: 1) community strengthening, 2) communications using multimedia, 3) individual-level change, 4) research and 5) policy reform': Ibid 31.
- 29 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 18.
- 30 See, eg, Whittlesea Community Connections, Submission 375, 15.
- 31 See, eg, cohealth, Submission 852, 42.
- 32 Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 893, 11.
- 33 cohealth, Submission 852, 39.
- 34 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 21.
- 35 See, eg, Victoria Legal Aid, 'Settled and Safe Training' (25 June 2015), produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015; Victoria Legal Aid, 'Settled and Safe' (April 2014), produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 36 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 18.
- 37 Ibid.
- 38 Ibid 34.
- 39 Community consultation, Northcote 2, 6 July 2015.
- 40 Minister for Social Services, The Hon Scott Morrison MP, Minister Assisting the Prime Minister for Women, Senator The Hon Michaelia Cash, and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Social Services, Senator The Hon Concetta Fierravanti-Wells, above n 10.
- 41 See Department of Social Services (Cth), Family Safety Pack (10 August 2015) <<https://www.dss.gov.au/family-safety-pack>, accessed 31 August 2015>.
- 42 Community consultation, Richmond, 1 May 2015.
- 43 Ibid.
- 44 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 28.
- 45 Ibid 29.
- 46 Ibid.
- 47 VicHealth, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates, above n 4, 28.
- 48 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015.
- 49 Ibid.
- 50 See, eg, Statement of 'Jana', 16 July 2015, 2 [8].
- 51 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015.
- 52 See, eg, Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 30.
- 53 Community consultation, Northcote 2, 6 July 2015.
- 54 Moonee Valley Legal Service, Submission 901, 5.
- 55 VicHealth, 'Australians' Attitudes to Violence Against Women: Findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey' (2014) 78.

56 Ibid 18–19.

57 Ibid 19.

58 VicHealth, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates, above n 4, 27.

59 Ibid 10, 42.

60 Transcript of El Matrah, 11 August 2015, 2625 [23]–[30].

61 Anonymous, Submission 199, 1.

62 Whittlesea Community Connections, Submission 375, Attachment 1, 47.

63 VicHealth, above n 55, 80.

64 Whittlesea Community Connections, Submission 375, Attachment 1, 47.

65 Anthony Morgan and Hanna Chadwick, 'Key Issues in Domestic Violence' (Research in Practice: Summary Paper No.7, Australian Institute of Criminology, December 2009) 5.

66 Victorian Multicultural Commission, Submission 887, 11.

67 Ethnic Communities Council of Victoria, 'Women Surviving Violence: Cultural Competence in Critical Services' (2013) 12.

68 Victorian Multicultural Commission, Submission 887, 10.

69 Ibid.

70 Ibid 11.

71 Ibid; Vaughan et al, above n 5, 36.

72 72 Victorian Multicultural Commission, Submission 887, 11.

73 73 Ibid.

74 Ethnic Communities' Council of Victoria, above n 67, 12.

75 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 47.

76 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 19.

77 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, 'I lived in fear because I knew nothing: Barriers to the Justice System Faced by CALD Women Experiencing Family Violence' (2010) 15.

78 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 34.

79 Community consultation, Morwell, 13 May 2015.

80 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 34.

81 Community consultation, Northcote 1, 6 July 2015.

82 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 29.

83 Community consultation, Northcote 1, 6 July 2015.

84 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 32, 33, 38.

85 Statement of 'Jana', 16 July 2015, 8 [35]; Community consultation, Richmond, 1 May 2015.

86 Community consultation, Werribee 1, 11 May 2015.

87 Community consultation, Ravenhall, 11 May 2015.

88 Shakti Migrant and Refugee Women's Support Group Melbourne Inc, Submission 500, 8.

89 Transcript of El Matrah, 11 August 2015, 2628 [4]–[10].

90 Community consultation, Northcote 2, 6 July 2015.

91 Ibid.

92 Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 4.

93 Ibid.

94 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 32.

95 The Victorian Foundation for Survivors of Torture (Foundation House), Submission 925, 4.

96 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 16.

97 Ibid 16. It is noted that it was only in 1991 that the High Court of Australia accepted that under the common law a husband could be guilty of raping his wife: R v L (1991) 174 CLR 379, but see PGA v The Queen (2012) 245 CLR 355.

98 Ibid 19.

99 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015.

100 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, above n 77, 16.

101 Transcript of Avdibegovic, 11 August 2015, 2624 [13]–[15].

102 Statement of Avdibegovic, 3 August 2015, 2 [9].

103 Victorian Auditor-General's Office, 'Access to Services for Migrants, Refugees and Asylum Seekers' (May 2014) 5.

104 See, eg, Asylum Seeker Resource Centre, Submission 874, 2; Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 2.

105 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 10.

106 The Victorian Foundation for Survivors of Torture (Foundation House), Submission 925, 2.

107 Ibid 3.

108 Ibid.

109 See, eg, Victorian Multicultural Commission, Submission 887, 9.

110 Ibid.

111 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 20.

112 See, eg, InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 13.

113 Department of Social Services, above n 5, 26.

114 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 23.

115 Ibid 28.

116 Georgina Martina Inc, Submission 191, 1.

117 Transcript of Rogers, 21 July 2015, 1064 [29]–1065 [8].

118 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 40.

119 Ibid 41.

120 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 26.

121 See, eg, InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 48; Transcript of Avdibegovic, 11 August 2015, 2636 [1]–[7].

122 Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 13.

123 See Department of Immigration and Border Protection (Cth), Contributory Aged Parent (Temporary) Visa (Subclass 884) <<https://www.border.gov.au/Trav/Visa-1/884->>.

124 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 15.

125 Ibid.

126 Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth) Schedule 2, s 100.221 (4)(c).

127 Ibid Division 1.5, Regulation 1.23, Sub-regulations (3), (5), (7) and (12).

128 Department of Immigration and Border Protection (Cth), 'Annual Report 2013-14' (2014) 60.

- 129 See Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth) Division 1.5, Regulations 1.23–1.25.
- 130 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 23 citing Nafiseh Ghafournia, 'Battered at home, played down in policy: Migrant women and domestic violence in Australia' (2011) 16(3) Aggression and Violent Behavior 207–213.
- 131 Australian Law Reform Commission, 'Family Violence and Commonwealth Laws: Improving Legal Frameworks—Final Report' (ALRC Report No 117, November 2011).
- 132 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 34.
- 133 Ibid 15. See also Victorian Multicultural Commission, Submission 557, 4.
- 134 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 18.
- 135 The extension of the definition of family violence to include violence perpetrated by intimate partners, as well as that perpetrated by other relatives, is particularly relevant to the experience of immigrant and refugee women. See generally Vaughan et al, above n 5, 21.
- 136 Community consultation, Northcote 1, 6 July 2015.
- 137 The Federation of Chinese Associations Vic, Submission 774, 7; Australian Greek Welfare Society, Submission 578, 2, 6, 8; Ethnic Communities' Council of Victoria, Submission 879, 7–10; InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 51.
- 138 Ethnic Communities' Council of Victoria, Submission 879, 8.
- 139 Ibid.
- 140 Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 22.
- 141 Ibid.
- 142 Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 4.
- 143 Community consultation, Northcote 1, 6 July 2015.
- 144 Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 4.
- 145 Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 22. See also Shelley Hadfield, 'Forced Marriage of Girl, 9, Among 34 Suspected Cases being Investigated by Australian Federal Police', Herald Sun (online), 17 May 2015 <<http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/law-order/forced-marriage-of-girl-9-among-34-suspected-cases-being-investigated-by-australian-federal-police/story-fni0fee2-1227358244691>>.
- 146 Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 4.
- 147 Ibid.
- 148 Australian Catholic Religious Against Trafficking in Humans, Submission 547, 3.
- 149 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 15.
- 150 Samantha Lyneham and Kelly Richards, 'Human Trafficking Involving Marriage and Partner Migration to Australia' (AIC Reports: Research and Public Policy Series 124, 2014) 11.
- 151 World Health Organization, 'Eliminating Female Genital Mutilation: An Interagency Statement—UNAIDS, UNDP, UNECA, UNESCO, UNFPA, UNHCHR, UNHCR, UNICEF, UNIFEM, WHO' (July 2008) 1.
- 152 Ibid 10.
- 153 Ibid 1.
- 154 See, eg, ibid 11; No FGM Australia, Submission 391, 1.
- 155 See Crimes (Female Genital Mutilation) Act 1996 (Vic).
- 156 See Emily Bourke, 'Female Circumcision Happening in Australia', ABC News (online), 6 February 2010 <<http://www.abc.net.au/news/2010-02-06/female-circumcision-happening-in-australia/2594496>>.
- 157 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 19, citing Cathy Vaughan et al, 'Listening to North Yarra Communities about Female Genital Cutting' (Melbourne University, School of Population and Global Health, May 2014) and Cathy Vaughan et al, 'Female Genital Mutilation/Cutting in Regional Victoria: Research to Practice' (Melbourne University, School of Population and Global Health, July 2014).
- 158 No FGM Australia, Submission 391, 1.
- 159 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 19.
- 160 No FGM Australia, Submission 391, 1, 23.
- 161 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 34.
- 162 No FGM Australia, Submission 391, 23.
- 163 Chapter 21 discusses financial abuse further.
- 164 Statement of 'Jana', 16 July 2015, 2 [6]–[7].
- 165 Australasian Centre for Human Rights and Health, Submission 168, 6.
- 166 Ibid 3.
- 167 See, eg, Community consultation, Sandringham, 29 April 2015; Community consultation, Richmond, 1 May 2015; Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015.
- 168 Australasian Centre for Human Rights and Health, Submission 168, 11.
- 169 See, eg, Wyndham Legal Service Inc—02, Submission 83, 12.
- 170 Australasian Centre for Human Rights and Health, Submission 168, 3.
- 171 Wyndham Legal Service Inc—02, Submission 83, 12.
- 172 Community consultation, Melbourne, 6 May 2015.
- 173 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015.
- 174 Wyndham Legal Service Inc—02, Submission 83, 33.
- 175 Australasian Centre for Human Rights and Health, Submission 168, 2.
- 176 Ibid 7.
- 177 Ibid 5, 18.
- 178 Ibid 4–5, 17.
- 179 Ibid 17.
- 180 See, eg, Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 48; Judith Lumley Centre—La Trobe University, Submission 516, 7; St Vincent's Health Victoria, Submission 833, 13.
- 181 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 48.
- 182 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 20.
- 183 See generally Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 20, 21, 24.
- 184 The Victorian Foundation for Survivors of Torture (Foundation House), Submission 925, 5.
- 185 Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 5.
- 186 Ibid 8.
- 187 Merri Community Health Services Ltd, Submission 503, 10.
- 188 Ibid 10–11.
- 189 Moonee Valley Legal Service, Submission 901, 2.
- 190 Australian Greek Welfare Society, Submission 578, 7.
- 191 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 17.
- 192 Shakti Migrant and Refugee Women's Support Group Melbourne Inc, Submission 500, 8.

- 193 Community consultation, Werribee 1, 11 May 2015.
- 194 Integrated Family Violence Partnership–Southern Melbourne, Submission 224, 18.
- 195 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 18.
- 196 Jagriti, Submission 386, 2.
- 197 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 21.
- 198 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 38.
- 199 Transcript of Avdibegovic, 11 August 2015, 2629 [6]–[18].
- 200 Ibid 2641 [29]–2642 [1].
- 201 Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 30.
- 202 Vaughan et al, above n 5, 33.
- 203 See, eg, Bethany Community Support, Submission 434, 9; Australian Greek Welfare Society, Submission 578, 5; State-wide Children's Resource Program, Submission 126, 1; Brotherhood of St Laurence, Submission 818, 12.
- 204 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 31; Transcript of Avdibegovic, 11 August 2015, 2636 [28]–[30].
- 205 Kildonan UnitingCare, Submission 770, 20.
- 206 Ibid.
- 207 Ibid 21; InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 31.
- 208 Relationships Australia Victoria, Submission 635, 22, 27, 28; Brotherhood of St Laurence, Submission 818, 11; ibid 32.
- 209 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 32.
- 210 Transcript of Avdibegovic, 11 August 2015, 2637 [23]–[29].
- 211 The Federation of Chinese Associations Vic, Submission 774, 1.
- 212 Office of Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship, 'Using Interpreting Services: Victorian Government Guidelines on Policies and Procedures' 7.
- 213 Ibid 11.
- 214 The Federation of Chinese Associations Vic, Submission 774, 2.
- 215 Coroners Court of Victoria, Submission 382, 17.
- 216 Victoria Police, 'Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence—Edition 3' (2014) 12.
- 217 Statement of Allen, 11 August 2015, 6 [19.5]; Transcript of Allen, 11 August 2015, 2671 [3]–[5], 2672 [17]–[21], 2673 [8].
- 218 See, eg, InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 42; Transcript of Avdibegovic, 11 August 2015, 2646 [24]–[28], 2647 [14]–[17].
- 219 Transcript of Becker, 11 August 2015, 2646 [8]–[13]; Community consultation, Geelong 2, 28 April 2015; Community consultation, Richmond, 1 May 2015; InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 13, 38.
- 220 Victoria Police, above n 216, 12.
- 221 Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 21.
- 222 Transcript of Allen, 11 August 2015, 2680 [25]–[30]. See also Department of Social Services (Cth), above n 5, 43.
- 223 Transcript of Allen, 11 August 2015, 2681 [8]–[14].
- 224 Community consultation, Morwell, 13 May 2015.
- 225 Statement of Allen, 11 August 2015, Attachment 1.
- 226 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 36.
- 227 See, eg, Neighbourhood Justice Centre, Application for Family Violence Intervention Order <www.fvivo-audioguide.org.au>.
- 228 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 39.
- 229 Ibid 24.
- 230 Ibid 39.
- 231 Ibid.
- 232 Court Network, Submission 927, 14.
- 233 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 43.
- 234 Court Network, Submission 927, 14.
- 235 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 8.
- 236 Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 8.
- 237 Court Network, Submission 927, 5.
- 238 Professionals Australia, Submission 442, 6–12. See also WAYSS Limited, Submission 542, 44.
- 239 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 43.
- 240 Professionals Australia, Submission 442, 8.

29 Faith communities

Introduction

Faith-based communities and organisations play an important role in the lives of many Victorians. These communities and organisations offer a vital opportunity to reach people who are affected by family violence, many of whom might not use formal family violence service pathways to seek help. It is therefore important that faith-based communities address barriers to the disclosure, prevention of or recovery from family violence and make it clear that religion cannot be used by perpetrators and others to condone or excuse abusive behaviour.

The first section of this chapter discusses evidence before the Royal Commission about the importance of faith communities in interacting with people affected by family violence; these communities are well placed to educate their members, influence attitudes and individuals' behaviours, respond to violence, provide support to victims, and facilitate referrals.

In its community consultations the Commission heard from leaders of a number of faith communities—as well as from women and from people working in the family violence field—about the support that faith communities can provide to people affected by family violence. The Commission also heard, however, that women experiencing family violence can face barriers to seeking help within their faith communities as a result of particular religious beliefs and practices.

The second section of this chapter outlines some of the issues leaders and members of faith communities raised. Spiritual abuse and the use of faith to support or condone violence are concerns in some communities. The Commission also heard that training for faith leaders in recognising and responding to family violence is inadequate. This lack of awareness of and knowledge about how to respond to disclosures of family violence limits communities' ability to support those experiencing such violence. Several examples of initiatives led by different faith communities, with the aim of preventing and responding to family violence, are also documented.

The chapter concludes with the Commission's views and recommendations relating to the need to facilitate and resource a multi-faith approach to improving information, training and responses to family violence in all faith communities and to ensure that family violence services take account of the needs of women from faith communities who seek their support.

Context and current practice

A wide range of faiths are practised by people in Victoria. In the 2011 census 67.7 per cent of Victorians indicated a religious affiliation. In terms of numbers, the most prominent faith communities are Western Catholic (26.6 per cent), the Anglican Church of Australia (12.3 per cent), the Uniting Church (4.7 per cent), Buddhism and Greek Orthodox (both 3.1 per cent) and Islam (2.9 per cent).

A comparison of census data for 2006 and 2011 reveals different trends for the top-ranking religions: the predominance of Christian faiths has declined slightly, whereas the number of Victorians of non-Christian faith has increased considerably. For example, the number of adherents of Buddhism increased by 27.1 per cent; the number of those adhering to Islam increased by 39.7 per cent; the number of Hindus increased by 96.5 per cent, and the number of Sikhs increased by 224.6 per cent.¹

Although there is no data on the prevalence of family violence in particular faith communities, anecdotal evidence suggests that such violence is causing increasing concern among those communities and their leaders.²

As noted in Chapter 28, both culture and faith can add complexity to a victim's experience of family violence and their ability to gain access to services. Importantly, however, the difficulties culturally and linguistically diverse communities and faith communities face are often distinct. People might share the same cultural practice yet come from different faith traditions.

The role of faith and faith-based responses to family violence was mentioned at a number of community consultations with women and people working in the family violence field and in submissions to the Commission. The comments predominantly related to the Christian, Jewish and Muslim faiths.

With the assistance of the Office for Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship, the Commission arranged a faith leaders consultation that was attended by representatives of the Anglican, Catholic, Jewish, Hindu, Muslim, Coptic Orthodox and Russian Orthodox communities.³ The consultation provided valuable insights into the experiences of faith leaders. All the leaders recognised that no faith community is immune from family violence by reason of their particular faith. The consultation also afforded the Commission an opportunity to hear about work being done in some communities to prevent and respond to such violence.

The importance of faith-based responses to family violence

Faith communities are 'vital settings' for dealing with family violence for a number of reasons:⁴

- ▷ They have an ability to reach and engage people who might not approach formal service providers in the family violence system.⁵
- ▷ They are places where people can go to find 'solace, meaning, comfort and support',⁶ and they can create supportive social networks for their members who are affected by family violence.
- ▷ They can provide education to their members about family violence.⁷
- ▷ Faith leaders occupy a position of authority in their community and have the ability to influence the behaviour of community members.⁸
- ▷ They can sensitively introduce ways of seeing the roles of men and women in society to members of their own communities, without being seen as 'outsiders'.⁹

Along with friends, family members and work colleagues, ministers of religion feature among the groups of people identified as the most common source of support following a woman's most recent physical assault by her cohabiting partner and in cases of assault generally.¹⁰

An international study commissioned by the United Kingdom's Department for International Development looked at the available literature and held consultations with a variety of experts from around the world on the topic of faith-based prevention and response activities. While noting that the existing literature primarily focuses on particular regions and particular religions,¹¹ the report stated:

The literature and experts agree ... that faith communities are present at grassroots level, all over the world, have existed for generations, are present before, during and after political unrest, and are insiders within the communities they serve. They are thus an integral part of a holistic response to SGBV [sexual and gender-based violence], able to carry out long-term interventions that aim to impact the root causes of SGBV. Particularly faith leaders, as moral authorities, have the potential to influence an entire community.¹²

In view of the authority faith leaders possess and the trust their communities place in them, these leaders are ideally positioned to influence community attitudes and provide strong leadership in relation to family violence:

The influential and respected position held by community and religious leaders provides an opportunity to foster genuine leadership on family violence, particularly in CALD communities. Religious leaders are in the unique position of being asked to provide spiritual guidance and support both to survivors and perpetrators of family violence.¹³

Our experience has shown that congregants who are victims of abuse often disclose to their rabbi; therefore, rabbis play a vital role in enabling vulnerable community members to move forward to create positive change in their lives and the lives of their families.¹⁴

Many faith-based organisations also deliver important services to victims and perpetrators of family violence through their community service agencies. In some instances, however, the beliefs of certain faith groups can become barriers to gaining access to those services.¹⁵

Faith-based initiatives

The faith leaders who participated in the Commission's consultation acknowledged that family violence is a problem facing all faith communities. They also agreed that much could be learnt from the experience of responding to family violence across faith traditions and by drawing on common teachings about compassion, respect and dignity.¹⁶ In relation to Islam, the Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights stated that the faith is 'a powerful and effective framework towards [family violence's] eradication'.¹⁷

Faith leaders spoke of the diversity that exists between and within faith communities and acknowledged the need to tailor responses to family violence to meet the requirements of their particular communities.¹⁸

Experience suggests that the most effective way of dealing with family violence in faith communities is on a faith-by-faith basis. Drawing on his experience working on the Northern Interfaith Respectful Relationships Project, Mr Scott Holmes, Project Manager, Health Promotion at YMCA Victoria, gave evidence that:

... it is probably much more productive to actually work from a faith by faith basis so that each of those faith traditions can be dealing with the issue in the context of their sacred text, their cultural backgrounds, their world views and so forth.¹⁹

A number of faith communities have been doing important work on preventing and responding to family violence. The Commission was told about the following initiatives:

- ▷ Anglicans Helping to Prevent Violence against Women, launched in October 2011, is a model of primary prevention that seeks to reduce the prevalence of violence by building a culture of equal and respectful gender relationships in Anglican organisations and local churches. The Anglican community has delivered active bystander training, peer mentoring and training in violence prevention in a number of parishes.²⁰
- ▷ The CHALLENGE Family Violence project, a partnership between the City of Casey, Cardinia Shire Council, the City of Greater Dandenong and Monash Health, provided training to local faith leaders and supported them in producing a resource entitled Creating Equality and Respect: An Interfaith Collaboration on Preventing Family Violence, which is designed to assist faith leaders in preventing family violence in their communities.²¹
- ▷ The Northern Interfaith Respectful Relationships project was a partnership between Darebin City Council and VicHealth and involved initiatives such as forums and workshops for faith leaders to raise awareness of family violence, production of a manual and tool kit, promotion of White Ribbon Day activities among the faith communities, and a peer mentoring program.²²
- ▷ In partnership with the Rabbinical Council of Victoria, the Jewish Taskforce Against Family Violence published Will My Rabbi Believe Me? Will He Understand? Responding to Disclosures of Family Violence in a Rabbinic Context, which is designed to help rabbis respond appropriately to disclosures of family violence.²³ The taskforce also provides training for rabbis about family violence and training to Victoria Police, Domestic Violence Victoria and maternal and child health nurses about Jewish cultural and religious traditions.²⁴ Faith leaders told us this training has been very useful in helping mainstream services respond more sensitively to Jewish women experiencing family violence.²⁵
- ▷ The Islamic Council of Victoria has assigned an imam to visit a different mosque each week to speak about family violence and stress that it is not acceptable.²⁶

Challenges and opportunities

This section outlines some of the challenges and other matters leaders and members of faith communities raised with the Commission and provides several examples of initiatives led by different faith communities with the aim of preventing and responding to family violence.

Faith leaders' views on family violence

In the majority of cases where women had sought assistance from faith communities in which the leaders, the commission was told the leaders were predominantly or exclusively men.

Some women received valuable support after they had disclosed family violence.²⁷ For example, one woman told us her priest helped her secure sole custody of her children and was of great emotional support to her, which was particularly important since she had no family in Australia.²⁸

For many women, however, the response was inadequate. The Commission heard that some faith leaders were uninformed and ill-equipped to respond to such disclosures: 'often the advice given wasn't helpful because the faith leader didn't know what kind of advice to give.'²⁹

My mother was repeatedly advised by elders in our church that she should stay with my father when she approached them for advice or when things at home had become intolerable.³⁰

At some point in our marriage I went to speak to our religious leader and ask advice about my husband's abusive behaviour. The religious leader advised me that perhaps if the house was cleaner when my husband got home, or if I cooked better, he might not be so angry. As a result of confiding to my religious leader, I was referred to a counselling service that advised me on how to be a more obliging and obedient wife.³¹

In other examples provided to the Commission, faith leaders colluded with perpetrators of family violence:

I was manipulated to stay within my marriage by five different ministers and respective congregations ... One church assisted my ex-husband to hide assets. Another minister phoned my friends and warned them to have nothing to do with me, [and] reveal where I was hiding. Another declared I was protected by God because I didn't die in the assault and to drop the AVO and return to my marriage because I married in sickness and in health, and he was only 'sick'. I was told I am my husband's property ... to be obedient so he wouldn't have to hit me, don't place demands, allow him to try and be a man, and be more loving etc, to the point of one congregation member coaching him in how to respond/act regarding psych evaluations and questioning ... I am gravely concerned about the lack of skills for lay ministers, counsellors and psychologist in the area of family violence counselling. One church-sponsored counsellor said 'Be gentle with him, he's trying to be a man'.³²

Some women felt pressured to remain in abusive relationships because of attitudes towards marriage and divorce:

[Family violence] was never, ever spoken of in my church. All that was spoken of was that a wife should submit to her husband. That women should submit to men. That women were not to speak in church. Not to lead prayer or deliver Scripture ... Divorce was considered unacceptable. Abuse was never spoken of so I have no idea whether it would have been an acceptable reason for someone to leave a marriage. I doubt that it would have been. Marriage vows were taken for better or worse. No matter what. You should just pray harder if things were difficult.³³

There was also a perception that ‘religious leaders simply reinforce the patriarchy’.³⁴ This view, which was expressed during the community consultations, has also been noted in recent research:

Most of the faith leaders are male and their reading and interpretation of holy scriptures often carry a decidedly patriarchal bias. Many participants argue that it is because there is an interweaving and cross-contamination of religion and patriarchal culture. Thus religion, and the way faith leaders interpret and teach it, echoes the patriarchal cultural ideas of male and female roles and power dynamics ... The way it is done actually at times facilitates and justifies [sexual and gender-based violence], for beliefs that justify and enable violence are preached and condoned. These include beliefs such as that wives should be submissive, and that women are the property of men.³⁵

In some faith communities the decision not to inform a secular authority of family violence is based on the stigma and shame associated with such a disclosure. The Commission heard that women can be pressured to ‘keep everything in the community’ and that if they seek outside help they are ‘shunned, stigmatised, isolated’.³⁶ One woman said that, although she was brought up to believe her faith leader would help in a time of crisis, she felt she could not turn to him because ‘if you spoke out you were committing a sin’.³⁷

The Casey Multi-Faith Network reported:

We have felt that faith communities often don’t want to be associated with issues related to family violence for fear of stigma or other such apprehensions. We have often found that faith communities want to brush such issues as family violence under the carpet and either do not want to deal with the problems, or want to hide them.³⁸

The Commission heard that in parts of the Jewish community there is ‘heavy reliance on keeping individual problems, such as family violence and child sexual abuse, within the community itself so as not to be seen to bring shame onto the community for exposing these problems to the non-Jewish community’.³⁹

Equipping faith leaders

The Commission heard that many faith leaders have received no training in dealing with family violence or were trained long ago. Mr Holmes noted during his evidence:

... the faith leader might think that they can care for both the victim and the perpetrator equally and not understand that there’s differences of power going on in those relationships and that they may not be the best person to care for both the victim and perpetrator, or indeed either, and need to refer elsewhere. So there is a role there to try to ensure that faith communities have best practice in terms of how to deal with their members who are experiencing family violence.⁴⁰

Some faith leaders were trained in countries where the understanding of relationships and gender roles was different from that in Australia.⁴¹ As a result of increased migration, some faith communities are now more culturally diverse, and faith leaders might not be properly equipped to understand the cultural practices of new communities aligned with a particular faith and where these practices might be misused. As was noted during the Commission’s consultation with faith leaders:

We also need to improve the cultural competence of the clergy to understand these issues [cultural dimensions of family violence, such as dowry]. Many clergy also come from other cultures and don’t fully understand what the issues are. More education and more opportunities for upskilling within the clergy are needed. We also need to have women in pastoral leadership roles as sometimes women won’t feel comfortable coming to a priest in what they perceive to be a very patriarchal system. Access to appropriate pastoral carers is really important.⁴²

In addition, a reluctance in some communities to discuss sex and related matters can inhibit discussion about sexual and family violence:

Addressing SGBV [sexual and gender-based violence] within and through faith communities is thus challenging, for one has first to deal with the refusal to even mention the topic. This refusal to mention or discuss SGBV often extends to the underlying causes of SGBV as well such as patriarchy, power and gender inequality.⁴³

Ms Joumanah El Matrah, Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights gave evidence about the importance of attitudes to gender equality among faith leaders and suggested this should be the focus of further training:

... while religious leaders may not agree with violence against women, a great number of religious leaders do see men and women as unequal and the idea of men being superior to women is one of the lead contributors to violence against women. Unless that shifts, no amount of support to them to eradicate violence is going to work.⁴⁴

Faith leaders also emphasised the importance of theological training to aid with contemporary interpretation of religious texts that might otherwise be seen to condone violent and controlling behaviour.⁴⁵

Using faith to support or condone the use of violence

The Commission heard that some men use faith to excuse their behaviour. Ms El Matrah gave evidence about the concept of 'spiritual abuse', which she explained as 'the use of religion to justify gender inequality and to justify violence against women'.⁴⁶ Spiritual abuse can occur in all faith communities and can include the following:

- ▷ using religion to dominate, exercise authority and claim superiority
- ▷ using someone's religious or spiritual beliefs to manipulate the person
- ▷ providing to someone incorrect religious information in order to promote the provider's own interests and needs
- ▷ preventing someone from practising their religious and spiritual beliefs
- ▷ ridiculing someone's religious or spiritual beliefs
- ▷ refusing a religious divorce.⁴⁷

The Commission heard that refusing a religious divorce is a particular concern in the Jewish and Muslim communities. Some men use their capacity to refuse a religious divorce as a means of manipulating or otherwise exerting control over women.

In the Orthodox Jewish community religious divorces are arranged by a rabbinic tribunal and entail the delivery of a divorce document called a gett from the husband to the wife.⁴⁸ Jewish Care Victoria told the Commission:

A woman who is refused a [gett] is referred to as an agunah (a chained woman). Gett refusal is often another form of abuse as it enables one party (the man) to exercise inappropriate power and control over the other. Without a [g]ett, the divorce is not recognised under Jewish law even if Australian courts grant the divorce.⁴⁹

If a man refuses to give his wife a get, she will be prevented from remarrying according to Jewish Law and from subsequently having children who can participate fully in the religious community.⁵⁰

In connection with the Muslim community, the Commission heard the following:

In some communities [polygamy] occurs more than others. They just get a second wife who is often from Australia too. It's just a religious marriage, after the first civil one. There's no way the first wife can challenge it. If the man doesn't want to give her a divorce she just has to live with it. The second wife doesn't have any rights either. It then sets up two women for abuse instead of one.⁵¹

Even having a civil divorce doesn't ensure the man will agree to an Islamic [religious] divorce ... Another woman got her Islamic divorce but now he has disappeared and she can't get her civil divorce.⁵²

Isolation from mainstream support services

As noted, faith communities can reach people who might not approach formal service providers in the family violence system. Women from some faith communities can feel isolated from mainstream services such as specialist family violence services, legal services and police. As described in Chapter 28, social isolation is a barrier for many women of culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds. In the context of faith communities, the following are perceived barriers for women seeking access to mainstream services:

- ▷ lack of knowledge about their rights and about the service system as a whole—especially in communities that do not use mainstream media and communication networks
- ▷ reluctance to seek help outside their own community
- ▷ a belief that mainstream services are not sensitive to their needs and, in particular, that refuge and crisis accommodation will not provide for or support the continuation of their religious and cultural practices. For example, women might be concerned they will not be able to satisfy kosher dietary requirements in a refuge or continue to send their children to the same school and attend the same place of worship.⁵³

These barriers can force women to feel they must choose between their safety and their faith.⁵⁴

The way forward

Despite the challenges experienced in faith-based responses to family violence, faith settings are an integral part of the community response to family violence. Faith leaders and organisations have direct and influential contact with many members of the Victorian community, and their guidance and intervention are often sought when family violence is being experienced. The trust communities have in their faith leaders enables these leaders to play an important role in educating communities about family violence, reinforcing community standards in relation to respect, dignity and non-violence, and providing practical advice and assistance to people in need.

The faith leaders the Commission consulted demonstrated a strong commitment to addressing the family violence that occurs in their communities. They also acknowledged, however, that they and their colleagues and communities require assistance to understand how to prevent, recognise and respond appropriately. Training for faith leaders in recognising and responding to family violence is generally inadequate. This lack of awareness and knowledge of how to respond to disclosures of family violence limits their ability to support women experiencing such violence.

As was evident in the personal accounts the Commission received, some attitudes and practices, and inadequate or ill-informed responses by faith leaders, risk exposing victims to further and sustained abuse by their family members. Women experiencing family violence can face barriers to seeking help within their faith community because of particular religious beliefs (for example, about divorce or gender roles). These barriers can force women into making a choice between their safety and their faith.

The Commission welcomes the different initiatives by faith communities, as outlined above. These communities should be supported in strengthening and building on this work and be equipped to respond sensitively and appropriately to disclosures of family violence, to maximise victims' safety, to refer victims and perpetrators to relevant services, and to challenge violence-supporting attitudes and behaviours. Faith communities should consider how to record the existence of these programs and to regularly assess how well they are working.

The Victorian Multicultural Commission is established under the Multicultural Victoria Act 2011 (Vic), and its functions include promoting full participation by Victoria's diverse communities in the social, cultural, economic and political life of the state and access by the state's diverse communities to services made available by governments and other bodies.⁵⁵ 'Diversity' is defined to include religious diversity, as well as cultural, racial and linguistic diversity.⁵⁶ The Commission notes the work done by the Victorian Multicultural Commission in developing responses to family violence.

The Office of Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship has a continuing role in supporting faith communities in Victoria, including supporting them in developing responses to family violence. It convenes the OMAC Multifaith Advisory Group, which facilitates continuing dialogue between the Victorian Government and Victoria's faith leaders and communities. The Advisory Group consists of about 25 senior representatives of Victoria's diverse faith communities—including various Christian, Jewish, Muslim, Sikh, Hindu, Buddhist and Baha'i communities.⁵⁷

The Victorian Multicultural Commission and the OMAC Multifaith Advisory Group are well placed to assist faith communities in their efforts to prevent and respond to family violence. In light of this, we make a recommendation for these bodies to work in partnership with family violence practitioners and women from faith communities to develop training packages on family violence and sexual assault for faith leaders and communities.

We also acknowledge the importance of mainstream family violence services understanding and being sensitive to people's religious and cultural needs. It therefore proposes that the recommended review of practice standards for specialist family violence services and men's behaviour change programs be informed by representatives of, and women from, faith communities.

Recommendation 163

The Office of Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship Multifaith Advisory Group and the Victorian Multicultural Commission, in partnership with expert family violence practitioners, develop training packages on family violence and sexual assault for faith leaders and communities [within three years]. These packages should build on existing work, reflect leading practice in responding to family violence, and include information about referral pathways for victims and perpetrators. The training should be suitable for inclusion as part of the pre-service learning in various faith training institutes, as well as the ongoing professional development of faith leaders.

Recommendation 164

The Department of Health and Human Services consult with the Office of Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship Multifaith Advisory Group, the Victorian Multicultural Commission and women from faith communities as part of its review of standards for specialist family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs), to ensure that these standards and the associated services take account of the needs of people in faith communities who experience family violence [within two years].

Recommendation 165

Faith leaders and communities establish processes for examining the ways in which they currently respond to family violence in their communities and whether any of their practices operate as deterrents to the prevention or reporting of, or recovery from, family violence or are used by perpetrators to excuse or condone abusive behaviour.

Endnotes

- 1 Office of Multicultural Affairs and Citizenship, 'Victoria's Diverse Population: 2011 Census' (2013).
- 2 Faith leader consultation, Melbourne, 2 September 2015.
- 3 A number of invitees from other faith communities were unable to attend the consultation on the day.
- 4 Transcript of Holmes, 10 August 2015, 2439 [26].
- 5 Jewish Taskforce Against Family Violence, Submission 820, 2.
- 6 Statement of Holmes, 26 June 2015, 13 [64].
- 7 See, eg, Anglican Diocese of Melbourne, Submission 173, 5–8.
- 8 Statement of Holmes, 26 June 2015, 13 [65].
- 9 Elisabet le Roux, 'A Scoping Study on the Role of Faith Communities and Organisations in Prevention and Response to Sexual and Gender-based Violence: Implications for Policy and Practice' (Stellenbosch University, Unit for Religion and Development Research, September 2015) 53.
- 10 Peta Cox, 'Violence Against Women: Additional Analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012' (Horizons Research Paper No 01, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, October 2015) 113.
- 11 le Roux, above n 9, 7.
- 12 Ibid 8.
- 13 Brotherhood of St Laurence, Submission 818, 13, (citations omitted).
- 14 Jewish Taskforce Against Family Violence, Submission 820, 20.
- 15 For example, the barriers that can arise for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people seeking to access these services are discussed in Chapter 30.
- 16 Faith leader consultation, Melbourne, 2 September 2015.
- 17 Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights, Submission 728, 11.
- 18 Faith leader consultation, Melbourne, 2 September 2015.
- 19 Transcript of Holmes, 10 August 2015, 2440 [21]–[25].
- 20 Anglican Diocese of Melbourne, Submission 173, 7. See also, Faith leader consultation, Melbourne, 2 September 2015.
- 21 City of Casey, Submission 354, 4; Borderlands Cooperative, 'Challenge Family Violence Project: Making Things Happen to Prevent Violence Against Women--Interim Evaluation Report (4), November 2014 to May 2015' (1 May 2015), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 22 Statement of Holmes, 26 June 2015, 14 [71]–[72], 15 [75].
- 23 Jewish Taskforce Against Family Violence, Submission 820, 2.
- 24 Ibid.
- 25 Faith leader consultation, Melbourne, 2 September 2015.
- 26 Ibid.
- 27 Department of Social Services (Cth), 'Hearing Her Voice: Report from the Kitchen Table Conversations with Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Women on Violence Against Women and Their Children' (September 2015) 36.
- 28 Community consultation, Melbourne, 6 May 2015.
- 29 Community consultation, Sandringham, 29 April 2015.
- 30 Anonymous, Submission 263, 1.
- 31 Statement of Jones', 13 July 2015, 2 [10].
- 32 Anonymous, Submission 230, 1.
- 33 Anonymous, Submission 200, 5.
- 34 Community consultation, Morwell, 13 May 2015.
- 35 le Roux, above n 9, 47–8.
- 36 Community consultation, Geelong 2, 28 April 2015.
- 37 Community consultation, Morwell, 13 May 2015.
- 38 Casey Multi-Faith Network, Submission 400, 2.
- 39 Jewish Care Victoria, Submission 761, 2.
- 40 Transcript of Holmes, 10 August 2015, 2439 [15]–[24].
- 41 Faith leader consultation, Melbourne, 2 September 2015.
- 42 Ibid.
- 43 le Roux, above n 9, 48.
- 44 Transcript of El Matrah, 11 August 2015, 2639 [31]–2640 [6].
- 45 Faith leader consultation, Melbourne, 2 September 2015.
- 46 Transcript of El Matrah, 11 August 2015, 2638 [12]–[14].
- 47 Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights, Submission 728, 12–13.
- 48 Jewish Care Victoria, Submission 761, 6.
- 49 Ibid.
- 50 Tayla Faigenbaum and Ann Wollner, Submission 484, 2.
- 51 Community consultation, Northcote 2, 6 July 2015.
- 52 Ibid.
- 53 Jewish Care Victoria, Submission 761, 2, 4.
- 54 Ibid 7.
- 55 Multicultural Victoria Act 2011 (Vic) s 7.
- 56 Ibid s 3.
- 57 Victorian Multicultural Commission, Consultative Structures <<http://www.multicultural.vic.gov.au/projectsand-initiatives/promoting-harmony/consultative-structures>>.

30 Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities

Introduction

The Commission's terms of reference require it to consider the needs and experiences of people affected by family violence, having particular regard to, among others, people from gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities.

This chapter outlines the diverse experiences of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people affected by family violence. Although transgender and intersex communities are often grouped together with gay and lesbian and bisexual communities because of a shared history of discrimination, we recognise that each of these communities and the barriers they face are distinct. It is for convenience only that this chapter refers collectively to 'LGBTI communities'.

This chapter examines the unique forms of family violence that can be experienced by LGBTI people. This can include such forms of family violence as threatening to 'out' a person, using homophobia as a tool of control, refusing to acknowledge or recognise a person's sexuality or gender identity, withholding medication such as hormones or HIV medication, or threatening to disclose HIV status. LGBTI people are less likely to report family violence to police or seek help from services, due to mistrust, fear of discrimination or simply due to a lack of appropriate services being available to assist them. LGBTI people may experience additional disadvantage associated with other identities or attributes they may have—as an Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander, a person from a culturally or linguistically diverse background, an older person, a person living in a rural, regional or remote area or as a person with a disability.

The family violence experience of LGBTI people are often invisible to the broader community. This chapter considers some of the key challenges for LGBTI people—including a lack of information, data and education within the community. The failure of a number of services and programs to recognise the unique experiences of people in LGBTI communities can lead to services being inaccessible or inappropriate for both victims and perpetrators. The potential for lawful discrimination against LGBTI people, including by providers of family violence services and other related services, also adversely affects LGBTI people.

The Commission recognises the need for greater community awareness of the needs of LGBTI people in relation to family violence. Greater attention by police, the courts and family violence services is also needed. We recommend the development of LGBTI-specific resources, programs and community education campaigns to improve awareness and understanding of family violence in this context. The Commission also recommends improvements to family violence services to respond to the needs of people in these communities.

Context and current practice

LGBTI communities in Victoria

In discussing the experiences of people in LGBTI communities, the Commission recognises that there are both diverse sexualities and gender identities. Sexuality is about a person being attracted to a person. Gay and lesbian people are attracted to people of the same sex, while bisexual people are attracted to people of a variety of sexes. Gender identity is about whether someone identifies as a woman, man or another form of gender identity. A transgender person is someone who was assigned a sex at birth that they do not feel reflects how they understand their gender identity. An intersex person is described by the Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) as someone with physical, hormonal or genetic features that are considered neither wholly female or wholly male, are a combination of female or male or are neither female or male.¹ Others define an intersex person to be someone 'born with physical sex characteristics that don't fit medical norms for female or male bodies.'² A person can identify as a gay, lesbian or bisexual (sexuality), as well as transgender or intersex (gender identity). The concept of gender identity is discussed in more detail in the box on this page.

Understanding gender identity

Although our society has historically treated gender as a binary concept—that is, either male or female—there is a spectrum of gender, resulting in gender diversity.³

Affirming gender and transitioning between genders are deeply personal decisions that involve a person seeking to redress a mismatch between their sex and their gender identity. They do not necessarily entail gender-reassignment surgery; they simply mean that a person is living their affirmed gender.⁴

The Commission was told that while attitudes are gradually changing, discrimination towards LGBTI people is still prevalent.⁵ Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria told us that:

...Recent research indicates that, while Australians' attitudes to sexual diversity have improved in the last ten years, still 1 in 8 women and 1 in 4 men think sex between two men is 'always wrong', and 1 in 6 men and 1 in 8 women think sex between two women is always wrong.⁶

Similarly, No To Violence and Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre note in their submission that:

the prevalence of violence, harassment and discrimination experienced generally by LGBTIQ people, is proportionally higher than that experienced in the broader community.⁷

In recent years, there has been progress in societal recognition of LGBTI people, particularly in our understanding of diverse relationships and family composition. This has been reflected in legislative changes to be more inclusive of people in these communities.

In 2000, gender identity and sexual orientation were recognised as attributes on the basis of which discrimination is prohibited under Victoria's equal opportunity legislation.⁸ In 2001, a series of legislative reforms amended a variety of pieces of legislation to recognise the rights and obligations of partners in domestic relationships, irrespective of the gender of each partner.⁹

The Relationships Act 2008 (Vic) allowed Victorian couples in domestic relationships, irrespective of their genders, to register their relationship with the Registrar of Births, Deaths and Marriages.¹⁰ This mechanism was intended to make it easier for domestic partners to access rights afforded to other couples under Victorian law.¹¹

In 2015, the Victorian Parliament amended the Adoption Act 1984 (Vic) to allow same-sex couples to adopt children.¹²

In addition to Victorian developments, the Commission notes the ongoing debate regarding Commonwealth law reform to recognise same-sex marriage.

The definition of family violence in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) is 'expansive, non-exhaustive and ... gender neutral'.¹³ The definitions of 'domestic partner' and 'family member' are applicable to members of the LGBTI community.¹⁴ In determining whether a person is a domestic partner of another person, the genders of the persons are irrelevant.¹⁵ Further, one of the statutory examples of emotional or psychological abuse set out in the Act specifically relates to a person's sexual orientation.¹⁶

Based on the 2011 Census, in Victoria there were 1,160,880 heterosexual couples, 4666 male same-sex couples and 4056 female same-sex couples.¹⁷ While the number of same-sex couples is likely to be under-reported—including for reasons discussed elsewhere in this chapter such as a fear of homophobia and discrimination if such relationships are identified—this data suggests that same-sex couples ($n=8722$) represent 0.7 per cent of all couples in Victoria. Data regarding the number of transgender and intersex people in Victoria is not readily available.

Prevalence of family violence in LGBTI communities

There has been little research into family violence in LGBTI relationships, in Australia or elsewhere. The Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey does not collect data on lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex identity.

However, the research that has been done suggests that intimate partner violence is as prevalent in LGBTI communities as it is in the general population:

- ▷ A 2008 study of 390 LGBTI Victorians reported that almost one-third of respondents had been in a same-sex relationship in which they were subjected to abuse by their partner.¹⁸
- ▷ Similarly, almost 33 per cent of the 5476 respondents in the Private Lives study—one of the largest surveys of LGBTI people ever conducted—reported experiencing intimate partner abuse.¹⁹
- ▷ In that study, 41 per cent of females and 28 per cent of males reported experiencing abuse within an intimate partner relationship, while 25 per cent of females and 20 per cent of males reported forced sex within such relationships.²⁰
- ▷ Only 18 per cent of those who had experienced forced sex and 20 per cent of those who were physically injured reported this to police.²¹

Victoria Police data also reveals that between 2013 and 2014, there were 373 incidents involving a male affected family member (that is, victim) and a current or former male partner as the other party (that is, perpetrator). This represents 8.3 per cent of all family violence incidents involving a male other party and 5.2 per cent of all male victim incidents involving a current or former partner and three per cent of all male victim incidents.²²

There were 308 incidents involving a female affected family member and a current or former female partner as the other party, representing 10 per cent of all incidents involving a female other party, one per cent of all female victim incidents involving a current or former partner and 0.7 per cent of all female victim incidents.²³

As a subset of family violence incidents recorded, those involving a current or former same-sex partner accounted for 1.7 per cent of all incidents involving a current or former partner and 1.1 per cent of all incidents.²⁴

Research from the Victorian Family Violence Database shows that of some 29,978 original applications for a family violence intervention order between 2013 and 2014, 68 per cent involved a current or former domestic partner or intimate personal relationship ($n=20,284$).²⁵ Applications involving an affected family member in a same-sex relationship ($n=639$) accounted for 3.2 per cent of all applications involving a current or former domestic partner or intimate personal relationship and 2.1 per cent of all applications.²⁶

A systematic literature review of intimate partner violence among US men who have sex with men found that all forms of intimate partner violence (physical, sexual and psychological) occur at 'alarming rates'—similar to or higher than those measured in populations of women.²⁷

Australian research data has identified high incidences of intimate partner violence experienced by transgender and intersex people as compared to non-transgender and non-intersex gay, lesbian and bisexual people.²⁸ The Commission heard that transgender people experience higher levels of violence in their lives than lesbian, gay and bisexual people.²⁹ Transgender women, in particular, are at greater risk of hate crime and sexual assault than others in the LGBTI community.³⁰

Little information is available about the experiences of intersex Australians who suffer family violence, but anecdotal evidence suggests that, because of society's poor understanding of intersex people and the associated social stigma, such people are highly vulnerable to discrimination and family violence.³¹

Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria's submission explained that some aspects of identity—such as a person's age, race, cultural and linguistic background, disability, and living in rural, regional and remote areas—might put LGBTI people at greater risk of experiencing family violence and make it less likely that they can gain access to appropriate services.³²

LGBTI experiences of family violence

Members of LGBTI communities can experience the same forms of family violence as the general population. For example, family violence in gay and lesbian relationships, as in heterosexual relationships, ranges from physical or sexual violence to psychological, emotional or economic abuse. Like family violence in heterosexual relationships, family violence in gay and lesbian relationships can include a pattern of behaviour, involving one partner using and maintaining power and control over the other.³³

Unique forms of family violence for LGBTI people

Experiences of intimate partner violence within LGBTI communities can also be different to the experiences of heterosexual people. Drummond Street Services submitted to the Commission that it has been 'struck by the complexity' of intimate partner violence in LGBTI members of the community who present at counselling services. For example:

IPV assessment is very specialist to understand both sex and gender identity issues and identify victim, perpetrator in relationships where clinically we see high rates of mutual violence. This tends to be common in LGBTIQ couples where both experience or have histories of child abuse, victimisation and bullying, lack of family supports, difficult experienced of coming out or gender affirmation/disclosure and lack of supports.³⁴

The Family Violence Protection Act defines ‘emotional or psychological abuse’ as including the specific example of ‘threatening to disclose a person’s sexual orientation to the person’s friends or family against the person’s wishes’.³⁵ ‘Outing’ a person is a common form of family violence in LGBTI communities.³⁶ The following are other kinds of violence:

- ▷ telling a partner they will lose custody of children as a result of being outed
- ▷ using homophobia as a tool of control—for example, through telling a partner they will be unable to gain access to police or other support services because the system is homophobic
- ▷ telling a partner they deserve the violence because they are lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender or intersex
- ▷ telling a partner they are not a real woman, man or lesbian, gay or bisexual person
- ▷ disclosing or threatening to disclose HIV status
- ▷ hiding, withholding or otherwise preventing a partner from taking medication or treatment such as hormones or HIV medication.³⁷

Challenging sexual and gender norms can be a major trigger of violence in some families:

LGBTI people may be at greater risk than heterosexual people from abuse, harassment and violence from family members such as parents, siblings and offspring due to entrenched homophobia ... For older people, there may be a heightened risk of homophobic-related family violence, particularly as they become more dependant or frail.³⁸

At a community consultation the Commission was told:

Too often family violence is referred to as ‘difference in values’. We need to recognise abuse against children because they don’t fit in. Often children who come out are at risk of being abused by their parents and family.³⁹

Barriers to reporting violence

The Commission heard that people who experience homophobia and transphobia face particular barriers when it comes to reporting family violence. A recent Sydney study found that 53.5 per cent of 116 female respondents and 67.1 per cent of 70 male respondents who had experienced abuse in a current or previous LGBTI relationship did not seek any form of assistance.⁴⁰

People from LGBTI communities are less likely to report violence, to seek support or to identify experiences of family violence and abuse, partly because of a fear of ‘outing’, as well as actual or perceived discrimination and harassment.⁴¹

In addition, people from LGBTI communities may have less support from family when experiencing violent relationships. The joint submission of No To Violence and Safe Steps explained:

Therefore some LGBTIQ people leaving a violent partner may be doing so without the support of biological family, who may have alienated them due to their intersex status or sexual and gender identity. This creates another layer of disadvantage, particularly if they are experiencing poverty, unemployment or under employment.⁴²

Transgender people report specific forms of family violence that might not be experienced by others; for example, a transgender person’s partner might cease recognising the victim’s gender as a man, woman or non-binary gender as a form of emotional abuse.⁴³

Intersex people can experience family violence in unique ways—for example, when family members do not accept a person identifying with a gender different from that which their parents attributed to them:

Intersex youth can also experience strong reactions from biological relatives if they have physical characteristics that may challenge their fundamental perception about the young person’s place and role within the family. Intersex organisations have stated that these reactions can be, and sometimes are, violent.⁴⁴

The Commission was informed that the justice system as well as service providers are not always supportive of intersex individuals. Police, specialist family violence services and other sources of assistance 'should be aware that a client could be intersex, and that many intersex people identify as women or men and not as a "third gender" or "third sex"'.⁴⁵

Intersection of different aspects of identity

Different aspects of identity can intersect to make family violence different for each individual in the LGBTI community.

Aboriginal people can experience family violence that is informed by both race and sexuality:

Indigenous Victorians witness or experience high[er] levels of family violence within their own communities than the general population as well as racially-based violence from the broader community. For those who identify as Indigenous and LGBTI the effects of this exposure [to] violence can be compounded by violence that might occur in their own partner relationships or be directed towards them by family members because of their sexuality or gender identity.⁴⁶

The Commission heard that LGBTI people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities can be subject to prejudice on the part of family members who have cultural or religious objections to their sexuality or gender identification:

More recently arrived migrant groups and refugee communities often come from countries where homosexuality remains a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment (79 countries) or death (in 9 countries including Iran, Iraq, Somalia and Sudan) ... Lesbian, gay, bisexual and trans* people within such families can be at significant risk in terms of their loss of liberty and personal safety ... LGB individuals have reported situations where family have physically assaulted them, locked them in their rooms, confiscated their bankcards and mobile phones, refused access to more sympathetic family members, and been subjected to 'interventions' by community elders.⁴⁷

For same-sex attracted and gender diverse young people from refugee and newly arrived communities, feeling unsafe at home is a common experience.⁴⁸

Older lesbian, gay and bisexual people also face particular risks and mainstream understandings of elder abuse and family violence may not be attuned to these risks:

The vast majority of older LGBT people have experienced a long life history of social exclusion, family rejection, community-sanctioned violence and discrimination, and in some cases for men, a criminal record for having consensual adult sex. As they move into their final decades of life, their increasing vulnerability and frailty leaves them exposed to emotional and economic abuse, social isolation and physical violence perpetrated by family members and carers. After a life-long habitual need to conceal their sexual identities, older lesbian and gay people can be particularly vulnerable to violence from family members who threaten to 'out' them.⁴⁹

Older transgender people can be extremely vulnerable:

Most older trans* people have only had the opportunity to transition when they reached their 50s and 60s and many are estranged from their parents, siblings and children because of their transition. Consequently there are genuine concerns (founded in stories of what has happened to other trans* people), that family members will re-enter their lives as they become frail and dependant, and attempt to reverse their gender change process by controlling their medication, their income and their lives.⁵⁰

LGBTI people living in rural, regional and remote areas can also be at risk of further marginalisation as a result of social isolation, homophobia and transphobia⁵¹ and a lack of appropriate support services.⁵² Ms Anna Brown, Co-convenor of the Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, gave evidence that:

... we do have some very limited specialist LGBTI providers or mainstream providers with some LGBTI understanding and competency in the metro areas, very, very limited as set out in the submissions. But this obviously is deeply lacking when it comes to regional and rural Victoria and also in those areas that's coupled with the real likelihood of higher rates of discrimination, homophobia and transphobia and more likely that LGBTI people will be in the closet and fearful of seeking help. So those experiences are very much compounded in those geographical areas.⁵³

Such discrimination and lack of support can have a devastating effect on an already traumatised person:

One of our colleagues, a counsellor of family violence victims, told us of a recent case where a gay male victim of intimate partner violence was denied support by a rural domestic violence support service because of his gender. This meant that at the time of the court hearing about his assault he was forced to sit outside a small rural courthouse in close proximity to the perpetrator. He was denied access to the 'women's safe room' because of his gender. He was also denied the support of the domestic violence support worker at the court. The court process and lack of services re-victimised this man, causing him immense distress and compounded the quite significant post-traumatic stress disorder he was already suffering.⁵⁴

Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria submitted that 21 per cent of LGBTI people have a disability and that these people experience higher levels of violence than people without a disability.⁵⁵ The organisation noted that given the high levels of family violence experienced by people with disabilities generally, 'it is likely that LGBTI people face similar or greater risks due to the compounding factors of disability and sexual/gender diversity'.⁵⁶

Current prevention strategies

The National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022, is an initiative of the Council of Australian Governments with a vision to ensure that 'Australian women and their children live free from violence in safe communities'.⁵⁷ The National Plan aims to achieve 'attitudinal and behavioural change at the cultural, institutional and individual levels, with a particular focus on young people'.⁵⁸ The National Plan is supported by three-year action plans.⁵⁹

The National Plan contemplates grants to encourage primary prevention with priority given to 'women with disabilities, older women, culturally and linguistically diverse communities and gay and lesbian communities'.⁶⁰

The First Action Plan Building a Strong Foundation 2010–2013 sought to address the needs of these diverse communities,⁶¹ though LGBTI communities do not appear to have been a focus.

While the Second Action Plan Moving Ahead 2013–2016 addresses family violence in some diverse communities—Indigenous and culturally and linguistically diverse communities and people with disabilities⁶²—it does not specifically refer to LGBTI communities.

In Victoria, Building Respectful Relationships education programs are run in secondary schools, educating students on 'gender, violence and respectful relationships' to 'prevent violence against women'.⁶³ Ms Gill Callister, Secretary of the Department of Education and Training, told the Commission that the curriculum contains 'themes relevant to preventing family violence' and the importance of 'challenging attitudes and behaviours such as homophobia and sexism, including discrimination and harassment'.⁶⁴ The materials used to teach the curriculum discuss relationships and gender based violence, including same-sex relationships, diverse experiences of sexuality and homophobia.⁶⁵ They also recognise that '[v]iolence happens in same-sex relationships as well as heterosexual relationships'.⁶⁶

Dr Sue Dyson, Associate Professor and Principal Research Fellow at the Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society, La Trobe University commended the program as a 'really good [example] of sexuality education that also address violence prevention' and is one of the 'best practice examples that we need to be building on'.⁶⁷

Ms Brown suggested that the program might also provide 'a useful model to expand ... for an adult context for LGBTI communities',⁶⁸ allowing community-wide education to occur.

The Commission heard that the Healthy Equal Youth Funding project has been a successful initiative.⁶⁹ It aims to build a same-sex attracted and sex and gender diverse (SSASGD) youth platform within the mainstream youth sector and improving the quality of mental health and support services provided to these young people.⁷⁰ Funded by the Department of Health and Human Services and jointly managed by Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria and the Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc., it provides one-off small grants for SSASGD youth projects.

Safe Schools Coalition

The Healthy Equal Youth Project funds the Safe Schools Coalition Australia, which provides training and resources to schools to become free of homophobia and transphobia. There are 490 member schools across Australia who work in coalition with partner organisations to offer:

a suite of free resources and support to equip staff and students with skills, practical ideas and greater confidence to lead positive change and be safe and inclusive for same sex attracted, intersex and gender diverse students, staff and families.⁷¹

The training and resources provided as part of the program include professional development and training for teachers and other school staff. Staff and student surveys are accessible online to measure perceptions, knowledge and experience, guidance and consultation. There are also printed and digital resources for teachers, and resources to support student engagement.⁷²

In a recent United Nations report into school bullying, violence and discrimination which covered the Asia-Pacific region, it was noted that Australia was the only country in the review that had a national whole school program that addresses school bullying, violence and discrimination based on sexual orientation, gender identity and expression or intersex characteristics.⁷³

Challenges and opportunities

Many submissions discussed the particular challenges experienced by those in LGBTI communities. Some of the themes which emerged from the evidence were that issues relevant to LGBTI communities are largely absent from the discourse around family violence (including in relation to awareness and education campaigns and the collection of data), LGBTI people face particular difficulties in reporting family violence to police and in accessing support services, and that discrimination against LGBTI people remains lawful in some instances.

The invisibility of family violence in LGBTI communities

The Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby argued that LGBTI communities are rendered invisible in awareness campaigns and that this limits recognition of family violence among LGBTI communities and acts as a barrier to reporting.⁷⁴

The Commission heard that community awareness of family violence usually involves the assumption that violence is invariably perpetrated by heterosexual men against heterosexual women and therefore the majority of intimate partner violence discourse is constructed according to gendered assumptions and 'heteronormativity' (the assumption of heterosexuality). Moreover, 'misconceptions exist which suggest that those who perpetrate domestic violence must be men, or 'bitches' and those who are victims of domestic violence must be women or 'femmes', essentially emulating assumptions about domestic violence in heterosexual relationships.' These misconceptions contribute to the hesitancy of people in same-sex relationships to disclose family violence, 'mask the reality of same-sex domestic violence' and also fail 'to account for the complexities arising in same-sex relationships.'⁷⁵

Dr Philomena Horsley, Research Fellow and Senior Trainer, Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria, Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society, La Trobe University, told the Commission these assumptions can mean that LGBTI victims lack the language to recognise that what is happening to them is family violence:

I think one of the key things is it is often more difficult to recognise domestic violence and family violence from the perspective of being the victim or indeed the offender, that because the language has been extensively relating only to heterosexual couples or in fact families that are all heterosexual, there is an invisibility and exclusion over this whole issue so people don't necessarily have the vocabulary or the sense of recognition around the dynamics that occur.⁷⁶

The Commission was told this was a particular problem in relationships between gay men, who might see family violence as something that happens to heterosexual women. Even if the violence is identified as family violence, there is a degree of shame associated with being a male victim of family violence.⁷⁷ As one commentator has noted, 'The lack of resources available for men in same-sex relationships mirrors the societal belief that abuse is something that only happens to heterosexual women'.⁷⁸

One submission to the Commission commented on the lack of understanding and support in relation to family violence in the gay community:

For gay men who are subjected to family violence, they will often be met with disbelief by others in the gay community or at worse disparaged. The reason for this I think is that the issue of family violence within gay relationships isn't discussed or raised prominently. This has the potential to reinforce that family violence within a gay relationship doesn't exist. Subsequently, when it does occur, the victim is less likely to disclose, thinking that he won't be believed or that the disclosure will be actively dismissed. Community education and awareness raising has a vital role to play in breaking down this response and reinforcing that family violence within gay relationships is unacceptable and that there is help available for those who are being abused or mistreated.⁷⁹

The Safe Steps and No To Violence joint submission noted that the gender-based analysis of violence within the family violence system has led to 'systemic and institutionalised marginalisation of LGBTIQ people'. Some service providers have themselves recognised this as a problem.⁸⁰

Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria further submitted that LGBTI people's 'long-lived experience of abuse, violence and discrimination' from the broader community, can result in 'a high tolerance of violence in personal relationships and an unwillingness to seek help from services':

This is likely to be particularly true for older LGBT people, most of whom who have endured many decades of rejection and/or violence from family members, and are also more likely to be isolated.⁸¹

The Commission also heard that the silence around violence in same-sex relationships may be 'reinforced by the fear that acknowledging it may feed societal homophobia and contribute to prejudice about gay or lesbian relationships'.⁸²

Lack of information

The Commission was informed that, although some family violence online resources provide a degree of support for lesbian, bisexual or 'same-sex attracted' women,⁸³ there is a general lack of relevant information and advice available to LGBTI family violence victims in Victoria. As a consequence, people in LGBTI communities are using interstate resources for information about sources of help for family violence:

There have been some broader campaigns run by the Victorian Aids Council (VAC) and the Aids Council of New South Wales (ACNSW), but nothing specific to Family Violence. Victorian people are referring to the NSW resources as the key resource because there's nothing specific for the Victorian LGBTIQ community.⁸⁴

Another Closet, a website developed by the New South Wales LGBTIQ Domestic Violence Interagency, provides comprehensive information and referrals for people experiencing family violence in LGBTIQ relationships.⁸⁵

The Commission was informed that promoting education about family violence in LGBTI communities and the broader community is an important part of preventing family violence.⁸⁶ Limited prevention strategies specific to LGBTI communities exist. Many prevention strategies focus solely on heterosexual intimate partner relationships.⁸⁷ Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria submitted that 'education initiatives need to be developed and resourced that specifically target the LGBTI community' as '[t]he need to address the gaps that exist in current prevention education programs available to the general community is urgent'.⁸⁸ This would require increased funding of inclusive family violence awareness campaigns and early intervention programs.⁸⁹

Such an education campaign could include running shared campaigns between LGBTI and family violence services so as to encourage people to make use of family violence services. The Stronger Safer Together campaign in Alice Springs was cited as an example of a successful campaign.⁹⁰ It could also include conducting targeted education campaigns for family violence services about their obligations under anti-discrimination and human rights legislation and about working with same-sex attracted and gender diverse people.⁹¹

The Commission was also told that there is a need to develop legal and non-legal resources for LGBTI communities to support the identification and reporting of family violence, along with information about safe, LGBTI-accessible sources of support.⁹² The online resource Another Closet provided by the LGBTIQ Domestic Violence Interagency and discussed above was cited as a useful model.⁹³

The Commission was also told that education of judges and magistrates about family violence in LGBTI communities would 'improve the culture of the justice system, including enhancing the sense of safety, confidentiality and respect for those who have experienced violence'.⁹⁴ Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria noted that in some cases, same-sex partner violence has been treated as less important or less serious in nature than heterosexual violence.⁹⁵

Lack of data

As discussed earlier, family violence in LGBTI communities remains poorly understood, partly because of a lack of research and poor data collection.⁹⁶ Data on sexuality is not captured by the Australian Bureau of Statistics, Personal Safety Survey, and may also not be captured by Victoria Police data. The limited state of research regarding the prevalence of family violence in LGBTI communities means it is difficult to understand the scope of the problem. Consequently, it is difficult to identify appropriate and effective policy responses, recognising that these may be different to those that apply to heterosexual people.

It was suggested to the Commission that one of the ways in which this could be addressed would be to improve existing data collection systems and mandate the collection of information about LGBTI status, type of violence, and outcomes and actions in order to refine future service delivery and monitor equality performance.⁹⁷ This would necessitate minor, but important, changes to existing forms and processes; for example, the Victoria Police L17 form should include a field to record 'other' gender for transgender or intersex people. Other measures could include amending the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or the CRAF) to incorporate risk assessment indicators for specific communities—including LGBTI people⁹⁸—and including LGBTI indicators in the Victorian Government's proposed Family Violence Index.⁹⁹ Finally, the Commission was told that funding research aimed at gaining a better understanding of the nature and prevalence of and most effective responses to family violence in LGBTI communities is key.¹⁰⁰ The lack of data in relation to LGBTI people and family violence is discussed further in Chapter 39.

Reporting violence to police

Police data reveals that of the 65,154 family violence incidences recorded in 2013 to 2014¹⁰¹ there were 741 recorded family violence incidents in which the parties were in a current or former same-sex relationship.¹⁰²

The Commission was told that LGBTI communities have a deep historical mistrust of the police and the legal system.¹⁰³ The past criminalisation of homosexuality has contributed to this mistrust,¹⁰⁴ which can lead to a reluctance in LGBTI communities to report violence.¹⁰⁵ We heard that this is especially the case among older members of LGBTI communities.¹⁰⁶

In one survey, more than half the respondents who cited homophobia and heterosexism as barriers to reporting referred to difficulties with the police. A large number cited fear of the police engaging in 'hetero male ridicule' or said the police would make their gender history public, out them to their parents, or be indifferent to the specific needs of LGBTI people.¹⁰⁷

The Commission was also told of examples of family violence where the police did not realise the people involved were in a relationship:

Police in an outer metropolitan Melbourne suburb received a call-out from neighbours to attend what sounds like a violent argument in the flat next door. When they arrived they found two men inside the flat. The men appeared to the police to be flatmates ... They were assured by the taller man that the two men had simply had an argument about something trivial but that it was all over. Later that night the same police were called to the local hospital's Emergency Department to discover the shorter man had been severely beaten and was being moved to the ICU with serious injuries. On investigation it was confirmed that the two men had been in a relationship for some years. One of the attending officers reflected with great regret that, on arrival at the flat, they did not implement the standard procedure in relation to suspected domestic violence, which required that the two people involved be interviewed separately to ascertain if they felt safe. He recognised that he did not entertain the idea of the men as a gay couple at the time.¹⁰⁸

An LGBTI worker participating in one of the Commission's community consultations said that police 'don't ever' identify a situation as family violence when it involves a same-sex relationship and that 'there's a lot of assumptions and stereotypes'.¹⁰⁹ Another participant in the consultation commented that 'some police stations respond well [to LGBTI family violence incidents] where there has been training'.

In recent years, Victoria Police has sought to build trust between police and LGBTI communities. The establishment of the Police LGBTIQ Portfolio Reference Group and the implementation of a network of gay and lesbian liaison officers, along with important symbolic efforts, have had an important cultural impact in the organisation.¹¹⁰ Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria submitted:

The role of [gay and lesbian liaison officers] is critical for those who wish to report family violence. However, their numbers and their availability are somewhat limited. It is therefore critical that training on family violence [is] provided to both new recruits and current VicPol staff incorporates issues relevant to the LGBTI community.¹¹¹

During its consultations the Commission was told that some gay and lesbian liaison officers were more effective than others.¹¹²

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence currently recognises that same-sex intimate partner abuse may involve:

- ▷ threatening to out their partner or someone for whom their partner cares (for example, a friend)
- ▷ telling their partner that no one will help them as the police and the justice system are homophobic
- ▷ telling a partner that they will not be believed because homosexuals do not abuse their lovers
- ▷ telling a partner that they deserve it because they are homosexual
- ▷ telling a partner that they are not a 'real' homosexual
- ▷ withholding of medication for those transitioning to another gender.¹¹³

Victoria Police recommended that the CRAF be updated 'to reflect the range of relationships, harms and risks now under the definition of family violence'.¹¹⁴ This includes incorporating risk assessment indicators for specific communities in the framework, including for LGBTI people.¹¹⁵

The Commission heard that there was support for training to be made available to police so that they could more effectively respond to family violence experienced by LGBTI people.¹¹⁶

Access to support services

The joint submission from Drummond Street Services and the Victorian Aids Council noted:

...there are no hot lines, no shelters, no support groups, no advocacy and no public campaigns for individuals in same sex relationships, or who identify as LGBTIQ who are subjected to intimate partner or family violence.¹¹⁷

The Commission was told LGBTI victims have difficulty gaining access to mainstream family violence services because of the lack of availability of these services,¹¹⁸ as well as a fear on their part that the systemic discrimination, homophobia and transphobia they experience in daily life will similarly occur when they try to make use of these services.¹¹⁹

Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria reported that 50 per cent of LGBTI people 'usually or occasionally' hid their sexuality or gender identity for fear of heterosexist violence or abuse when in public places, at work, and at social and community events.¹²⁰ Living in fear of discrimination damages victims' trust in service providers and creates apprehension at the prospect of using mainstream services.¹²¹

The Commission was told that mainstream family violence services might not have the requisite level of understanding of and sensitivity to respond to LGBTI victims and their needs. In a consultation with LGBTI workers it was said that within both mainstream and LGBTI services training in relation to family violence within LGBTI communities is largely non-existent:

When LGBTIQ people are looking for assistance in Victoria it's a real cycle of hit and miss, but generally miss. There's been no specific training in either mainstream or LGBTIQ-specific agencies, and that has contributed to the myth that there is no family violence in LGBTIQ communities, or that family violence is more applicable to straight relationships.¹²²

The Commission is aware of a variety of ways in which the capacity of mainstream and family violence services to respond to LGBTI victims might be improved.

In 2012, Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria developed what are now nationally recognised standards for LGBTI-inclusive practices in services.¹²³ This included a training program called the How2 Program package, which is designed to help organisations develop their practices in order to provide a safe and inclusive environment for LGBTI people.¹²⁴

Others identified the Rainbow Tick as another way of encouraging family violence services to better accommodate the needs of LGBTI people. Organisations that successfully pass through an accreditation process are awarded a Rainbow Tick to show that they offer a safe and inclusive place for LGBTI people to seek help. There are six standards against which a service can be formally accredited to demonstrate LGBTI-inclusive practice and service delivery:

- ▷ organisational capability
- ▷ consumer consultation
- ▷ LGBTI cultural safety
- ▷ disclosure and documentation
- ▷ professional development
- ▷ access and intake.¹²⁵

According to Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria, the Rainbow Tick is currently under-used among family violence services:

While mainstream services are showing increased interest in undertaking this workplace process, it remains the case that the family services sector remains significantly underrepresented among such organisations, and generally under-resourced to undertake such work.¹²⁶

Drummond Street Services and the Victorian Aids Council submitted:

It is becoming more evident that the LGBTIQ community both require and want LGBTIQ specialist rather than mainstream services to better understand and meet their complex needs. We would argue that ... LGBTIQ specific support services may well be more effective and provide safety.¹²⁷

Several organisations operating in Victoria assist people from LGBTI communities, including in relation to family violence. For example, Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria, the Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby and Drummond Street Services all provide some information to do with family violence. Fitzroy Legal Service runs a free LGBTIQ legal service every second Thursday night, focusing particularly on family law matters. Mensline also provides information for male victims of family violence, including those in same-sex relationships.¹²⁸

The Commission was told, however, that the limited LGBTI-specific family violence support services that do exist are fragmented, have inadequate funding, and are limited or non-existent in rural, regional and remote areas.¹²⁹ Accordingly, the Commission was told, there is a need for specialist LGBTI family violence services¹³⁰ and capability building in existing services.¹³¹ It was submitted that there is an 'urgent and on-going need to provide professional education on LGBTI-related issues to the Victorian services sector that have responsibility for, or intersect with, family violence'.¹³²

Lack of accommodation options

Homelessness is a serious risk for people who are coming out about their sexuality or gender identity to their family if the family does not accept that identification. A literature review carried out for the University of Adelaide reported that LGBTI people are over-represented in homeless populations, often experience homophobia or transphobia in accommodation services, and suffer more adverse outcomes associated with homelessness.¹³³

The Commission was told that LGBTI people regularly experience homophobia and transphobia in housing and accommodation services.¹³⁴ A participant in the Commission's consultation with LGBTI workers said, 'There's no safe place ... assumptions are made, there's transphobia in agencies and refuges (trans being refused services)—and all that is re-traumatising'.¹³⁵ Another commented:

There is no access to suitable crisis accommodation, and LGBTIQ people experience not being taken seriously by agencies. In one instance same-sex family violence was not in the frame of reference for a worker from one agency who laughed it off thinking it was a joke.¹³⁶

The Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby submitted that there are limited, if any, appropriate emergency accommodation options available to LGBTI victims. It was unaware of any emergency accommodation for gay men experiencing family violence. It also observed that transgender women are refused crisis accommodation set aside for women if they have not had gender-reassignment surgery.¹³⁷ The Safe Steps and No To Violence submission provided an example of a transgender man who was required to live as a woman in order to obtain services.¹³⁸ The Commission was told that Kara House, which includes a women's refuge, has provided support to several transgender clients.¹³⁹

Same-sex attracted and gender diverse young people are particularly vulnerable to family violence and face specific barriers to finding a safe place to call home.¹⁴⁰ They often express concern about experiencing violence in the home if they come out and might leave home early for fear that violence will occur.¹⁴¹ Young LGBTI people can have greater difficulty gaining access to support services because of discrimination or because staff are not adequately trained to be sensitive to the person's experiences and needs.¹⁴² In addition, some young people might not feel comfortable in youth or family violence refuges as a result of the homophobic or transphobic views of other residents.¹⁴³

The lack of safe emergency housing for these communities is a huge impediment. It's a massive issue. Especially for young trans people who have been kicked out of home, it leaves them open to exploitation. They end up sleeping around or going to saunas just to have a roof over their head.¹⁴⁴

Alsorts

Alsorts is run by Family Access Network and provides case-managed transitional housing for same-sex attracted and gender diverse young people who are homeless. Launched in 2006, the service was the first of its kind in Victoria. It offers access to transitional accommodation (with support) for young people aged 15 to 25 years in two properties and an outreach service. In addition, it helps link young people to other housing options (including private rental), provides assistance with or referrals to other support services, and offers one-on-one support through its volunteer mentors.

Discrimination against transgender and intersex people in relation to accommodation is considered further in this chapter.

Lack of access to perpetrator programs

The Commission heard that heterosexual assumptions were also a problem with perpetrator programs. The Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby submitted that current government funding is allocated only to behaviour change programs for heterosexual male perpetrators.¹⁴⁵ This is discussed further in Chapter 18. Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria pointed out that the Men's Referral Service website focuses exclusively on heterosexual men and does not recognise gay, bisexual or transgender men.¹⁴⁶ No To Violence has prepared practice guidelines which state that programs should challenge homophobia and recommend referrals, information and resources for men who are in same-sex relationships.¹⁴⁷ This is not the same as providing programs which are targeted towards LGBTI perpetrators.

Historically, there have been no government-funded behaviour change programs at the state or national level appropriate for people in same-sex relationships.¹⁴⁸ The Victorian AIDS Council has run a behaviour change program called ReVisioning for gay or bisexual men, without support by government.¹⁴⁹ On 24 February 2016, the Victorian Government announced $145,000 for the Victorian AIDS Council to deliver behaviour change programs.¹⁵⁰

The Commission was told that specific behaviour change programs for LGBTI people who use violence against family members should be developed.¹⁵¹

In the context of recognising the need to tailor behaviour change programs for specific groups, the Victorian Government has acknowledged the lack of programs specific to LGBTI perpetrators is a 'service gap' which needs to be considered in the future.¹⁵²

Concerns about discrimination against LGBTI people

Discrimination by faith-based service providers

Faith-based organisations play an important role in the delivery of services such as crisis accommodation, counselling and health services, all of which are essential for victims escaping and recovering from family violence.¹⁵³ Many of these organisations receive government funding to deliver such services.

Section 84 of the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) allows a person to discriminate on the basis of another person's religious belief or activity, sex, sexual orientation, lawful sexual activity, marital status, parental status or gender identity if the discrimination is reasonably necessary in order for the person to comply with the doctrines, beliefs or principles of their religion.¹⁵⁴

Concern was expressed that this exception is 'extraordinarily broad' and represents a barrier to LGBTI victims seeking access to services that would otherwise be provided by government in a non-discriminatory manner.¹⁵⁵

The Commission was told that, although there is no 'concrete data' on the use of section 84 to exclude LGBTI victims from services, there is anecdotal evidence that this does happen. Ms Brown stated:

We have anecdotal stories from people, particularly, for instance, transgender women, that have experienced difficulties and we know from work we did around federal discrimination reforms that LGBTI people experience discrimination from faith based providers in a whole range of settings.¹⁵⁶

The Commission was told that a victim's perception that a faith-based provider might discriminate against them because of their sexuality or gender identity can be a powerful deterrent to seeking help. Ms Brown said:

I think a really important point to make is that it's the fear of discrimination. Even if faith based providers are doing the right thing, and I think more than often they are, it's that fear and apprehension that will stop someone from accessing those services or indeed disclosing the nature of their relationship and getting the help that they need.¹⁵⁷

One consultation participant commented, 'While there is state sanctioned discrimination it doesn't create [an] environment ... of inclusivity'.¹⁵⁸ The Commission was therefore told:

... we would strongly recommend that in this forum we explore possible amendments to discrimination laws and limiting or removing those religious exemptions when it comes to these service providers, but indeed any service provider that's delivering services to vulnerable communities.¹⁵⁹

In other contexts some religious organisations have supported confining the scope of religious anti-discrimination exemptions—for example, to religious ordination.¹⁶⁰

The Victorian Court of Appeal has previously considered the statutory precursor to section 84. In Christian Youth Camps Ltd v Cobaw Community Health Services Ltd ('Cobaw') it held that the exemption applies only to individuals (not corporate bodies)¹⁶¹ and adopted a narrow interpretation of what is 'necessary' to comply with a person's religious belief.¹⁶² In that case, the Christian owners of a campground denied access to a 'same-sex attracted young people's' group. The majority of the court held that it was not necessary for the Christian owners, who were in substance operating a commercial venture, to deny access to the group under this exemption in order for the owners to comply with their religious beliefs. Such an approach would generally prevent corporate bodies from relying on section 84 to refuse services to particular people on the basis of religious belief.¹⁶³

Although Cobaw might constrain the ability of a faith-based organisation to refuse services to people on the basis of their sexuality or gender identity, given what the Commission was told in written submissions and consultations, it appears few people are aware of the potential application of Cobaw. As a consequence, the fear of discrimination by faith-based providers of family violence services might still discourage victims with diverse sexualities or gender identities from seeking help.

The Victorian Government has promised to review Victorian legislation with a view to amending any provisions that 'unfairly discriminate' against LGBTI people:

We will modernise Victorian laws. We will start by reviewing all Victorian legislation to identify provisions that unfairly discriminate against LGBTI Victorians, and act to change them. Equal opportunity laws should exist to promote recognition and acceptance of the rights of every person. Victorians want their laws to be modern and reflect community attitudes. We will amend the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 to restore greater balance to the right to be free from discrimination.¹⁶⁴

It has also created a whole-of-government LGBTI Taskforce with two working groups to support it—the Justice Working Group and the Health and Human Services Working Group. The taskforce was established to provide advice to the Victorian Minister for Equality, The Hon. Martin Foley. It will work closely with the Commissioner for Gender and Sexuality, Ms Rowena Allen.

As at the date of this report, the Commission understands that the contemplated review of Victorian legislation (including the Equal Opportunity Act) is not yet under way.

Discrimination against intersex people

The Equal Opportunity Act does not list 'intersex' as an attribute on the basis of which discrimination is prohibited. In contrast, the Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) and the Anti-Discrimination Act 1998 (Tas) do so.¹⁶⁵ The Sex Discrimination Act specifically prohibits discrimination on the basis of intersex status;¹⁶⁶ the Tasmanian Act lists protected attributes including gender, gender identity, sexual orientation and intersex.¹⁶⁷

The Victorian Act does list 'gender identity' as a protected attribute. It defines this to include the bona fide identification by a person of indeterminate sex as being a member of a particular sex (whether or not the person is recognised as such) by assuming characteristics of that sex (whether by means of medical intervention, style of dressing or otherwise) or by living or seeking to live as a member of that sex.¹⁶⁸

In his Second Reading Speech for the Equal Opportunity (Gender Identity and Sexual Orientation) Bill 2000 (Vic), which amended the Equal Opportunity Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity, the then Victorian Attorney-General explained:

The term 'gender identity' is used in the bill ... because the amendment is designed to protect not only transgender people but also people born of indeterminate sex who seek to live as a member of a particular sex.¹⁶⁹

Although the government might have intended to protect intersex people from discrimination, the adopted definition of 'gender identity'—contrary to recognising a spectrum of genders—might be interpreted to assume that sex, whether biological, affirmed or re-assigned, is binary and so does not encompass any gender other than male or female. As a consequence, an intersex person who chooses not to affirm a binary sex (for example, because they want to identify as intersex or of no particular sex) might not be protected from discrimination. This uncertainty could be resolved by including 'intersex' as a protected attribute in section 6 of the Equal Opportunity Act.

Transgender and intersex people and accommodation

Section 60 of the Equal Opportunity Act allows providers of accommodation in a hostel or similar institution to discriminate on the basis of sex, age, race or religious belief if the institution was established wholly or mainly for the welfare of a particular sex, age, race or religious belief.¹⁷⁰

The Act does not define 'sex'. It could be interpreted narrowly to assume that sex is binary (that is, either male or female) and/or that sex refers to the biological birth sex, rather than a broader concept of 'gender identity'. As discussed, the definition of 'gender identity' as the law stands could also be interpreted to assume that sex is binary.

Therefore, if a family violence refuge is established for women it might be possible for it to lawfully discriminate against a pre-operative transgender woman who is biologically male (even if she has affirmed her gender in accordance with the Act, for example, by living or seeking to live as a woman) or an intersex person (depending on their biological characteristics). Accordingly, even if a transgender woman has lived in her affirmed gender for decades, if she has not had gender re-assignment surgery, it may be lawful to refuse her refuge accommodation. In contrast, it would not be possible to lawfully discriminate against a pre-operative transgender man who was biologically a woman, even if he was living his affirmed gender as a man.

As the Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby submitted, transgender women have experienced difficulty gaining access to women-only shelters unless they have had re-assignment surgery. The Safe Steps submission expressed concern about these difficulties and recommended as follows:

That the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission clarifies the application of exceptions under the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 with regard to transgender women's usage of women's services.¹⁷¹

The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission submission noted:

Transgender women and men (from homosexual or heterosexual relationships) who are also victim/survivors of family violence also face particular barriers in escaping family violence and accessing housing support services and accommodation. This is partly based on a lack of services designed to assist this group of victim/survivors, but may also be partly caused by discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes towards these groups. More work needs to be undertaken to assist these groups of victim/survivors to safely leave violent relationships and access the supports that they require.¹⁷²

Determining a person's legal sex can be 'complex, contextual and contested'.¹⁷³ In the case of transgender and intersex people, their legal identity often does not align with their self-identity.¹⁷⁴ This 'disconnect' can have serious consequences for victims and perpetrators of family violence.

When interpreting the Gender Reassignment Act 2000 (WA), the High Court of Australia found that the definition of ‘gender characteristics’ in the Act required consideration of social recognition rather than merely biological characteristics.¹⁷⁵ The court has also accepted that sex is not binary and there may be gradated changes between gender identities.¹⁷⁶ The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission guideline entitled Transgender People and Sport is presumably referring to these cases when it says:

Sex refers to a person’s physical sex characteristics. Traditionally this has been read as being either male or female, but courts are now recognising that ‘sex’ can have a broader meaning to specifically apply to people who are intersex, those who may be a combination, or on a spectrum, of being male and female or identify as being physically indeterminate.¹⁷⁷

Accordingly, such authorities might support a broad interpretation of ‘sex’ for the purposes of section 60, which encompasses a person’s self-affirmed gender (that is, not merely their birth sex or their post-sex affirmation surgery sex), including intersex. Such a broad interpretation would prevent a refuge established for women from lawfully discriminating against a pre-operative transgender woman, or at least some intersex people.

It remains a concern, however, that only a person who has undergone sex-affirmation surgery may apply to the Registrar of Births, Deaths and Marriages to have their birth sex altered.¹⁷⁸ This could be seen as supporting a narrower interpretation of sex for the purposes of section 60—namely, that sex means a person’s birth sex, unless altered by sex-affirmation surgery alone. The current Victorian Government has previously identified this as a problem and has also promised to ‘[r]emove barriers to new birth certificates for transgender and intersex Victorians’.¹⁷⁹

In a letter to the Commission, the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commissioner, Ms Kate Jenkins, recommended a human rights-based approach that would:

... require services to actively consider the human rights that may be engaged or limited by any overarching policies or individual decisions to exclude ... transgender [or intersex] people from accessing services. Ensuring that the safety of those both currently receiving, and seeking to receive services, is maintained should be the primary objective in these considerations.¹⁸⁰

As noted, there remains some doubt about whether the Equal Opportunity Act does prevent all such discrimination in the context of section 60.

The way forward

Family violence in lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities is under-reported and not well understood. It is an invisible problem within both the broader community and the family violence system.

In addition to intimate partner violence, some LGBTI victims experience homophobic or transphobic violence from family members as a response to their sexual and gender identity. Young people and older people are particularly vulnerable to this form of violence as they may be more dependent on their family. Existing models of family violence prevention and response (including elder abuse) often do not recognise homophobia and transphobia as motivations for family violence.

LGBTI victims might have experienced discrimination when seeking access to services: they might fear and mistrust services such as the police, the courts, and health and community organisations. If victims seek help and this is denied because of their sexuality or gender identity, or the violence is not taken seriously because it does not fit social expectations of what family violence is, they may remain in or return to the relationship rather than expose themselves to such treatment. All parts of the family violence system—including the police, the courts and specialist family violence services—must improve their responses to LGBTI communities.

The Commission's recommended priority areas for action are set out below. These are in addition to the recommendations we make elsewhere in this report to improve the responsiveness of the family violence system to the diverse experiences of victims.

Overcoming barriers to reporting

In view of the current barriers to reporting, information and referral avenues should be developed for LGBTI communities in Victoria. Online and hard copy material should continue to raise awareness of family violence in LGBTI communities and identify appropriate support services for victims.

The Commission supports the development of specific LGBTI resources such as those that have been developed in New South Wales.¹⁸¹ We also support the proposal that the CRAF guidance materials need to be amended to incorporate a greater focus on risk assessment indicators for specific communities—including LGBTI people.¹⁸² For example, a risk factor for the LGBTI community might include threats to 'out' a person or denying their affirmed gender. Providing practitioners across sectors with greater guidance on how to ask questions about and recognise these forms of emotional abuse will in turn improve risk assessment practice.

If family violence is portrayed in a way that does not reflect the different relationship contexts in which it occurs, LGBTI victims will be further marginalised and will continue to remain invisible within the system. Prevention activities and community awareness campaigns, such as those being considered by the Council of Australian Governments, need to be developed in consultation with LGBTI communities; they should use imagery and language that reflect these communities and highlight the problem of family violence in all its forms.

Building capacity for and commitment to inclusive practice

Various submissions identified useful programs for helping implement LGBTI-inclusive policies, principles and practices.

One option is to devise training packages that help organisations develop their practice and so ensure a safe and inclusive service for LGBTI people. The How2Program, run by Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria, is a good example of this.

Another option is for service providers to become accredited Rainbow Tick organisations. Services that receive the Rainbow Tick are listed in a national register of LGBTI-accredited organisations. Apart from being a promotional tool, this initiative offers a structured, practical approach to helping organisations be more inclusive and responsive. Achieving such accreditation would, however, consume resources in an already overstretched service system. In the Commission's view, additional funding should be provided to enable family violence organisations to achieve this accreditation.

Further, the Commission considers that the whole-of-government LGBTI Taskforce should play an advisory role in the Commission's recommended review of the standards for family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs) and should also inform the revised policy and practice frameworks that will be required to establish the Commission's recommended Support and Safety Hubs (Chapter 13). Similarly, learning and development around family violence for universal services, judiciary and police (including family violence risk assessment) will need to include a strong focus on family violence experienced by LGBTI communities and the principles of inclusive practice with these communities.

Recommendation 166

The Victorian LGBTI Taskforce, supported by relevant experts, provide advice [within two years] on the following:

- ▷ research priorities relating to the nature and prevalence of and the most effective responses to family violence in LGBTI communities
- ▷ effective prevention strategies
- ▷ the review of the standards for family violence service providers—including men’s behaviour change programs
- ▷ intersections between family violence and health and wellbeing initiatives.

Recommendation 167

The Victorian Government require all funded family violence services to achieve Rainbow Tick accreditation [by 31 December 2018]. This should be achieved by means of a staged approach, using workforce training and LGBTI equity auditing followed by full accreditation. An evaluation should be conducted to determine whether all family violence services are suitably responsive to and inclusive of LGBTI people [by 31 December 2019].

Targeted services

A number of parties alerted the Commission to the need for specialist services that provide support specifically for LGBTI communities.

The family violence system has historically focused on women and their children, and people outside of heterosexual intimate partnerships have been inadequately supported by service providers. This is particularly the case with accommodation services. Transgender women and gender diverse young people can face specific barriers in gaining access to accommodation. This places people at risk and goes against the human rights principles that should lie at the heart of our society’s response to family violence.

At present, there is no statewide organisation or centre of expertise that is solely focused on family violence services for LGBTI communities. Such organisations or centres do exist for other communities who experience barriers in finding support for family violence, for example the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention Legal Service Victoria; InTouch Multicultural Centre against Family Violence; Seniors Rights Victoria and Women with Disabilities Victoria.

The Commission favours building the capability and inclusivity of existing organisations among both specialist family violence and LGBTI organisations so that they can provide adequate services and support for people from LGBTI communities experiencing family violence. As discussed, there are a range of existing LGBTI organisations who provide statewide services and advocacy, including Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria and the Victoria Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby. There are also existing family violence services which have LGBTI capability including Safe Steps, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Kara House and Drummond Street Services (Carlton, Werribee and Geelong).

In order to develop the necessary statewide LGBTI capacity the Victorian Government will need to fund and support the development of specific resources and programs for LGBTI communities, including for LGBTI perpetrators.

Recommendation 168

The Victorian Government provide funding [within 12 months] for the following:

- ▷ development and maintenance of legal and other resources for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities to support the identification and reporting of family violence, along with information about safe, accessible sources of support
- ▷ shared community education campaigns via LGBTI and family violence services to encourage LGBTI people who are experiencing family violence to seek help
- ▷ provision of training and advice to specialist family violence services
- ▷ for those LGBTI victims who cannot remain in their home, assistance with obtaining safe accommodation.

Relevant legislation

A number of options are available to the Victorian Government in seeking to remedy the problems transgender and intersex victims of family violence have in gaining access to crisis accommodation and other services.

One option is for the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission to issue guidelines under section 148 of the Equal Opportunity Act¹⁶³ to enable specialist family violence service providers to develop their organisational policies to make it clear that staff should not rely on the statutory exemptions to discriminate against transgender or intersex victims. The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission told the Royal Commission it has the expertise and willingness to assist with the drafting of these guidelines.

The current state of the law is complex and indeterminate. The Commission supports the idea of the Victorian Government proceeding with a review of the Equal Opportunity Act with a view to better protecting LGBTI communities against discrimination. Any such review should consider the following:

- ▷ including 'intersex' as a protected attribute without requiring intersex people to affirm any particular sex in order to be entitled to protection under the Act—consistent with the position in both Commonwealth and Tasmanian law
- ▷ ensuring that transgender and intersex people have their self-affirmed gender recognised and protected—without the requirement to undergo sex-affirmation surgery
- ▷ allaying the concerns expressed to the Commission about the availability of exceptions offered by the Equal Opportunity Act and the chilling effect that fear of discrimination can have on LGBTI victims seeking help.

Whether the Equal Opportunity Act is amended or not, any guidelines that are developed would be most effective if combined with support for implementing non-discriminatory practices. Some accommodation providers, for example, might feel pressure to exclude transgender people from refuges because of the communal setting and the transphobic attitudes of some residents. In cases such as this, implementation of non-discriminatory practices might be best effected by moving away from a communal service model. The Commission supports the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission's recommendation that a human rights approach be adopted, which seeks to balance the rights of those currently receiving and those seeking to receive support.

In Chapter 9 we recommend that the communal refuge model be phased out over the next five years and replaced with a core and cluster model of self contained units. This may not relieve all the problems that arise from homophobia and transphobia but may assist with those that occur in a shared living environment.

Recommendation 169

The Victorian Government, in the context of its commitment to review equal opportunity and birth certificate laws, examine the need to clarify relevant provisions of the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) to remove any capacity for family violence accommodation and service providers to discriminate against lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex Victorians [within 12 months].

Prevention

Education about respectful relationships and diverse sexualities and genders is important to combat the homophobic and transphobic attitudes and beliefs that underlie some family violence. Such programs are also valuable in raising awareness that family violence occurs in LGBTI communities and reinforcing that relationships of all kinds should be free from violence. This builds a basis for better identification and response to family violence in all its forms across the community. For these reasons we strongly support the continuation and development of the Building Respectful Relationships program in all schools.

The Commission also supports the Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, seeking to ensure that the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010-2022 and the third and fourth action plans take account of and seek to address family violence in LGBTI communities.

Endnotes

- 1 Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) s 4. Intersex status is a protected attribute under the Act: Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) s 5C. See also, Victorian Equal Opportunity & Human Rights Commission, 'Guideline: Transgender People and Sport—Complying With the Equal Opportunity Act 2010' (January 2015) 7.
- 2 Organisation Intersex International Australia Limited, What is Intersex? Defining Intersex (2 August 2013) <<https://oii.org.au/18106/what-is-intersex/>>.
- 3 See generally, Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821; Rainbow Families Council, Submission 865; 'Addressing Sexual Orientation and Sex and/or Gender Identity Discrimination' (Consultation Report, Australian Human Rights Commission, 2011); Caroline White and Joshua Goldberg, 'Expanding Our Understanding of Gendered Violence: Violence Against Trans People and Their Loved Ones' (2004) 25 (1, 2) Canadian Woman Studies/Les Cahiers De La Femme 124–5.
- 4 See Victorian Equal Opportunity & Human Rights Commission, 'Guideline: Transgender People at Work—Complying with the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 in Employment' (July 2014).
- 5 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 5.
- 6 Ibid (citations omitted).
- 7 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 13 (citations omitted).
- 8 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) ss 6(d) and 6(p).
- 9 Statute Law Amendment (Relationships) Act 2001 (Vic) and Statute Law Further Amendment (Relationships) Act 2001 (Vic). See also, Explanatory Memorandum, Relationships Bill 2007 (Vic) 1.
- 10 Relationships Act 2008 (Vic).
- 11 Explanatory Memorandum, Relationships Bill 2007 (Vic) 1.
- 12 Adoption Amendment (Adoption by Same-Sex Couples) Act 2015 (Vic).
- 13 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Human Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 1.
- 14 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 8, 9.
- 15 Ibid s 9(2).
- 16 Ibid s 7.
- 17 Australian Bureau of Statistics, Australian Social Trends: Same-Sex Couples (25 July 2013) <<http://www.abs.gov.au/AUSSTATS/abs@.nsf/Lookup/4102.0Main+Features10July+2013>>.
- 18 Participants were able to nominate the type of abuse they experienced and could select multiple answers. Some of the types of abuse nominated were emotional abuse, psychological abuse, being physically attacked or hit, sexual abuse, and deprivation of financial independence: William Leonard et al, 'Coming Forward: The Underreporting of Heterosexist Violence and Same Sex Partner Abuse in Victoria' (Monograph Series No 69, Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society, La Trobe University, December 2008) 45.
- 19 Marian Pitts et al, 'Private Lives: A Report on the Health and Wellbeing of GLBTI Australians' (Monograph Series No 57, The Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society, La Trobe University, March 2006) 51–2.
- 20 Ibid.
- 21 Ibid.
- 22 Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14' (January 2016) Victoria Police data source, Tab 10, Table 10: Family incidents where the affected family member and other party were in a current or former same-sex relationships, July 2009–June 2014, provided the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015; Victoria Police data source, Tab 40, Table 40: Relationships between Affected Family Member and Other Party where the AFM is male and the OTH is Male; Tab 41, Table 41: Relationship between Affected Family Member and Other Party where the AFM is Female and the OTH is Female, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 10 February 2016.
- 23 Ibid.
- 24 Ibid.
- 25 Ibid Magistrates' Court of Victoria data source, Tab 9, Table 9: Primary affected family members on original applications by relationship to respondent, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.
- 26 Ibid Magistrates' Court of Victoria data source, Tab 16, Table 16: Number of affected family members on original application in same sex relationship by gender, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.
- 27 Catherine Finneran and Rob Stephenson, 'Intimate Partner Violence Among Men Who Have Sex with Men: A Systematic Review' (2012) 14(2) Trauma, Violence & Abuse 168, 180. See also Kylie Lloyd, 'Homophobia, Transphobia and Men's Behaviour Change Work' (No To Violence—Male Family Violence Prevention Association, 2015) 7–8; Joan C McClennen, 'Domestic Violence Between Same-Gender Partners: Recent Findings and Future Research' (2005) 20(2) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 149.
- 28 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 12; Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 3.
- 29 Transcript of Horsley, 11 August 2015, 2528 [15]–[18].
- 30 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 19.
- 31 Ibid 13.
- 32 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 8–11.
- 33 Carrie Chan, 'Domestic Violence in Gay and Lesbian Relationships' (Topic Paper No 16, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2005) 2.
- 34 Drummond Street Services, Submission 685, 12.
- 35 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 7.
- 36 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015; Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 18.
- 37 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 2.
- 38 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 4.
- 39 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 40 Janine Farrell and Somali Cerise, 'Fair's Fair: A Snapshot of Violence and Abuse in Sydney LGBT Relationships 2006' (Same Sex Domestic Violence Interagency Group, 2007).
- 41 Transcript of Brown, 11 August 2015, 2541 [24]–2542 [3].
- 42 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 15.
- 43 Transcript of Horsley, 11 August 2015, 2530 [12]–[14].
- 44 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 12.
- 45 Ibid 17.
- 46 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 9–10.
- 47 Ibid 9.
- 48 Olivia Noto, William Leonard and Anne Mitchell, 'Nothing for Them: Understanding the Support Needs of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender (LGBT) Young People from Refugee and Newly Arrived Backgrounds' (Monograph Series No 94, The Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health & Society, La Trobe University, January 2014) 12.
- 49 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 10.

- 50 Ibid 11. See also Marcus O'Donnell and Practice Wisdom Resource Practitioners Panel 2014, 'Working Therapeutically with LGBTI Clients: A Practice Wisdom Resource' (National LGBTI Health Alliance, 2014) 39.
- 51 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 4, 12–13.
- 52 A recent Ballarat Courier article reported that gay victims of family violence typically travel to Melbourne to access 'homosexual-friendly' services: Amber Wilson, 'Gay Abuse Victims Travelling For Help', Ballarat Courier (online), 4 October 2015 <<http://www.thecourier.com.au/story/3400151/gay-abuse-victims-travelling-for-help/>>.
- 53 Transcript of Brown, 11 August 2015, 2542 [8]–[18].
- 54 One in Three Campaign, Submission 584, 25.
- 55 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 4, 10.
- 56 Ibid 10.
- 57 Council of Australian Governments (COAG), 'National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022' (2011) 10.
- 58 Ibid.
- 59 Ibid 12–13.
- 60 Ibid 16.
- 61 Council of Australian Governments (COAG), 'National Implementation Plan: First Action Plan 2010–2013—Building a Strong Foundation' (2012) 15, 18, 22, 25, 28, 30; Council of Australian Governments (COAG), 'Progress Review of the First Action Plan of the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022' (May 2014).
- 62 Council of Australian Governments (COAG), 'Second Action Plan 2013–2016: Moving Ahead—Of the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children (September 2014) 25–8.
- 63 Department of Education and Training, 'Building Respectful Relationships: Stepping Out Against Gender-Based Violence' (December 2015) 6, 104.
- 64 Supplementary statement of Callister, 13 October 2015, Attachment GC-28.
- 65 Department of Education and Training, 'Building Respectful Relationships: Stepping Out Against Gender-Based Violence' (December 2015) 16, 18, 54, 68 161, 200.
- 66 Ibid 28, 105. See also Cara Gleeson et al, 'Relationships Education in Schools' (Evidence Paper, Our Watch, December 2015) 6.
- 67 Transcript of Dyson, 10 August 2015, 2438 [2]–[14].
- 68 Transcript of Brown, 11 August 2015, 2555 [31]–2556 [14].
- 69 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 70 Hey Project, The Hey Project (Victoria Government) <<http://heyproject.org.au/index.php/the-project>>.
- 71 Safe Schools Coalition Australia, What We Do <<http://www.safeschoolscoalition.org.au/what-we-do>>.
- 72 Ibid.
- 73 United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, 'From Insult to Inclusion: Asia-Pacific Report on School Bullying, Violence and Discrimination on the Basis of Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity' (2015) 72.
- 74 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 10.
- 75 Ibid 9–10 (citations omitted).
- 76 Transcript of Horsley, 11 August 2015, 2530 [18]–[26].
- 77 Ibid 2531 [6]–[14].
- 78 Lloyd, above n 27, 6 quoting Brenda Russell, Kristine Chapple and Shane Kraus, 'When Is It Abuse? How Assailant Gender, Sexual Orientation, and Protection Orders Influence Perceptions of Intimate Partner Abuse (2015) 6(1) Partner Abuse 47, 50.
- 79 Anonymous, Submission 406, 5.
- 80 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 16. See also Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 6–7; Melanie Greenhalgh and Annelise Roberts, 'Transforming Domestic Violence Support in the ACT: Improving Accessibility for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Intersex and Queer (LGBTIQ) Clients' (Women's Centre for Health Matters, September 2015) 26–7.
- 81 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 6.
- 82 Chan, above n 33, 5.
- 83 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 17.
- 84 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 85 LGBTIQ Domestic Violence Interagency, Another Closet: Domestic and Family Violence in LGBTIQ Relationships <<http://www.anothercloset.com.au/>> (8 October 2015).
- 86 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 21.
- 87 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 15.
- 88 Ibid 20.
- 89 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 10; Transcript of Brown, 11 August 2015, 2555 [31]–2556 [14].
- 90 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 24.
- 91 Ibid 25.
- 92 Ibid 7.
- 93 Ibid 23–24. See LGBTIQ Domestic Violence Interagency, above n 85. In September 2015, the New South Wales Government announced a further $115,000 towards a campaign to be delivered by the AIDS Council of NSW and targeted towards LGBTI communities to 'identify the early signs of domestic violence among LGBTI people, and also to specifically increase awareness of healthy relationships among lesbians': Matt Akersten, NSW Pledges $115k to Tackle LGBTI Domestic Violence (9 September 2015) Same Same <<http://www.samesame.com.au/news/12731/NSW-pledges-115k-to-tackle-LGBTI-domestic-violence>>.
- 94 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 19. Judicial education and support materials specific to family violence in diverse communities is discussed in Chapters 16 and 40.
- 95 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 19.
- 96 Jenna M Calton, Lauren B Cattaneo and Kris T Gebhard, 'Barriers to Help Seeking for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer Survivors of Intimate Partner Violence' (2015) Trauma, Violence & Abuse (forthcoming), 2; Community consultation, Geelong 2, 28 April 2015. See also Annaliese Constable et al, 'One Size Does Not Fit All: Gap Analysis of NSW Domestic Violence Support Services in Relation to Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex Communities' Needs—Executive Summary and Recommendations' (ACON's Lesbian and Gay Anti-Violence Project, 2011).
- 97 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 4.
- 98 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 16.
- 99 The Victorian Government's proposed Family Violence Index is discussed in Chapter 39.
- 100 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 5.
- 101 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 22, Victoria Police data, Tab 10, Table 10: Family incidents where the affected family member and other party were in a current or former same-sex relationship, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.

- 102 Ibid.
- 103 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 18.
- 104 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 11.
- 105 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 5–6.
- 106 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 18.
- 107 Leonard et al, above n 18, 57–59.
- 108 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 13.
- 109 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 110 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 19; Statement of Allen, 11 August 2015, 9, 19–20; Transcript of Horsley, 11 August 2015, 2555 [4]–[22].
- 111 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 19.
- 112 Community consultation, Geelong 2, 28 April 2015. We discuss the police referral L17 form in Chapters 6 and 14.
- 113 Victoria Police, Code of Practise for the Investigation Family Violence (2014), 14, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 114 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 16.
- 115 Ibid.
- 116 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 18–19.
- 117 Drummond Street Services, Submission 685, 1.
- 118 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 13–14; Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 4–5.
- 119 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 6; Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 12.
- 120 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 6, citing Leonard above n 18, 21–2.
- 121 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 4.
- 122 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 123 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 2.
- 124 Ibid 18.
- 125 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 4.
- 126 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 18.
- 127 Drummond Street Services, Submission 685, 14.
- 128 MensLine, Family violence in same sex relationships <<https://www.mensline.org.au/same-sex-relationships/family-violence-in-same-sex-relationships>>.
- 129 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 5.
- 130 Ibid.
- 131 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 63.
- 132 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 19. See also Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 5; No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 4.
- 133 Angelique Bletsas and Susan Oakley, 'Understanding the Circumstances and Experiences of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Intersex and Gender Questioning People who are Homeless in Australia: A Scoping Study' (Positioning Paper, National Homelessness Research Partnership Program, March 2013) 7–8.
- 134 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 14; ibid 8.
- 135 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 136 Ibid.
- 137 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 11 citing Inner City Legal Centre, Submission No 116 to Senate Standing Committee on Finance and Public Administration, Parliament of Australia, Inquiry into Domestic Violence in Australia, 11 August 2014, 14.
- 138 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 17.
- 139 Kara House, Submission 618, 2.
- 140 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 21.
- 141 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 14. See also Noto, Leonard and Mitchell, above n 48, 12–13.
- 142 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 143 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 21.
- 144 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 145 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 11 citing ACON, Submission No 46 to Social Issues Committee, Parliament of NSW, Inquiry into Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW, 23 September 2011, 7.
- 146 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 14.
- 147 The Commission understands that these guidelines are voluntarily adopted, in full or in part, by some service providers: No To Violence, Men's Behaviour Change Group Work: Resources for Quality Practise, 128, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August and 20 October 2015); No To Violence, Men's Behaviour Change Group Work: Minimum Standards and Quality Practice, 74, 92–3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August and 20 October 2015).
- 148 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 11 quoting ACON, Submission No 46 to Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues, Inquiry into Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW, 23 September 2011, 7.
- 149 Drummond Street Services, Submission 685, 1–2.
- 150 Minister for Equality, The Hon Jenny Mikakos, 'Boosting Men's Behaviour Change Support to End the Cycle of Family Violence' (Media Release, 24 February 2016).
- 151 The development of perpetrator programs is discussed in Chapter 18.
- 152 Department of Health and Human Services, Question 5—Men's behaviour change programs (MBCPS) (29 January 2016), 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August and 20 October 2015).
- 153 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 7.
- 154 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) s 84.
- 155 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 8.
- 156 Transcript of Brown, 11 August 2015, 2543 [10]–[15].
- 157 Ibid 2543 [18]–[24].
- 158 Community consultation, Melbourne, 7 July 2015.
- 159 Transcript of Brown, 11 August 2015, 2542 [30]–2543 [4].
- 160 Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Parliament of Australia, Exposure Draft of the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Bill 2012 (2013) 58 [5.25].

- 161 (2014) 308 ALR 615, 651 [162], 680–4 [307]–[325] (Maxwell P), 706–8 [411]–[420] (Neave JA), 721–4 [473]–[488] (Redlich JA in dissent).
- 162 Ibid 684 [327]–[330] (Maxwell P), 708–12 [422]–[435] (Neave JA), 730–5 [511]–[532] (Redlich JA in dissent).
- 163 After Cobaw, section 84 was amended to require not merely that discrimination is necessary but that it is ‘reasonably necessary’.
- 164 Victorian Labor, ‘Equality Back on the Agenda: Labor’s LGBTI Policy’ (2014) 3.
- 165 Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) s 5C; Anti-Discrimination Act 1998 (Tas) s 16(eb).
- 166 Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) s 5C.
- 167 Anti-Discrimination Act 1998 (Tas) s 16.
- 168 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic), s 4(1), definition of ‘gender identity’.
- 169 Victoria, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 13 April 2000, 1015 (Rob Hulls, Attorney-General).
- 170 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) s 60.
- 171 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 43.
- 172 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Submission 609, 17.
- 173 Letter from Kate Jenkins, Commissioner, Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission to The Hon Marcia Neave AO, Commissioner, Royal Commission into Family Violence, 1 December 2015, 2.
- 174 Ibid.
- 175 AB v Western Australia (2011) 244 CLR 390, 405 [34]–[35] (French CJ, Gummow, Hayne, Kiefel and Bell JJ).
- 176 Registrar of Births, Deaths and Marriages v Norrie (2014) 250 CLR 490, 492 [1] (French CJ, Hayne, Kiefel, Bell and Keane JJ); AB v Western Australia (2011) 244 CLR 390, 402 [23] (French CJ, Gummow, Hayne, Kiefel and Bell JJ).
- 177 Victorian Equal Opportunity & Human Rights Commission, above n 1, 6.
- 178 Births, Deaths and Marriages Registration Act 1996 (Vic) s 30A(a).
- 179 Victorian Labor, ‘Platform 2014’ (2014) 70.
- 180 Jenkins, above n 173, 3.
- 181 LGBTIQ Domestic Violence Interagency, above n 85.
- 182 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 16.
- 183 Jenkins, above n 173, 2–3.

31 People with disabilities

Introduction

It is estimated that 1.1 million Victorians have a disability,¹ of whom 32.7 per cent have a 'profound or severe disability'.² While there is no consistent data on the prevalence and incidence of family violence or sexual assault on people with disabilities, the Commission heard that women with disabilities are at higher risk than men with disabilities, and are more likely to experience family violence than women without disabilities.³ This reflects a disturbing culture of acceptance of violence against people with disabilities, which was highlighted in the recent Victorian Ombudsman's report into allegations of abuse in the disability services sector.⁴

The first section of this chapter considers the meaning of 'disability', reflects on the experience of people with disabilities, and sets out their human rights protections under domestic and international law. The Commission notes that restrictions on people with disabilities participating fully and effectively in society are a result of environmental and attitudinal barriers—including entrenched multiple disadvantages and pervasive negative attitudes toward people with disabilities.

The Commission consulted directly with women with disabilities, their carers and their families about their experiences and understanding of family violence. For some of these women, their disabilities had been caused by their partner's violence against them. In other cases the perpetrator had targeted them because of their disability. We appreciate the generosity these women showed in sharing their experiences.

The Commission also spoke to workers and advocates, including representatives of Women with Disabilities Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria and the Office of the Public Advocate. Many submissions to the Commission raised the question of disability and family violence and put forward recommendations to improve the situation for people with disabilities. Evidence at the public hearings also canvassed the difficulties faced by victims of family violence who have disabilities.

While violence against people with disabilities living in residential settings has been identified as a serious issue, both in Victoria and nationally, the Commission's terms of reference require us to focus on family violence. In relation to people with disabilities, this includes violence against them by their family members or relatives, as well as violence by paid carers (either home-based or in a residential setting) or co-residents in disability services who have a 'family-like' relationship with the victim.

Victorian and Commonwealth reports and inquiries into violence against people with disabilities are summarised in this section in order to provide a broader context of the issues at both state and national levels.

The second section of this chapter explores issues of concern considered by the Commission. There is a notable lack of systematic data collection on family violence against people with disabilities—as a result, reliable and consistent data on this issue is not available. In community consultations, the lack of data about acquired brain injuries (ABIs) and family violence was also identified. This section then explains how people with disabilities may experience family violence from intimate partners, other family members, non-related carers and co-residents in residential facilities, and how the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) includes an extended definition of 'family member'. Inconsistencies in police and others applying this extended definition are discussed. Barriers to people with disabilities reporting family violence and the lack of a positive reporting culture among those working in the disability support sector are noted. The particular barriers to support and recovery experienced by women with disabilities and the lack of perpetrator programs for men with disabilities are also discussed.

In the third section of this chapter, the Commission provides its opinions and proposes a way forward. Key recommendations include ensuring greater and more accurate data collection and initiatives to enhance the inclusiveness, capability and effectiveness of the system which supports victims with disabilities and intervenes with perpetrators, as well as education and training to develop the capacity of those who come into contact with people with disabilities to identify and respond to family violence.

The Commission considered calls to extend the definition of family member to include all paid carers and co-residents, but has declined to do so as we consider other mechanisms to be more appropriate.

While mental illness is a disability and so is encompassed by the discussion in this chapter, the Commission specifically addresses the mental health system in Chapter 19. Chapter 20 discusses the effect on victims of mental illness and ABIs associated with family violence. Mental illness is also discussed in Chapter 18.

Current context and practice

What do we mean by 'disability'?

Definitions of what constitutes a 'disability' vary, as do people's experiences of disability. The Department of Health and Human Services describes a disability as:

any physical, sensory, intellectual, cognitive or psychiatric impairment that affects a person's ability to undertake everyday activities.⁵

It acknowledges that people can be born with a disability or acquire a disability suddenly through an accident. Some disabilities are episodic; others temporary, and not all are visible.⁶

The Commission has adopted the approach of the United Nations that disability is a social construct, and that 'disability results from the interaction between persons with impairments and attitudinal and environmental barriers that hinders their full and effective participation in society on an equal basis with others'.⁷

As the World Health Organization explains, '[o]vercoming the difficulties faced by people with disabilities requires interventions to remove environmental and social barriers'.⁸ The removal of these barriers empowers people with a disability to live their lives with greater independence, self-direction and dignity.

People with disabilities in Victoria

The 2011 census shows that almost one in five Victorians have a disability (19.4 per cent). Around a third of Victorians with disabilities (or 6.4 per cent of the state population) have a profound or severe disability, and almost 40 per cent (7.6 per cent of the state population) have a schooling or employment restriction. Of those 1.1 million people with disabilities, approximately 905,926 (81.3 per cent) have a physical condition and approximately 209,488 (18.8 per cent) have a mental or behavioural disorder.⁹

The prevalence of disability in Victoria is higher in older age groups, rising from 18.6 per cent in the 45 to 54 age group to 86.8 per cent in the 90 and over age group. Women are slightly more likely to have a disability than men (20.3 per cent of all Victorian females compared with 18.5 per cent of all Victorian males). Nationally, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people are 1.7 times as likely as non-Indigenous people to have a disability.¹⁰

Almost 94 per cent of all Victorians with a disability live in a private dwelling, either alone (19.3 per cent) or with others (74.5 per cent), and 4.6 per cent live in 'cared accommodation'.¹¹ The remaining 1.7 per cent live in another non-private dwelling (including hostels, motels and rooming houses).

The Commission heard that people with disabilities are at greater risk of poverty, with Melbourne City Mission submitting:

... the relative income of people with disabilities in Australia is approximately 70 per cent of those without disability (the lowest in the OECD) and ... 45 per cent of Australians with disabilities live in poverty or near poverty, a situation that has worsened since the mid-1990s.¹²

Emerson and colleagues have reported that Australian young people with disabilities were five times more likely to experience entrenched multiple disadvantage and long term unemployment than people without disabilities. They are also less likely to be engaged in full-time work and more likely to experience mental illness, homelessness and be victims of crime.¹³

The Commission was told that a poll of 761 Australians with a disability found that 'negative attitudes towards disability were the single biggest cause of disadvantage'.¹⁴ Pervasive negative attitudes towards people with disabilities mean that women who have grown up with disabilities may have experienced 'discrimination, or been ignored and devalued' over the course of their entire lives.¹⁵

The human rights of people with disabilities

The human rights of people with disabilities—including equality before the law and freedom from violence—are protected under international and domestic law.

Australia has international obligations under the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, which creates a duty for Australian governments to ensure that the rights of people with disabilities are protected.¹⁶ In particular, Article 16 of the convention protects the rights of persons with disabilities to freedom from exploitation, violence and abuse. This is especially relevant in the context of family violence, including in disability service settings.¹⁷ Further rights are contained in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.¹⁸

In addition to the general protections under the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) as discussed in the introductory 'Family violence and diversity', the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) expressly requires organisations to make reasonable adjustments to accommodate people with disabilities when delivering services.¹⁹ In addition, the federal Disability Discrimination Act 1992 (Cth) makes it unlawful to discriminate against people with disabilities in the provision of services.²⁰

Current protections for people with disabilities in Victoria

There are a number of bodies that oversee the disability sector in Victoria, and provide people with disabilities with avenues for complaint about abuse or violence. These include:

- ▷ The Disability Services Commissioner, appointed to resolve complaints raised by or on behalf of people who receive disability services, about their providers.²¹
- ▷ Office for the Public Advocate which acts as the adult guardian of last resort for people with disabilities, with responsibilities including advocacy and oversight of the Community Visitors Program.²²
- ▷ Community visitors, volunteers appointed by the Governor in Council to visit residential services, monitor and report on the adequacy of the services provided and raise concerns about the treatment of residents with staff and management.²³ Since 2010, community visitors have been required to notify the OPA of matters concerning sexual assault, serious abuse or unexplained injuries in facilities they visit. The majority of notifications have been from disability residential services (67 per cent).²⁴
- ▷ The Senior Practitioner (Disability), appointed by the Secretary of DHHS under the Disability Act 2006 (Vic) and responsible for protecting the rights of people subject to restrictive interventions and compulsory treatment. The Senior Practitioner also reviews some incident reports from disability service providers about allegations of staff-to-client assault involving a serious outcome.²⁵

The Victorian Ombudsman has jurisdiction over each of these, but does not often receive allegations about people with disabilities. It is also unclear whether its jurisdiction is limited to state-run facilities, or whether it extends to funded providers.²⁶

In addition, Victoria Police investigates and prosecutes allegations of abuse or violence which may amount to a criminal offence.

The complexity of the system, under which no single agency is responsible for dealing with reports of abuse or violence against people with disabilities, is noted in the recent Ombudsman's report into reporting of abuse against people with disabilities.²⁷ The report stated that:

[D]espite areas of good practice, oversight arrangements in Victoria are fragmented, complicated and confusing, even to those who work in the field. As a result there is a lack of ownership of the problem and little clarity about who is responsible for what.²⁸

As a result, it concluded that the current system is 'fundamentally failing to deliver protection in a coherent and consistent way'.²⁹ Its recommendations included the creation of an independent oversight body to which all serious incidents must be reported. This is discussed further below.³⁰

The Commission also notes that the National Disability Insurance Scheme (NDIS) will be implemented from July 2016 to July 2019, and will provide a uniform framework for much of the disability service system.³¹ This includes a quality and safeguards framework that includes safeguards against abuse of clients by service providers.

The Commission notes that the Office of the Public Advocate has produced the Interagency Guideline for Addressing Violence, Neglect and Abuse (IGUANA) which provides response guidance, including reporting and investigation guidelines. However, these are guidelines only and are not mandatory.³²

The Interagency Guideline for Addressing Violence, Neglect and Abuse

IGUANA, the Interagency Guideline for Addressing Violence, Neglect and Abuse produced by the Office of the Public Advocate in consultation with a number of organisations, provides useful information for organisations, staff members and volunteers working with adults who are at risk of violence, including family violence, neglect or abuse. It sets out a process for staff reporting abuse, the basic principles of which are to:

- ▷ protect the person
- ▷ support the person
- ▷ report the matter immediately
- ▷ encourage the person to take part in any investigation
- ▷ preserve any evidence
- ▷ contact the family or carer
- ▷ take further action if the person reporting has doubts or concerns.

IGUANA also sets out the process for managers and heads of organisations to ensure compliance within their organisations.³³

The National Disability Insurance Scheme

The first stage of the National Disability Insurance Scheme (NDIS) in Victoria commenced in the Barwon region in 2013. From 1 July 2016 the scheme will be progressively rolled out across the rest of Victoria, with completion due in 2019.³⁴

The Commonwealth and all states and territories have agreed to the development of a national approach to quality and safeguards as part of the NDIS, which will include service standards, complaint mechanisms and management of critical incidents.³⁵ The Council of Australian Governments (COAG) released a consultation paper in early 2015 on options for the national framework. Those consulted supported the following measures to prevent and respond to family violence by disability service providers:

- ▷ a statutory-based, independent complaints body
- ▷ a nationally-consistent approach to staff screening
- ▷ other workplace practices and policies to prevent abuse, for example:
 - ▷ effective recruitment practices
 - ▷ the development of organisational cultures that do not tolerate abuse, neglect and exploitation
 - ▷ ongoing staff training and supervision
 - ▷ the involvement of people with disabilities in selecting staff
- ▷ an independent oversight body and/or community visitor role.³⁶

Family violence was identified as a potential risk for clients of the NDIS, and training and learning in specialist violence prevention was identified as a key element of building a capable workforce for the NDIS.³⁷ This includes consultation with relevant organisations and advocacy groups, and developing cultural competency including understanding the gendered nature of violence and abuse and issues relating to lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, queer and intersex communities.³⁸

The Commission understands that work is under way to develop a Decision Regulation Impact Statement for consideration by Ministers in early 2016.³⁹

The Family and Community Development Committee of the Victorian Parliament has also commenced an inquiry into abuse in disability services, the terms of reference of which include informing Victoria's position on an appropriate quality and safeguarding framework for the NDIS.⁴⁰ This is discussed further below.

Experiences of family violence

The extent and nature of violence against people with disabilities

The lack of systematic and disaggregated data on violence against people with disabilities makes it difficult to be precise about the extent of family violence involving people with disabilities – even more so than in relation to the general population. This is discussed further below.

In addition, the Commission heard that people with disabilities experiencing family violence are less likely than people without disabilities to report it. Victoria Police notes in its submission that only a 'small proportion' of family violence incidents in 2014 involved people with disabilities, and suggests that this is a result of the significant barriers to reporting that they may face.⁴¹ These barriers, and the issues of reporting generally, are discussed further in this chapter.

Despite the lack of data, the evidence before the Commission was that women with disabilities experience all kinds of violence at higher rates than women who do not have disabilities⁴² and that this violence is more severe and lasts longer than for other women.⁴³ The Public Advocate, Ms Colleen Pearce, gave evidence that some research suggests that women with disabilities are 40 per cent more likely to be victims of domestic violence than women without disabilities.⁴⁴ Women with disabilities are at higher risk of violence, abuse and exploitation than men with disabilities,⁴⁵ and most interpersonal violence towards women with disabilities is perpetrated by men,⁴⁶ highlighting the salience of gender.

As the Public Advocate said in her statement to the Commission ‘violence against women with disabilities must be understood in the context of the intersections between gender and disability, power and marginalisation’.⁴⁷

Women with disabilities are also more likely to experience violence from a broader range of perpetrators than women without disabilities.⁴⁸

Family violence

In relation to family violence, the Commission was told that women with disabilities experience many of the same kinds of family violence as women without disabilities, including that perpetrated by male intimate partners and sexual violence.⁴⁹ Women with intellectual disabilities are at a ‘considerably heightened risk’ of experiencing sexual assault compared with other women with disabilities, according to the Voices against Violence study.⁵⁰ Women with disabilities may also experience ‘disability-based violence’; that is, violence which is unique to their disability, for example, the withholding of a mobility aide or medication.⁵¹

International research shows that acquired brain injuries can be a risk factor for being a victim of family violence. A victim may also experience an ABI as a consequence of family violence.⁵² ABIs and family violence are discussed further in Chapter 20.

The Commission heard that family violence may begin or worsen when women acquire a disability:

Many women who acquire disabilities describe how their status changes. In family relationships their power changes. It may change in all kinds of ways including physically, economically and socially. Similar to what we know about pregnancy, the life change of acquiring a disability can be accompanied by an increase in, or even the commencement of family violence.⁵³

Disability may also overlap with other forms of identity to place women at even greater risk of experiencing family violence, or of not being able to access appropriate services:

The risks are further heightened for women who are indigenous, from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, and living in isolated – rural or institutional – communities.⁵⁴

So, for women with disabilities we experience poorer socioeconomic status, poorer economic and social participation than both men with disabilities and other women. So that gives us what we might call a double disadvantage. If you are an Aboriginal woman, that’s again compounded and this disadvantage compounds itself and significantly increases the risk that women with disabilities, and particularly women from other disadvantaged groups, experience.⁵⁵

The research shows that women with disabilities who live in rural, regional and remote communities are particularly vulnerable:

In the Australian context, women and girls with disabilities living in rural and remote communities are particularly disadvantaged as a result of the inaccessible environments and lack of services, information, awareness and education.⁵⁶

During a community consultation, the Commission heard that family violence against women with disabilities in rural, regional and remote areas is increasing and that it is 'extra hard when you're in a remote area and living with family violence'.⁵⁷ One worker gave the example of a woman in a wheelchair who was pushed against a wall by her husband and left all day while he worked on the farm.⁵⁸

Although older people experience some similar barriers to some women with disabilities (particularly where they have complex care and communication needs), the experience of family violence by these groups is distinct. The experiences of older women who acquire a disability can be different to women with disabilities who are ageing.

Settings

People with disabilities can experience family violence in a range of settings. People with disabilities may live in their own home, with family members or in a facility. Facilities include supported accommodation, day care services, aged care residences, respite care facilities, detention centres and psychiatric care facilities.⁵⁹ The vast majority of Victorians with a disability live at home.⁶⁰

Whether they live at home or in a residential/institutional setting, violence towards them by a family member constitutes family violence.

While a 'family member' generally means a partner, relative, child or someone with whom they are in an intimate personal relationship, violence committed by non-related carers (either in the home or in an institutional setting) or by co-residents in residential facilities may also constitute family violence where the relationship can be said to be 'family-like': see box.

Extended definition of ‘family member’

The definition of ‘family violence’ in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) involves violent behaviour by a person towards a ‘family member’ of that person.⁶¹ For the purposes of the Act, the definition of ‘family member’ extends beyond intimate partners and relatives and includes:

... any other person whom the relevant person regards or regarded as being like a family member if it is or was reasonable to regard the other person as being like a family member having regard to the circumstances of the relationship.⁶²

The Family Violence Protection Act sets out a range of matters to be considered in determining whether it is reasonable to regard the person as being ‘like a family member’, including:

- ▷ the nature of the social and emotional ties between the relevant person and the other person
- ▷ whether the relevant person and the other person live together or relate together in a home environment
- ▷ the duration of the relationship between the relevant person and the other person and the frequency of contact
- ▷ any financial dependence or interdependence between the relevant person or other person
- ▷ any other form of dependence or interdependence between the relevant person and the other person
- ▷ the provision of any responsibility or care, whether paid or unpaid, between the relevant person and the other person
- ▷ the provision of sustenance or support between the relevant person and the other person.⁶³

In deciding whether a person is like a family member, the ‘relationship between the persons must be considered in its entirety’.⁶⁴

The Act includes an example of where a person might be like a family member, namely:

[a] relationship between a person with a disability and the person’s carer may over time ... come to approximate the type of relationship that would exist between family members.⁶⁵

Who commits family violence against people with disabilities?

Intimate partners

The most common manifestation of family violence suffered by women with disabilities is intimate partner violence.⁶⁶ The Commission heard from women with disabilities who have experienced family violence perpetrated by intimate partners:

My husband was my carer. I didn’t think I could physically support myself. Family violence can result in emotional, physical and financial difficulties but with a disability you also struggle to live independently. I didn’t know there were services available to help me ... My husband told me ‘I didn’t sign up to be your carer. I signed up to be your husband’.⁶⁷

Some had also suffered family violence throughout their childhoods, which continued into adulthood:

I suffered abuse from my real parents and adopted parents ... [My] foster family took advantage of me, sexually abused me and my baby ... Men take advantage of me because of my disability.⁶⁸

Another participant in the Commission's community consultations spoke of how she 'managed' her husband's moods throughout their long marriage, but that this was no longer possible after she was injured at work and acquired a disability:

I had a workplace accident [and] ended up with spinal injuries with chronic pain with depression and anxiety ... He supported me for the first three months – then it went downhill – he then got more violent and more verbal. If we were driving and I made a mistake he would bash me. Kids in the car. Then you get home and you think this is terrible, but you keep going and going.⁶⁹

Intimate partner violence may take on different forms in the context of disability. As the Public Advocate explained:

... we were the guardian for a woman. She had had a stroke. She was in hospital. She told the guardian that she wanted to go into care because her husband hit her. Now, she was in that relationship for 40 years. It was a very difficult decision for her, but her choices were very limited and she expressed the desire to go into care rather than return home. But she said, 'Please don't tell him that I've told you that he hits me.'

The power dynamic continued when she was in fact placed in care and he was continually at her bedside and interfering with the care that was being provided to her, and particularly around feeding time, insisting on—he controlled even her feeding. So, this control that we see is really a very common pattern.⁷⁰

Intimate partner violence can also involve perpetrators with a disability. In another case presented to the Commission by the Office of the Public Advocate, the guardian of a woman with an intellectual disability sought an intervention order against the woman's partner who also had an intellectual disability:

Ms Na was a young woman with an intellectual disability and a life-threatening eating disorder living independently in community housing with case management support. Ms Na's eating disorder was so serious that food cupboards in the house needed to be locked and her food intake was severely restricted by support workers. Ms Na became involved with Mr O who also had an intellectual disability. He did not have the cognitive capacity to understand that Ms Na's eating disorder was life threatening and so he would bring large amounts of food into the house, ignoring the guardian's instructions not to do so.

The guardian attempted to reach an agreement with Mr O for him not to bring food into the house. However, Mr O became violent and abusive towards Ms Na and assaulted a neighbouring resident and ongoing contact with Mr O was considered unsafe for Ms Na. The guardian approached the police who agreed to apply for an intervention order against Mr O that was limited to preventing Mr O from committing family violence.⁷¹

Other perpetrators

As a group, women with disabilities experience family violence from a broader range of perpetrators than women without a disability. Ms Keran Howe, Executive Director of Women with Disabilities Victoria, told the Commission during the public hearings that:

What we find from our research and also from listening to women with disabilities as our members is that ... [t]hey experience violence from intimate partners, but also from other family members. In addition to that, [they] experience violence from a broader range of perpetrators of violence than other women. So that can also take in paid carers and service workers such as transport workers.⁷²

Other research also confirms these findings. In 2010, the Office of the Public Advocate analysed 86 reported cases of physical, sexual, psychological or emotional violence and financial abuse and neglect of clients with a cognitive impairment: 66 of these victims were women, and 20 men. The Office found that the perpetrator was a partner or relative in 64 cases, a staff member of a disability service in nine cases and a co-resident in four cases (the remainder involved neighbours or strangers).⁷³

The 2012 Voices against Violence study, which was a joint research project undertaken by Women with Disabilities Victoria, the Victorian Office for the Public Advocate and Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, found that, although intimate partners were the most common perpetrators of violence against women with disabilities, other potential perpetrators are personal carers, support staff, service providers, medical and transport staff (such as taxi drivers) and male co-residents. Once again, it also found that women may be subjected to violence by multiple perpetrators, often over a period of many years.⁷⁴

Carers

Carers can be intimate partners, other relatives, in-home carers and staff at relevant facilities.

As discussed above, under the Family Violence Protection Act, non-related carers can commit family violence if they are in a family-like relationship with the victim.

The Commission was told that women with disabilities are particularly vulnerable to violence, especially when perpetrators are carers who are in a position to exert control and power.⁷⁵

Victoria Police acknowledged the problem of family violence committed by carers in its submission:

Carer [to] patient family violence is a unique subset of family violence that is heavily underreported. A small percentage of all family violence incidents in 2014 identified a carer as the perpetrator, possibly due to few being aware that a disability carer can be considered a perpetrator of family violence under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008. In addition to being in a privileged position to perpetrate violence against their patients, carers can also commit unique forms of family violence, including withholding support or medication, and threatening institutionalisation.⁷⁶

A recent survey conducted by the Health and Community Services Union found that nearly half of all Victoria's disability sector employees have witnessed co-workers perpetrating acts of abuse, violence or neglect towards people with disabilities who are in their care.⁷⁷

The Office for the Public Advocate submission notes that there appears to be a culture of denial in some services:

Violence perpetrated by staff towards residents is reported to OPA and Community Visitors in many forms ranging from bullying and disrespectful behaviour to rough handling, physical and sexual violence. In some services there is an implicit acceptance of behaviours that cause harm and a reluctance to name this as violence.⁷⁸

Due to the often highly dependent nature of their relationship with their carers, people with disabilities may suffer unique forms of family violence at the hands of carers. Some examples of abuse by carers are:

- ▷ threatening to withdraw care
- ▷ controlling access to medication
- ▷ controlling access to mobility and transport
- ▷ threatening to institutionalise the person
- ▷ controlling access to tampons and sanitary pads
- ▷ controlling access to pregnancy termination.⁷⁹

Powers of Attorney, guardianship orders and other forms of decision-making power give carers the right to make financial, medical and other decisions about their clients. Some carers use such powers to financially abuse victims.⁸⁰

In its submission to the Commission, the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal (VCAT) noted:

The Guardianship List deals with victims of family and domestic violence. Elder abuse, carer abuse and issues related to the care of those with a disability are complaints that arise often in the context of physical, mental and economic abuse. The existence of family violence is not immediately evident in guardianship proceedings and often does not emerge until the parties are well into a hearing.⁸¹

In its submission, VCAT expressed concern that the Guardianship List is not adequately funded to identify and respond to family violence, potentially endangering witnesses and staff:

Currently, the Guardianship List at VCAT is not fully funded and does not have the resources to adequately case manage prior to a hearing. Case management of applications involves contacting the parties, ensuring that all relevant people are aware of the application and the hearing, and identifying any issues of concern, including any background of abuse, violence or exploitation.⁸²

It suggested that the Guardianship List should be adequately funded to enable case management of Guardianship and Power of Attorney matters and provision of essential and specialised support for victims of family violence.⁸³

The Commission notes that VCAT has a family violence support worker who is available to work across all lists,⁸⁴ but it is not clear to what extent they have the role or capacity to assist with this function.

Co-residents

People with disabilities who live in supported accommodation, such as group homes or supported residential services, may live with other residents for extended periods of time in a home-like environment and come to regard each other as 'family'. Once again, under the Family Violence Protection Act, co-residents can commit family violence if they are in a 'family-like' relationship with the victim.

People with disabilities may have varying abilities to cope with family violence perpetrated by co-residents. The Commission was told of one example of increasing physical assaults by a 21-year-old man with mental health issues on other co-residents who:

... were described as having extremely impaired ability to defend themselves from the perpetrator's attacks. Residents were reported to be remaining in their rooms after returning from day programs, even eating and urinating in their rooms.⁸⁵

In this case, despite the escalating violence, he was not promptly re-located.

Disability and perpetration of family violence

The Commission also heard evidence about perpetrators of family violence with disabilities. For example, Ms Helen Fatouros, Director, Criminal Law Services of Victoria Legal Aid, explained that:

Our client data reveals that 15 percent of our clients who breach family violence intervention orders have disclosed a disability. Of that group, over half had a mental health issue. Seven percent had an intellectual disability and four percent had an acquired brain injury.⁸⁶

One study showed that in a relationship where the man has an ABI the chances of 'marital aggression' (the author's term) are increased sixfold.⁸⁷ A New Zealand study found that in a group of 206 mothers identified as being at high risk of committing child abuse, over 36 per cent had suffered at least one traumatic brain injury over their lifetime, with around a third experiencing multiple such injuries.⁸⁸

The Office of the Public Advocate expressed concern that perpetrators with cognitive impairments are subjected to intervention orders when they may not have the capacity to understand them. More generally, they may have limited capacity to understand and learn from their actions.⁸⁹ The OPA submission included the following example:

While intervention orders have been reasonably effective in keeping him away from certain properties and people there is little indication that Mr S has understood them or they will be effective in determining future violent behaviour. It is a concern that Mr S's breaches could lead to him being imprisoned for up to two years. Long term secure accommodation with a high level of support is needed to circumvent the cycle he is in.⁹⁰

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence instructs that if police suspect a perpetrator to have a cognitive impairment, police should not issue a family violence safety notice, however they remain responsible for ensuring the victim's safety.⁹¹

In another example, a perpetrator with a disability was excluded from a facility following the issue of a personal safety intervention order, resulting in him returning to his family home from which he had previously been removed because of suspected family violence.⁹² The Office of the Public Advocate recommended that the government fund emergency accommodation with appropriate intensive support for perpetrators evicted from disability residential settings.⁹³

Inquiries into violence against people with disabilities

There have been several government inquiries and reports into violence against people with disabilities at a state and national level in recent years.

Victoria

In 2012, the Victorian Law Reform Commission conducted a review into the Guardianship and Administration Act 1986 (Vic), the purpose of which is to enable persons with a disability to have a guardian or administrator appointed.⁹⁴

The scope of the review was broad. It considered, among a range of other things, the functions, powers and duties of the Public Advocate, including its investigatory powers when a person is under inappropriate guardianship, is being exploited or abused, or is in need of guardianship.⁹⁵ It recommended expansion of the Office of the Public Advocate's investigatory role beyond its current ability to investigate only in circumstances where a guardianship or administration order might be appropriate.⁹⁶ This is discussed in more detail in Chapter 27.

In 2015, the Victorian Ombudsman conducted an investigation into how allegations of abuse in the disability sector are reported and investigated.⁹⁷

The investigation looked at:

- ▷ services including residential, respite and day programs funded by the Victorian Government
- ▷ the oversight responsibilities of agencies including the Department of Health and Human Services and the Disability Services Commissioner.⁹⁸

It found that the current system of oversight and accountability reporting is fragmented and disjointed, a positive reporting culture does not exist, that there is a systemic failure by those working in the system to report abuse and inadequate oversight by DHHS of incidents in supported residential services.⁹⁹ Its recommendations included mandatory reporting, by all service providers, of all serious incidents relating to people with disabilities to an independent oversight body.¹⁰⁰

In 2015, the Victorian Parliament Family and Community Development Committee commenced an Inquiry into Abuse in Disability Services, examining the reasons abuse is not reported or acted upon, and how it can be prevented.¹⁰¹ The terms of reference asked the Committee to consider these broad issues in two stages: the first stage is to inform Victoria's position on appropriate quality and safeguards for the NDIS, while the second is to consider systemic issues and measures to strengthen the disability services system prior to transition to the NDIS. The terms of reference contemplated that the Committee will work with the Ombudsman to avoid unnecessary duplication of the Ombudsman's work. It is due to report on 30 April 2016.¹⁰²

The Committee released an interim report in August 2015, which identified a number of concerns about the current system of oversight of disability services in Victoria, and made recommendations on the development of a quality and safeguarding framework to ensure the safety of people who access disability services. It endorsed the recommendation in the Ombudsman's report that an independent oversight body should be created. It also identified a number of questions to inform Stage 2 of the review.¹⁰³

The Victorian State Disability Plan 2013–2016 articulates the government's plan to achieve its vision of an 'inclusive Victorian society that enables people with a disability, their families and carers to fulfil their potential as equal citizens'.¹⁰⁴ The plan aims to achieve a number of outcomes in four key areas: a strong foundation in life; upholding rights and promoting participation; accessing information, transport, buildings and places; and a contemporary approach through disability system reform. One of the outcomes of the current plan is the better protection of human rights. One of the strategies to achieve this outcome is to improve responses to violence and sexual assault. The plan does not specifically deal with family violence.¹⁰⁵

Commonwealth

In 2014, the National Cross-Disability Disabled People's Organisations made a submission to the Commonwealth Senate Standing Committee's Inquiry into Domestic Violence in Australia.¹⁰⁶ It stated that:

Violence against people with disability in institutions is Australia's hidden shame. It is an urgent, unaddressed national crisis, of epidemic proportions, yet is excluded from national policy responses relating to domestic/family violence and sexual assault, and from national policy responses relating to advancing the human rights of people with disability.¹⁰⁷

It submitted that the overwhelming majority of perpetrators are male residential care workers, some of whom deliberately target those least able to resist or complain.¹⁰⁸

The Senate Committee's report acknowledged the issue of violence against people with disabilities, including by family members and support workers.¹⁰⁹ It also acknowledged the problems with data collection in relation to family violence generally, and specifically in relation to violence against people with disabilities, and made recommendations to improve data collection at a national level.¹¹⁰

The federal Parliament's Senate Community Affairs References Committee also recently conducted an inquiry into violence, abuse and neglect against people with disabilities in institutional and residential settings. The Committee's report, containing 30 recommendations and tabled in November 2015, acknowledged that family violence occurs both outside and within institutions and residential settings and identified the need for people with disabilities to have improved access to a range of mainstream family violence support services.¹¹¹ Some of the Committee's recommendations were relevant to family violence, including that:

- ▷ all accommodation and service delivery funding agreements should have a mandatory gender-sensitivity requirement¹¹²
- ▷ the Australian Government should consider amending the National Disability Strategy, the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children and the National Framework for Protecting Australia's Children to include specific needs of people with disabilities and, in order to give effect to these frameworks, increase funding to support women with disabilities escaping family violence¹¹³
- ▷ the Australian Bureau of Statistics should ensure all of its surveys are inclusive of people with disabilities and that the Australian Government commit additional funding to ensure that data is collected on the prevalence of violence, abuse and neglect against people with disabilities in certain surveys, including the Personal Safety Survey¹¹⁴

- ▷ the Australian Government should establish a scheme to ensure national consistency in disability worker training, including mandatory rights based training to develop core competency skills in recognising and responding to violence, abuse and neglect of people with disabilities.¹¹⁵

Challenges and opportunities

This section highlights a number of areas of concern raised with the Commission, including the lack of data available on family violence against people with disabilities, the issue of inconsistent interpretation by police and others of whether carers and co-residents in disability residential services fit within the extended definition of ‘family member’ under the Family Violence Protection Act, and the barriers people with disabilities face when speaking up about or reporting family violence. The reasons why some workers may not report abuse of a client, and the response of specialist family violence services, the police and the courts to victims who have a disability are also discussed.

Lack of data and knowledge

The lack of data on violence (including family violence) against people with disabilities has been noted in the literature, and in the recent inquiries. As noted in the Voices against Violence study:

[T]here is no systematic collection of data in Australia or within the states and territories that enables the determination of the prevalence of violence against women with disabilities ... Nor has there been any national scale research into the prevalence of violence against women and girls with disabilities, to date ...¹¹⁶

In relation to family violence:

There is no consistent and inclusive national data available on the intersection of gender, disability and violence that enables reliable ongoing trend analysis into prevalence rates, for either family violence or sexual assault ... The Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) has no standard national data collection recording the experiences of violence among adults with disabilities although it has been working on this issue.¹¹⁷

The Senate Community Affairs References Committee’s inquiry into violence, abuse and neglect against people with disabilities in institutional and residential settings (discussed above) also found that there was a concerning lack of data:

The committee notes with great concern, the lack of reliable and consistent data on violence, abuse and neglect of people with disability, and the complete lack of data on the outcomes of reporting and investigations. It is impossible to adequately address an issue that has not properly been identified. Part of the work to eliminate violence and abuse of people with disability must surely include quantifying the precise nature of the problem.¹¹⁸

As discussed above, it recommended that the Australian Bureau of Statistics should ensure all of its surveys are inclusive of people with disabilities and that the Australian Government commits additional funding to ensure that data is collected on the prevalence of violence, abuse and neglect against people with disabilities in certain surveys, including the Personal Safety Survey.¹¹⁹

The Senate Standing Committee’s Inquiry into Domestic Violence in Australia also acknowledged the problems with data collection in relation to family violence generally, noting that there is a lack of reliable disaggregated quantitative data regarding family violence experienced by people with a disability and that ‘most methodologies used in Australia systematically [exclude] many people with a disability’.¹²⁰ It made recommendations to improve data collection at a national level.¹²¹

One example of the lack of data in this area is in respect of ABIs. The Commission learned that ABIs may be a consequence of family violence as well as being a risk factor both for being a victim of family violence and for using violence. However, during a community consultation, the Commission was told that there is no 'comprehensive database' that provides information on family violence cases involving ABIs and that this is a 'sleeper' issue.¹²²

Difficulties in applying the extended definition of family member

Submissions identified that the extended definition of 'family member' in the Family Violence Protection Act can be difficult for police and others to interpret and apply, and this is not done consistently.¹²³

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence identifies that a 'paid or unpaid carer may, on a case by case basis, be regarded as being like a family member',¹²⁴ but does not refer to co-residents as possible 'family members'.

The Office of the Public Advocate's submission to the Commission notes that violence by staff towards residents and between residents in disability residential services are the 'top two types of notifications to the Public Advocate' and that both 'potentially meet the definition of family violence'.¹²⁵

However the Public Advocate stated that she was unaware of the Act ever being used to seek a family violence intervention order against a paid carer or co-resident.¹²⁶

The Office of the Public Advocate submitted that the Family Violence Protection Act should be amended to make clear that people in disability residential settings are regarded as being in family-like relationships.¹²⁷ They also recommended that the Victorian Government and Victoria Police establish a special taskforce to develop protocols for responding to family violence in disability residential settings.¹²⁸

An intervention order under the Personal Safety Intervention Orders Act 2010 (Vic) may be sought against a carer or co-resident who commits violence, regardless of whether they are considered a family member under the Family Violence Protection Act. As the OPA notes, however:

... in practice in group [home] settings, there appears to be little knowledge or understanding of the application of either [the Family Violence Protection Act or the Personal Safety Intervention Orders Act].¹²⁹

The Office of the Public Advocate also notes that police have no code of practice for personal safety intervention orders and as a result 'there is likely to be a less consistent approach by police'.¹³⁰

Speaking up about violence

People with disabilities may not report family violence

In 2015, the Victorian Ombudsman's investigation into reports of abuse in the disability sector highlighted the low levels of reporting of violence against people with disabilities. It stated:

Whether or not they ever have the need to report abuse, it is vital that everyone has confidence in the systems that exist to protect them. Yet reports and research consistently show that many people with a disability will not report abuse, for fear they will either not be believed, that nothing will happen, or that they will suffer repercussions. If no single agency carries overall responsibility for building people's confidence, including in fair and robust outcomes, this sorry state of affairs will continue.¹³¹

The Commission heard that there are a number of reasons why people with disabilities do not report family violence. Fear of retribution or a loss of support can prevent people with disabilities from reporting family violence:

Like all people who have experienced violence and abuse, people with disabilities may feel shame in reporting, and may fear that if abuse is made known to outside parties there will be violent repercussions and other consequences, such as family breakdown. There may also be other obstacles to reporting experienced by people with disabilities, such as a fear that support services will cease, and reliance on abusers for transport or communication assistance that impedes access to support services and police ...¹³²

For someone with a disability, the fear of reporting violence may be compounded if the perpetrator is a carer or someone on whom the person is dependent. For some the choice is between enduring the violence or the indignity of being left without assistance for personal things such as showering and toileting. A witness providing evidence at the public hearings explained that:

I use a wheelchair and I relied on [my husband] for physical and practical support. This put me in a difficult position. I was too afraid to be on my own. I didn't think I could look after myself and my children due to my physical disabilities.¹³³

The witness recounted that after her husband was ultimately removed from the house by police due to his violence she was physically unable to shower for weeks and wanted him to come home because she felt she could not care for herself.¹³⁴

For people with disabilities in residential accommodation, there can be a culture of acceptance of abuse and an atmosphere of fear that can be a barrier to people reporting violence.¹³⁵ The Ombudsman noted that there are fewer safeguards for people living at home to report abuse by their paid carers as they do not receive visits by community visitors and may not have contact with other support workers.¹³⁶

The Commission also heard that women with disabilities fear losing custody of their children if Child Protection is notified of the violence. While many women have this fear, evidence suggested that it has special relevance for mothers with disabilities, because of the prevailing stereotypes about their capability as parents and, perhaps, because removal of children from parents with disabilities happens at a much higher rate than for parents without disabilities.¹³⁷ Ms Howe spoke about this:

There is a strong belief in our community, an unfounded belief that women with disabilities are not able to provide adequately for their children. In fact, it's very common, when a woman reports family violence, that the child can be removed from her care because the belief is if the partner isn't around that she's not able to provide adequate care. There is nothing in the research that suggests that women with disabilities are less able to provide effective parenting and to be good mothers.¹³⁸

The Voices against Violence research study found that some women with disabilities may not perceive that what is occurring is violence:

A lifetime of cumulative discrimination and demeaning experiences can result in some women seeing their experiences of violence as normal and an everyday occurrence. Women then felt that what was happening to them was to be expected, and that they have to live with the violence. Women spoke of perpetrators reinforcing this idea by telling them they deserved the violence they were experiencing.¹³⁹

Experiencing discrimination day-to-day can also lead victims to blame themselves, which itself creates a barrier to reporting. Ms Howe told the Commission:

... women with disabilities ... often have talked about internalising this experience and believing when they do experience violence that maybe it's their fault and perhaps they deserve it.¹⁴⁰

The Commission was told of cases where women believed that family violence was ‘what I deserved’, and ‘I just thought that’s what it is like in families.’¹⁴¹

Finally, the Commission heard that people with disabilities may not report family violence because they do not think they will be believed. People with disabilities may be the subject of negative stereotypes about disabilities—including mental health disabilities—that can cause family, friends, carers and police not to believe them when they report violence:

People may be reliant on family, carers or staff to assist them to report. If these ‘gatekeepers’ do not recognise that a crime has occurred, do not want to see what happened as a crime, or if they do not know how to report, crimes go unreported.¹⁴²

The Commission was informed that women with disabilities are variously stereotyped as ‘incompetent, voiceless, hypersexualised or inherently vulnerable’.¹⁴³ These stereotypes become barriers when women seek help or disclose family violence because they contribute to perceptions that women with disabilities are not credible witnesses:¹⁴⁴

... tolerance of violence against people with disability is high and often one of the greatest difficulties people with disabilities face is the reluctance of others to recognise and believe that abuse has taken place.¹⁴⁵

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence acknowledges that people with disabilities who report family violence, are ‘more likely to be disbelieved and the impact of the violence is more likely to be underestimated’.¹⁴⁶ It goes on:

It is important that the police approach to a person with a disability is not informed by negative stereotypes; but that police take the time to listen, acknowledge and respect even if there is insufficient evidence to prosecute.¹⁴⁷

Workers may not report violence

Absence of a positive reporting culture

The Ombudsman’s investigation into the disability sector recently identified a ‘systemic failure by those working in the system to report abuse’.¹⁴⁸ Some reasons given for this reluctance to report abuse include:

- ▷ intimidation
- ▷ fear of reprisal against the reporting staff member, the client and/or their family
- ▷ concern about the reputation of the service provider
- ▷ unease about the impact on the subject of the allegation
- ▷ frustration with the significant paperwork associated with reporting.¹⁴⁹

This lack of a positive reporting culture may in part be due to an acceptance of violence against people with disabilities. The Public Advocate gave evidence that:

The tolerance of violence against people with disabilities is high and often one of the greatest difficulties people with disabilities face is the reluctance of others to recognise and believe that abuse has taken place.¹⁵⁰

She reports that in some residential services:

... there is an implicit acceptance of behaviours that cause harm and a reluctance to name this as violence. This type of culture may also include the bullying of staff, which is intended to discourage reporting.¹⁵¹

The reluctance to name violence as such can lead to inaction on the part of providers. The Public Advocate described how she had written to the Department of Health and Human Services expressing her concern about a number of physical and sexual assaults at a particular facility. She said the department treated the matter as an issue of 'resident incompatibility', despite the fact that nearly 30 incidents had been reported in 12 months.¹⁵² The Public Advocate told the Commission:

It's got nothing to do with resident compatibility. It's got to do with violence. One of the things that the family violence sector has fought for for many years is to have violence and abuse named as that. What we see in disability services calling it 'behaviours of concern' or 'resident compatibility' and not naming it as violence and abuse means that it remains hidden, we are not getting the cultural change or the policy change that's required to in fact address what's happening in these houses, it remains hidden and if it's not named and it's hidden, we can't address it.¹⁵³

The Ombudsman also documented a number of instances of intimidation of disability workers who reported violence or abuse by their colleagues, contributing to a culture of fear around reporting.¹⁵⁴ The protected disclosure legislation designed to protect whistleblowers currently extends to some but not all workers, and the Ombudsman recommended that it extended to all disability workers across the sector in order to support a culture of reporting.¹⁵⁵

Lack of training

The Ombudsman's report identified that disability service staff are not always trained to identify, and act on, incidents of violence or abuse against their clients. The report cited a departmental review stating that 'staff consistently reported that they do not feel confident in their ability to recognise the indicators of abuse and neglect and have not received training on the topic ...'¹⁵⁶

One of the recommendations of the Ombudsman's report was that there be mandatory training for the department's disability workers, with a focus on incident reporting, identifying abuse and respect for human rights.¹⁵⁷ The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission also recommended, in its Beyond Doubt report, that DHHS should deliver training for departmental and funded services staff on preventing, recognising, responding to, and reporting violence, abuse and family violence, including focused efforts to support management to strengthen supervision and recruitment processes.¹⁵⁸

The Commission requested information from the Victorian Government regarding the availability of professional development opportunities in respect of family violence for practitioners in disability services it either manages or funds. Documentation prepared by the Department of Health and Human Services indicates that family violence is identified in the Introduction to Disability Practice course. The Commission understands that this training is provided to Department of Health and Human Services disability workers.¹⁵⁹ The Ready4work Disability Support Work Induction Resource Kit, which is available to government and non-government disability workers, also considers family violence, including that which may occur in disability settings as well as other forms of violence or abuse in such settings. It describes a number of scenarios as relevant examples, including some that are specific to family violence, as well as information about the Interagency Guidelines for Addressing Violence, Neglect and Abuse.¹⁶⁰

The Commission notes that some disability practitioners also participate in training on the statewide Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or CRAF). The CRAF provides guidance on identifying family violence for both family violence and non-family violence practitioners. However, compared to other sectors their participation was relatively low in the roll-out of training during the period November 2011 to December 2014. Documentation indicates that of 1985 attendees at the first level Family Violence Risk Assessment Training, approximately 77 were disability workers (3.9 per cent). Their participation was higher in the 'train the trainer' course, with 8.9 per cent of participants recording that they worked primarily in the disability sector.¹⁶¹

Proposed minimum standards to support the delivery of accessible domestic violence services to women with disabilities are also identified in Inclusive Domestic Violence Standards: Strategies to Improve Interventions for Women With Disabilities.¹⁶²

The Commission notes that a new Community Service Training Package (a set of nationally endorsed standards, qualifications and guidelines developed by the Community Services and Health Industry Skills Council) was released in December 2015.¹⁶³ The Training Package includes courses on disability, ageing and individual support (for example, Certificate IV in Disability, Certificate IV in Ageing Support and Certificate III in Individual Support). Each of these units has as an elective component of the course a unit titled 'respond to suspected abuse'.¹⁶⁴ This unit covers a broad range of abuse but could be developed to cover family violence. Alternatively, the relevant courses could be mandated to include a unit or units on family violence. Units on family violence currently exist as either mandatory or elective units in other courses such as Community Services, Social Housing, Alcohol and Other Drugs, Mental Health and Family Dispute Resolution.¹⁶⁵

Responding to reports of family violence

Access to specialist family violence services

Access needs to be understood in the broadest sense of the word—where women with disabilities not only know about services but are also able to make use of them and obtain benefit from them ...¹⁶⁶

Useful resources

The Commission was told of the following resources that help women with disabilities experiencing family violence access information and support:

- ▷ the Daisy app, which gives victims an easy way to locate a wide range of family violence support services.¹⁶⁷ It provides information into 28 languages, has text-to-voice functionality for women with a vision impairment or poor literacy and an SMS function for women living in rural or remote areas¹⁶⁸
- ▷ Easy English translations of materials for victims of crime by the Victorian Victims Support Agency¹⁶⁹
- ▷ The Tell Someone website developed by the Southern Integrated Family Violence Executive in consultation with people with disabilities and disability services. It provides information videos on family violence for people with mild intellectual disability.¹⁷⁰

The recent ANROWS State of Knowledge report into best practice responses to women with disabilities experiencing family violence notes a lack of awareness among disability services of the needs of women and girls with disabilities who have experienced family violence, and a lack of appropriate responses of family violence services and sexual assault services to people with disabilities.¹⁷¹

A key finding of this review is that effective, accessible services for women and girls with disabilities must be built on multi-agency collaborations.¹⁷²

Lack of accessible accommodation

Women with Disabilities Victoria submitted that women with disabilities fleeing family violence can be forced to return home because they have been unable to obtain appropriate accommodation.¹⁷³ This is the case both for women with physical and mental health disabilities.¹⁷⁴

The Commission visited two refuges that were designed and built to be fully accessible for people with disabilities. However, currently, not all Victorian refuges are fully accessible for people with disabilities:

In talking about disability access we should recognise that there are many different types of disability which require different types of access. For women requiring, for example, ramps or handrails or wider doorways we have on record from the Department of Health and Human Services and Safe Steps that there are up to nine refuges with those facilities across Victoria. Appropriately three of those are for Aboriginal women because nationally 51 per cent of Aboriginal women have a disability.¹⁷⁵

This is also a source of frustration for services. McAuley Community Services for Women submitted:

Currently we are unable to accommodate women and children with physical disabilities as our refuges are not accessible. We have requested assistance to upgrade our facilities from the state government; however, to date no funding is available for physical upgrades.¹⁷⁶

Women with disabilities may also be unable to obtain crisis accommodation because there is not enough room for their carers to accompany them. They might have to move long distances for safety reasons and for some women leaving home means leaving essential supports such as assistance with showering.¹⁷⁷

Seeking help was said to be especially difficult for women with children who have disabilities. A community consultation participant told the Commission:

In families where the child or parent has a disability, it becomes very difficult to leave a violent situation. There is very limited access to services. How can you leave quickly? What refuges are set up for children (including adult children) with disabilities? How do you get the transport you need? How do you get the supplies you need? People need to know what they will need in order to leave safely.¹⁷⁸

The Commission heard that without adequate crisis accommodation for both themselves and their children, women might choose to stay in a violent relationship rather than leave their children behind.¹⁷⁹ This also leaves children at risk of family violence.

Ms Howe said in her evidence that there was an urgent need for funding of the Safe at Home/Safe in the Community program which allows women with disabilities to stay in the home. She told the Commission:

These programs allow women and children to remain where they live safely and to maintain their existing disability supports and social supports. This is an essential option for women with disabilities who may rely on local infrastructure, services or house adaptations.¹⁸⁰

The Commission received evidence about the Department of Health and Human Services' Disability and Family Violence Crisis Response Initiative which provides 12 weeks funding (up to $9000 per person) for women with disabilities and their children experiencing family violence to access crisis accommodation or disability support to remain safe in their own home.¹⁸¹ The program extends to women (and their children) who are eligible for services under the Disability Act, which does not include people with a mental health disability or a disability related to ageing.¹⁸²

The Commission heard that while initial interest in the program was low, there has been a steady increase in demand following promotion of the program, and in April 2013 the Victorian Government announced that the initiative would be funded on a continuing basis.¹⁸³

The police response

Previous findings

In 2014 in its Beyond Doubt report, the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission documented a number of concerns by individuals and organisations about the police response to people with disabilities. It concluded that building police capacity is an 'urgent priority', and that '[p]olice members told us unequivocally that they need more support to know how to identify, respond to and support people with disabilities reporting crime'.¹⁸⁴ VEOHRC recommended that Victoria Police develop a 'comprehensive, career-long learning strategy' to equip members at all levels to respond equitably to people with disabilities. This includes being able to identify and understand disability, and make adjustments.¹⁸⁵

Victoria Police agreed in July 2014 to implement VEOHRC's recommendations. This Commission received evidence on the progress of these, which include:

- ▷ a review of the Victoria Police Manual (under way)
- ▷ a Community and Cultural Diversity Education Strategy to improve and strengthen police education on human rights and the principles of equality (completed)
- ▷ Easy English translations of documents on making a complaint to police and reporting a sexual assault and an Easy English resource for Reporting Crime (under way)
- ▷ development of a bystander response for police members who witness discrimination (under way)
- ▷ development of an Independent Third Person 'Ready Reckoner' to improve the identification of people who have disabilities and uptake of Independent Third Persons for victims of crime (under way).¹⁸⁶

VEOHRC also recommended that the Department of Health and Human Services issue comprehensive practice guidelines around reporting to police, including where the victim has a disability.¹⁸⁷ The Commission understands that the development of these guidelines is in progress.¹⁸⁸

What this Commission heard

The Commission was told that victims of family violence who have disabilities can experience additional barriers to reporting family violence to police.

Many women and children with disability face barriers to accessing support when they seek it because ... [t]here is poor understanding of disability among police, with police often considering women with disability unreliable witnesses, or disregarding their reports of abuse in favour of the perpetrator.¹⁸⁹

We were told that the 'diverse living circumstances of women with disabilities requiring assistance for the most basic and intimate activities of daily living present challenges' for many services, including police.¹⁹⁰ Further, in relation to victims of sexual assault, Western Region Centre Against Sexual Assault told us that:

Victims of sexual assault with a mental health issue or an intellectual disability when reporting matters to the police have difficulties making statements in formats required by the court. Their medical or physical conditions are easily used to discredit evidence.¹⁹¹

The Victoria Police submission acknowledged that Victoria Police data does not reflect the true picture of violence against people with disabilities. In 2013–14, Victoria Police recorded the presence of a disability in only three per cent of family violence incidents.¹⁹² Victoria Police acknowledged that this does not reflect the prevalence of violence against people with disabilities:

Although research indicates people with disabilities are almost twice as likely to experience family violence as those without, Victoria Police statistics do not reflect this prevalence. 18.5% of Australians identify as having a disability, but only a small proportion of family violence incidents in 2014 were marked with a 'presence of a disability' flag.¹⁹³

This was attributed to the 'significant reporting barriers' faced by people with disabilities:

The low number of family violence incidents involving an individual with a disability likely results from the significant reporting barriers they may face (including communication, sensory and intellectual barriers, feelings of shame and deservedness, and fears that a change in circumstances will lead to worse living conditions such as institutionalisation).¹⁹⁴

The Victoria Police submission also noted the importance of:

- ▷ interpreters and independent third parties to help people communicate effectively
- ▷ physically accessible services such as police stations and interview rooms
- ▷ services that can provide support or facilitate access from the point of initial contact until the conclusion of the justice process, rather than the victim having to re-tell their story at each point in the system.¹⁹⁵

While under-reporting is undeniably an issue, as discussed earlier, the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission also noted in its Beyond Doubt report that it had received reports of police members failing to take family violence reports from victims with disabilities.¹⁹⁶

Victoria Police's Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence states that police should engage the services of a support person or independent third person as soon as possible in an investigation involving people with disabilities.¹⁹⁷ However the Commission received evidence from the Public Advocate that police do not always do so, and that there is a disparity in the use of the independent third person program across Victoria.¹⁹⁸

The Women with Disabilities Victoria submission recommended that the Office of the Public Advocate be funded to develop an advocacy and referral scheme for the independent third person program that provides 'holistic support to people who are at risk of having repeat contact with crime, including women with cognitive impairments and mental ill-health who have been victims of violence'.¹⁹⁹

How the courts respond

Previous findings

The Beyond Doubt report found that while some progress has been made in court accessibility, basic adjustments to accommodate people with a disability are not always made and court practices and procedures do not always meet the access needs of witnesses with sensory, physical, learning or communication disabilities.²⁰⁰ For example, courts lack hearing loop technology and the paper-based information provided by courts can pose challenges for people with low literacy levels.²⁰¹

The Voices Against Violence research study also described the problems women with disabilities experience in accessing court services. For example:

Women described the humiliation of having to get out of their wheelchair to climb steps up to the witness stand and having to negotiate their wheelchairs around where the perpetrator was sitting.²⁰²

Similarly, the Beyond Doubt report cited examples of people with disabilities not being appropriately accommodated in courts (although these were not family violence cases):

We had the example of a person with cerebral palsy, who had a cramped hand being told to lie it flat on the bible rather than curled – just no understanding of disability at all.²⁰³

When I entered the courtroom I accidentally ran over the defence solicitor's feet. There are many problems with courtroom accessibility. My friend who gave evidence had had a stroke and wasn't able to sit in the witness stand, he kept falling off the seat – it was terrible. The access to the actual courts is pathetic. This was the biggest challenge for me. There needs to be a ramp installed instead of the stairs. The whole court environment needs to be re-evaluated to support the needs [of] people with disabilities, to make it more accessible.²⁰⁴

The Beyond Doubt report recommended that Victoria Police and the Department of Justice establish a centralised booking system for augmentative and alternative communication for use by Victoria Police, the Office of Public Prosecutions, Victoria Legal Aid, Victorian courts and tribunals, the Victims Support Agency and other justice agencies. To date, however there has been limited progress in implementing this recommendation.²⁰⁵

What this Commission heard

Another recommendation by VEOHRC was to give priority to disability access to courts and to have this consistently implemented across jurisdictions by Court Services Victoria.²⁰⁶ The Commission notes the requirements under the Disability Discrimination to ensure that persons of disabilities are not discriminated against in relation to access to premises.²⁰⁷

The Commission makes a recommendation on court accessibility in Chapter 16.

The Commission was told that people with disabilities—especially those which affect oral communication—are at a disadvantage when appearing in court.²⁰⁸ This is consistent with the Beyond Doubt report’s finding that successful prosecutions in cases where victims have disabilities are uncommon.²⁰⁹

The Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) allows courts to make adjustments to the way they receive evidence from witnesses with disabilities. For example, a witness who cannot hear or be understood may give evidence by any appropriate means, and the court may give directions on the way and means by which a witness may be questioned.²¹⁰ The Beyond Doubt report notes that the Act does not give any guidance on this, which means that courts may vary in their approaches to accommodating witnesses with disabilities.²¹¹

The process of giving evidence in family violence matters can be challenging for people with disabilities. People with disabilities, especially those with a cognitive impairment, may face difficulties in understanding proceedings. Family violence proceedings can involve the victim giving evidence about a person with whom they have or have had a personal relationship. This can also be distressing, particularly for people with certain disabilities (such as a cognitive impairment).²¹²

The Magistrates’ Court and Children’s Court submission commented on the need for a vulnerable witnesses service or other support for people with cognitive impairments:

Applicants with a cognitive impairment are particularly vulnerable as witnesses and require assistance in obtaining, framing and understanding orders. This support, as well as individualised services, are required at the time of application, to prevent attrition of cases and to ensure that these vulnerable witnesses are appropriately supported throughout their engagement with the court. Given the complexity of issues facing witnesses involved in family violence related matters (including the distress involved in giving evidence and additional challenges for people with cognitive disabilities), it may be useful to explore the introduction of a vulnerable witness service to provide support similar to that provided by the [Child Witness Service], throughout the court experience.²¹³

The Commission heard that the provision of an independent third person for police interviews and court appearances was a part of the Making Rights a Reality project (see box) for adults with an intellectual disability who have been sexually assaulted. Women with Disabilities Victoria called for funding for a statewide roll-out of this program.²¹⁴

Making Rights a Reality program

This program was a pilot funded jointly by philanthropic trusts and the Victorian Government and delivered by the South Eastern Centre Against Sexual Assault (SECASA), in conjunction with the Springvale Monash Legal Service. It is currently running at reduced capacity due to lack of funding into the future. It helps adults who have been sexually assaulted and who have an intellectual disability, acquired brain injury or who use aids to communicate, by providing counselling, organising an independent third person, communication support worker or an attendant carer to be with them in interviews with police and at court, and helping with applications for compensation from the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal. The program was positively evaluated in 2014.

Judicial education

The Judicial College of Victoria, which has the task of educating Victorian judicial officers, outlined in its submission a family violence core curriculum for judges and magistrates. One of the topics is ‘understanding groups with specific needs’ and this includes ‘people (predominantly women) with disabilities’.²¹⁵

Such education may be complemented by materials that assist judicial officers to meet the diverse needs of people with disabilities. The Commission is aware that a resource is being developed by the Judicial College of Victoria, with assistance from the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission²¹⁶ in line with its Beyond Doubt report recommendations that the College should collaborate with the Commission to develop educative resources that specifically address making adjustments for people with disabilities.²¹⁷

Responses to perpetrators with disabilities

The Commission heard that there are no behaviour change programs for perpetrators with learning or mental health disabilities, that restrict their capacity to learn in a group setting. The evidence before the Commission was that they are currently screened out of mainstream men's behaviour change programs.²¹⁸

[Men's behaviour change programs] are currently not well-equipped to work with men with intellectual disabilities. Current levels of funding for MBCP work limit their capacity to offer anything more than standard groupwork interventions, which do not suit some men with intellectual disabilities who require more of an individualised approach. As a result, very few men with intellectual disabilities are referred to MBCPs. Furthermore, little attempt has been made to adapt MBCP curricula or intervention methods for men with intellectual disabilities. This is despite a significant volume of work over the past 35 years focusing on intervention programs for men with intellectual disabilities who commit sexualised offences, which could be adapted for the family violence field.²¹⁹

The Commission understands that the No To Violence standards for men's behavioural change programs are silent on the making of reasonable adjustments to allow men with disabilities to participate in men's behaviour change programs.²²⁰ The standards for men's behaviour change programs do require that interpreters be provided 'for assessment, groups and contact with men's families wherever possible.'²²¹ However the Commission was unable to determine whether the use of AUSLAN (Australian sign language) interpreters is routine because program providers are not audited for performance.²²²

The Commission makes recommendations relating to standards for men's behaviour change programs in 'Family violence and diversity' located at the start of this volume.

The way forward

The picture that has emerged in recent years about the extent of violence against people with disabilities—and particularly women with disabilities—is disturbing. While the Commission's focus is on family violence, the evidence before this Commission indicates that family violence is one part of a wider picture of violence and abuse against people with disabilities. This includes violence by paid carers and other workers, both within home and service settings, and by people living together in group settings. In some circumstances, this violence can constitute family violence.

The Victorian Ombudsman's investigation identified a culture within disability services that deters reporting of violence and abuse against people with disabilities. Her recommendations seek to address this by providing independent oversight of the system and mandatory reporting of violence within it. Her suggested reforms should provide greater protection for people experiencing violence, including family violence. The Commission supports her recommendations.

The Commission heard that intimate partner violence (including sexual violence) is the main form of family violence against women with disabilities and that the dynamics between women with disabilities and their partners can be complicated because of the dual roles of partner and carer. This dynamic can make it even more difficult for women to consider reporting violence and leaving the relationship as they rely on the relationship for practical support. We also heard about the ways in which reliance on other carers can leave women at risk of violence, with women in rural, regional or remote areas and those who have limited English more at risk.

The Commission understands the current difficulties in interpreting and applying the extended definition of 'family member' under the Family Violence Protection Act to cover violence by paid carers and co-residents who are in a 'family-like' relationship with the victim. Ultimately we have decided against recommending an expansion of that definition as we consider that strengthening access to other legal remedies (such as personal safety intervention orders) is a more appropriate mechanism. The Commission supports the recommendation of the Ombudsman for an independent oversight body and for other measures to encourage reporting of violence and abuse against people with disabilities, noting that the entire disabilities services landscape will change with the roll-out of the National Disability Insurance Scheme. Accordingly, a rigorous and independent oversight function will be needed to ensure that the rights of people with disabilities are protected under this scheme.

The Commission is concerned by the significant barriers that women with disabilities face in accessing services, particularly crisis accommodation. We have made a number of recommendations including recommending that refuge accommodation be fully accessible within five years.

We are also concerned that disability service workers are not always aware of the nature and dynamics of family violence and may not be in a position to identify or intervene appropriately. The uptake of previous statewide training on the CRAF by disability workers was quite low. Disability service workers' lack of ability to identify family violence or intervene appropriately leaves many women with disabilities without any recourse. We consider workforce training a priority and have supported the Ombudsman's call for mandatory training for disability workers at all levels. We recommend that family violence be specifically addressed as part of this training.

The aim of those providing services to people with disabilities should be to support their independence, self-determination and dignity. This applies equally in the context of family violence and related services.

To achieve this a much stronger recognition of and response to disability violence as a manifestation of family violence is needed by family violence services, the justice system and across disability and health services.

The Victorian Government is currently developing the Victorian State Disability Plan 2017–2020.²²³ The Commission encourages the Victorian Government to place greater emphasis in this plan on violence experienced by people with disabilities in recognition of the concerning evidence that has emerged over recent years regarding this issue. In particular, we encourage the government to specifically consider family violence experienced by people with disabilities and to include greater detail around the ways in which responses to violence (including family violence) will be improved. The State Disability Plan needs to contain family violence prevention actions linked with the broader state family violence prevention strategy we recommend in Chapter 36.

Understanding the unique experience of family violence for people with disabilities means that family violence and gender must be prominent in disability policy and practice frameworks, including the State Disability Plan, the NDIS Quality and Safeguarding Framework and across disability service standards and protocols. Similarly family violence codes of practice, standards and professional guidelines need to reflect the broad range of family violence experienced by people with disabilities and the range of settings and relationships in which this violence occurs.

Underpinning all this must be strengthened collection, analysis and availability of data so that family violence against people with disabilities comes out from the shadows and sits at the heart of our planning and prioritising of prevention and response.

The Commission's recommended priority areas for action are set out below. These are in addition to the recommendations we make elsewhere in this report to improve the responsiveness of the family violence system to the diverse experiences of victims.

Ensuring accurate data and knowledge

The Commission notes the current lack of data available in relation to violence (including family violence) against people with disabilities, and that lack of data has been a significant and recurring finding in recent state and commonwealth inquiries.

A consistent and comprehensive approach to collecting data regarding people with disabilities who experience family violence (and other forms of violence) is vital to obtaining an accurate understanding of the extent and scope of the problem. The Commission makes a number of recommendations to ensure greater and more accurate data collection in future, including in relation to information gathered by the Victorian Government, by Victoria Police through its L17 form and by the Australian Bureau of Statistics through its Personal Safety Survey.

The Commission also notes the limited Australian research into acquired brain injuries and family violence. The Victorian Government and other funders should consider supporting research into acquired brain injuries among both victims and perpetrators of family violence. Subject to this research, there is scope for policy and practice development, including to ensure identification of acquired brain injuries by family violence services, crisis accommodation services and health services.

Recommendation 170

The Victorian Government adopt a consistent and comprehensive approach to the collection of data on people with disabilities who experience or perpetrate family violence. This should include collecting data from relevant services—for example, incident reports made to the Department of Health and Human Services by disability services when family violence has occurred [within two years].

Recommendation 171

The Victorian Government fund research into the prevalence of acquired brain injury among family violence victims and perpetrators [within two years].

Defining ‘family member’

The Commission acknowledges the difficulties in applying the extended definition of family member in the Family Violence Protection Act, as well as the call for amendments to the Act to recognise the relationship between paid carers and their clients, and co-residents in residential settings.

We have considered whether amendments to this Act might assist. One option might be to amend the definition of ‘family member’ to expressly state that it encompasses non-related carers and co-residents. The Commission determined that this is not desirable. The Family Violence Protection Act is concerned with a specific form of violence, namely that which arises in the context of ‘family-like’ relationships. Where the elements of a ‘family-like’ relationship do exist in relation to non-related carers and co-residents, then the Act should be applied. In other cases, seeking to define a ‘family-like’ relationship to exist in all circumstances involving carers and co-residents risks confusing the purpose of this Act. In these cases, the Personal Safety Intervention Orders Act 2010 (Vic), and the criminal and civil law generally, are available and the approach should be to ensure that these other legal mechanisms are applied. In the case of either a family violence intervention order or a personal safety intervention order, it remains the responsibility of the police to properly investigate the abuse and any criminal offences. We consider that the creation of an independent oversight body, as recommended by the Ombudsman, would provide important additional safeguards in regards to institutional abuse.

Service providers are responsible for ensuring that those whom they serve are safe. In the case of paid carers, providers should ensure there are appropriate reporting and supervision processes in place to monitor staff and clear consequences in the event of abuse, including the involvement of law enforcement. In the case of co-residents, providers should have mechanisms in place to prevent and identify abuse between residents and take action promptly to address any that occurs, including removing the resident who is a risk to others to alternative supported accommodation. Ultimately, the solution requires operational and cultural change more than any changes to the definition of family violence. Systemic oversight of disability services and a prompt response by DHHS where problems are identified is imperative.

The Commission is sensitive to the fact that the dynamics between a person with a disability and paid carers may give rise to 'family-like' relationships very quickly, given the often intimate nature of the care, the social and emotional ties and the levels of 'dependence' (as referenced in the Family Violence Protection Act). The duration of those relationships may be a less critical factor. The Commission considered whether the example in the Family Violence Protection Act, which acknowledges that the relationship between a person with a disability and their paid carer may over time come to approximate a 'family-like' relationship should be amended to remove the reference to 'over time'.

Again, the Commission determined this is unnecessary, as the amendment to the statutory example is unlikely to provide much greater clarity to paid carers, police and the courts.

Encouraging reporting and investigation

The Commission received considerable evidence about the lack of reporting of family violence both by victims and by disability workers. The reasons are numerous and include a culture of acceptance of violence against people with disabilities and a fear of reprisal.

Another reason that was identified in the Ombudsman's report and subsequently also addressed in the Victorian Parliamentary Inquiry report was that the 'existing oversight arrangements for dealing with incidents of abuse in the disability sector are complex, fragmented and confusing' and 'no one body has specific responsibility for receiving abuse allegations/incident reports or for reviewing incidents, reporting on deficiencies and addressing systemic issues to prevent abuse in the disability sector'.²²⁴

The Ombudsman, and the Victorian Parliamentary inquiry in its interim report, recommend establishment of a single, independent oversight body with powers and responsibility for, among other things, handling complaints and managing and investigating incidents.²²⁵ The Victorian Government has said that it will 'consider the recommendation within the context of the final Parliamentary Inquiry report and development of the National Disability Insurance Scheme Quality and Safeguards Framework'.²²⁶ Similarly, in its 2012 Guardianship report, the Victorian Law Reform Commission recommends that the Public Advocate be given a stronger 'supervisory, regulatory and investigative role' in order to better 'protect and promote the rights of people with disabilities'.²²⁷

The Commission encourages the Victorian Government to settle on and begin implementation of a model to improve oversight of the disability services sector (including independent complaints handling and investigations where people with disabilities are at risk), whether this be through expansion of the powers of an existing body such as the Office of the Public Advocate, a newly created independent oversight body, or through mechanisms under the National Disability Insurance Scheme Quality and Safeguards Framework.

The Commission considers that in order for the framework or any oversight body to be effective, it must address current inadequacies in the monitoring, reporting and response described throughout this chapter. In particular, disability workers must be supported to recognise and respond to such abuse, including where this amounts to family violence; feel able to report such violence to their superiors; be able to rely upon police or the independent body to investigate it thoroughly; and safely share information with others to protect the safety of the victim.

The Commission supports the Ombudsman's recommendation to extend the protected disclosure legislation to all disability workers across the sector to encourage reporting. Additional training is also needed to ensure that all those providing services to people with disabilities are equipped to identify and respond to family violence. The Commission supports the Ombudsman's call for mandatory training of disability workers and service providers in preventing, identifying and responding to abuse. The Commission also notes the recommendations in the Commonwealth Senate Community Affairs References Committee in respect of national regulation in disability services, including establishing a national scheme to ensure consistency in disability worker training.²²⁸

Whether such training is ultimately carried out through a state or a national scheme, it must include family violence. As most people with disabilities live at home (rather than supported accommodation being their home), such training must also extend to disability workers who provide services in the home. This will equip workers to better identify when family members are perpetrating family violence (including intimate partner violence and financial abuse) by recognising risk factors articulated in the CRAF, as well as being alert to violence committed by colleagues or family members of the person with a disability.

Alongside, or as part of any broader scheme that is implemented, the Victorian Government should fund training and education programs for disability workers—including residential workers, home and community care workers, interpreters and communication assistants and attendant carers—to encourage identification and reporting of family violence among people with disabilities. It should also require, through its accreditation, contracting and funding arrangements with relevant service providers, that all disability service workers, both current and future, have undertaken appropriate training.

As the Victorian Government and the Commonwealth Government (including through the National Disability Insurance Agency) have a dual role in relation to different service providers, and given the recommendation made by the Commonwealth Senate Community Affairs References Committee regarding a national scheme for disability worker training, the Victorian Government should work with the Commonwealth Government to ensure all disability services workers involved in assessing needs and in delivering services are expected to have successfully completed certified training in identifying family violence and responding to it. This could include further developing the units regarding family violence and responding to suspected abuse in the Community Service Training Package. The disability workforce should also be a priority for CRAF training.

In relation to other accommodation settings, the Commission notes the Office of the Public Advocate's call for a special taskforce, set up by the Victorian Government and Victoria Police, to develop protocols for responding to family violence in disability residential settings.²²⁹ This would be a positive first step to address the current situation, and complement the existing work of the Victorian Government in establishing the Disability Workers Exclusion Scheme in residential settings.²³⁰ Consideration should, however, be given as to whether the development of such protocols could be undertaken by the independent oversight body recommended by the Ombudsman. The functions of the independent body, as recommended by the Ombudsman, would include preparing and publicising best practice guides for complaint handling.

The Commission welcomes the Office of the Public Advocate's Interagency Guidelines for Addressing Violence, Neglect and Abuse (IGUANA), but notes these are only guidelines. In addition to supporting mandatory training, the Department of Health and Human Services should adopt IGUANA for its workforce and the Victorian Government should also require, through its accreditation, contracting and funding arrangements with relevant service providers, that they adopt IGUANA or develop and enforce an equivalent code to address the principles and processes for reporting family violence against people with disabilities.

Recommendation 172

The Victorian Government fund training and education programs for disability workers—including residential workers, home and community care workers, interpreters and communication assistants and attendant carers—to encourage identification and reporting of family violence among people with disabilities [within two years].

Recommendation 173

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments Disability Reform Council, encourage the Commonwealth Government and the National Disability Insurance Agency to ensure that all disability services workers involved in assessing needs and delivering services have successfully completed certified training in identifying family violence and responding to it. This could include further developing and mandating the units on family violence and responding to suspected abuse in the Community Service Training Package [within five years].

Access to justice

The Commission supports the efforts by Victoria Police to improve its response to people with disabilities reporting family violence following the recommendations in the VEOHRC report. However, more can and should be done. Victoria Police serves as the entry point to the family violence system for many victims. Accordingly, if police do not take a report of family violence seriously, do not conduct a risk assessment and do not complete the associated L17 form—regardless of whether any family violence intervention order or criminal justice process follows—those victims may very well remain unassisted by anyone.

The Commission considers that Victoria Police must improve the collection of disability information. We do not consider that the low numbers of recorded reports of family violence by people with disabilities can be fully explained by barriers to reporting, but consider that there is a lack of consistency in identifying and recording information about disability. While including a disability question on the L17 form is useful, Victoria Police needs to require this field to be completed and should also specify the nature of the disability and/or any assistance (reasonable adjustments) required. We are also concerned about the lack of consistent application of the Code of Practice in relation to the provision of an independent third party for victims with a cognitive disability or mental illness.

Ultimately, Victoria Police must ensure that its practices are non-discriminatory and that it makes reasonable adjustments for people with disabilities, including through supporting the use of AUSLAN interpreters and any communications support that may be required.

Similar considerations apply in relation to the courts.

The Commission welcomes the fact that the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal has a family violence support worker to assist people with family violence matters across all lists. The Commission agrees that more could be done to improve the management of cases within the Guardianship List that may involve people with disabilities experiencing family violence. VCAT is encouraged to develop that capacity.

The Commission welcomes the initiative of the Judicial College of Victoria in developing a core curriculum for judges and magistrates, which addresses family violence, including the specific needs of people with disabilities. We further welcome the development of specific resources for judicial members on disability to be released later in 2016.

The Commission notes that the Judicial College has amended the Uniform Evidence Manual to highlight that people with communication disabilities are encompassed by the definition of a vulnerable witness, in relation to whom a court must disallow improper questioning in cross-examination (section 41(2), (4) of the Evidence Act 2008 (Vic)) and that augmentative and alternative communication may be used by a witness to give evidence (section 31(2) of the Evidence Act). Against this background, the Commission encourages the Judicial College to provide further training to judicial officers on these matters.

The Commission supports the Magistrates' Court and Children's Court submission suggesting the establishment of a vulnerable witness service, similar to the existing statewide Child Witness Service, for people with cognitive impairments or significant communication impairments.

The Commission also supports the proposal that the Victorian Government provide funding to roll out programs, such as the Making Rights a Reality Program, which seek to assist people with disabilities experiencing family violence (including sexual violence) to exercise their legal rights effectively within the justice system.

Recommendation 174

Victoria Police, in the redesign of the police referral (L17) form, ensure that disability data is collected, including on the type of disability and the support required. Training should be provided to help police members identify how and when to make adjustments for people with disabilities [within 12 months].

Recommendation 175

The Judicial College of Victoria provide training to judicial officers in order to raise awareness and encourage consistent application of section 31 of the Evidence Act 2008 (Vic), which allows courts to make adjustments to the way people with disabilities may be questioned and give evidence [within 12 months].

Access to family violence services and accommodation

People with disabilities experiencing family violence must be able to access necessary services, including appropriate and accessible accommodation. Accessibility should not be regarded as something aspirational or special; rather, it should be considered the norm.

In Chapter 9, the Commission recommended that all refuge accommodation should be converted to a core and cluster model by 31 December 2020. This model will also address some very practical issues, such as the accommodation being fully accessible to people with disabilities and including carer accommodation, which should alleviate some of the major barriers women with disabilities face when they need to leave their home because they are unable to safely stay.

The Commission also recommends a concerted move towards increased use of individualised and flexible packages of funding, which include funding to meet costs associated with improving the safety of homes, relocation, purchase of essential household furnishings and the provision of rental or mortgage subsidies. These packages should also be used to fund adaptations to private rental properties, with the approval of the landlord, to improve accessibility. In designing and delivering rental subsidies, the Commission is aware that a challenge will be locating private rental properties that are accessible and avoiding landlord discrimination so that women and children with disabilities can take advantage of these additional packages. Another key component of the package is assistance with education and workforce participation, in recognition of the fact that people with disabilities make a valuable contribution to the workforce but face specific barriers to employment due to discrimination.

The Commission emphasises that in recommending expansion of Flexible Family Violence Packages this expansion should be in addition to the support available under the Disability and Family Violence Crisis Response Initiative, which was described above. The Commission supports the continued funding of the Disability and Family Violence Crisis Response Initiative. The initiative is only available to those eligible for services under the Disability Act. The Commission considers it should be available to other victims of family violence with disabilities, even if they are not eligible under this Act.

The Commission believes that the roll-out of the National Disability Insurance Scheme also presents important opportunities to improve the response to family violence by ensuring that the national quality and safeguarding framework provides individual flexible packages that incorporate provisions for crisis and longer term accommodation for women with disabilities experiencing family violence. The Victorian Government should pursue these opportunities through the Council of Australian Governments and the National Disability Insurance Agency.

The Equal Opportunity Act requires that all service providers (including family violence services) make reasonable adjustments for people with disabilities. We are concerned this is not currently occurring, and that standards and practices do not clearly reflect this obligation. In the introduction to this volume, we recommend that the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission issue a guideline under the Equal Opportunity Act to guide service providers in meeting their obligations.

Similarly, the standards and practices around men's behaviour change programs must also be developed to address the different needs of men with intellectual disabilities or other cognitive impairments. Once again, this includes making reasonable adjustments to such programs, for example, through the use of AUSLAN and other communication supports where required. Also in the introduction to this volume, we recommend that the Department of Health and Human Services should review and update standards for family violence service providers (including men's behaviour change programs). In particular, we recommend that these standards specify an obligation to make reasonable adjustments for people with disabilities.

Recommendation 176

The Department of Health and Human Services review the funding model for crisis supported accommodation to remove barriers for women and children with disabilities [within 12 months].

Recommendation 177

The Victorian Government, in phasing out communal refuges, ensure that replacement accommodation contains disability-accessible units (universal design), where carers can be accommodated as needed and adaptations for children with disabilities are made [within five years].

Recommendation 178

The Victorian Government extend eligibility for the Victorian Disability Family Violence Crisis Response to assist people with disabilities who are victims of family violence and are not eligible for services under the Disability Act 2006 (Vic) but who nevertheless require assistance. Such eligibility should apply when these individuals do not have access to alternative supports [within 12 months].

Recommendation 179

The Victorian Government encourage the National Disability Insurance Agency, in the transition to the National Disability Insurance Scheme, to provide flexible packages that are responsive to people with disabilities experiencing family violence. These packages should incorporate crisis supports and assistance for rebuilding and recovering from family violence [within two years].

Endnotes

- 1 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Disability, Ageing and Carers, Australia: Victoria 2012' (Catalogue No 4433.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, November 2013), Table 3.1. In this survey a person had a disability if they reported a 'limitation, restriction or impairment, which has lasted, or is likely to last, for at least six months and restricts everyday activities'. This included shortness of breath or breathing difficulties causing restriction, mental illness or conditions requiring help or supervision and blackouts, seizures, or loss of consciousness: Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Disability, Ageing and Carers, Australia: Summary of Findings, 2012' (Catalogue No 4433.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, November 2013), Explanatory Notes: Glossary.
- 2 Australian Bureau of Statistics, Disability, Ageing and Carers Australia: Victoria 2012, above n 1, Table 3.1.
- 3 Delanie Woodlock et al, 'Voices Against Violence: Paper One: Summary Report and Recommendations' (Women with Disabilities Victoria, Office of the Public Advocate and Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, 2014) 14; Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 8 [35].
- 4 Victorian Ombudsman, 'Reporting and Investigation of Allegations of Abuse in the Disability Sector: Phase 1—The Effectiveness of Statutory Oversight' (25 June 2015).
- 5 Department of Health and Human Services, People with a disability in the community: Disability in Victoria—About Disability (2 April 2013) <<http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/for-business-and-community/community-involvement/people-with-a-disability-in-the-community/disability-in-victoria/about-disability>>.
- 6 Ibid.
- 7 Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, opened for signature 30 March 2007, 2515 UNTS 3 (entered into force 3 May 2008).
- 8 World Health Organization, Disabilities (2016) <<http://www.who.int/topics/disabilities/en/>>.
- 9 Australian Bureau of Statistics, Disability, Ageing and Carers Australia: Victoria 2012, above n 1, Tables 3.1, 3.2, 4, 6. All data in this section is from this source, unless otherwise indicated.
- 10 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Profiles of Disability, Australia, 2009' (Catalogue No 4429.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, 27 June 2012). This is after adjusting for differences in the age structure of the two populations.
- 11 This term refers to accommodation within establishments, such as hospitals, nursing homes, aged care hostels, care components of retirement villages, and other 'homes', such as group homes for people with disability. The accommodation must include all meals for its occupants and provide 24-hour access to assistance for personal and/or medical needs. To be included in this survey a person must have been a resident—or expected to be a resident—of the cared-accommodation establishment for three months or more.
- 12 Melbourne City Mission, Submission 812, 14 citing VicHealth, 'Disability and Health Inequalities in Australia: Research Summary' (August 2012) 5.
- 13 Eric Emerson, Anne Honey and Gwynnyth Llewellyn, 'Left Behind: 2013—Monitoring the Social Inclusion of Young Australians with Self Reported Long Term Health Conditions, Impairments or Disabilities 2001–2011' (Technical Report 1, Centre for Disability Research and Policy, University of Sydney, February 2013) 1.
- 14 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 9 citing Deakin University and Scope, 'Scope 1 in 4 Information Sheet: Social Inclusion' (25 February 2015) 2.
- 15 Statement of Howe and Hargrave, 11 August 2015, 11 [54].
- 16 Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, above n 7. See also Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 2–3 [13].
- 17 Article 16(1) provides 'States Parties shall take all appropriate legislative, administrative, social, educational and other measures to protect persons with disabilities, both within and outside the home, from all forms of exploitation, violence and abuse, including their gender-based aspects'.
- 18 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, opened for signature 16 December 1966, 999 UNTS 171 (entered into force 23 March 1976); Convention on the Rights of the Child, opened for signature 20 November 1989, 1577 UNTS 3 (entered into force 2 September 1990); Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, opened for signature 18 December 1979, 1249 UNTS 13 (entered into force 3 September 1981).
- 19 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) ss 44–5.
- 20 Disability Discrimination Act 1992 (Cth) s 24.
- 21 See Disability Act 2006 (Vic), ss 14, 16–17.
- 22 See Guardianship and Administration Act 1986 (Vic), ss 14–16, Sch 3.
- 23 Disability Act 2006 (Vic) ss 28, 30, 32; Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 5 [25].
- 24 Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 5 [25].
- 25 See Disability Act 2006 (Vic), ss 23–24. Victorian Ombudsman, above n 4, 66.
- 26 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 4, 17 [67].
- 27 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 4.
- 28 Ibid 4.
- 29 Ibid.
- 30 Ibid 91.
- 31 National Disability Insurance Scheme, NDIS in Victoria <<http://www.ndis.gov.au/about-us/our-sites/vic>>.
- 32 Office of the Public Advocate, 'Interagency Guideline for Addressing Violence, Neglect and Abuse (IGUANA)' (Guideline, 2016).
- 33 Ibid.
- 34 National Disability Insurance Scheme, above n 31.
- 35 National Disability Insurance Scheme, Quality and Safeguards <<http://www.ndis.gov.au/providers/quality-and-safeguards>>.
- 36 ARTD Consultants, 'National Disability Insurance Scheme Quality Assurance and Safeguarding Framework', Department of Social Services Consultation Report (Cth), (31 August 2015) iv–v.
- 37 Ibid 27.
- 38 Ibid.
- 39 Ibid vii.
- 40 Family and Community Development Committee, Parliament of Victoria, Inquiry into Abuse in Disability Services (August 2015).
- 41 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 35.
- 42 Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 8 [35]; Women's Health Victoria, Submission 514, 7; Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Cathy Humphreys et al), Submission 840, 231; Sara-Beth Plummer and Patricia A Findley, 'Women With Disabilities' Experience with Physical and Sexual Abuse: Review of the Literature and Implications for the Field' (2012) 13(1) Trauma, Violence and Abuse 1; Woodlock et al, above n 3, 14.
- 43 Senate Finance and Public Administration References Committee, Parliament of Australia, Inquiry into Domestic Violence in Australia (2015) 40; Women's Health Victoria, Submission 514, 7. See generally Victorian Government, 'Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence Against Women and Children: Everyone Has a Responsibility to Act' (October 2012) 26; Magdalena McGuire, 'Voices Against Violence Paper Four: A Review of the Office of the Public Advocate's Records on Violence Against Women with Disabilities' (Women With Disabilities Australia, 2013) 16–28.
- 44 Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 8 [35].
- 45 Leanne Dowse et al, 'Addressing Violence Against Women and Girls with Disabilities in Australia': (Background Paper, Women With Disabilities Australia, 25 October 2013) 25 citing International Network of Women with Disabilities, 'Violence Against Women with Disabilities' (Centre for Women Policy Studies, 2011).

46 Delanie Woodlock et al, above n 3, 15.

47 Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 8 [36].

48 Plummer and Findley, above n 42, 15, 23, 26; Women's Health Victoria, Submission 514, 7.

49 See, eg, Statement of Howe and Hargrave, 11 August 2015, 4 [23]; Woodlock et al, above n 3, 5. See also Barwon CASA, Submission 524, 9.

50 Lucy Healey, 'Voices Against Violence: Paper 2—Current Issues in Understanding and Responding to Violence Against Women with Disabilities' (Women with Disabilities Victoria, Office of the Public Advocate and Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, 2013) 30.

51 Woodlock et al, above n 3, 5.

52 Eve M Valera and Howard Berenbaum, 'Brain Injury in Battered Women' (2003) 71(4) Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology 797; Christine E Murray et al, 'Practice Update: What Professionals Who Are Not Brain Injury Specialists Need to Know About Intimate Partner Violence-Related Traumatic Brain Injury' (2015) Trauma, Violence & Abuse (forthcoming) 1.

53 Statement of Howe and Hargrave, 11 August 2015, 11 [55].

54 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Cathy Humphreys et al)—02, Submission 840, Briefing paper no 8, 2 (citations omitted).

55 Transcript of Howe, 11 August 2015, 2564 [16]–[24].

56 Dowse et al, above n 45, 26 (citations omitted).

57 Community consultation, Benalla 2, 19 May 2015.

58 Ibid.

59 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, Attachment 4, 21.

60 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 4, 14.

61 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 5(1).

62 Ibid s 8(3).

63 Ibid ss 8(3)(a)–(i). See also, Explanatory Memorandum, Family Violence Protection Bill 2008 (Vic) 4, which explains that it is the court which determines the reasonableness of regarding a person as a family member.

64 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 8(4).

65 Ibid s 8(3).

66 Plummer and Findley, above n 42, 23.

67 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 22 May 2015.

68 Ibid.

69 Ibid.

70 Transcript of Pearce, 11 August 2015, 2566 [16]–[30].

71 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 21 (de-identified case study 12).

72 Transcript of Howe, 11 August 2015, 2563 [16]–[25].

73 Office of the Public Advocate, 'Violence Against People with Cognitive Impairments: Report from the Advocacy/Guardianship Program at the Office of the Public Advocate, Victoria' (2010) 13. The remaining nine perpetrators included the categories of neighbours and strangers.

74 Woodlock et al, above n 3, 15.

75 South West Carer and Respite Services Network, Submission 552, 3.

76 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 36 citing Lucy Healey et al, 'Building the Evidence: A Report on the Status of Policy and Practice in Responding to Violence Against Women with Disabilities in Victoria' (July 2008) 114.

77 Health Services Union, Submission No 69 to Senate Community Affairs References Committee, Parliament of Australia, Inquiry into Violence, Abuse and Neglect against People with a Disability in Institutional and Residential Settings, including the Gender and Age Related Dimensions, and the Particular Situation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander People with Disability, and Culturally and Linguistically Diverse People with Disability, June 2015, 6.

78 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 14.

79 Woodlock et al, above n 3, 14.

80 See, eg, Guardianship and Administration Act 1986 (Vic) s 19; Powers of Attorney Act 2014 (Vic) s 7.

81 Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal (VCAT), Submission 164, 5.

82 Ibid.

83 Ibid 6.

84 Ibid 3.

85 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 23.

86 Statement of Fatouros, 6 August 2015, 18 [71].

87 Ian Rosenbaum et al, 'Head injury in partner-abusive men' (1994) 62(6), Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology 1187–1193, cited in Brain Injury Australia, 'Acquired Brain Injury and Family Violence' (Fact Sheet No 6, 2008), 1.

88 Audrey McKinlay, Cora van Vliet-Ruissen and Annabel Taylor, 'Traumatic Brain Injury Among Mothers Identified as Having a High Risk of Child Maltreatment: A Pilot Study' (2014) 29(4) Journal of Family Violence 391, 393.

89 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 28.

90 Ibid 28–9.

91 Victoria Police, Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence—Edition 3 (2014), 13, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

92 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 30.

93 Ibid 31.

94 Guardianship and Administration Act 1986 (Vic) s 1.

95 Victorian Law Reform Commission, 'Guardianship: Final Report 24' (February 2012) xxix.

96 Ibid 456.

97 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 4, 19.

98 Ibid.

99 Victorian Ombudsman, 'Reporting and Investigation of Allegations of Abuse in the Disability Sector: Phase 2—Incident Reporting' (December 2015) 136–7.

100 Ibid 141–3.

101 Family and Community Development Committee, Parliament of Victoria, Inquiry into Abuse in Disability Services (August 2015) viii–ix.

102 Ibid.

103 Ibid xxviii–xxxii.

104 Department of Health and Human Services, 'State Disability Plan 2013–2016' (2015) iii.

105 Ibid 16–17.

106 National Cross-Disability Disabled People's Organisations, Submission No 142 to Senate Finance and Public Administration References Committee, Parliament of Australia, Inquiry into Domestic Violence in Australia (2015).

107 Ibid 16.

- 108 Ibid 16–17.
- 109 Senate Finance and Public Administration References Committee, Parliament of Australia, Inquiry into Domestic Violence in Australia (2015) 42–3.
- 110 Ibid 63, ix.
- 111 Senate Community Affairs References Committee, Parliament of Australia, Inquiry into Violence, Abuse and Neglect Against People with Disability in Institutional and Residential Settings, including the Gender and Age Related Dimensions, and the Particular Situation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander People with Disability, and Culturally and Linguistically Diverse People with Disability (2015) 169 [6.64], 170 [6.70].
- 112 Ibid 280 [10.64].
- 113 Ibid 281 [10.68].
- 114 Ibid 282 [10.74].
- 115 Ibid 271 [10.26].
- 116 Healey, above n 50, 30 (citations omitted).
- 117 Ibid 34 (citations omitted).
- 118 Senate Community Affairs References Committee, above n 111, 68 [3.67].
- 119 Ibid 282 [10.74].
- 120 Senate Finance and Public Administration References Committee, above n 109, 42–3.
- 121 Ibid ix [4.49], [5.59], [5.61].
- 122 Community consultation, Geelong 2, 28 April 2015.
- 123 See, eg, Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 23.
- 124 Victoria Police, above n 91, 13. The issues of carers and family violence is discussed under a previous sub-heading.
- 125 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 14.
- 126 Transcript of Pearce, 11 August 2015, 2580 [17]–[18].
- 127 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 32.
- 128 Ibid 33.
- 129 Ibid 23.
- 130 Ibid 24.
- 131 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 4, 5.
- 132 Janine Dillon, 'Violence Against People with Cognitive Impairments: Report from the Advocacy/Guardianship Program at the Office of the Public Advocate, Victoria' (2010) 8.
- 133 Statement of 'Brown', 22 July 2015, 1 [7].
- 134 Ibid 8 [52].
- 135 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 99, 63.
- 136 Ibid 104.
- 137 Barbara Carter, 'Rebuilding the Village: Supporting Families Where a Parent Has a Disability' (Report No 2, Office of the Public Advocate, September 2015) 4.
- 138 Transcript of Howe, 11 August 2015, 2569 [20]–[29].
- 139 Woodlock et al, above n 3, 16.
- 140 Transcript of Howe, 11 August 2015, 2573 [24]–[28].
- 141 Statement of Howe and Hargrave, 11 August 2015, 11 [54].
- 142 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, 'Beyond Doubt: The Experiences of People with Disabilities Reporting Crime: Research Findings' (July 2014) 37.
- 143 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 15.
- 144 Ibid.
- 145 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 12 (citations omitted).
- 146 Victoria Police, above n 91, 12.
- 147 Ibid.
- 148 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 99, 136.
- 149 Ibid.
- 150 Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 9 [39].
- 151 Ibid 9 [41].
- 152 Transcript of Pearce, 11 August 2015, 2575 [25]–2576 [5].
- 153 Ibid 2576 [8]–[19]. See also 'Who commits family violence against people with disabilities' previously in this chapter for further discussion around this issue.
- 154 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 99, 51.
- 155 Ibid 144.
- 156 Ibid 12, citing KPMG, 'Review of safeguarding practices in East Division Disability Accommodation Services' (July 2015) 16.
- 157 Ibid 144.
- 158 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 17.
- 159 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Introduction to Disability Practice' (28 April 2015), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 160 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Ready4work Disability Support Work Induction Resource Kit' (2014), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 161 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Department of Human Services—Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework Training Final Report 2011–2013', 4–5, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 162 Lucy Healey, Cathy Humphreys and Keran Howe, 'Inclusive Domestic Violence Standards: Strategies to Improve Interventions for Women with Disabilities?' (2013)(1) Violence and Victims 50.
- 163 Community Services and Health Industry Skills Council (Cth), 'CHC Community Standards' (Release 3.0, 8 December 2015).
- 164 Ibid.
- 165 Ibid 50, 104, 123, 128, 210.
- 166 Lucy Healey, Cathy Humphreys and Keran Howe, above n 162, 50, 60.
- 167 1800Respect National Sexual Assault, Domestic Family Violence Counselling Service, Who is Daisy? (2015) Medibank Health Solutions Telehealth Pty Ltd <<https://www.1800respect.org.au/daisy/>>.
- 168 Minister for Women, The Hon Michaelia Cash, Daisy App Now Connects More Women to Support Services (Media Release, 3 September 2015).
- 169 Victims of Crime, Easy English Resources (10 December 2015) Department of Justice and Regulation <<http://www.victimsofcrime.vic.gov.au/utility/for+professionals/easy+english+resources/>>.
- 170 Tell Someone, Tell Someone (2010) Integrated Family Violence Executive <<http://www.tellsomeone.org.au/>>.

- 171 Patsie Frawley et al, 'What Does it Take? Developing Informed and Effective Tertiary Responses to Violence and Abuse of Women and Girls with Disabilities in Australia.' (Landscapes: State of Knowledge Paper No 3, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, 2015) 12. Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS), Submission 626, 9. One of the 20 projects in ANROWS' 2014–16 research program is a national project to identify best practice models for responding to women and girls with disabilities who have suffered family violence or sexual assault. ANROWS will conduct a national survey to ascertain the accessibility and effectiveness of existing mainstream and specialist services.
- 172 Frawley et al, above n 171, 20.
- 173 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 14.
- 174 Statement of Howe and Hargrave, 11 August 2015, 20 [100]; Magdalena McGuire, 'Voices Against Violence Paper Five: Interviews with Staff and Volunteers from the Office of the Public Advocate' (2014) 29; McAuley Community Services for Women, Submission 480, 27.
- 175 Transcript of Pearce, 11 August 2015, 2583 [3]–[12].
- 176 McAuley Community Services for Women, Submission 480, 27.
- 177 Statement of Howe and Hargrave, 11 August 2015, 20 [100].
- 178 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 24 April 2015.
- 179 See, eg, Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission 447, 17; Statement of 'Jones', 13 July 2015, 6–7 [44].
- 180 Statement of Howe and Hargrave, 11 August 2015, 20 [102].
- 181 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Disability and Family Violence Crisis Response Initiative Guidelines (Version 2)' (2012) 9, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 182 Disability Act 2006 (Vic) s 3.
- 183 Statement of Fonzi, 3 August 2015, 4 [13].
- 184 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 51.
- 185 Ibid.
- 186 Victoria Police, 'Beyond Doubt Recommendations Update 27 April 2015' (2015) 2, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 187 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 15.
- 188 Victoria Police, above n 186, 6.
- 189 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 42.
- 190 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Cathy Humphries et al)—02 Submission 840, Briefing Paper 8, 3.
- 191 Western Region Centre Against Sexual Assault, Submission 864, 7.
- 192 Crime Statistics Agency, An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14 (January 2016) Table 13: Proportion of incidents where other risk factors were recorded at the time of the incident—Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014, 38, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 8 January 2016.
- 193 Victoria Police, Submission 923, Appendix B, 35.
- 194 Ibid.
- 195 Ibid. 7.
- 196 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 24.
- 197 Victoria Police, above n 91, 12.
- 198 Statement of Pearce, 10 August 2015, 15–16 [72].
- 199 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 7.
- 200 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 12.
- 201 Ibid. 39.
- 202 Woodlock et al, above n 3, 18.
- 203 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 81.
- 204 Ibid.
- 205 Victoria Police, above n 186, 3.
- 206 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 112.
- 207 Disability Discrimination Act 1992 (Cth) s 23.
- 208 Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015.
- 209 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 38.
- 210 Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) s 31.
- 211 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 38.v
- 212 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 40.
- 213 Ibid.
- 214 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 7.
- 215 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 14.
- 216 Letter from Kate Jenkins, Commissioner, Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission to The Hon PD Cummins AM, Chair, Victorian Law Reform Commission, 1 <http://www.lawreform.vic.gov.au/sites/default/files/Submission_CP_4_Victorian_Equal_Opportunity_and_Human_Rights_Commission_28-09-15.pdf>.
- 217 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 142, 17.
- 218 No To Violence, 'Men's Behaviour Change Group Work: Minimum Standards and Quality Practice' (2005) 71, 75. For a more detailed discussion of this issue, see Chapter 18.
- 219 No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 42; Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, 8 [35].
- 220 No To Violence, above n 218, 18–19.
- 221 Ibid. 19.
- 222 No to Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 36.
- 223 Minister for Housing, Disability and Ageing, The Hon Martin Foley, 'State Disability Plan for 2017–2020' (Media Release, 17 March 2015). Department of Health and Human Services, 'State Disability Plan 2013–2016' (2015).
- 224 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 4, 83 [502]–[503].
- 225 Ibid. 91.
- 226 Victorian Ombudsman, above n 99, 140.
- 227 Victorian Law Reform Commission, 'Guardianship: Final Report 24' (February 2012) xxix.
- 228 Senate Community Affairs References Committee, above n 111, xv.
- 229 Office of the Public Advocate, Submission 905, 33.
- 230 Department of Human Services, Disability Worker Exclusion Scheme (10 November 2014) <<http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/about-the-department/plans,-programs-and-projects/projects-and-initiatives/disability-services/disability-worker-exclusion-scheme>>.

32 Male victims

Introduction

In this chapter, we discuss the challenges faced by male victims of family violence. Men can be victims of violence inflicted by an intimate partner, a parent, a sibling, an adolescent or adult child or another family member. As is the case for all victims, family violence can have a profound and enduring effect on the lives of men who experience it and they should have their experiences acknowledged and their needs taken into account and addressed.

The first section of this chapter reviews the data on male victims of family violence and outlines men's experience of family violence and current responses to male victims. The Australian data shows that when men are victims, they are likely to be victims of violence perpetrated by either female partners or another male family member (for example, brother, son, father). Men make up around one quarter of victims of violence by intimate partners within heterosexual relationships. Violence by women towards male partners is generally less severe than that of men towards their female partners.

The second section of this chapter explores the issues and challenges related to support services for men. It identifies a lack of information and services for male victims, which can create barriers to men seeking help. It also discusses the problems caused by assumptions and misperceptions about male victims.

The final section of this chapter sets out the Commission's recommendations to promote and strengthen the services available to male victims.

The data considered in this chapter includes all men, unless otherwise indicated, but focuses predominantly on the experiences of heterosexual men. The specific experiences of gay, bisexual and transgender men who experience violence are discussed in Chapter 30.

Context

In order to understand the extent and nature of family violence against men and develop an evidence-based policy response, the Commission has carefully analysed the data on this topic.

We acknowledge that interpreting this data is complicated by the possible under-reporting of family violence by both male and female victims.¹ On this point, there is disagreement about whether men are less likely to report family violence. Some of the material we examined supports this proposition,² while other research suggested that reporting may be further complicated because some men may play down the violence they perpetrate, and play up violence used by women.³

Quantitative studies also tend to record discrete incidents of violence rather than tracking the context of the incident and the history of a relationship, which may contain repeated violent incidents.⁴

Estimated prevalence of family violence against men

The Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey estimates that 5.3 per cent of men (that is, one in 19) and 16.9 per cent of women (one in six) have experienced physical or sexual violence perpetrated by a current or previous partner since the age of 15.⁵ Further, the survey estimates that 14 per cent of men and 25 per cent of women aged 18 or over have experienced emotional abuse by a partner since the age of 15.⁶

The ABS Personal Safety Survey also provides information about the estimated prevalence of other types of family violence against men.

- ▷ 2.1 per cent of men (since the age of 15) have experienced violence perpetrated by a parent against them, compared with 3.5 per cent of women—with men making up 37 per cent of victims of parent-on-child violence.⁷
- ▷ 0.9 per cent of men (since the age of 15) have experienced violence perpetrated by a sibling against them, compared with 1.9 per cent of women, with men making up 32 per cent of victims of sibling violence.⁸
- ▷ 0.2 per cent of men (since the age of 15) have experienced violence used by their children against them, compared with 0.5 per cent of women, with men making up 26 per cent of victims of child-on-parent violence.⁹
- ▷ 1.2 per cent of men (since the age of 15) have experienced violence used by other relatives or in-laws against them, compared with 2.4 per cent of women, with men making up 32 per cent of victims of violence perpetrated by other relatives or in-laws.¹⁰

Police data on family violence incidents shows that the proportion of affected family members who are male remained relatively stable in the five years from July 2009, with an average 24 per cent of affected family members being male.¹¹ Figure 32.1, which is based on family violence incidents reported to police, shows the data for 2013–14.

Figure 32.1 Affected family members, by age and sex: Victoria Police, 2013–14

Source: Crime Statistics Agency, An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14 (January 2016), Figure 4: Sex and age of affected family members – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014, 27, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 8 January 2016.

Gender of victims

The Commission heard many claims concerning the prevalence of male victims of family violence. One such proposition was that one in three victims of family violence are men.¹² Across Australia, men are estimated to comprise approximately one in three victims of physical and/or sexual violence by a current cohabiting partner of the opposite sex.¹³ However, examining violence experienced since the age of 15 and including previous cohabiting partners and boyfriends, girlfriends and dates, men are estimated to comprise approximately one in four victims (24 per cent) of physical and/or sexual violence by intimate partners of the opposite sex.¹⁴

Gender of perpetrators

Perpetrators of family violence against adult males tend to be both male and female, whereas perpetrators of family violence against adult females are mostly male. Research from the Victorian Family Violence Database (which examined court and police data from July 2009 to June 2014)¹⁵ showed that in original applications for a family violence intervention order:

- ▷ Adult perpetrators of family violence against adult males were 43 per cent male ($n=3111$) and 57 per cent female ($n=4119$).¹⁶
- ▷ On the other hand, adult perpetrators of family violence against adult females were 90 per cent male ($n=19,900$).¹⁷
- ▷ For both genders, the majority of adult perpetrators of the opposite sex were a current or former partner, whereas the majority of adult perpetrators of the same sex were another family member (that is, not a same-sex current or former partner).¹⁸

Overall, women are most likely to be victims of intimate partner violence perpetrated by male partners (rather than by any other family member). In contrast, when men are victims, they are likely to be victims of violence either perpetrated by female partners, or by another male family member (brother, son, father).¹⁹

While this quantitative information is the best indicator of the incidence of family violence, it may not capture certain nuances. Quantitative studies tend to assign people to distinct categories of 'victim' or 'perpetrator', which might not always reflect the complexity of family violence incidents—for instance, in determining who is the primary aggressor. A perpetrator can simultaneously receive and inflict injuries (if, say a victim defends himself or herself).²⁰ This can obscure the identity of the primary aggressor.²¹ By way of example, Ms Jacky Tucker, Family Violence Services Manager, Women's Health West, gave evidence that of the 57 referrals her organisation received from police in June 2015 that identified the female as the perpetrator of family violence, after conversations with and assessments of these women, only six were actually found to be perpetrators.²² We examine issues regarding the identification of the primary aggressor in Chapter 14.

Family violence deaths

Data from the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths shows that, of the 288 deaths of relevance to the review between 2000 and 2010, 138 were men and 150 were women (that is, 48 per cent male).²³

The review revealed that there were 136 intimate partner homicides, with approximately 76 per cent ($n=103$) resulting in the death of a woman and 73 per cent ($n=97$) involving male offenders.²⁴ Similarly, the National Homicide Monitoring Program data showed that between July 2010 and June 2012 there were 109 intimate partner homicides across Australia, with 76 per cent ($n=83$) of these victims being women.²⁵

The Victorian System Review of Family Violence Deaths also identified 81 intimate partner homicides where there was a history of family violence, which can be further broken down as follows:

- ▷ 61 of those who died had been the victims of continuing family violence, with six being male victims (9.8 per cent) and 55 being female victims (90.2 per cent)²⁶
- ▷ 18 of those who died had been the perpetrator of violence, with 15 being male perpetrators (83.3 per cent)²⁷
- ▷ two of those who died had been both a victim and perpetrator.²⁸

As discussed, the Victorian Family Violence Database information shows that adult male victims were more likely to experience violence from non-intimate family members than were adult female victims.²⁹ Nationally, between July 2002 and June 2012, when each group of non-intimate partner victim is considered separately, men were more likely than women to be victims of parricides (the killing of a parent—54 per cent, $n=73$), filicides (the killing of a child—56 per cent, $n=132$), siblicides (the killing of a brother or sister—80 per cent, $n=32$) and homicides in other non-intimate partner family relationships (70 per cent, $n=64$).³⁰

In total, of 467 family homicides with male victims, 64 per cent ($n=301$) involved a non-intimate partner perpetrator, whereas of 690 family homicides with female victims, 71 per cent ($n=488$) involved an intimate partner perpetrator.

Therefore, the data suggests that policy responses seeking to address the highest risks to men should focus on the risk posed by parents, siblings and other family members, rather than female intimate partners.

Men's experiences of family violence

Male victims can be subject to physical violence, threats, sexual, emotional, psychological, verbal and financial abuse, property damage and social isolation.³¹ As well as physical injuries, the impact of family violence can include psychological distress, suicidal ideation and loss of work.³² The children of male victims can also suffer these effects.³³

Unlike what you may read, the violence in my household was perpetrated by my mother towards my father. I would routinely see physical assaults of him, either with her hands, punching him, or with her feet, kicking him. She would use weapons, cooking implements, such as saucepans, utensils or furniture. I recall as well where she tried to kill him, running behind him with a garden fork directed at his back. If my sister had not screamed, he would have been seriously injured or killed.³⁴

I think that if you're talking about family violence, even though it's a really small percentage, you've gotta be aware that it's not always a hundred percent directed from the male to the female, it could be the other way around. My dad was very cool and very calm and very placid ... as my sisters and I were, but we copped the full brunt of pretty savage violence directed from the woman, i.e. my mum. That was an ongoing nightmare and it's a difficult one.³⁵

Although heterosexual men are less likely than women to be assaulted by an intimate partner, the Commission received submissions from a number of male victims who had experienced intimate partner violence in a heterosexual relationship.

The Commission was also told about intimate partner violence in circumstances where the woman who used violence had a suspected mental illness or problems with misuse of alcohol and drugs.³⁶ We discuss issues regarding mental health and drug and alcohol misuse in more detail in Chapter 19.

Current responses

The Victims Support Agency is the primary provider of services for male victims of family violence. The Victims of Crime Helpline, a telephone contact service funded by the Department of Justice and Regulation, acts as the 'gateway' to services.³⁷ Most male victims who come into contact with the Helpline have been referred by police through the L17 form (a family violence risk assessment and management report) following police attendance at a family violence incident.³⁸

Of the Helpline's 1143 referrals who identified themselves as a family violence victim in 2013–14, 48 per cent were male and 52 per cent were female.³⁹

The Helpline conducts initial assessments and determines eligibility for referral to the statewide Victims Assistance Program and other services.⁴⁰ The referral pathway through the Helpline depends on a victim's needs and eligibility for services.⁴¹ The Victims Assistance Program helps victims gain access to information, therapeutic interventions and counselling.⁴² Short-term counselling can be provided through in-house counsellors and private providers.⁴³ There is also a case management service that offers assistance with security and finding accommodation.⁴⁴ In addition, the program receives brokerage funding that can be used to provide practical support or therapeutic interventions (including paying for counselling).⁴⁵

The Helpline also makes referrals to Mensline,⁴⁶ which appears to be the only referral point specifically for male victims of family violence. The Mensline website provides some information for male victims.⁴⁷

Challenges and opportunities

Lack of services for male victims

A lack of data makes it difficult to determine the extent of the service gap for male victims of family violence. The Commission was, however, told about the following barriers and shortcomings in services and interventions for men:

- ▷ lack of services for men affected by family violence, and services' limited awareness of the problems experienced by male victims⁴⁸
- ▷ male victims' lack of knowledge of available support⁴⁹
- ▷ lack of online resources for male victims⁵⁰
- ▷ lack of services for male victims of family violence who have children.⁵¹

Some submissions also identified that there are no behaviour change programs for women.⁵²

The Commission was told a number of times about the lack of services designed to respond to family violence against men and the adverse effect this has on male victims.⁵³ The One in Three Campaign submitted that:

It doesn't matter whether males make up 5 per cent, 15 per cent, 35 per cent or 50 per cent of victims of family violence, the fact is that there are few services currently available to assist them.⁵⁴

Other individual submissions noted:

I was unable to access any support and very little reading material to help me whilst I was directly a victim of [family violence]. Any support available was directed towards female victims and the only support services offered to men were for behaviour change programs assuming they were the perpetrator. This immediately negates that I am a victim, showing no acknowledgment of my needs and certainly does not help me remove myself from the situation.⁵⁵

After reporting being knocked out and choked to a [female] GP, she arranged contact with a Domestic Violence support group. A meeting was arranged and I talked to a [counsellor], describing my feelings and what was happening. At the end of the session, the [counsellor] said they do not offer support for men and the meeting [had been] arranged because someone they knew was doing research about male victims. I was utterly devastated, the hard part is asking for help, the harder part is finding it.⁵⁶

The Commission was told that men who seek to leave the family home to escape family violence find that there are few, if any, crisis accommodation options for them, including where they are accompanied by their children.⁵⁷ The Commission was not made aware of any refuges catering only to male victims. General homelessness services can provide accommodation to male victims or provide housing establishment fund assistance with accommodation costs.

National data from specialist homelessness services identified 144,710 female clients and 42,507 male clients who were experiencing family violence.⁵⁸ Importantly, this data does not identify whether the client is a victim or perpetrator of family violence and the data set includes general homelessness services for men which are likely to be a primary source of accommodation for perpetrators when excluded from the home.

In addition, 60 per cent (n=21,254) of these male clients were aged 0–14 years. There were 112,874 female clients aged over 18 years, with 13,602 male clients. Once again, this demonstrates the importance of providing accommodation for children exposed to family violence, including boys and young adult males.

Assumptions and perceptions

The Commission was told of community attitudes that lead to toleration of family violence against men,⁵⁹ including that men should accept violence against them and that men cannot be victims of violence.⁶⁰ The Commission heard that complaints by men about family violence were sometimes disbelieved, not taken seriously or treated with indifference.⁶¹

My first point of contact was the police. It was indifferent. They were trying to play down the situation.⁶²

There were a few outcomes. One of the devastating ones for me was when I went into the police station and told them I had had death threats and had been assaulted. I told them I feared for my life. The police wouldn't investigate because nothing had happened yet. That devastated me. I went for help and they didn't help.⁶³

I went to Men's Helpline and found it atrocious. It's one of the motivators that brought me here. The man [on the phone] said, 'Do you want me to come and hold your hand for you?' He later called back to apologise.⁶⁴

One consequence of this is the difficulties male victims face in proving their victim status to police, courts and services.⁶⁵ Male victims explained that they felt they had to demonstrate that there was more than violence simply perpetrated against them—for example, they could be required to show that their partner had directed her violent behaviour at their children or that she suffered from mental ill-health.⁶⁶

We were also told that in some cases where the man was the victim, it was assumed that he was the perpetrator of the violence:

After the first time I called the police and they attended, I received a letter from Relationships Victoria [sic] asking me if I'd come to a [family violence] program. My wife didn't get a letter. I was the complainant. They presumed I was the perpetrator.⁶⁷

As noted, identifying the 'victim' or 'perpetrator' in a family violence situation can be difficult. The Commission was informed of family violence incidents where the police found both parties were 'equally violent' to each other but charged only the male party.⁶⁸ Ms Annette Vickery, Deputy Chief Executive Officer of the Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, suggested that this can be traced back to the assumptions sometimes made about men in family violence situations:

I have looked at these things from a range of different experiences and I think we as a society struggle to identify women as being able to be violent and struggle to identify men as being victims in a particular situation. Because we do that, we stumble across an equal and equitable way to deal with people who don't fit into the dominant role.⁶⁹

A number of men expressed a particular sense of injustice in connection with family violence intervention orders. In particular, some said the justice system was unable to differentiate between 'true perpetrators' of family violence and those men who were 'set up' by a female partner.⁷⁰

Conversely, the Commission heard that it was common for male perpetrators of family violence to blame their situation on unfair legal processes, rather than accepting responsibility for their own behaviour.⁷¹

The Commission heard that responses to family violence should be flexible enough to accommodate the experiences of all victims:

So the majority of women, yes, they are victims of family violence. The majority of men may well be perpetrators, but there is that crossover. We need a system that's flexible enough to be able to encompass that experience rather than deny somebody the ability to voice that part of them that is not readily recognised or readily recognisable.⁷²

The Commission heard that any public campaign aiming to reduce family violence needs to reflect the diversity of victims (including gay, bisexual and transgender men). At the same time, campaigns focusing on specific cohorts need to complement and not undermine awareness-raising in relation to family violence against women and children, who remain the majority of victims.⁷³

The way forward

Men and women have different experiences as victims of family violence. It is important to understand these differences. Men are more likely to be the perpetrators of family violence in intimate partner relationships. However, men can also be victims of family violence in these relationships. The data suggests that one in four victims of heterosexual intimate partner violence is male.

Men can also be victims of violence when they are children or as older people, and violence can be used against them by adolescent or adult children, siblings and other family members. The data suggests that responses seeking to address the highest risks to men (including homicide) should focus on the risk posed by parents, siblings and other family members, rather than female intimate partners.

Like all victims, male victims should have their experiences acknowledged and their needs taken into account and addressed. There are opportunities to improve our understanding of male victims and the services available to them.

Below we set out our recommended priority areas for action. These are in addition to the recommendations we make elsewhere in this report to improve the responsiveness of the family violence system to the diverse experiences of victims.

Addressing assumptions and misperceptions

Assumptions about victims and perpetrators can result in a failure to identify both male and female victims of family violence. This can increase the risks for victims and any children involved. It can also make it difficult for some male victims to report their experiences and gain support. Assumptions also create challenges for policy makers seeking to determine the level of service provision required.

One of the purposes of any family violence information strategy should be to improve people's understanding of where suitable support can be found. As part of this, the information needs of specific cohorts, including men (whether heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual and transgender), should be taken into account.

Building services' capacity

The principles the Commission applies in its approach to victims of family violence who are women and children—for example, minimising the duration of crisis, ensuring their safety, improving access to quality accommodation and promoting recovery—apply equally to male victims. Although resources should not be diverted from women and children, who constitute the majority of victims, the family violence system needs to respond better to male victims of family violence.

In identifying and responding to the needs of family violence victims, the Victorian Government should take steps to identify and take account of the needs of male victims—including male children, older men who are victims of elder abuse by family members, and gay, bisexual and transgender men.

Any response should be sufficiently flexible to meet the needs of male victims. For example:

- ▷ Responses should build on existing capacities—for instance, the capacity of the Victims of Crime Helpline to provide counselling or other support.
- ▷ Male victims who cannot remain in their home should continue to be provided with assistance to obtain safe accommodation.
- ▷ Other services that could be enhanced to support male victims of family violence include men's or community health services and services that currently support male perpetrators of family violence, such as Mensline.

As part of the industry plan recommended in Chapter 40, the Commission encourages the Victorian Government to develop and implement a corresponding workforce strategy to ensure the effectiveness of services for male victims. Consideration should be given to the gender composition of the workforce and whether a greater number of male counsellors should be employed in male victim services.⁷⁴

As part of the Commission's recommendations relating to strengthening universal services' response to family violence in Chapter 19, the health system's ability to identify and respond to male victims should also be enhanced.

Recommendations

The following recommendations should be read together with the general recommendations in 'Family violence and diversity', located at the start of this part of the report.

Recommendation 180

The Victorian Government publicise and promote the Victims Support Agency in any information campaign relating to family violence as the primary source of assistance for male victims. The agency should also provide appropriate online resources for male victims [within 12 months].

Recommendation 181

The Victims Support Agency continue to receive all police referrals (L17 forms) relating to male victims, including after the establishment of the Support and Safety Hubs. The agency and all other relevant support services should develop joint arrangements to ensure that male victims of family violence are supported in obtaining the help they need [within two years].

Endnotes

- 1 Rochelle Braaf and Isobelle Barrett Meyering, 'The Gender Debate in Domestic Violence: The Role of Data' (Issues Paper 25, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, May 2013) 5.
- 2 See, eg, Dads in Distress Support Services, Submission 493, 3–4; ibid.
- 3 Braaf and Meyering, above n 1, 5.
- 4 Ibid.
- 5 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Personal Safety, Australia, 2012' (Catalogue No 4906.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, December 2013) Table 4.
- 6 Ibid Table 32.
- 7 Ibid Table 4.
- 8 Ibid.
- 9 Ibid. The figure for men experiencing violence by son/daughter (0.2) has a 25–50 per cent relative standard error, and so this figure should be used with caution.
- 10 Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 5.
- 11 Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14' (January 2016), 26, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 8 January 2016.
- 12 See generally, One in Three Campaign, Submission 584.
- 13 Peta Cox, Violence Against Women in Australia: Additional Analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012' (Horizons Research Report Issue 01, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, October 2015) Table A1: Men and Women's experience of violence since the age of 15, Type of violence by relationship to perpetrator and sex of perpetrator.
- 14 Ibid.
- 15 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 11, Magistrates' Court data source, Tab 10, Table 10: Gender of adult respondents on original applications when affected family member is an adult Female, July 2009 to June 2014; Tab 11, Table 11: Gender of adult respondent on original applications when affected family member is an adult Male, July 2009 to June 2014; Victoria Police data source, Tab 11, Table 11: Sex of adult other party by sex of the adult affected family member, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.
- 16 Ibid Magistrates' Court data source, Tab 11, Table 11: Gender of adult respondent on original applications when affected family member is an adult Male, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.
- 17 Ibid Magistrates' Court data source, Magistrates' Court data source, Tab 10, Table 10: Gender of adult respondents on original applications when affected family member is an adult Female, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015.
- 18 Ibid Victoria Police data source, Tab 40, Table 40: Relationship between Affected Family Member and Other Party where the AFM is Male and the OTH is Male; Tab 41, Table 41: Relationship between Affected Family Member and Other Party where the AFM is Female and the OTH is Female, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 10 February 2016.
- 19 Ibid Victoria Police data source, Tab 42, Table 42: Relationship between Affected Family Member and Other Party where the AFM is Female and the OTH is Male; Tab 39, Table 39: Relationship between Affected Family Member and Other Party where the AFM is Male and the OTH is Female, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 10 February 2016.
- 20 Department of Justice, 'Measuring Family Violence in Victoria—Victorian Family Violence Database Volume 5: Eleven Year Trend Analysis 1999–2010' (2012) 77.
- 21 Ibid.
- 22 Transcript of Tucker, 3 August 2015, 1557 [27]–[31].
- 23 Coroners Court of Victoria, 'Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths: First Report' (November 2012) 20.
- 24 Ibid 25.
- 25 Willow Bryant and Tracy Cussen, 'Homicide in Australia: 2010–11 to 2011–12: National Homicide Monitoring Program Report' (AIC Reports Monitoring Reports No.23, 2015) 17.
- 26 Coroners Court of Victoria, above n 23, 26.
- 27 Ibid.
- 28 Ibid.
- 29 Department of Justice, above n 20, 18.
- 30 Tracy Cussen and Willow Bryant, 'Domestic/Family Homicide in Australia' (Research in Practice No.38, May 2015) 3–4.
- 31 One in Three, Male Victims of Family Violence (2015) <<http://www.oneinthree.com.au/malevictims>>.
- 32 One in Three Campaign, Submission 584, 4; Dads in Distress, Submission 493, 3.
- 33 See Chapter 10.
- 34 Anonymous, Submission 35, 1.
- 35 Fitzroy Legal Service and Homeless Persons' Union, Submission 702, 17.
- 36 Anonymous, Submission 35, 4; One in Three Campaign, Submission 584, 14. See generally, Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 22 May 2015.
- 37 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Victims of Crime Helpline Practice Manual', 2015, 19, produced by the State in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 38 Ibid 46.
- 39 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 11, 91.
- 40 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 37, 19.
- 41 Ibid 70.
- 42 Ibid 86.
- 43 Ibid 88.
- 44 Ibid.
- 45 Ibid.
- 46 Department of Justice, 'Victims of Crime Helpline Male Family Violence Practice Manual', 2014, 14, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commissioner's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 47 MensLine, Are you experiencing violence or abuse in your relationship? (2014) <<https://www.mensline.org.au/improvingrelationships/are-you-experiencing-violence-or-abuse-in-your-relationship>>.
- 48 Anonymous, Submission 378, 2.
- 49 Paul Rogers, Submission 103, 2.
- 50 Anonymous, Submission 241, 3.
- 51 Anonymous, Submission 12, 4–5. See also, Anonymous, Submission 586, 3.
- 52 Anonymous, Submission 586, 3; Family Life, Submission 758, 25.

- 53 See, eg, Community consultation, Warrnambool 2, 27 April 2015; Community consultation, Werribee 2, 11 May 2015; Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 14 May 2015; Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015; The Police Association Victoria, Submission 636, 20.
- 54 One in Three Campaign, Submission 584, 6.
- 55 Anonymous, Submission 241, 2.
- 56 Anonymous, Submission 378, 1.
- 57 See, eg, Anonymous, Submission 586, 3, 5.
- 58 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, The Intersection of Domestic Violence and Homelessness <<http://www.aihw.gov.au/homelessness/domestic-violence-and-homelessness/intersection/>>.
- 59 Mentality, Submission 501, 4.
- 60 One in Three Campaign, Submission 584, 10.
- 61 See, eg, Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 22 May 2015; Community consultation, Melbourne 3, 24 April 2015.
- 62 Community consultation, Melbourne 3, 24 April 2015.
- 63 Ibid.
- 64 Ibid.
- 65 See, eg, Dads in Distress Support Services, Submission 493, 4.
- 66 Casey Cardinia Community Legal Service, Submission 991, 3.
- 67 Community consultation, Melbourne 3, 24 April 2015.
- 68 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 815 [3]–[9].
- 69 Ibid 815 [18]–[24].
- 70 Confidential, Submission 45, 29; Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 22 May 2015.
- 71 Moonee Valley Legal Service, Submission 901, 10.
- 72 Transcript of Vickery, 20 July 2015, 815 [25]–[31]. See also, Transcript of Broughton, 6 August 2015, 2176 [7]–[31].
- 73 See, eg, One in Three Campaign, Submission 584, 15; Dads in Distress Support Services, Submission 493, 4.
- 74 See, eg, One in Three Campaign, Submission 584, 20.

33 Rural, regional and remote communities

Introduction

The Commission's terms of reference require it to consider the needs and experiences of people affected by family violence, having particular regard to, among others, people from rural, regional and remote communities. For completeness, the Commission has also considered the needs of people living in remote communities.

This chapter outlines what we heard from and about people living in and providing services to these communities. The Commission held community consultations throughout Victoria—including in Bairnsdale, Benalla, Bendigo, Colac, Echuca, Geelong, Horsham, Maryborough, Mildura, Morwell, Sale, Shepparton, Traralgon and Warrnambool. It also received written submissions¹ and heard evidence from witnesses at the public hearings that dealt with the experiences of people affected by family violence who live outside Melbourne.

The chapter begins by looking at the limited data on the prevalence of family violence and explores some of the main factors that shape a person's experience of family violence in non-urban areas. These include geographic and social isolation, economic vulnerability and cultural factors, all of which may exacerbate the difficulties in finding support that many urban victims of family violence experience.

The next section describes the challenges faced by the justice and service systems that seek to support people in rural, regional and remote communities, including the limited access to specialist services for both victims and perpetrators. Finally, we consider opportunities for improving coordination, governance and the service system and for using technology to assist in addressing the situation in rural, regional and remote communities.

The Commission heard of an increasing awareness in rural, regional and remote communities of family violence and a growing commitment to seeking to prevent and respond to it. Various plans and initiatives are in progress, many of them initiated and led by the local communities themselves. The social connectedness and resilience within these communities offers great potential. At the same time, these communities face significant challenges in addressing family violence, which demands an active and appropriately resourced response.

Accordingly, our recommendations reflect the view that government and other stakeholders need to take further steps to respond to the particular challenges posed by family violence in rural, regional and remote communities. Government should give priority to preventing and responding to family violence in these communities. Greater flexibility in contracting and funding arrangements for service provision and using new technologies should also be pursued.

Context and current practice

The latest Australian Bureau of Statistics figures (as at June 2014) show the estimated resident population of Victoria to be 5.84 million people. Of this, approximately 1.4 million people (24 per cent) live in regional Victoria; that is, anywhere outside of Greater Melbourne.² ABS data shows that 0.1 per cent of Victoria's population is classified as remote.³

The Regional Statement produced by the Victorian Government sets out the breakdown of the regional population as follows:

- ▷ Barwon: 276,935
- ▷ Central Highlands: 184,804
- ▷ Gippsland: 265,150
- ▷ Goulburn: 154,022
- ▷ Great South Coast: 101,117
- ▷ Loddon Campaspe: 226,640
- ▷ Mallee: 89,847
- ▷ Ovens Murray: 120,296
- ▷ Wimmera Southern Mallee: 48,261.⁴

Family violence in rural, regional and remote communities

The Centre for Rural and Regional Law and Justice's recent Landscapes of Violence report acknowledged the difficulty in definitively determining the prevalence and rate of family violence generally, and in comparing one geographic area to another. After reviewing the limited data available, it concluded that Victoria Police family incident statistics 'affirm that higher rates of family violence reports occur in non-urban places'.⁵

This is supported by evidence provided to the Commission that in 2013–14, the 10 local government areas with the highest rates of family violence incidents reported to Victoria Police per 100,000 population were outside metropolitan Melbourne.⁶

According to the Victoria Police submission, although 'metropolitan areas have more than twice as many family violence offences as rural areas, on a per capita basis rural areas account for 65 per cent more offences'.⁷

Although family violence is in general under-reported,⁸ given a number of factors discussed below (including geographic isolation, culture and barriers to accessing services) it is likely that under-reporting is an even greater problem in rural, regional and remote communities.⁹

Experiences of family violence

The Commission heard evidence and received submissions about a number of factors that influence how family violence is experienced in rural, regional and remote communities,¹⁰ as well as posing challenges for government and community responses. These will be discussed in turn.

Geographic and social isolation

One of the biggest difficulties for people living in rural communities is geographic and social isolation.¹¹ Living in remote locations can increase victims' exposure to a variety of forms of violence by perpetrators. Victims living outside towns are particularly vulnerable. This can make it more difficult for police to respond as quickly as would be desirable, as well as making it harder for victims to seek support from family and friends. As one woman noted, 'there is only one road in/out and at times I feel trapped'.¹² Another person commented that:

I live on my own ... up in the Mountains ... very isolated. it's hard to receive the right support to come out to rural areas to see how things are going, as living out in the country on a farm you don't have any visitors or support ... you have to travel to find it.¹³

Isolation also makes it more difficult for victims to obtain relevant services. Many submissions identified transport as posing problems for rural, regional and remote communities,¹⁴ the need to travel increasing both the time and the cost involved in seeking relevant services.¹⁵ There is limited public transport, and any private transport that is available can be expensive, with the result that some victims cannot travel into town to get help.¹⁶ If a perpetrator controls access to private vehicles, this exacerbates the isolation and vulnerability of a victim.¹⁷ The Commission was told in a community consultation that 'people need the services to come to them. They can't get into town, the public transport system is shit. In some towns there's not even taxis'.¹⁸ One woman told the Commission:

I would go out to my car and try to drive away but he would have taken the [removed] out in advance so I couldn't drive the car. By then he would be laughing at me and had locked the door so I'd be stuck outside. I'd have to walk or hitch hike to stay somewhere the night. He thought this was funny.¹⁹

During a consultation, the Commission heard that in rural, regional and remote communities it can be the local taxi service that helps victims escape from the place of violence.²⁰ It was suggested that if taxi drivers were equipped with an understanding of family violence and information about support services, they could better help victims in a crisis.

Position of perpetrator within the community

Paradoxically, victims of family violence in rural, regional and remote communities may be both isolated from services and support, but also concerned about the perpetrator's position within the community and about the inability to maintain privacy, which can make seeking help harder. One woman told the Commission:

People in the local community loved him ... He was the left wing, alternative community hero. We would often drive long distances and he would pull the keys out of the ignition so the steering wheel would jam - we would slide to a halt, skidding alongside the road. He would push me out of the car in the middle of the night and I would have to walk [removed] kms home or hitch hike in pitch darkness through a forest.²¹

Victims can be reluctant to seek help when the police, court staff and the relevant services know the perpetrator. Intertwined with this can be a fear that the victim's (or perpetrator's) circumstances will become more widely known in their community and could result in their ostracism:

If your abuser is seen as an upstanding or outstanding member of the community, it may be difficult to report them to the local authorities.²²

[It's a case of] small town syndrome: the police know the perpetrator and can't believe he's done anything wrong. Everyone talks to everyone.²³

I went to a domestic violence service ... [The perpetrator's] sister worked there. She rang her father and the father told [the perpetrator].²⁴

The Commission was told that this can not only discourage victims from seeking help; it can also deter others from taking action:

[H]ealth professionals may feel unwilling to intervene due to a personal connection with the perpetrator or victim.²⁵

Some doctors who were part of the community tended to try to keep families together or discourage women leaving.²⁶

Importantly, '[k]nowing a person socially does not exclude the potential of that person to be a perpetrator behind closed doors'.²⁷

Economic vulnerability and dependence

Rural, regional and remote communities can also experience economic dislocation—such as underemployment and unemployment.²⁸ This can increase a victim's economic dependence on their partner and family.²⁹

The Commission heard many cases of economic abuse:

I didn't want to go to police because what do I tell them? He held a knife to my throat, but will they believe me? You walk in to a police station saying, "I'm hiding ten dollars under my mattress so that I have some money of my own." I thought I'd be laughed out of the station.³⁰

I gained part time employment in an isolated town he was happy about that because it was so isolated ... he interfered in my work no matter what I did he made trouble for me until I lost the job.³¹

In some cases victims belong to, or have married into, a farm-owning family.³² The Commission heard that if the victim flees or the perpetrator is excluded because of his violence this can have implications for the running of the farm and its ongoing viability. For example, Quantum Support Services submitted that 'family breakup' has implications in the division of the family farm in terms of both livelihood, income and assets,³³ with consequences for the entire family.

Isolation and economic dislocation can also lead to an increase in alcohol and drug misuse and have deleterious effects on mental health.³⁴ One submission noted the 'pub culture' in some small towns.³⁵ The evidence suggests both alcohol and drug misuse and mental illness are more prevalent in rural, regional and remote communities.³⁶ As discussed in Chapter 6, these are individual risk factors for family violence.

Cultural norms in rural, regional and remote communities

Rural, regional and remote communities have many strengths which are relevant to addressing social problems. People living in these communities often feel a sense of connectedness and responsibility for other members of their community who are facing difficulty. As acknowledged in one submission, there is a 'strong community spirit wanting to make changes for the better' in these communities.³⁷

The Commission heard, however, that the culture within some communities is also relevant to experiences of family violence. The Commission was told that rural, regional and remote communities can be characterised by a more conservative view of the world,³⁸ a 'stronger emphasis on gender stereotypes'³⁹ and 'traditional gender constructs and cultures of masculinity'.⁴⁰ The Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice at Deakin University described a victim's experience of these cultural norms:

Tina spoke of the ways her abuser framed his controlling behaviour – restricting both her access to their finances and her association with others – as 'taking care' of her in an 'old fashioned' manner. On the farm she was encouraged to assume responsibility for the domestic sphere and to have no involvement in the operations and management of the business, which were regarded as male domains by her abuser.⁴¹

At a community consultation, the Commission was told of how these conservative views may affect the response that women receive when they disclose family violence:

In [removed] there is a brilliant police officer but there are two others who do not like assertive women. Unfortunately I had had to deal with them on a call-out.⁴²

Another woman from a country area described the difficulties she experienced in gaining employment, due to expectations that she should be a primary caregiver.

Someone told me I shouldn't be working but should look after my children at home, but I didn't have any money. People would deny me work because 'I should be at home'.⁴³

Victims might not identify family violence as wrong and illegal or might feel forced to endure it. This may be demonstrated by the fact that 60 per cent of women from remote areas who leave the family home after a violent episode return; this compares with 30 per cent nationally.⁴⁴ Others observed that 'values of self-reliance' can be important in rural, regional and remote communities and that this might make it more difficult for victims to seek help.⁴⁵

Unique challenges for communities near state borders

Some of Victoria's rural, regional and remote communities are located close to the state's borders. This can give rise to challenges for people experiencing family violence in such areas.⁴⁶ They might need to cross the border frequently for work, education and leisure,⁴⁷ and the closest police station or other relevant service might in fact be located across the border.⁴⁸

There are no national arrangements for automatically recognising and enforcing intervention orders. An interstate intervention order will not be recognised in Victoria until it is registered, and any breaches of that order in Victoria will not be recognised until registration has occurred.⁴⁹ As one consultation participant put it, 'the border is bad for us ... you're not protected over the border.'⁵⁰ The Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice argued that 'synchronisation and coordination of laws' and improved cooperation between law enforcement agencies were required.⁵¹ In Chapter 1, the Commission notes that because this issue is being addressed by the Council of Australian Governments, it is not addressed in this report.

Firearms and other weapons

The Commission was informed that access to firearms is a 'major concern' in rural, regional and remote communities.⁵² Firearm ownership rates are higher in these communities⁵³ and, as Victoria Police pointed out, the high prevalence of firearms in such communities increases the risk of serious family violence.⁵⁴ This concern was raised both in community consultations⁵⁵ and in submissions.⁵⁶ A concern about access to and the prevalence of home-made weapons in these communities was also identified.⁵⁷ One woman told the Commission:

There's still a gun missing that the police didn't find. They said that it's not important ... if he comes out and wants to kill me, he will.⁵⁸

It was also observed that in the past 20 years Victoria Police has become much more responsive to the risks associated with firearms.⁵⁹

A family violence intervention order can include a condition cancelling or suspending a firearms authority,⁶⁰ which, it was submitted, could make it difficult for the perpetrator to manage a farm or maintain employment in rural, regional and remote communities.⁶¹ While it is necessary to preserve safety, such intervention order conditions can also have unintended consequences for the economic wellbeing of the victim and any children.

The impact of natural disasters

The Commission further heard that family violence increases in the wake of natural disasters such as bushfires, droughts and floods, which are more common in rural, regional and remote communities.⁶² Some speculated that during such disasters a 'hypermasculinity kicks in for some.'⁶³ The dislocation, stress and loss experienced during and after these events can also contribute to this phenomenon.

Women's Health Goulburn North East and Women's Health in the North submitted there should be '[i]ncreased understanding by emergency [services] personnel (including police) and community of the likelihood that [family violence] will increase after disaster ... and that disaster is no excuse for violence'.⁶⁴ The links between natural disasters and family violence are discussed further in Chapter 2.

Experiences of diverse groups

The Commission received evidence that some people within rural, regional and remote communities face additional difficulties and ‘[i]ntersectional disadvantage’ as a result of other aspects of their identity.⁶⁵ This includes children and young people, older people, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, people within the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities and people with disabilities. Their experiences will be discussed in turn.

Children and young people

The Commission was informed that there is a lack of services for children in rural, regional and remote communities⁶⁶ and that this applies across a broad spectrum of services relevant to family violence. As one person said, ‘[c]hildren’s voices are not heard much and this needs to change’.⁶⁷

Few activities are available specifically for children and young people in rural, regional and remote communities. One parent noted, ‘[w]e need more opportunities for our children to meet other children who are not on drugs. There is nothing here to do except sport clubs and my kids are not sporty’.⁶⁸

Concerns were also raised about the justice system’s response to children and young people. Victoria Police is required by legislation to interview young people in the presence of an independent third person,⁶⁹ most often a parent or guardian. If a parent or guardian is not available, a referral is made to a trained independent third person, but the Commission was told that trained individuals are not always available in some communities.⁷⁰

The Commission heard that there are no appropriate trauma psychologists for children who have experienced violence in these communities.⁷¹ There are also few options for children or young people who use violence, including limited counselling services.⁷² One consultation participant noted that within their community there were ‘[n]o behaviour programs for kids or males under 18 years’.⁷³

Older people

As explored in Chapter 27, older people’s experience of family violence in rural, regional and remote communities can also be more challenging compared with that of those in metropolitan areas. The proportion of older people in rural, regional and remote communities is increasing as younger people leave to pursue study and employment opportunities elsewhere.⁷⁴

Importantly, this development can exacerbate geographic and social isolation and hence increase the risk and consequence of family violence, including elder abuse by family members who have remained in the local community. One woman told the Commission of the abuse she and her husband experienced from their son:

We’ve had no real help ... he falls between the cracks. He’s 40 ... He damages the property. He’s on an intervention order ... I took it out. We have no other family here. We’re getting worried as we’re getting old and we’re worried about what would happen to us and him. I slept next to a knife block for 5 years I was so scared.⁷⁵

Older people may also be more reliant on others for transport. The outflow of younger community members can diminish the workforce available to provide the services older people need.

The Commission also heard of a lack of attention being given to elder abuse in rural, regional and remote communities.⁷⁶

Aboriginal peoples

Just over half (52 per cent) of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander population of Victoria lives outside Melbourne⁷⁷ and submissions outlined challenges for Aboriginal peoples in non-urban areas. These include a lack of mainstream or Aboriginal community controlled services, and a shortage of culturally safe crisis accommodation.⁷⁸ These and other issues relating to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples are discussed in detail in Chapter 26.

Culturally and linguistically diverse communities

The Commission was informed that the experience of family violence by people in CALD communities in rural, regional and remote areas presents various difficulties, including the availability of services.⁷⁹ For example, it can be difficult to find suitable interpreters, including ones who are not known to the parties, which is likely to be much more of a problem in rural, regional and remote communities.⁸⁰

The Commission heard that it can also be difficult for CALD women in small communities to access information about their rights, which can lead to an increased vulnerability. One woman told the Commission of her experience in a small town:

... her husband lived there for 25 years. He's a charming person to everyone else. He brain washed her on everything. Told her Immigration will deport her. He has strong connections to everyone in the town. He said 'You cannot do anything here. You can't get help, your life is in my hands.' She ran away, and miraculously ran into a friend. She convinced her to leave. She packed everything. Felt she had to go. Caught a taxi. Sent to [removed]—very helpful. One knew her husband and said you have to be sent to Melbourne. Hard for you to fight your husband as it would be like fighting the whole city.⁸¹

InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, which provides culturally appropriate family violence services to CALD communities, noted that it 'rarely sees family violence initiatives targeted at people in CALD communities in [rural, regional and remote communities], even where they make up a significant proportion of the population'.⁸² It added that, because of the 'relatively low cost of living and relatively high rate of low skilled employment opportunities, [rural, regional and remote communities] are attractive to many recently arrived migrants'.⁸³ Such settlement patterns can themselves create vulnerabilities,⁸⁴ confirming the need for suitable services to be available.

Although InTouch is a statewide service, which provides a telephone service and serves as a source of expert advice for other providers (for example, those serving rural, regional and remote communities), its current resources do not allow it to provide more extensive services to CALD communities in these areas.⁸⁵ The experiences of people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds is discussed in more detail in Chapter 28.

LGBTI communities

The Commission was advised that higher levels of discrimination, homophobia and transphobia are experienced in rural, regional and remote communities than in metropolitan communities.⁸⁶ These attitudes can result in a higher prevalence of family members perpetrating violence against their LGBTI relatives.⁸⁷

Discrimination can also make people in same-sex relationships in these communities more likely to remain 'in the closet' and, if they experience intimate partner violence, less likely to seek help.⁸⁸ As is the case throughout rural, regional and remote areas, there is a lack of suitable services—for example, a local or nearby LGBTI support service or health centre, much less an LGBTI family violence worker.⁸⁹ For further discussion see Chapter 30.

People with a disability

The Commission heard that women with disabilities in rural, regional and remote communities face a greater risk than women without disabilities or in metropolitan areas.⁹⁰ Their isolation can be acute. The Commission was told that there is a lack of suitable services for people with disabilities experiencing family violence,⁹¹ as well as a lack of refuges for women who have children with disabilities.⁹² See Chapter 31 for more information about the experiences of people with disabilities.

Community education and prevention initiatives

The Commission heard about a variety of plans and initiatives in progress in rural, regional and remote communities, illustrating their capacity to draw on local resources to prevent family violence and support people affected by it. Among these are establishment of the Benalla Family Violence Prevention Network,⁹³ the Goulburn Valley Family Violence Prevention Network⁹⁴ and the Grampians Integrated Family Violence Committee,⁹⁵ as well as the work of the Go Goldfields Alliance and Family Violence Action Group and the Rotary Club of Maryborough.⁹⁶ This is not an exhaustive list, and the Commission notes that family violence regional integration committees operate across Victoria.

The Commission also heard about examples of work already happening in rural, regional and remote communities, including the following:

- ▷ Community participation in campaigns and events such as White Ribbon Day⁹⁷ and Take a Stand.⁹⁸
- ▷ Distribution of contact cards in an accessible format providing details of local crisis and support options.⁹⁹
- ▷ Placement of advertising messages about family violence on posters and billboards to raise awareness.¹⁰⁰ In the Goulburn Valley, advertisements feature local people in local places as a way of making the messages immediately relevant. The Commission was told this particular campaign had attracted significant local support and positive comment.¹⁰¹
- ▷ Devoting local sporting rounds to the question of family violence—for example, Maryborough's '#sayno2familyviolence football round', which featured players wearing white armbands, the distribution of educational information to players and supporters, and presentation by a female Rotarian of the perpetual shield to the winning team. The intention is that this will be an annual event as part of the Maryborough football-netball league's community round.¹⁰²
- ▷ A focus on parenting (such as Parent and Child Mother Goose, Parents Early Education Partnership, Real Men Make Great Dads and Bringing up Great Kids) and communication and self-defence (such as Rock and Water).¹⁰³
- ▷ Provision of training to employers and local workers in how better to identify and respond to family violence.¹⁰⁴ One such program was attended by over 30 chief executive officers, human resource managers and key staff, with the purpose of embedding knowledge and responses in the workplace.¹⁰⁵
- ▷ Provision of education about respectful relationships to people in schools, sporting clubs and community groups.¹⁰⁶
- ▷ Encouraging local businesses and organisations to support gender equity and respect within their organisational structure,¹⁰⁷ this might include 'increasing the availability and affordability of child care, or changing workplace systems to promote men's equal participation in child-rearing'.¹⁰⁸

Technology

The Commission heard that technology is helping with the provision of family violence-related services. It could be especially promising in responding to some of the challenges rural, regional and remote communities face (although it is recognised that mobile and internet coverage may be an issue for some). The following examples provided to the Commission are indicative of the possibilities:

- ▷ Women's Legal Service Victoria offers the LINK Outreach service which uses Skype to enable rural women to obtain legal advice from professionals with appropriate expertise from across the state.¹⁰⁹ The Commission heard this can be a vital service for rural women when a conflict of interest prevents them from getting legal advice from a local source.¹¹⁰ This could also be used to help provide services to meet specific needs—for example, for culturally and linguistically diverse communities in rural, regional and remote areas.¹¹¹
- ▷ Using technology to disseminate general information on family violence—including to rural, regional and remote communities.¹¹²
- ▷ Electronic security systems and CCTV could be used to improve safety.

- ▷ An online platform (such as that trialled by the Neighbourhood Justice Centre) could be used as a more convenient and secure way to apply for a family violence intervention order.¹¹³
- ▷ Remote witness facilities could be made available for court hearings.¹¹⁴ Given the cost of otherwise improving court infrastructure in rural, regional and remote communities, it was suggested that using remote witness facilities might be a more 'effective investment'.¹¹⁵ It might also help with ensuring access to interpreters.¹¹⁶
- ▷ Services could be integrated across providers and locations by using virtual teams and virtual hubs.¹¹⁷

Although technology promises new ways in which victims can be supported, many consultation participants noted the importance of trusted local people,¹¹⁸ drop-in services¹¹⁹ and face-to-face contact¹²⁰ in encouraging victims to report violence and seek advice and assistance.

Challenges and opportunities

This section examines some of the key challenges and opportunities in relation to addressing family violence in rural, regional and remote communities. Many of these challenges are not unique to these communities—examples of poor or inadequate justice system responses, inaccessibility of necessary family violence services and fragmented governance structures are problems that have been raised statewide. However, the manifestation of these universal challenges in the context of the rural, regional and remote communities needs to be understood in order to develop truly effective responses.

This section outlines the rural, regional and remote communities' experience of the justice system (including police, courts and legal services) and limitations around existing services (including specialist family violence services and access to safe accommodation). The loss of momentum around regional governance frameworks is also discussed.

The justice system

Victoria Police

The evidence before the Commission showed that, as was the case with all victims (see Chapter 14), the experiences of people from rural, regional and remote communities in relation to Victoria Police were varied.

Some referred to 'fantastic'¹²¹ and 'exemplary'¹²² officers and described their 'excellent experiences being looked after by concerned police officers'.¹²³ In the community consultations there was general praise for family violence police teams (units) in rural, regional and remote communities.¹²⁴

On the other hand, some consultation participants suggested that Victoria Police officers in these communities either 'don't want to deal with family violence'¹²⁵ or hold outdated views on family violence. In consultations, the Commission was told that police were reluctant to act if there had been no physical assault.¹²⁶ Examples included police considering that text messages in breach of a family violence intervention order do not amount to family violence¹²⁷ or advising against reporting a breach of a family violence intervention order on a public holiday because of the impact on the perpetrator.¹²⁸ One survivor described the police as 'hopeless' and declared, 'I'll never go through them again'.¹²⁹

The Federation of Community Legal Centres suggested that the closeness of people in rural, regional and remote communities may affect Victoria Police responses: '[T]here is often more empathy from the local police station towards the perpetrator rather than focussing on the safety needs of the women and children'.¹³⁰ Some even alleged collusion between perpetrators and police officers.¹³¹

Police resourcing was also the subject of comment. Ovens Murray Goulburn Integrated Family Violence Services suggested that there were insufficient police resources in rural, regional and remote communities to respond to family violence.¹³² Geographic distance contributes to delays in police attendance, which can ultimately jeopardise safety. The Commission was told by Victorian Police that transporting victims of family violence to a safe place sometimes ties up a police vehicle and delays the response to other incidents.¹³³

The Police Association Victoria argued that the current legislative requirement that family violence safety notices be issued by a Victoria Police officer of the rank of sergeant or higher was inflexible,¹³⁴ noting this was a particular problem in regional areas.¹³⁵

The courts

As in the pattern throughout Victoria, discussed in Chapter 16, concerns were expressed about the level of resources at courts servicing rural, regional and remote communities.

Although the establishment of the Family Violence Court Division of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria in Ballarat was welcomed, there was a general call for a greater number of specialist family violence courts.¹³⁶ The Commission heard from the Magistrates' Court of Victoria that it had endeavoured to spread best practice from the Family Violence Court Division more broadly—'across more courts, across regional and rural Victoria as well as suburban courts'.¹³⁷ The Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice argued that dedicated family violence services should be extended to all headquarter courts in Victoria.¹³⁸

There was concern about poor infrastructure at many courts in rural, regional and remote communities. Several submissions, consultation participants and witnesses pointed to serious safety shortcomings—for example, the lack of a secure waiting area for applicant victims or their children and in some cases, insufficient space to keep them apart from respondent perpetrators in general waiting areas.¹³⁹ The lack of privacy at the front counter of Magistrates' Courts was seen to be a particular difficulty in small communities.¹⁴⁰ One woman described her court experience in a regional town:

For me it was about the exposure in an open court with people walking in and out when you are distraught and frightened and them reading out your name. The entry area, where you're in a small community and see people you live and work with. When you're standing outside distraught and your name is called out over a PA system. May as well say 'whole of Geelong ...'¹⁴¹

Despite these limitations, some consultation participants reported positive experiences of court staff in rural, regional and remote communities. One person described court staff in such a community as 'brilliant'.¹⁴²

The Goulburn Valley Community Legal Centre emphasised the difficulties experienced by lawyers trying to seek instructions from, and provide advice to, clients in some courts noting that interviews were 'conducted in the park or sometimes in the lawyer's vehicle if it is raining, leaving both client and lawyer vulnerable absent security'.¹⁴³

The Commission was made aware of a variety of perspectives in relation to decision-making in rural, regional and remote communities. Some consultation participants praised the work of magistrates sitting in these communities;¹⁴⁴ others commented that members of the magistracy are trained in and sensitive to the nature of family violence.¹⁴⁵ As the Commission explores in Chapter 16, magistrates sitting in rural, regional and remote communities are more likely than most magistrates sitting in metropolitan Melbourne to deal with a range of issues arising from family violence.

In its submission, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria explained that:

All of our country Magistrates regularly do work in the family law area in terms of their professional development ... We regard this as an incredibly important part, particularly dealing with families who are experiencing family violence, in being able to make appropriate family law orders to promote their safety.¹⁴⁶

It was, however, suggested that some magistrates might not be 'well versed in the latest thinking regarding family violence'¹⁴⁷ and that, with magistrates serving on a circuit, they might lack relevant local knowledge.¹⁴⁸ The result can be 'great variance' in outcomes,¹⁴⁹ some comparing it to a lottery as to both the magistrate hearing the matter and the ultimate outcome.¹⁵⁰

The Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice called for 'funded applicant and respondent workers in all rural regional courts'.¹⁵¹

Legal services

The Commission heard there was limited availability of legal services for people attending court. Victoria Legal Aid argued it was not feasible for it to have an office in every large regional centre (such as Mildura), so it is unable to deliver duty lawyer services in these locations (including Mildura).¹⁵² In some cases, community legal centres' servicing of regional centres has also been affected by funding uncertainty.¹⁵³

The Commission was also told that, because of the smaller populations in rural, regional and remote communities, it was more common for conflicts of interest to arise. As Victoria Legal Aid or a community legal centre may have previously acted for the victim (or the perpetrator), that service cannot then act for the other party.¹⁵⁴ In some cases this can leave the other party without access to any legal services.

Service systems

Service challenges

It was submitted that there is a 'significant disparity in service availability and provision between metropolitan and [rural, regional and remote communities]'.¹⁵⁵ Relevant services might not be available in a particular community, or it might be necessary for people to travel considerable distances in order to gain access to the services.

The Commission heard that many services are under-resourced, especially if they have to cover a large geographic area, or victims or perpetrators present with a number of different needs. People might also need more than one service. One provider explained that coordinating and integrating the various service systems which a person needs can entail 'quite significant difficulties'.¹⁵⁶ The end result can be that some people are effectively denied access to relevant services. As one consultation participant put it, '[t]here are just no support services here'.¹⁵⁷

Even where services are available, other complexities can arise in rural, regional and remote communities. Sometimes an organisation might provide a variety of services associated with family violence—such as women's specialist services and men's behaviour change programs—which can give rise to safety concerns when both victims and perpetrators attend the same location.¹⁵⁸

The Commission heard that providing services in these communities is challenging. Indeed, 'considerable effort is needed to get new resources, training and projects into [rural, regional and remote communities]'.¹⁵⁹ It is also difficult for service providers to recruit and retain staff, as well as equip them with suitable training and exposure to new ideas.¹⁶⁰ Some providers feel 'over-stretched' and concerned at 'delivering less than an optimal service' and the 'cumulative trauma of the "lost opportunity" to intervene effectively', which has a direct impact on the 'safety and well-being of [their] staff'.¹⁶¹

The Commission heard that rural, regional and remote communities do not have sufficient trained specialist family violence workers.¹⁶² The result is that many people do not have ready access to these services and even where such services exist, as the Department of Health and Human Services acknowledged during the public hearings, the 'wait lists are greater than what we would like'.¹⁶³ One victim noted, however, that despite the long wait, their local service provider was 'brilliant';¹⁶⁴ another said, '[w]ithout [them] I wouldn't be here'.¹⁶⁵

Similarly, problems with access to men's behaviour change programs were described. Some men might be required to travel long distances to attend such programs,¹⁶⁶ and again, there are long waiting lists. For example, in one regional area there were 2000 potential referrals in nine months, but there were only 120 funded places for the year and the result was a waiting list of six months to two years.¹⁶⁷ The Commission also heard that there are particular difficulties in recruiting people who are qualified to run men's behaviour change programs.¹⁶⁸ The Commission considers this issue further in Chapter 18.

Accommodation

The Commission was told of critical shortages in access to refuges and other accommodation options. It was said that in some major regional cities there is no refuge accommodation at all.¹⁶⁹ Service providers try to place people in local motels and caravan parks—'anywhere that we can find a bed'.¹⁷⁰ Some even spoke of resorting to putting people in tents.¹⁷¹ An associated problem in some rural, regional and remote communities is that they are tourist destinations, which decreases the availability of accommodation and drives up costs.¹⁷² Accordingly, Macedon Ranges Shire Council argued for more refuges in these communities.¹⁷³ At present victims are often sent to Melbourne in order to be kept safe.¹⁷⁴

The Commission also heard that the demand for public and community housing in rural, regional and remote communities exceeds the available stock.¹⁷⁵ The situation was described as 'ridiculous' in one major regional city.¹⁷⁶ In the private market, although rental properties are relatively more affordable in rural, regional and remote communities, there are often fewer available.¹⁷⁷

The Commission heard that this shortage of refuge and other accommodation caused considerable hardship for victims and their families seeking to escape violence in these communities. Some victims were forced out of their communities altogether because of these shortages.¹⁷⁸ Leaving their community can offer a measure of immediate safety, but it jeopardises victims' social and economic wellbeing, removes them from their natural supports, as well as having a broader impact on their family, friends and the wider community they have left.

As discussed, the evidence suggests that alcohol and drug misuse is more prevalent in rural, regional and remote communities.¹⁷⁹ Some argue this has a direct impact on levels of family violence in these communities.¹⁸⁰ There is also evidence of higher levels of psychological distress in such communities.¹⁸¹ As described in Chapter 19, increasing the availability of these health services and their responsiveness to family violence, including the link between depression and other psychological impacts of family violence, is another important element in meeting the needs of rural, regional and remote communities.

Building the capacity of universal services

Although the Commission was told that both universal and specialist services can be under-resourced in rural, regional and remote communities, it was emphasised that universal services are particularly crucial in responding to family violence for several reasons.¹⁸² First, it was argued that there will never be enough funds to develop specialist services in every community.¹⁸³ Secondly, it was noted that victims who are seeking help will usually go to universal services, such as the local community health service.¹⁸⁴ As a result, it was said to be important to invest in developing the level of family violence expertise in universal services in these communities.

As a result of the often large geographic areas, as well as the structures and limited amounts of government funding, some service providers seek to partner with others, which can facilitate a multi-disciplinary response. Ms Ailsa Carr, Executive Manager, Family Youth and Children's Services Unit, Gippsland Lakes Community Health, gave evidence that, in order to service communities, maximise the available funding and engage a team of staff, some providers seek to combine various programs 'where there are synergies' into a package of programs that is 'able to better respond'.¹⁸⁵ Ms Carr argued that a flexible approach was preferable to simple centralisation: '[T]here's 200 kilometres between our agencies. So it's not logical to have people relocated to a single agency ... it's also not logical to have a single centre'.¹⁸⁶

At Gippsland Lakes Community Health an integrated model of care has been developed, involving the provision of five different units of health services.¹⁸⁷ One of these units is the Family Youth and Children's Services unit, which aims to provide a holistic response to the various needs of individuals, families, young people and children¹⁸⁸ and offers numerous programs and services, including the following:

- ▷ Integrated Family Services and Child FIRST
- ▷ maternal and child health nursing
- ▷ family violence outreach
- ▷ a men's behaviour-change program
- ▷ women's and children's family violence counselling
- ▷ a youth pregnancy and parenting group

- ▷ alcohol and drug services
- ▷ homelessness programs
- ▷ youth programs.¹⁸⁹

Individuals who go to Gippsland Lakes Community Health are subject to a comprehensive assessment, which includes a risk assessment. Those who are assessed as requiring multiple services are linked to the relevant services.¹⁹⁰ Ms Carr said her staff:

... also try and utilise the same approach in working with external agencies and use a case management type approach so that [they] can provide a coordinated multidisciplinary response.¹⁹¹

The Commission heard that a model of this nature enables workers to develop a good knowledge of services beyond their own,¹⁹² which means they are better equipped to deal with the complexity and range of problems presented by people coming to universal services.

The Commission was also informed that local governments are generally one of the main employers in rural, regional and remote communities.¹⁹³ Local government is an important provider of services, contracts and funding. Many local governments with responsibility for these communities already have relevant plans and initiatives under way. Local governments—in their capacity as a service provider, employer, contractor and funder—can play an important role in both preventing and responding to family violence.

Similarly, in some communities, one or two private entities can also be major employers.

The Commission was told about current workplace initiatives in rural, regional and remote communities, including the Act at Work initiative¹⁹⁴ which aims to improve understanding of sexism, discrimination and violence against women, increase awareness of the impacts of such behaviours, and develop individuals' and workplaces' capacity to take action.¹⁹⁵ As a result of this initiative, the Commission heard workplaces have become more aware of violence against women, including family violence,¹⁹⁶ while early evaluation findings suggest an overall positive change in staff knowledge, skills, attitudes and willingness to be an active bystander.¹⁹⁷

Governance arrangements

The Commission heard about the existing governance arrangements to support integrated service delivery in rural, regional and remote communities: the regional integration committees.

Regional Integration Committees

Historically, regional integration committees were established (supported by a chairperson and with leadership from a regional integration coordinator) with the aim of bringing together organisations from a range of different sectors to work locally to integrate and improve a region's response to family violence. Among the organisations that contributed representatives to the committees were specialist family violence services, men's behaviour change services, homelessness services, and representatives from Victoria Police, the courts, Corrections Victoria, Child Protection and/or the local Department of Health and Human Services office. In some cases the local coordinator of the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Group was also a representative. In rural, regional and remote communities, the scope of regional integration committees' membership and activity could be even broader.¹⁹⁸

The committees and their coordinators were funded by the Department of Health and Human Services, receiving varying allocations of funding for distribution. The coordinators were employed by a local service provider, which could be either a specialist family violence service or other service provider. Within government, the Office of Women's Policy supported the committees by providing a statewide policy framework and coordination. The committees were also able to report back to the Office of Women's Policy.

The Commission heard that, although the regional integration committees still exist, the structures for the committees and the sense of whole-of-government support, coordination and relationship with the committees have been lost.¹⁹⁹ Witnesses said there was a need for statewide strategic planning and coordination, as well as measures to ensure consistency in purpose and role definition across committees.²⁰⁰ While it was acknowledged that government had supported the development of a regional family violence integration governance model, the model's relevance to and adoption by various committees differed.²⁰¹

The Commission also heard it was important for the regional integration committees, and the family violence sector more generally, to have a structure through which information could be exchanged with government, including clear and consistent statewide messages from government.²⁰² As Domestic Violence Victoria put it:

... for us as a peak body, if [we] want to go and talk to government about how the system is going there's nowhere to go to. [We] might go and talk to DHHS about what they are doing. [We] might go to police and talk about what they are doing. But in terms of anything that's working together or towards common objectives there's nowhere.²⁰³

During the public hearings the Victorian Government acknowledged this situation. Some of the departmental secretaries who gave evidence are involved in the government's regional management forums, which cover the state. Although the regional management forms are not family violence-specific, the departmental secretary who chairs the southern forum said that one of its priorities in 2015 was family violence, in terms of both prevention and local community awareness.²⁰⁴ In the case of another forum, there have been occasions where there has been a session on family violence,²⁰⁵ although these were 'very ad hoc'.²⁰⁶ The Commission discusses these issues further in Chapter 38.

Structuring and funding services

The Commission heard that there are significant problems with the way the Victorian Government structures and funds family violence-related activities, particularly in rural, regional and remote communities.

The Victoria Police and Department of Health and Human Services regions consist of several local government areas, which can create anomalies in terms of the location from which services are provided or to which people are referred.²⁰⁷ For people requiring multiple services, this can aggravate the problem of being sent in multiple directions, as well as making it harder to share information and integrate services.

Many argued that 'one size does not fit all' when it comes to policies, programs, structures and funding.²⁰⁸ For example, structures and funding arrangements based on models that have been suitable in metropolitan areas (for example, servicing a given population) are difficult to apply in rural, regional and remote communities (the relevant population being distributed across a larger area) and might not take account of the greater cost of delivering the same service in these communities.²⁰⁹

Working with the structures and the limited amount of government funding is not easy. Service providers have to be imaginative.²¹⁰ The great strength of these communities is that service providers in these areas 'know each other and have strong working relationships'.²¹¹

Some witnesses gave evidence that government structures and funding mechanisms can have a centralising effect, forcing services to integrate and relocate to larger cities or towns.²¹² As a consequence, smaller communities can lose their local services, resulting in increased travel costs and longer waiting times to gain access to the services sought.

Among other criticisms was the argument that government approaches lack flexibility²¹³ and force administrative burdens onto providers who have to 'unpack' their different activities and services in order to separately report back to government in accordance with their various funding lines.²¹⁴ It was argued that services should instead be developed in partnership with local communities and service providers.²¹⁵

The way forward

People experiencing family violence in rural, regional and remote communities face particular challenges. These include geographical and social isolation, greater economic vulnerability, cultural factors and a lack of access to services. The shortage of behaviour change programs also means that perpetrators are unable to access the interventions they need to change their behaviour.

However, many of these communities also have a strong sense of social connectedness and community, which can be leveraged to prevent and respond to family violence. Shared community condemnation of family violence is more likely to be effective in these communities, where strong social bonds can work to help to influence and change behaviour. There is also great resilience in many of these communities and great potential to build on this.²¹⁶ The Commission was impressed by the plans and initiatives already under way in some of these communities. These developments give us hope that the prevalence of family violence in rural, regional and remote communities can be reduced and that the barriers that victims face in seeking safety and support can be overcome. This will require the combined commitment of all levels of government, service providers and the community.

In Chapter 38, we propose a Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. This strategy should take account of, and give priority attention to, the particular needs of those experiencing family violence in rural, regional and remote communities when formulating policies, planning, developing structures and allocating funding.

The following section describes the Commission's recommended approach to improving responses to family violence in rural, regional and remote communities, by better leveraging universal services (such as health services), harnessing technology and strengthening community responses through reinvigorated governance arrangements.

Services

The Commission heard that the dispersed population and the long distances between population centres in rural, regional and remote communities means that in some areas specialist family violence services are only available on a part-time basis or if the victim has the ability to travel long distances. Unfortunately, often this results in an effective denial of service.

The Commission accepts that no matter how desirable it might be, ensuring that there are specialist family violence services in every rural, regional and remote community would be financially prohibitive. A little more of the same will only result in a little less effective denial of service. More effective strategies are needed for the delivery of specialist family violence services in these communities. For this reason, we recommend that universal services that already have good geographic coverage in these communities—such as health practitioners, child and maternal health services, hospitals, schools and other education providers—are supported to build their capacity to provide a specialist response to family violence. Many of these universal services are already deeply embedded in, and have a broad reach across, their communities. With support from people with relevant specialist knowledge, these services could build on their existing reputation and networks to improve outcomes in rural, regional and remote communities.

In Chapter 13, the Commission recommends the creation of new Support and Safety Hubs designed to improve access to services for victims and perpetrators of family violence. While in metropolitan Melbourne we anticipate that many will operate from a single location, some in the outer suburban areas not well-served by public transport and in rural, regional and remote communities will need to build on existing universal service infrastructure and significant outreach capacity. We note the examples outlined in this chapter of how this could be achieved. Universal and specialist service providers, together with government and other funders, will need to pursue collaboration, creativity and flexibility in order to improve access to services. The Commission notes that when partnerships and relationships between diverse service providers work well, these providers in rural, regional and remote communities often make a noticeable difference with limited resources.

In our view, working with both local government and strategically chosen private employers presents real opportunities to reach a large proportion of the population in rural, regional and remote communities, enabling these communities to be involved in prevention support activities.

Governance structures

The Commission discusses the desirable elements of regional governance arrangements in Chapter 38. The Commission emphasises here, however, that any new regional governance arrangements, including the regional partnerships, should take account of the role of regional integration committees and the concerns noted in this chapter. Such arrangements will be critical in determining progress in preventing and responding to family violence in rural, regional and remote communities.

Any approach to structuring or funding local services must:

- ▷ consult and involve the relevant community in planning and delivery
- ▷ avoid duplication and 'siloing' of services, and unnecessary administration and reporting
- ▷ balance the need to share best practice information with the need to encourage innovation and services which are flexible enough to respond to local conditions
- ▷ facilitate multi-disciplinary partnerships between service providers.

The Commission notes the roles of various groups and services addressing family violence in Aboriginal communities. These include the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups, which consist primarily of members of the Aboriginal community, particularly Elders, and Aboriginal services working in the local area, together with associate members such as Victoria Police, DHHS staff and service providers.²¹⁷ These groups have an essential role in developing and reviewing initiatives designed to redress family violence in Aboriginal communities, including those in rural, regional and remote areas.

Technology

Effective and strategic use of technology has the potential to assist in disseminating information and providing services to victims and communities. It can also facilitate effective communication and relationships between service providers, which assists in improving the safety and efficiency of justice and other service systems.

This potential is especially important for rural, regional and remote communities, but should not be regarded as a substitute for the need for face-to-face contact and support for those affected by family violence.

The Commission urges government and service providers to consider funding technological solutions to better meet the specific needs of these communities, as well as ensuring that communications technology infrastructure is in place to support this.

Recommendation

The following recommendation should be read together with the general recommendations in 'Family violence and diversity'.

Recommendation 182

The Victorian Government and other relevant parties, in designing the recommended Statewide Family Violence Action Plan and implementing the Commission's other recommendations:

- ▷ give priority to reducing family violence in rural, regional and remote communities
- ▷ improve access to services by victims and perpetrators of family violence in such communities
- ▷ investigate and fund the use of technological solutions to provide access to service providers—among them those with experience in safety planning and counselling
- ▷ when contracting for and funding services in these communities, recognise:
 - ▷ the importance of building the capacity of universal services to deliver family violence services in order to facilitate an effective, locally based response
 - ▷ the need for flexibility in contracting and funding arrangements in order to facilitate collaboration between different services and providers.

Endnotes

- 1 See generally, Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511; Gippsland Lakes Community Health, Submission 229; Mallee Family Violence Executive, Submission 617; Women’s Health and Wellbeing—Barwon South West Inc, Submission 780.
- 2 Australian Bureau of Statistics, ‘Regional Population Growth, Australia, 2013–14’ (Catalogue No 3218.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, March 2015) Victoria. Regional means anything outside Greater Melbourne.
- 3 Ibid Population Estimates by Remoteness Area, 2004 to 2014, Table 1.
- 4 State of Victoria, ‘Victoria’s Regional Statement: Your Voice, Your Region, Your State’ (November 2015), 53–71.
- 5 Amanda George and Bridget Harris, ‘Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria’ (2014) 33–34.
- 6 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 15. See also Women’s Health in the South East Inc, Submission 370, 11. See also Chapter 3.
- 7 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 36.
- 8 See Chapters 3 and 39.
- 9 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 4 citing George and Harris, above n 5 and Russell Hogg and Kerry Carrington, Policing the Rural Crisis (Federation Press, 2006).
- 10 See, eg, Daniel Mulino and Harriet Shing—Members for Eastern Victoria Region, Submission 806, 1–2.
- 11 Ibid 2.
- 12 Anonymous, Submission 76, 6.
- 13 Anonymous, Submission 856, 10.
- 14 Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3757 [5]–[9]; Castlemaine District Community Health Ltd on behalf of Health and Community Services Sector—Mount Alexander Shire, Submission 211, 1; Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 5; Mary-Anne Thomas—Member for Macedon, Submission 441, 3; Sharon Knight—Member for Wendouree, Submission 788, 1; Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 55; Anonymous, Submission 251, 5.
- 15 Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015; Cobaw Community Health, Submission 396, 5.
- 16 Community consultation, Bairnsdale, 28 May 2015.
- 17 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 5, citing George and Harris, above n 5.
- 18 Community consultation, Bairnsdale, 28 May 2015.
- 19 Anonymous, Submission 411, 2.
- 20 Community consultation, Horsham 2, 22 April 2015.
- 21 Anonymous, Submission 411, 1–2.
- 22 Sharon Knight—Member for Wendouree, Submission 788, 2.
- 23 Community consultation, Warrnambool 2, 27 April 2015.
- 24 Anonymous, Submission 976, 2.
- 25 Colac Area Health, Submission 599, 1.
- 26 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 29.
- 27 Anonymous, Submission 383, 1.
- 28 Daniel Mulino and Harriet Shing—Members for Eastern Victoria Region, Submission 806, 2.
- 29 Women’s Health and Wellbeing—Barwon South West Inc, Submission 780, 15.
- 30 Community consultation, Bendigo 1, 5 May 2015.
- 31 Anonymous, Submission 585, 2–3.
- 32 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 18.
- 33 Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 10.
- 34 Daniel Mulino and Harriet Shing—Members for Eastern Victoria Region, Submission 806, 2.
- 35 Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 1.
- 36 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, ‘National Drug Strategy Household Survey: Detailed Report 2013’ (Drug Statistics Series No 28 Cat no PHE 183, Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, 2014) ix, 84, 86–9; Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, ‘Rural, Regional and Remote Health: Indicators of Health Status and Determinants of Health’ (Rural Health Series No 9, Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, March 2008) 31–6.
- 37 Anonymous, Submission 76, 6.
- 38 Central Goldfields Shire Council, Submission 498, 4; Women’s Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 23; Women’s Health and Wellbeing—Barwon South West Inc, Submission 780, 16; Women’s Health Grampians, Submission 824, 8; Anonymous, Submission 403, 2.
- 39 Transcript of Brennan, 15 July 2015, 302 [22]–[25].
- 40 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 51. See also Victoria Police, Submission 923, 36.
- 41 George and Harris, above n 5, 48.
- 42 Community consultation, Shepparton 1, 18 May 2015.
- 43 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 24 April 2015.
- 44 Women’s Health and Wellbeing—Barwon South West Inc, Submission 780, 15, citing Alexandra Neame and Melanie Heenan, ‘Responding to Sexual Assault in Rural Communities’ (ACSSA Briefing No 3, Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, June 2004) 5.
- 45 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 40.
- 46 Owens Murray Goulburn Integrated Family Violence Services, Submission 444, 4.
- 47 Ibid 13.
- 48 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 36. See also Echuca Regional Health, Submission 754, 3–4; Community consultation, Maryborough 2, 21 April 2015.
- 49 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) pt 10. See also Murray Mallee Community Legal Service, Submission 513, 7; Owens Murray Goulburn Integrated Family Violence Services, Submission 444, 13.
- 50 Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015.
- 51 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 36.
- 52 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 18.
- 53 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 15 citing George and Harris, above n 5.
- 54 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 36.
- 55 Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015; Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015.
- 56 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 31 quoting George and Harris, above n 5, 153; Goulburn Valley Community Legal Centre, Submission 495, 7; Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 10.
- 57 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, Attachment 1, 55.
- 58 Community consultation, Shepparton 1, 18 May 2015.
- 59 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, Attachment 1, 57.
- 60 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) ss 81(2)(h), 95. In certain circumstances, a firearm can also be seized: ss 160(2)(b)(ii), 163.

61 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, Attachment 1, 99–100.

62 Mallee Family Violence Executive, Submission 617, 17; Women’s Health Goulburn North East, Submission 367, 6; Women’s Health Grampians, Submission 824, 8; Women’s Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 22; Women’s Health in the North, Submission 637, 29; Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015.

63 Chris Laming, Submission 658, 5.

64 Women’s Health Goulburn North East, Submission 367, 6. See also, Women’s Health in the North, Submission 637, 29.

65 Women’s Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 4.

66 State-wide Children’s Resource Program, Submission 126, 1; Community consultation, Bendigo 2, 5 May 2015; Community consultation, Echuca 2, 7 May 2015; Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015. On children and young people, see generally Chapter 10.

67 Community consultation, Bendigo 2, 5 May 2015.

68 Anonymous, Submission 76, 6.

69 See, eg, Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 464E.

70 Transcript of Allen, 11 August 2015, 2684 [13]–[17].

71 Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015.

72 Community consultation, Echuca 2, 7 May 2015. See generally, Chapter 23.

73 Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015.

74 Transcript of Blakey, 11 August 2015, 2601 [13]–[16].

75 Community consultation, Shepparton 1, 18 May 2015.

76 Community consultation, Shepparton 2, 18 May 2015.

77 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 43.

78 Ibid 18.

79 Transcript of Avdibegovic, 11 August 2015, 2653 [19]–[22]. See, eg, The Federation of Chinese Associations Vic, Submission 774, 5–6. See also Chapter 28.

80 Barwon Community Legal Service, Submission 535, 4; Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 23; Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 10.

81 Community consultation, Richmond, 1 May 2015.

82 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 51.

83 Ibid.

84 Transcript of El Matrah, 11 August 2015, 2654 [1]–[3].

85 Transcript of Avdibegovic, 11 August 2015, 2653 [6]–[10].

86 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 12; Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 7. On LGBTI communities, see generally Chapter 30.

87 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 4.

88 Transcript of Brown, 11 August 2015, 2542 [11]–[16]; Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 7.

89 Rainbow Families Council, Submission 865, 3.

90 Transcript of Taft, 13 October 2015, 3459 [4]–[6]; Community consultation, Benalla 2, 19 May 2015.

91 Community consultation, Geelong 2, 28 April 2015.

92 Community consultation, Melbourne, 6 May 2015.

93 Benalla Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 131, 1.

94 Goulburn Valley Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 801, 1.

95 Grampians Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 399, 2.

96 Statement of Higgins, 7 August 2015; Transcript of Higgins, 10 August 2015, 2486 [29]–2505 [31]; Maryborough Rotary Club, Submission 133.

97 See, eg, Benalla Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 131, 8; Goulburn Valley Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 801, 2.

98 Benalla Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 131, 9.

99 Statement of Higgins, 7 August 2015, 9 [35]; Goulburn Valley Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 801, 2.

100 Statement of Higgins, 7 August 2015, 9 [35]; Goulburn Valley Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 801, 1.

101 Goulburn Valley Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 801, 1.

102 Statement of Higgins, 7 August 2015, 6 [38]–[39].

103 Benalla Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 131, 9.

104 Goulburn Valley Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 801, 1–2.

105 Statement of Higgins, 7 August 2015, 5 [36].

106 Benalla Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 131, 8.

107 Ibid 9.

108 Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 18–19.

109 Women’s Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 62.

110 Berry Street, Submission 834, 44.

111 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 51.

112 Transcript of Renkin, 12 October 2015, 3298 [26]–[28].

113 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 38.

114 Community consultation, Bendigo 2, 5 May 2015; Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 4, 17; Court Services Victoria, Submission 646, 11.

115 Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 19 citing George and Harris, above n 5.

116 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 23.

117 Transcript of Carr, 13 August 2015, 3021 [10]–[15]; Transcript of Mahoney, 23 July 2015, 1392 [25]–[29].

118 Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015.

119 Community consultation, Echuca 2, 7 May 2015.

120 Community consultation, Warrnambool 2, 27 April 2015.

121 Community consultation, Sale, 12 May 2015.

122 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 7.

123 Anonymous, Submission 416, 1.

124 Community consultation, Warrnambool 2, 27 April 2015; Community consultation, Geelong 1, 28 April 2015; Community consultation, Mildura, 2 July 2015; Community consultation, Melbourne, 6 May 2015.

125 Community consultation, Echuca 1, 7 May 2015.

126 Community consultation, Maryborough 1, 21 April 2015; Community consultation, Bendigo 1, 5 May 2015.

127 Confidential, Submission 4.

128 Confidential, Submission 283.

129 Community consultation, Melbourne, 6 May 2015.

130 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 18.

131 Confidential, Submission 594.

132 Owens Murray Goulburn Integrated Family Violence Services, Submission 444, 4.

133 Community consultation, Maryborough 2, 21 April 2015.

134 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) s 26.

135 The Police Association Victoria, Submission 636, 28.

136 Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 2. See generally Chapter 16.

137 Transcript of Hawkins, 4 August 2015, 1857 [19]–[24].

138 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 10.

139 Community consultation, Maryborough 2, 21 April 2015; Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015; Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 5 [26]; Transcript of Atmore, 5 August 2015, 1931 [20]–[21]; Transcript of Casey, 4 August 2015, 1780 [24]–[25]; Court Services Victoria, Submission 646, 11; Goulburn Valley Community Legal Centre, Submission 495, 5.

140 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 17.

141 Community consultation, Geelong 1, 28 April 2015.

142 Community consultation, Maryborough 1, 21 April 2015.

143 Goulburn Valley Community Legal Centre, Submission 495, 6.

144 Community consultation, Melbourne, 6 May 2015.

145 Gippsland Community Legal Service, Submission 443, 9.

146 Transcript of Broughton, 5 August 2015, 1967 [26]–1968 [2].

147 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 5 [26].

148 Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 12.

149 Ibid.

150 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 5 [26]; Gippsland Lakes Community Health, Submission 229, 4; Community consultation, Melbourne, 6 May 2015.

151 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 19.

152 Victoria Legal Aid, Submission 919, 22.

153 Ibid.

154 Community consultation, Werribee 1, 11 May 2015; Barwon Community Legal Service, Submission 535, 4; Central Highlands Community Legal Centre Inc, Submission 463, 2; Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 12; Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 7.

155 Crystal Bruton, Submission 137, 4.

156 Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3756 [27].

157 Community consultation, Maryborough 1, 21 April 2015.

158 Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015; ibid.

159 Women’s Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 24.

160 Ibid. 23.

161 Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 9.

162 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 4–5 [23]; Community consultation, Echuca 2, 7 May 2015.

163 Transcript of Allen, 15 July 2015, 373 [21]–[22].

164 Community consultation, Geelong 1, 28 April 2015.

165 Ibid.

166 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 5 [27].

167 Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015; Exploring perpetrator interventions roundtable discussion, Melbourne 21 September 2015.

168 Transcript of Brandenburg, 24 July 2015, 1506 [20]–[21].

169 Statement of Doody, 20 July 2015, 3 [13].

170 Ibid. 3 [14].

171 Statement of Kirby, 10 August 2015, 13 [53].

172 Community consultation, Echuca 2, 7 May 2015; Statement of Doody, 20 July 2015, 3 [15].

173 Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 2.

174 Community consultation, Horsham 2, 22 April 2015.

175 Statement of Kirby, 10 August 2015, 13 [53].

176 Ibid.

177 Council to Homeless Persons, Submission 920, 16.

178 Women’s Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 23; ibid.

179 Campaspe Primary Care Partnership, Submission 802, 2–3.

180 Anonymous, Submission 76, 2.

181 Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 5.

182 Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015.

183 Transcript of Carr, 13 August 2015, 3026 [14]–[17].

184 Ibid. 3027 [5]–[6].

185 Ibid. 2999 [13]–[17], [26]–[31].

186 Ibid. 3021 [5]–[9].

187 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 2 [14].

188 Ibid. 3 [15].

189 Ibid. 3 [16].

190 Ibid. 3 [17].

191 Transcript of Carr, 14 July 2015, 230 [7]–[10].

192 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 3 [18].

193 City of Greater Bendigo, Submission 763, 5.

194 Community consultation, Maryborough 2, 21 April 2015; Community consultation, Horsham 2, 22 April 2015.

195 Women’s Health Grampians, Submission 824, Attachment 1, 19.

196 Statement of Brandenburg, 21 July 2015, 10 [47].

197 Women’s Health Grampians, Submission 824, Attachment 1, 19; Women’s Health Association of Victoria, Submission 509, 13.

198 Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3728 [16]–[17].

199 Transcript of McCormack, 15 October 2015, 3723 [7]–[16].

200 Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3734 [22]–3735 [3].

- 201 Transcript of McCormack, 15 October 2015, 3735 [9]–[16].
- 202 Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3737 [15]–[19]; Transcript of Campbell, 15 October 2015, 3738 [22]–[27].
- 203 Transcript of McCormack, 15 October 2015, 3739 [22]–[27].
- 204 Transcript of Callister, 16 October 2015, 3886 [24]–[30].
- 205 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3878 [12]–[13].
- 206 Ibid 3878 [15].
- 207 Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3756 [1]–[6]; Community consultation, Maryborough 2, 21 April 2015; Ovens Murray Goulburn Integrated Family Violence Services, Submission 444, 4.
- 208 Benalla Family Violence Prevention Network, Submission 131, 4; Grampians Community Health, Submission 520, 14; North Central Victoria Family Services Alliance, Submission 624, 2; Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 11, 15.
- 209 Quantum Support Services Incorporated, Submission 371, 9.
- 210 Community consultation, Echuca 2, 7 May 2015.
- 211 Community consultation, Warrnambool 2, 27 April 2015.
- 212 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 4 [20]; Statement of Doody, 20 July 2015, 8 [40].
- 213 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 5 [25]; Gippsland Lakes Community Health, Submission 229, 4.
- 214 Transcript of Carr, 13 August 2015, 2999 [26]–3000 [4].
- 215 Statement of Carr, 8 July 2015, 4–5 [23].
- 216 Transcript of Comrie, 14 October 2015, 3568 [1]–[2].
- 217 Transcript of Singh, 20 July 2015, 844 [9]–[17].

34 Women in prison

Introduction

The Royal Commission's terms of reference require it to consider the needs and experiences of people affected by family violence, having particular regard to people in diverse communities.¹ Although women in prison are not specifically named, the Commission has chosen to consider them specifically because they are often marginalised, may include a disproportionate number of women from specific communities, and have a particular experience of family violence. In view of their different circumstances and needs, they warrant particular policy and practice interventions to facilitate access to supports and services.

Evidence presented to the Commission suggests that family violence looms large in the childhood and early years of many of these women and might disproportionately affect them in their adult life. Some women in prison might have committed offences as a result of a history of childhood violence or other trauma; some might have committed offences because they were pressured to do so by a violent partner; some might be pursued by a violent partner while they are in prison or might be at risk of violence when they leave prison. Women in these situations need support while they are in prison, to help them overcome the effects of past trauma and avoid re-offending. They might also need risk assessment and management to protect them from violence after their release. In addition, many women in prison face challenges in obtaining support before, during and after family violence. This can have serious consequences for their health and wellbeing, can impede their recovery from violence, and can lead to further criminalisation.

The Commission acknowledges the complexity of the lived experience of these women and the importance of avoiding categorising their identities and experiences. Evidence tells us that women in prison have often experienced social and economic disadvantage, and the intersection between these forms of inequality and family violence can have severe effects on their health, wellbeing and long-term recovery and can contribute to some of them re-offending.

The first section of this chapter describes women's patterns of offending and the policies and practices of Corrections Victoria in relation to family violence. The Commission was informed that Corrections Victoria has to date not collected data on the number of women prisoners who have experienced family violence but that new policies and documents outlining practical initiatives have recently been developed. This section also discusses how family violence can be a contributing factor to women committing offences and outlines current initiatives aimed at alleviating the effects of family violence on female prisoners.

The second section of this chapter discusses the experiences of female prisoners who have been victims of family violence and considers how these experiences can make it more difficult for women to re-integrate into the community after they are released.

In the final section of this chapter, the Commission makes recommendations aimed at helping to identify female victims of family violence in the corrections system and providing intensive practical and therapeutic support to meet their needs. The purpose of the recommendations is to improve the treatment of marginalised women and to ensure that, as victims of family violence, they receive the same access to support as other victims of family violence and that such support reflects the complexity of their experiences.

Context and current practice

Evidence, research and submissions the Commission examined show that women in prison have experienced family violence at much higher rates than women in the rest of the community. This section discusses what is currently known about the population of women prisoners in Victoria and how Corrections Victoria assesses their needs. The chapter then examines how family violence can be a contributing factor to women committing offences and outlines current initiatives to mitigate the effects of family violence on women who have been imprisoned.

Female prisoners

In Victoria there are two female-only prisons—the Dame Phyllis Frost Centre and Tarrengower Prison. As at 30 June 2015 these two institutions had a combined operational capacity of 468 prisoners.²

The Australian Institute of Criminology observes that women's pathways to and patterns of offending are very different from those of males.³ Although the research results vary slightly, when compared with men Australian women tend to commit fewer and less violent crimes—for example, drug offences, fraud and property theft.⁴ They also have shorter average periods of imprisonment but have more frequent periods in prison.⁵ In addition, women offenders have higher levels of previous victimisation, poor mental health and serious mental illness, substance misuse, and unemployment and low educational attainment.⁶

Family violence-related policy and practice: Corrections Victoria

In 2005 Corrections Victoria developed Better Pathways: An Integrated Response to Women's Offending and Reoffending with a view to meeting the needs of some women who are at risk of offending and re-offending—including women affected by family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse, and lack of employment and housing.⁷

The 2014 Corrections Victoria document entitled Standards for the Management of Women Prisoners in Victoria establishes the minimum requirements for correctional services in Victorian prisons for women.⁸ It also describes a range of services and supportive interventions designed to prepare prisoners for release and promote integration and reduce re-offending;⁹ one element of this is access to specialist family violence and sexual assault services.¹⁰

The standards document establishes that 'survivors of sexual, physical and/or emotional abuse are provided with specialist counselling, advocacy and support services by an approved community-based agency to assist them in the recovery process and reduce the risk of perpetuating cycles of abuse and reoffending'. This occurs while in prison and after release. In the case of family violence victims, other services are provided, where practical, to respond to unmet needs relating to female prisoners' experiences of family violence.¹¹

In 2015 Corrections Victoria produced its major family violence-related policy document, the Family Violence Policy Framework, which outlines the organisation's response and commitment to contributing to the broader work being done in relation to family violence in Victoria.¹² It also issued its Family Violence Service Reform Strategy, which covers all prisons and community corrections and includes identification of perpetrators, delivery of targeted family violence programs and services to perpetrators, support for victims of family violence, cultural and attitudinal change through education, and the need to work with other systems.¹³

The 2015 Corrections Victoria Reintegration Pathway document sets out the service delivery model for the re-integration pathway for prisoners, through entry, sentence stage, pre-release and post-release. It states:

The CV Reintegration Pathway provides general and targeted transitional activities at each stage that aim to build on achievements and interventions of previous stages. In accordance with evidence and best practice, transitional activities commence on entry and continue throughout a prisoner's correctional episode. The service will operate as a hybrid model combining internal Corrections Victoria services with contracted services delivered by Community Service Organisations.¹⁴

The Commission notes Corrections Victoria's transition programs—Reception Transition Triage, Case Planning Transition and the General Pre-Release Program. These deal with transitional needs, from entry into prison to pre-release, in combination with support from external services and agencies.¹⁵

The Commission was informed that about 560 Community Correctional Services staff members were trained in the use of the Victorian Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF) between 2009–2010 and 2013–2014 and that training continues.¹⁶

In connection with identifying women who have experienced or are experiencing family violence, the Commission was informed that when an offender enters prison Corrections Victoria uses the following assessment tools to determine the general risk of re-offending as well as intervention needs:

- ▷ The Level of Service Inventory—Revised: Screening Version (LSI-R: SV). This is administered as part of the classification process, within 14 days of sentencing or a sentenced prisoner's reception into prison custody.
- ▷ The Level of Service/Risk, Need, Responsivity (LS/RNR). This is administered within six weeks of completion of the LSI-R: SV; it is for prisoners assessed as medium and high-risk who have six or more months remaining on their sentence.¹⁷

The Sentence Management Manual—Level of Service (LS) Assessment Tools states that the LS/RNR is an instrument in which static risks and dynamic (criminogenic) needs are combined to produce an overall assessment of offender risk.¹⁸ It allows the interviewer to record whether the prisoner discloses that they are a 'victim of family violence' and whether it is 'past, current, physical, sexual, emotional, neglect'.¹⁹

In response to a request for information on the total number of prisoners for which a history of family violence is flagged or noted, Corrections Victoria said that data is not collected on family violence victim status of prisoners or offenders.²⁰

Family violence and the criminalisation of women

Provocative though it may be, the question then becomes to what extent Victoria would need a women's prison were it not for its epidemic of family violence.²¹

The trauma associated with family violence can be a contributing factor to criminal offending, can exacerbate the trauma of being imprisoned, and can make it difficult to re-integrate into the community on release.²²

Evidence that family violence frequently features in the lives of women in prison was presented to the Commission. Women in prison report substantially higher rates of victimisation, physical and sexual abuse and family violence than in the rest of the community.²³ Although some women are incarcerated for violence-related offences, it is important to stress that female offenders experience higher rates of victimisation than male offenders.²⁴ The Commission's consultations with female offenders revealed that a substantial majority of these women had experienced family violence either as children or from their intimate partners, and sometimes both.²⁵

Caraniche, a Victoria-based psychological consulting firm that delivers forensic drug, alcohol, violence prevention and rehabilitation services in prisons and corrections systems, estimates that more than 70 per cent of its female clients were exposed to family violence as a child and as an adult. This is substantially higher than the rate for its male clients.²⁶ It also noted, however, that the availability of quality data on the prevalence of family violence in offender populations and on the effect of family violence on criminal offending is limited.²⁷

An Australian Institute of Criminology study found that 78 per cent of female offenders ($n=470$) who were incarcerated in 2003 reported experiencing emotional, sexual or physical abuse as an adult and that the primary perpetrators of emotional and physical abuse were spouses or partners.²⁸

As part of their submission, the Mental Health Legal Centre, Inside Access and the Centre for Innovative Justice analysed 50 civil matter case files from women at the Dame Phyllis Frost Centre who sought legal assistance from the prison's Inside Access program. Of the 50 randomly selected case files, family violence was a factor in 44 per cent of cases.²⁹

This is not to say that all family violence victims become criminal offenders: rather, the effects of family violence can contribute to victims committing offences.³⁰ For some women, it is their only option for leaving violence. Other victims experience multiple layers of disadvantage that can contribute to their offending. Caraniche clinicians estimate that 40 per cent of female offenders also use violence in the home, often against their children.³¹

The Commission's discussions with women in prison highlighted the lengths to which some women go for safety from family violence because of the inadequacy of the options they perceive they have outside prison. One woman who had lived in a violent relationship, and who offended to protect a friend from her violent partner, said, 'The only way it stopped with my partner was when I came to jail'.³²

The Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault has noted that women can react violently after long-term exposure to intimate partner violence or sexual abuse, or both, especially when children are at risk.³³ The Commission notes the evidence that violence by women is more likely to be motivated by self-defence and fear of the (male) primary aggressor.³⁴

I thought 'No, I'll change myself' to provoke my partner less. I had to not voice anything to aggravate him. I did that for many years but if you hold your opinions in, it's a heavy burden and it pushes you down. You say enough is enough. He stood in front of the door. I had to take a knife and put it under the bed. He woke me that morning and I said 'Please don't wake the kids up, let's drive somewhere.' I said 'It won't end unless one of us dies.' The police came (he called them), they found the knife and the tables turned. I was the one threatening him. I decided never to get the law involved again.³⁵

The profile of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women is striking: they are over-represented in the prison system and there is a strong correlation between their experience of family violence and their incarceration.³⁶ In 2013 research conducted by the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission found that Koori women who enter prison are likely to re-enter the criminal justice system 'on multiple occasions, often for relatively short periods ...'³⁷ The report notes the lack of pre-prison diversionary options and post-release support compared to that provided to men.³⁸ VEOHRC added:

Family violence and other stressors manifest across the life cycle, and across generations. This cycle is typified by periods in prison, which entrenches trauma, family breakdown, contact with child protection and out-of-home care systems, homelessness, family violence, substance misuse and mental health episodes. Our research found that these inform further contact with the criminal justice system, post-release breakdown, reoffending and reimprisonment.³⁹

The Mental Health Legal Service, Inside Access and the Centre for Innovative Justice submitted that, generally, women who have experienced the effects of family violence are likely to re-offend on release and that the likelihood is heightened by factors such as mental ill-health, low educational attainment and employment, drug and alcohol abuse and homelessness.⁴⁰

The intersection of social exclusion and multiple forms of discrimination and disadvantage means that for some women the experience of family violence and its effects is exacerbated. The Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault has noted that women entering prison have often experienced extreme disadvantage, and many of the outcomes they experience (such as mental ill-health, reduced socio-economic status and substance abuse) are related to their experience of violence.⁴¹

Addressing the effects of family violence on criminalised women

Corrections Victoria

The Commissioner of Corrections Victoria, Department of Justice and Regulation, Ms Jan Shuard, stated in evidence that one of Corrections Victoria's strategic objectives is to support prisoners and offenders who are victims of family violence.⁴² She said Corrections Victoria recognises that a high proportion of female prisoners and offenders are victims of family violence and that supporting victims must take into account their previous victimisation and trauma.⁴³ She noted in addition:

Identifying and supporting victims of family violence is fundamentally different from identifying and treating perpetrators. Appropriate supports must be in place in the event that a female prisoner chooses to disclose that she is a victim and seek assistance.⁴⁴

Commissioner Shuard told the Royal Commission that Corrections Victoria is considering a number of options, among them the following:

- ▷ targeting transitional housing for victims of family violence who are leaving prison and might be returning to an environment where their safety is at risk
- ▷ strengthening Community Correctional Services case-management resources to include referral to family violence-related services
- ▷ providing training to all Corrections Victoria staff, to improve their understanding of family violence.⁴⁵

Corrections Victoria's Family Violence Reform Strategy, released in December 2015, states that the organisation will also be doing the following:

- ▷ developing a new women's policy to guide future program and service delivery in the women's correctional system
- ▷ piloting a family support program in prisons and Community Correctional Services that aims to build family connectedness
- ▷ increasing support for Aboriginal victims of family violence who are in prison
- ▷ reviewing all Community Correctional Services and prison-based programs delivered to women with a view to including family violence components
- ▷ developing culturally specific family violence awareness programs.⁴⁶

The Commission understands that Corrections Victoria also facilitates the provision of family violence services to victims of family violence in prison, including through the following organisations:⁴⁷

- ▷ Inside Access and the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, which provide legal assistance⁴⁸
- ▷ West CASA and Loddon Campaspe CASA, which deliver sexual assault counselling, advocacy and support services such as individual and group counselling.⁴⁹

Corrections Victoria informed the Commission that between 1 July 2012 and March 2015 a total of 429 counselling sessions were conducted by West CASA and Loddon Campaspe CASA at the Dame Phyllis Frost Centre and Tarrengower Prison.⁵⁰ Corrections Victoria informed the Commission that sexual assault counselling is available to women on remand and sentence.⁵¹

In addition to learning of the Corrections Victoria initiatives, the Commission received a number of submissions detailing programs that might help women avoid prison and also help those in prison who have experienced family violence. Caraniche suggested that imprisonment can present a timely opportunity for women to reconsider the nature and quality of their relationships, link up with support services, and build community networks in preparation for their release.⁵² The Commission understands that while family violence-specific or related programs may not be readily available for prisoners on remand, Corrections Victoria is looking to implement programs for remand prisoners in the future.⁵³

The Women and Mentoring Program

The Women and Mentoring Program Limited is a community-based mentoring program operating in a small number of areas of Melbourne for women who have been charged with criminal offences. The program offers personal and practical assistance to participants, over 70 per cent of whom have experienced some form of family violence.⁵⁴ Of the 37 participants the program has helped to date, 97 per cent have avoided a custodial sentence and 95 per cent have not re-offended.⁵⁵

Out of the Dark

In 2009 Corrections Victoria engaged Melbourne City Mission to deliver the Out of the Dark family violence program at the Dame Phyllis Frost Centre.⁵⁶ Developed by the New South Wales Department of Corrective Services, the program now runs at both women's prisons in Victoria; to date, 163 women have completed the program.⁵⁷ The Commission was told that the existing arrangements with Melbourne City Mission have been extended from 1 July 2015 to 30 June 2016.⁵⁸

The program runs 10 sessions over five weeks and relies on a psycho-educational model that supports women in identifying different forms of abuse, distinguishing between healthy and unhealthy relationships, understanding the effects of violence on children, and learning about family violence and the law.⁵⁹ Women are helped to 'develop strategies for moving forward'.⁶⁰ Program participants told the Commission about the program's benefits:⁶¹

The Out of Dark program helped me understand where the violence came from and the different types of violence there are.⁶²

I'm back here for the second time. I breached my bail conditions. I saw my ex. He was my co-accused. I was in a violent relationship with my ex, and the one before that was violent too. He's got my kids. My daughter is seven and my son is four. I haven't had them for four years. The father is a morph addict. I tried to hang myself. Out of the Dark helped me a lot.⁶³

Melbourne City Mission told the Commission, however, that it is unable to meet the demand for the program because of the number of referrals from another of its programs, Family Support; services in prisons and self-referrals. It submitted that funding should be provided to double the current capacity of the program at the Dame Phyllis Frost and Tarrengower facilities.⁶⁴ The Commission for Children and Young People submitted that the program should be adapted and implemented in other custodial settings.⁶⁵

The Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria noted the importance of culturally safe, holistic services for imprisoned Aboriginal victims of family violence.⁶⁶ In view of the high proportion of Aboriginal mothers who are in prison, it also called for culturally appropriate, child-friendly facilities and policies in women's prison facilities so that women can care for or meet up with their children.⁶⁷ The Commission notes that through the implementation of the Cultural Wrap Around Model, Corrections Victoria will aim to reduce the risk of Aboriginal re-offending by strengthening the interface between cultural programs and mainstream offending behaviour programs.⁶⁸

Challenges and opportunities

Experiences in prison

As noted earlier, the Commission was informed of Corrections Victoria's assessment tools to determine the risk of re-offending and intervention needs—the LSI-R: SV, and the LS/RNR.⁶⁹

The Victorian Government submitted that, while the primary focus of Corrections Victoria is perpetrators, there is an increasing need for assessing whether female prisoners are victims of family violence and how this might have contributed to their offending.⁷⁰ It was submitted that further work is needed to identify victims of family violence when they enter the corrections system and to determine how they can be better supported while in prison and how services can be better linked up to support them once they are released.⁷¹

The Federation of Community Legal Centres argued that Corrections Victoria should conduct routine assessments of women prisoners in order to identify any history or risk of family violence and provide referrals to therapeutic and legal services.⁷² The Mental Health Legal Centre, Inside Access and the Centre for Innovative Justice agreed that women in custody who have experienced or are at risk of being exposed to family violence must be identified as early as possible in their period of incarceration, so as to guide service provision and case management.⁷³

Once in the prison system, women who are victims of family violence face additional barriers in their everyday living. For example, the Commission was informed about the retraumatising effects prison can have for victims of family violence—for example, through strip searching:⁷⁴ ‘strip searches perpetuate cycles of control, submission and humiliation—similar to the function of violent and abusive behaviour in the family.’⁷⁵

For some, however, prison offered respite and was a positive circuit-breaker in the violence and trauma of their lives:⁷⁶

Women who have suffered family violence who are incarcerated find that by committing a crime, they are finally provided with a safe haven. They are finally away from their abusers and they have a place to stay and three meals a day.⁷⁷

One woman who had experienced extensive childhood violence and then severe and protracted intimate partner violence before ending up committing an act of violence herself described the experience of prison in very positive terms:

A year ago I came to prison scared, shattered and angry. But I want to say—this is the best thing that ever happened to me. It gave me the time I needed to reflect on my life and on why I ended up in prison and how could I change.⁷⁸

The Mental Health Legal Centre, Inside Access and the Centre for Innovative Justice did, however, express concern that women might still not be safe from abusive partners while in prison.⁷⁹ They described a situation in which a female client in prison continued to receive letters from her ex-partner, despite the existence of an intervention order.⁸⁰

In evidence, Corrections Victoria outlined its processes for preventing family violence perpetrators from having contact with female prisoners in contravention of an intervention order. Its approach involves approved contact monitoring and visiting lists, prisoner phone call detection, and intervention order information that can be entered into the Corrections Intelligence Unit database, Centurion.⁸¹ Corrections Victoria noted that a joint project with Victoria Police will allow employees in both systems access to up-to-date intervention order information on prisoners and offenders in the Corrections Victoria system.⁸²

The Commission also heard arguments that the prison environment is not therapeutic and does not aid recovery.⁸³ Flat Out Inc., for example, called for the Victorian Government to curb the number of female prisoners and reduce the harm of imprisonment and for state and federal governments to fund and expand specialist services in the community.⁸⁴ The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission report noted that for Koori women involved in the research:

Rather than rehabilitating the women or tackling the factors contributing to their offending, imprisonment of these women further damaged the protective factors that might have prevented reoffending.⁸⁵

For many women, incarceration means separation from their children. The Mental Health Legal Centre, Inside Access and the Centre for Innovative Justice noted that the Corrections Victoria Mothers and Children Program provides pre and ante-natal care in prison and allows prisoners' young children to reside with them in custody. They also reported that, for many of their Inside Access clients, gaining access to their children who are subject to child protection orders is deeply distressing.⁸⁶

Post-release transition

On release from prison, victims of family violence can experience difficulties with recovery—for example, in family re-unification and the risk of returning to pre-incarceration and potentially violent relationships.⁸⁷ The Commission was informed that:

The experience of having been incarcerated can directly contribute to women's vulnerability to subsequent violence from their partners – the disconnection caused by incarceration not only propelling them back to their violent partners upon release, but actually acting as a threat to an abusive man's sense of control.⁸⁸

Corrections Victoria noted research performed by Monash University in a tracking study of 90 women prisoners after their release.⁸⁹ At the three-month interview stage about 21 per cent of the study group of released women reported victimisation of some type; the figure had increased to one-third (32 per cent) by the time of the final interview at 12 months post-release. The most frequent types of victimisation were assaults and domestic violence.⁹⁰

The Commission was informed that, apart from returning to violence, women can also face family violence-related debt and homelessness on release, which can disrupt their transition back into the community.⁹¹ Research into ex-prisoners' housing and social situations found that accommodation instability—being in a 'state of homelessness'—is an indicator of whether the person will return to prison.⁹²

In addition to trying to recover from the violence, victims are having to face challenges in common with other prisoners on release—including securing accommodation, gaining employment and rebuilding social skills. Researchers have also found chronic homelessness, poverty and lack of support to be common in post-release participants' lives.⁹³

Several submissions argued that post-release support and planning are vital for recovery. For example, the Mental Health Legal Centre, Inside Access and the Centre for Innovative Justice recommended that pre-release planning be integrated with post-release support and be delivered to all women through an intensive case-management model.⁹⁴

Alongside other therapeutic interventions, the Commission was informed that the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal could be particularly useful in recovery and should form part of post-release planning for family violence victims. The Mental Health Legal Centre, Inside Access and the Innovative Centre for Justice submitted:

VOCAT could be an important piece of the puzzle in helping some of these women to heal, move forward, and to break the cycle of trauma. Planning for release from prison is an ideal time for these women to be submitting VOCAT applications, but because of their isolation and other difficulties they often need additional support to do so. This is particularly the case given the high rates of illiteracy or semi-literacy that we see among prisoners.⁹⁵

The Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal is discussed in Chapter 20.

The Commission was also told of inadequate, 'judgmental, non-responsive' responses by the justice and service systems towards women who have experienced family violence and committed offences, a factor that increases many women's reluctance to report family violence.⁹⁶ The Commission heard that on occasion police failed to investigate family violence reports and take steps to ensure the safety of these women because they view them as criminals rather than victims.⁹⁷ Victims of family violence who have been criminalised have also been reported to have been excluded from refuges because of their complex support needs.⁹⁸

The way forward

The Commission heard from a number of women in prison who were experiencing or had experienced family violence. These women helped the Commission gain an understanding of the link between the criminalisation of women and family violence, of initiatives designed to alleviate family violence-related trauma, and of how best to provide support during the post-release phase.

Identifying victims of family violence in prison

Understanding the circumstances that contribute to the incarceration of women who have experienced family violence is important, in part because it casts light on the specific challenges they can face in prison. If women prisoners with a history of family violence are identified, case-management processes and service providers will be better able to support them in dealing with trauma and the other effects of violence.

The Commission understands that there are two assessment tools for determining intervention needs and the general risk of re-offending. These are the Level of Service Inventory—Revised: Screening Version (LSI-R: SV) and the Level of Service/Risk, Need, Responsivity (LS/RNR). The Commission did not review the LSI-R: SV, but it notes that the screening takes place within 14 days of sentencing or reception into prison custody and provides an opportunity to develop and offer support in the early stages of the victim's imprisonment. The Commission did, however, look at the use of the LS/RNR. Although this assessment tool is primarily used to assess offender risk, it does offer an opportunity to determine intervention needs, which can include family violence-related support services.

The LS/RNR is administered only for prisoners assessed as medium and high-risk and with six or more months remaining on their sentence. This could mean that some women are not subject to this screening tool. If the LS/RNR is administered, the Commission understands that identifying female offenders entering prison who have experienced family violence might be dependent on self-disclosure. It can be difficult for victims to disclose family violence and, if this is not identified in the initial assessment process, they might not receive any subsequent support.

In evidence to the Commission, Commissioner Shuard noted that Corrections Victoria is examining the training provided to staff to better support victims, with the option of expanding training on the CRAF to staff within the women's prison system being considered.⁹⁹ The Commission welcomes this initiative. It may mean that interviewers and employees gain the skills needed to allow victims to disclose safely. In addition, the Commission notes that CRAF training for community corrections staff continues.¹⁰⁰ This is also positive.

The Commission supports the suggestion of the Federation of Community Legal Centres, the Mental Health Legal Centre, and the Centre for Innovative Justice, that Corrections Victoria establish a process for identifying as early as possible female offenders with a risk or history of family violence. This information should guide service provision and case management.

Recommendation 183

Corrections Victoria review the current processes for identifying female offenders at risk of or with a history of family violence and respond through therapeutic interventions and education programs [within 12 months].

Therapeutic interventions

Serving time in prison can exacerbate the trauma family violence victims experience and disrupt efforts to promote recovery. As a consequence, therapeutic initiatives and support programs that can serve to enhance victims' recovery from family violence are needed in prisons.

The Commission was advised of the importance of interventions and programs in alleviating the trauma that led to female offenders' imprisonment and in preparing them for their release.¹⁰¹ The Commission supports these programs and interventions, which have shown benefits in terms of victim recovery.

However, the Commission is concerned about the lack of family violence-related therapeutic initiatives and support programs available for women on remand or in prison for short periods. This presents an opportunity for Corrections Victoria to think creatively about support initiatives targeted at these groups of women. The Commission welcomes Corrections Victoria's intention of looking at family violence-specific or related programs for remand prisoners in the future.¹⁰²

Melbourne City Mission recommended that Corrections Victoria provide funding to double the current capacity of the Out of the Dark program at the Dame Phyllis Frost Centre and Tarrengower Prison.¹⁰³ Corrections Victoria should ensure that therapeutic interventions such as individual counselling and group-based programs such as Out of the Dark are available for all women who are in prison or on community correction orders and have experienced family violence. Interventions of this nature should be culturally appropriate, including specifically for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander victims of family violence.

Commissioner Shuard described several initiatives that the organisation is considering in relation to post-release transitional housing, family violence service referrals, and staff training to improve their understanding of family violence.¹⁰⁴ Together with the range of family violence-related support and education programs described in Corrections Victoria's Family Violence Reform Strategy—Priority Initiatives 2015–16, the Commission welcomes these developments.

It is very positive that Corrections Victoria is proactively turning its mind to facilitating the provision of a wide range of programs to female prisoners; these programs are delivered by various community organisations, among them Inside Access. The continued provision of these programs in the prison environment requires both adequate funding and continued support from Corrections Victoria. The Commission therefore urges that such programs continue to be funded—as well as programs designed to support women following their release from prison—and that Corrections Victoria continues to support their delivery.¹⁰⁵

Recommendation 184

Corrections Victoria ensure that therapeutic interventions such as individual counselling and group-based programs such as Out of the Dark are available for all women in prison who have experienced family violence [within 12 months].

Post-release support and planning

The Commission received evidence that victims of family violence experience major challenges on their release from prison—challenges ordinarily faced by other prisoners on release as well as family violence–related safety or recovery challenges, or both. We heard about women who returned to violent relationships or reported victimisation of some kind, including assault or family violence.¹⁰⁶ In addition, women can face financial problems, homelessness and difficulties gaining employment.

The Commission understands that Corrections Victoria’s Reintegration Pathway provides pre-release programs aimed at prisoners’ transitional needs when entering prison, throughout their incarceration and in preparation for release. Post-release support is available to prisoners with additional support needs.¹⁰⁷

The Commission is concerned, however, about the lack of pre-release planning and post-release support specifically directed at women who are or have been victims of family violence. Family violence risk assessment should form a major part of discharge planning and ongoing risk management as part of post-release support. The Commission supports the Mental Health Legal Centre, Inside Access and Centre for Innovative Justice proposal that pre-release planning be integrated with post-release support and be delivered to all women through an intensive case-management model.¹⁰⁸ In addition, protocols between the prison and post-release services, including specialist family violence services, integrated family services and/or other support services, could assist in the post-release transition.

In particular, the Commission is concerned about post-release accommodation arrangements, which can place a woman at risk of further victimisation or perpetration, or both. If it is aware that a prisoner has a history of family violence perpetration or victimisation, Corrections Victoria should inform post-release support services in order to avoid accommodation placements that increase risk to women. This, of course, depends on Corrections Victoria being aware that a woman might experience victimisation and/or perpetration of family violence when she is released, highlighting the importance of family violence risk assessment as part of post-release planning and the need for appropriate services and case-management strategies being provided. These considerations must also be extended to women on community corrections orders.

The Commission is aware that Corrections Victoria has screening and identification processes, therapeutic interventions and pre- and post-release transition programs, but in view of the very large number of women in prison who are affected by family violence, there are substantial shortcomings when it comes to identifying and providing targeted interventions to assist these women while they are in prison and after their release.

Recommendation 185

Corrections Victoria [within 12 months]:

- ▷ inform post-release support services if a prisoner has a history of family violence victimisation to ensure that post-release accommodation arrangements do not place the prisoner at increased risk
- ▷ refer prisoners who have been victims of family violence to family violence services when they are being released.

Endnotes

- 1 Royal Commission into Family Violence, Letters Patent—Terms of Reference (22 February 2015) 3 <<http://www.rcfv.com.au/MediaLibraries/RCFamilyViolence/UploadedDocs/Terms-of-Reference.pdf>>.
- 2 Corrections Prisons and Parole, Prison (30 March 2015) <<http://www.corrections.vic.gov.au/home/prison/>>.
- 3 Lubica Forsythe and Kerryn Adams, 'Mental Health, Abuse, Drug Use and Crime: Does Gender Matter?' (Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice No 384, Australian Institute of Criminology, November 2009) 1–2, 5. See also, Mary Stathopoulos et al, 'Addressing Women's Victimization Histories in Custodial Settings' (ACSSA Issues No.13, Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault, 2012) 6.
- 4 Stathopoulos et al, above n 3, 8; Forsythe and Adams, above n 3, 1.
- 5 Stathopoulos et al, above n 3, 7.
- 6 Ibid.
- 7 Corrections Victoria, 'Standards for the Management of Women Prisoners in Victoria' (Department of Justice and Regulation, 4 July 2014) 10.
- 8 Ibid. 6.
- 9 Ibid. 68–9.
- 10 Ibid. 68.
- 11 Ibid. 76.
- 12 Statement of Shuard, 27 July 2015, Attachment 6, 6.
- 13 Corrections Victoria, 'Family Violence Service Reform Strategy Priority Initiatives 2015–16' (Department of Justice and Regulation, 2015) 2.
- 14 Statement of Shuard, 27 July 2015, Attachment 5, 6.
- 15 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Offending Behaviour Programs Branch: Program Suite' (April 2015), 9, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 16 Statement of Reaper, 17 July 2015, 11 [60].
- 17 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Level of Service (LS) Assessment Tools' (26 May 2015), 3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 18 Ibid.
- 19 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'LS/RNR: Quick Score Form—Level of Service-Risk Need Responsivity' (1 January 2008), 5, produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015. The Commission did not receive LSI-R: SV, therefore cannot make any observations about whether it assists in identifying family violence.
- 20 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Table of Items where No Relevant Documents or Data Identified/Available' (21 October 2015), 23, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 21 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 17.
- 22 Ibid. 2.
- 23 Stathopoulos et al, above n 3, 6; Forsythe and Adams, above n 3, 2. See also Mental Health Legal Centre and Centre for Innovative Justice, 648, 24.
- 24 Stathopoulos et al, above n 3, 7.
- 25 Community consultation, Ravenhall, 11 May 2015.
- 26 Caraniche, Submission 456, 2. 'The estimates from this survey represent clinicians' perceptions based on their current caseload. Several responses noted that forensic clients are often reluctant to disclose experience with family violence (both as a victim and a perpetrator) and the results of this survey therefore probably represent conservative estimates of prevalence': Caraniche, Submission 456, 6.
- 27 Ibid. 1.
- 28 Holly Johnson, 'Drugs and Crime: A Study of Incarcerated Female Offenders' (Research and Public Policy Series No 63, Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth), 2004) 77.
- 29 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 2.
- 30 Stathopoulos et al, above n 3, 1, 5–7.
- 31 Caraniche, Submission 456, 4.
- 32 Anonymous, Submission 973, 2.
- 33 Stathopoulos et al, above n 3, 7.
- 34 Ibid. 7.
- 35 Community consultation, Ravenhall, 11 May 2015.
- 36 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 19. See also Debbie Kilroy, 'Sister's Inside: The Over-Representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women in Prison' (April 2013) 3.
- 37 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, 'Unfinished Business: Koori Women and the Justice System' (August 2013) 3.
- 38 Ibid. 81.
- 39 Ibid. 37.
- 40 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 10.
- 41 Stathopoulos et al, above n 3, 1.
- 42 Statement of Shuard, 27 July 2015, Attachment 6, 8.
- 43 Ibid. 9 [52].
- 44 Ibid. 9 [53].
- 45 Ibid. Attachment 6, 9.
- 46 Corrections Victoria, above n 13, 2.
- 47 For a full list of family violence services with external providers in women's prisons see: Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Out of the Dark: Sexual Assault Counselling CASA—Data' 4, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 48 Statement of Shuard, 27 July 2015, Attachment 4, 1.
- 49 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 47, 4.
- 50 Note: the January to March data for Loddon Campaspe CASA was available at the time of writing. Ibid. 6.
- 51 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 15, 13.
- 52 Caraniche, Submission 456, 4.
- 53 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 20, 30.
- 54 Women and Mentoring Limited, Submission 431, 1–2.
- 55 Ibid. 1.
- 56 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 47, 2.
- 57 Note: the May/June program data for Tarrengower Prison not available at the time of reporting. Ibid. 2–3.
- 58 Note: total program cost of $73,714.36 (GST excl). Ibid. 2.
- 59 Melbourne City Mission, Submission 812, 51, 51–2.
- 60 Ibid. 52.

- 61 Anonymous, Submission 973, 2; Confidential, Submission 721, 3.
- 62 Community consultation, Ravenhall, 11 May 2015.
- 63 Ibid.
- 64 Melbourne City Mission, Submission 812, 10, 54.
- 65 Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 8.
- 66 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 20.
- 67 Ibid 63.
- 68 State Government of Victoria, Aboriginal Social and Emotional Wellbeing Plan (2015) Department of Justice and Regulation <<http://www.justice.vic.gov.au/home/your+rights/aboriginal+justice+agreement/aboriginal+social+and+emotional+wellbeing+plan>>.
- 69 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 17, 3.
- 70 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 38.
- 71 Ibid.
- 72 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 42.
- 73 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 26.
- 74 Flat Out Inc, Submission 980, 10. See also, Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 13.
- 75 Flat Out Inc, Submission 980, 10.
- 76 Anonymous, Submission 964, 1.
- 77 Anonymous, Submission 974, 2.
- 78 Anonymous, Submission 725, 2.
- 79 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 13–4.
- 80 Ibid 13.
- 81 Statement of Shuard, 27 July 2015. 5 [27], 11 [61], 11–12 [63], 12 [65]–[66].
- 82 Ibid 5 [27].
- 83 Flat Out Inc, Submission 980, 10–11.
- 84 Ibid 5.
- 85 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 37, 87.
- 86 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 12.
- 87 Ibid 13–14.
- 88 Ibid 13.
- 89 See Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 20, 24. See also, Corrections Victoria, 'Women Exiting Prison in Victoria: Summary Report of a Post-Release Study by Monash University' (Department of Justice and Regulation, February 2016) 1.
- 90 Corrections Victoria stated that 'As participation in this study was voluntary, it only captured the experience of approximately one quarter of the population of women prisoners who were released in the period covered by the study. It is not an accurate estimate of the prevalence of family violence among women prisoners.' Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 20, 24–5. See also, Corrections Victoria, above n 89, 8.
- 91 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 11.
- 92 Eileen Baldry et al, 'Ex-Prisoners, Homelessness and the State in Australia' (2006) 39(1) Australian & New Zealand Journal of Criminology 39, 20, 30.
- 93 Ibid 20.
- 94 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 26.
- 95 Ibid 20.
- 96 Flat Out Inc, Submission 980, 6.
- 97 Ibid 8.
- 98 Ibid 20.
- 99 Statement of Shuard, 27 July 2015, 13 [72].
- 100 Statement of Reaper, 17 July 2015, 11 [60.1].
- 101 Caraniche, Submission 456, 4.
- 102 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 20, 30.
- 103 Melbourne City Mission, Submission 812, 10.
- 104 Statement of Shuard, 27 July 2015, Attachment 6, 8–9.
- 105 See, eg, Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 26.
- 106 Flat Out Inc, Submission 980, 18.
- 107 Corrections Victoria, Transition programs (20 January 2016) State Government of Victoria <<http://www.corrections.vic.gov.au/home/release/transition+programs/>>.
- 108 Mental Health Legal Centre Inc; Inside Access; Centre for Innovative Justice, Submission 648, 26.

35 Women working in the sex industry

Introduction

The Royal Commission's terms of reference require it to consider the needs and experiences of people affected by family violence, having particular regard to people in certain diverse communities.¹ Although women working in the sex industry are not specifically named, the Commission decided to include them in its considerations because they are often marginalised and have a unique experience of family violence.

Although not all women in the sex industry have been exposed to family violence, many have experienced it in the past and some may still be victims of family violence. The Commission heard from a number of women who have previously been or are sex workers, along with people and organisations who have given them support.

The Commission was told that women who work in the sex industry are disproportionately affected by family violence and that they face particular challenges when seeking support before, during and after the violence. The impact of family violence on their health and wellbeing can be particularly severe and can impede their recovery.

The Commission is mindful of the diversity in experience of women who work in the sex industry. The Commission's focus is on ensuring that supports and services are available to women in the sex industry who have been or are still affected by family violence.

The Commission was informed that some women enter the sex industry as a consequence of family violence. While no reliable data on the number, sex or gender identity of people who work in the sex industry in Victoria exists, research and submissions suggest that those who work in the industry have higher levels of exposure to violence than others and experience additional barriers when seeking help and support because of entrenched, persistent stigma and discrimination. These women often feel 'invisible' or overlooked in the broader family violence system in terms of both prevention and response.

Submissions received by the Commission described the ongoing effects of trauma resulting from family violence for women in the sex industry and the lack of available therapeutic interventions and support. The Commission was also told that inadequate responses and poor attitudes on the part of police and family violence services prevent women who work in the industry from obtaining these services.

The Commission recommends that Victoria Police amend its Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to take into account the challenges faced by women in the sex industry when investigating family violence perpetrated against these victims.

Context and current practice

The Commission took into account research and submissions relating to the experiences of women who work in the sex industry and who have been victims of family violence.

Under the Sex Work Act 1994 (Vic) people may provide paid sexual services in brothels and any premises on which an escort agency carries on business, but cannot solicit a person in a public place.²

There is no reliable data on the number, sex or gender identity of people who work in the sex industry in Australia or in the states or territories.³ In its submission, Project Respect, a community-based organisation that aims to empower and support women who work in the sex industry, also noted an absence of data, including on the impact of sex work.⁴

The Commission was told that women who work in the sex industry are disproportionately affected by family violence: many are victims of family violence perpetrated by an intimate partner; others experienced it during childhood; and, for some, family violence led them into the sex industry.⁵ The effects of this violence on their health and wellbeing can be severe.⁶

In its submission, Project Respect provided evidence to the Commission from a number of international studies that suggest that women who work in the sex industry can experience higher rates of family violence than other women in the community.⁷ A study of 72 street-based female sex workers in Kings Cross, New South Wales, found that 81 per cent of female sex workers had experienced sexual assault and 44 per cent had been raped outside work.⁸ Other research confirms that sex workers are mostly assaulted by someone known to them.⁹

Project Respect noted that 55 per cent of the 714 women with whom it had had contact in 2011–12 had experienced or were experiencing family violence.¹⁰ It outlined the women's varying experiences:

- ▷ They are often subjected to violence, including in their work, which compounds the family violence they experience or have experienced, and they are disproportionately likely to have experienced violence as children.
- ▷ They experience additional barriers to seeking help when they are subjected to family violence because of entrenched, persistent stigma and discrimination.
- ▷ Although they experience high levels of family violence and other violence, they might be less likely to label these experiences violence because they have been exposed to and have normalised violence in their childhood, in previous relationships and in the sex industry.
- ▷ They commonly enter the sex industry as a consequence of family violence—including when they leave relationships with violent men—and in order to gain access to an income.¹¹

Although the Commission did not receive evidence about the experiences of male or transgender sex workers, it is conceivable that some of them are likely to have also been subjected to family violence as children or adults.

The Commission heard from women who work in the sex industry about their experiences of family violence, and in some cases sexual assault, as a child¹² and about the continuing effects of this trauma and the lack of therapeutic interventions:

I have such a poor memory of my childhood. There are huge blocks in my memory. I have no memory and I should. I've blocked out so much of the bad stuff that a lot of the good stuff has gone as well. It creeps back too. Suddenly I remember something. It's traumatic.¹³

Childhood sexual abuse started at three – couldn't tell anyone as he threatened that something would happen to mum. She died at seven from cancer and I thought I've brought this on myself. It never stops that constant background noise of guilt. There are some who go into the industry with their eyes open and it's heartbreaking, seeing these women feeling 'less'.¹⁴

As a kid I lost my virginity to rape – it just goes downhill from there.¹⁵

One woman who previously worked in the sex industry but now supports women who work in the industry explained why she became involved in the industry:

Again, the whole reason I went into the sex industry was because, my body wasn't mine it was always theirs always someone else's to control, whether it was mum's or boyfriends ... So my body was never mine. I was a binge drinker before I started using heroin. So I blacked out a lot. I don't remember ever saying yes or I'd say no and it wasn't listened to and I didn't know how to say no further. So doing prostitution, was 'why not?' I'm not going to hurt anyone else, why not get paid for it, it's getting taken for free, why not get paid for it. Once you're a prostitute, you're a worthless piece of shit, you're belted, a non-human, you're not a woman and you're not a man, not a child, you're not on the human spectrum, you're a fucking whore.¹⁶

The Commission's consultations with women who work in the industry highlighted the correlation between unresolved trauma from family violence and sex industry work. Feelings of isolation and a loss of control were central to many of their experiences:

I just want to make a link with the sex industry and domestic violence – I was raped numerous times by my first proper boyfriend and I didn't know it was rape ... I decided to go into the sex industry ... my justification was sex was taken from me so many times why shouldn't I get paid for it.¹⁷

The Kings Cross study of 72 street-based female sex workers also found that a substantial majority (87 per cent) of women who participated in the research had experienced depressive symptoms ranging from mild to severe: 74 per cent had experienced suicidal ideation and 42 per cent had attempted suicide.¹⁸ The study found that 45 per cent of non-Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander sex workers had sought the help of a mental health professional in the preceding six months, whereas only 25 per cent of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander sex workers had done so.¹⁹ Eighty per cent of these consultations with mental health professionals were related to depression.²⁰

Several women who work or used to work in the sex industry described the normalisation of violence in the industry:

Links between domestic violence and sex industry is so strong. The expectation that it's part of the job to be abused. Women expect that he is going to try and have anal sex, push further than what's agreed upon. That is the norm. Link between women controlled by their boyfriend and them living off them working in industry. That normalised violence—it just makes sense that it's going to happen forever. And women ignore it and allow it to happen because that's what women are meant to do.²¹

100% connection between family violence and being in the sex industry. It's the reason for working in the sex industry, my justification for working in the sex industry. It was normal for every single guy, tries to get more so if we've made an agreement to have sex, they will try to have anal sex, I would have to fight them off, but I expected that to be the norm because that was the norm at home. All my relationships, in regards to anal sex, I've always had to fight them off, how many times do I have to say no. And then cop a beating.²²

... being involved in the [sex] industry. You are further compromised because of the work you're doing. You may have experienced violence before going into the industry; it's compounded by the industry. If your partner finds out then it's a reason for it to continue.²³

Some women who work in the industry explained how the nature of sex work can make it less likely for intimate partner violence to be recognised as abuse:²⁴

Until you see a list of what family violence is, you don't realise that that's what it is, [it's] threats, making you feel small, him threatening to write on Facebook that I've worked in the industry if I ask for child support. He had been violent to other people, and I'd seen him in a rage, he would threaten me. We went to family counselling instead of family violence, if I had have known it was family violence ...²⁵

Often with women in the sex industry unless they're being physically beaten they often don't realise they are in an abusive relationship, not when it's emotional and psychological abuse.²⁶

For some women, their work in the industry was used as another form of control by abusive partners.²⁷ One woman who previously worked in the industry said, for example, "[T]here are often threats. Men will say "don't you dare leave because I will tell child protection you're in the sex industry".²⁸ For other women, it was their partners who forced them to work in the industry.²⁹

Challenges and opportunities

As noted, women working in the sex industry face particular difficulties when seeking support and assistance. This includes sex industry workers who report family violence to police. Additionally, a range of barriers can present themselves when these women seek access to family violence services in Victoria.

The police

The subject of inadequate and inappropriate police responses to women who are or have been involved in the sex industry and have experienced family violence was often raised with the Commission as a concern. Women who were working or who had worked in the industry described the negative attitudes police held towards them, which in many cases affected the justice outcome they received:

When I was with [removed] I had told him I'd been a prostitute and when the police was called, he would tap them on the shoulder and say ... she's a prostitute and the police would say to me you need to pull your head in, and to him they'd say 'just don't hit her mate, just get rid of her'.³⁰

From the police the other day: 'How can she be raped if she's a prostitute?' 'How can she be raped if she's married to him?' Both of these comments came from the police.³¹

The Commission also heard accounts of police physically and verbally abusing and sexually harassing workers in the sex industry who reported family violence. Many women told the Commission they would not report to the police again.³²

Some women who work in the industry explained, however, that the police response is often dependent on which police station they attend or contact, and which police member assists them.³³ The Commission heard consistently that women who work in the sex industry want to be treated in the same way as other victims of family violence—to be listened to, believed and supported:

If just once a cop would have pulled me aside, and said 'he's not allowed to hit you' and given me his number, and said 'call me'. If they'd taken me away – not in front of my boyfriend. Just once, said call me, I'll do something, not even, I'll try and help you. It's not your fault. That would have helped me. But the number of times I heard 'you have gotta get off their back'.³⁴

In contrast, one support worker described a positive experience with police:

I had a women at a brothel, her partner had bashed her and she left the house. I told her to get in a cab and come to me. I encouraged [her] to call the police and the guy was great. [The] cop said 'no matter what you do for a job, you shouldn't be treated like that'. He came past the brothel later that week to check if she was okay.³⁵

Participants in the Commission's consultations suggested that exposure to the sex industry and adopting a pro-active approach might make a difference to the police response.³⁶ One woman who previously worked in the sex industry said:

Police need training—whatever training they've had is shit. No faith in the police. I can't change that, not trustworthy. I was gobsmacked re their response. The Family Violence Unit. They have an inkling that she's in the sex industry. They tried to take a statement without an interpreter—lucky I was there—ended up using my mobile and my interpreter. They need training from women who have experienced family violence and from women who they actually hear.³⁷

The Commission heard that women who work in the sex industry can face multiple barriers when it comes to receiving a fair response from police. Some of these women told the Commission of their experiences:

I was sexually abused by quite a few men. I took it to the police and I was just treated horrible. They cancelled appointments, bringing up the past 'when you were 16 you stole ...'³⁸

It is all too familiar ending up in court. Everything is looked at from your past to belittle. When you have that mentality used against you it's incredibly demoralising. You end up giving up trying.³⁹

It is plain that these women's situations are complex and that their difficulties can be compounded by continued victimisation, ostracism and inadequate police responses.

Family violence and related support services

Through submissions and consultations with women who work in the sex industry and their supporters, the Commission learnt that a range of factors can prevent these women from benefiting from family violence-related services in Victoria. For example, Vixen Collective submitted that women who work in the sex industry might be fearful of having their working status recorded by family violence services because this could result in them experiencing discrimination, changes to child custody arrangements, and difficulty gaining access to housing (including refuges).⁴⁰

The attitudes of some family violence services and professionals towards women who work in the sex industry were noted as a concern.⁴¹ One woman who previously worked in the sex industry told the Commission that family violence services need to be able to put their personal views aside and simply look at the situation of the victim of violence.⁴²

Victims described not knowing how or where to obtain support services that would allow them to remain employed in the sex industry. One woman explained:

When you're looking for help—there isn't help out there. Unless I packed up my whole life right at that moment then I couldn't see the crisis people. They told me about AVOs because I was getting death threats: 'We can't help you until it happens'. Rigidity in the supports [is] a real barrier. There's not enough help out there. Years ago I didn't know about help. Unless you talk to the right people you don't know there is help out there. Things are only done when it's too late. There needs to be more help along the way.⁴³

The Commission also heard about the lack of integration between family violence services and other support services, which can mean women who work in the sex industry become 'lost in the system'. One supporter of women working in the sex industry explained:

Women in the sex industry are often linked in with mental health services, alcohol and drug services, CASA workers – who may or may not be working with them on the family violence issues. By the time I make a referral to Safe Steps they're at the point where they've been beaten so much and they can't go home and they're just desperate.⁴⁴

Participants in the Commission's consultations noted that this can serve to hinder a return to health and wellbeing for victims of family violence.⁴⁵ As Vixen Collective observed, women leaving family violence can face additional challenges obtaining housing (including in refuges) because of their employment status.⁴⁶ A community consultation participant said:

A lot of times we had to put women in a hotel because there was nowhere to take them. There was one woman at Project Respect who had called the domestic violence service. She said she was working in the industry, they said 'We don't deal with women like you. We're only for good nice women'. I was cut off. That was it. We're still looking for a domestic violence service that we can contact. Not all the workers were like that.⁴⁷

It is also apparent that some women who work in the sex industry experience multiple forms of discrimination and disadvantage as a result of their cultural and linguistic background, disability, age, race, sexuality, gender identity or socio-economic status. For example, there has been limited research done on the experiences of transgender women who work in the industry, although there is some evidence to suggest that they face additional challenges in seeking access to family violence specialist services and programs such as housing support and accommodation.⁴⁸

The way forward

The Commission was greatly assisted by speaking with women who work or have worked in the sex industry and by a number of submissions provided by individuals and organisations who support them. There is a need to ensure that sex workers who are victims of family violence can access the support of police, family violence services and other related services. These services should work closely with organisations that advocate for and assist sex workers.

The effects on the health and wellbeing of women who work in the sex industry and who are family violence victims can be particularly severe. As Project Respect found, women who work in the sex industry face additional barriers to seeking support when they are victims of family violence because of entrenched, persistent stigma and discrimination.⁴⁹ Access to appropriate support is essential to their recovery. Submissions and consultations revealed that there remain major shortcomings in how the family violence system responds to the experience of women who work in the sex industry and who are victims of family violence. It is vitally important that support services understand the complexity and ‘instability’ of these women’s lives when delivering services.⁵⁰

The Commission notes that some diverse groups in the community, including women who work in the sex industry are often ‘invisible’ to the family violence system. In Chapter 13, the Commission found that there is a need for structural change to ensure better coordination within the service system—to improve entry into the system and access to a broad range of services. The needs of diverse communities must be part of this service system reform.

The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence⁵¹ should acknowledge that people in the sex industry face particular challenges in reporting family violence and that they should be assisted in the same way as anyone else who reports such violence. It is not acceptable for police to turn away from reports of family violence brought forward by victims who either work in the sex industry or who have in the past had contact with the criminal justice system. Victoria Police must take steps to ensure that police members take reports of family violence by women who work in the sex industry seriously and investigate them as they would any other family violence report. Further, in areas that have high numbers of sex workers, police should take active steps to encourage reporting.

The Commission notes that neither the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence nor the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Sexual Assault mentions the particular challenges faced by women who work in the sex industry and who are victims of family violence or sexual assault. There is an opportunity to insert ‘women who work in the sex industry’ into the ‘Responding to diverse communities’ section of the (family violence) Code of Practice and to note that these women are disproportionately affected by family violence and might require specific support and consideration in their dealings with the justice system. The Commission encourages Victoria Police to make similar amendments to the Code of Practice for the Investigation of Sexual Assault.

In view of what the Commission learnt about the attitudes of some police towards women who work in the sex industry, there is a need to enhance understanding by police of the effects of family violence and more broadly, to improve the workforce’s response to particular communities experiencing family violence. On this point, the Commission notes the recommendations made in Chapter 15 to develop a model to strengthen the investigation of family violence offences.

Recommendation 186

Victoria Police amend the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence to describe the difficulties women in the sex industry face in reporting family violence to police and how to take those difficulties into account when investigating family violence perpetrated against these victims [within 12 months].

Endnotes

- 1 Royal Commission into Family Violence, Letters Patent—Terms of Reference (22 February 2015) 3 <<http://www.rcfv.com.au/MediaLibraries/RCFamilyViolence/UploadedDocs/Terms-of-Reference.pdf>>.
- 2 See generally Sex Work Act 1994 (Vic) ss 12–14. The Commission acknowledges Project Respect's submission that the sex industry includes a range of sexual services, including pornography, stripping, table-top dancing, and escort, street and brothel prostitution. Project Respect, Submission 930, 4.
- 3 Lauren Renshaw and Jules Kim, The Australian sex industry (21 September 2015) Australian Institute of Criminology <http://aic.gov.au/publications/current%20series/rpp/121-140/rpp131/05_aus_industry.html>; Project Respect, Submission 930, 5.
- 4 Project Respect, Submission 930, 5.
- 5 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 6 See Chapter 20.
- 7 Project Respect, Submission 930, 6–7.
- 8 Amanda Roxburgh, Louisa Degenhardt and Jan Copeland, 'Posttraumatic Stress Disorder Among Female Street-Based Sex Workers in the Greater Sydney Area, Australia' (2006) 6(24) BMC Psychiatry 6.
- 9 Antonia Quadara, 'Sex workers and sexual assault in Australia: Prevalence, risk and safety' (Issues No 8, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2008) 5 (citations omitted) <https://www3.aifs.gov.au/acssa/pubs/issue/acssa_issues8.pdf>.
- 10 Project Respect, Submission 930, 9.
- 11 Ibid. 2.
- 12 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015; Anonymous, Submission 962, 1.
- 13 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 14 Ibid.
- 15 Ibid.
- 16 Kate Connett, Submission 960, 4.
- 17 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 18 Roxburgh, Degenhardt and Copeland, above n 8, 6.
- 19 Ibid.
- 20 Ibid.
- 21 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 22 Kate Connett, Submission 960, 5.
- 23 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 24 See, eg, ibid.
- 25 Ibid.
- 26 Shirley Woods, Submission 959, 2.
- 27 Anonymous, Submission 961, 2; Anonymous, Submission 311, 1; Kate Connett, Submission 960, 4.
- 28 Shirley Woods, Submission 959, 1.
- 29 Ibid.; Anonymous, Submission 311, 1.
- 30 Kate Connett, Submission 960, 3.
- 31 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 32 Ibid.
- 33 Ibid.
- 34 Kate Connett, Submission 960, 4.
- 35 Shirley Woods, Submission 959, 2.
- 36 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 37 Ibid.
- 38 Ibid.
- 39 Ibid.
- 40 Vixen Collective, Submission 671, 9.
- 41 Kate Connett, Submission 960, 5; Anonymous, Submission 962, 3; Shirley Woods, Submission 959, 2.
- 42 Shirley Woods, Submission 959, 3.
- 43 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 44 Shirley Woods, Submission 959, 2.
- 45 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 46 Vixen Collective, Submission 671, 9.
- 47 Community consultation, Melbourne, 21 May 2015.
- 48 Fiona Patten—Member for Northern Metropolitan Region, Submission 979, 3; Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Submission 609, 17; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 43; Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 16.
- 49 Project Respect, Submission 930, 2.
- 50 Roxburgh, Degenhardt and Copeland, above n 8, 12.
- 51 See generally Victoria Police, 'Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence—Edition 3' (2014).

Glossary

Affected family member	A person who is to be protected by a family violence intervention order. This terminology is also used by Victoria Police to describe victims of family violence.
Affidavit	A written statement made under oath or affirmation.
Applicant	A person who applies for a family violence intervention order (or other court process). This can be the affected family member or a Victoria Police member acting on behalf of the affected family member.
Applicant support worker	A worker at some magistrates' courts who advises and assists an applicant with court procedures (for example, applying for a family violence intervention order).
Bail	The release of a person from legal custody into the community on condition that they promise to re-appear later for a court hearing to answer the charges. The person may have to agree to certain conditions, such as reporting to the police or living at a particular place.
Breach	A failure to comply with a legal obligation, for example the conditions of a family violence safety notice or family violence intervention order. Breaching a notice or order is a criminal offence. In this report the terms 'breach' and 'contravention' are used interchangeably.
Brokerage	A pool of funds allocated to a service provider to purchase goods and/or services for its clients according to relevant guidelines. For example, brokerage funds could be used to pay for rental accommodation, health services and other community services.
Child	A person under the age of 18 years.
CISP	The Court Integrated Services Program is a case-management and referral service operating in certain magistrates' courts for people who are on bail or summons and are accused of criminal offences.
Cold referral	A referral to a service where it is up to the client to make contact, rather than a third party. For example, where a phone number or address is provided to a victim.
Committal proceeding	A hearing in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, to determine if there is sufficient evidence for a person charged with a crime to be required to stand trial.
Contravention	A breach, as defined above. In this report, the terms 'breach' and 'contravention' are used interchangeably.
Crimonogenic	Producing or leading to crime or criminality.
Culturally and linguistically diverse	People from a range of different countries or ethnic and cultural groups. Includes people from non-English speaking backgrounds as well as those born outside Australia whose first language is English. In the context of this report, CALD includes migrants, refugees and humanitarian entrants, international students, unaccompanied minors, 'trafficked' women and tourists. Far from suggesting a homogenous group, it encompasses a wide range of experiences and needs.
Culturally safe	An approach to service delivery that is respectful of a person's culture and beliefs, is free from discrimination and does not question their cultural identity. Cultural safety is often used in relation to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.
Directions hearing	A court hearing to resolve procedural matters before a substantive hearing.

Duty lawyer	A lawyer who advises and assists people who do not have their own lawyer on the day of their court hearing and can represent them for free in court.
Ex parte hearing	A court hearing conducted in the absence of one of the parties.
Expert witness	A witness who is an expert or has special knowledge on a particular topic.
Family violence intervention order	An order made by either the Magistrates' Court of Victoria or the Children's Court of Victoria, to protect an affected family member from family violence.
Family violence safety notice	A notice issued by Victoria Police to protect a family member from violence. It is valid for a maximum of five working days. A notice constitutes an application by the relevant police officer for a family violence intervention order.
Federal Circuit Court	A lower level federal court (formerly known as the Federal Magistrates' Court). The court's jurisdiction includes family law and child support, administrative law, admiralty law, bankruptcy, copyright, human rights, industrial law, migration, privacy and trade practices. The court shares those jurisdictions with the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Court of Australia.
First mention	The first court hearing date on which a matter is listed before a court.
Genograms	A graphic representation of a family tree that includes information about the history of, and relationship between, different family members. It goes beyond a traditional family tree by allowing repetitive patterns to be analysed.
Headquarter court	In the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, there is a headquarter court for each of its 12 regions at which most, if not all, of the court's important functions are performed. All Magistrates' Court headquarter courts have family violence intervention order lists.
Heteronormative/heteronormatism	The assumption or belief that heterosexuality is the only normal sexual orientation.
Indictable offence	A serious offence heard before a judge in a higher court. Some indictable offences may be triable summarily.
Informant	The Victoria Police officer who prepares the information in respect of a criminal charge. The informant may be called to give evidence in the court hearing about what they did, heard or saw.
Intake	A point of entry or 'doorway' into a service or set of services.
Interim order	A temporary order made pending a final order.
L17	The Victoria Police family violence risk assessment and risk management report. The L17 form records risks identified at family violence incidents and is completed when a report of family violence is made. It also forms the basis for referrals to specialist family violence services.
Lay witness	A witness who does not testify as an expert witness.
Mandatory sentence	A sentence set by legislation (for example, a minimum penalty) which does not permit the court to exercise its discretion to impose a different sentence.
Other party	A term used by Victoria Police to describe the person against whom an allegation of family violence has been made (the alleged perpetrator).

Prescribed organisation	An organisation empowered to share information relevant to risk assessment and risk management under the Commission’s recommended information-sharing regime to be established under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) . Such organisations could include, for example, Support and Safety Hubs, specialist family violence services, drug and alcohol services, mental health services, courts, general practitioners and nurses. The proposed regime is discussed in Chapter 7.
Protected person	A person who is protected by a family violence intervention order or a family violence safety notice.
Recidivist	A repeat offender who continues to commit crimes despite previous findings of guilt and punishment. In this report this term is also used to describe perpetrators against whom more than one report of family violence has been made to Victoria Police, including where no criminal charge has been brought.
Registrar	An administrative court official.
Respondent	A person who responds to an application for a family violence intervention orders (or other court process). This includes a person against whom a family violence safety notice has been issued.
Respondent support worker	A worker based at some magistrates’ courts who advises and assists respondents with court procedures, (for example, a family violence intervention order proceeding).
Risk assessment and risk management report	A Victoria Police referral L17 form, completed for every family violence incident reported to police.
Risk Assessment and Management Panels	Also known as RAMPs, these are multi-agency partnerships that manage high-risk cases where victims are at risk of serious injury or death. These are described in Chapter 6.
Summary offence	A less serious offence than an indictable offence, which is usually heard by a magistrate.
Summons	A document issued by a court requiring a person to attend a hearing at a particular time and place.
Triable summarily	Specific indictable offences that can be prosecuted in the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, subject to the consent of the accused and the magistrate.
Universal services	A service provider to the entire community, such as health services in public hospitals or education in public schools.
Warm referral	A referral to a service where the person making the referral facilitates the contact—for example, by introducing and making an appointment for the client.
Young person	A person up to the age of 25 years.

If you would like to receive this publication in an accessible format, including large print or audio, please call the Victorian Government Contact Centre on 1300 366 356.

Royal Commission
into Family Violence

www.rcfv.com.au

ISBN 978-0-9944439-5-3

Royal Commission
into Family Violence

Volume VI

Report and recommendations

March 2016

Royal Commission into Family Violence

Volume VI

Report and recommendations

The Hon. Marcia Neave AO – Commissioner
Patricia Faulkner AO – Deputy Commissioner
Tony Nicholson – Deputy Commissioner

ORDER TO BE PUBLISHED

Victorian Government Printer
March 2016

Volume VI Report and recommendations
978-0-9944439-6-0

Published March 2016

ISBN

Summary and recommendations

978-0-9944440-1-1

Volume I Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-1-5

Volume II Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-2-2

Volume III Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-3-9

Volume IV Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-4-6

Volume V Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-5-3

Volume VII Commissioned research

978-0-9944439-0-8

Suggested citation: State of Victoria, Royal Commission into Family Violence: Report and recommendations, Vol VI, Parl Paper No 132 (2014–16).

Contents

36 Prevention	1
37 The workplace	71
38 Sustainable and certain governance	99
39 Data, research and evaluation	137
40 Industry planning	171
41 Investment	219
Appendix H Cost categories of PwC report	255
Appendix I The Victorian Government's budget for specialist family violence services, 2014–15	257
Appendix J Funding in the Victorian Government 2015–16 Budget for family violence initiatives	259
Appendix K List of the activities and activity sub-elements for family violence service providers who receive funding	261
Glossary	277

36 Prevention

Introduction

Preventing family violence is essential for the health and wellbeing of our community. While we have tended to focus on how best to respond to family violence once it occurs, prevention deserves an equal degree of attention.

Unless we address the problem of family violence at its source, and get better at preventing it from occurring in the first place, our communities and support systems will continue to be overwhelmed. As Mr Ken Lay, APM, the former Victorian Chief Commissioner of Victoria Police, told the Commission:

... despite all that investment, despite all the work, despite all the goodwill, we still have a court system that many victims and women describe as a horrendous experience. We still have women being murdered at almost a weekly rate. We still have terrible, terrible injuries. We still have much of our focus on trying to arrest our way out of this. So the violence continues ... I don't see the current model, unless we get into that primary prevention space, moving.¹

Prevention strategies in relation to family violence, also referred to as primary prevention, are concerned with changing the underlying social determinants that allow family violence to occur. Prevention and early intervention are often conflated in practice and policy. Early intervention, also referred to as secondary prevention, includes activities that target individuals at risk of perpetrating or experiencing violence. Responding to family violence, sometimes referred to as tertiary prevention, aims to reduce the effects of violence once it has occurred, and to prevent its recurrence. Strategies include providing support for victims of violence, and justice responses to perpetrators.

The first section of this chapter begins with an overview of research on population and individual risk factors for family violence. This research has largely emerged in the context of efforts to prevent violence against women. As intimate partner violence and sexual violence (which may be perpetrated by men who are unknown or unrelated to the woman) are the most common forms of violence against women, the research focuses on the prevention of these forms of violence. This body of research has informed the development of programs and strategies to prevent violence against women and their children, with a key focus on preventing intimate partner violence.

Strategies that seek to prevent violence against women focus on addressing gender inequality by, among other things, challenging gender norms and attitudes towards women:

... primary prevention is not about simply stopping or disrupting an individual from 'going down a path' to perpetrating violence. Nor should it end at awareness raising or even attitudinal change. It is a transformative agenda that requires shifting the social conditions that excuse, justify or even promote violence. Individual attitudinal or behaviour change may be the intended result of prevention activity, but such change cannot be achieved prior to, or in isolation from, a broader challenge to the underlying drivers of such violence across communities, organisations, and society as a whole.²

The literature on prevention of violence against women also recognises that prevention efforts need to address social conditions such as socio-economic disadvantage, discrimination based on race, sexuality or age, and prior exposure to violence alongside gender inequality.³

Programs to prevent violence against women aim to develop and promote respectful relationships generally, to change broader social norms around the use of violence and to create environments in the home that model non-violent and respectful behaviour to children. On this basis, strategies that have been developed to prevent intimate partner violence against women are also likely to be applicable to the prevention of other forms of family violence, such as violence committed against children, in same-sex relationships, and against parents, siblings and older people.

However, there is still a need for a more robust research base in relation to the factors that drive these other forms of family violence, and the prevention actions required to directly address all circumstances that give rise to family violence.

The chapter then offers an overview of recent prevention policy at both the state and Commonwealth levels and a discussion about the elements of best practice primary prevention responses. Victoria has been recognised internationally for its work in the area of prevention of violence against women in research, policy and practice development over the last 10 years, and the substantial contribution of VicHealth (the Victorian Health Promotion Foundation) has positioned Victoria well for the future. Coordinated policy and planning effort is a significant gap, however, and an immediate priority.

Some of the important features of best practice primary prevention programs are that they involve the whole community, including men and boys, and that they are tailored to, and developed in partnership with, communities who have experienced sustained discrimination, and communities from different cultures. There is growing understanding about the value of investing in prevention strategies focused on children and young people, and in the settings that have greatest influence on their development—such as schools and home visitation programs. The Commission also heard evidence that prevention programs do not work in isolation and that a more systematic approach, rather than a ‘project-by-project’ approach, is required.

Primary prevention strategies work best when they are delivered in the places where people live, work, play and learn. The remainder of this section outlines current prevention actions within key settings including schools and tertiary institutions, workplaces, sporting clubs and local councils. Prevention programs occurring in schools are a particular focus of this section.

In the second section, we outline some of the key challenges raised in the evidence in relation to prevention. These include the lack of a coordinating strategy or framework for the current proliferation of prevention initiatives, and the need for strong leadership by government as well as dedicated funding and more effective monitoring and evaluation of programs.

In the final section the Commission makes its recommendations. It is clear from the evidence that a key priority for the Victorian Government is to effectively coordinate the current efforts supported by appropriate regional governance, and ensure that they are well-founded and resourced, appropriately targeted and subject to evaluation and improvement. To this end we recommend that a dedicated primary prevention strategy be developed as a discrete part of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan proposed in Chapter 38. That strategy should be informed by the Gender Equality Strategy which is currently being developed by the Victorian Government, and which will address community attitudes towards women and issues such as economic inequality, health and wellbeing, employment and workplace issues, and inequality among diverse groups of women.

Further, we recommend that the Victorian Government resource a mechanism to provide policy and technical advice to policy makers, and oversee the research, development and implementation of primary prevention initiatives within organisations and communities. We have discussed a number of options but have ultimately left the decision to government about the location of that oversight mechanism.

Political leadership will be required to drive this strategy, and a bi-partisan approach is essential. However, the actions of the Victorian Government itself will not be enough. This strategy relies in large part on the efforts of all Victorians in coming together to change attitudes and behaviours. Individuals and organisations all have a role to play.

Finally we recommend that respectful relationships education be mandated in all government schools in Victoria from prep (or foundation) to Year 12, and be delivered through the effective resourcing of a whole-of-school approach. This accords with the evidence that educating children and young people about the basis for healthy and respectful relationships is crucial to preventing family violence in the future. Further work in other key settings, such as workplaces, must also continue. This is discussed further in Chapter 37.

The Commission’s recommendations on prevention strategies aim to position Victoria for the next generation of reform in the area of family violence prevention.

Context

Understanding the causes of family violence is an important step in determining what sort of prevention strategies are effective. This section discusses common risk factors that have been identified across different types of family violence, including intimate partner violence and child abuse, and also looks at key population risk factors for violence against women, such as gender inequality. Prevention policies and planning, at both state and Commonwealth level, are also discussed, as are best practice planning principles for engaging the community, including diverse groups, in prevention strategies.

Research on the causes of family violence

The terms of reference for this Commission do not require determination of the causes of family violence. However, understanding the many factors which contribute to it must inform future action, particularly primary prevention strategies.

The Commission has reviewed evidence from expert Australian and international organisations over the last decade about the causes of violence against women.⁴ In November 2015, Our Watch, a national body established in 2013 to drive change in the culture, behaviours and attitudes that lead to violence against women and children, released a National Framework to Prevent Violence Against Women and Children. The national framework provides a synthesis of research on the causes of violence against women and their children, and effective interventions.⁵

The most common form of family violence is male intimate partner violence against women.⁶ Research on the causes of violence against women, both in Australia and internationally, has focused on factors that contribute to intimate partner violence.

Progress towards understanding, and developing effective prevention measures are recognised to be considerably less well developed for elder abuse.⁷

Research on child abuse and maltreatment (which can occur within a family, but also in institutional and other non-family settings) suggests that child abuse frequently occurs alongside intimate partner violence. Co-existence rates identified in the literature range from 30 per cent to 70 per cent.⁸ Research about the risk factors for child abuse and maltreatment indicates that they are broadly consistent with the risk factors relating to intimate partner violence (such as gender inequality, socio-economic disadvantage, discrimination, and violence supportive cultures)⁹—this is unsurprising given the frequent co-occurrence of violence against children and intimate partner violence against women. There is also research on other forms of child abuse such as neglect, maltreatment and sexual abuse and the specific factors associated with these forms of violence.¹⁰

Professor Leah Bromfield, Deputy Director, Australian Centre for Child Protection, University of South Australia, told the Commission that 'if you were looking at some of those social determinants for child abuse, they would be common to some of the things you are looking at in trying to reduce the incidence of domestic violence'.¹¹

The Commission notes that design of family violence prevention efforts must encompass all available evidence, as well as addressing gaps in the research where they exist. Prevention efforts must be targeted to all forms of family violence, such as elder abuse, violence against men, including gay, bisexual and transgender men, and violence used by young people in the home.

Risk factors

Risk factors are determined by comparing rates of violence, or precursors to violence (such as social tolerance for violent behaviour) between individuals, groups, and communities with varying levels of exposure to certain conditions. Where the rate of violence is found to be lower in the presence of a given condition, this condition is considered a 'protective factor' against intimate partner violence. Where the rate of violence is higher in the presence of a particular condition, this condition is considered a 'risk factor' for intimate partner violence.

Some of the factors implicated in intimate partner violence are present at the population level; that is, they affect a significant proportion of the population, or the population as a whole. Population-level risk factors refer to social conditions or norms that are reinforced through social structures and cultures.

Research suggests that gender inequality is a significant population risk factor for intimate partner violence. There have been some challenges to this proposition based on observations about violence against women in Nordic countries which are relatively gender equal yet still have high rates of violence against women.¹² However, it has been suggested that this 'may be the result of increased disclosure of violence in surveys, as disclosing violence becomes less socially stigmatised in more gender equitable contexts'.¹³ Another possible explanation is that efforts in Nordic countries have focused primarily on women in the public sphere (such as leadership and pay equity), and less focus has been on achieving gender inequality in the private sphere (such as addressing inequalities in roles and responsibilities).¹⁴

Different forms of inequality and discrimination can create social and economic disadvantage.¹⁵ While international evidence is equivocal on socio-economic status as a factor to the occurrence of family violence,¹⁶ when socio-economic disadvantage intersects with other forms of inequality, the risk of violence increases.¹⁷

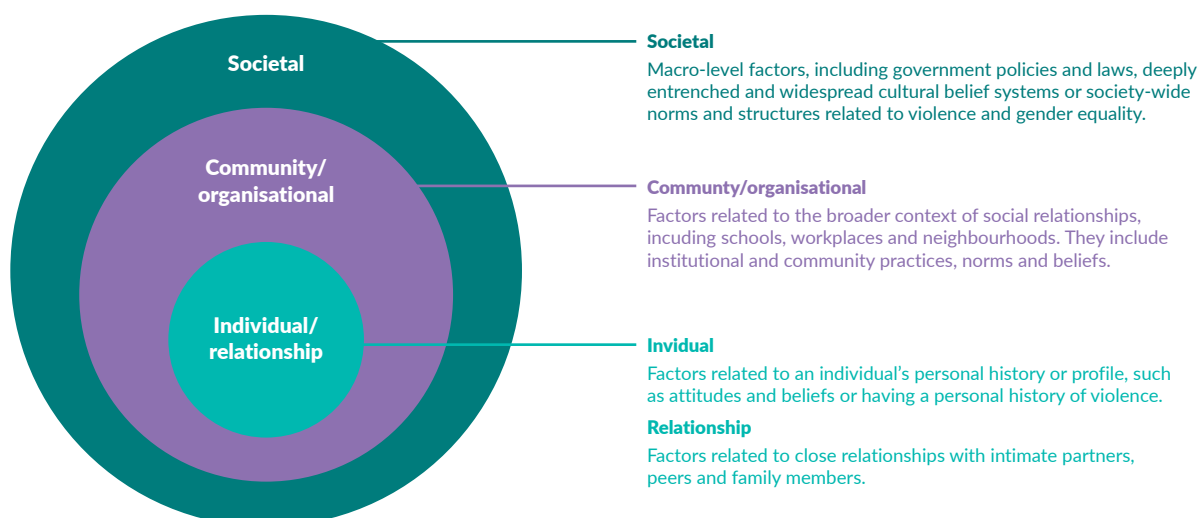

In addition, intersections between disadvantage and family violence can contribute to spatial patterns of incidence because disadvantage is heavily concentrated in some areas.¹⁸ Social and economic disadvantage is further discussed in Chapter 21. Gender inequality is discussed in more detail below.

Population-level factors are not the same as those that put particular individuals at high risk of perpetrating or experiencing violence. These 'individual-level' risk factors include mental illness and harmful use of alcohol or other drugs.¹⁹ Individual risk factors for family violence are considered in more detail in Chapter 6 and in Chapter 18.

Population-level and individual-level risk factors can interact with one another to influence the likelihood of violence. For example, a woman may have a low level of individual risk if she has a high level of education (education is considered a protective factor), but this may not necessarily equate to a low level of actual risk if there are marked population-level risks, such as intimate partner violence being widely tolerated in her community. Due to the need to assess the relationship between these factors, key expert bodies now use an 'ecological approach' to understand the causes of intimate partner violence, where factors are mapped across individual, community and broader social environments. This approach is represented in Figure 36.1.

Recent international studies have found a significant variation between countries in the prevalence of intimate partner violence.²⁰ This finding, coupled with the evidence that biological factors and individual psychopathologies cannot explain intimate partner violence on their own, has led to a consensus among experts that changeable social conditions play a key role in the prevalence of intimate partner violence.²¹

Figure 36.1 An ecological approach to understanding intimate partner violence²²

Source: Adapted from Lori Heise, Mary Ellsberg and Megan Gottemoeller, 'Ending Violence Against Women, Population Reports' (Series L No 11, John Hopkins University, School of Public Health, 1999) 8.

Gender inequality

There is consensus among international experts that gender inequality is an important population risk factor for intimate partner violence.²³ Responding to gender inequality needs to be considered along with other factors that contribute to or influence violence.²⁴ For example, poverty or the effects of colonisation and racism, can influence how gender inequality is experienced, and may in some cases have a greater influence on the risk of violence. The impacts of disadvantage and discrimination, when occurring in the context of gender inequality, can increase the probability of violence occurring.²⁵

A substantial body of research shows that the prevalence of intimate partner violence varies according to the gender inequality present at each level of the ecological model. This has been confirmed in a recent study, spanning 44 countries, of the relationship between intimate partner violence and a suite of gender equality indicators.²⁶ Indicators of gender inequality at different levels include:

- ▷ social practices, such as the use of violence to discipline children, and applying different rules in child rearing practices about how girls and boys should behave
- ▷ social structures, such as gender hierarchies within families and the gender pay gap
- ▷ formal and informal social norms, or the rules of conduct and models of behaviour expected by a society or group, such as weak laws against intimate partner violence, or the belief that women are solely responsible for the care of children.²⁷

There are particular expressions of gender inequality at all of these levels that are linked with an increased risk of intimate partner violence. Intimate partner violence is likely to be higher when:

- ▷ women lack autonomy and men dominate decision-making in public life, as well as in families and relationships. For example, violence is more common in societies where property, inheritance and family laws discriminate against women
- ▷ there is rigid adherence to stereotyped gender roles
- ▷ dominant constructions of masculinity emphasise dominance, aggression and entitlement in relationships, while dominant constructions of femininity emphasise purity, passivity and subordination
- ▷ peer relations encourage bonding between men at the expense of respect for women; relations between men and women are seen as naturally adversarial; or connections between women are weak.²⁸

Studies show that social norms that support violence against women, such as the belief by a significant proportion of the population that violence is justified in some circumstances, can increase the risk of intimate partner violence occurring.²⁹ High levels of exposure to violence, such as exposure to media representations of violence, may also increase this risk.³⁰ Men who use violence in other contexts, such as in the workplace or in the community, are more likely to also use violence against their female partners. Breakdowns of social norms, for example, in the context of natural disasters, may also increase intimate partner violence.³¹

However, exposure to and tolerance of violence in general is not sufficient, on its own, to explain violence. Many people who have been exposed to violence do not become perpetrators or victims of intimate partner violence.³²

Child abuse

The causes and prevention of child abuse have been examined in the Protecting Victoria's Vulnerable Children Inquiry (the Cummins Inquiry), and are currently a focus of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse.

Children may be the victims of violence perpetrated by their fathers or mothers, or as in the case of institutional abuse, by people with authority over them. Research shows that the experience of violence and neglect as a child is linked to perpetrating or being a victim of intimate partner violence as an adult: 'gender impacts place girls at higher risk of victimisation as adults and boys at greater risk of perpetration as adults'.³³ Boys and girls who are exposed to violence against their mother are learning about gender, power and disrespect in relationships,³⁴ and they may model this in their future relationships.

Research also indicates that while there are different risk and protective factors for child abuse and for intimate partner violence, many are common. Consideration of child abuse as a precursor to family violence is therefore important, as is consideration of the social determinants that can reduce child abuse, as they may also reduce family violence.³⁵

The Commission heard that there is a gap in our collective knowledge about the extent of child abuse in Australia.³⁶ Child abuse covers a range of behaviours including physical, sexual and emotional abuse, neglect and exposure to family violence.³⁷

A recent review by the Australian Research Alliance for Children and Youth of early intervention and prevention practices relevant to children and young people found that there is a core set of protective factors against child sexual abuse present at individual, family, and community levels. These factors include relationship and problem-solving skills development, competence as a parent, the company of positive peers and adults, and supportive school and community environments.³⁸ Risk factors for child sexual abuse include poverty, family violence, the lack of positive attachment to a parent, and the presence of parental mental illness or substance abuse.³⁹

The review notes evidence that services targeted at parents experiencing mental illness, substance misuse and/or family violence have significant flow-on benefits for their children.⁴⁰ The Commission heard that an important element of addressing intergenerational violence is targeting intervention efforts towards women with histories of abuse and neglect:

... noting that fostering safe, stable, nurturing relationships between mothers and their partners and between mothers and their children appears to be a key factor in breaking the cycle of abuse from one generation to the next.⁴¹

The Commission also heard that effective primary prevention strategies in relation to child abuse include 'kids attending schools, kids going to high quality child-care, parents who are socially connected [and] parents who have access to high quality information about parenting'.⁴²

Recent prevention policy and planning

The Victorian Government's A Right to Respect: Victoria's Plan to Prevent Violence Against Women 2010–2020 was referred to by many written submissions received by the Commission as one of the significant policy reforms in the area of primary prevention over the last 10 years.⁴³ The health journal The Lancet has recognised A Right to Respect as the 'first public policy of its kind worldwide with a focus on primary prevention of violence across individual, community, and societal levels'.⁴⁴

Under this policy, the Victorian Government focused on working with local government to embed prevention practice within schools, workplaces, and sporting clubs.⁴⁵ With the change of government in 2010, a new policy was developed, and Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence Against Women and Children 2012–2015 was released in October 2012. This policy framework committed to targeted primary prevention strategies as part of a broader approach that also included early intervention and response efforts.⁴⁶

A Right to Respect builds on the evidence in the 2007 VicHealth framework Preventing Violence Before it Occurs—A framework and background paper to guide the primary prevention of violence against women in Victoria.⁴⁷ Many written submissions received by the Commission highlighted the contribution of VicHealth to policy and practice initiatives that have been recognised internationally relevant to primary prevention of violence against women.

The significance of the VicHealth framework cannot be underestimated and could certainly be described as a key reform and development in the field of preventing violence against women. The framework helped to coordinate effort across a range of sectors previously not engaged in prevention, such as the sport and recreation and education fields. Alongside identifying where action should be directed, the framework consolidated previously fragmented attempts to prevent violence against women through outlining how key partners might contribute to addressing the determinants.⁴⁸

In October 2014, the Victorian Government introduced Ending Violence Against Women and Children: Further initiatives for Victoria's action plan to address violence against women and children 2012–2015.⁴⁹ This strategy outlines a range of initiatives to 'prevent violence against women and children before it occurs, keep victims of violence safe and hold perpetrators to account', and was supported with government funding.⁵⁰ The new government, elected in November 2014, deferred spending the majority of this investment, and it will be reconsidered in light of this Royal Commission's recommendations.⁵¹

There is debate within the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities about the contribution gender inequality makes to violence against women and children in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families. The Commission heard that, as with policy in relation to responding to family violence generally, the development of prevention policy specific to the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander community has had a different trajectory to prevention policy targeted to the non-Aboriginal population in Victoria. Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families: Towards a safer future for Indigenous families and communities is a 10-year plan focused on developing 'an Indigenous specific prevention framework for family violence'.⁵²

This plan led to the Indigenous Family Violence Prevention Framework released in 2012. This was designed to 'support primary prevention capacity building; effective, sustainable activities, and ownership and leadership within Aboriginal communities'.⁵³ The framework includes six key strategies: raising community awareness, family strengthening, cultural strengthening, responding to grief and trauma information and education, and self-esteem and resilience building.⁵⁴

Funding for prevention

In 2014–15 the Victorian Government budgeted $3.6 million for prevention programs, services and activities. This represents four per cent of the $80.6 million that the Victorian Government budgeted for services and programs specifically focused on family violence.⁵⁵ The Commission notes that this proportion would be even smaller if the total cost of family violence to the Victorian Government was included, such as the proportion of police and court expenditure arising from responding to family violence.

This funding is spread across a number of programs, including:

- ▷ Respectful Relationships Education in Schools program ($0.55 million in 2014–15)
- ▷ twelve one-off grants supporting local projects to reduce violence against women and their children, including four projects specifically addressing violence in Aboriginal communities ($2 million in 2014–15)
- ▷ development and trialling of primary intervention models with two culturally and linguistically diverse communities ($0.55 million in 2014–15)
- ▷ a targeted community awareness-raising project focused on elder abuse across six culturally and linguistically diverse communities ($0.22 million in 2014–15)
- ▷ support for the Municipal Association of Victoria to build local government capacity and action in the prevention of violence against women ($0.2 million in 2014–15).⁵⁶

Information provided by the Victorian Government indicates that most of the above funding is not ongoing and will lapse.⁵⁷

In the 2015–16 State Budget the Victorian Government allocated $2 million to extend three projects for preventing family violence against women and children.⁵⁸ Two projects target key settings (workplaces and local government), with a further project focused on women with disabilities. As we discuss in Chapter 41, most of the additional funding allocated in the 2015–16 State Budget is for one year only, including the above initiative, with the Victorian Government advising that future investment would be informed by the findings of the this Royal Commission.

The Victorian Government acknowledged to the Commission that there is currently a funding gap in relation to prevention:

Over the years, there has been comparatively low investment in prevention initiatives aimed at the key determinant of family violence or its contributing factors. Prevention programs have often relied on short-term, project-based funding rather than ongoing and sustained investment.⁵⁹

Prior to 2013, the Victorian Government had provided some funding towards prevention programs. For example, in 2011–12, $7.2 million was allocated through the (then) Department of Justice Reducing Violence against Women and their Children grants program.⁶⁰ With criteria informed by the VicHealth Framework, Preventing Violence Before it Occurs, the program allocated $600,000 each to eight Victorian regions over three years. The organisations leading these projects were women's health services, local councils, and community health services. In addition, $2.4 million was allocated to four Aboriginal services for Koori Community Safety Grants. The purpose of these grants was to enhance collaborative relationships at a local level and help build a primary prevention and early intervention evidence base. The programs are being evaluated by the Australian Institute of Criminology,⁶¹ and interim evaluations have demonstrated clear evidence of positive outcomes across the programs.⁶²

The Commonwealth approach to prevention

The National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children 2010–2022 has been endorsed by the Council of Australian Governments (COAG).⁶³ The plan is overseen by a ministerial committee of nominated state and territory ministers, chaired by the relevant Commonwealth minister.⁶⁴ The plan is being implemented through four three-year action plans, supported by state and territory implementation plans.⁶⁵

The Second Action Plan: Moving Ahead 2013–2016 was released in June 2013. As part of the development of each action plan, the Commonwealth and states and territories have nominated a number of priority areas for joint focus. These include: prevention, improving responses for diverse communities, supporting an integrated service response to family violence, improving perpetrator interventions, and continuing to build the evidence base.⁶⁶ The third action plan is due in 2016.

Of the six outcome (strategy) areas of the national plan, there are two that relate specifically to prevention

- ▷ outcome area 1: Communities are safe and free from violence and
- ▷ outcome area 2: Relationships are respectful.⁶⁷

Commonwealth-led prevention activities to date have included The Line (a social marketing campaign targeting young people that is now being led by Our Watch); a $3 million Community Action Grants program; and a $9 million Respectful Relationships Grants program.⁶⁸ Evaluation of these grants programs is pending.

In 2015, COAG established an advisory panel and nominated a number of new priority areas for action under the national plan. The three priority areas identified were the National Domestic Violence Order Model Law; the national outcome standards for perpetrator interventions; and strategies to keep women safe from technology-facilitated abuse.⁶⁹

During the Commission's deliberations, the Commonwealth Government announced specific funding for the prevention of violence against women and their children.⁷⁰ This included $5 million to expand the Safer Schools website as a resource for teachers, parents and students around fostering respectful relationships.⁷¹ The Commonwealth Government has indicated that this will build on the $30 million national campaign (jointly funded by the Commonwealth, states and territories) to change young people's attitudes to violence, and will commence in early 2016.⁷² In 2015, all governments agreed on a national curriculum, which now includes respectful relationships education. This is detailed further in this chapter.

National prevention foundation: Our Watch

In 2013, as part of the National Plan, the Victorian and Commonwealth Governments established and jointly funded Our Watch, a national foundation to prevent violence against women and their children. Our Watch is an independent, not-for-profit organisation that is currently funded until 2017. The organisation's role is to drive nation-wide change in the culture, behaviours and attitudes that underpin and create violence against women and children. Our Watch has four areas of focus: design and deliver public campaigns; promote a sustained and constructive public conversation; enable organisations, networks and community to effect change; and influence public policy, systems and institutions.⁷³

Our Watch and VicHealth have also established a formal partnership. VicHealth is currently transferring knowledge and resources that it has developed to Our Watch.⁷⁴

Our Watch has been funded to deliver specific prevention projects. As part of its establishment in 2013, Our Watch was funded to deliver:

- ▷ respectful relationships education (RRE) in schools. This project focuses on embedding RRE in a number of secondary schools across three local government areas.⁷⁵ This project is discussed further below
- ▷ culturally and linguistically diverse prevention strategies with Indian and Iranian communities.⁷⁶ Further discussion is in Chapter 28.

In late 2015, the Victorian Government provided $900,000 in funding to Our Watch to manage the Workplace Equality and Respect Project, aimed at developing policies and practices relevant to preventing violence in Victorian workplaces.⁷⁷ This project is discussed further in Chapter 37.

Our Watch has also been funded to deliver the Strengthening Hospital Responses to family violence project, working with the Royal Women's and Bendigo Hospitals. This has an early intervention rather than primary prevention focus, and is discussed in detail in Chapter 19.

At the time of writing this report, the South Australian Government, the Tasmanian Government, and the Northern Territory Government have also partnered with Our Watch. In its submission to the Commission, opportunities that Our Watch identifies for collaboration across states and territories are:

- ▷ guidance on monitoring and evaluating prevention strategies
- ▷ nationally agreed quality standards and implementation tools for work in different settings and tailored for different groups
- ▷ technical and specialist expertise in prevention practice and policy
- ▷ prevention training programs and materials, adaptable to different sectors
- ▷ design and delivery of communications campaigns/social marketing initiatives to change norms, behaviours and practices.⁷⁸

New national framework for prevention of violence: Change the Story

The national framework for prevention of violence against women and their children was developed by Our Watch in partnership with Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS) and VicHealth.⁷⁹ The development of the framework was a priority under the second action plan of the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022.⁸⁰

Change the Story: a shared framework for the primary prevention of violence against women and their children in Australia

The national framework Change the Story was released in November 2015. It includes a review of international literature about prevention, and a number of independent opinion pieces about key areas. The framework was informed by consultations undertaken across Australia with researchers, practitioners and policy makers, from community and non-government organisations, community networks, and government agencies.

The intent of the shared national framework is to present current evidence and research about prevention of violence against women and their children, and to outline a conceptual approach and guide to progressing action.

Drawing from the evidence, Change the Story provides an explanatory model, key actions to prevent violence, presents practical strategies, and details the most effective settings. A main message is that governments, the service sector, and the community cannot solve this challenge alone—it must be a shared endeavour.

The new national framework will provide Victoria with further evidence and guidance that it can build on to inform its own state level policy and program planning.

Table 36.1 Time line of key milestones in prevention of violence against women and their children
(includes national markers)

Time line	Victoria	Key indicators	National and international
1995			First national Community Attitudes to Violence Against Women Survey conducted by the Office for the Status of Women (equivalent to the National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey [NCAS]).
1996		1 in 3 women are subjected to male violence at some time in their adult lives ⁸¹	The Australian Bureau of Statistics leads the first Women's Safety Survey .
2002	Victorian Government launches Women's Safety Strategy 2002–2007 .		World Health Organization launches the World Report on Violence and Health , which identifies violence against women as a key area for action across the globe.
2004	VicHealth and Vic Government launch The Health Costs of Violence: Measuring the burden of disease caused by intimate partner violence . This is the first international study assessing the burden of disease associated with intimate partner violence.	Violence is identified as the leading preventable contributor to ill health, death and disease for Victorian women aged 15–44 ⁸²	Release of the Access Economics report, indicating that the economic cost associated with violence against women is $8.1 billion in 2003.
2006	Victorian survey of community attitudes towards violence against women led by VicHealth.	Of Australian women who had experienced physical assault in the 12 months prior to the survey, 1 in 3 experienced physical assault from a male partner ⁸³	Australian Bureau of Statistics releases results from the Personal Safety Survey (replaces the Women's Safety Survey undertaken in 1996).
2007	VicHealth releases Preventing Violence Before it Occurs: A framework and background paper to guide the primary prevention of violence against women in Victoria , commissioned by the Victorian Government.
2008	Strong Culture Strong Peoples Strong Families: Indigenous family violence 10-year plan .
2009	The Victorian Government releases A Right to Respect: Victoria's plan to prevent violence against women 2010–2022 , which included a dedicated prevention budget.		Second National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey led by VicHealth and Commonwealth Government.
2010			World Health Organization releases Preventing Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Against Women: Taking action and generating evidence .
2011			The Commonwealth Government releases the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children 2010–2022 .
2012	Victoria's Action Plan to Prevent Violence Against Women and Children 2012–2015 , that included a number of prevention projects. Reducing Violence Against Women and their Children Grants, through the Victorian Department of Justice Crime Prevention Program.

Time line	Victoria	Key indicators	National and international
2013	Our Watch, previously the Foundation to Prevent Violence Against Women and their Children, is established by the Victorian and Commonwealth Governments.
		1 in 6 women have experienced violence from a male partner since the age of 15. ⁸⁴	Australian Bureau of Statistics releases the third Personal Safety Survey .
2014	Victorian Government introduces Ending Violence Against Women and Children: Further initiatives for Victoria's action plan to address violence against women and children strategy .		Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS) is established under the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022 .
			Third National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey is released by VicHealth and Commonwealth Government.
2015	Victorian Government starts consultation on a gender equality strategy. ⁸⁵	1 in 4 women have experienced intimate partner violence since the age of 15. ⁸⁶	ANROWS releases report entitled Violence Against Women: Additional analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012 . Change the Story , a shared framework for the primary prevention of violence against women and their children in Australia, is released.

Best practice in prevention

Prevention strategies targeted to population-level risk factors for family violence are relatively new. Research on the most effective form of action at the population level is therefore limited.⁸⁷ The Commission heard that the success of other population-level prevention strategies relevant to public health, such as reducing smoking and increasing road safety, may be useful in informing prevention strategies relevant to all forms of family violence.⁸⁸

Population-level prevention strategies used with public health strategies vary depending on the issue being addressed, but the following components and approaches are broadly consistent:

- ▷ legislative, policy and regulatory reform to support the strategy
- ▷ community mobilisation to engage communities in shifting practices and norms
- ▷ communications and social marketing to shift social norms and practices
- ▷ organisational development to change policies, structures and cultures
- ▷ education of key workforces to enable them to build prevention into their job roles
- ▷ development of the skills of individuals through direct participation programs
- ▷ advocacy to ensure that attention is given to the problem and that barriers are addressed
- ▷ research, monitoring and evaluation.⁸⁹

In 2007, VicHealth adopted this framework in developing prevention policy and programs relevant to violence against women.⁹⁰

In 2010, WHO reported on the status of the effectiveness of initiatives to prevent violence against women.⁹¹ Our Watch, as part of the development of its National Framework to Prevent Violence Against Women and their Children, has recently updated this research.⁹² It categorised prevention initiatives (targeted to prevent intimate partner violence against women) as follows:

- ▷ effective—the initiative has shown to be effective in preventing violence
- ▷ promising—the initiative has an impact on risk factors, but has not been shown to reduce violence

- ▷ conflicting—some evaluations show the intervention is effective and others show that it is not
- ▷ ineffective—current studies have not established that the intervention has a positive impact on violence against women or its risk factors.⁹³

These initiatives are outlined in Table 36.2.

Table 36.2 Interventions to prevent violence against women—current state of the evidence for effectiveness⁹⁴

Intervention	Assessment based on available evidence of effectiveness
Policy, legislative and institutional reform
Macro-level reforms designed to address specific aspects of human rights and gender inequality established in research to be strongly linked with violence against women	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence
Efforts to reform the media's representation/reporting of gender relations, women and violence against women (including self-regulation)	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence
Strengthening infrastructure and transport, for example by improving the safety of public transport and street lighting ^	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence
Community mobilisation and strengthening
Community mobilisation, involving community-driven, participatory projects that engage multiple stakeholders to address gender norms	Effective
Organisational development
'Whole-of-school' programs involving teachers and other school staff, pupils, reporting mechanisms, parents and the local community, along with national advocacy. A variety of strategies are used (e.g. curriculum and group-based programmes, policy reform, advocacy)	Promising
Multi-strategy approaches with media outlets to promote the responsible portrayal of women, girls and violence against women in the media (e.g. involving advocacy, training, guidelines)	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence
Organisational auditing processes to identify and address structures and practices contributing to gender inequality and violence against women. Involves developing audit tools and processes for engaging staff, community members and volunteers in using these to reflect on organisational cultures and processes and plan reform. Inducements may be used to encourage or support compliance (e.g. funding, awards)	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence
Communications and social marketing
Social marketing campaigns or edutainment plus group education. Long-term programs engaging social media, mobile applications, thematic television series, posters, together with interpersonal communication activities	Promising
Single-component communications campaigns (e.g. a campaign involving advertisements through television and print media)	Ineffective
Advocacy
Skills training and capacity building for organisations and community members advocating for gender equality and the elimination of violence against women	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence
Leadership programmes that identify and support influential, non-violent individuals to 'speak out' and play a leadership role regarding gender inequality and the elimination of violence against women. These may be targeted to prominent individuals or be delivered through informal peer groups (e.g. among young people) or organisational settings (e.g. workplaces). Based on social norms theory which proposes that the views of prominent others are influential in shifting social norms (Webster et al. 2014)	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence

Intervention	Assessment based on available evidence of effectiveness
Individual or group direct participation programs providing education, support and skills development
School or community programs to improve women's and girls' agency. Can include other components such as safe spaces, mentoring and life-skills training	Effective
Economic empowerment and income supplements including micro-finance, vocational training, job placement or cash or asset transfers (e.g. land reform)	Conflicting evidence
Economic empowerment and income supplements plus gender equality training	Effective
Collectivisation [^] . Supporting women's and girls' empowerment by strengthening supportive links to other women and girls in similar circumstances (e.g. a collective for sex workers)	Effective
Peer education. Supporting individuals from particular sub-populations to educate their peers on gender norms and violence against women	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence
School programs and community workshops with men and boys to promote changes in social norms and behaviours that encourage violence against women and gender inequality	Effective
School and community workshops to promote changes in norms and behaviour that encourage violence against women and gender inequality. In contrast to the above, they involve both men and women	Effective
Programs to support young people to engage critically with media and popular culture representations of women and gender relations, often referred to as strengthening media literacy. Based on the theory that the negative influences of the media on constructions of masculinities and femininities and on behaviours can be lessened by encouraging young people to engage in a critical way with the media	Successfully implemented but not yet evaluated for impact on violence/precursors to violence
Programs to strengthen individual skills and knowledge to take positive or 'pro-social' action in relation to attitudes and behaviours supporting violence (e.g. the belief that women deserve violence) and precursors to violence (e.g. sexist attitudes). Often referred to as 'bystander' programs. Typically implemented as part of a broader program of community/organisational mobilisation	Conflicting evidence (emphasis in many current evaluations is on bystander responses to violence, as opposed to its precursors, and on bystander approaches as 'stand-alone' interventions) Have been successfully implemented in Australia
Programs to support the skills of parents (both men and women) to promote gender equality and non-violence in their parenting practices (noting that these programs differ from the parenting programs below which have the goals of preventing child abuse)	Not yet systematically assessed
Group or relationship-level interventions for equitable and respectful relationships Couple interventions to support them to maintain equitable and respectful relationships have been successfully implemented (e.g. among couples expecting a first child). There may be some potential in such programs as preventive measures at the population or sub-population level. However, relationship-level interventions without a gender transformative approach may inadvertently compound gender inequality and hence be harmful to women	Conflicting evidence

Intervention	Assessment based on available evidence of effectiveness
Protective behaviours programs [^] . Group programs teaching women and girls how to modify their behaviour to reduce the risk of sexual assault and/or to defend themselves in the event of being threatened with assault	Conflicting evidence. Such programs may increase victim-blaming (itself contributing by way of social norms to sexual violence). If they encourage women and girls to curtail their movements and divert attention from perpetration as a human rights violation, such programs would be incompatible with a rights-based approach. Promoting self-defence in the absence of comprehensive skills training has been found to increase risk. Ideally these programs would be implemented alongside those promoting changes in norms pertaining to gender and violence among men and boys
Collaborating with other policy settings to address issues of common concern
Nurse home-visiting programs aimed to strengthen parenting attitudes and skills, noting that the primary purpose and benefits of such programs are the prevention of child abuse. These programs are distinguished from those above which have an emphasis on promoting skills to raise children in ways that promote gender equality and non-violence	Promising for IPV (effective for reducing child abuse and neglect)
Regulation to reduce the density of alcohol outlets or reduce alcohol consumption (e.g. through taxation, rationing, regulating trading hours)	Effective*, although optimally should be implemented alongside other interventions addressing normative support for violence against women

[^] Interventions evaluated were for the purposes of preventing non-partner sexual assault only.

* Evidence from high income countries only.

 Evidence from low and middle income countries only.

Principles of effective prevention

The Commission heard that best-practice prevention approaches have a number of features in common. These are:

- ▷ involving the community
- ▷ having strategies not just single programs
- ▷ engaging men and boys
- ▷ taking account of the circumstances of particular groups.

Principles specific to respectful relationships education and effective prevention in school and place-based settings are outlined later in this chapter.

Involving the community

The Commission heard that while preventing and responding to family violence should be a core responsibility of government, 'whole-of-community' approaches to preventing family violence are essential:⁹⁵

Community development and community mobilisation are important but underutilised strategies ... Community mobilisation shows increasing promise, with a recent review documenting that well-designed interventions ... can have a positive impact upon violence perpetration or victimisation.⁹⁶

Ms Rosie Batty, domestic violence victim advocate, Luke Batty Foundation, told the Commission that community involvement should be as inclusive as possible as 'cultural change means no-one is immune, everyone has to change, and really become aware of their behaviour and their influence on others'.⁹⁷ Professor Tony Vinson, Emeritus Professor at the University of New South Wales submitted that community level prevention approaches should be focused on the most disadvantaged communities with the greatest need.⁹⁸

The Commission was told that all communities are different—some have good social networks and strong local leadership, others have a diversity of cultures with different attitudes to family violence. Many people talked about the importance of responding to local needs and delivering whole-of-community initiatives in ways that recognise and respond to local circumstances.⁹⁹

The Commission also heard about the importance of ensuring that systems are in place to support prevention strategies, as increased community awareness and involvement will mean an increase in demand for service responses.¹⁰⁰ Ms Batty told the Commission that ‘speaking openly about these issues can make it easier for some women to confront their situation and make a change, and perhaps take steps to leave a violent relationship’.¹⁰¹ However, if specialist services are not in place and well-resourced, this can be devastating for victims who are often at their most vulnerable when they try to leave an abusive partner, as was the case for a prevention strategy in New Zealand:

In Gisborne, Levin, Ohakune, New Plymouth and Paeroa, a scarcity of adequate referral, support and intervention services was raised as a primary concern. While the Campaign has resulted in increased awareness and referrals for support and intervention, communities have struggled to meet these demands. Moreover, areas that include isolated rural communities faced additional challenges responding to requests for family violence related support and intervention.¹⁰²

Why attitudes matter

Measuring and changing attitudes to violence against women is recognised as an important way of informing prevention activities, as attitudes reflect and reinforce social norms. Attitudes influence community expectations of what is acceptable behaviour, which in turn influences individual behaviour. Community attitudes also influence how people respond to violence, and whether or not they seek help. The 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey identified links between attitudes and behaviour including:

- ▷ violence against women is more common in communities where violence-supportive attitudes are prevalent
- ▷ men who have violence-supportive attitudes are more likely to perpetrate or say they would perpetrate violence
- ▷ where victims have violence-supportive attitudes, they are more likely to experience family violence again
- ▷ violence-supportive attitudes held by people who witness violence and its precursors may result in less empathy and support being given to victims of violence, which in turn can affect their recovery.¹⁰³

The link between attitude and behaviour is not necessarily direct (e.g. if someone holds violence-supportive attitudes it does not mean they will therefore perpetrate violence). Attitudes influence, and are in turn influenced by broader norms and cultures, including how gender roles and relationships in families and organisations are formed, and how women and men are portrayed in the media and popular culture.¹⁰⁴

The Commission notes that the 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey revealed that community attitudes may be slower than public policy to recognise that alcohol and drug use is not an excuse for family violence. Nine per cent of those surveyed believed that partner violence can be excused if the perpetrator is affected by alcohol and 19 per cent believed that the woman bears some responsibility if she is raped while affected by alcohol or drugs. Eleven per cent also believed that family violence can be excused if the victim is heavily affected by alcohol.¹⁰⁵

Strategies not just single programs

Changing deeply entrenched beliefs, behaviours and cultures in communities to prevent problems such as family violence, requires sustained and coordinated efforts over a long period of time.¹⁰⁶ Consistent with the experience in other areas of population-level prevention (like smoking) the evidence suggests that interventions are more likely to be successful when they combine multiple strategies and target more than one level of the community: for example, whole-of-school interventions are more effective than implementing a single strategy such as a group education program. Similarly, media campaigns are more likely to be successful when combined with group training and efforts to develop leadership. Research shows that individual prevention interventions may have positive effects, but violence prevention interventions will not be effective in achieving widespread behavioural and attitudinal change on a 'project-by-project' basis:

... duration and intensity of programs makes a difference. We know that one-off, short duration programs are ineffective in changing attitudes and behaviour. Similarly, stand-alone social marketing and communications campaigns which don't have community development input are also ineffective. Multi component programs which combine multiple prevention strategies are more likely to generate change, according to recent international reviews, although it is challenging to figure out what components are most important or what the most desirable package of interventions is.¹⁰⁷

There is little evidence that awareness-raising communications campaigns on their own (such as a campaign with advertisements through television and print media) have any substantial positive effect.¹⁰⁸ These campaigns may simply increase demand and without sustained funding,¹⁰⁹ potentially putting victims at increased risk. Messages encouraging victims to feel empowered to 'end the violence' by getting help could implicitly reinforce messages that they are responsible for the violence.¹¹⁰

It is critical to note that public education and awareness (at the broadest community level or tailored and targeted to particular services and settings such as schools) has the potential to elicit disclosure of current family violence risk. It is essential therefore to ensure that additional resourcing of specialist family violence responses is available to support people making those disclosures, noting that this will likely include children and young people.¹¹¹

Berry Street also highlighted that it was essential to ensure adequate specialist responses were in place before initiating prevention initiatives.¹¹²

Research indicates that social marketing and media advocacy strategies are of value when they are integrated, mutually reinforce on-the-ground activities, and are supported by cross-sector partnerships that allow for consistent approaches with broad reach.¹¹³ Where these campaigns promote policy or legislative changes, they can have additional benefits. Campaign strategies that are sustained beyond a single 'dose' are also important to embed the uptake of campaign messages. The most useful role of social marketing may be to raise awareness and supplement the efficacy of other strategies.¹¹⁴

If they are going to run big social marketing campaigns everybody has to be on board because that's going to have impacts on the police and the courts and the response system. So everybody has to be prepared for that. We have seen examples of Federal Government campaigns increasing people ringing up a phone number and there's nothing happening at the delivery end, and where the state and Commonwealth haven't been in sync and the service system hasn't been engaged. So anything that involves campaigns ... you can't just have one ... [and] [t]hey have to be in sync.¹¹⁵

The Commission heard that historically the tendency has been for prevention activities to focus on changing community attitudes, without addressing the structures and practices known to shape them, such as practices in families, organisational and community cultures, or the portrayal of gender relations and violence in the media.

In my view, one of the problems in the violence prevention field is that the focus so far has been on attitudes. Attitudes are influential, but not the only determinant. Violence prevention efforts must seek to change not only individual attitudes and community norms, but also behaviours, social and sexual relations, and the structural conditions that perpetuate violence. Interventions aimed at attitudinal and cultural change must be accompanied by changes in social practices and structural relations if violence in relationships and families is to be undermined and prevented ... For example, various forms of gender inequality – such as women’s economic dependence on men – are risk factors for family violence. They are related to attitudes but not reducible to attitudes.¹¹⁶

The Commission heard that more attention must be given to prevention programs that go beyond awareness raising and instead focus on supporting communities to develop norms that promote equality and respect. As reported in the 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey:

The literature on which this study was based shows that while there may be some value in community and professional education and campaigns to strengthen attitudes, sustained change is most likely to be achieved by changing the family, social, community and organisational environments that shape attitudes, and influence whether they are manifest in violent or violence supportive behaviour or not.¹¹⁷

Engaging men and boys

I am as concerned for my son as I am for my daughters in this environment. I do not want my son growing up thinking that to be a man means being rough, dominating, having an entitlement to more based on his gender.¹¹⁸

Most interpersonal violence, whether against men or women, is perpetrated by men.¹¹⁹ This suggests that constructions of masculinity—the identities and roles attributed to men, and the norms, structures and practices supporting these identities and roles—are important considerations when discussing prevention strategies. In line with this view, the Commission was told that ‘research indicates ... interventions which address and seek to transform gender are more effective than those interventions which do not.’¹²⁰ Dr Michael Flood, Australian Research Council Future Fellow and Senior Lecturer in Sociology, University of Wollongong, described how masculinity is constructed:

By masculinity, I mean the meanings attached to being a man and the social organisation of men’s lives and relations. This does not just include attitudes and values, but men’s practices and interactions with others – how men’s lives are actually organized, how they learn to treat each other and to treat women.¹²¹

The Commission was told that prevention programs need to support men and boys to critically reflect on what it means to be a man, and to shift some of the meanings and practices that are traditionally associated with masculinity.¹²² Effective prevention work will also require acknowledging that violence against women perpetrated by men cannot be reduced solely to constructions of masculinity or to gender relations, since ‘masculinity’ is experienced in the context of other social and economic conditions, such as poverty.¹²³

The involvement of men in violence prevention work is now widely recognised as central to the success of primary prevention activities.¹²⁴

The field of violence prevention has seen a shift in the last decade towards primary prevention activities which explicitly engage men and boys. There is a compelling argument for the need to engage men in prevention of men’s violence against women. Prevention activities need to address attitudes, relations and behaviours of men and boys in general.¹²⁵

Many submissions received by the Commission cited the work of White Ribbon in engaging men and boys to prevent violence. Active in Australia since 2003, White Ribbon is a national public education and violence prevention campaign that aims to drive behavioural and attitudinal change across the community, primarily among men and boys.¹²⁶ The Commission heard that the annual White Ribbon Day and Ambassador Program were useful and well-known mechanisms for engagement. The Koori Caucus submitted:

White Ribbon Day events are great activities for reaching out to the whole community; and the events take place across the community. Information packs, t-shirts and caps with messages about not tolerating family violence also feature in White Ribbon Day activities ... White Ribbon Day primary prevention activities often create momentum for future partnerships and prevention activities.¹²⁷

A recent review of efforts in engaging men in the prevention of violence against women found that while there have been a number of achievements, and there is significant momentum to continue this work, most interventions have not been evaluated and therefore their impact is unknown.¹²⁸ The review also highlights tensions, including that most work in engaging men in violence prevention continues to be done by women, and that male advocates are often given greater status and power than women doing similar work.¹²⁹ Women's Health in the South East noted caution that '[p]lacing male champions of change on a pedestal reinforces traditional power structures and somewhat limits the discourse to "say no to violence", rather than challenging rigid gender stereotypes and gender inequality'.¹³⁰

A review commissioned by the NSW Government in 2014, titled Less to Lose and More to Gain? Men and Boys Violence Prevention Research Project final report found that there are promising prevention approaches targeted to men and boys, including: respectful relationships education; bystander strategies; community development; whole-of-organisation practices; infant and parenting programs; and social marketing.¹³¹ The report emphasises that engaging men and boys in the prevention of family violence is facilitated by:

- ▷ addressing the role of gender in violence against women in a way that boys and men can understand
- ▷ utilising educators who boys and men can relate to as role models
- ▷ recognising that masculinities are diverse and affected by class, location, ethnicity, cultural background, sexuality and other factors
- ▷ engaging men and boys in the places where they live, work and play.¹³²

The National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey refers to evidence that young men in particular are 'struggling with changes in gender power and gender roles' and that there is a 'greater preparedness [among young men] to justify and excuse violence in certain [situations]'.¹³³ The report states that these findings mean that young people are a priority when designing and delivering prevention programs. It also stresses that effective programs need to draw on contemporary thinking about gender relations:

This is consistent with efforts that critically draw on rather than merely reject aspects of dominant gender scripts—for example, promoting control over behaviour and sexuality as positive masculine characteristics or using high-profile men to denounce violence against women—that are [likely] to be compelling to young people.¹³⁴

Dr Flood told the Commission that, in his view, one of the key challenges in gaining traction with young men is to minimise hostile and defensive reactions:¹³⁵

Often men feel they are being stereotyped as batterers or rapists. In my view, we need to minimize hostile and defensive reactions by emphasising men's positive role in stopping family violence, by acknowledging their own victimization (which is largely at the hands of other men), and by creating safe spaces for men to reflect and learn.¹³⁶

An interim evaluation of CHALLENGE Family Violence, a program led by the City of Casey and the City of Greater Dandenong, notes that ‘... men engaged with the project [were] keen to contribute to reducing men’s violence against women and developing alternative forms of masculinity that challenge gendered beliefs and behaviours – but not at the cost of their friendships’.¹³⁷ In addition, the project found that men reported ‘feeling uncomfortable in discussing violence-related issues with women present, and were not ready to embrace women as allies’.¹³⁸ While highlighting that there were some positive changes in individual men in the program,¹³⁹ the evaluation also noted:

Men’s speaking out about violence against women and sexism, attending events to call for preventing violence against women and wearing a white ribbon are not enough for social gender transformation ...¹⁴⁰

The Commission was told that many of the factors that influence intimate partner violence and other forms of family violence are related to how men’s identities are shaped. Targeting prevention strategies to settings where men congregate, such as sports clubs, is particularly important.¹⁴¹

Engaging diverse communities

Some groups within the community experience higher rates of family violence, and can experience more prolonged and severe violence.¹⁴² Factors such as Aboriginality, class, age, sexuality, ethnicity and disability intersect with gender inequality to shape the experience and risk of family violence, as well as access to appropriate responses:

Women’s diverse backgrounds, contexts and life experiences demands a sophisticated, long term commitment to addressing the diverse and intersecting forms of discrimination faced by women and ensure an approach to both prevention and response that is accessible, inclusive and relevant ...¹⁴³

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities

The higher rates of intimate partner violence and child abuse experienced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women makes prevention strategies a critical priority for this group.

The need for community-specific prevention programs for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples was emphasised to the Commission, as was the need for these programs to be designed and implemented by Aboriginal leaders. At a consultation with members of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, the Commission was told about a family violence campaign developed by the community in Mildura:

There was a series of 6 TV ads on local TV in Mildura. They used local people in Mildura, Robinvale, got the attention of those communities because people knew someone on TV. They were run during primetime. They were about elder abuse, younger relationships, early indicators, cyber abuse. They were funded by the Koori Justice Unit as a community safety grant. Makes the community proud.¹⁴⁴

The Commission heard that many Aboriginal people prefer to deal with Aboriginal organisations, as community-managed programs that are community-owned and controlled are better able to engage with communities and respond to trauma.

The Commission heard that under the 2011–12 Department of Justice and Regulation’s Reducing Violence against Women and their Children grants program, $2.4 million was provided for four projects in Koori communities (the Koori Community Safety Grants).¹⁴⁵ There were a number of activities delivered by each of these projects, including the Dilly Bag Programs, Sisters Day Out workshops, Dardi Munwurro youth camps, men’s groups, harmony days, and mediation training.¹⁴⁶ The Australian Institute of Criminology has reviewed progress to date on these four projects. The interim evaluation found that a number of programs demonstrate leading practice in the design of Aboriginal family violence prevention.¹⁴⁷

Lessons from the interim evaluation include the importance of locating the program design in cultural frameworks, and including a mix of targeted and universal activities (a 'one size fits all' approach is not appropriate given the differences between communities).¹⁴⁸ Ensuring adequate implementation time is an important factor, as many project workers are juggling a number of roles and responsibilities.¹⁴⁹

The importance of community-led prevention effort is shown by the results of the National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey (NCAS) which found that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities have a similar attitude to the non-Aboriginal community that family violence is wrong. However, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander respondents were two and a half times more likely to believe that partner violence can be excused where a victim is affected by alcohol (25 per cent compared with nine per cent of the broader community surveyed).¹⁵⁰ The survey also indicates that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander respondents were nearly twice as likely to agree that such violence can be excused if a person is under stress.¹⁵¹

For further discussion see Chapter 26.

Culturally and linguistically diverse communities

The Commission heard that targeted prevention strategies are required for culturally and linguistically diverse communities, and that funding has been limited:

The 'CALD project' ... announced in July 2013 as an initiative of the Foundation to Prevent Violence against Women and their Children (now Our Watch), and again in September 2014 as part of the National Plan's second action plan, remains one of two primary prevention Victoria's Action Plan investments targeting immigrant and refugee communities. Thus far, funding for primary prevention activity in Victorian immigrant and refugee communities has been inadequate, short-term, and ill-timed.¹⁵²

While many CALD communities will be effectively reached by strategies delivered to the population as a whole, there are a number of communities, such as new and emerging communities, or long-standing migrant groups affected by social exclusion, that will require targeted effort.¹⁵³

For respondents born in non-English speaking countries, the NCAS found that while only a relatively small proportion considered family violence to be acceptable, the proportion endorsing attitudes that excuse, trivialise or minimise the problem, or blame the victim, was higher than the broader surveyed community. For example, respondents born in non-English speaking countries were more than three times as likely to agree that family violence can be excused if the victim is heavily affected by alcohol (22 per cent compared with seven per cent of the broader community surveyed).¹⁵⁴

CALD communities are identified as a priority in the NCAS. A recent AMES and VicHealth report, titled Understandings and Actions to Prevent Violence Against Women in CALD Communities was commissioned through the national plan.¹⁵⁵ The report stresses that when planning, developing, implementing and evaluating prevention strategies, the varying cultural, religious, social and economic circumstances of communities need to be considered.¹⁵⁶ It concludes that prevention work in communities requires a rights-based approach that prioritises the safety, agency and empowerment of women, and responds to increasing diversity in the composition of the migration program, as well as geographic diversity in settlement patterns in Australia.

The Commission heard of a number of initiatives that are progressing work with CALD communities with regard to primary prevention. These include the InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence program CALD Communities Leading the Way to Respectful Relationships, which was the state winner of the Australian Crime and Violence Prevention Awards, and worked with Croatian, Indian, Sudanese and Vietnamese communities.¹⁵⁷

The Commission heard that including strategies that focused on women's leadership and empowerment were important elements of a broader prevention strategy.

Recognising the fundamental underlying role of gender inequalities in VAW, efforts to prevent this violence must support the empowerment of CALD women, including by engaging them as leaders in prevention programs and settings.¹⁵⁸

Enhance and foster the leadership of women from immigrant and refugee communities as an integral strategy to build gender equity.¹⁵⁹

Seniors Rights Victoria told the Commission that while elder abuse is not necessarily more common in ethnic communities, older people within these communities 'may be at greater risk or face additional barriers in accessing assistance', including lack of English language skills, cultural influences and smaller family networks.¹⁶⁰ Seniors Rights Victoria highlighted that approximately one-third of people over 65 years of age in Victoria are from CALD backgrounds.¹⁶¹

Faith can also play an important role in the experiences of family violence for some people from CALD communities. The Commission explores the role of faith as an important additional setting for prevention later in this chapter, as well as in Chapter 29.

For further discussion, see Chapter 28.

People with disabilities

As discussed in Chapter 31 evidence shows that women with disabilities face a higher risk of violence than other women and men with disabilities.¹⁶² Our Watch told the Commission that women with disabilities are more vulnerable to family violence due to restricted mobility or dependency on the perpetrator, and/or the fear of being institutionalised.¹⁶³

There is also limited evidence on the effectiveness of prevention and early intervention activities targeted to this group. However, key themes emerging from the available literature include:

- ▶ the need for community awareness-raising to address stereotypes about women with disabilities
- ▶ training for all service providers on the particular needs of this group
- ▶ involvement of women with disabilities in policy development
- ▶ providing women with disabilities with information about family violence, and the need for a standard screening and assessment tool for use by a range of services.¹⁶⁴

The Commission heard that the Gender and Disability Workforce Development Program, developed by Women with Disabilities Victoria, was a good example of a program that aims to improve the quality of gender-sensitive practice among disability workers.¹⁶⁵ A key aspect of this approach has been engagement and training of women with disabilities and professional trainers from women's health and violence response services to deliver jointly the program to disability services.¹⁶⁶ The program is being evaluated, with an initial findings report indicating that there are changes that can be directly attributed to the program.¹⁶⁷

Case study: Gender and disability Workforce Development (Women with Disabilities Victoria)

The Gender and Disability Workforce Development Program is designed to change culture across whole organisations, working with clients, staff, managers and executives.¹⁶⁸ The aim is to improve gender equitable service delivery as a strategy for increasing women's wellbeing and reducing gender based violence. The package is co-delivered by women with disabilities and professionals from relevant sectors.

- ▷ 'I have observed a marked difference in staff approaches to working with women with disabilities, in particular between staff who have completed the training and those that have not. Moving from managing one residential service to another has highlighted this for me.' (Participant)
- ▷ 'We lose insight of gender issues in "individual person centred planning". It needs to remain at the forefront.' (Disability Service Manager)
- ▷ 'It opened my eyes. It flicked a switch and made me more aware.' (Disability Support Worker)
- ▷ 'Reaffirmed the amount of power we have over our clients and how we must be mindful (constantly) how we use it.' (Disability Worker)

The program is targeted to services providing support to women and men with disabilities; one of the findings of the evaluation was that some participants raised that the experience of men with disabilities was a gap within the training.¹⁶⁹

Rural, regional and remote communities

The Commission heard that geographical factors, and social norms and attitudes that are specific to life in these communities significantly shape the experience of family violence and that these need to be considered for prevention strategies to be effective with these communities.¹⁷⁰

Through its consultations, submissions and the hearings the Commission noted an increasing awareness in rural, regional and remote communities of family violence, and a growing commitment to seeking to prevent and respond to it. Specific plans and initiatives, many of these initiated and led by the local communities, were described to the Commission. These are discussed in more detail in Chapter 33.

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people

People who identify as lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender or intersex can face particular patterns of family violence, including violence directed at young people by family members in response to their sexuality or gender diversity, the use or threat of outing, or disclosing a person's HIV status.¹⁷¹

Submissions to the Commission identified that there are very few prevention strategies aimed at people who identify as LGBTI.¹⁷² It is argued that the invisibility of family violence in LGBTI communities within the broader community contributes to this problem.¹⁷³

While Moving Ahead 2013–2016, the second action plan under the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children, addresses family violence in some diverse communities it does not specifically refer to LGBTI communities.¹⁷⁴

The Australian Institute of Criminology report on same-sex partner homicide pointed to the need for a 'more nuanced approach to violence prevention' among same-sex attracted persons, and highlighted the effect of discrimination and marginalisation in increasing the risks for these communities.¹⁷⁵

The Commission also heard that broad-based prevention campaigns need to address LGBTI needs and that the gendered framework often used to discuss family violence does not resonate with the LGBTI community.¹⁷⁶

The most established family violence information program targeted to LGBTI people is the LGBTI Domestic and Family Violence Project run by the AIDS Council of NSW. This project includes a website (Another Closet), which provides information on support services and campaigns.¹⁷⁷

In regard to prevention initiatives in schools, the Healthy Equal Youth Project funds the Safe Schools Coalition Australia, which provides training and resources to schools to become free of homophobia and transphobia.¹⁷⁸ In addition, materials used in respectful relationships education as part of the national curriculum discuss relationships and gender-based violence, including same-sex relationships, diverse experiences of sexuality and homophobia.¹⁷⁹ We discuss Respectful Relationships Education below.

Further discussion is located in Chapter 30.

Older people

The Commission heard that there is very little research on the effectiveness of programs in preventing elder abuse, which in the context of an ageing population, is a critical gap. Family violence against older people can take different forms including intimate partner violence, financial abuse and neglect. As with all family violence, violence against older people tends to be under-reported. As discussed in Chapter 27, specific challenges in responding include a reluctance by some older people to engage the legal system in these circumstances.

Awareness and education campaigns must be inclusive of older people in their messages and imagery to enable the abuse to be recognised for what it is, rather than 'normal' ... Campaigns should also more generally aim to educate the broader community about elder abuse as a form of family violence. Educational 'respect' campaigns should begin in primary schools.¹⁸⁰

Older women are less likely to report violence than younger women, and may be in relationships and social environments in which 'traditional' or conservative norms about violence and gender relations prevail.¹⁸¹ Older women may also have a relatively high degree of economic dependence on their male partners, increasing their vulnerability to violence.¹⁸²

Seniors Rights Victoria submitted that there is an increasing awareness of the hidden levels of sexual violence against older women, and that the system needs to be more responsive to this issue.¹⁸³

A focus on children and young people

The Commission heard that there are sustained benefits in targeting prevention strategies to children and young people.¹⁸⁴ As outlined earlier, research indicates that many of the risk factors for family violence are acquired in childhood. Childhood and adolescence are also stages of life when ideas about and relationships to gender, as well as gender identities, are formed. Intimate relationships outside the immediate family develop during adolescence, and intervention at this life stage can reinforce respectful, non-violent relationships, or change the trajectory of disrespectful ways of relating.¹⁸⁵ Experiences during childhood and adolescence have a powerful influence on behaviour and outcomes in adult life.¹⁸⁶

National research indicates that there is a higher level of tolerance for violence against women and girls among children and young people, than among adults.¹⁸⁷ Young women experience a high prevalence of intimate partner violence when dating and cohabiting. A substantial proportion of men who report perpetrating rape against women or girls did so for the first time before turning 20 years of age.¹⁸⁸

Three recent surveys looking at the attitudes of Australian young people towards violence against women and gender equality found that:

- ▷ most young people believe that violence against women is due to men being unable to manage their anger¹⁸⁹
- ▷ two in five young people agree that 'rape results from men not being able to control their sexual urges' (an increase from 2009, when one in three believed this)
- ▷ a sizable portion of young people surveyed support male dominance in decision-making in relationships.¹⁹⁰

These findings are reinforced by recent research undertaken by the Commonwealth Government to inform a future national campaign to prevent violence against women and their children.¹⁹¹ The research identifies some of the challenges in engaging young people to prevent violence. These include that intimate partner violence is often not 'named' by young people, and young people may have little understanding of its causes.¹⁹²

The research also discusses the 'automatic defences' that impede the ability of young people to prevent intimate partner violence. These defences include automatically blaming victims, minimising the behaviour of men, and a tendency to protect and empathise with men's experience over the experience of women.¹⁹³ The implications of these defences are that some young men's disrespectful and aggressive behaviour goes unchallenged and so is normalised, and in turn some young women accept gender inequality, disrespectful relationships and aggressive behaviour from men as the norm.¹⁹⁴ Mr Lay, informed the Commission that he found the research confronting and highlighted the importance of prevention work with young people.¹⁹⁵

The Commission heard that effective prevention work with children and young people needs to be appropriately tailored to young people's specific concerns, contexts and preferred modes of learning.¹⁹⁶ Prevention strategies should also be delivered in settings that are influential in shaping the attitudes and behaviours of children.¹⁹⁷ Embedding respectful relationships education in schools and recreation settings was consistently raised with the Commission.¹⁹⁸

Prevention work with children and young people also needs to be able to respond effectively when violence occurs and to the ways in which it manifests.¹⁹⁹ The Commission heard about adolescents who use violence against family members, and sibling violence, as growing areas of concern. The Commission also heard that these young people are often victims (or have been victims) of family violence themselves.²⁰⁰ Research also demonstrates the seriousness of sibling conflict, including aggression and violence, which has been linked 'to a wide range of negative youth outcomes'.²⁰¹

Prevention strategies targeting children and young people are discussed in more detail in Chapter 10 and Chapter 23.

The influence of media and popular culture on young people was also a common theme raised with the Commission. The need for increased support for young people to engage critically with popular culture and new media, including critiquing representations of women and girls in the media, is a recommendation of NCAS.²⁰²

Current prevention practice in key settings

Places where people live, work, learn and play, such as schools and workplaces, are key settings for implementing prevention strategies.²⁰³ Evidence to the Commission identified a number of key settings for delivering prevention strategies, which are described below.

Schools

Many people the Commission consulted emphasised the importance of educating children and young people about healthy and respectful relationships.²⁰⁴

There need to be education programs in schools about healthy relationships, bullying, intimate relationships. Teaching boys how to treat girls and women and teaching women what comes under the umbrella of abuse. Needs to be mandatory. Girls don't recognise abuse. You need messages outside the family especially if you are in a violent family.²⁰⁵

I think it should be in schools – they talk about sex education, but they don't talk about family violence. Need to explain that everyday abuse is not OK. It's so common, kids don't know what's right and wrong.²⁰⁶

This message was reinforced when the Commission met with the principals and staff of government secondary schools, the Catholic Education Office, Independent Schools Victoria, and the Australian Education Union. The Commission heard a strong and consistent view that the prevention of family violence, and creating generational change in attitudes to family violence, must start with children and young people. The Commission also heard that violence prevention initiatives targeted to children and young people have been shown to work:²⁰⁷

Respectful relationship education programs that are delivered, predominantly in secondary schools, are ... an important development contributing towards preventing family violence ... These programs successfully introduce concepts around gender that challenge existing rigid gender stereotypes that create inequity and violence supportive attitudes and behaviours. This approach works systemically to prevent family violence through creating cultures that are based on principles of equity and respect. Further extension of this work in both the early childhood and primary school settings is needed to ensure that these important messages are being embedded from an early age and in all phases of development. It would be beneficial for this to be incorporated in to government policy and curriculum development across all education settings.²⁰⁸

Recognising the value of schools as a platform to drive cultural and attitudinal change has long been recognised. In 2006 the Victorian Law Reform Commission in its Review of Family Violence Laws: Report recommended the Victorian Government consider introducing a 'state-wide and consistent education program for Victorian secondary schools on respect in relationships'.²⁰⁹

Schools are a logical environment for prevention action for a number of reasons:

- ▷ Schools are small communities that provide a 'mass and captive audience' for learning about family violence.²¹⁰
- ▷ As well as sites of learning, schools are workplaces, which means that prevention strategies in schools can reach two main population groups: 'students who are at a critical age for forming their attitudes and knowledge, and a diverse teacher and non-teaching workforce'.²¹¹
- ▷ Violence-supportive cultures are evident in some schools, so situating prevention programs in this setting can target these aspects of the school environment.²¹²
- ▷ Delivering prevention programs in schools is relatively cost effective and less stigmatising than other settings.²¹³
- ▷ Violence prevention education generates broader benefits for schools, and children's overall education and development. It can help make schools safe and supportive environments and reduce time and energy spent on conflict resolution and managing disruptive behaviour.²¹⁴
- ▷ Prevention programs delivered in schools reach beyond the immediate school environment—they facilitate partnerships between the school and parents, teachers and counsellors.²¹⁵

The importance of starting in schools and with education was emphasised to the Commission as essential for all communities. Ms Jill Gallagher AO, the Chief Executive Officer of the Victorian Aboriginal Community Controlled Health Organisation, told the Commission that to 'get violence out of our community, keep families together and give kids the best start in life that we can ... we need education':

For example, we need to run programs in our local schools that teach our young men and young women about what respectful relationships are. Already, as teenagers, we see that our young men are displaying behaviours that are disrespectful and we are seeing our young women accepting that behaviour, they think that it's normal but it's ... not part of Aboriginal culture.²¹⁶

The importance of school environments to the lives of children was highlighted by Hue Man Dang, a year 12 student and Hobsons Bay Young Citizen of the Year.

... schools are the main environment, other than their homes, where children spend most of their day, and it is where children learn the life lessons of what is right and wrong. These institutions combined with a healthy relationship program, will shape the normative and secretive culture of domestic violence, into a healthier one. Most importantly, education into domestic violence will allow students, who have experienced or witnessed domestic violence, to identify stressors throughout their life, which will as a result improve their development and overall education. Schools are an oasis for children who live in violent homes, and to make it a better place, we need to make it more supportive and accommodate the young people who are often neglected.

Finally, we need to show students, this is what a healthy relationship looks like, this is where you go to get help, and we need to let them know that they are not alone. The education program should cover things such as: The definition of domestic violence, what constitutes as domestic violence and the warning signs; causes of family violence and abuse; the differences between a healthy and unhealthy relationships; gender stereotypes within intimate relationships; how and where to seek help; if a victim is being abused, it isn't their fault.²¹⁷

Respectful relationships education

In 2009, the then Victorian Department of Education and Early Childhood Development published Respectful Relationships Education: Violence prevention and respectful relationships education in Victorian Secondary Schools.²¹⁸ Developed by VicHealth, the report maps current violence prevention programs in Victorian schools, and identifies the most effective and promising practices in Victoria and elsewhere. The report remains the most comprehensive overview of the evidence relating to school-based primary prevention initiatives.

Prior to 2009, specialist family violence, sexual assault and women's health services primarily delivered these programs, on request by the school. In 2010, the Victorian Government committed to implementing respectful relationships education in schools as part of a multi-setting approach to prevention, under the policy A Right to Respect: Victoria's Plan to Prevent Violence against Women 2010–2020.²¹⁹ While the state policy did not continue, pilots commenced in four Melbourne secondary colleges, based on the good practice criteria outlined in the Respectful Relationships Education report.²²⁰ The pilots ran for 10 weeks and tested two units of curriculum—one designed for year 8, to develop a common understanding of gender, relationships and respect; and one designed for year 9, exploring family violence and sexual assault in the context of power, social and institutional structures, and young people's lives.²²¹

In 2014, following this pilot, an optional AusVELS (now the Victorian Curriculum F–10) curriculum²²² for years 8 and 9, called 'Building Respectful Relationships: Stepping Out Against Gender-based Violence' was released. The curriculum provides 'a set of sequential teaching activities to educate secondary school students about gender, violence and respectful relationships'.²²³

Also in 2014, under the Respectful Relationships Education in Schools project, the Victorian Government provided funding to Our Watch to support up to 30 schools in central, outer eastern and western metropolitan Victoria to implement the Building Respectful Relationships curriculum resource. As a result of the project, 4000 students received respectful relationships education.²²⁴ The project sought to build the capacity of the education system through a suite of professional learning for individual teachers and all school staff.²²⁵ Additionally, three specialist project implementation leaders based in Department of Education and Training regional offices worked closely with the schools.²²⁶ Leadership from departmental Deputy Regional Directors was reported as an essential strategy for principals and schools engaging with the project.²²⁷ Internal school project champions (such as the principal, or the curriculum leader), were seen as essential and the most highly valued external supports were the Department of Education and Training regional office specialist project workers.²²⁸ A particularly valued element of their role, according the evaluation, was the translation of a whole-of-school approach.

The draft evaluation report for the project provided to the Commission said that students demonstrated increased understanding about violence, gender and gender inequality, and were also less likely to trivialise and excuse gender-based violence, or victim blame.²²⁹

As stated in the evaluation however, ‘perhaps the greatest impact of the RREiS pilot was the positive changes in student behaviour’, with 64 per cent of 42 teachers stating that there had been a positive change in classroom behaviour.²³⁰

In addition, the evaluation emphasised that schools need to have better training, and access to referrals for responding to disclosures. Increased disclosures from students, as well as from staff members, was common across all schools in the pilot.²³¹ A common theme through all parts of the evaluation was a strong concern about the lack of staff confidence in where to refer, and how to respond, as well as not having procedures in place.²³² This was particularly the case for those disclosures that fell outside of the mandatory reporting guidelines.²³³

As part of the project, Our Watch will develop a suite of resources that can be used ‘by schools, community organisations, local governments, and the Department’s own regional offices as part of a whole of school approach to assist in building school cultures that support equality and respect’.²³⁴

The Commission notes that there are varying understandings about what constitutes respectful relationships education in a school context. As respectful relationships education is a relatively new field, there is not yet a standard model in the Australian context that can guide policy makers and education departments.²³⁵

The Commission heard that there are currently a number of programs, focused on healthy and respectful relationships, being delivered in schools. Several of these have been delivered over a number of years, and have in the main been developed and delivered by sexual assault, women’s health and family violence services. In addition to the program currently being delivered by Our Watch, other respectful relationships prevention programs include:

- ▷ Sexual Assault Prevention Program in Secondary Schools. An initiative of CASA House, this program includes staff professional development, respectful relationships curriculum for year 9 and 10 students, train-the-trainer workshops for teachers, peer educator programs for older students, and evaluation. It depends on strong, committed partnerships between sexual assault services and schools and has been evaluated²³⁶
- ▷ Solving the Jigsaw. Developed by the Centre for Non-Violence (formally EASE) in 1997, this program includes classroom activities, accredited trainers, and professional development of teachers and others to deliver whole-of-school 20-week program²³⁷
- ▷ Girls Talk/Guys Talk. An initiative of Women’s Health West, this program combines year 9 sexuality education with a World Health Organization whole-of-school approach, a feminist philosophy, and VicHealth’s *Participation for Health: Framework for Action*²³⁸
- ▷ Gippsland Respectful Relationships Education in Schools. An initiative of Gippsland Women’s Health, this program seeks to prevent violence against women by promoting gender equality and reducing adherence to rigid gender roles in school communities²³⁹
- ▷ Respect Protect Connect Program. An evaluated initiative of South Eastern CASA, this program offers workshops for students at all secondary year levels, to build understandings of violence, healthy relationships and respect²⁴⁰
- ▷ Reality and Risk. Run by Brophy Family Community Services, which has developed a range of educational materials to promote critical thinking about pornography, including curriculum resources, teacher-training materials, parent education and audiovisual resources
- ▷ Feeling Safe Together. A South Eastern CASA initiative, this program is delivered in a number of primary schools and focuses on advanced personal safety.²⁴¹

The White Ribbon Foundation also offers a respectful relationship program for schools nationally that includes a professional development program, and works ‘with school leadership to embed models of respectful relationships in school culture and classroom activities’.²⁴²

Strengthening the respectful relationship education program

In August 2015, the Victorian Government announced that in 2016, respectful relationships education will be introduced into the school curriculum from prep to year 10. It will 'focus on challenging negative attitudes such as prejudice, discrimination and harassment that can lead to violence, often against women'.²⁴³

The Secretary of the Department of Education and Training, Ms Gill Callister, told the Commission that successful implementation will require the development of age-appropriate curriculum for these year levels:

We have a number of resources currently, as I said, that will help implement that curriculum. But our most immediate focus is to have some independent assessment of those different resources and look at how we develop something much more specific but more primary appropriate for the foundation to year 6. So there will be resources that are more explicit about gender and more explicit about violence. We think we have some of them, but we want some advice about how to integrate them and build on them utilising what we know now about the year 8, year 9 resources.²⁴⁴

On 14 September 2015, the Victorian Government announced the development of a new state curriculum under the Education State reform agenda.²⁴⁵ The government emphasised to the Commission that support for disengaged and disadvantaged students is a focus of the new reforms, noting that factors such as isolation and poverty can indicate an increased risk of family violence.²⁴⁶ The Education State reform agenda notes that funding will be provided over three years to 'help all government school teachers teach the new Victorian Curriculum—including mandatory new subjects like digital coding and respectful relationships'.²⁴⁷

Victorian government and Catholic schools are required to use the new curriculum for Victoria schools, called the Victorian Curriculum (F–10).²⁴⁸ Independent schools may use the curriculum as a model and resource for the effective implementation of the Australian Curriculum.

Ms Callister gave evidence that there are two areas in the curriculum that address the underlying factors relevant to family violence—Health and Physical Education 'learning area' curriculum, and the Personal and Social 'capability' curriculum. In particular, the curriculums in these two areas address gender stereotypes and norms, power imbalances, and the use of violence or aggression to resolve conflict or express negative emotions.²⁴⁹

Ms Callister further advised that the resources available to assist schools in delivering the curriculum are:

- ▷ Building Respectful Relationships: Stepping Out Against Gender-Based Violence, for years 8, 9 and 10
- ▷ Building Resilience: A model to support children and young people
- ▷ Catching On sexuality education resources.²⁵⁰

The Commission was advised that all Victorian government and Catholic schools will be required to implement the new curriculum, including the content about respectful relationships.²⁵¹ How this is undertaken, including the particular resources used, is a decision for the school.²⁵² Funding has been provided to support government schools to implement the new curriculum, including training for school leadership teams and new staff in regional schools.²⁵³

In December 2015, the Victorian Government announced that a new module for year 10 will be introduced, which includes a focus on sexualisation, pornography and gender, and will build on the respectful relationships modules for years 8 and 9.²⁵⁴ The year 10 curriculum was developed with a view to equipping young people to understand how they can develop a positive sexuality that incorporates respect and the negotiation of free and full consent.²⁵⁵

Dr Flood gave evidence to the Commission about the importance of discussing pornography with young people. Dr Flood described the link between pornography and violence as follows:

There is good evidence ... particularly from research among young adults, that pornography consumption, particularly consumption of violent pornography, is linked to the perpetration of sexual violence; that is that young men, for example, who consume pornography, particularly violent pornography, are more likely to be tolerant of and indeed to perpetrate sexual violence to try to coerce or force a girl or woman into sex, than other young men.²⁵⁶

Similarly, the Jewish Taskforce Against Family Violence told the Commission that

... many young men think that what they see on those sites reflects normal sexual relationships and young women feel coerced into complying with their boyfriends' requests lest they are cast aside ... What is required is funding to provide programs which are, in essence, respectful relationship programs but with an emphasis on how porn demeans women.²⁵⁷

A number of submissions commented on the Reality and Risk project developed by Brophy Family Community Services as a project that is contributing valuable resources, research and curriculum focused on 'engaging young people in thinking critically about pornography'.²⁵⁸

The Victorian Government has also announced continued funding for the Partners in Prevention program, led by Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, which aims to build the capacity of school staff to support schools in delivering respectful relationships education. Community organisations which work with early childhood services and primary and secondary schools are included in the program.²⁵⁹

The Commission understands that the Minister for Education has broad powers under section 5.2.1(2) of the Education and Training Reform Act 2006 (Vic) to issue directions to education institutions. Specifically, section 5.1.2(2)(b) states that the Minister has the power to issue policies, guidelines, advice and directions to education or training institutions in or related to Victoria. In addition, the Minister has the power to set the overall policy for education and training in or related to Victoria.²⁶⁰

In her evidence to the Commission prior to the Victorian Government announcement of the new state curriculum, Ms Callister stated that it may be possible to mandate the inclusion of respectful relationships programs in Victorian schools through use of a Ministerial Direction.²⁶¹

Respectful relationships education in the national curriculum

The inclusion of respectful relationships education in the national curriculum was an agreed action in the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2020.²⁶²

On 18 September 2015, the Education Council, consisting of ministerial representatives from all Australian jurisdictions (and New Zealand), endorsed the contents of the first national school curriculum, from prep to year 10, for Australia.²⁶³ The curriculum includes the following learning areas: English, mathematics, science, humanities and social sciences, the arts, technologies, and health and physical education.²⁶⁴ The health and physical education component of the curriculum includes express reference to respectful relationships, sexuality and safety. The curriculum addresses:

physical, social and emotional changes that occur over time and the significant role relationships and sexuality play in these changes. The content supports students to develop knowledge, understanding and skills that will help them to establish and manage respectful relationships. It also supports them to develop positive practices in relation to their reproductive and sexual health and the development of their identities. In doing so, students will gain an understanding of the factors that influence gender and sexual identities.²⁶⁵

...

[it includes] safety issues that students may encounter in their daily lives. The content supports students to develop knowledge, understanding and skills to make safe decisions and behave in ways that protect their own safety and that of others.²⁶⁶

These topics will be included in the curriculum for all year levels, from prep to year 10.²⁶⁷ State and territory authorities are responsible for implementing the curriculum in their respective jurisdictions, and for the timing of that implementation.²⁶⁸

A whole-of-school approach

The Victorian Government's 2009 Respectful Relationships Education report states that the single most important criterion for effective violence prevention and respectful relationships education in schools is the adoption of a whole-of-school approach.²⁶⁹ This was also a clear message from the Commission's consultations with education and community service providers, researchers and academics:²⁷⁰

The most effective programs – in terms of positive changes to student attitudes/behaviours and to school culture/practices – were those that used a whole-school approach. This meant that prevention of violence was integrated into the curriculum and teacher training, supportive school policies and protocols were developed and widely understood, and school leadership, parents and community organisations were engaged.²⁷¹

A whole-of-school approach requires a prevention program to address four broad areas:

- ▷ curriculum, teaching and learning: curriculum content, pedagogy, resources and outcomes
- ▷ school policy and practices: formal school policies and practices
- ▷ school culture, ethos and environment: informal school culture and ethos (attitudes, values and practices), extracurricular activities, and the social and physical environment
- ▷ partnerships and services: the relationships between school, home and the community.²⁷²

Figure 36.2 Elements of a whole-of-school approach²⁷³

As outlined in the respectful relationships curriculum, a key challenge is for schools to apply the whole-of-school approach comprehensively:

... it may be tempting for educators and others to focus on issues of program content and delivery, and these are undoubtedly important, but more important are the comprehensive involvement of schools in violence prevention.²⁷⁴

The Commission heard that effective implementation of whole-of-school violence prevention approaches requires substantial commitment from schools. Resources and training are one aspect; another challenge is investing the time required to set up the systems and structures to ensure the sustainability of initiatives and their adoption across the whole school and broader school community.²⁷⁵

The Commission heard that there is also a need for both policy and institutional support for a whole-of-school approach, as ‘without support for and commitment to schools-based violence prevention, efforts will be piecemeal, insubstantial, vulnerable and ultimately ineffective.’²⁷⁶ The specialist regional support being provided by the Department of Education and Training, within the current model being tested by Our Watch, was spoken of highly by schools participating in this trial. Feedback from the Our Watch evaluation also reflected that the ‘centralised support and “top down” leadership from Ministers is essential and needs to be sustained’.²⁷⁷

Involving parents is an essential aspect of whole-of-school approaches, as they are one of the ‘critical domains of influence’ on children’s lives.²⁷⁸ A number of submissions raised the importance of including parents in the delivery of school-based prevention programs,²⁷⁹ as well as highlighting the role of schools in changing the attitudes and behaviours of parents.²⁸⁰ Schools and other educational settings play a central role in teaching children and young people about violence against women and how it can be prevented, and provide an environment in which children and young people already living with violence at home or in their relationships may receive support and appropriate referrals.

Schools are also major workplaces and community hubs: the school culture, policies and practices can therefore influence attitudes and behaviours of staff, parents and other adults towards violence, discrimination and stereotyping.²⁸¹ In addition, Our Watch’s recent review of respectful relationships education highlights several ‘infrastructure’ requirements to ensure successful implementation of the whole school model:

- ▷ policy and planning frameworks helping to mainstream respectful relationships education into implementation and school strategic plans
- ▷ programs are supported and included within school global budgets
- ▷ schools engage the right expertise, such as gender and family violence experts
- ▷ the whole school community, including school leadership, teachers, parents/carers and school staff is engaged and supportive.²⁸²

Principles of school-based prevention

Effective implementation is a critical element in the success of school-based prevention programs. Conversely, inadequately resourced programs are ineffective, and in some cases cause harm.²⁸³ An international review of the available evidence undertaken by Our Watch has distilled seven criteria of good practice in schools-based violence prevention programs:²⁸⁴

- ▷ Take a ‘whole-of-school’ approach—recognise that change will not be achieved through classroom learning alone.
- ▷ Address the drivers of gender-based violence—respectful relationships education approaches need to acknowledge the power imbalances that foster gender-based violence in age-appropriate ways.
- ▷ Have a long-term vision and the funding to match—political leadership and sustainable resourcing is required to ensure respectful relationships education is embedded across all schools.
- ▷ Establish mechanisms for collaboration and coordinated effort—working in partnership with specialist services is key to supporting successful implementation in schools. These specialist services will require increased support to respond to disclosures.
- ▷ Ensure integrated evaluation and continual improvement mechanisms are in place—there are currently no longitudinal research studies in Australia to demonstrate the effect of prevention strategies on the prevalence of family violence.
- ▷ Provide resources and support for teachers—well-trained teachers can teach respectful relationships education and promote gender inequality through all their subjects. Teachers will require access to secondary consultation and specialist support when they require advice on how to approach a specific student’s issues or disclosure.
- ▷ Use age-appropriate, interactive and participatory curriculum—curriculum needs to match the developmental age of students, and should be designed to allow for applicability to students of all diverse backgrounds.

Reaching children and young people not in schools

The Commission notes that school-based interventions will not reach all young people. Many young people most at risk of perpetrating or experiencing family violence may not be engaged with formal educational institutions. School-based interventions therefore need to be complemented by interventions targeted to children who do not attend school.²⁸⁵

The need for joined-up approaches across prevention and response settings for children and young people was emphasised:

The historical focus of work in this area with children and young people has been on responding to existing violence and (more recently) on intervening early. As a result, early intervention and response programs and systems exist in a number of settings and across jurisdictions nationwide. A key challenge and opportunity lies in ensuring a ‘joined up’ approach, so that children and young people who experience violence are not only respected, supported and encouraged in their own efforts to overcome its impacts – but that all children and young people in Australia grow up with the skills to build healthy relationships and reject violence.

Education, health and social services departments can play a key role in ensuring and/or strengthening such a coordinated and holistic approach between primary prevention, early intervention and response initiatives with this age group.²⁸⁶

The Commission heard that from 2016, the Victorian Government will fund new initiatives responding to children and young people who are disengaged from schooling.²⁸⁷ These strategies included new Lookout Centres, working with children in out-of-home care,²⁸⁸ and the 'Navigator' initiative, which will provide specialist support workers to maintain regular contact with disengaged young people.²⁸⁹ These initiatives are discussed in Chapter 10.

Tertiary institutions

There is limited prevention work currently undertaken in Victorian universities. The Commission heard that Monash University is participating in the White Ribbon Workplace Accreditation Pilot Project and has a focus on promoting gender equity; and La Trobe University includes a focus on respectful relationships through their Living Well student counselling and education program.²⁹⁰ Compared to universities in the United States however, where sexual violence prevention programs are a common feature of induction for first-year students, this area is underdeveloped.²⁹¹ Dr Flood informed the Commission that the international evidence is positive with regard to the effect of these programs, and a 'systemic rollout in Australia' should be considered.²⁹²

Our Watch submitted that the university setting offers unique opportunities to implement prevention activities, with potential to drive whole-of-campus activities, link to associated professional development for relevant university educators, develop tools for students to engage in respectful relationships and take bystander action, and reach a number of businesses who are onsite at the university.²⁹³

The Department of Education and Training informed the Commission of relevant work in the area of vocational and higher education, including standards and guidelines that recognise that students attending vocational training and higher education settings may be experiencing family violence.²⁹⁴

The Commission also heard that Victoria University, working in partnership with Victoria police, relevant experts, and local support services, is developing a Respect and Responsibility policy that includes professional development for university staff and students, and bystander strategies.²⁹⁵ A key driver of this policy was VU acknowledging 'the prevalence and impact of violence against women on individuals, communities and our society in general' and understanding 'our responsibility, as a public institution, to support those who have experienced this violence'.²⁹⁶

Given individual students can be with us for a number of years, an opportunity is created for the University to undertake activity which raises awareness of the unacceptable nature of violence against women and provides students with the necessary behaviours and skills to reject this violence, as they progress into the broader community.²⁹⁷

The role of universities in incorporating an understanding of family violence into curriculum and pre-service training is discussed in Chapter 40.

Local government

For many years, local government has been a key setting for mobilising local communities to prevent family violence.²⁹⁸ Local councils have broad reach and access to members of the community who may be otherwise hard to reach, such as people with disabilities, people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, and Aboriginal people. Local councils are also major employers, and in rural and regional areas are often the largest employer in the whole local government area and are therefore ideally positioned to implement workplace-based prevention initiatives.²⁹⁹

The Commission received over 26 submissions from local government, and 29 local governments were represented at community consultations. These representatives told the Commission about numerous programs and initiatives undertaken by local councils or by councils in partnership with the Victorian Government, aimed at preventing family violence.³⁰⁰

A number of councils mentioned the statewide capacity-building program funded by the Victorian Government through the Municipal Association of Victoria, which provides expert advice and support to all local councils relevant to prevention initiatives.³⁰¹ The Commission also learnt about funded partnerships between VicHealth and local governments.³⁰²

In 2009, the Victorian Government funded the Preventing Violence Against Women Local Clusters Project, which involved the Outer Eastern Metropolitan Cluster, Maribyrnong City Council and the Mount Alexander Shire Council. An overview of this project is presented in the case study below.

Some councils are members of family violence regional integration committees, and the Commission heard that councils are also involved in forming Children and Youth Area Partnerships, which are aimed at better addressing child and youth vulnerability.³⁰³ These partnerships are discussed in Chapter 10.

The Commission understands that a significant number of councils currently include activities to address violence against women or family violence in their 2013–17 Municipal Public Health and Wellbeing Plans.³⁰⁴ A number of submissions received by the Commission include a recommendation that the Victorian Public Health and Wellbeing Plan should mandate the inclusion of family violence prevention programs in municipal plans.³⁰⁵

In addition to specific, targeted programs that look to prevent and respond to family violence, many local governments have made efforts to promote the prevention of family violence and violence against women in the broader community. This includes programs and strategies that aim to reduce gender inequality at a community and organisational level. Maribyrnong City Council, for example, introduced the She's Game program in 2015 which sought to increase the participation of women and girls in local sporting clubs.³⁰⁶

In 2012, the City of Ballarat endorsed the City of Ballarat Community Charter for the Prevention of Violence Against Women.³⁰⁷ This charter aims to:

highlight the need for a community approach to prevention, gather support for action that reduces violence against women and inspire people to act at an individual and community level to eliminate the attitudes that support violence. Approximately 3000 residents have signed 'The Charter' since its launch in October 2012. The Charter has not been formally evaluated, however its exposure to the community in a wide variety of settings (including education, business and community) has allowed for a community conversation and greater understanding of the extent of violence against women.³⁰⁸

Like the City of Ballarat, many local governments have created a plan for the prevention of family violence. For example, Brimbank City Council has worked to implement the Brimbank Family Violence Prevention Action Plan (2010–2013), which outlines 'a whole-of-Council approach to create a respectful, gender equitable and violence-free community in the municipality'.³⁰⁹

As discussed further in Chapter 37, many local governments have sought to make their own organisations more aware of preventing and recognising family violence. In 2010, Surf Coast Shire Council introduced a family violence clause into their Enterprise Bargaining Agreement allowing up to 20 days of paid leave for staff experiencing family violence.³¹⁰ Other local governments have adopted this clause and/or have sought to make their employees more aware of family violence and how it may be affecting not only the community but their own staff as well.

Case study: Preventing Violence Against Women Local Clusters Project

The evaluation of the Victorian Government Preventing Violence Against Women Local Clusters Project,³¹¹ initiated in 2009, has provided information to inform further investment in place-based initiatives. The project's aims were to embed cultural change in local governments to mainstream gender equity across policy and programs, and build skills in local governments and their communities to promote respectful relationships and non-violent norms. An evaluation was undertaken by the Australian Institute of Criminology. Positive findings included:

- ▷ increased understanding and awareness of the severity and prevalence of violence against women and its underlying causes among council staff
- ▷ the capacity of council staff to promote gender equitable relationships and non-violent norms improved
- ▷ the project was innovative in both its design and approach to preventing violence against women, particularly in terms of the role of local government.

The evaluation concluded that local government should continue to take a leadership role in the delivery of prevention initiatives. The evaluation however reported a number of barriers to successful implementation. These included insufficient senior management 'buy-in' across the local councils, due to inadequate project management resourcing. The original intent of other mutually reinforcing programs were to be included (such as programs in schools and workplaces) did not eventuate, due to state government funding decisions. There was also wide variation across councils around the selection of particular activities, resulting in difficulty measuring any cumulative impact.³¹²

Place-based initiatives

Place-based initiatives are collaborations between government (often local government) and a local community, including businesses, service providers and community groups. The Commission heard about place-based prevention initiatives which harnessed community effort by establishing trust and respect, and recognising the existing of cultural practices that may 'assist (or hinder) the change process'.³¹³ The Rotary Club of Maryborough submitted that the community needs to accept that change is required³¹⁴ and that the Victorian Government should then actively support local campaigns to progress change.³¹⁵

Mr Jeremy Hearne, Manager of Prevention, North and Inner North at cohealth, also told the Commission that place-based initiatives must be targeted to the local community, and engage with the community where 'they are ready to start the conversation'.³¹⁶ This was the approach of New Zealand's It's not OK program:

The idea is we will support local communities to be able to pick that up and drive that themselves. So it's really taking a linking national to local kind of approach. The community mobilisation or community action is about local communities who what to do something about family violence but are not sure where to start or what to do, and the campaign team will help support them in terms of identifying where their community is at, what they are ready for, what are the right messages, what's going to work, what might work in this community.³¹⁷

The Commission heard that while place-based approaches may be diverse, the principles underpinning them should be consistent.

Local and regional knowledge is essential in ensuring successful community led approaches based on universal principles which are tailored to specific areas and populations. These should build on pre-existing networks and communities of interest and engage local leaders and influencers from a range of sectors, including community, health, education, business, sport and agriculture, essentially engaging mainstream partners.³¹⁸

Implementing a whole-of-community approach to preventing violence against women: Lessons from effective practice

The Australian Institute of Criminology was commissioned by the then Victorian Department of Human Services' Office of Women's Affairs to prepare a guide for agencies, such as local government, implementing whole-of-community strategies to prevent violence against women.

The guide was developed following a comprehensive literature review, a small number of focus groups and workshops, and a review and analysis of past evaluations of the Preventing Violence Against Women in our Community Project. Because research specific to whole-of-community approaches to preventing violence against women is limited, the Institute also drew on community-based programs for other social problems such as 'health disorders (eg childhood obesity), child abuse and neglect and criminal offending (eg alcohol-related violence)'.³¹⁹

The guide defined 11 principles, based on best-practice evidence, for the design, implementation, delivery and management of a whole of community approach.

1. Communities should be selected on the basis that they are ready to receive, support and participate in the program.
2. The operation of the program should be overseen by a high-level governance body comprised of representatives from key program agencies who have delegated authority and have demonstrated their willingness and ability to work together.
3. Prior to implementing the program, it is important to develop an accurate understanding of the nature, extent and causes of VAW [violence against women] (determinants and contributing/protective factors) in the community being targeted.
4. Program staff and coordinators should attempt to collaborate with a range of key partners and in key settings in a range of capacities. Key partners should be selected on the basis they have a role to play in preventing VAW, have demonstrated their willingness and ability to work together, and their culture is consistent with the key aims and messages of the program.
5. Identify the level of community engagement required to drive the program, and the tools and methods that will be used to facilitate this process.
6. Involve men as leaders, participants and advocates and approach them as partners in addressing VAW rather than simply as the cause.
7. Appropriate strategies should be identified early in the program period and supported and maintained throughout the program period.
8. All aspects of the program should be deliverable with the available resources.
9. Responses that target key determinants, contributing and protective factors for VAW, are supported by evidence of effectiveness and are relevant to the intended audience.
10. Plan for evaluation from the start of the program period and identify short-term and intermediate outcomes that are attributable to the program.
11. Plan for program sustainability by ensuring that the program is implemented in accordance with evidence-based principles, identifying opportunities for ongoing funding throughout the life of the program and embedding the program in core work undertaken by program partner agencies.³²⁰

Source: Based on Australian Institute of Criminology report produced to the Commission by the Department of Premier Cabinet.³²¹

The Commission heard about several examples of place-based initiatives to prevent family violence within local communities.

Generating equality and respect project

The Generating Equality and Respect pilot is a place-based model funded by VicHealth, which commenced in 2012. The program was delivered over three years through a partnership between VicHealth, Monash City Council and MonashLink Community Health Service. Previous VicHealth investments have focused on prevention efforts within 'single' settings, such as in local councils, in workplaces and in sporting clubs. GEAR was designed as a 'saturation' model, providing one community with many mutually reinforcing programs. Its goals included to:

- ▷ build communities, cultures and organisations that are gender equitable and value and support non-violent norms
- ▷ foster respectful and equal relationships between men and women
- ▷ realise sustainable primary prevention through strong collaboration with established and new partners
- ▷ pilot an innovative model for the primary prevention of violence against women that is transferable and informs practice.³²²

Over the life of the program, prevention activities focused on the suburb of Clayton and included:

- the Baby Makes 3 program, for first time parents delivered through Maternal Child Health Services
- an organisational change program at MonashLink Community Health Service and Monash City Council to promote respect and equality within the workplace, which will be extended into the broader community through the programs and services they deliver
- a suite of training has been delivered to more than 700 participants including the VicHealth Preventing Violence Against Women Short Course and Leaders' Masterclass
- a local Monash Partners in Prevention Network to actively support youth practitioners to deliver good practice respectful relationships education and promote gender equality through their programs and services. Network members include local teachers, police, school nurses, youth services and community organisations
- Robert Bosch Australia, a significant employer in Clayton, is a partner in the program and has joined forces with Monash Council, MonashLink Community Health Service and VicHealth to raise awareness of family violence and respectful relationships for its male and female employees. The Clayton headquarters of Robert Bosch Australia is a home for awareness raising and training activities integrated into existing staff health and HR programs over the next six months.³²³

The evaluation of GEAR found that having effective gender equity processes in place within lead organisations is a necessary prerequisite to work in external settings. In effect, prior to undertaking work with communities, organisations needed to 'get their own house in order':

Of the settings included in the Program those that attained most depth were the two organisational partners. Having mature and embedded gender equity processes in place within lead organisations is a necessary prerequisite to work in external settings, and in particular communities and or/sites.³²⁴

This element was emphasised in research underpinning the development of the GEAR model which indicated that leadership was a key ingredient in place based interventions: 'if there's no authority or buy-in, there's no reach'.³²⁵ The GEAR evaluation also found that leadership within a place-based intervention requires organisational and partnership agency backing, with links to specialist support and expert partners to build credibility. In addition, the evaluation reinforced that as a prevention to place based prevention, a well-functioning violence against women response system was a prerequisite.³²⁶

Go Goldfields

The Central Goldfields Council has developed a strategy to address disadvantage within the Central Goldfields Shire. The Go Goldfields Alliance is the committee tasked with implementing the strategy. The Alliance includes a Family Violence Action Group, which has developed the Central Goldfields Family Violence Strategy. The strategy covers prevention, early intervention/detection, tertiary response and capacity building.³²⁷ Prevention actions include:

- ▷ funding a maternal and child health nurse to consider prevention and early detection strategies in rural communities
- ▷ training service providers to recognise family violence
- ▷ using a White Ribbon event to raise community awareness of family violence.³²⁸

The evaluation report for the first stage of the Go Goldfields program, states in relation to family violence that:

Go Goldfields has produced a Family Violence Position Statement to acknowledge that family violence is a community issue and there is collective responsibility to take action against it. Apart from Council, there have been no other signatories. This indicated that more work is required to fully engage the Go Goldfields Alliance in the family violence work.³²⁹

SAFE

Maryborough Rotary told the Commission that it decided to take action on family violence because the Maryborough region has 'one of the highest rates of family violence in the state'.³³⁰ After consulting with their local council and groups like Go Goldfields, Maryborough Rotary developed the SAFE model to change community attitudes about family violence:

... everyone has a responsibility to act and a role to play in addressing family violence. SAFE would provide an umbrella to coordinate community messaging [about family violence] and work with the district's support services and partner organisation networks. Central to the social change model was its communications and marketing strategy.³³¹

One of the club's first steps was to 'make a public statement in the form of a White Ribbon oath, pledging to take a stand against family violence and to become strong advocates for its eradication'.³³² Mr Garry Higgins, Membership Director of Maryborough Rotary, argued that this experience 'seeded the motivation to put words into action'.³³³

Since the SAFE program was launched in January 2015, education programs have been rolled out in workplaces, sporting groups, schools and the general community. Initiatives include:

- ▷ preparing and disseminating wallet cards with information and advice about where to get help³³⁴
- ▷ sponsoring a message campaign that used local transport company truck signage to spread the campaign message
- ▷ working with sporting clubs to get the SAFE messages to target groups like young males
- ▷ funding overseas travel for vocation scholarships to benchmark best-practice family violence projects in overseas communities³³⁵
- ▷ sponsoring bystander projects to help people know what to do if they are aware of or witness someone subject to or perpetrating violent behaviour. These were delivered through onsite workplace education.³³⁶

Mr Higgins stated to the Commission that as a result of the SAFE project, there is greater awareness of family violence in the Maryborough community and this has influenced decisions made by local government and service providers. A group has been established to promote collaboration in delivering community focused services, and there is a plan to establish a family violence project in the shire with a dedicated worker. Reporting of family violence has also increased.³³⁷

Workplace and organisational settings

Workplaces are an important site for family violence prevention and response strategies. Women's experience of violence in the home affects the workplace in many ways, and workplaces can play a direct role in supporting victims of existing violence. Workplaces can support victims through providing access to services and a safe place away from home, and through providing family violence leave. Workplaces can also reduce the future harm of violence by supporting women to retain employment. Being unemployed can contribute to keeping women 'stuck' in violent situations as they lack the financial autonomy to leave.³³⁸

Workplaces are settings that provide significant opportunity to reach large sections of the population, as well as unique potential to reach and support vulnerable or isolated groups. For newly arrived immigrant or refugee women, the workplace may be the only contact with systems of support beyond their own families.³³⁹

Organisations and organisational cultures are increasingly recognised as having significant potential to influence and shape social norms, through modelling respectful behaviours and reinforcing gender equitable and non-violent cultures.³⁴⁰ Workplaces can play a key role in building people's capacity to challenge sexist, discriminatory and bullying behaviours and cultures. Active bystander training has been identified as an important aspect of all prevention initiatives undertaken in workplaces and organisations.³⁴¹

As with all prevention activity, organisational change is not a short-term exercise, and each organisation is likely to face different issues. A key finding from an interim evaluation of workplace partnerships in the western region of Melbourne titled United: Working Together to Prevent Violence in the West highlights the need to engage senior management to implement prevention strategies effectively in the workplace.³⁴²

The role of workplaces is further discussed in Chapter 37.

Sports settings

Sports clubs are accessed by a large segment of the community and so are a key setting for promoting prevention and gender equity equality programs. They can also be primary sites for reinforcing negative community attitudes about women, and some sporting environments may increase the risk that men associated with them will perpetrate violence.³⁴³ Recent media reports of women being harassed by prominent sportsmen highlight the need to target sport settings for prevention activities.

The Commission heard that sports clubs have an important role to play in influencing the behaviour of men and boys.

In part, sport has been identified as a setting for primary prevention as a result of the number of high-profile incidents of sexual assault and violence against women, and also because of the sexist peer norms that are often associated with male-dominated sports (Dyson & Flood, 2008). This has been described as 'group disrespect', a phenomenon which includes rude and aggressive behaviour, consumption of pornography, and encouragement of group drinking at both individual and group levels (Rosen et al., 2003).³⁴⁴

Some of the most well-developed workplace initiatives aimed at men have taken place among athletes in male-dominated sporting workplaces.³⁴⁵ Both the Australian Football League and the National Rugby League have developed violence prevention programs for their athletes and the wider communities associated with these sports. The AFL's Respect and Responsibility initiative was developed with VicHealth in consultation with violence prevention agencies, and launched in 2005. The initiative includes changes to AFL rules regarding violent behaviour, education of players and officials, development of model policies and procedures, and a public education program.³⁴⁶

In 2015, the Commonwealth Government provided funding for a Sports Grants program, managed by Our Watch, to 'facilitate violence prevention activities in the sporting community and embed gender equality and respectful relationships into their networks and communities'.³⁴⁷ The AFL, NRL, Netball Australia and Australian Rugby Union will each receive $250,000 over a three-year period to participate in the program, and will contribute their own additional funding to demonstrate their commitment.³⁴⁸

Dr Sue Dyson, Associate Professor and Principal Research Fellow at the Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society, La Trobe University, evaluated the AFL Victoria program Fair Game Respect Matters, a program that works with clubs to create socially inclusive environments and promoting gender equitable programs and environments behaviours.³⁴⁹ Dr Dyson spoke to the Commission about the longer-term outcomes that such programs can deliver:

Early changes that I observed in clubs were superficial. Women in clubs were consulted about what would make the club more welcoming for them. From this emerged simple solutions like cleaning up the female facilities, installing baby change tables, and decentering the bar – which was usually at the centre of the club rooms where (mainly male) social gatherings occurred. By making simple physical changes, more women started to see the club as welcoming and stayed for longer rather than dropping their children at training and leaving. These clubs focused on becoming family-friendly as well as on encouraging equal and respectful relationships ... Six years on, we can see more complex, nuanced changes that have emerged in the culture of clubs and the structure of the organisation. Women have asserted themselves in a range of roles and are making themselves heard in operations, such as decision making and in a range of (often non-traditional) on- and off-field positions. Structural change has also been implemented at the head office of AFL Victoria: policy changes have been introduced and social responsibility mainstreamed into every aspect of the sport, so equal and respectful relationships have become part of training for coaches, umpires and development staff who work in schools and with Indigenous and multicultural communities.³⁵⁰

Bystander intervention

A bystander is somebody who observes an act of violence, discrimination or other unacceptable or offensive behaviour. Bystander action refers to actions taken by a person or persons who is not the victim or perpetrator of violence to identify, speak out about, or seek to engage others in responding to specific incidents of violence and/or behaviours, attitudes, practices or policies that contribute to violence.³⁵¹

Bystander action can have different objectives. While some forms of bystander action require intervention in violent incidents, others challenge the social norms and attitudes that perpetuate violence in the community.

Bystander training is a prevention approach that is increasingly being adopted by sports teams. Research undertaken with professional male athletes in the AFL highlights the value of this work, but it also raises some significant challenges. The research indicates that while many men are willing to raise concerns when others express disrespectful attitudes or behaviours towards women, there were substantial numbers that were hesitant or unwilling to do so:³⁵²

... it depends on who the comment was said to. Like you know if someone said to a random girl walking past something super-derogatory, you'd just have to [say] 'What was that? I don't know if I liked that at all'. But you know, if we're just in here and someone just makes a joke about someone's mum or wife, or something like that, the boys just generally laugh it off.³⁵³

Some of the reasons given by men for not responding to disrespectful behaviour include:

- ▷ fear of not belonging to the group
- ▷ being young and lacking in confidence
- ▷ concerns about the implications of intervening
- ▷ homosocial codes of silence, that is, 'what happens on the end of season trip stays on the end of season trip'.³⁵⁴

The Commission heard that this research reinforces the need for prevention interventions to be appropriately tailored to the existing culture of the specific organisational, sporting or workplace context.³⁵⁵

Sport is also a useful way to reach particular communities. The Commission heard of an indoor soccer program in Whittlesea that works with Iranian men, providing targeted respectful relationships training 'adjusted to incorporate a human rights, legal education and settlement lens'.³⁵⁶

The Municipal Association of Victoria told the Commission that local and state governments have particular leverage with sports clubs given the funding they contribute to sport and recreation associations. Local councils, in particular, intersect regularly with these associations.

There are a number of programs directed at improving the participation of women and girls in sporting activities.³⁵⁷ While these may not be specifically aimed at reducing family violence, they may contribute to doing so. The Commission heard about the Active Women and Girls Policy introduced by Moreland City Council in 2009. The policy is directly linked to sporting ground allocations, and any club wanting to access community-owned facilities for their sports teams must demonstrate the role girls and women have at their clubs. Moreland City Council has seen a substantial increase in participation by girls and women since the implementation of the policy.³⁵⁸

The Gender Lens for Leisure project, led by Knox City Council, has produced a 'suite of recommendations' for the council's three outer east leisure services teams (Knox, Maroondah and Yarra Ranges) around identifying 'the ways in which leisure services can support the equal participation, inclusion and respect of women and girls in sport and recreation activities'.³⁵⁹

Media and popular culture

The normalisation and acceptance of violence against women portrayed in media, is a factor contributing to violence against women.³⁶⁰ The media is therefore an important site for influencing the prevention of violence,³⁶¹ and many submissions received by the Commission highlighted their important role.³⁶² Other submissions suggested that building awareness does not necessarily lead to changed behaviour: 'The recent increase in media exposure and awareness is making the public more aware but unfortunately awareness is not transferring into a change of perceptions or attitudes'.³⁶³ Mr Joe Calafiore, Chief Executive Officer of the Transport Accident Commission also commented on the media's 'important and a critical role in influencing debate, [both] good and bad'.³⁶⁴

In 2015, the Victorian Government released Working with News and Social Media to Prevent Violence Against Women and their Children: A strategic framework for Victoria (2015).³⁶⁵ Developed by Domestic Violence Victoria, the framework makes it clear that accurate news coverage and engaged social media interaction around family violence makes a positive contribution to prevention efforts.³⁶⁶ The framework emphasises the need for:

- ▷ accuracy in reporting
- ▷ challenging common myths
- ▷ ensuring women's experiences of violence are accurately and sensitively communicated.³⁶⁷

The Commission also heard about the Eliminating Violence Against Women Media Awards, first funded by VicHealth through Domestic Violence Victoria.³⁶⁸ The EVAs honour journalists for excellence in reporting on violence against women, and include guidance and training for journalists. In 2014, the EVAs became the Our Watch Awards, with Our Watch continuing to coordinate the awards annually. The Commission heard that these awards have made a positive contribution to more responsible journalism, and are a successful incentive-based approach to prevention.³⁶⁹

A recent current 'state of knowledge' review by ANROWS regarding media representation of violence against women and their children has further contributed to understanding the media's role and influence around family violence.³⁷⁰ The review highlights:

- ▷ the frequency with which stories about violence against women are sensationalised
- ▷ over-reporting on incidents where the perpetrator is female
- ▷ the propagation of myths such as 'stranger danger'
- ▷ how the media can reinforce victim blaming by providing excuses for perpetrators.³⁷¹

Another initiative that has received positive attention is the Media Advocacy Project, which 'empowers women by giving them the tools to tell their stories so that they are heard and understood'.³⁷² The statewide service Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre has operated the program over several years. The Commission also heard that a number of women's health and family violence services run similar programs as part of their media advocacy.³⁷³

The importance of strong engagement between specialist family violence services and the media, particularly local media, was emphasised to the Commission as a way to ensure that the media makes a positive contribution to preventing violence against women.³⁷⁴ The Commission also heard positive examples of local Aboriginal community family violence prevention initiatives working in partnership with local media, in particular the Mallee District Aboriginal Service's Community Safety Project TV advertisements.³⁷⁵

Faith-based contexts

Faith communities are places where people 'learn their values, experience community [and] practise their gender relationships' and are therefore, as much as any other setting, a space to target prevention strategies.³⁷⁶

The Commission heard several examples of faith and spiritual leaders responding to and preventing family violence in the community. As noted in Chapter 29, the Anglican Diocese of Melbourne launched Anglicans Helping to Prevent Violence against Women in 2011, which is a primary prevention model that seeks to build 'a culture of equal and respectful gender relationships in Anglican organisations and local churches'.³⁷⁷ Another model was the CHALLENGE Family Violence project, an interfaith collaboration involving three local governments (City of Casey, Cardinia Shire Council and City of Greater Dandenong), and Monash Health.³⁷⁸ A component of this model focuses on influential male community leaders 'promoting ... gender equity and challenging sexism [and] male privilege ... within their spheres of influence'.³⁷⁹

The Anglican Diocese of Melbourne submission emphasised to the Commission that preventing family violence requires sustained work, commitment and resourcing, as 'challenging deeply engrained norms ... affect how women are viewed and treated, individually and systemically'.³⁸⁰

Women's voices are largely silent in my church except in the choir, Sunday School and women's groups. Women seeking a voice have to counter the many theological arguments – based on Biblical interpretation – advanced to deny women access to church leadership. What is worse, women like me who strive to break with tradition find themselves in many instances without the support of their own gender in their struggle.³⁸¹

The Commission heard that providing faith leaders with sustained support and training was essential.

Active bystander training, coaching and peer mentoring all assist leaders to develop a deeper understanding of the issues involved in prevention work and builds capacity for change at a structural and cultural level. One-off awareness raising sessions that are not linked to training, are the least effectual in terms of bringing about any significant change to attitudes or behaviour.³⁸²

Faith-based communities and family violence are discussed further in Chapter 29.

Challenges and opportunities

A consistent message to the Commission in evidence and submissions was the need for an integrated, system-wide approach to primary prevention, which encompasses governance mechanisms, funding and resources, and provides a framework to address all forms of family violence.

The absence of a primary prevention strategy

Many submissions articulated the need for a statewide strategy to prevent all forms of family violence.³⁸³ For example, Darebin City Council submitted that ‘without leadership, a state policy commitment and plan to implement primary prevention actions, our [prevention] efforts are greatly diminished’.³⁸⁴ In its submission, the State of Victoria recognised that ‘Victoria needs a consistently applied and resourced prevention framework with both universal and targeted programs’.³⁸⁵

The Commission heard that while increased awareness of the need for prevention programs has led to innovation, in the absence of such a framework, the standards guiding these programs and broader benefits of these programs are unknown.

The Chief Executive Officer of Domestic Violence Victoria, Ms Fiona McCormack observed:

What we’ve got now, family violence is like the flavour of the day, and we get every man and his dog claiming “oh yes we do prevention, we do prevention”. We get civic groups saying: “We’re starting a website, we’re doing this for women, or we’re doing this for men”. People who have absolutely no qualifications, expertise, they’re people in the community. If we’re going to prevent violence against women we actually need the community, but without a policy framework that says “in Victoria this is what informs our approach, and this is where we’re heading”, it’s very difficult to hold those organisations to account, or even bring them in under the umbrella, in the fold, which is what is needed.³⁸⁶

The Commission heard, for example, that the diversity of respectful relationships programs currently available to schools presents challenges:

As public awareness of family violence has grown, many community members have become interested in working with young people on the topic, developing their own modules and engaging directly with schools. This process is not guided by any central coordinating body, accreditation process, or minimum standards, and as such the style, content and quality of programs vary considerably. Some programs are not informed by current research, and may promote ideas about gender and violence which are confusing or harmful.³⁸⁷

The Commission heard that a statewide prevention policy and corresponding plan should be informed by research on best practice and implemented across key settings, as outlined in the previous section of this chapter, and that it should be supported by strong infrastructure. The infrastructure most commonly identified in the evidence before the Commission was:

- ▷ leadership and governance mechanisms at all levels
- ▷ funding and resources
- ▷ a framework that addresses all forms of family violence
- ▷ a trained prevention workforce
- ▷ evaluation and monitoring.

The Commission heard that prevention strategies must address gender inequality, as well as being linked to other policy agendas related to family violence:

Prevention of violence against women activity should be conceptualised as having ‘common cause’ with policy and practice agendas to end alcohol abuse, redress socio-economic disadvantage or prevent violence against children, for instance, and should seek to inform and strengthen such agendas (and be informed and strengthened by them).³⁸⁸

In the same vein the World Health Organization reported that there is little coordination between programs and research agendas on child abuse, alcohol and substance misuse, and intimate partner and sexual violence and yet ‘all of these problems regularly affect families, predictably with greater frequency in economically disadvantaged communities where there is often also greater inequality between women and men’.³⁸⁹

Submissions emphasised the importance of ensuring that there was an effective support system to back up prevention strategies:

Primary prevention can often be associated with a surge in service demand and police reporting and referrals, as community awareness about violence against women increases, the topic loses its ‘taboo’ status, and women experiencing violence become more aware of their rights to live free from violence.³⁹⁰

Leadership and governance

Strong government leadership and policy around prevention is urgently required.³⁹¹

Active engagement and formal support from leaders at all levels of government, non-government organisations, and private sector agencies was cited as essential to ensuring the development and implementation of a statewide prevention strategy. Dr Dyson described the need for ‘authorising environments’ to champion and propel change:

... those formal and informal bodies and significant individuals that provide legitimacy and support for a particular issue or area. These might include governments, community organisations and non-government organisations, religious leaders, senior managers, published research based evidence, high profile advocates, the media and many others that have an influence on public opinion.³⁹²

Dr Dyson emphasised that the ‘importance of authorising environments at all levels cannot be overstated as the foundation’ of effective prevention strategies.³⁹³ She told the Commission that two key factors for success emerge from evaluations of sexuality and relationships programs in Australia: ‘active leadership from the school principal and high-quality training for teachers’.³⁹⁴

There was a focus in the evidence on the fundamental role of the Victorian Government in creating the conditions for other organisations to drive change.³⁹⁵

Ms Helen Campbell, Chair of the Eastern Metropolitan Regional Family Violence Partnership, told the Commission that clarity from government is required to support services working more effectively together.

We will do everything within our power to build those relationships and partnerships at a regional level. But at the same time we all need the same shared authorising environment which stipulates a very clear and unequivocal statement of what safety looks like and means for every single service sector in the state.³⁹⁶

In terms of regional leadership and planning for prevention, the Commission heard that women’s health services have played a substantial role in building regional partnerships with local government, specialist and community organisations, and most now have published regional prevention plans.³⁹⁷

The Women's Health Services Leading Regional Action to Prevent Violence Against Women and Children 2013–2015 project was developed by the Women's Health Association of Victoria (WHA) and funded by the Department of Health and Human Services.³⁹⁸ The statewide service Women's Health Victoria, is the lead agency and coordinator of the project and will play a primary role in ensuring the guidelines are maintained and updated and that the tools and resources are current and evidence based.

The project aims to support a consistent and coordinated approach to primary prevention activities across Victoria, with outcomes including a new online hub, called Equality and Safety for Women, that brings together information, evidence, tools, resources and best practice examples to support planning, implementation and measurement of primary prevention efforts in the Victorian regional context.³⁹⁹ The online hub was launched in late 2015. A guide has been prepared to assist those preparing regional plans, and the Victorian Government has funded Women's Health Victoria to appoint a person to support the preparation of these plans.⁴⁰⁰

Women's Health West Inc. described to the Commission how their regional prevention plan, Preventing Violence Together has contributed to a better coordinated prevention system:

... as a result of their participation in the United project, 100 per cent of Preventing Violence Together partners have integrated primary prevention and/or gender equity into significant organisational and community planning documents (including integrated health promotion plans and municipal public health plans). This demonstrates that the commitment to primary prevention, as well as the vision and leadership for it, are steadily and surely building in our region. Even though it is still early days, regional action plans such as Preventing Violence Together appear to be effective in forging links between partners, harnessing the strengths and capacities of each, and working for a seamless primary prevention system of partner organisations with incredible reach into the wider community.⁴⁰¹

Women's Health in the North highlighted in its submission some of the achievements since it launched its regional prevention strategy in 2011, Building a Respectful Community Strategy:

In May 2013, 50 organisations endorsed the vision and goals of the strategy, including seven councils, nine community health services, three PCPs, three hospitals, and 29 community organisations, including family violence services and Victoria Police

...

Since the adoption of the regional strategy, three local councils have developed and adopted gender equity strategies. Three have adopted specific family violence policies and strategies. All seven local councils in the NMR [Northern Metropolitan Region] have identified violence against women, gender equity and family violence in key organisational strategies and plans (Community Safety Action Plans and Municipal Public Health Plans (MPHPs)).⁴⁰²

The Commission heard that there are currently a range of other regional governance systems in place, such as Crime Prevention Regional Committees,⁴⁰³ Services Connect,⁴⁰⁴ and Children and Youth Partnerships.⁴⁰⁵

The role of local government in coordinating prevention strategies, as well as delivering local services was emphasised to the Commission by the Victorian Government:

Local government plays an important role in delivering local services, including jointly delivering the Maternal and Child Health Service, public education and community development initiatives, supporting local partnerships, influencing a range of local settings via prevention activities and pursuing their own organisational change.⁴⁰⁶

Maribyrnong City Council advocated for more resourcing of local councils relevant to prevention programs and that programs should build on the Preventing Violence Against Women Local Clusters project.⁴⁰⁷ As previously discussed, as part of the work of this project, the Victorian Government commissioned the development of a guide, titled Implementing a Whole-of-Community Approach to Preventing Violence Against Women: Lessons from effective practice, to support whole-of-community approaches.⁴⁰⁸ This guide is targeted to community-based organisations, particularly local government.

The Commission was also told of the need for leadership to sustain community initiatives. Several people referred to 'backbone' support, which is specifically recognised in the Go Goldfields project evaluation as a condition for success:

Creating and managing Collective Impact requires a separate organisation(s) with staff and a specific set of skills to serve as the backbone for the entire initiative and coordinate participating organisations and agencies.⁴⁰⁹

A peak body

A number of submissions argued for a well-resourced peak body to coordinate primary prevention action and strategy, and engage with and expand partnerships across the sector.⁴¹⁰ The Commission was told that, in addition:

State funded coordinator roles similar to the Family Violence Regional Integration Coordinators model (currently funded by the state government) ought to be implemented. These coordinators would act as an advocate and conduit between local work and the peak body.⁴¹¹

Ms Patricia Kinnersly, Director, Practice Leadership, Our Watch told the Commission that while VicHealth and the Victorian Government have undertaken this role to some extent and at different points, a lack of an ongoing centralised body to coordinate prevention strategies has meant that resources are used inefficiently:

So what's happened in that absence of that kind of vision, if you like, housed within a structure that can do evaluation and monitoring and all of those sorts of things is that there has been short-term funding, project funding, which we know is not an effective way to do prevention—prevention is a long-term effort—and so there can be competitiveness in the sector because there's only a small amount of money and people needing to access that money; the skill base moves around, so it is hard to invest long-term in building the skill base because the funding is short-term.⁴¹²

The role of political leadership in ensuring that effort could be sustained was reinforced to the Commission,⁴¹³ with submissions reflecting the need for a prevention strategy to have bipartisan support so that it can withstand changes in government.

The State government must develop a stand-alone primary prevention action-plan for Victoria that sets out the government's long-term commitment to preventing violence against women. This plan must be long-term, adequately funded, evidence-based, targeted towards redressing the determinants of violence against women, and represent a whole-of-government commitment to preventing violence against women.⁴¹⁴

Dedicated prevention funding

Dedicated government funding for prevention programs was a consistent theme in the evidence before the Commission. Various stakeholders told the Commission that the buy-in and collaboration across organisations that are central to cultural change are undermined by funding uncertainty.⁴¹⁵ Women's health services currently leading regional prevention strategies emphasised this point, noting that the significant time spent on planning for future funding is time not available for implementing programs. Further, uncertainty about whether resources will be available to see a project through can mean that projects are not embraced and therefore have limited impact.⁴¹⁶

Primary prevention needs to be funded for more than one or two year funding cycles. Everyone talks about evidence based. With primary prevention, the evidence base is thin. The need for evaluation is there. We have a sense that what we do at the primary prevention level works and the evidence base is building. But to convince funders to fund stuff for 5 or 10 years or for ongoing funding ...⁴¹⁷

The Commission heard from many sources that moving to approaches that worked across settings across local areas (such as progressing school-based and workplace programs concurrently), could not be done within current resources.

The Australian Institute of Criminology report has noted that having sufficient resources to deliver whole-of-community prevention programs is a key principle of good program design. The lack of resources is, however, a commonly cited problem.⁴¹⁸

A prevention framework that addresses gender inequality

Gender inequality refers to the 'gender norms, roles, cultural practices, policies and laws, economic factors and institutional practices that collectively contribute to and perpetuate unequal power relations between women and men'.⁴¹⁹

In the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children gender equality is identified as having a profound influence on violence at every level of society.⁴²⁰ The Victorian Government notes in its submission that:

A key determinant of family violence is gender inequality, yet the government does not have a long-term gender equity framework. Not enough has been done to target gender inequality in a whole of government fashion, addressing gender stereotyping, discriminatory behaviours and leadership disparities between women and men. Nor has there been sufficient investment in gender focused programs.⁴²¹

In December 2015, the Victorian Government commenced consultations on the development of a Victorian gender equality strategy. The terms of reference address a broad range of issues including community attitudes towards women, economic inequality, health and wellbeing, employment pathways and flexibility in workplaces, and inequality amongst diverse groups of women. The consultation phase runs to March 2016.⁴²²

The Commission also heard of the need for a better understanding of how the link between gender inequality and family violence is 'operationalised' through prevention strategies.⁴²³ Further research is being led by Our Watch and ANROWS, and the Commission notes that the new National Framework to Prevent Violence Against Women and their Children provides guidance in this area.⁴²⁴

The need for policy makers in all parts of the system to assess how policies may have disproportionately adverse impacts on women's lives, was another issue raised with the Commission.⁴²⁵ Some organisations have treated building gender equality as an essential first step in building commitment to prevent violence against women. For example, the City of Whittlesea's Gender Equity Strategy policy includes:

- ▷ applying a gender lens to sporting facilities that are being built and upgraded, to ensure equitable access for women and girls
- ▷ partnering with the Planning Institute Australia to host a Women in Growth Areas forum to explore opportunities to enhance gender equity in growth area communities
- ▷ scheduling a pay equity audit every four years
- ▷ extending parenting programs to weekends and after-hours, and increasing engagement around parenting with men/fathers.⁴²⁶

Respectful relationships education has included material on gender equality and gender roles.⁴²⁷ The schools that the Commission met with gave positive feedback about the response of boys and male staff to this aspect of the curriculum. The curriculum itself identifies the risk of the curriculum being seen to 'blame the boys'. Testing of the curriculum in fact indicated that boys can see the connection between the construction of gender and violence, and understand that it is 'not an individual problem but rather a collective and institutional problem'.⁴²⁸

More broadly, the Commission heard of the importance of schools creating cultures based on gender equity and respect, and challenging discriminatory behaviours and attitudes.⁴²⁹

I do not want my son growing up thinking that to be a man means being rough, dominating, having an entitlement to more based on his gender, superior, etc. Addressing gender effectively in a primary school environment is good for boys as well as girls. I do not believe that there is any particular or widespread opposition to gender equity within the school. However, there appears to be a general lack of understanding about the full importance of promoting a gender equitable environment and how to go about it. This is an area where prevention work could reap significant rewards.⁴³⁰

Submissions received by the Commission also highlighted that supporting teachers to reflect on their own internalised assumptions about power and gender increases their confidence and skill in their ability to teach, shape and model appropriate attitudes, so that 'every teacher is a teacher of culture and gender'.⁴³¹

Schools are becoming vigilant at picking up on the need to recognize and deal with racism and homophobia – so should it be with sexism. Whether it be sexist jokes in the playground – or the staff room, whether it be internet pornography, students sharing sex texts or sex pics, students participating in forums such as Tinder – all need to be challenged, every time. Teachers need to have increased training around family violence to know how to recognize this, how to ask about this and where to refer families in trouble.⁴³²

Nine leading Victorian organisations recommended building blocks for prevention, with one of these building blocks being an 'intersectional gender analysis' applied to all government policy:

All government policy, legislative development and budgeting should:

- Be informed by an intersectional gender analysis;
- Involve consultation with women's organisations;
- Include provisions or resources specifically designed to address existing gender inequalities and empower women; and
- Require a gender impact statement, ideally as part of a broader Human Rights Impact Assessment Statement. This would take account of all forms of discrimination against women, to ensure that policies and practices are consistent with the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities 2006 and that they [policy makers] continue to work to promote and progress the right to equality and non-discrimination.⁴³³

The literature on prevention of violence against women also recognises that prevention efforts need to address, alongside gender inequality, social conditions such as socio-economic disadvantage, structural discrimination and exposure to violence.⁴³⁴

In evidence, representatives of Our Watch and VicHealth agreed that if there was a state entity dedicated to primary prevention of family violence it would need to deal with preventing all forms of family violence, as well as violence against women, while maintaining a focus on the gendered nature of violence against women.⁴³⁵

Workforce development

There is a diverse approach to developing and implementing prevention strategies in Victoria. Concerns were expressed to the Commission about inconsistent practices within the prevention workforce.

The Commission heard that an understanding of health promotion theory and practice is important to effectively developing and delivering prevention programs.

Many are skilled practitioners who use a feminist framework based on understandings about gender and power. For others, the public health discourses that underpin many programmes may not be well understood or well applied. Without a critical understanding of the application of health promotion theory, programmes are unlikely to be effective. Health promotion is a discipline which should be implemented by practitioners with a sound understanding of the practice and its ramifications (Whitelaw et al., 2001).⁴³⁶

As part of its review in developing national standards for the primary prevention of sexual assault, the National Association of Services against Sexual Violence reported that there is a lack of workforce development programs for people working in primary prevention,⁴³⁷ and that programs have historically been developed by professionals working with victims of violence, which means that 'there may be an assumption these workers do not require further training and skills to deliver prevention education.'⁴³⁸

The primary focus of prevention work is behaviour change. People delivering prevention programs need a range of skills in behavioural science, and education, as well as an understanding of family violence.⁴³⁹ As NASASV states in its report, 'doing primary prevention in the area of sexual assault is a practice far more sophisticated than merely raising people's awareness.'⁴⁴⁰

Pre-service training targeting early childhood educators, teachers and health promotion workers was highlighted as a priority and a current gap in workforce development:

While some in-service training is currently provided for prevention practitioners, no specific pre-service training is available to prepare people for the work, which is complex and challenging and requires specific skills, resources, tenacity and a belief that change is possible.⁴⁴¹

The Commission heard that a well-equipped prevention workforce has 'two arms'—those working outside and those working within organisations:

First are the primary prevention experts who can work alongside workplaces and sports clubs to provide them with technical advice. Second are the in-house experts, the staff inside the workplaces and sports clubs, who can be provided with training so that they integrate prevention to their existing skillset in, for example, human resource management, sports administration, workplace wellbeing, or community development. Further and coordinated development of these two arms of the prevention workforce would enable greater traction for prevention across sectors and enhance outcomes in relation to equal and respectful relationships.⁴⁴²

In addition to workers having expertise in prevention, the Commission heard that they must have the capacity to respond to violence, and to be effectively linked to response services. This was particularly raised in the context of prevention work with children and young people:

No setting in which prevention activity is undertaken should be presumed to be free of existing violence. Nor should the likelihood be overlooked that some children and young people who are participants in prevention programs and activities are already experiencing violence. For this reason, while a clear distinction needs to be drawn between the prevention of violence and early intervention or response efforts, any prevention activities that involve working with children and young people should seek to link with and support early intervention initiatives aimed at children experiencing (or who have experienced) violence (and create referral pathways to link individual children to those programs and services where appropriate).⁴⁴³

The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria provided an example of a model for enhancing coordination as the Partners in Prevention, or PiP, network. Established in 2007, the network is hosted by Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria and was set up to augment the capacity of various sectors (among them health, youth and education) who work with young people in the area of primary prevention.⁴⁴⁴ The network provides online resources and operates as a community of practice for respectful relationships educators.⁴⁴⁵ The Youth Affairs Council of Victoria submitted that models such as PiP could be extended to other areas—particularly to support youth services operating in rural communities.⁴⁴⁶

The Commission notes that VicHealth has previously developed workforce modules, including evaluated short courses and leaders' courses, specific to preventing violence against women. The Commission understands that the national foundation, Our Watch, is considering its national workforce development and training role in this area.

Evaluation and monitoring

It was reiterated to the Commission that there is a need for ongoing applied research and evaluation to keep workforces up to date on how to develop and deliver prevention programs.⁴⁴⁷

The Commission heard that in an area like family violence, success is hard to measure and it is difficult to be confident about what will work.⁴⁴⁸ Measuring the outcomes of prevention initiatives and programs is conceptually and practically difficult, and requires an understanding of the complex factors that contribute to family violence, as well as long-term investment. In a report prepared for VicHealth on preventing violence against women, Dr Wei Leng Kwok noted that:

As with other health and social problems, the challenge of addressing violence against women is conceptualized as a long term endeavor: reducing or ending violence against women is unlikely to be seen in the life of a project or program, suggesting that the effects of any primary prevention initiative can only ever contribute incrementally to change on the underlying determinants and that this change in turn contributes eventually to ameliorating the problem.⁴⁴⁹

Mr Hearne told the Commission that people involved in place-based prevention activity recognise that the stakes are high and are aware of the importance of evaluating what has happened elsewhere, and how new initiatives might be monitored, assessed and improved as information about effectiveness emerges:

... you would be looking at considering what the data might be telling you with regard to the need in a certain community or within a given population, but also you rely on your local understanding of the community in which you have relationships and a general understanding of what the indicators might be for greater risk for communities such as the diversity, the level of employment or unemployment or underemployment in the community, what the data says around family violence outcomes through justice indicators.⁴⁵⁰

While there is research available on the outcomes of prevention programs and activity, it has primarily focused on individual and organisational change (given the short-term nature of many prevention programs), rather than on social, structural or cultural change. Given this context, the majority of current evaluation has focused on measuring changes in individual attitudes or beliefs around gender and violence, changes in organisational practices, and increases in individual skills to promote non-violent social norms (such as increased bystander activity).⁴⁵¹ Our Watch has argued that while these evaluations have 'sometimes been perceived as 'weaker' than those measuring reduced future levels of violence', changes against the factors known to contribute to violence could be assumed to affect future levels of such violence.⁴⁵² Individual initiatives delivered alongside other programs (such as a school based program delivered concurrently with a local media campaign or community initiative) may have greater impact.⁴⁵³

The need for long-term evaluation was made by Mr Shaun Leane, Member for Eastern Metropolitan Region, who emphasised the need for strengthened regional effort:

One area where evidence is missing relates to the impacts of undertaking a range of mutually reinforcing activities at a population level. Well evaluated regional action plans have the capacity to add to this gap in evidence.⁴⁵⁴

The Commission heard that funding decisions are currently premised on a 'confidence' that individual-level outcomes will lead in the longer-term to population-level outcomes.

The World Health Organization emphasised however, that despite the challenges with the current evidence base, action cannot wait:

Although pressing, the need for evidence and further research in all these areas in no way precludes taking action now to prevent both intimate partner violence and sexual violence. Those programmes that have evidence supporting their effectiveness should be implemented and, where necessary, adapted. Those that have shown promise or appear to have potential can also play an immediate role – provided strenuous efforts are made to incorporate at the outset rigorous outcome evaluations. It is only by taking action and generating evidence that intimate partner and sexual violence will be prevented and the field of evidence-based primary prevention of such violence will successfully mature.⁴⁵⁵

The Commission heard that alongside the challenges of resourcing, the prevention workforce has limited guidance about how to evaluate primary prevention initiatives. The Commission notes that this area has been a significant focus of VicHealth's work, and that a number of resources have been developed.⁴⁵⁶

The Commission was told of the value of building communities of practice to pool and develop evidence-based practice resources:⁴⁵⁷

... one of the things that VicHealth has given us the opportunity to do with the AFL projects and with the one in the YMCA is a much more in-depth kind of evaluation, which is called constructivist evaluation, where the evaluation isn't something that comes in and judges the value of change at the end but works alongside the project giving it continuous feedback and allowing for continuous improvement to occur.⁴⁵⁸

The Commission also notes there are opportunities for greater collaboration across national expert research bodies, such as Our Watch, ANROWS, the Australian Institute of Family Studies, and the Australian Centre for Child Protection, so that evaluations have a broader scope and use best-practice methodologies.

The way forward

Preventing family violence requires cultural change. There are no quick fixes—a long-term perspective and sustained effort is needed. Successful population-level prevention strategies in Australia, such as anti-smoking and drink-driving campaigns, are a good source of information about what it takes to shift social practices and norms. Preventing family violence is an even bigger task—it is one of the most complex problems confronting the Victorian Government and the Victorian community.

The Victorian Government must make preventing all forms of family violence a priority. This will require political leadership. As recommended by the Commission in Chapter 38, the government should develop a Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. A discrete and prominent part of this plan needs to address primary prevention of family violence. There should be a Victorian body either within or outside government responsible for championing, driving and monitoring the implementation of prevention strategies under the plan. This function must be well resourced. As submitted by Women's Health West Inc:

Primary prevention is different from the response system because the actions and settings required to prevent violence before it occurs are different from those required to respond. Prevention is everyone's business and requires a distinct system comprising cross-government, multi-sector, community and business partnerships; and a distinct workforce and practitioner skill set. It also needs to be funded and resourced distinctly from the already-overloaded response system, not as 'either/or' but as 'both/and'.⁴⁵⁹

To date, the discussion around prevention has been focused largely on preventing intimate partner violence against women. Preventing intimate partner violence must remain central to a prevention strategy, as it remains the most prevalent form of family violence. Addressing gender inequality, and changing social norms that perpetuate an acceptance of violence will be of significant benefit to the whole community. The co-occurrence of family violence, child abuse and neglect means we must target effort towards children and young people, and in the settings that have greatest influence on their development—such as schools and home visitation programs.

Effort should also be directed to increasing our understanding about how best to prevent specific forms of family violence, such as the abuse of children, older people, parents and siblings. Prevention programs also need to be tailored to, and developed in partnership with, communities who have experienced sustained discrimination, and communities from different cultures.

Promising prevention programs, including respectful relationships education in schools, should be enhanced and made a mandatory part of the school curriculum across all year levels, with the resources necessary for these to have their full effect provided. Prevention efforts in workplaces should also be given high priority.

Engaging communities in the task of preventing family violence is essential. Whether communities are defined by a geographic place, or a population group with a shared ethos or interests, the culture they establish can have a powerful influence over the behaviour of individuals. Cultural change cannot happen without enabling community-led prevention action.

There are a number of recommendations relevant to prevention that are discussed in other chapters. These include the need for statewide and regional governance (Chapter 38), development of the prevention workforce (Chapter 40), and the need to prioritise prevention efforts in workplaces (Chapter 37).

Develop and implement a prevention action plan

As recommended in Chapter 38 of this report, an independent Family Violence Agency will be established to monitor the implementation of the Royal Commission's recommendations. One of the Commission's recommendations is that the Victorian Government develop a Statewide Family Violence Action Plan for Victoria. This plan will include both prevention and response strategies and actions. Prevention strategies and actions must be a discrete and prominent part of this plan.

The overarching goals of the plan should be the prevention of family violence in all its forms; addressing the structures, norms and practices that are driving and contributing to all forms of family violence; and building community awareness. All prevention action must be underpinned by a commitment to keep victims safe and hold perpetrators accountable.

Victoria has been investing in the prevention of violence against women and their children for a number of years, and there is a strong base of practice and understanding in the community sector and in government on which to build. A key aim of the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children 2010–2022 is to build mechanisms to share evaluation and learning about good practice across jurisdictions. The national plan should inform Victoria's statewide plan, and in turn, Victoria's statewide plan will form part of its commitment to the national plan. The recent release of the national framework by Our Watch, and research undertaken by ANROWS and VicHealth, will be of value to the Victorian Government when considering prevention planning. This work focuses on preventing violence against women and their children.

Family violence, sexual assault and women's health services have been key in developing and supporting the translation of prevention models into mainstream sectors. Drawing on their expertise will be necessary to developing effective prevention programs, as well as bringing the voices and experience of women and children into prevention practice.

The prevention aspect of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan should last for at least 10 years so that prevention approaches can be adapted in response to evaluation outcomes. The plan should feature a carefully phased approach. Pre-conditions for implementing effective prevention strategies include assessment of community or organisational readiness, putting the right support services in place, building the right workforce, and training people in how to respond to disclosures.

To date, the Victorian Government has funded piecemeal initiatives and pilots aimed at preventing violence against women and children. Dedicated prevention funding has primarily been time-limited and targeted to one-off projects. Projects that demonstrate effectiveness need to be resourced for the longer term. Future funding arrangements for prevention should be sustainable, give certainty to service providers to adequately plan and implement strategies, and allocate for a duration that recognises that prevention activities have a longer time frame than service delivery. The Commission notes the approach of VicHealth and the Department of Justice and Regulation in investing in prevention programs for the longer-term, and for their commitment to evaluation.

The Commission notes the Victorian Government's commitment to developing a gender equality strategy. The prevention aspect of the statewide plan should be informed by, and align with, that strategy.

The plan should reflect the following principles and make provision for their implementation.

Prevention requires a multi-strategy, multi-setting approach

A range of prevention approaches and strategies is required. These will include direct participation programs, organisational development, and building community engagement and mobilisation. Social marketing and communications campaigns are important strategies, but they need to be multi-phased and not undertaken as single initiatives. The Commission notes that community awareness-building campaigns about violence against women and children come within the remit of Our Watch, which has a national reach. Victorian prevention activities need to be aligned with the work done by Our Watch.

The proposed prevention action plan should put in place mutually reinforcing prevention initiatives across multiple settings, such as schools, early childhood services, local government, sports clubs, workplaces and the media. Other settings, such as tertiary institutions, should be assessed for intervention given the evidence of their potential. Online and digital environments should also be used.

Priority should be given to interventions targeting children and young people, through respectful relationships education in early childhood and care settings, primary and secondary schools and parenting services. The Commission makes a number of recommendations below about mandating respectful relationships education in schools.

Employers have an opportunity to implement best-practice responses to victims of family violence and promote gender equity in their own workplace. Many employers are also recognising that attitudes towards women in the workplace have implications for how employees make decisions in their service or business delivery and interact with the community.

The Victorian Government is in a position to drive change across public sector workplaces.

The Victorian Government's role as an employer extends beyond providing employees with family violence leave and associated supports. The government and its agencies can also institute policies and programs in public sector workplaces that take a broader view of responding to and preventing family violence, by building respectful and gender equitable cultures.

The work that has been commissioned through Our Watch by the Victorian Government, the Workplace Equality and Respect Project, will provide government with advice about program models that it can draw from. In addition, as Victoria Police implements the recommendations from the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission review, this will have broader application to other public sector workplaces, in preventing violence-supportive attitudes that can contribute to the occurrence of family violence.

Detailed discussion about this area and related recommendations are included in Chapter 37.

Prevention must engage communities

The Commission heard that government-initiated prevention campaigns can 'wash over' communities. Prevention programs targeted to communities need to be designed in consultation with communities, and the Victorian Government should provide support to community-led initiatives that have been shown to work.

The Commission heard many examples of how the altruism and effort of communities has been harnessed around the issue of family violence to great effect. The approaches adopted were diverse, but several principles that emerge that are likely to be relevant to future endeavours in mobilising community effort to prevent family violence:

- ▷ A broad cross-section of the community must be involved, not just government agencies and funded service providers. Leaders in the economic, social and civic spheres of the community, as well as those with the lived experience of family violence, need to be engaged.
- ▷ The community must determine the initiatives that it is going to work on and how it is going to pursue them. They cannot be imposed upon the community. The priorities of different parts of the community may be quite different.
- ▷ Government and funded service providers can act as enablers by providing information and advice, and at times some funds, but they cannot control or run community initiatives. These must be led by the community.
- ▷ Wherever possible, existing networks and social and administrative infrastructure should be used rather than attempting to establish something new.
- ▷ While specific initiatives may change from time to time a long-term commitment is required.
- ▷ The identification of measurable outcomes underpinned by data collection that enables the measuring progress can assist in keeping the community engaged and in engendering confidence that change is possible.

- ▷ Prevention work must be adequately resourced to support this effort.
- ▷ A ‘backbone’ organisation can be valuable in providing of administrative support and ensuring there is continuous communication with all involved.

Prevention should reflect diverse communities

Given that population-level strategies will not reach all, there will need to be targeted investment in and co-design of prevention strategies tailored to different communities, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, culturally and linguistically diverse communities, people with disabilities, and LGBTI communities.

There is increasing evidence that context is important and that more research is required on how successful programs can be transferred from one setting to others. This is particularly the case for whole-of-population strategies that may not translate for all groups.⁴⁶⁰

Elsewhere in this report, the Commission recommends that prevention programs and activities reflect the diversity of the community (see Volume V).

Effective prevention requires a dedicated specialist workforce

The Commission notes that there is currently limited investment in specialist expertise for delivering prevention programs. Limited workforce training programs are available and there is a lack of accredited training. Our Watch is committed to development in this area as part of the transfer of resources from VicHealth, but the nature of its investment is currently unclear. A dedicated workforce development strategy that is part of the industry plan (see Chapter 40) will be required to deliver the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. An oversight mechanism will also be required to coordinate and maintain consistent prevention practice (see below).

Prevention programs need to be monitored and evaluated

A performance monitoring and evaluation framework is required. In the short term this could include appropriate indicators to measure changes in attitudes and social norms relating to family violence. In the longer term, however, we should expect to be able to measure whether primary prevention activities result in a reduction in the prevalence of family violence. Work with the Australian Bureau of Statistics will be required to build on the National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey so that Victoria can run local surveys and collect data at regional area levels to support local level planning and monitoring.

There is existing evidence about what works to prevent violence against women. The Victorian Government should continue to build on this evidence base, by continuing to support the work of Our Watch and ANROWS. Working with other relevant research bodies will also be necessary to increase the evidence, and to develop effective primary prevention strategies, in relation to forms of family violence other than intimate partner violence.

Prevention should inform and be informed by other policy

The Victorian Government must work effectively with sector partners and relevant academic institutions to build the evidence base in the area of intimate partner violence and other forms of family violence. Strengthened partnerships between those working on the prevention of family violence and those working in other areas of social policy—such as alcohol and drug misuse, mental health and child protection—will consolidate shared effort and resources.

For example, the Commission heard that Victoria’s Vulnerable Children—Our Shared Responsibility Strategy (2013–22), had three goals, one of which was to ‘prevent abuse and neglect’.⁴⁶¹

At a national level, greater linkage between relevant policies, such as the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and their Children, and the National Framework for Protecting Australia’s Children 2009–2020 needs to be further developed.

Recommendation 187

The Victorian Government ensure that the Commission's recommended Statewide Family Violence Action Plan includes a primary prevention strategy [within 12 months] that should:

- ▶ be implemented through a series of three-year action cycles
- ▶ refer to actions to be taken and be accompanied by performance measures
- ▶ guide and be guided by the Victorian Government's Gender Equality Strategy
- ▶ be supported by dedicated funding for family violence primary prevention.

Overseeing prevention activities

There is a plethora of programs, some positive innovation, and strong sector momentum to continue the work in prevention. However this work has been inconsistently funded and supported, and programs often operate on an ad hoc basis. The Commission has heard that it is critical that prevention activities be funded consistently in the future.

Implementing the family violence prevention plan will require a process to oversee and coordinate prevention activities within and across government, local government, community agencies and the broader community.

Because VicHealth has now reduced its involvement in this area, Our Watch has assumed some aspects of VicHealth's previous role in prevention. Established and located in Victoria, Our Watch provides technical expertise in prevention to Victorian government and non-government services, undertaking research and testing prevention programs across a range of settings. Our Watch is also responds to calls from community organisations for advice on prevention as the momentum and interest in this area has grown.

However, Our Watch is a national organisation and will be unable to provide the level of support to Victorian agencies and communities that is required to drive prevention practice.

There is a need for a mechanism at state level to:

- ▶ oversee and work with organisations already involved in prevention activities
- ▶ undertake evidence-based program design
- ▶ provide technical advice and expertise to organisations engaged in prevention
- ▶ build partnerships with governments, non-government organisations, the private sector and community
- ▶ contribute to the development of the prevention workforce.

These functions are outlined in Table 36.3 below.

Table 36.3 Proposed prevention oversight functions

Function	Example
1. Program design, technical advice and expertise	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Statewide coordination role in monitoring implementation of prevention practice across different settings ▷ Provides support to regional governance structures and arrangements ▷ Provides technical advice and expertise to government, community organisations
2. Build partnerships with governments, non-government organisations, private sector and community	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Works with peak bodies in Victoria, such as Municipal Association of Victoria, the Victorian Employers' Chamber of Commerce and Industry, Worksafe, state sporting bodies to support their prevention efforts ▷ Builds partnerships with sectors new to prevention, such as health, arts, media ▷ Works with business and corporate sector
3. Workforce development [^]	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Provides technical advice to inform the industry plan ▷ Coordinates training delivery through registered training organisations ▷ Manages communities of practice, facilitates workshops, conferences to build and share knowledge ▷ In conjunction with Our Watch, disseminates up-to-date practice guidance, tools and resources
4. Build on the evidence base	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Funds and supports research/innovation where gaps identified, but is not a grant making body ▷ Seeks philanthropic funding to support research/innovation ▷ Works in partnership with Our Watch, ANROWS, the Australian Institute of Family Studies and other relevant research agencies in family violence prevention.

[^] Note that the agency will not directly provide workforce development and training, and will work through registered training organisations.

The Commission considered a number of ways that prevention activities could be overseen and supported. One option would be to locate these functions within government, for example, within the proposed family violence unit in the Department of Premier and Cabinet. This would align prevention with other aspects of family violence planning and facilitate interaction with other departments when they implement family violence prevention and workplace initiatives.

A second option would be to place the prevention function within the independent Family Violence Agency. The proposed independent Family Violence Agency will be a statutory body that will oversee the implementation of the Royal Commission's recommendations and have power to undertake research and provide expert policy advice. This would create a coherent link between oversight of family prevention and support activities. On the other hand, the Commission is concerned that engaging in prevention could detract from the independent Family Violence Agency's broader role. In addition, the location of the prevention function within the Family Violence Agency could create the perception of a conflict of interest between its role in monitoring the performance of the system and its own prevention activities.

A third option would be to create a stand-alone entity that is independent from government and separate from the Family Violence Agency.

The Commission looked at national agencies that were established specifically to drive prevention. The Australian National Health Prevention Agency was established in 2011 as a statutory entity through the Council of Australian Governments, with the agreement of all governments. It was responsible for providing advice to governments on the development of preventive health policy, managing a research fund and evaluating existing programs, and publishing biennial reports on the state of preventive health in Australia. It was also responsible for developing national guidelines and standards, conducting educational and community awareness campaigns, and establishing partnerships with governments, health and industry sectors. It was abolished in 2014.⁴⁶²

The Commission heard evidence about the Transport Accident Commission, a government-owned entity whose role is to promote road safety, improve the system and provide support to victims.⁴⁶³ The TAC spends 'about $160 million of its budget on prevention work'.⁴⁶⁴

The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission is a statutory organisation that monitors and reports the implementation of relevant legislation to eliminate inequality and discrimination. VEOHRC's role includes responding to individuals experiencing discrimination, community engagement and awareness raising.

The Commission has not expressed a view about which of these options should be adopted. Each has advantages and disadvantages. Whichever option is adopted, it will be important for the prevention mechanism to be supported by:

- ▷ a government commitment to funding for prevention as part of the delivery of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, with continued government leadership
- ▷ adequate funding for response services, as an increased investment and focus on prevention activity will increase disclosure
- ▷ effective regional governance and coordination for local and regional prevention planning that can act as a conduit for the state agency
- ▷ continued funding for the national foundation, Our Watch and for the national research body driving research, ANROWS
- ▷ adequate investment in the prevention workforce, and training for those sectors who are prioritised, such as teachers. This will need to be supported by the industry plan, and appropriate registered training organisations with the capacity to deliver accredited training.

Whichever option is adopted, it will be necessary for the Victorian Government to consider how the mechanism collaborates with Our Watch, to avoid the risk of duplication and confusion among Victorian stakeholders.

Recommendation 188

The Victorian Government resource an initiative (either inside or outside government) [within 18 months] to:

- ▷ oversee prevention of family violence activities in Victoria
- ▷ provide policy and technical advice to policy makers—including government—on primary prevention
- ▷ provide to organisations technical advice and expertise on building primary prevention in their organisations and within communities
- ▷ coordinate research that builds evidence around the primary prevention of all forms of family violence
- ▷ ensure that accredited workforce development training in primary prevention is available through registered training organisations.

This Victorian initiative should be undertaken in close collaboration with Our Watch, ANROWS (Australia's National Organisation for Women's Safety) and other relevant bodies.

Respectful Relationships Education in schools

One of the most consistent messages the Commission heard was about the opportunity that the education of children and young people offers to prevent family violence in the future. In all of our community consultations with victims of family violence, specific communities and people who work in family violence-related fields, across metropolitan Melbourne and regional Victoria, people emphasised the value of educating children and young people about respectful and healthy relationships.

Respectful relationships education must be a fundamental component of Victoria's family violence prevention strategy. The objectives of RRE should be to educate our children to have greater respect for themselves and for one another, and to support more cohesive families and communities.

The Commission acknowledges the Victorian Government's planned expansion of respectful relationships education curriculum in schools from prep to year 10. The need to expand into primary schools was an area highlighted as a gap in a number of submissions.⁴⁶⁵

However, the Commission is concerned that the Victorian Government's current approach to the implementation of respectful relationships education is inadequate. It does not appear to meet the whole-of-school test that the best evidence indicates is necessary for the program to be effective and for unintended harm to be avoided. A whole-of-school approach requires not only the introduction of new curriculum but needs to be accompanied by a broad range of school policies, training and professional learning for teachers beyond those actually delivering the curriculum, the establishment of protocols with support agencies beyond Child Protection, and the engagement of the parent community in preventing family violence.

The Commission is particularly concerned that a failure to incorporate these aspects creates the risk that harm already caused by family violence will be exacerbated if the curriculum triggers disclosures of family violence in schools without appropriate policies and protocols in place, without teachers having the appropriate knowledge and skills, and without parents understanding respectful relationships education.

In addition, the design of appropriate respectful relationships education curriculum and associated resources for all year levels will be required, building on the Building Respectful Relationships: Stepping Out Against Gender-based Violence curriculum developed for years 8 to 10. The implementation of respectful relationships education should occur in concert with, not in competition with, other programs that schools are implementing to build the health, wellbeing and resilience of children and young people, such as programs addressing bullying, homophobia and transphobia, and sexual and reproductive health.

The Commission acknowledges that the implementation of respectful relationships education in a way that reflects whole-of-school best practice, will entail major reforms in Victorian schools and will necessitate significant resourcing throughout an implementation period of several years. This is a small price to pay for the very real prospect that these programs will support future generations to adopt attitudes and behaviours that will leave a legacy of significant reductions in all forms of family violence.

Given the complexity of this change, a detailed and staged approach to implementation will be required. The Commission welcomes the Victorian Government's commitment to expand respectful relationships education in 2016, however given the planning and preparation that will be required to ensure readiness within individual schools, we suggest that a staged approach should be adopted.

The Commission expects that by the end of 2016, a learning and development strategy for the education workforce will be implemented to support the statewide rollout of the Building Respectful Relationships: Stepping Out Against Gender-based Violence curriculum to all secondary schools in years 8 and 9. Concurrently, the department's module of respectful relationships education for year 10 will have been tested and evaluated. By the end of 2018, new curriculum, teacher training and associated resources for prep to year seven should be developed. These will have been piloted and tested in primary and secondary schools, building on the lessons from the Our Watch evaluation. In addition, the Commission considers that respectful relationships education should be developed for years 11 and 12.

The Commission notes that the resources and guidelines that Our Watch have developed will be important to build on, given that the Commission notes the varying understandings about what constitutes respectful relationships education in a school context, and as a relatively new field, there is not yet a standard model in the Australian context that can guide policy makers and education departments.⁴⁶⁶

The Commission notes from the Our Watch evaluation the strong message that teaching and learning resources and curriculum are often used as the 'way in' to implementing a whole-of-school approach, but they are just one part of the larger strategy that is required. We also heard that leadership from senior executives in the Department of Education and Training was essential, as was expertise located in regional offices dedicated to support schools.

In addition, one of the most critical elements was the need for greater guidance, training and support for school staff to manage the increase in disclosures from students and staff. This will be a priority element of the rollout of the respectful relationships program.

The Commission notes that all three education sectors—government, independent and Catholic—now have an enabling environment for respectful relationships education through the national and Victorian curriculums. Consistent with the statewide implementation for government schools, the Commission's view is that Catholic, and independent schools should be supported to mirror this commitment, and we note that the Victorian Government has indicated that 'support for Catholic and independent sector schools will be arranged with the respective sectoral authorities' for implementation of the new Victorian curriculum under the education state reforms.⁴⁶⁷

Recommendation 189

The Victorian Government mandate the introduction of respectful relationships education into every government school in Victoria from prep to year 12. Implementation should be staged to ensure school readiness and to allow for ongoing evaluation and adaptation. It should be delivered through a whole-of-school approach and be consistent with best practice, building on the evaluation of the model being tested by the Department of Education and Training through Our Watch [within five years].

Endnotes

- 1 Transcript of Lay, 15 October 2015, 3705 [14]–[22].
- 2 Our Watch—01, Submission 922, 6.
- 3 UN Women, 'A Framework to Underpin Action to Prevent Violence Against Women' (United Nations, November 2015) 26–7. See also Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Framework Foundations 1: A Review of the Evidence on Correlates of Violence Against Women and What Works to Prevent It—Companion Document to Change the Story: A Shared Framework for the Primary Prevention of Violence Against Women and Their Children in Australia' (Our Watch, 2015) 21.
- 4 See, eg, United Nations, 'Ending Violence Against Women: From Words to Action—Study of the Secretary General' (2006); Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Preventing Violence Before it Occurs: A Framework and Background Paper to Guide the Primary Prevention of Violence Against Women in Victoria' (December 2007); European Commission, 'Review of Research on Factors at Play in Perpetration' (Feasibility Study, October 2012); World Health Organization and London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, 'Preventing Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Against Women: Taking Action and Generating Evidence' (World Health Organization, 2010); Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Change the Story: A Shared Framework for the Primary Prevention of Violence Against Women and Their Children in Australia' (2015); UN Women, above n 3.
- 5 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4.
- 6 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Personal Safety, Australia, 2012' (Catalogue No 4906.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, December 2013) Table 1, 4, 5.
- 7 Rae Kaspiew, Rachel Carson and Helen Rhoades, 'Elder Abuse: Understanding Issues, Frameworks and Responses' (Research Report No 35, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2016) 4; World Health Organization, 'Global Status Report on Violence Prevention 2014' (2014) 46.
- 8 Statement of Miller, 14 July 2015, 6 [19] (citations omitted).
- 9 Our Watch and Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 29. Child Family Community Australia (Cth), What is Child Abuse and Neglect? (September 2015) Australian Institute of Family Studies <<https://aifs.gov.au/cfca/publications/what-child-abuse-and-neglect>>. Note that 'exposure to domestic violence' is included as a form of child maltreatment. See also Transcript of Bromfield, 12 October 2015, 3357 [25]–3358 [3].
- 10 Child Family Community Australia (Cth), Risk and Protective Factors for Child Abuse and Neglect (March 2013) Australian Institute of Family Studies <<https://aifs.gov.au/cfca/publications/risk-and-protective-factors-child-abuse-and-neglect>>; Antonia Quadara et al, 'Conceptualising the Prevention of Child Sexual Abuse: Final Report' (Research Report No 33, Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2015). See, also, Australian Institute of Family Studies, Submission 827; Monica Campo et al, 'Children Affected by Domestic and Family Violence: A Review of Domestic and Family Violence Prevention, Early Intervention and Response Services' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) ix–x, 32–5.
- 11 Transcript of Bromfield, 12 October 2015, 3358 [11]–[15].
- 12 See European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, 'Violence Against Women: An EU-wide Survey—Main Results' (April 2014) 21–53. See also Gay Alcorn, 'Australians are Being Told That Gender Inequality is the Root Cause of Domestic Violence. But is it?' The Guardian Australia (online), 19 February 2016 <<http://www.theguardian.com/society/2016/feb/19/australians-are-being-told-that-gender-inequality-is-the-root-cause-of-domestic-violence-but-is-it>>.
- 13 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 15.
- 14 Ibid 16.
- 15 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) s 3(d)(i); ibid 16–17.
- 16 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 55.
- 17 Ibid.
- 18 Brotherhood of St Laurence, 'What Next for Place-based Initiatives to Tackle Disadvantage? A Practical Look at Recent Lessons for Australian Public Policy' (April 2015) 2.
- 19 UN Women, above n 3, 26; Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 40.
- 20 Claudia Garcia-Moreno et al, 'Prevalence of Intimate Partner Violence: Findings from the WHO Multi-Country Study on Women's Health and Domestic Violence' (2006) 368 (9543) The Lancet 1260; Emma Fulu et al, 'Why Do Some Men Use Violence Against Women and How Can We Prevent It? Quantitative Findings from the United Nations Multi-Country Study on Men and Violence in Asian and the Pacific' (UNDP, UNFPA, UN Women and UNV, 2013).
- 21 Parveen Azam Ali and Paul B Naylor, 'Intimate Partner Violence: A Narrative Review of the Biological and Psychological Explanations for its Causation' (2013) 18(3) Aggression and Violent Behavior 373.
- 22 Adapted from Lori Heise, Mary Ellsberg and Megan Gottemoeller, 'Ending Violence Against Women, Population Reports' (Series L No 11, John Hopkins University, School of Public Health, 1999) 8; World Health Organization, 'World Report on Violence and Health' (2002).
- 23 UN Women, above n 3, 26.
- 24 Ibid 24–8.
- 25 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 21, 55.
- 26 Lori Heise and Andreas Kotsadam, 'Cross-National and Multilevel Correlates of Partner Violence: An Analysis of Data From Population-based Surveys' (2015) 3(6) The Lancet Global Health e332, e336–40.
- 27 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 8, 36–9.
- 28 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 31.
- 29 For example, violence against women is more common in communities in which violence-supportive attitudes are prevalent: Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Australians' Attitudes to Violence Against Women: Findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey' (September 2014) 37.
- 30 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 32.
- 31 Christopher R Browning, 'The Span of Collective Efficacy: Extending Social Disorganization Theory to Partner Violence' (2002) 64(4) Journal of Marriage and Family 833, 847–8; Victoria Frye, 'The Informal Social Control of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women: Exploring Personal Attitudes and Perceived Neighbourhood Social Cohesion' (2007) 35(8) Journal of Community Psychology 1001, 1001, 1014.
- 32 See, eg, Jenny Mouzos and Toni Makkai, 'Women's Experiences of Male Violence: Findings from the Australian Component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IWAWS)' (Research and Public Policy Series No 56, Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth), 2004) 83, 112.
- 33 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Gippsland Region: Changing Family Futures Initiative' (15 May 2013), 7, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 34 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 29, 9, 41–2, 50, 203, 226.
- 35 Transcript of Bromfield, 12 October 2015, 3358 [9]–[15].
- 36 Ibid 3356 [1]–[5].
- 37 Ibid 3359 [13]–[21].
- 38 Stacey Fox et al, 'Better Systems, Better Chances: A Review of Research and Practice for Prevention and Early Intervention' (Australian Research Alliance for Children and Youth, 2015) 4, 57.

39 Ibid 4, 56–7.

40 Ibid 3, 65.

41 Ibid 65 citing Sara Jaffee et al, 'Safe, Stable, Nurturing Relationships Break the Intergenerational Cycle of Abuse: A Prospective Nationally Representative Cohort Of Children in the United Kingdom' (2013) 53(4) Journal of Adolescent Health, S4–10.

42 Transcript of Bromfield, 12 October 2015, 3370 [21]–[24].

43 Brimbank City Council, Submission 123, 4; Women's Health Association of Victoria, Submission 509, 9; Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 9.

44 Lori Michau et al, 'Prevention of Violence Against Women and Girls: Lessons From Practice' (2015) 385 The Lancet 1672, 1676.

45 World Health Organization, 'Violence Prevention: The Evidence—Series of Briefings on Violence Prevention' (2010).

46 Victorian Government, 'Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence Against Women and Children: Everyone Has a Responsibility to Act' (October 2012) 8.

47 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4.

48 Knox City Council, Submission 227, 6.

49 Victorian Government, 'Ending Violence Against Women and Children—Further initiatives for Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence against Women and Children: Everyone Has a Responsibility to Act 2012–15' (2014).

50 Ibid 20.

51 Australian Labor Party (Victorian Branch), 'Labor's Financial Statement 2014' (November 2014) 10.

52 52 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, 'Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families: Towards a Safer Future for Indigenous Families and Communities—10 Year Plan' (Department of Planning and Community Development, October 2008) 1.

53 Ibid.

54 Ibid 23–4.

55 State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix B, 3.

56 Ibid Appendix B, 3, 5; Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Additional Information Requested about Appendix B—Snapshot of Funding as at March 2015', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 20 August 2015.

57 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 56, 3.

58 State of Victoria, '2015–16 Budget Paper No 3: Service Delivery' (Department of Treasury and Finance, 2015) 5, 10.

59 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 39.

60 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Reducing Violence Against Women and Their Children, 'Victorian Grants Program: Review of Progress and Interim Evaluation Report' (Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth), August 2014), 3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 6 August 2014. This was part of the Community Crime Prevention Program.

61 Ibid 4.

62 Ibid 3.

63 Council of Australian Governments, 'The National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–22' (February 2011) 6.

64 Ibid.

65 Ibid 10.

66 Council of Australian Government, 'Second Action Plan 2013–2016: Moving Ahead of the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children 2010–2020' (June 2014) 3.

67 Ibid 10.

68 See, eg, ibid.

69 See Australian Government, 'COAG Advisory Panel on Reducing Violence against Women and their Children' (2015) 1 <https://www.dpmc.gov.au/sites/default/files/files/advisory_panel/fact_sheet_reducing_violence.pdf>.

70 See, eg, Prime Minister, The Hon Malcolm Turnbull MP, 'Women's Safety Package to Stop the Violence' (Media Release, 24 September 2015).

71 Ibid.

72 ibid.

73 Our Watch—01, Submission 922, 3.

74 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Preventing Violence Against Women: Victorian Health Promotion Foundation's Integration Approach' (December 2015) 1.

75 State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix 2, 6.

76 Ibid. Our Watch is overseeing this project, which is being delivered by cohealth, and the Jagriti Forum (working with the Indian community) and Whittlesea Community Connections in partnership with Women's Health in the North and the Salvation Army (working with the Iranian community).

77 Minister for the Prevention of Family Violence, The Hon Fiona Richardson MP, 'Workplace Funding to Help Address Family Violence' (Media Release, 30 November 2015).

78 See generally Our Watch—01, Submission 922, 21–2.

79 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 6.

80 Council of Australian Governments, above n 66, 19.

81 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Women's Safety, Australia, 1996' (Catalogue No 4128.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, December 1996) 12.

82 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'The Health Costs of Violence: Measuring the Burden of Disease Caused by Intimate Partner Violence—A Summary of Findings' (2004) 10.

83 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Personal Safety, Australia, 2005 (Reissue)' (Catalogue No 4906.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, August 2006) 30.

84 This excludes boyfriends and dates. Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 6, Table 6.

85 Victorian Government, 'A Victorian Gender Equality Strategy: Consultation Paper' (November 2015).

86 This includes boyfriends/girlfriends and dates. Peta Cox, 'Violence Against Women: Additional Analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012' (Horizons: Research Report Issue 01, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, October 2015) Table A1.

87 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 8.

88 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation (VicHealth), Submission 243, 14–17.

89 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 43–4.

90 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 57.

91 World Health Organization and London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, above n 4, 40.

92 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 64–9.

93 Ibid 64.

94 Ibid 65–9.

95 Women's Health Grampians, Submission 824, 6.

96 Statement of Flood, 9 July 2015, 5–6 [22].

97 Transcript of Batty, 10 August 2015, 2365 [14]–[16].

- 98 Transcript of Vinson, 10 August 2015, 2484 [23]–2485[8].
- 99 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Implementing a Whole-of-Community Approach to Preventing Violence Against Women—Lessons from Effective Practice' (Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth), 2015), 8–9, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 100 See, eg, Transcript of Callister, 16 October 2015, 3928 [16]–3929 [2].
- 101 Statement of Batty, 6 August 2015, 3 [10].
- 102 Michael Roguski, "'It's Not OK' Campaign Community Evaluation Project' (prepared for the Ministry of Social Development (NZ), 18 March 2015) 27.
- 103 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 29, 39; Kim Webster et al, 'Australians' Attitudes to Violence Against Women: 2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey—Full Technical Report' (Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, September 2014) 36.
- 104 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 29, 37–41.
- 105 Ibid 53. Webster et al, above n 103, 128.
- 106 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 59.
- 107 Statement of Flood, 9 July 2015, 4.
- 108 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 45; See also Roguski, above n 102, 45, 54.
- 109 Roguski, above n 102, 27.
- 110 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Review of Communication Components of Social Marketing/Public Education Campaigns Focusing on Violence Against Women: Paper Two of the Violence Against Women Community Attitudes Project' (2005) 191.
- 111 Berry Street, Submission 834, 32.
- 112 Ibid.
- 113 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 47.
- 114 Dr Michael Salter, "Preventing Violence Before it Occurs" Framework Redevelopment, Stage 1: Literature Review' (University of Western Sydney, 2015) 43.
- 115 Transcript of Callister, 16 October 2015, 3928 [16]–[30].
- 116 Statement of Flood, 9 July 2015, 4 [16].
- 117 Webster et al, above n 103, 5.
- 118 Susan Rennie, Submission 248, 4.
- 119 Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 6, Table 6.
- 120 Statement of Flood, 9 July 2015, 2 [12]. See, eg, Michael Flood, 'Where Men Stand: Men's Roles in Ending Violence Against Women' (Ribbon Prevention Research Series, No 2, 2010) 32 citing a recent international review by the World Health Organization, which documents 57 interventions with evaluations. The study found that those programs which sought to transform gender roles and promote more gender-equitable relationships were the most effective of all types of programs reviewed. Gary Barker, Christine Ricardo and Marcos Nascimento 'Engaging Men and Boys in Changing Gender-Based Inequity in Health: Evidence from Programme Interventions' (World Health Organization, 2007). See also Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 66, which identifies effective or promising practices as including those which '[d]eliver initiatives that are 'gender transformative', as compared to those that are 'gender blind'.
- 121 Statement of Flood, 9 July 2015, 4 [15].
- 122 Webster et al, above n 103, 12.
- 123 This view has also been advanced by Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 12, 32.
- 124 See, eg, Webster et al, above n 103, 12.
- 125 Statement of Flood, 9 July 2015, 2 [9].
- 126 White Ribbon Australia, Submission 880, 2.
- 127 Koori Caucus, Submission 946, 17.
- 128 Michael Flood, 'Work With Men to End Violence Against Women: A Critical Stocktake' (2015) 17(S2) Culture, Health and Sexuality: An International Journal for Research, Intervention and Care S159, 2.
- 129 Ibid 4.
- 130 Women's Health in the South East Inc, Submission 370, 9.
- 131 Moira Carmody, Michael Salter and Geir Presterudstuen, 'Less to Lose and More to Gain? Men and Boys Violence Prevention Research Project: Final Report' (University of Western Sydney, July 2014) 36.
- 132 Ibid 7–8.
- 133 Anita Harris et al, 'Young Australian's Attitudes to Violence Against Women: Findings From the 2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey for Respondents 16–24 Years' (Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, September 2015) 67.
- 134 Ibid 68.
- 135 Ibid.
- 136 Statement of Flood, 9 July 2015, 6 [25].
- 137 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 60, 17.
- 138 Ibid 18.
- 139 Tracy Castelino, Kristen Sheridan and Jacques Boulet, 'Challenge Family Violence Project: Making Things Happen to Prevent Violence Against Women (Interim Evaluation Report—4, November 2014 to May 2015), 21, produced by the State of Victoria in Response to the Commission's Notice to Produce 6 August 2014.
- 140 Ibid 43.
- 141 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 70–1.
- 142 Lucy Healey, 'Voices Against Violence: Paper Two: Current Issues in Understanding and Responding to Violence Against Women with Disabilities' (Women with Disabilities Victoria, 2013) 17; Corinne Peek-Asa et al, 'Rural Disparity in Domestic Violence Prevalence and Access to Resources' (2011) 20(11) Journal of Women's Health 1743, 1747–8; Aarati Kasturirangan, Sandhya Krishnan and Stephanie Riger, 'The Impact of Culture and Minority Status on Women's Experience of Domestic Violence' (2004) 5(4) Trauma, Violence & Abuse 318, 320–3; Susan Evans, 'Beyond Gender: Class, Poverty and Domestic Violence' (2005) 58(1) Australian Social Work 36, 39–40; Fadwa Al-Yaman, Mieke Van Doeland and Michelle Wallis, 'Family Violence Among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Peoples' (Cat no IHW 17, Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, November 2006) 2–3; Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates, 'Understandings and Actions to Prevent Violence Against Women in Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Communities' (2015) 8–10 (unpublished, copy on file with author).
- 143 Shaun Leane—Member for Eastern Metropolitan Region, Submission 139, 3.
- 144 Community consultation, Melbourne 1, 14 May 2015.
- 145 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 60, 1, 3, 13.

- 146 Ibid 13–14.
- 147 Ibid 14–15.
- 148 Statement of Turfrey, 16 July 2015, Attachment 7, 32.
- 149 Ibid Attachment 7, 19–20.
- 150 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, '2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders' Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women' (August 2015) 9.
- 151 Ibid 16.
- 152 Multicultural Centre for Women's Health, Submission 616, 5.
- 153 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates, above n 142, 12.
- 154 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, '2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey: Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Among People Born in Non-Main English Speaking Countries' (August 2015) 9.
- 155 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates, above n 142.
- 156 Ibid 10.
- 157 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 18.
- 158 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, AMES Australia and Lyn Walker and Associates, above n 142, 52.
- 159 Multicultural Centre for Women's Health, Submission 616, 8.
- 160 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 55.
- 161 Ibid.
- 162 See, eg, Delanie Woodlock et al, 'Voices Against Violence: Paper One—Summary Report and Recommendations' (Women with Disabilities Victoria, Office of the Public Advocate and Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, 2014) 14.
- 163 Ibid 28.
- 164 Ibid 53–4.
- 165 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 42.
- 166 Ibid 10.
- 167 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Workforce Development Program on Gender and Disability: Early Findings Report' (9 October 2014), 8, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 168 See, eg, Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 10.
- 169 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 167, 7.
- 170 Monica Campo and Sarah Tayton, 'Domestic and Family Violence in Regional, Rural and Remote Areas: An Overview of Key Issues' (Australian Institute of Family Studies (Cth), December 2015) 7.
- 171 See, eg, Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 4, 8–13.
- 172 Ibid 15.
- 173 Ibid 18; Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 10–11.
- 174 Council of Australian Governments, above n 66, 25–8.
- 175 Alexandra Gannoni and Tracy Cussen, 'Same-Sex Intimate Partner Homicide in Australia' (Trends & Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice No 469, Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth), March 2014) 5.
- 176 176. Statement of Horsley, 5 August, Attachment 2, 6–7.
- 177 LGBTIQ Domestic Violence Interagency, Another Closet: LGBTIQ Domestic & Family Violence (2014) <<http://www.anothercloset.com.au/>>.
- 178 Safe Schools Coalition Australia, What We Do (2016) <<http://www.safeschoolscoalition.org.au/what-we-do>>.
- 179 Department of Education and Training, 'Building Respectful Relationships: Stepping Out Against Gender-based Violence' (December 2015) 16, 18, 54, 68 161, 200.
- 180 Macedon Ranges Shire Council, Submission 122, 1.
- 181 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 58.
- 182 Ibid.
- 183 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 29.
- 184 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 39–41.
- 185 Charles Edwards, Paul Omaji and Irene Froyland, 'Working with Adolescents to Prevent Domestic Violence: The Northam Project' (Australian Institute of Criminology, 1998) 34, 9.
- 186 Royal Children's Hospital, 'Early Childhood and the Life Course' (Policy Brief No 1/2006, 2006) <http://www.rch.org.au/uploadedFiles/Main/Content/ccch/PB1_Earlyhood_lifecourse.pdf>.
- 187 Harris et al, above n 133, 28.
- 188 Fulu et al, above n 20, 43
- 189 Harris et al, above n 133, 12.
- 190 Ibid 13.
- 191 Department Of Social Services (Cth), 'Reducing Sex Violence Against Women and Their Children: Research Informing the Development of a National Campaign' (November 2015).
- 192 Ibid 49.
- 193 Ibid 1.
- 194 Ibid 31.
- 195 Transcript of Lay, 15 October 2015, 3715 [19]–[27].
- 196 Harris et al, above n 133, 65.
- 197 Ibid 63–5.
- 198 Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 12–13, 25; Women's Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 4.
- 199 Research about adolescent family violence indicates most victims are mothers and most offenders are males, a gendered presentation similar to adult family violence. Jo Howard and Lisa Abbott, 'The Last Resort: Pathways to Justice—Adolescent Violence in the Home' (Peninsula Health, November 2013) 20.
- 200 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 5.
- 201 Statement of Feinberg, 9 July 2015, 2 [9].
- 202 Harris et al, above n 133, 64.
- 203 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 29.
- 204 Transcript of Lay, 15 October 2015, 3708 [8]–[10]; Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015; Community consultation, Bendigo 2, 5 May 2015; Women's Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 4; Plenty Valley Community Health Service, Submission 242, 6; Doncaster Community Care and Counselling Centre Inc—Doncare, Submission 742, 5–6.
- 205 Community consultation, Melbourne 2, 14 May 2015.
- 206 Community consultation, Ravenhall, 11 May 2015.
- 207 Cara Gleeson et al, 'Respectful Relationships Education in Schools: Evidence Paper' (Our Watch, December 2015) 9.
- 208 City of Port Phillip, Submission 787, 2.

- 209 Victorian Law Reform Commission, Review of Family Violence Laws: Report (2006) 416.
- 210 Michael Flood, Lara Fergus and Melanie Heenan, 'Respectful Relationships Education: Violence Prevention and Respectful Relationships Education in Victorian Secondary Schools' (Department of Education and Early Childhood Development, November 2009) 10.
- 211 Gleeson et al, above n 207, 10.
- 212 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 10 citing Ian Hassall and Kristen Hanna 'School-Based Violence Prevention Programmes: A Literature Review' (Accident Compensation Corporation, prepared by the Institute of Public Policy, 2007) 59.
- 213 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 64, 11.
- 214 Ibid 64, 11.
- 215 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 11.
- 216 Statement of Gallagher, 10 August 2015, 7 [34].
- 217 Hue Man Dang, Submission 174, 1.
- 218 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 64, 11.
- 219 Office of Women's Policy, Department of Planning and Community Development, 'A Right to Respect: Victoria's Plan to Prevent Violence Against Women 2010–2020' (November 2009) 31.
- 220 Debbie Ollis, 'The Role of Teachers in Delivering Education About Respectful Relationships: Exploring Teacher and Student Perspectives' (2014) 29(4) Health Education Research 702, 703.
- 221 Ibid 704.
- 222 Victorian Curriculum F-10 is the Foundation to Year 10 curriculum in Victoria that provides a single set of prescribed content and common achievement standards, which schools use to plan student learning programs, assess student progress and report to parents. It replaces the AusVELS. Victorian Curriculum and Assessment Authority, Foundation: 10 Curriculum (22 February 2016) <<http://www.vcaa.vic.edu.au/Pages/foundation10/f10index.aspx>>.
- 223 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 2.
- 224 Our Watch, 'Respectful Relationships Education in Schools, 'The Beginnings of Change—Final Evaluation Report' (forthcoming) (February 2016), 5, provided to the Commission by Our Watch on 18 February 2016.
- 225 Ibid 30–1.
- 226 Ibid 5.
- 227 Ibid 50.
- 228 Ibid 50–1.
- 229 Ibid 78.
- 230 Ibid 79.
- 231 Ibid 65–6.
- 232 Ibid 65–7.
- 233 Ibid 68.
- 234 Statement of Callister, 4 August 2015, 35 [152].
- 235 Gleeson et al, above n 207, 7.
- 236 Renee Imbesi, 'CASA House Sexual Assault Prevention Program for Secondary Schools (SAPPSS) Report' (Royal Women's Hospital, Centre Against Sexual Assault, 2008) 10; See also Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 29.
- 237 Loddon Campaspe Integrated Family Violence Services Consortium, Submission 914, 18.
- 238 Women's Health West Inc, Submission 239, 28.
- 239 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 25.
- 240 Ibid.
- 241 Russell Pratt and Carol Pyke, 'Respect, Protect, Connect: A Workshop Program for Young People in Schools' (2001) 7(3) Australian Journal of Primary Health 92.
- 242 White Ribbon Australia, Submission 880, 7.
- 243 Minister for Education, The Hon James Merlino MP and Minister for the Prevention of Family Violence, The Hon Fiona Richardson MP, 'Respectful Relationships Support Funding Announced' (Media Release, 4 December 2015).
- 244 Transcript of Callister, 16 October 2015, 3931 [12]–[22].
- 245 Supplementary Statement of Callister, 13 October 2015, 1 [3].
- 246 Ibid 2 [5]–[6].
- 247 Department of Education and Training, 'Education State: Schools' (September 2015) 9 <<http://www.education.vic.gov.au/Documents/about/educationstate/launch.pdf>>.
- 248 Supplementary Statement of Callister, 13 October 2015, 8 [45].
- 249 Ibid 9 [48].
- 250 Statement of Callister, 4 August 2015, 28 [125].
- 251 Supplementary Statement of Callister, 13 October 2015, 12 [57].
- 252 Ibid.
- 253 Department of Education and Training, above n 247, 9, 12, 14.
- 254 Department of Education and Training, 'Gender, Power & Media: Unit Three', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 as varied on 20 August 2015 and 20 October 2015; Farrah Tomazin, 'Sexting, Porn and Raunch to Form Part of 'Respectful Relationships' Classes' The Age (online), 6 December 2015 <<http://www.theage.com.au/victoria/sexting-porn-and-raunch-to-form-part-of-respectful-relationships-classes-20151204-glg616.html>>.
- 255 Statement of Callister, 4 August 2015, 30 [132].
- 256 Transcript of Flood, 10 August 2015, 2436 [24]–[31].
- 257 Jewish Taskforce Against Family Violence, Submission 820, 5.
- 258 Transcript of Flood, 10 August 2015, 2437 [7]–[9].
- 259 Minister for Education, The Hon James Merlino MP and Minister for the Prevention of Family Violence, The Hon Fiona Richardson MP, above n 243.
- 260 Education and Training Reform Act 2006 (Vic) s 5.1.1(2)(a).
- 261 Transcript of Callister, 10 August 2015, 2448 [13]–[14].
- 262 Council of Australian Governments, above n 66, 18.
- 263 Education Council, 'Sixth Education Council Meeting' (Communiqué, 18 September 2015) 3.
- 264 Australian Curriculum Assessment and Reporting Authority, Curriculum (2013) <<http://www.acara.edu.au/curriculum/curriculum.html>>.
- 265 Australian Curriculum, Relationships and Sexuality <<http://www.australiancurriculum.edu.au/Curriculum/FocusArea/ecf580d5-b334-4d39-bf1e-8fe22d187ee5>>.
- 266 Australian Curriculum, Safety <<http://www.australiancurriculum.edu.au/Curriculum/FocusArea/a5fad7e-c459-4b4d-bbd9-42d3b71b2121>>.
- 267 Australian Curriculum, F–10 Overview: Health and Physical Education—Learning Area <<http://www.australiancurriculum.edu.au/health-and-physical-education/structure>>.

268 Australian Curriculum, F–10 Overview: Version Implementation Advice <<http://www.australiancurriculum.edu.au/curriculum/overview>>.

269 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 27.

270 Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 9; Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 25; Family Planning Victoria, Submission 557, 6; Warrnambool and District Network of Schools, Submission 797, 3.

271 Australian Education Union Victoria, Submission 235, 6.

272 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 29.

273 Ibid 8.

274 Ibid 28.

275 Ibid 30.

276 Ibid 82.

277 Our Watch, above n 224, 6.

278 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 28.

279 Brotherhood of St Laurence, Submission 818.

280 Australian Education Union Victoria, Submission 235, 5.

281 Ibid.

282 Gleeson et al, above n 207, 21.

283 Ibid 15, 21, 27, 30.

284 Ibid 3.

285 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 12.

286 Our Watch, 'Working with Children and Young People' (Policy Brief 5, May 2015) 9.

287 Letter from the Victorian Government Solicitor's Office to the Royal Commission into Family Violence, 12 October 2015, 1–3.

288 Ibid 2–3.

289 Ibid 3.

290 Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 26.

291 Statement of Flood, 9 July 2015, 9 [37].

292 Ibid.

293 Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 26.

294 Such as the Vocational Education and Training (VET) Quality Framework: Statement of Callister, 4 August 2015, 55 [236].

295 Victoria University, 'Respect and Responsibility Policy and Procedures: Briefing for the Royal Commission', 1–3, provided by Victoria University to the Commission, 21 December 2015.

296 Ibid 1.

297 Ibid.

298 See, eg, State of Victoria, Submission 717, 30; Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Ending Violence Against Women and Children: Further Initiatives for Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence against Women and Children: Everyone has a Responsibility to Act 2012–2015' (October 2015) 8; Victorian Health Promotion Foundation (VicHealth), Submission 243, 20–1.

299 Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 22.

300 Women's Health West Inc, Submission 239, 25.

301 Maribyrnong City Council, Submission 362, 17.

302 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'The Respect, Responsibility and Equality Program: A Summary Report on Five Projects That Build New Knowledge to Prevent Violence Against Women' (April 2012) 3.

303 Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 15. 'Area Partnerships are a shared commitment across Victorian Government departments including the Departments of Education and Early Childhood; Health; Human Services; Justice; Premier and Cabinet and Victoria Police to work with local government and the community sector to reduce child vulnerability'. Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Area Partnerships Launch Site Handbook: Reducing Child and Youth Vulnerability Together', 3, 16, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

304 Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 16.

305 Ibid; Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 28; Gippsland Women's Health, Submission 692, 3.

306 Maribyrnong City Council, Submission 362, 17.

307 City of Ballarat, Submission 146, 1.

308 Ibid 1–2.

309 Brimbank City Council, Submission 123, 4.

310 Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 47.

311 Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth), 'Meta-evaluation of the Preventing Violence against Women in our Community project: Final Report' (Australian Government, 2014) 84.

312 Ibid 86.

313 Statement of Hearne, 5 August 2015, 4 – 5 [22].

314 Transcript of Higgins, 10 August 2015, 2503 [27]–2504 [5].

315 Maryborough Rotary Club, Submission 133, 5.

316 Transcript of Hearne, 10 August 2015, 2495 [27]–[38].

317 Transcript of Hann, 12 October 2015, 3320 [12]–[22].

318 Women's Health Grampians, Submission 824, 10.

319 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 99, 15.

320 Ibid 9–10.

321 See, eg, ibid 9–10.

322 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation (VicHealth), Submission 243, Appendix 3, 32.

323 Ibid.

324 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'GEAR', 2, provided by Victorian Health Promotion Foundation to the Commission, 5 January 2016.

325 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Conceptualisation and Design of an Intervention Site for Integrated Primary Prevention Activity' (Final Report, 3 June 2011) 28.

326 Ibid 33. Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 324, 3.

327 Go Goldfields, Submission 498, 2.

328 Go Goldfields, 'Alliance Evaluation Report: 2012–2014' (2015) 29.

329 Ibid 30.

330 Statement of Higgins, 7 August 2015, 3 [20].

331 Maryborough Rotary Club, Submission 133, 3.

332 Statement of Higgins, 7 August 2015, 4 [27].

333 Ibid.

- 334 Ibid 5 [35].
- 335 Ibid 4 [31]–5 [34].
- 336 Ibid 5 [36].
- 337 Ibid 8 [51].
- 338 Anastasia Powell, Larissa Sandy and Jessica Findling, 'Promising Practices in Workplace and Organisational Approaches for the Prevention of Violence Against Women' (prepared for Our Watch, RMIT University, 2015) 8.
- 339 Ibid.
- 340 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 41, 44.
- 341 Powell, Sandy and Findling, above n 338, 23–4, 28.
- 342 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 60, 21.
- 343 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 28, 57.
- 344 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 6–7 [32].
- 345 Michael Flood, 'Preventing Violence Against Women and Girls' in Ronald J Burke and Debra A Major (eds), Gender in Organizations: Are Men Allies or Adversaries to Women's Career Advancement (Edward Elgar Publishing, 2014) 405; AFL Community Club, AFL Taking the Tackle: Respect is for Everyone <<http://www.learningseat.com/servlet/ShopLearning?companyId=afcommunityclub&categoryName=Browse+%BB+%3CB%3EClub+Management+Courses%3CB%3E+%BB+AFL+Taking+the+Tackle:+Respect+is+for+Everyone&learningId=90192>>.
- 346 See also Transcript of Dyson, 10 August 2015, 7 [33].
- 347 Our Watch, Sports Engagement Programs <http://www.ourwatch.org.au/What-We-Do-\(1\)/Sports-Engagement-Program/Sports-Engagement-Program)>.
- 348 Lisa Wheildon, '$1million Granted to Sporting Organisations to Prevent Violence Against Women and their Children' (30 July 2015) Our Watch <http://www.ourwatch.org.au/News-media/Latest-news/\$1million-granted-to-national-sporting-organisatio>.
- 349 AFL Victoria, Fair Game Respect Matters (2016) <<http://www.aflvic.com.au/fair-game-respect-matters/#>>.
- 350 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 8 [37]–[38].
- 351 Anastasia Powell, 'Review of Bystander Approaches in Support of Preventing Violence Against Women' (Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, May 2011) 8.
- 352 Julienne Corboz, Michael Flood and Sue Dyson, 'Challenges of Bystander Intervention in Male-Dominated Professional Sport: Lessons from the Australian Football League' (2015) Violence Against Women (forthcoming) 14.
- 353 Ibid 11.
- 354 Ibid 14.
- 355 Ibid 16.
- 356 Whittlesea Community Connections, Submission 375, 18.
- 357 Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015; Wyndham City Council, Submission 518, 17.
- 358 Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 63.
- 359 Ibid.
- 360 Georgina Sutherland et al, 'Media Representations of Violence Against Women and Their Children' (Landscapes: State of Knowledge No 15, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, November 2015) 30-3.
- 361 Domestic Violence Victoria, 'Working with News and Social Media to Prevent Violence Against Women and their Children: A Strategic Framework for Victoria' (2015) 8.
- 362 Primary Care Connect, Submission 145, 5; Gippsland Lakes Community Health, Submission 229, 2; Australian Greek Welfare Society, Submission 578, 9.
- 363 Phoenix Foundation, Submission 675, 3.
- 364 Transcript of Calafiore, 15 October 2015, 3831 [25]–[26].
- 365 Domestic Violence Victoria, above n 361.
- 366 Ibid 8.
- 367 Ibid.
- 368 See, eg, the EVAs, Eliminating Violence Against Women Media Awards <<http://www.evas.org.au/>>.
- 369 Domestic Violence Victoria, above n 361, 38.
- 370 Sutherland et al, above n 360.
- 371 Ibid 18.
- 372 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 2.
- 373 Preventing Violence Together Partnership, Submission 491, 11.
- 374 Loddon Campaspe Integrated Family Violence Services Consortium, Submission 914, 20. See also, Domestic Violence Victoria—05, Submission 943, 25.
- 375 These were funded by the Department of Justice and Regulation's 'Reducing Violence Against Women and their Children, Victorian Grants Program' as part of the Mallee District Aboriginal Service Family and Community Violence Prevention Project. A series of six television advertisements were developed and designed by community members. See the advertisements at Mallee District Aboriginal Services: Mildura, Swan Hill, Kerang and Robinvale, Ending Family Violence (2013) <<http://www.mdas.org.au/familyviolence>>.
- 376 Transcript of Holmes, 10 August 2015, 2439 [28]–[31].
- 377 Anglican Diocese of Melbourne, Submission 173, 7.
- 378 CHALLENGE Family Violence, 'Promoting Equality and Respect: An Interfaith Collaboration on Preventing Family Violence' (City of Greater Dandenong, 2015).
- 379 City of Casey, Submission 354, 4.
- 380 Anglican Diocese of Melbourne, Submission 173, 10.
- 381 Ibid.
- 382 Ibid 12, 15.
- 383 Preventing Violence Together Partnership, Submission 491, 15; Women's Health and Wellbeing Barwon South West Inc, Submission 780, 24; Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 16; Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 24.
- 384 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 39.
- 385 Darebin City Council, Submission 222, 8.
- 386 Domestic Violence Victoria—01, Submission 943, Attachment 2, 9.
- 387 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 25–26.
- 388 Statement of Fergus, 7 August 2015, 9 [45].
- 389 World Health Organization and London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, above n 4, 3.
- 390 Women's Health West Inc, Submission 239, 21.
- 391 Loddon Campaspe Integrated Family Violence Services Consortium, Submission 914, 28.
- 392 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 13 [60].
- 393 Ibid.
- 394 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 9 [40].

395 Loddon Campaspe Integrated Family Violence Services Consortium, Submission 914, 28; Our Watch—01, Submission 922, 20–2. See also, State of Victoria, Submission 717, 9.

396 Transcript of Campbell, 15 October 2015, 3760 [8]–[14].

397 See, eg, Women’s Health in the North, Building a Respectful Community Preventing Violence Against Women 2011-2016 <<http://www.whin.org.au/resources/preventing-violence-against-women.html#BARC>>; Monash University, ‘Evaluation of the Northern Region Prevention of Violence against women strategy’ (Evaluation Report, November 2013) 7; Western Region Action Plan to Prevent Violence Against Women, Preventing Violence Together, Women’s Health West <<http://whwest.org.au/health-promotion/prevent-violence/preventing-violence-together>>; Women’s Health East, ‘Together for Equality and Respect: A Strategy to Prevent Violence Against Women in Melbourne’s East 2013-2017’ (May 2013).

398 Women’s Health Victoria, Submission 514, 20.

399 Women’s Health Victoria, Equality and Safety for Women: Preventing Violence Before it Occurs—The Guide (2016) <<http://equalityandsafetyforwomen.org.au/the-guide/>>.

400 Minister for the Prevention of Family Violence, The Hon Fiona Richardson MP, ‘Family Violence Prevention Funding Boost’ (Media Release, 27 October 2015).

401 Women’s Health West Inc, Submission 239, 24.

402 Women’s Health in the North, Submission 637, 27.

403 See, eg, Community Crime Prevention, Regional Crime Prevention Groups (1 March 2016) Department of Justice and Regulation <<http://www.crimeprevention.vic.gov.au/home/your+community/regional+crime+prevention+groups/>>.

404 Transcript of Williams, 13 October 2015, 3469 [27]–3470 [5]; Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3864 [24]–3866 [31]. See also Department of Health and Human Services, Services Connect (4 August 2015) <<http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/for-service-providers/for-funded-agencies/services-connect>>.

405 State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix C, 134.

406 Ibid 29.

407 Maribyrnong City Council, Submission 362, 2; Municipal Association of Victoria, Submission 641, 5, 24.

408 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 99, 8–9.

409 Go Goldfields, above n 328, 52.

410 Preventing Violence Together Partnership, Submission 491, 16; Knox City Council, Submission 227, 1; Wyndham City Council, Submission 518, 30; Darebin City Council, Submission 222, 14.

411 Maribyrnong City Council, Submission 362, 11.

412 Transcript of Kinnersly, 12 October 2015, 3340 [3]–[13].

413 See, eg, Transcript of Lay, 15 October 2015, 3706 [2]–[11].

414 Preventing Violence Together Partnership, Submission 491, 3.

415 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 60, 21.

416 Ibid 17, 19, 20.

417 Community consultation, Werribee 2, 11 May 2015.

418 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 99, 15.

419 UN Women, above n 3, 10.

420 Council of Australian Governments, above n 66, 15.

421 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 39.

422 Victorian Government, ‘A Victorian Gender Equality Strategy: Consultation Paper’ (November 2015) 4.

423 Liz Wall, ‘Gender Equality and Violence Against Women: What’s the Connection?’ (Australian Institute of Family Studies (Cth), June 2014).

424 Our Watch, Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 17–20.

425 MonashLink Community Health Services Ltd, Submission 121, 7; City of Casey, Submission 354, 5; City of Melbourne, Submission 798, 8.

426 City of Whittlesea—01, Submission 714, 30–1.

427 Department of Education and Training, above n 179, 34.

428 Ibid 11.

429 See, eg, Gleeson et al, above n 207, 9.

430 Susan Rennie, Submission 248, 1.

431 Family Planning Victoria, Submission 557, 6.

432 Christine Craik, Submission 437, 1.

433 The nine organisations are: CASA Forum (Victorian Centres Against Sexual Assault); Domestic Violence Victoria; Multicultural Centre for Women’s Health; No To Violence; Our Watch; Victorian Equal and Opportunity and Human Rights Commission; Women with Disabilities Victoria; Women’s Health Association of Victoria; Women’s Health Victoria. Moira Carmody et al, ‘Framing Best Practice: National Standards for the Primary Prevention of Sexual Assault Through Education—National Sexual Assault Prevention Education Project for NASASV’ (University of Western Sydney, Social Justice and Social Change Research Centre, April 2009).

434 Our Watch, Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 4, 12, 29, 31–2.

435 Transcript of Rechter and Kinnersly, 12 October 2015, 3351 [25]–3352 [15].

436 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 4 [21].

437 Carmody et al, above n 433, 60.

438 Ibid 59.

439 UN Women, above n 3, 32.

440 Carmody et al, above n 433, 61.

441 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 21 [91].

442 Statement of Imbesi, 6 August 2015, 3 [14].

443 Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 13.

444 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 32.

445 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 79.

446 Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 36–7.

447 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 21 [91].

448 Statement of Higgins, 7 August 2015, 8 [54].

449 Wei Leng Kwok, ‘Trends in Evaluation: Preventing Violence Against Women—Paper 2’ (Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, December 2013) 9.

450 Transcript of Hearne, 10 August 2015, 2490 [10]–[20].

451 Our Watch, ‘International Evidence Base’ (Policy Brief 3, September 2014) 10.

452 Ibid.

453 Our Watch, Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety and Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, above n 3, 64.

454 Shaun Leane—Member for Eastern Metropolitan Region, Submission 139, 3.

- 455 World Health Organization and London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, above n 4, 2.
- 456 See generally Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, 'Evaluating Victorian Projects for the Primary Prevention of Violence Against Women: A Concise Guide' (2015).
- 457 Kwok, above n 449, 26.
- 458 Transcript of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 2430 [22]-[29].
- 459 Women's Health West Inc, Submission 239, 25.
- 460 Flood, Fergus and Heenan, above n 210, 2, 10. Our Watch, above n 451, 10.
- 461 Department of Human Services, 'Victoria's Vulnerable Children: Our Shared Responsibility 2013-2022' (May 2013) 9.
- 462 Australian National Preventative Health Agency (Abolition) Bill 2014 (Cth).
- 463 Transcript of Calafiore, 15 October 2015, 3816 [21]-[25].
- 464 Transcript of Eccles, 16 October 2015, 3924 [7]-[8].
- 465 Australian Education Union Victoria, Submission 235, 5; Inner East Community Health, Submission 438, 5; Victorian Council Of Social Service, Submission 467, 39; CASA Forum, Submission 828, 7.
- 466 Gleeson et al, above n 207, 7.
- 467 Department of Education and Training, 'Implementing the New Victorian Curriculum' (Fact Sheet) <<http://www.education.vic.gov.au/Documents/about/educationstate/curriculum.pdf>>.

37 The workplace

Introduction

Workplaces can play an important role in preventing and responding to family violence. They reflect the breadth and diversity of the community and offer a key opportunity to reach people who are affected by family violence, to provide support for them and to help them take steps to secure their safety. Workplaces are also important sites for dealing with family violence because the effects of violence reach into them in a variety of ways and because attitudes and cultures that prevail in them can influence the level to which violent behaviour is supported or condoned.

The first section of this chapter considers the factors that make workplaces, and workplace culture, important in preventing or countering family violence, and the impact family violence has in the workplace—for workers experiencing family violence, their co-workers and employers. It then outlines initiatives that have been developed and implemented in workplaces in Victoria with the aim of preventing and responding to family violence, and some of the main findings that have emerged about what is required for effective implementation of these initiatives.

The second section of the chapter discusses the concept of paid family violence leave, which emerged in evidence to the Commission as an issue, and considers recent moves to expand its availability to a greater number of employees who might be affected by family violence. The section discusses evidence from employers about how they have responded to the practical challenges of implementing family violence leave.

In this section, the Commission also explores opportunities for expanding the roles and functions of WorkSafe Victoria and the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission to work with employers to ensure that workers are protected from occupational health and safety risks posed by family violence and from any discrimination they might experience as a result of being a victim of family violence.

In the final section of the chapter, after considering current practice and the issues raised by stakeholders, the Commission sets out a way forward. The Commission proposes that the Victorian Government ensure that when it implements its decision to provide public sector employees with access to dedicated family violence leave, it also provides employees with suitable information and supports, and managers with training and resources. Secondly, the Commission proposes that the Victorian Government implement best-practice workplace programs in all public sector workplaces to ensure that these workplaces have suitable policies for helping family violence victims and to build a respectful, gender equitable culture.

Finally, in order to foster more widespread adoption of family violence-related policies and programs in Victorian workplaces, the Commission proposes the Victorian Government support moves to expand the availability of family violence leave to non-government employees, facilitate the dissemination of resources and tools to help workplaces address family violence, and review and report on options for using existing regulatory frameworks and government procurement policies to support all Victorian employers in implementing best-practice family violence policies.

In Chapter 36, the Commission discusses the importance of engaging with organisations to promote cultures of non-violence, respect and equity as strategies to prevent family violence.

Context and practice

Workplaces are an important site for intervening to prevent and respond to family violence. This section examines the relationship between family violence and workplaces and provides an overview of various workplace programs and initiatives for preventing and responding to family violence.

... we know that [family violence] is an issue that needs to be dealt with by the community at large and that the workplace is a very important part of the community, and that if we are serious about tackling this issue then the workplace has to be part of the solution.¹

Workplaces present an opportunity to reach large sections of the population. This is important both for harnessing community effort in tackling family violence and for reaching people who might need help or advice.

Workplaces have particular potential to reach and support members of vulnerable or isolated groups, who can have limited access to services and agencies they need. For newly arrived immigrant and refugee women, for example, their workplace might be their only point of contact with systems of support beyond their own families.

Relationship between family violence and workplaces

Workplaces are widely regarded as an important site for intervening to address family violence for several reasons:

- ▷ Family violence can have a negative impact on a victim's employment.
- ▷ The workplace can be a place where family violence is perpetrated.
- ▷ Employment can be a protective factor against family violence, and employers and colleagues can play a role in recognising the signs of violence and supporting an employee who is experiencing it.
- ▷ A workplace's culture can perpetuate attitudes that support and condone family violence, making it an important place for promoting gender equity and positive changes to violence-supportive attitudes and behaviours.²

Many of these considerations were apparent in the account one woman provided in a witness statement to the Commission. Ms 'Anjali Jana' told of her experience of family violence, including how it affected her employment and, in turn, how her workplace supported her in seeking help and regaining her financial independence:

I was doing really well at work and I was given more shifts than I was contracted for, meaning that I was earning quite a bit of money ... He [my husband] started to make me put all of my money that I was earning directly into his personal bank account, so that I had nothing. I had to rely on him for access to my money, but he always spent it and said that we had no money for anything.

Because of [the abuse], I began to feel sad all of the time, and it was hard to feel motivated, particularly in terms of my work. Previously I had been an excellent employee but now I was having trouble concentrating and I found it hard to do a good job, like I used to, I found that I would make lots of mistakes at work. They started giving me less shifts as a result.

People at work had noticed the drop in my performance and I think that they were privately concerned for me but I didn't talk about my life at home with them. I didn't understand at the time that a marriage was supposed to be any different to what I was experiencing. I thought that this is just how marriage is supposed to be. However, when I spoke to the other people that I worked with, I began to see that they were really happy in their marriages and their lives. In contrast, I grew to realise that the marriage that I was living in was like being in hell. I knew that there was something wrong with my marriage, that the way that my husband was treating me was not right.

My manager spoke to me and I admitted to her what was going on, that it was really bad. I knew that if I went back I would do something that I would regret, to myself, because this was not the life that I wanted. One of my colleagues was there and she gave me a 1800 number to call, I think it was the Woman's Domestic Violence Hotline. I called them but they said that they couldn't help me because I had a job. They told me to call WAYYS in Dandenong instead, so I did. WAYYS told me to come and see them in person. I asked my manager and she said that was absolutely fine, that I needed to go and sort this out and get my life in order because I couldn't work like this. She said that she would look after my shift and that I should take as long as I needed. My manager spoke to the area manager and he said that this was OK as well. Normally you have to give four days' notice for leave but they were great about letting me go with no notice at all. They were so supporting and lovely throughout the whole process.

I am starting to get my life back on track after all of this. It has been about a year since I left. He took everything, every penny in my account, however I have been able to save up by working hard and my manager helped me to find extra shifts. In addition, the people at work have been so amazing in helping me get all of the basics that I needed. They gave me money to help me when I had first left my husband. They were like my family, when I had no one else to turn to. My employer has been so supportive, they did things like making sure that I was never rostered on alone until my intervention order was in place, in case my husband turned up at work, so that I was safe. They have been amazing.

I have saved enough money and I have started my training to be a nurse. I am so happy. However, I will still keep working one shift with my employer so I can stay in contact with all of my friends there.³

The effects of family violence on employment

Family violence can have negative effects on a victim's employment, which can in turn compound the overall effects of the violence. Victims report that unexplained absences, poor performance, anxiety and distress caused by family violence can lead them to leave or change their employment, accept insecure employment or otherwise disrupt their working arrangements. The Commission was told of a case in which a woman's employment was directly at risk as a result of the time she took off work following episodes of violence:

She had been in full time employment for 27 years in a large metropolitan school. She began to feel deeply embarrassed about the injuries to her face and arms, which were becoming more visible, and started missing work. As a result, she was disciplined and told she could be terminated from her role and the ongoing financial security and safety it provided to her.⁴

ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) analysed the 2012 Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey and found, among other things, that:

... 145,700 women who had been physically assaulted by a male cohabiting partner, took time off work in the 12 months after the incident. This is over one in four women who were employed during this time and who had experienced this type of violence.⁵

The Australian Family and Domestic Violence Clearinghouse's National Domestic Violence and the Workplace Survey in 2011 found as follows:

... women with a history of domestic violence have a more disrupted work history, are consequently on lower personal incomes, have had to change jobs more often and are employed at higher levels in casual and part time work than women with no experience of violence.⁶

Nearly half of the survey respondents who had experienced family violence reported that the violence had affected their capacity to go to work. The main reason for this was physical injury or restraint (67 per cent). Some reported that their violent partner hid keys and personal documents such as drivers licences, failed to care for children or refused access to transportation money;⁷ others reported that sleepless nights affected their performance at work or that the violence caused them to be distracted, anxious, tired or unwell.⁸

This experience was echoed in the Commission's community consultations. One woman reported:

I lost one job because I went to work with a black eye and they said we don't want your crazy husband here. So staff don't understand, managers don't understand. There's no trust, you can't confide in anyone because people gossip, people blow it out of proportion, people don't understand.⁹

The workplace as a site of family violence

The workplace itself can sometimes be a site where family violence occurs—for example, if a victim is harassed by the perpetrator at her place of work or in the context of her employment in a family business. People now work in many types of environments, and the workplace can be a site of family violence when victims of family violence work from home.

Of the respondents to the Family and Domestic Violence Clearinghouse survey who reported family violence in the preceding 12 months, 19 per cent reported that the violence had continued in the workplace in the form of abusive telephone calls, emails or physical confrontations.¹⁰

It is also not uncommon for violence to occur between two employees at the same workplace who are in a relationship.¹¹ The FDVCH survey results show that 12 per cent of those who reported experiencing family violence were employed in the same workplace as the person perpetrating the violence.¹²

In a recent case heard by the Fair Work Commission an employer was found to have unfairly dismissed a woman who had taken time away from work because of a domestic violence incident perpetrated by her partner and her subsequent court attendance to obtain an intervention order against him.¹³ Both she and her partner worked at the same place. When the woman returned to work her employer told her it would 'not be safe or nice for [her] employment to continue'¹⁴ and that 'keeping [both her and her partner] in the office [was] a no.'¹⁵ The Fair Work Commission found that the employer's words during the meeting effectively amounted to the woman's dismissal and ordered the employer to pay her $27,500 in compensation.¹⁶

A perpetrator can also use a woman's earning capacity to abuse her financially. Financial abuse is discussed in Chapter 21.

Employment as a protective factor

Employment is a crucial 'protective' factor in relation to family violence:

- ▷ The financial security and independence provided by paid employment increase a victim's ability to leave the relationship and recover from the effects of the violence. This is discussed in Chapter 21.
- ▷ The workplace can be the only place where the victim spends time physically away from the perpetrator, giving her the space to take steps to ensure her safety.
- ▷ Employers and colleagues can play an important role in helping victims recognise that they are experiencing family violence and supporting them in seeking help.

The Commission heard that the financial security provided by paid employment is of particular importance when someone is leaving a violent relationship. The Young Men's Christian Association of Victoria noted in its submission:

A critical factor for women experiencing violence is their ability to secure financial independence. Maintaining employment is therefore crucial. At the same time, the impacts of the violence may compromise the victim's ability to get to work and meet agreed expectations at work. This creates a ... dilemma for women seeking to escape the impact of violence – at the time they most need their work they are most [in] danger of losing it.¹⁷

The Commission was also told about the ways in which a workplace can provide access to support services, as well as being a source of support itself.

... we do know that people do get support through their workplace, it is a significant place where women get support. For some women it's the only safe place they have. It may be the only place that they can look on-line for resources and know that they are not going to be checked, their browser history is not going to be checked, where they can have 10, 15 minutes to themselves. So work is an incredibly important place for women to get support about family violence.¹⁸

Initiatives taken by the City of Whittlesea are indicative of the protection that can be afforded victims through their employment:

The City recognises the impacts that workplace policy has on increasing access to support services for women experiencing violence and how it could engage in the prevention of escalating violence by intervening early through support and paid leave entitlements for staff. The policy helps to develop an environment that promotes gender equity and models non-violent and respectful relationships to prevent family violence occurring; while creating a supportive environment to encourage victims of family violence to seek support.¹⁹

ANROWS has reported that the 2012 ABS Personal Safety Survey shows that work colleagues were included among the most common sources of support for women who had been physically assaulted by their cohabiting partner.²⁰

Workplace culture

Some workplaces are said to contribute to the family violence problem. Dr Michael Flood, Australian Research Council Future Fellow and Senior Lecturer in Sociology, University of Wollongong, has noted that ‘there is now substantial evidence that violence-supportive attitudes are encouraged and institutionalised in the peer relations and cultures of particular organisations and workplaces’—particularly male-dominated sporting clubs, workplaces and military institutions.²¹

Dr Sue Dyson, Associate Professor and Principal Research Fellow at the Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society, La Trobe University, reflected this point in her statement to the Commission:

Workplaces are another setting in which sexism and cultures of disrespect can thrive. There are also likely to be women in any workplace who have been personally affected by violence and the culture of the workplace can potentially exacerbate the effects of intimate partner or sexual violence. Despite decades of anti-discrimination legislation and the availability of equally (or better) qualified women, gender equality in senior leadership roles remains an intractable problem ...²²

Workplaces have therefore been identified as important settings for the prevention of family violence and violence-supporting attitudes. Employers can be partners in violence prevention by encouraging attitudinal and behavioural change in their workplaces: they can create a culture that encourages respectful relationships, both inside and outside the workplace, and builds people’s confidence to challenge sexist, discriminatory and bullying behaviours and environments.

Workplace programs and initiatives

Numerous workplace-based programs and initiatives for preventing and responding to family violence have been developed and implemented in Victoria and elsewhere in Australia in the past 20 years, led by a range of different organisations.

Our Watch commissioned RMIT University to review workplace and organisational programs and approaches for preventing violence against women.²³ The RMIT researchers noted that workplace initiatives can have three main targets of activity—responding to violence that is already occurring, preventing violence, and promoting gender equality and respect.²⁴ Most of these activities are voluntarily engaged in by employers, although, as discussed shortly, employers also have a range of legislative obligations to provide safe and non-discriminatory workplaces.

In the case of responding to violence that is already occurring, workplace initiatives can include the following:

- ▷ helping individual staff and managers to recognise the signs that an employee might be experiencing violence at home, to respond appropriately to a disclosure of violence, and/or to refer the person concerned to appropriate services
- ▷ having policies and additional leave entitlements to support individuals experiencing violence. The availability of family violence leave is discussed in detail later in this chapter, under the heading 'Family violence leave'
- ▷ supporting people in taking bystander action to confront perpetrators of violence about their behaviour or intervening in an incident observed in the workplace.

Bystander intervention approaches are designed to instil a sense of responsibility in community members, so they are able to intervene in incidents of violence or challenge violence-condoning attitudes. There is strong support for incorporating bystander training in workplace programs.²⁵ Victorian research conducted in 2012 analysed the factors suggesting that an individual might be more likely to take bystander action when witnessing sexist, discriminatory or violent behaviour. Central factors were the individual's level of confidence, their assessment of whether the action would have a positive effect, and whether they thought the action would have the support of their friends, peers or colleagues.²⁶ In a workplace context an additional factor was an individual's confidence that their employer would take the matter seriously.²⁷

Prevention and gender equality initiatives involve improving workplace culture, conditions and practices to combat violence-supporting attitudes and behaviours and to ensure women's equal participation in the workforce. Organisational development is increasingly recognised as a specific component of effective prevention strategies:²⁸ as a technique, it recognises that organisations and organisational culture have great potential to influence and shape social norms through modelling respectful behaviours and reinforcing gender equitable and non-violent cultures.²⁹

The RMIT paper noted that, although response and prevention activities are conceptually distinct, in practice they can and do co-exist and are often blurred. The authors also state that 'policies and programs to respond to incidents of violence are less likely to be effective within an informal workplace culture that condones violence against women, sexist and/or other discriminatory behaviour, or accepts gender inequality'.³⁰ Table 37.1 shows the various activities possible in each focus area nominated in the RMIT paper.

Table 37.1 Response, prevention and promoting gender equity: complementary models for change in the workplace

Model	Area of focus	Example activities
Responding to violence	Knowledge, attitudes	Awareness-raising communications across the organisation about the extent and nature of intimate partner violence and how to support staff who may be experiencing it. Leadership active in speaking about intimate partner violence. Support and referral information for potential victims and perpetrators made available throughout the workplace.
	Behaviours, informal culture, practices	Managers and key contact staff trained to recognise the signs of family violence, respond appropriately to disclosures, and refer to services.
	Structures, formal policies, procedures	Family violence leave provisions, and flexible work policy and safety planning in addition to legislative requirements (e.g. Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth), and Workplace Gender Equality Act 2012 (Cth)).
Preventing violence against women	Knowledge, attitudes	Awareness-raising communications across the organisation about the extent and nature of violence against women and the connection between sexism, rigid gender roles and gender stereotyping in supporting violence against women. Leadership active in speaking about violence against women and challenging sexist cultures and practices within workplaces.
	Behaviours, informal culture, practices	Managers and key contact staff trained in recognising and responding to sexism and discriminatory or exclusive gendered practices. Staff trained in taking prosocial action as bystanders when they witness sexism and discriminatory or exclusive gendered practices.
	Structures, formal policies, procedures	Employee codes of conduct and/or values statements commit to intolerance of sexism, discrimination and violence against women, in addition to meeting legislative requirements (e.g. Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) and Workplace Gender Equality Act 2012 (Cth)).
Promoting gender equity and respect	Attitudes, norms	Awareness-raising communications across organisation about the foundations and causes of gender inequality, sexism, discrimination, unconscious gender bias and promoting respectful relationships. Leadership active in speaking about valuing females and males equally, promoting the same rights, opportunities and rewards across the organisation, including women's equal participation in decision making and pay structures.
	Behaviours, informal culture, practices	Managers trained to recognise and address unconscious gender bias in workplace decision making and practice. Leadership training for women to encourage and promote women in leadership positions.
	Structures, formal policies, procedures	Reporting to the Workplace Gender Equality Agency on equity measures. Building a gender equality strategy in consultation with staff. Review of hiring and promotion policies and practices to attract and retain quality women employees.

Source: Based on Anastasia Powell, Larissa Sandy and Jessica Findling, 'Promising Practices in Workplace and Organisational Approaches for the Prevention of Violence Against Women' (Report prepared for Our Watch, RMIT University, 2015), 13.

During the course of its inquiry the Commission learnt about a number of programs that incorporate some or more of the types of response and prevention activities listed in Table 37.1:

- ▷ Act@Work—Challenging Sexism, Discrimination and Violence against Women and Children (Women's Health Grampians in partnership with Child and Family Services Ballarat, WRISC Family Violence Support and the City of Ballarat)³¹
- ▷ Engage to Change (McAuley Community Services for Women)³²
- ▷ the White Ribbon Australia Workplace Accreditation Program³³
- ▷ Take a Stand: Working Together against Domestic Violence (VicHealth, Women's Health Victoria, Women's Health Loddon Mallee, Melton City Council, Women's Health and Wellbeing Barwon South West)³⁴
- ▷ United: Working Together to Prevent Violence in the West (Women's Health West Inc.)³⁵
- ▷ Gender and Disability Workforce Development Program (Women with Disabilities Victoria)³⁶
- ▷ Y Respect Gender Project (YMCA Victoria)³⁷
- ▷ We Need to Talk: Preventing Violence Against Women Strategy (City of Melbourne)³⁸
- ▷ Darebin Says NO to Family Violence: A Whole-of-Organisation Approach to Preventing Violence Against Women (City of Darebin)³⁹
- ▷ Paving the Way (Wellington Shire Council, Baw Baw Shire Council)⁴⁰
- ▷ the Equal Footing tool kit (VicHealth)⁴¹
- ▷ Safe at Home, Safe at Work (previously the Workplace Rights and Entitlements Project) (UNSW Australia's Family and Domestic Violence Clearinghouse under the leadership of the Centre for Gender Related Violence Studies)⁴²
- ▷ Male Champions of Change (established by Elizabeth Broderick AO, Sex Discrimination Commissioner, Australian Human Rights Commission)⁴³
- ▷ Male Champions of Change (Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission)⁴⁴
- ▷ the Respect and Responsibility initiative (Australian Football League).⁴⁵

Building on this work, the Victorian Government has announced it will allocate $900,000 to a project, the Workplace Equality and Respect Project, to be carried out by Our Watch to help Victorian workplaces equip their staff to recognise and respond to family violence and maintain respectful relationships.⁴⁶ The project will work directly with selected participating workplaces and will partner with regional service providers to support the implementation of workplace programs in rural and regional Victoria. It is expected the project will directly reach over 2000 employees in multiple sectors, workplaces and geographical locations.⁴⁷ It will draw on existing programs, resources and evidence about effective practice to strengthen and consolidate workplace initiatives in Victoria. It will also develop minimum-practice standards as well as tools, guides, resources and training packages for future workplace programs.⁴⁸ These resources will be made available on an 'online knowledge hub'.⁴⁹ A project evaluation report is due to be provided to government in May 2017.⁵⁰

During its inquiry the Commission received information from the Department of Premier and Cabinet, the Department of Justice and Regulation, Victoria Legal Aid and Victoria Police about the policies and supports in place for any employees experiencing family violence.⁵¹ In broad terms, the initiatives consisted of access to employee assistance programs, fact sheets on family violence, the provision of referrals to support services and the availability of leave. The Family Violence Support Guidelines and Related Policy, issued by the Department of Justice and Regulation, offers staff access to professionally trained family violence officers within the Victims Support Agency. The role of these officers is to take a sensitive, non-judgmental approach to an employee who is experiencing family violence, assist with referrals to community support services, discuss measures for making safety a priority, and offer advice about suitable leave and flexible working arrangements.⁵²

Court Services Victoria told the Commission that, although it has no support, referral or assistance programs that relate specifically to family violence, court staff can have access to an employee assistance program for a range of matters. It further advised that at present it has no policies, guidance or work directions for managers that relate specifically to employees experiencing family violence, but is considering the development of such policies as part of its process of reviewing a number of human resources policies.⁵³ The Commission also heard from the Magistrates' and the Children's Courts that staff have access to an employee assistance program and that individual support is provided as required by management to staff, although there is no formal policy on this.⁵⁴

Victoria Police provides a number of employee support services, among them a confidential counselling service and a consultation service for managers seeking advice about employee wellbeing.⁵⁵ Chapter 14 discusses work done by Victoria Police to respond to family violence incidents involving police members as victims and/or perpetrators and to address cultural norms and attitudes within the organisation relating to casual sexism, adherence to rigid gender stereotypes and support for gender inequality.

The Independent Review into Sex Discrimination, Sexual Harassment, including Predatory Behaviour, in Victoria Police,⁵⁶ conducted by the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission at the request of Victoria Police, presented its Phase One report in 2015. The review's recommendations focused on the response to and prevention of sexual harassment and sex discrimination, recognising that workplaces are crucial settings for the prevention of violence against women. Among the recommendations, a whole-of-organisation Gender and Diversity Strategy linked to performance and capability was proposed, as was improving recruitment and retention processes and promotional pathways.⁵⁷ The review also recommended developing victim-centric internal complaint mechanisms and appropriate victim support services.⁵⁸ The Victorian Government has since announced a Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission review of gender equity and workplace culture in Victoria's fire services.⁵⁹

The South Australian Government has commissioned the Equal Opportunity Commission of South Australia to work with all South Australian government departments to achieve accreditation as White Ribbon workplaces.⁶⁰ The Commission was told that the Department of Justice and Regulation in Victoria is participating in the White Ribbon Australia Workplace Accreditation Program.⁶¹ In addition to engaging in a range of activities, such as an annual campaign, social marketing and promotional activities, White Ribbon offers, on a fee-for-service basis, prevention programs in schools and workplaces.⁶² Its workplace accreditation program involves workplaces committing to implement policies, programs, leadership and training to prevent and respond to violence against women. Workplaces are accredited for three years, during which time they must continue to promote cultural change, which is measured by means of a survey after 18 months.⁶³

Principles of workplace initiatives to address family violence

Although there have been limited reviews and evaluations of workplace initiatives, there is some evidence that they are effective in raising awareness and understanding within organisations, and in encouraging people to speak out against violence condoning attitudes and behaviours.⁶⁴

A number of factors have been cited in the literature and by people the Commission consulted as important considerations or preconditions for effective implementation of workplace-based programs. Central among these are the importance of leadership, ensuring that programs are tailored to the needs of the organisation and its employees, and building and disseminating the evidence base for what works.

Leadership required at all levels to promote organisational change

The Commission heard that leadership in organisations is crucial to ensuring not only that programs and initiatives are taken up in the first place but also that they are given priority within an organisation, that messages are consistently reinforced, and that employees have the confidence to put what they have learnt into practice.

A recent evaluation of the workplace training component of the Take a Stand program—which aims to strengthen organisational capacity to promote gender equality and non-violent norms—found that employees in organisations where the leadership style encouraged and valued employee feedback and participation, felt more positive about their capacity to challenge behaviours and attitudes that normalise violence against women. Employees in these types of organisation also felt more positive about their capacity to obtain help for a colleague found to be experiencing domestic violence.⁶⁵

It is also important that such a workplace program is part of the organisation's strategic and business planning process and is seen as the direct responsibility of senior organisational leadership,⁶⁶ rather than approaching family violence as merely a 'private issue' for individual workers, to be managed by human resources departments.⁶⁷ Additionally, it is vital to involve both senior managers and middle managers in organisational change programs.⁶⁸

The role of internal workplace 'champions' in leading organisational change is also seen as crucial to creating an enabling environment.⁶⁹ The Take a Stand evaluation stressed that such champions are needed to encourage respectful cultural attitudes, to provide advice about how to respond to inappropriate attitudes and behaviours, and to provide referrals to people seeking help when needed.⁷⁰ The specific role of the senior project officer of the Y Respect Gender project was cited in that project's evaluation as an important success factor; it had a positive impact on other senior managers, who also became advocates internally and in the wider community.⁷¹ Providing opportunities for internal workplace champions has also been identified as a way of involving more men in strategies for combatting family violence.⁷²

The City of Whittlesea informed the Commission that, as part of its family violence workplace support policy, it has 16 family violence contact officers on staff to act as contact points for anyone in the workplace experiencing family violence.⁷³ The role of the contact officers is to provide information about external services and workplace entitlements, to liaise confidentially with the local family violence specialist service on behalf of the employee, and to act as a conduit between the employee and the human resources department if the employee does not wish to talk to her immediate manager about her situation.⁷⁴

Tailoring the intervention to the needs of the organisation and its employees

The Commission heard that approaches to encourage workplaces to become involved in family violence prevention and responses need to be tailored to meet the needs of an individual organisation and that 'starting where the organisation is at' is an important part of ensuring that suitable programs are identified for specific organisations. There is no 'one size fits all' model. Knowledge of an organisation's readiness for change, as well as levels of motivation within the organisation, will help determine the nature of the resources, support and interventions to be adopted.

The RMIT paper reinforced the notion that understanding an organisation's current capacity and readiness is essential to determining the 'way-in':

... it became apparent that, for some workplaces, engaging in a discrete project of raising awareness of family violence and improving workplace policy and responses to potential victims of family violence (such as through the White Ribbon Workplace Accreditation Program), became a way-in to progressing further workplace changes in policy and practice to promote gender equity. [Alternatively] for other workplaces, such as in some corporate environments, gender equity in relation to retaining skilled women in senior positions and leadership was a way-in to a broader program of change that connected gender equity, respect and the prevention of violence against women.⁷⁵

Experience from previous programs suggests that program messaging and delivery need to be both targeted to the audience and 'non-confrontational'.⁷⁶ The Y Respect Gender project pointed to challenges in communicating the project goals in ways that did not alienate people and in managing defensive responses from some senior staff, particularly some male staff.⁷⁷ Similarly, the authors of the RMIT paper found that the language and concepts used in some workplace programs are overly technical and complex and are not easy to communicate to diverse audiences—in particular, the way they explain the connection between attitudes and gender stereotypes and incidents of violence.⁷⁸

It has also been found that local ownership is crucial in both facilitating attitudinal and organisation change and ensuring program stability and sustainability.⁷⁹

Building and disseminating the evidence base

As with many other programs and policies in the area of family violence, there is relatively little evidence about whether and how effective workplace-based programs are at preventing or responding suitably to family violence. It has been noted that 'new initiatives need comprehensive review and evaluation so that some form of cost-benefit can be accurately estimated to give an indication of the utility and effects of these types of interventions'.⁸⁰

Evaluating programs and initiatives and gathering information about their impact are also important for guiding the development of tools, knowledge and resources that reflect leading practice. Such materials can be disseminated to workplaces that have an interest in doing what they can to prevent and respond to family violence but do not know where to start or what steps to take.

In this regard, the RMIT paper puts forward a series of recommendations, including for the creation of a web-based portal for workplaces interested in relevant programs, the development of tool kits and common education materials that can be adapted for use by different organisations, and the introduction of national standards for workplace programs, supporting good evaluation practice, and highlighting promising practice.⁸¹

Challenges and opportunities

The Commission received evidence about the value of family violence leave as a necessary support for people experiencing family violence. This section considers the current extent of family violence leave in Victorian workplaces where enterprise agreements currently include or soon will include such leave. Additional mechanisms for providing family violence leave for employees who are not covered by existing entitlements under federal workplace laws, is then considered.

In the final part of this section other regulatory measures to deal with the workplace impacts of family violence are explored—such as occupational health and safety legislation and equal opportunity legislation.

Family violence leave

Lack of dedicated family violence leave can make the situation worse for people who are experiencing family violence. The Commission heard that victims often exhaust their leave entitlements when they must attend medical appointments and court appearances, organise accommodation, and care for their family. As one family violence survivor said, 'All workplaces should be able to give leave for those leaving a violent relationship, without my long service and sick leave I would not have financially survived'.⁸² The Commission was also informed that without paid leave, women are less likely to report family violence or manage the necessary interactions with courts, medical services and schools.⁸³

Mr Craig O'Donnell, the father of Rekiyah O'Donnell, who was killed by her partner, submitted that immediate family members of homicide victims should be entitled to a special category of leave to enable them to attend the trial of the accused 'without penalty or loss of job ... nor having to ... use some other form of leave that they have rightly accrued'.⁸⁴ Mr O'Donnell submitted that this would 'help minimise the trauma in seeking time off when experiencing such an ordeal'.⁸⁵

The concept of dedicated paid family violence leave has evolved as a specific mechanism for supporting victims. The ACTU submitted:

Paid domestic violence leave is designed to assist victims of domestic violence to remain in paid employment, support them through the process of escaping violence and to promote safe and secure workplaces for them and their work colleagues. The leave is based on an employee's need to, for example, attend court appearances and related appointments, seek legal advice, and make re-location arrangements.⁸⁶

The availability of family violence leave also sends a message to staff that the organisation takes family violence seriously.

On the question of whether there should be a designated family violence leave entitlement or simply greater access to already existing leave entitlements, Ms Ged Kearney, President of the ACTU, told the Commission she was in favour of specifically naming the entitlement 'family violence leave' because:

... if we do actually label it, if we do say that this is specifically for family and domestic violence leave, then it makes absolutely no doubt that that is the issue we are trying to tackle ... I think that that's an important part of culturally swinging about the attitude to domestic and family violence in the community.⁸⁷

Mr Phil Cleary, whose sister was killed by her former partner in 1987 and who has been a long-time advocate for the prevention of violence against women, submitted that paid family violence leave should be supported because it validates a woman's experience of violence.⁸⁸

Ms Wil Stracke, Campaigns and Industrial Officer at the Victorian Trades Hall Council, gave evidence that the provision of a specific family violence leave entitlement in an enterprise agreement was also a way of countering the stigma associated with family violence, the message to victims being:

This is a workplace where your co-workers have voted with you in an enterprise agreement for this entitlement, so they stand with you, and your employer has accepted that claim, which means they stand with you. So this is a workplace where we all stand together to support you in this situation.⁸⁹

The Commission heard that for people who do not have other sources of support and advice, this might encourage a victim to disclose violence and seek assistance.⁹⁰

The Commission notes that in August 2015 the Senate Finance and Public Administration References Committee handed down its report on domestic violence in Australia.⁹¹ The committee supported the notion of victims of domestic and family violence having access to leave provisions that help them maintain employment and financial security while attending necessary appointments such as court appearances and obtaining legal advice; it recommended that the Commonwealth Government investigate ways of implementing this throughout the private and public sectors.⁹²

Enterprise agreements

In the past five years there has been a marked increase in the adoption of family violence leave clauses in enterprise agreements. The Productivity Commission's report on its Workplace Relations Framework Inquiry noted that 840 enterprise agreements approved between 1 January 2012 and 30 June 2015—covering an estimated 630,592 employees—contained a family violence provision of some kind, most of them providing for family violence leave. It also noted that access to domestic violence provisions is skewed in favour of public sector employees.⁹³

One of the earliest family violence leave clauses negotiated in Victoria was that between the Australian Services Union and the Surf Coast Shire Council in 2010.⁹⁴ The agreement provided for up to 20 days' paid leave for an employee experiencing family violence. The employee could use the leave for medical appointments, legal proceedings and other activities related to the violence.⁹⁵ The clause required the employee to provide evidence of the violence in the form of a document issued by the police, a doctor, a district nurse, a family violence support worker or a lawyer in order to obtain the entitlement.⁹⁶ By September 2014 at least 60 of Victoria's 79 local councils had family violence leave provisions incorporated in their enterprise agreements.⁹⁷

The Commission heard from employers who, through their association with the White Ribbon Foundation and other initiatives, have introduced family violence leave policies into their workplaces. Ms Katherine Paroz, Human Resources Advisor at Telstra Corporation, gave evidence that Telstra's family violence leave policy had received a very positive response in that organisation's workplace.⁹⁸ She noted that, with 33,000 employees, Telstra thought it highly likely that some of its staff would be experiencing family violence.⁹⁹ Accordingly, Telstra introduced a policy providing for 10 days of paid, dedicated family violence leave for permanent employees and 10 days of unpaid family violence leave for casual employees in order to support staff and ensure that the business does not lose talented employees unnecessarily.¹⁰⁰

In August 2015 the Victorian Government announced that all future Victorian public sector enterprise agreements would contain a family violence clause.¹⁰¹ The government is the state's largest employer, so this will significantly increase the number of Victorians having access to family violence leave. Under an in-principle agreement reached with the Victorian Public Service, employees will be entitled to up to 20 days' paid family violence leave.¹⁰² Similarly, an in-principle agreement has been reached with Victoria Police, whereby employees will be entitled to 10 days' paid family violence leave plus such additional leave as is reasonable.¹⁰³ The government has not yet released any further details about how the entitlement to family violence leave will be communicated or otherwise implemented.

Although entitlements arising out of enterprise agreements negotiated to date provide coverage for a large number of Victorian employees, the current availability of family violence leave is low overall and largely dependent on an employer's goodwill. As Ms Stracke told the Commission:

... it should not be a matter of luck that you work for an employer who will do those things and bend over backwards, and that's why our submission is around an entitlement to this leave, that that's a critical thing because your safety should not be dependent on having an employer who is understanding.¹⁰⁴

Mr O'Donnell similarly submitted that entitlement to family violence-related leave should be 'enshrined in law' on the basis that not all employers are 'so gracious' as to offer a special category of paid leave when asked by an employee.¹⁰⁵

Many women work in insecure employment, do not have union representation, or work for organisations or businesses that are not covered by enterprise agreements, so inclusion of family violence leave in enterprise agreements can only ever be part of a broader effort to extend the availability of family violence leave throughout the workforce. As a result of this concern, the discussion associated with family violence leave has become focused on the creation of a right or entitlement to family violence leave entrenched in statute or modern awards.

Efforts are being made to make family violence leave an entitlement that is available to all national system employees (that is, employees covered by Australia's national workplace relations system) through inclusion in the National Employment Standards and to include an entitlement to family violence leave in all modern awards.

The Productivity Commission noted in its report on the Workplace Relations Framework Inquiry that employer organisations have been generally opposed to, or silent on, the introduction of a regulatory obligation on employers to provide entitlements related to family violence, on the basis that employees already have access to other generic forms of leave.¹⁰⁶ For its part, the Australian Industry Group has said that in its view the best way of involving employers in responding to family violence is to engage them in a positive way, to educate them and encourage their participation, rather than imposing 'heavy handed and inappropriate measures on them'.¹⁰⁷

Ms Julie Kun, Deputy CEO and Business Development Manager of WIRE (the Women's Information Referral Exchange) gave evidence that, when advocating in the past for employers to implement family violence leave entitlements, she has found employers responsive to the argument that such entitlements offer benefits not just for individual employees but also for the workplace and the wider community and in terms of how employers are perceived.¹⁰⁸

The Productivity Commission noted that paid domestic violence leave provisions can impose additional costs on employers but can also offer productivity and other benefits.¹⁰⁹

The National Employment Standards

The National Employment Standards are a set of 10 minimum employment standards that apply to all national system employees and cannot be displaced by employment contracts, modern awards or enterprise agreements.¹¹⁰ They are contained in the Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) and cover entitlements such as annual leave, personal or carer's leave, and compassionate leave.¹¹¹ Pursuant to the standards, employees (other than casual employees) may also make a request for flexible working arrangements, including in circumstances where they are experiencing violence from a member of their family.¹¹²

It has been proposed that the National Employment Standards be amended to include an entitlement to family violence leave. Subject to the way such a standard is drafted, including family violence leave in the standards would ensure that most employees in Victoria would have access to this category of leave. In 2011 the Australian Law Reform Commission recommended that the Commonwealth Government review the National Employment Standards with a view to including an additional entitlement to family violence leave.¹¹³ Amending the standards to this end has the support of the ACTU National Congress, which passed a resolution supporting the initiative in May 2015.¹¹⁴

In November 2015 the Commonwealth Government stated that it would consider the proposal to introduce family violence leave into the National Employment Standards and noted that the Productivity Commission was considering the matter as part of its workplace relations review.¹¹⁵ The Productivity Commission has since concluded that any decision about including family violence provisions in the standards should await the outcome of the Fair Work Commission's review of modern awards.¹¹⁶

The Federal Opposition announced, also in November 2015, that it would incorporate five days of paid family violence leave in the National Employment Standards if elected to government, following consultation with business, unions and other stakeholders.¹¹⁷

Modern awards

Modern awards, which are made by the Fair Work Commission, set minimum conditions for employees working in particular industries or occupations; they apply to all employees and employers covered by the relevant modern award.¹¹⁸ Not all employees will be covered by a modern award. A modern award creates a safety net for an industry, ensuring that the terms of any enterprise agreements made in that industry are better overall than the terms of the relevant modern award. Modern awards also offer the benefit of covering employees in the classifications set out in the award across an industry, regardless of the employees' relative bargaining power or level of union representation.

The Commission was informed that the ACTU and its affiliated unions are running a campaign to include 10 days' paid family violence leave as a minimum entitlement in all modern awards.¹¹⁹ The ACTU submitted:

The inclusion of domestic violence leave in Modern Awards ensures that the entitlement is available to all employees [for whom the award applies who are] affected by domestic violence as a matter of law and removes the need for [these] employees facing extremely difficult circumstances to negotiate with their employer in order to take time off work.¹²⁰

The Commission received no submissions from employer groups on the question of including family violence leave in modern awards. A number of employer groups did make submissions to the Fair Work Commission as part of the four-yearly modern award review process,¹²¹ opposing the introduction of a family violence leave clause.¹²² For example, the Australian Industry Group expressed concern that the inclusion of family violence provisions in modern awards was 'heavy handed' and risked generating negative views among employers in relation to efforts to deal with family violence.¹²³ It went on to say:

Awards are already far too complex to constitute a genuine safety net. Awards need to be simplified – not expanded to deal with the numerous very important community problems which exist. If family violence is to be dealt with through a specific clause in awards, why not street crime, drug dependence, alcohol dependence, illiteracy, homelessness, mental health, age discrimination, gender inequality, road accidents, traffic congestion, environmental degradation, and so on? All social problems interact with the workplace in one way or another.¹²⁴

The Commission notes that the Fair Work Commission has scheduled a hearing for October 2016 in respect of the inclusion of a family violence leave clause in modern awards as part of its modern awards review.¹²⁵

Considerations for employers introducing family violence leave

A number of concerns were expressed about the practical implementation of family violence leave in the workplace, regardless of the source of the entitlement. In particular, concern was expressed about the supports provided to employees, privacy, confidentiality, and the type of evidence to be provided by an employee seeking access to paid family violence leave.

A University of NSW Australia study of the incorporation of domestic violence clauses in enterprise agreements surveyed a number of large workplaces and consulting employees about their experiences. The researchers concluded, '[T]he essential elements for a successful implementation of domestic violence clauses are ongoing monitoring and research, awareness and information strategies, the guarantee of confidentiality, and training'.¹²⁶

Ms Paroz of Telstra told the Commission that when the corporation introduced family violence leave it communicated the policy widely to staff, required leaders to attend training, and provided assistance to managers in supporting employees seeking leave.¹²⁷ The Commission heard in evidence, however, that by July 2015 only 17 people had availed themselves of the entitlement to family violence leave since its introduction in November 2014, there being a total 45 days of family violence leave taken in this period.¹²⁸ Ms Paroz stated that Telstra was confident the policy was understood internally and that she expected employees would develop the confidence to use the entitlement to family violence leave over time.¹²⁹

The ACTU has proposed the following set of best-practice principles for evaluating and guiding the implementation of paid family violence leave provisions in workplaces:

- ▷ There must be a workplace contact for employees who want to disclose family violence.
- ▷ The role and responsibilities of the person to whom an employee has disclosed family violence must be clear.
- ▷ Processes and procedures for ensuring confidentiality for employees disclosing family violence must be clear.
- ▷ The clause must take account of mandatory reporting and Privacy Act 1988 (Cth) requirements if relevant.
- ▷ The clause must include anti-discrimination protections for employees disclosing family violence.
- ▷ Training and support must be provided for all employees—in particular, those who are likely to have an employee disclose circumstances related to family violence to them.¹³⁰

The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission expressed concern about the evidence that an employee who sought access to family violence leave would be required to provide—for example, whether an employer would ask for a note from a police officer, doctor or family violence worker or whether a statutory declaration signed by the victim would be sufficient.¹³¹

VEOHRC suggested that the test could be modelled on section 107 of the Fair Work Act, which provides that an employee who has notified their employer that they intend to take leave ‘must, if required by the employer, give the employer evidence that would satisfy a reasonable person’ that the leave is taken for the permissible reason. This test would usually be satisfied by a statutory declaration signed by the employee.¹³²

Further regulatory measures

Employers have some statutory obligations—in addition to those relating to existing general leave provisions—that require them to take into account some of the potential workplace impacts of family violence. For example:

- ▶ Occupational health and safety legislation requires that employers maintain a safe workplace.¹³³ These provisions can apply, for example, to a situation in which family violence is being perpetrated in the workplace by a co-worker.
- ▶ Equal opportunity legislation requires that employers not discriminate against employees on the basis of certain attributes. A woman who is treated less favourably by her employer because she is experiencing family violence might be able to avail herself of the protection afforded by the legislation if the treatment relates to one of the existing protected attributes. If, for example, the discrimination relates to mental illness she experiences as a result of the family violence, she might be able to make a discrimination claim on the basis of the disability attribute.

Some submissions the Commission received recommended that these regulatory regimes be amended to impose express obligations on employers to take steps to respond to family violence in the workplace. For example, a number of submissions called for amendments to OHS legislation to include the impacts of family violence at work as an express OHS consideration and for the introduction of a new attribute in the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic).

VicHealth has previously identified scope for employers to use workplace policies in these contexts as vehicles for responding to family violence:

There is potential for incorporating support for bystander action in key policies (such as occupational health and safety, equal opportunity) as a way of fulfilling for example legislated employer ‘positive duty’ obligations. Promoting an organisational culture where sexism, discrimination and violence (including sexual harassment for example) towards women are not only not tolerated, but where staff are encouraged and skilled to identify and take action when witnessing these behaviours, could be an important component of these positive duty obligations.¹³⁴

Occupational health and safety

Under OHS legislation, employers are obliged to provide and maintain a working environment that is safe and does not pose risks to health.¹³⁵ They are also required to monitor employees’ health, including their psychological health.¹³⁶ WorkSafe Victoria, the authority with responsibility for monitoring and enforcing compliance with Victorian OHS laws, provides guidance to employers on their obligations in cases where a person is being bullied, abused, threatened or assaulted in circumstances relating to their work—including how to identify and respond to hazards and risks and implement suitable control measures.¹³⁷ Victorian OHS legislation and policy is silent on whether the specific impacts of family violence in the workplace constitute risks to workers’ health and safety.

The Canadian province of Ontario has amended its Occupational Health and Safety Act to include ‘domestic violence’ as a type of workplace violence. Pursuant to this legislation, an employer is required to take every reasonable precaution to protect an employee from physical injury in the workplace if the employer becomes aware, or should reasonably be aware, that domestic violence is a risk. Employers are also required to have policies and programs relating to workplace violence.¹³⁸

Some submissions the Commission received argued that Victoria's OHS laws should be amended to include the impacts of family violence at work as an OHS consideration.¹³⁹ Submissions referred the Commission to recommendations the Australian Law Reform Commission made in its report Family Violence and Commonwealth Laws—Improving Legal Frameworks, which considered the Commonwealth OHS system in the context of moves to harmonise OHS law across Australia.¹⁴⁰

According to the ALRC among the circumstances in which family violence can pose a clear OHS concern or risk are the following:

- physical or verbal abuse between partners employed at the same workplace
- threats to a partner or the partner's co-workers at the workplace
- harassment or attacks on a partner or a partner's co-workers at their workplace either in person or through phone calls and emails
- stalking a partner at the partner's workplace – for example, 29 per cent of victims who were stalked by their previous partner reported that the person using family violence loitered outside their workplace
- in the most extreme cases, family violence-related homicide at the workplace.¹⁴¹

The ALRC concluded that lack of knowledge, rather than legislative inadequacies, was the primary challenge in this regard and made a range of recommendations in relation to the need for guidance, education, training and appropriate employer responses.¹⁴² It pointed to the need for future policy development in this area to be guided by further research¹⁴³—in particular, in relation to instances of family violence where it is more difficult to establish that the incident would engage an employer's duty of care or be covered by existing OHS laws.¹⁴⁴

The ACTU submitted to the Royal Commission:

- ▷ The Victorian Government and WorkSafe Victoria should work with Safe Work Australia, unions, employer organisations and other relevant bodies to raise awareness about family violence and its impact as a possible work health and safety consideration, as well as develop and provide education in this area.
- ▷ WorkSafe Victoria should ensure that information about family violence as a work health and safety matter is provided to employers and employees.¹⁴⁵

Our Watch called for the Commission to recommend that WorkSafe Victoria examine the possibility of strengthening prevention work through existing OHS strategies¹⁴⁶ and that support be provided to private sector workplaces and other non-government organisational settings to implement good-practice programs. It observed that this should be done by means of a comprehensive and coordinated model and strong evaluation to ensure consistent standards and adherence to legislative requirements, including those of the Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 (Vic).¹⁴⁷

WorkSafe Victoria has established a number of programs that adopt what are known as 'integrated approaches' to worker health and safety. Integrated health, safety and wellbeing approaches 'address environmental exposures in the workplace, the social context that workers experience on the job, and workers' individual health behaviours'¹⁴⁸ and in so doing seek to improve workforce productivity. WorkSafe Victoria's principal programs of this nature are WIN (the WorkHealth Improvement Network) and WorkHealth.¹⁴⁹

A 2013 report prepared for WorkSafe Victoria by Monash University and the Institute for Safety, Compensation and Recovery Research reviewed initiatives in Victorian workplaces and concluded that integrated approaches are effective for both physical and mental health outcomes, provide a positive return on investment, and are able to be adopted rapidly within existing OHS structures.¹⁵⁰ The report found that, in addition to engaging in activities related to physical workplace safety, an integrated approach should consider non-work factors such as work-family conflict.¹⁵¹ On the basis of the report's findings, WorkSafe Victoria has published a guidebook on implementing integrated health, safety and wellbeing approaches in the workplace.¹⁵²

The annual WorkSafe Awards are another relevant initiative. The awards celebrate businesses, groups or individuals who 'are making a dedicated commitment to safety, health and wellbeing and return to work in their workplace'.¹⁵³ This is not limited to workplace health and safety: it can extend to initiatives aimed at improving the wellbeing of employees more generally. For example, in 2015 St Vincent's Private Hospital was shortlisted for an award as a consequence of its implementation of a program the McAuley Community Centre developed to help management and staff recognise and respond to family violence and know where to refer staff for support.¹⁵⁴

Equal opportunity and discrimination

The Commission was informed that victims of family violence may experience both direct and indirect discrimination in the workplace, which can exacerbate their initial experience of family violence.¹⁵⁵ Victims report they fear that disclosure will jeopardise their position or career progression, they will be stigmatised, and/or their employer will be unresponsive to a disclosure.¹⁵⁶

It was also argued that victims of family violence face a unique set of negative stereotypes at work. One union representing workers in a predominantly female profession reported:

Specific negative assumptions and stereotyping about victims of domestic violence include that they are unreliable, likely to underperform or bring danger or disruption into the workplace. These assumptions are likely to reflect community attitudes towards domestic violence and specifically, stigma attributed to victims, who are perceived as complicit in their own abuse.¹⁵⁷

In their submissions to the Commission, the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, the Victorian Trades Hall Council, the Australian Education Union (Victorian Branch), the ACTU and the Australian Services Union (Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch) recommended that the Victorian Government amend the Equal Opportunity Act to include 'victim of family violence' (or 'victim/survivor of family violence') as a protected attribute for the purpose of anti-discrimination legislation.¹⁵⁸ VEOHRC recommended that the definition of family violence in the Equal Opportunity Act be aligned to that in the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).¹⁵⁹ These organisations submitted that a dedicated attribute would have both symbolic and practical effects. In broad terms, they submitted that a dedicated attribute would help combat negative stereotypes and allow victims to obtain assistance safely while at work. Both the Australian Law Reform Commission and the Australian Human Rights Commission have previously advanced a similar proposal.¹⁶⁰

Section 18 of the Equal Opportunity Act provides specific protections against discrimination in the workplace. 'Discrimination' is defined as including the following:

- ▷ denying or limiting access by the employee to opportunities for promotion, transfer or training or to any other benefits connected with the employment
- ▷ dismissing the employee or otherwise terminating their employment
- ▷ denying the employee access to a guidance program, an apprenticeship training program, or another occupational training or retraining program
- ▷ subjecting the employee to any other detriment.¹⁶¹

These protections apply to people who have an attribute protected under the Equal Opportunity Act; among these attributes are disability, age, sex, race, religion, sexual orientation, political belief or activity, and expunged homosexual conviction.¹⁶² The Equal Opportunity Act prohibits treating people unfavourably or imposing unreasonable conditions on them because of those attributes.¹⁶³

If 'victim of family violence' were to be added to the list of attributes, victims who experienced unfavourable treatment would no longer be required to fit their experience into an established category of discrimination but would instead be able to rely on their status as a victim of family violence in order to gain the relevant protections. The new attribute would prohibit employers from discriminating against victims of family violence in the ways just described. For example, it would be unlawful for an employer to fail to promote a woman because of a perception that she is 'unreliable' or uses too much personal leave as a result of family violence. Affording victims of family violence this protection could be particularly important for casual employees, for whom paid family violence leave might be unavailable. Adding 'victim of family violence' to the list of attributes protected by the legislation would also make it unlawful to discipline a woman whose violent partner attends the workplace and threatens other staff.

A protection under anti-discrimination legislation might also offer an avenue of relief for someone whose employment has been terminated as a result of the impact family violence has had on their work, in a situation where no other relief is available under unfair dismissal laws.¹⁶⁴

The protections offered by the Equal Opportunity Act apply not only in the context of paid employment: they also apply in other areas of public life—for example, in the delivery of services. Accordingly, if an education provider refused the enrolment or temporary attendance of a child affected by family violence who was living in a refuge or transitional accommodation, this could amount to discrimination under the Act.

The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission also submitted that this specific protection would foster important cultural and attitudinal change in the workplace on the basis that the Equal Opportunity Act places an obligation on duty holders to take positive action to eliminate discrimination, sexual harassment and victimisation. In this way a new attribute would promote proactive improvements by requiring employers and other holders of a duty to take reasonable and proportionate measures to eliminate discrimination as far as possible. VEOHRC suggested that duty holders could be expected to do the following:

- introduce or review existing policy/practices which either directly relate to, or indirectly affect, people experiencing family violence
- increase awareness of the issue of family violence in the workplace or the provision of accommodation
- introduce staff training on the issue (particularly for management and human resource personnel), including training on the causes of violence against women
- conduct an environmental scan of their organisation's policies, procedures and practice to look more broadly at what they can do to support victim/survivors (e.g. whether to provide external counselling, safety planning, peer support, flexible arrangements). This scan should also consider the drivers of family violence and what the organisations can do to improve gender equity.¹⁶⁵

The Royal Commission notes that it received no submissions from employer groups or others in relation to the proposal to add a new attribute to the Equal Opportunity Act.

The way forward

The manner in which family violence intersects with the workplace is profound and multi-faceted. The Commission supports workplace-based initiatives to prevent and respond to family violence and acknowledges the extensive work that has been done to date to harness workplaces' capacity to deal with such violence. Although, as highlighted in the RMIT paper, these endeavours have primarily focused on addressing intimate partner violence against women, they have laid the foundation for similar approaches that can and should be taken to prevent and respond to all forms of family violence.

As settings that represent and reflect the community at large, workplaces can identify and respond to victims and perpetrators, reduce further harm, and act in accordance with changing social norms and attitudes. Employers are vital partners in dealing with family violence, having responsibilities such as motivating employees—and even clients and consumers—to take part in efforts to end family violence.

The Victorian Government should model best practice. Because the Victorian Government is the state's largest employer, it has the opportunity to support and equip its own workforce to respond to and prevent family violence.

Modelling best practice in Victorian public sector workplaces

The Victorian Government's decision to provide all public sector employees with an entitlement to paid family violence leave is a welcome initiative, not only because of the practical benefits it will bring to people whose working lives are disrupted by such violence, but also because it shows its workforce that the Victorian Government takes the impact of family violence on individuals seriously. This is important in building a community that confidently recognises and responds to disclosures of family violence.

The Commission supports the introduction of paid family violence leave for Victorian Government employees. It is essential, however, that it be accompanied by adequate information and support for employees, and training and resources for managers and human resources staff to implement the new entitlement. The Victorian Government cannot require other employers to introduce family violence leave, but its own successful implementation of this category of leave for public sector employees might well persuade other employers to do the same.

The Commission recommends that, in implementing its commitment to provide family violence leave to public sector employees, the Victorian Government ensure the following:

- ▷ Employees have access to appropriate support services and referrals.
- ▷ Any requirement for employees to provide evidence supporting their application for leave is not excessively onerous.
- ▷ Employees' confidentiality is maintained as far as possible.
- ▷ Employees are helped to make reasonable and necessary adjustments to their working arrangements.
- ▷ Employees, managers and human resources staff are trained and equipped to respond suitably to disclosures of family violence, taking into account all the types of family violence and the diversity of people who are affected by it.
- ▷ Provision is made for managing situations in which a victim and a perpetrator are working in the same workplace.

Although government departments and agencies currently offer staff access to generic employee assistance programs, the Family Violence Support Guidelines and Related Policy issued by the Department of Justice and Regulation represents a detailed family violence-specific policy aimed at providing practical and specialised advice and support to any employee experiencing family violence. Adoption of a policy along these lines could be more widespread throughout government and its agencies.

The Commission notes that, although family violence leave clauses are generally aimed at supporting victims of family violence, it might be that they could also be used by perpetrators of family violence—depending on how the clauses are drafted—including to facilitate the attendance of perpetrators at court hearings as well as compliance with any relevant court orders to attend appointments. Consideration will need to be given to the eligibility of perpetrators for family violence leave—including whether perpetrators' use of such leave should be restricted to activities of a rehabilitative nature such as attending counselling appointments and men's behaviour change programs. It will also be necessary to equip managers and staff to respond to circumstances of this nature. Additionally, consideration will need to be given to whether the leave entitlement should be available to employees who are relatives of victims of family violence in exceptional circumstances—for example, when there has been a homicide.

Of course, the Victorian Government's role as an employer extends beyond providing family violence leave and associated supports and information to its employees. The government and its agencies can also institute in public sector workplaces policies and programs that take a broader view of responding to and preventing family violence by building respectful and gender equitable cultures. This represents a crucial leadership opportunity for the Victorian Government.

The Commission therefore recommends that the Victorian Government implement best-practice workplace programs in all public sector workplaces to:

- ▷ enable them to build respectful and gender equitable cultures
- ▷ ensure they have suitable policies for family violence victims
- ▷ provide suitable responses and do not allow for collusion with family violence perpetrators
- ▷ build skills and support staff in taking bystander action.

Leave entitlement in National Employment Standards and modern awards

The Commission supports moves to extend the availability of dedicated family violence leave to as many Victorian employees as possible by embedding an entitlement in the National Employment Standards and modern awards, and recommends the Victorian Government encourage the Commonwealth to make the necessary amendments to the standards. It acknowledges the close consideration of these matters by the Productivity Commission and the Fair Work Commission and the contributions employer and employee representatives have made in those forums. Since these matters fall within the Commonwealth's purview, the Commission recommends that—in the context of discussions by the Council of Australian Governments on family violence reforms—the Victorian Government encourage the Commonwealth to amend the National Employment Standards in Part 2-2 of the Fair Work Act to include an entitlement to paid family violence leave for employees (other than casual employees) and unpaid family violence leave for casual employees.

The Victorian Government might also consider making a submission to the Fair Work Commission, as part of the Modern Awards Review, in support of the inclusion of family violence leave in all modern awards. It is noted that, according to the directions the Fair Work Commission issued on 30 November 2015, any interested party supporting the introduction of family and domestic leave must file written submissions and any witness statements or documentary material on which it seeks to rely by 16 May 2016.¹⁶⁶

Encouraging and supporting initiatives in non-government workplaces

In addition to being the state's largest employer, the Victorian Government and its agencies have the capacity to influence the culture and practices of private and community sector workplaces and to ensure the more widespread availability of family violence-related information, supports and/or protections in a broad range of industries and professions throughout the state. The government collaborates with industry at a policy level but also in relation to the procurement of goods and services. Agencies such as WorkSafe Victoria and the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission work closely with employers to improve the health, safety and rights of employees.

The Victorian Government's recent announcement of its $900,000 commitment towards workplace programs is a critical initiative—in particular, because it is intended to develop resources and tools that can support the involvement of a greater number of employers and workplaces in combatting family violence in the future. At present different providers deliver different programs and activities, with very little independent assessment or evaluation. The Workplace Equality and Respect Project, which is being conducted by Our Watch and funded by government, offers an important opportunity to test workplace strategies aimed at combatting family violence, taking into account lessons from past programs, and to advise the Victorian Government and the community on the most effective ways of securing the participation of employers and employees.

Similarly, the findings of the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission's review of Victoria Police have a broader application to other workplaces in preventing violence-supportive attitudes that can contribute to the occurrence of family violence. Victoria Police recognised that attitudes towards women in the workplace have implications for how police make decisions and interact with the community.¹⁶⁷ By confronting gender-based harm in the workplace, employers have an opportunity to implement best-practice responses to victims, target violence-supportive attitudes, and promote gender equality in their workforce and in their service delivery.

In order to maximise the outcomes of the Workplace Equality and Respect Project, on receiving the final report of the project the Victorian Government should support the maintenance of the planned online hub of program models, tool kits, training resources and packages for application in government and non-government workplaces.

The Commission considered submissions about extending or clarifying the occupational health and safety or equal opportunity regimes to support or require employers to implement measures to respond to family violence. The Commission is conscious that any regulatory intervention to mandate family violence strategies in the workplace through frameworks would need to be supported by a suite of educational and other materials that are based on best-practice knowledge. It therefore considers that any regulatory reform in this area should await the further development and evaluation of strategies, tools and measures for dealing with family violence in workplaces through the Workplace Equality and Respect Project, and should be subject to further detailed consideration and consultation with experts and stakeholders by means of a separate review.

In relation to the application of occupational health and safety laws, the Commission considers that there is scope for a greater role for WorkSafe Victoria to support workplaces that respond to family violence, and any future work it embarks on in connection with integrated health, safety and wellbeing approaches to complex problems. Such a role would capitalise on WorkSafe Victoria's expertise in and capacity for engaging with workplaces large and small throughout Victoria on a broad range of workplace matters. It would also bring efforts currently made in a piecemeal, ad hoc fashion into the sphere of core government business.

This would require WorkSafe Victoria to have a detailed understanding of the workplace impacts of family violence and a familiarity with workplace strategies for preventing and responding to such violence. To this end, the Commission suggests that the Victorian Government facilitate the involvement of representatives of WorkSafe Victoria in the Workplace Equality and Respect Project—for example, as part of the project's advisory group. We also suggest that Our Watch consult with WorkSafe Victoria as part of the Workplace Equality and Respect Project to identify opportunities for WorkSafe Victoria to lead future workplace strategies relating to family violence.

As major purchasers of goods and services, governments can use their purchasing power and procurement policies to encourage the implementation of improved workplace policies and practices by the organisations with which they contract. For example, members of the Victorian Government's Government Legal Services Panel are required to commit to a range of conditions aimed at achieving some broader social justice benefits, including the provision of pro bono legal services, equal opportunity practices in the workplace, the briefing of female barristers, and adherence to model litigant guidelines.¹⁶⁸

The Commission proposes that, in reviewing options for invoking equal opportunity and OHS frameworks to address family violence, the Victorian Government also identify ways in which its procurement policies can incorporate requirements for employer organisations with which it contracts to provide family violence-related information, support, and/or leave entitlements to their employees.

Recommendation 190

The Victorian Government should ensure that the inclusion of family violence leave in all public sector enterprise agreements is accompanied by access to suitable support services and referrals, as well as adequate planning, training and resources to equip managers and human resources staff to communicate and implement the leave entitlements.

Recommendation 191

The Victorian Government, through the Council of Australian Governments, encourage the Commonwealth Government to amend the National Employment Standards in Part 2-2 of the Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) to include an entitlement to paid family violence leave for employees (other than casual employees) and an entitlement to unpaid family violence leave for casual employees [within 12 months].

Recommendation 192

On receipt of Our Watch's Workplace Equality and Respect Project final report, the Victorian Government should:

- ▷ begin implementing best-practice workplace programs in all public sector workplaces in order to:
 - ▷ enable them to build respectful and gender equitable cultures
 - ▷ ensure that they have suitable policies for family violence victims
 - ▷ provide adequate responses to and not allow for collusion with family violence perpetrators
 - ▷ build skills and support staff in taking bystander action
- ▷ support the maintenance of the proposed web-based portal or database of program models, tool kits, training resources and packages for application and use in all workplaces
- ▷ review and report on options for using existing regulatory frameworks and government procurement policies to support all Victorian employers in implementing best-practice family violence policies [within 12 months of receipt of the final report].

Endnotes

- 1 Transcript of Kearney, 10 August 2015, 2509 [10]–[14].
- 2 See, eg, Statement of Bignold, 13 July 2015, 6 [28]–8 [37], 12 [58].
- 3 Statement of Jana, 16 July 2015, 1 [7], 2 [13], 5 [31], 9 [36]–[37].
- 4 Statement of Kun, 10 July 2015, 10 [41].
- 5 Peta Cox, 'Violence Against Women: Additional Analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012' (Horizons: Research Paper No 01, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, October 2015) 116.
- 6 Ludo McFerran, 'Safe at Home, Safe at Work? National Domestic Violence and the Workplace Survey: 2011' (Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse—A Project of the Centre for Gender Related Violence Studies and Micromex Research, December 2011) 2 [1.2].
- 7 Ibid 8, Table 6.
- 8 Ibid 10, Table 9.
- 9 Community consultation, Melbourne, 6 May 2015.
- 10 McFerran, above n 6, 10, Table 8.
- 11 We also touch on this issue in the context of the police force in Chapter 14.
- 12 McFerran, above n 6, 11.
- 13 Leyla Moghimi v Eliana Construction and Developing Group Pty Ltd [2015] FWC 4864. A subsequent application by the employer to appeal the decision was refused: Eliana Construction and Developing Group Pty Ltd v Leyla Moghimi [2015] FWCFB 7476.
- 14 Leyla Moghimi v Eliana Construction and Developing Group Pty Ltd [2015] FWC 4864, 22.
- 15 Ibid 23.
- 16 Ibid 59.
- 17 The Young Men's Christian Association of Victoria, Submission 196, 9.
- 18 Transcript of Kun, 16 July 2015, 453 [28]–454 [5].
- 19 City of Whittlesea–01, Submission 714, 29.
- 20 Cox, above n 5, 113.
- 21 Michael Flood, 'Preventing Violence Against Women and Girls' (University of Wollongong, 2014) in Ronald J Burke and Debra A Major (eds), Gender in Organizations: Are Men Allies or Adversaries to Women's Career Advancement (Edward Elgar Publishing, 2014) 405.
- 22 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, 11 [48].
- 23 Anastasia Powell, Larissa Sandy and Jessica Findling, 'Promising Practices in Workplace and Organisational Approaches for the Prevention of Violence Against Women' (Report prepared for OurWatch, RMIT University, 2015).
- 24 Ibid 10.
- 25 Women's Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 3, 11–13.
- 26 Anastasia Powell, 'More Than Ready: Bystander Action to Prevent Violence Against Women in the Victorian Community' (Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, May 2012) 8.
- 27 Ibid 8.
- 28 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and VicHealth, 'Framework Foundations 1: A Review of the Evidence on Correlates of Violence Against Women and What Works to Prevent It—Companion Document to Change the Story: A Shared Framework for the Primary Prevention of Violence Against Women and Their Children in Australia' (2015) 61.
- 29 Our Watch, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety and VicHealth, 'Change the Story: A Shared Framework for the Primary Prevention of Violence Against Women and Their Children in Australia' (2015) 44.
- 30 Powell, Sandy and Findling, above n 23, 10–12.
- 31 Women's Health Association of Victoria, Submission 509, 13; Women's Health Grampians, Submission 824, 11; City of Ballarat, Submission 146, 4.
- 32 McAuley Community Services for Women, Submission 480, 38–40.
- 33 White Ribbon Australia, Submission 880, 8; Australian Education Union Victoria, Submission 235, 9; Child and Family Services Ballarat Inc, Submission 687, 2.
- 34 Women's Health Victoria, Submission 514, 19–20; Women's Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 11; Mallee Family Violence Executive, Submission 617, 15–16; Castlemaine District Community Health Ltd on behalf of Health and Community Services Sector—Mount Alexander Shire, Submission 211, 1; Melton City Council, Submission 538, 13; Women's Health and Wellbeing Barwon South West Inc, Submission 780, 25.
- 35 Department of Justice and Regulation 'Reducing Violence Against Women and Their Children, Victorian Grants Program: Review of Progress and Interim Evaluation Reports' (Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth) (August 2014), 13, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 36 Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 10.
- 37 The Young Men's Christian Association of Victoria, Submission 196, 3–7.
- 38 City of Melbourne, Submission 798, 7–8.
- 39 Darebin City Council, Submission 222, 11.
- 40 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Progress Report, Milestone (Year 2 Mid-Year Project Update), Project Title: Gippsland Preventing Men's Violence Against Women Strategy: A Coordinated Approach', 4–5, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 41 Victorian Health Promotion Foundation (VicHealth), Submission 243, 12; VicHealth, Equal Footing Toolkit (4 January 2016) <<https://www.vichealth.vic.gov.au/media-and-resources/publications/equal-footing-toolkit>>.
- 42 Robyn Dale and Ludo McFerran, Submission 854, 4.
- 43 Male Champions of Change, Male Champions of Change (2016) <<http://malechampionsofchange.com/>>.
- 44 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Male Champions of Change <<http://humanrightscommission.vic.gov.au/index.php/our-projects-a-initiatives/male-champions-of-change>>.
- 45 Statement of Dyson, 4 August 2015, Attachment 3, 9; Australian Football League, Respect and Responsibility <<http://www.afl.com.au/respectandresponsibility>>.
- 46 Minister for the Prevention of Family Violence, The Hon Fiona Richardson MP, 'Workplace Funding To Help Address Family Violence' (Media Release, 30 November 2015).
- 47 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Updated Project Plan—2015–16 Workplace Equality and Respect Project' (January 2016), 3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 10 December 2015.
- 48 Ibid.
- 49 Ibid 5.
- 50 Ibid 11.

- 51 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Family Violence Support Guidelines and Related Policy', 1; Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Employee Assistance Counselling support for personal or work-related concerns'; Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Healthy Work Healthy Living Tip Sheet: Family and Domestic Violence'; Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Leave Guidelines', 22; Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Leave Policy and Procedure', 4, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015; Victoria Legal Aid, 'Enterprise Agreement 2013–2016', 45–6; Victoria Legal Aid, 'Employee Assistance Program'; Victoria Legal Aid, 'Response to Royal Commission into Family Violence Notice to Produce (30 June 2015)', 63–4, produced by Victoria Legal Aid in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 52 Department of Justice and Regulation, Family Violence Support Guidelines and Related Policy, above n 51, 1.
- 53 Court Services Victoria, 'Request for data and information (2 July 2015)', 2, produced by Court Services Victoria in response to the Commission's request for information dated 5 June 2015.
- 54 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, 'Magistrates' and Children's Courts—Information Request Response', 10, produced by the Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the Children's Court of Victoria in response to the Commission's request for information dated 5 June 2015.
- 55 Victoria Police, 'Employee Support Services', 2, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 56 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, 'Independent Review into Sex Discrimination, Sexual Harassment, including Predatory Behaviour, in Victoria Police' (Phase One Report, 2015) <<http://www.humanrightscommission.vic.gov.au/independentreview>>.
- 57 Ibid Appendix 1, 347–8.
- 58 Ibid Appendix 1, 352.
- 59 The Hon Jane Garrett MP, 'Ministerial Working Group Appointed' (Media Release, 15 December 2015).
- 60 Commissioner for Equal Opportunity, White Ribbon (25 November 2014) Equal Opportunity Commission of South Australia <<http://www.eoc.sa.gov.au/eo-resources/what-commissioner-says/white-ribbon>>.
- 61 Correspondence from Department of Justice and Regulation to the Royal Commission into Family Violence, 22 January 2016.
- 62 White Ribbon Australia, Submission 880, 1–2.
- 63 Ibid 7.
- 64 See, eg, Department of Justice and Regulation, Reducing Violence Against Women and Their Children, above n 35, 5, 9; Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Meta-evaluation of the Preventing Violence against Women in our Community Project: Final Report' (Australian Institute of Criminology (Cth)), 46–53, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 65 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Women's Health Loddon Mallee: 'Take A Stand'—Program Evaluation, Interim Report #4' (May 2015), 46, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 66 Donna Chung, Carole Zufferey and Anastasia Powell, 'Preventing Violence Against Women in the Workplace—An Evidence Review: Full Report' (Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, March 2012) 39; The Young Men's Christian Association of Victoria, Submission 196, 7.
- 67 Chung, Zufferey and Powell, above n 66, 39.
- 68 Powell, Sandy and Findling, above n 23, 33–4. See also Department of Premier and Cabinet, Meta-evaluation of the Preventing Violence against Women in our Community Project, above n 64, 55, 102.
- 69 Powell, Sandy and Findling, above n 23, 33.
- 70 Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 65, 49.
- 71 The Young Men's Christian Association of Victoria, Submission 196, Attachment 2, 35.
- 72 Powell, Sandy and Findling, above n 23, 39.
- 73 City of Whittlesea–01, Submission 714, 29.
- 74 Statement of Nagle, 28 July 2015, 6 [27].
- 75 Powell, Sandy and Findling, above n 23, 19–20.
- 76 Ibid 27.
- 77 The Young Men's Christian Association of Victoria, Submission 196, 6.
- 78 Powell, Sandy and Findling, above n 23, 27.
- 79 Ibid 24.
- 80 Chung, Zufferey and Powell, above n 66, 55–1.
- 81 Powell, Sandy and Findling, above n 23, 43–44.
- 82 Anonymous, Submission 161, 4.
- 83 Robyn Dale and Ludo McFerran, Submission 854, 7.
- 84 Craig O'Donnell, Submission 657, 1.
- 85 Ibid.
- 86 Australian Council of Trade Unions, Submission 521, 5.
- 87 Transcript of Kearney, 10 August 2015, 2511 [8]–[15].
- 88 Phil Cleary, Submission 470, 3.
- 89 Transcript of Stracke, 10 August 2015, 2511 [29]–2512 [3].
- 90 Transcript of Kun, 16 July 2015, 455 [14]–[27].
- 91 Senate Finance and Public Administration References Committee, Parliament of Australia, Domestic Violence in Australia (2015).
- 92 Ibid 9 [2.31].
- 93 Productivity Commission (Cth), 'Workplace Relations Framework: Productivity Commission Inquiry Report Volume 1' (Inquiry Report No.76, November 2015) 545. The ACTU told the Commission that over 1.6 million employees now have access to paid domestic violence leave negotiated by their unions and employers in workplace agreements: Australian Council of Trade Unions, Submission 521, 5. This figure appears to encompass employees covered by enterprise agreements as well as government employees covered by directives federally and in Queensland and Tasmania, awards in New South Wales, guidelines in the Northern Territory and policies in South Australia: Australian Council of Trade Unions, 'Implementation of Domestic Violence Clauses—An Employer's Perspective' (November 2015) 3 n 1.
- 94 Surf Coast Shire Council Enterprise Agreement No.7 2010–2013 [2010] FWAA 9380 (10 December 2010).
- 95 Ibid Clause 4.3.3.1.
- 96 Ibid Clause 4.3.4.
- 97 Statement of Nagle, 28 July 2015, 5 [26].
- 98 Transcript of Paroz, 10 August 2015, 2508 [18]–[28].
- 99 Statement of Paroz, 14 July 2015, 1 [9]–2 [11].
- 100 Ibid 2 [15].
- 101 Minister for the Prevention of Family Violence, The Hon Fiona Richardson MP, 'Victoria to Lead the Way on Family Violence Leave' (Media Release, 17 August 2015).
- 102 Minister for Industrial Relations, The Hon Natalie Hutchins MP, 'In-principle agreement with Victorian Public Service Reached' (Media Release, 17 December 2015); Heads of Agreement between the State of Victoria and the Community and Public Sector Union (CPSU) (16 December 2016) <<https://cpsu.vic.org/news/principle-vps-agreement-reached>>.

- 103 The Hon Wade Noonan MP, 'Police Agreement: A Fair Deal that Supports Police and Keeps Victorians Safe', (Media Release, 10 December 2015); The Police Association Victoria, 'EB#06—What We Achieved?' (InBrief, 10 December 2015) <https://tpav.org.au/Publications_and_Media/InBrief/2015_InBrief/December_2015/10_December.html>.
- 104 Transcript of Stracke, 10 August 2015, 2515 [6]–[11].
- 105 Craig O'Donnell, Submission 657, 1.
- 106 Productivity Commission (Cth), above n 93, 550.
- 107 Australian Industry Group, 'Four Yearly Review of Modern Awards, AM 2015/1 and AM 2015/2 Family and Domestic Violence Clause and Family Friendly Work Arrangements' (Submission to the Fair Work Commission, 20 April 2015) 4–5 <<https://www.fwc.gov.au/documents/sites/awardsmodernfouryr/common/AM20151and2-sub-AiG-200415.pdf>>.
- 108 Statement of Kun, 10 July 2015, 9, [40]; Transcript of Kun, 16 July 2015, 451 [26]–[30].
- 109 Productivity Commission (Cth), above n 93, 550.
- 110 Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) s 61. The NES do not apply to employees who fall outside the Fair Work regime, such as certain public sector employees: see Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) ss 13, 14, 55, 61. Employers and employees not covered by the Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) are covered by the applicable state industrial relations system. Further, while full-time employees must be provided with conditions that meet all 10 standards, casual employees are paid a loading in lieu of some of the entitlements.
- 111 Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) ss 87, 96, 104.
- 112 Ibid s 65.
- 113 Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence and Commonwealth Laws—Improving Legal Frameworks, Final Report (2011) 429.
- 114 Australian Council of Trade Unions, Submission 521, 9.
- 115 Commonwealth, Parliamentary Debates, House of Representatives, 25 November 2015, 13708 (The Hon. Malcolm Turnbull, Prime Minister).
- 116 Productivity Commission (Cth), above n 93, 552.
- 117 Opposition Leader, The Hon Bill Shorten MP, 'Labor to Introduce Domestic and Family Violence Leave' (Media Release, 25 November 2015).
- 118 Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) ss 134, 156, 157, 159–161.
- 119 Australian Council of Trade Unions, Submission 521, 7.
- 120 Ibid 8.
- 121 Modern Awards are reviewed by the Fair Work Commission every four years and updated where necessary: Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) Division 4.
- 122 Australian Entertainment Industry Association, 'Four Yearly Review of Modern Awards—Common Issues, Additional Common Issues' (Outline of Submission to the Fair Work Commission, 10 November 2014) 2 [6]–[8] <<https://www.fwc.gov.au/documents/sites/awardsmodernfouryr/common/Sub1-AEIA-101114.pdf>>; Private Hospital Industry Employer Associations, 'Additional Common Issues, Response to ACTU Outline Claims in Respect of Domestic Violence Leave, Family Friendly Work Arrangements' (November 2014) 2–3 [4]–[10] <<https://www.fwc.gov.au/documents/sites/awardsmodernfouryr/common/sub-PHIEA-111114.pdf>>; Accommodation Association of Victoria, 'Four Yearly Review of Modern Awards, Additional Common Issues, AM2014/196 and others', 11 November 2014, 4 [11] <<https://www.fwc.gov.au/documents/sites/awardsmodernfouryr/common/AM2014196-197-additional-sub-AAA-111114.pdf>>.
- 123 Australian Industry Group, 'Four Yearly Review of Modern Awards, AM 2015/1 and AM 2015/2 Family and Domestic Violence Clause and Family Friendly Work Arrangements' (Submission to the Fair Work Commission, 20 April 2015) 4 [8] <<https://www.fwc.gov.au/documents/sites/awardsmodernfouryr/common/AM20151and2-sub-AiG-200415.pdf>>.
- 124 Ibid 4 [12].
- 125 Fair Work Commission, Directions, Family and Domestic Violence Clause, AM2015/1, 30 November 2015 <<http://www.fwc.gov.au/documents/sites/awardsmodernfouryr/common/AM20151-dirs-301115.pdf>>. We note that under section 156 of the Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth), the Fair Work Commission is required to review all modern awards every four years.
- 126 Ludo McFerran, Natasha Cortis and Tahlia Tribetz, 'Domestic and Family Violence Clauses in Your Workplace: Implementation and Good Practice' (June 2013) 3.
- 127 Transcript of Paroz, 10 August 2015, 2508 [5]–[15].
- 128 Statement of Paroz, 14 July 2015, 3 [22]. In evidence, Ms Paroz stated that the number of people who had taken family violence leave had increased slightly to 22 people as at August 2015: Transcript of Paroz, 10 August 2015, 2516 [30]–2517 [1].
- 129 Transcript of Paroz, 10 August 2015, 2517 [2]–[11].
- 130 Australian Council of Trade Unions, Submission 521, 5–6.
- 131 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Submission 609, 24.
- 132 Ibid.
- 133 Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 (Vic) ss 21, 23, 24.
- 134 Powell, above n 26, 41–42.
- 135 Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 (Vic) ss 21, 23, 24.
- 136 Ibid s 22.
- 137 See, eg, WorkSafe Victoria, Your guide to Workplace bullying – prevention and response (October 2012) <http://www.worksafe.vic.gov.au/info/_data/assets/pdf_file/0008/42893/WS_Bullying_Guide_Web2.pdf>; WorkSafe Victoria, A guide for employers: Preventing and responding to work-related violence (March 2015) <http://www.worksafe.vic.gov.au/_data/assets/pdf_file/0020/138332/Work-related_violence.pdf>.
- 138 Occupational Health and Safety Act, RSO 1990, c. 0.1, pt III.01.
- 139 Victorian Trades Hall Council, Submission 562, 8–9; Australian Education Union Victoria, Submission 235, 20; Australian Council of Trade Unions, Submission 521, 10–11; Robyn Dale and Ludo McFerran, Submission 854, 9.
- 140 Victorian Trades Hall Council, Submission 562, 8; Australian Education Union, Submission 235, 19; Australian Law Reform Commission, above n 113, 435–50. The Commission notes that Victoria has not adopted the model Work Health and Safety laws.
- 141 Australian Law Reform Commission, above n 113, 440 [18.38] (original citations omitted).
- 142 Ibid 431 [18.2], 440 [18.39].
- 143 Ibid 442–443 [18.47].
- 144 Ibid 440–441 [18.40].
- 145 Australian Council of Trade Unions, Submission 521, 11.
- 146 Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 34.
- 147 Ibid 27.
- 148 WorkSafe, Integrated Worker Health: A How to Guide <https://www.worksafe.vic.gov.au/_data/assets/pdf_file/0007/178162/WS_FACTSHEET_INTRO_D1.pdf>.
- 149 See generally, WorkSafe, Integrated Approaches to Worker Health, Safety and Wellbeing, <<http://www.worksafe.vic.gov.au/safety-and-prevention/health-and-wellbeing/integrated-approaches-to-worker-health-safety-and-wellbeing>>; Amanda Cooklin et al, 'Integrated Approaches to Worker Health, Safety and Well-Being' (Research Report No 1213-088-R1C, Monash University School of Public Health and Preventative Medicine, December 2013). An advisory group was appointed in 2015 to identify initiatives to expand and improve the WorkHealth program: Minister for Finance, The Hon Robin Scott MP, 'Minister Announces New WorkHealth Advisory Group' (Media Release, 28 April 2015).
- 150 Cooklin et al, above n 149, 10.
- 151 Ibid 27.

- 152 Amanda Cooklin et al, 'Guidebook: Integrated Approaches to Worker Health, Safety and Well-Being' (Institute for Safety Compensation and Recovery Research, 2014).
- 153 WorkSafe Victoria, WorkSafe Victoria 2015 Awards <<http://worksafeawards.worksafe.vic.gov.au/>>.
- 154 WorkSafe Victoria, Family violence: it is your business—St Vincent's Private Hospital Melbourne <<http://worksafeawards.worksafe.vic.gov.au/browse-entries/entries/family-violence-it-is-your-business2>>.
- 155 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Submission 609, 13; Victorian Trades Hall Council, Submission 562, 6–7.
- 156 Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence and Commonwealth: Employment and Superannuation, Issues Paper No 36 (2011) 6 [21].
- 157 Australian Education Union Victoria, Submission 235, 19.
- 158 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Submission 609, 10–11; Victorian Trades Hall Council, Submission 562, 6–8; Australian Education Union Victoria, Submission 235, 17–18; Australian Council of Trade Unions, Submission 521, 10; Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 27–8.
- 159 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Submission 609, 10–11; Victorian Trades Hall Council, Submission 562, 8.
- 160 Australian Human Rights Commission, Fact sheet: Domestic and family violence – a workplace issue, a discrimination issue (2014) <<https://www.humanrights.gov.au/our-work/family-and-domestic-violence/publications/fact-sheet-domestic-and-family-violence-workplace>>; Australian Law Reform Commission, above n 113, 407–411.
- 161 Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) s 18.
- 162 Ibid s 6.
- 163 Ibid s 7.
- 164 For example, employees are required to have completed a 'minimum period of employment': see Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) ss 382–4. Employees will also not be protected from unfair dismissal where they earn above the high income threshold: see Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) s 382.
- 165 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Submission 609, 19–20.
- 166 Fair Work Commission, Directions, Family and Domestic Violence Clause (AM2015/1), 30 November 2015.
- 167 Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, above n 56, 40.
- 168 Victorian Government, Victorian Government Procurement: Achieving Excellence in Government Procurement—Legal Services Panel (commencing 1 March 2016) State of Victoria <<http://www.procurement.vic.gov.au/State-Purchase-Contracts/Legal-Services-Panel>>.

38 Sustainable and certain governance

Introduction

The Royal Commission's terms of reference require it to, among other things, 'identify and focus on practical short, medium and long-term systemic improvements to Victoria's current response to family violence and the need for this response to be sustainable into the future'. The Commission therefore investigated systemic responses to family violence in different systems and considered how government agencies and community organisations might better integrate and coordinate their efforts.¹

This chapter proposes a governance system to support overall reform. Governance is particularly important because of the complexity of family violence and the fact that many systems are involved in the response to it. Without strong governance arrangements to underpin these systems, family violence can fall between the gaps and not attract the policy attention and investment it requires and deserves. For individuals seeking to engage with agencies or services, the unnecessary complexity, confusion, duplication, service gaps or inconsistent practices that are identified in this chapter and throughout this report can compromise safety or compound the effects of the violence, or both.

For these reasons the Commission considered whether the existing governance structures and consultative forums are working effectively and identified areas in which they can be improved.

The first section of this chapter briefly outlines the recent history of family violence governance arrangements in Victoria and how the family violence reforms of the mid-2000s evolved into the arrangements in place today. The second section of this chapter considers evidence and submissions the Commission received about how the existing arrangements are failing to deliver on their promise and could be improved. There were a range of consistent themes. For example, many individuals and organisations expressed frustration at a fragmented and dislocated system, with disparate governance and consultative arrangements running parallel and, occasionally, at cross-purposes. The absence of agreed goals and a system for overseeing the overall performance of the family violence system was also highlighted as a concern.

In the final section of this chapter the Commission makes recommendations for a new system architecture. This includes recommendations for a Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, arrangements for supporting regional governance, a clear focus on prevention and the establishment of a dedicated agency to provide expert independent oversight and monitoring. It is intended that these changes will promote greater coordination, consistency and accountability throughout the state, without stifling innovation and tailored approaches at the local level.

The Commission recognises the need for strong political leadership and bipartisanship to ensure that family violence remains a central consideration in policy-making and investment decisions. This will provide stability and consistency for service providers and the people they support. We make a number of recommendations to embed the continued consideration of family violence in all levels of government, drawing on clear goals and shared principles.

The Commission also proposes that the voices and experiences of victims of family violence directly inform service planning and performance evaluation, to ensure that the system is designed to suit victims' needs, rather than being based on bureaucratic convention or convenience. Family violence governance arrangements will be ineffective if they fail to take account of the needs of the people and families they are intended to support.

Context and current practice

Following is a brief overview of the historical development of the family violence system and in particular the reforms in the mid-2000s, which were intended to create an integrated family violence system. Chapter 4 provides a more comprehensive history. The second part of this chapter then describes the current governance arrangements.

Historical development

From the late 1960s onwards, many women worked to expose the extent of family violence and keep women and children who were victims of such violence safe. Much of their work was done at a grass-roots level, without the benefit of formal support structures at the government level.

In the mid-2000s a series of reforms were implemented to formalise the governance arrangements for the various systems and processes in place to address family violence. One of the main objectives of the governance arrangements was to achieve an integrated family violence system. Describing the system before the reforms, Dr Rhonda Cumberland, Chief Executive Officer of Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, stated:

Well, in the pre-integrated period there was no nuance or real complexity, let me be blunt. It was simply you came into one part of the system, you might have come through via Victoria Police, you might have come through via a women's service, you might have come through via an intervention order through a legal support program. But those programs never spoke to each other. Hence, as a service provider we had very few options that we could provide to women. It was one way or no way at all. Of course, those systems failed and women were subjected to repeat incidences of violence. The system did not, as a system, protect or give her options or in any way treat her as an individual with particular sets of circumstances where she might exercise some decision about what might happen to her.²

The introduction of the Victoria Police Code of Practice into the Investigation of Family Violence in 2004 represented the first step towards a multi-agency integrated response to family violence in Victoria. For the first time, police were required to make referrals to family violence services when they attended a family violence incident, regardless of whether police took further action.³

In 2005 the Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence plotted a course toward an integrated family violence system in its report titled Reforming the Family Violence System in Victoria.⁴ The vision of the Steering Committee was a response to family violence in which all parts of the system focused on the safety of the victim—including by managing perpetrator risk. The goal was to build an 'integrated family violence system' that would bring together all key services to ensure that 'women receive an appropriate response regardless of the pathway through which they choose to receive assistance'.⁵ The report stated:

Family violence is a problem that cannot be addressed by one sector or service alone or when services work in a fragmented and inconsistent way. The model proposed in this paper will bring together government and non-government agencies, including the police, justice system, housing and community services to work together to provide an effective and consistent response to family violence.⁶

The report's recommendations went beyond coordinating services and referral pathways: the vision was for a fully integrated response supported by regional implementation to allow for local circumstances.⁷ The report said that an integrated approach is 'critically dependent on agencies across the service system agreeing and articulating what an integrated system means and the components that are necessary to ensure that an integrated response by the justice system and victim support services can be achieved'.⁸

The report noted, that while there were local examples of organisations working together and other positive steps to improve responses, this was the first attempt to integrate a family violence response at the statewide level.⁹ The committee concluded:

Integration of services is more than co-ordinated service delivery – it is a whole new service. Co-location of agencies, agreed protocols and codes of practice, joint service delivery, agencies reconstituting or realigning their core business to confront the challenges posed by a broadened conception of the problem: these are the key indicators of an integrated response.¹⁰

One of the features of the Victorian reforms is that the roll-out was statewide. Elsewhere, an integrated approach had been applied at the local level as ‘the operation of such initiatives is relatively easy to influence monitor and evaluate.’¹¹ The achievement of an integrated approach across all of Victoria was recognised as a challenging but important aspiration.¹²

Among the elements of the integrated system put forward by the Committee in 2005 were the following features:

- ▷ multiple entry pathways to ensure that a person entering the system received a consistent response regardless of the entry point
- ▷ expanded and improved support services that embrace diversity
- ▷ individual advocacy for women and children at all points in the system
- ▷ common risk assessment and referral processes
- ▷ consistent case coordination
- ▷ intensive case management for high-risk and complex-needs families
- ▷ a more streamlined justice response through legislative and practice change
- ▷ longitudinal tracking of cases
- ▷ effective data collection and recording that includes data on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, culturally and linguistically diverse communities and women with disabilities
- ▷ advocacy at a systems level, informed by experiences in advocating for individuals
- ▷ effective and efficient monitoring and evaluation processes mechanisms.¹³

This broadly correlates with the features of an integrated response to family violence identified by the Australian and New South Wales law reform commissions in their 2010 report.¹⁴

As a result of the Statewide Steering Committee’s report, a statewide and regional governance structure involving courts, police and specialist family violence services was introduced¹⁵ to build an integrated response to family violence. Other important developments from this era included:

- ▷ enactment of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic), which set out objectives for the family violence intervention order system, introduced family violence safety notices, and extended protection to a wider range of family violence victims
- ▷ community–government partnership governance structures that supported the development and implementation of the Indigenous Family Violence 10 Year Plan: *Strong Culture, Strong People, Strong Families*¹⁶
- ▷ oversight arrangements for the development and implementation of the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework, or the CRAF).

These reforms, often referred to as the ‘first generation’ of governance arrangements, set a strong foundation for the current family violence system.

Governance structures from the mid-2000 reforms

The Victorian Government's submission to the Commission outlined the various statewide and regional structures established in the years following the release of the Reforming the Family Violence System in Victoria report in 2005, describing these as the 'beginnings of an integrated family violence system'.¹⁷ At the statewide level, these included:

- ▷ establishment of a Family Violence Statewide Advisory Committee, which met quarterly and consisted of key government, sector and statewide representatives, co-chaired by the Department of Planning and Community Development and Victoria Police, to provide advice to government on the progress of the reforms and on the direction and issues related to the reform program (renamed in 2011 as the Violence Against Women and Children Advisory Forum)
- ▷ regular meetings between relevant senior ministers and the establishment of a Family Violence Interdepartmental Committee, a regular meeting of senior executive officers with relevant portfolio responsibilities
- ▷ a Family Violence Roundtable—a biannual meeting of all stakeholders.¹⁸

In addition, the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum was established following the release of the Indigenous Family Violence Task Force Report (2003) to provide a forum for ongoing, high-level dialogue between government and Aboriginal communities.¹⁹ Chapter 26 provides more detail about the forum and the task force's report.

Current governance arrangements

The main features of the current governance arrangements in Victoria include:

- ▷ a ministerial task force, chaired by the Premier and attended by relevant ministers, meeting monthly to set strategic directions for addressing family violence. This is now a standing sub-committee of Cabinet
- ▷ family violence regional integration committees
- ▷ the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups and the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum
- ▷ Violence Against Women and Children Advisory Forum—a quarterly meeting for policy discussion and consultation attended by government, justice and community agencies.²⁰

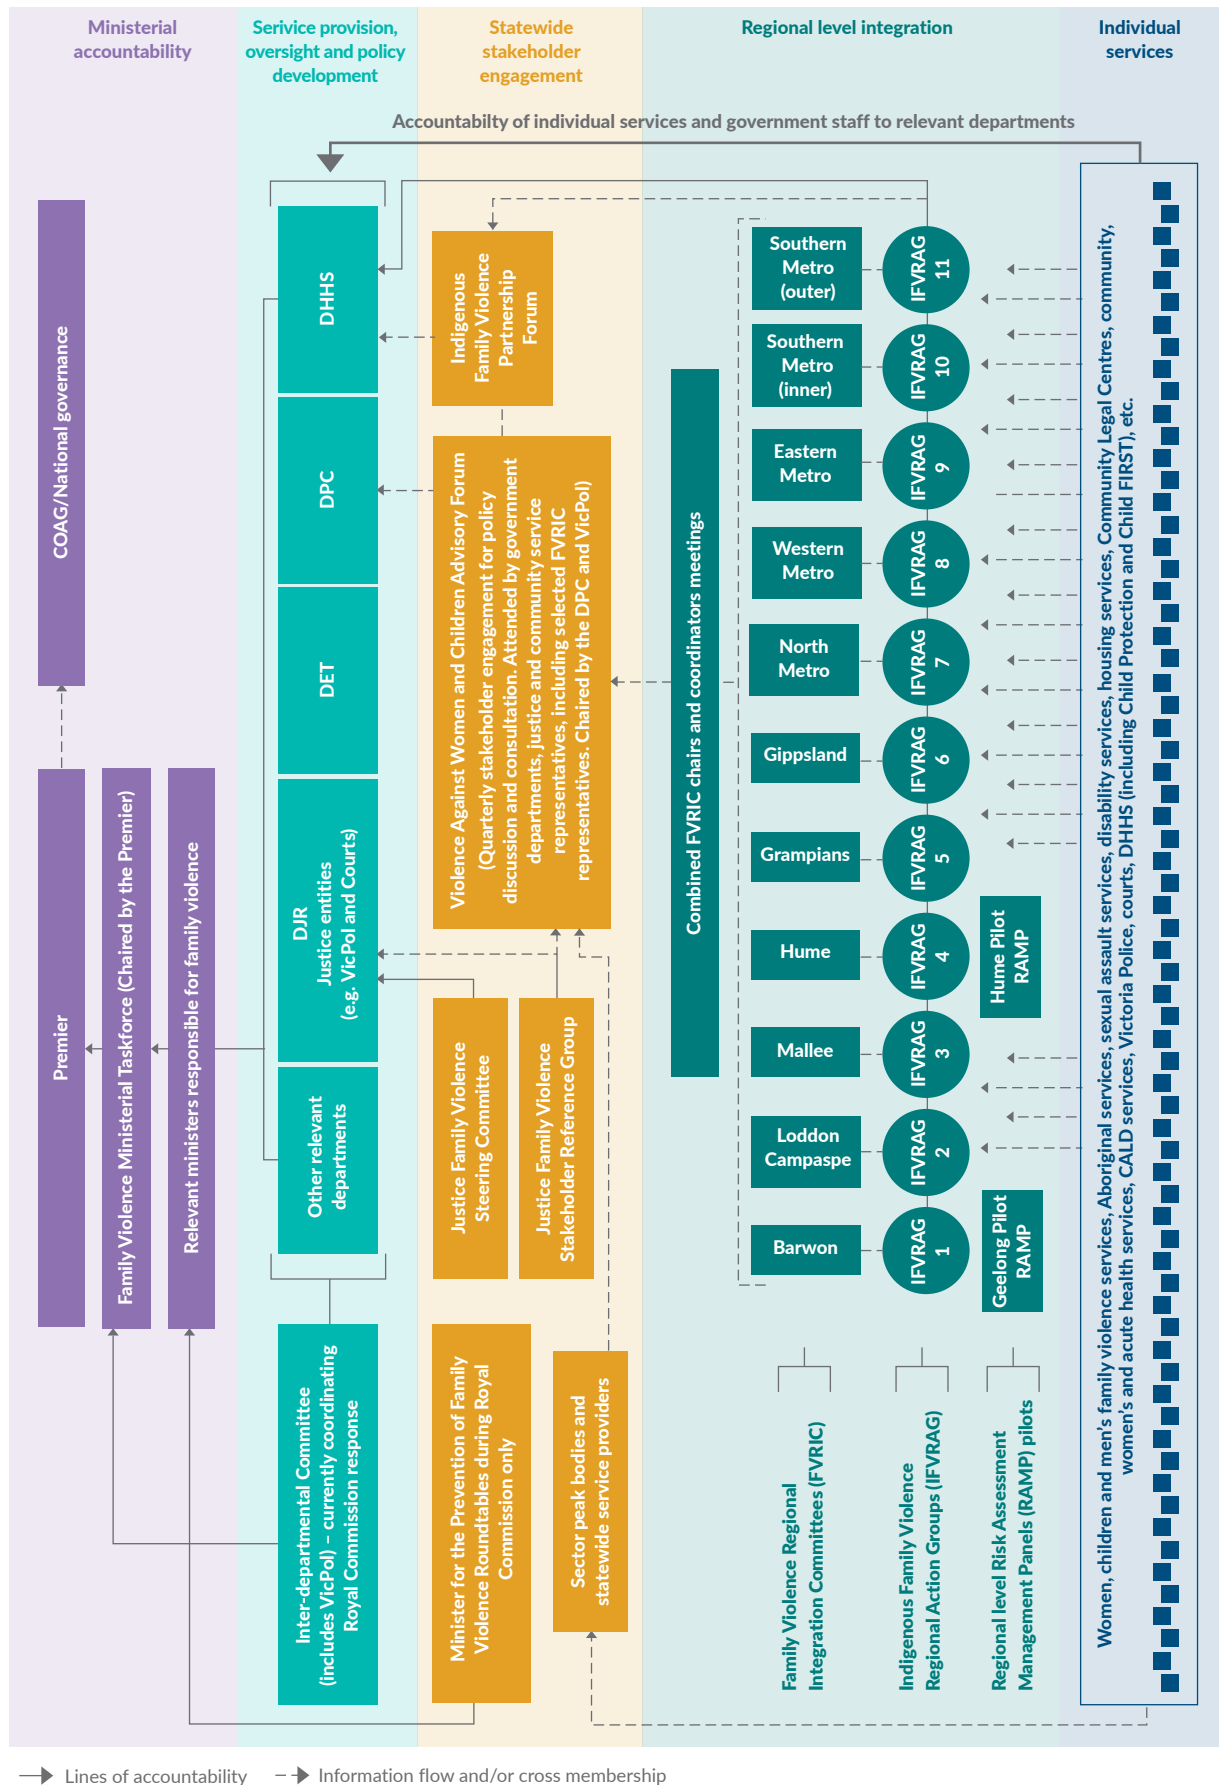

In its submission, the Victorian Government also highlighted governance arrangements made as a consequence of this Royal Commission, including ministerial roundtables convened on a temporary basis and a Family Violence Royal Commission Interdepartmental Committee.²¹

The Commission was also informed of regular meetings of the Victorian Secretaries Board, which consists of seven departmental secretaries, the Chief Commissioner of Police and the Victorian Public Service Commissioner.

Mr Chris Eccles, Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, told the Commission that the Victorian Secretaries Board has three primary responsibilities: coordination, leadership and stewardship.²² He went on to say it could play an important role in guiding the Victorian Government response to family violence because '[i]t is the perfect forum for a matter that has whole-of-government significance that presents in complex issues'.²³

Figure 38.1 shows the current governance arrangements.

Figure 38.1 Governance architecture: Victoria

→ Lines of accountability - - -> Information flow and/or cross membership

Source: State of Victoria, Submission 717, 33.

Regional arrangements

Governance arrangements for integrated family violence systems at the regional level have been in place since 2006. The role and responsibilities of family violence regional integrated committees were set out in Guiding Integrated Family Violence Service Reform 2006–2009. These regional committees were intended to provide a forum to support coordinated responses to family violence at the local level. They were given nine priorities:

- ▷ establish regional coordination and planning structures
- ▷ work together to provide quality services for clients
- ▷ develop clear referral pathways and intake processes
- ▷ develop continuous improvement strategies
- ▷ ensure access by Indigenous Victorians
- ▷ ensure access by diverse groups—including culturally and linguistically diverse people and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people
- ▷ focus on children and young people
- ▷ develop critical linkages
- ▷ ensure workforce development to support quality services.²⁴

Some regional committees identified additional priorities such as primary prevention and/or a focus on children and young people.

The regional committees were intended to bring together local representatives of the sectors that made up the integrated family violence system. Each committee was to be overseen by a Regional Integration Chair and supported by a Family Violence Regional Integration Coordinator (RIC).²⁵ Funding for the establishment and implementation of these arrangements, including funding for the role of the RIC, was provided by the (then) Department of Human Services to auspice agencies that were responsible for recruiting, employing and managing the RIC on behalf of the regional committees.²⁶

The family violence regional integrated committees have been represented through nominated chairs and RICs on the Family Violence Statewide Advisory Committee, and later the Violence Against Women and their Children Advisory Forum, to provide regional perspectives on implementation challenges and opportunities to the Victorian Government. Domestic Violence Victoria convenes biannual meetings of chairs and RICs to explore emerging challenges and opportunities, as well as provide an information-sharing forum.

The structure and roles of the committees were reviewed and the (then) Department of Human Services and this review provided further guidance to support more consistent arrangements across the state in 2013.²⁷

In Chapter 26 the role of Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups (IFVRAGs), established in 2003, is discussed. IFVRAGs have a leadership role in implementing community-led responses that aim to educate, prevent, reduce and respond to family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities.²⁸

The regional committees and IFVRAGs work to pursue projects and initiatives to support responses to family violence in Aboriginal communities. While the mechanisms and effectiveness of these collaborations vary across the state, these relationships are crucial for developing culturally-appropriate practice throughout the system in responding to Aboriginal people affected by family violence.

Challenges and opportunities

Family violence requires government to set policy and fund or provide services in many different areas, including health, human services, courts, police, correctional services, legal services and education. Community organisations provide services to victims and perpetrators under service agreements with government. All of these services contribute to the response to family violence.²⁹

The Commission heard about the many efforts agencies and non-government organisations make to respond to the needs of victims of family violence and to ensure that perpetrators take responsibility for their behaviour. It was told that there is often cooperation, and various levels of service coordination and integration, between people and agencies working in different parts of the system at the local, regional and state levels.

Despite this, the evidence before the Commission was that the existing system faces problems. As outlined here, the Commission was told of a system that is fragmented and broken into 'silos', with diffuse responsibilities spread across different departments, agencies and community organisations. The importance of effective system oversight and a shared understanding of how best to respond to family violence was emphasised. In particular, the Commission was told there is a need for strong political leadership and bipartisanship in the area of family violence, to ensure that it is considered core government policy. The need for victims' voices and stories was also highlighted.

Fragmentation and lack of coherence

Lack of integration in policy and service responses

Although submissions to the Commission spoke positively about the reforms of the mid-2000s, many noted that the potential to build a system that provides an integrated response to family violence has not been fully realised. Court Network described a 'patchy and incomplete reform process' which has resulted in 'cobbled together responses, without understanding how changes in one part of the system impact on another'.³⁰

Court Network also noted:

A coherent governance structure with clear and shared Ministerial accountability to guide the reforms has not been maintained ... Integration at the local level has lacked clear direction and guidance about 'what' and 'how to' integrate – there was no 'blueprint' or direction for integration that might have assisted in developing common understandings about how to achieve integration.³¹

The Commission heard that implementation of the reforms failed to maintain momentum in the long term. Dr Cumberland said in evidence:

We hoped for more momentum in the reforms that were set out in 2005. We built the reforms unfortunately for a sprint race, where we should have built them for a marathon, and we are feeling the consequences of that today. We now know that the biggest challenge in any policy reform, whether it be in family violence or in any social policy, economic policy or reform, the challenge is to have it last the distance ... it's about a longer term agenda and it's about what we leave for next generations. So how we use all our policy capacity to build tools and structures that ensure reform can last the distance I think is a big challenge, and it's something we failed to do back then.³²

Many witnesses criticised the absence of governance processes to support better services for victims and perpetrators of family violence. Ms Helen Campbell, Chair of the Eastern Metropolitan Family Violence Partnership, told the Commission:

In terms of the mechanisms for integration I think a lot of the conversation in recent years has really focused around services integration and has ignored the policy, strategy and legislative and authorising environment integration that enables this to happen.³³

The need for a system owner

The Commission was told that, although various departments had responsibility for individual parts of the family violence system, there was no 'system owner'. Ms Fiona McCormack, Chief Executive Officer of Domestic Violence Victoria, told the Commission:

Say for us as a peak body, if I want to go and talk to government about how the system is going there's nowhere to go to. I might go and talk to DHHS about what they are doing. I might go to police and talk about what they are doing. But in terms of anything that's working together or towards common objectives there's nowhere.³⁴

It was argued there should be some central point of accountability for all the systems that have a role in preventing and responding to family violence. In its submission, Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand told the Commission:

The main governance challenge would appear to be identifying a central point for governance of the system. The most obvious central point would be the Premier and Cabinet. The present system of a group of Ministers working as a Ministerial Council has been problematic. Ministers have competing priorities and family violence has never been on top of the list.³⁵

Stakeholders felt it was important to ensure that government departments do not shift responsibility for family violence between each other. Although different departments and agencies have different roles in responding to family violence, there was a view that overall responsibility for the operating of the system should be shared. Mr Dave Heatley, Principal Advisor, New Zealand Productivity Commission stated:

I think whole-of-system oversight obviously doesn't fit well within one agency, one existing government department. Defining outcomes I think is something that is a role of government rather than agencies. Overall system performance again cuts across agencies, because no one agency is in a position to determine it by themselves.³⁶

Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand further noted, 'Under the current system everyone is responsible for a part, which often means no one is responsible for the whole'.³⁷

A focus on programs rather than people

The Commission was also told that a focus on programs rather than people had contributed to a framework where departments and agencies operated in silos. These programmatic barriers can result in multiple referrals to different agencies and programs, rather than a response to all aspects of a person's experience. As one victim put it:

While we have received verbal assurances of sympathy (and disbelief) at what has occurred, there is a resounding pattern. Every person who has been contacted has referred us across to another agency. Our 'file' has just been sent around in a big circle. Not one person or agency has at any point really looked into what is happening to me, my children and now my partner.³⁸

This problem was acknowledged by departmental secretaries who gave evidence to the Commission. Ms Gill Callister (former Secretary of the Department of Human Services and current Secretary of the Department of Education and Training), gave the following evidence:

I think part of the problem is that the programmatic lens, which is the lens that the system is designed to view the client through, is the label that you get. So it's a focus on program and problem rather than people. So some of the examples ... that the Commission will be familiar with after lots of evidence are that if you appear in the homelessness system as a victim of family violence you are largely seen through the lens of homelessness; if you appear in the mental health system as a victim of family violence you will be seen through a mental health lens; if you appear in the family violence system as a victim but you have a mental illness you will be seen perhaps first through a family violence lens; and you won't necessarily get much attention as a child until you appear in a child system.

So it's about sort of I think changing the lens from a program-dominated lens to understanding the whole person and what's going on. One of the consequences of those lenses is people are referred to a service for each component, and each service does a plan and each service has a kind of intervention plan with the client.³⁹

This lack of integration is also seen in the fact that family violence, sexual assault and Child Protection have traditionally been dealt with separately in policy development and service provision, despite the obvious link between them. This is described further in Chapters 11 and 12.

Lack of shared understanding

As discussed elsewhere in this report (see, for example, Chapters 11, 18 and 26), there are persistent philosophical and theoretical differences in relation to policy and service provision in the area of family violence.

It was said there is still some way to go to reach a shared understanding within government and the not-for-profit service sectors about how best to prevent and respond to family violence. This has been described in the following way:

The structural fragmentation in the family violence sector also involves a great deal of philosophical and organisational cultural variation in the way that family violence is understood, and the way that responses to it are framed within organisational cultures.⁴⁰

In relation to violence against women, Ms McCormack said in her evidence:

... fundamentally one of the core issues that we have is a lack of gender literacy amongst the public sector. So it's really, really difficult even having discussions around what we need to be doing in family violence or how regional committees are going when we are talking a completely different language. We don't even have a fundamental understanding of the causes of the impact of gender on population health outcomes.⁴¹

The Commission heard that this lack of a shared understanding or language can inhibit the development of effective responses.

Disconnection between state government and regional bodies

The Commission heard concerns about the state government's lack of engagement with the regional family violence governance structures in recent years.⁴² Witnesses noted that the regional governance arrangements had been developed with a strong state government 'centre' but that whole-of-government oversight had diminished. This meant that regional committees had effectively been operating in isolation. The Gippsland Integrated Family Violence Service Reform Steering Committee told the Commission 'Consequently there have been several regional initiatives developed without consideration of family violence from a policy or practice level at a state wide level'.⁴³

This issue was also reflected in concerns about the lack of a formal process by which peak organisations and regional family violence governance bodies could inform government about problems or positive developments or discuss proposed changes. Ms Tammy Smith, Regional Integration Coordinator, Ovens Murray Goulburn Integrated Family Violence Network, said to the Commission:

We had a structure where we could actually feedback up into and alert the ministers and the government of what the localised and statewide concerns were. We don't seem to have that at all at the moment. So it appears that we need some sort of structure in place where we can actually have – whether it's an authorising body or a committee, I'm not sure, but we need some sort of structure in place where we can actually feed up and feed down.⁴⁴

Ms Kym Peake, then Acting Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, said there was a three-year evaluation of the regional governance structure under way, but that some feedback had suggested that guidance was needed on state government directions.

... what needs to happen is that there is a state framework which describes what is our approach to improving the way that we deal with family violence which cascades down to a local plan, and I think that sort of structure and resourcing could then be incredibly powerful in helping to develop that local plan, to track progress against that plan and to share learnings across the state about what is working.⁴⁵

The Commission was told that the role of family violence regional integration committees, their reporting lines to government and their relationship with other regional bodies should be more precisely defined.⁴⁶ On this point, Ms Peake told the Commission:

That structure really has evolved over the last 10 years as a very organic, ground-up way of bringing together all of the professionals who may have a role in better supporting particularly victims but increasingly also responding to perpetrators of family violence. So its strength is that it has built those relationships, but I think, as you have heard, the challenge for that structure is that it is neither embedded in any sort of statewide structured approach to thinking about where to put your effort, nor is it supported to be really clear about what the priorities, accountabilities and reporting on results should look like.

I know we will move through to how we think about the whole sort of governance and stewardship model, but the solution to better supporting joining up of organisations on the ground needs to be connected to both how there is that vertical connection to planning strategy, evaluation and accountability for family violence services specifically and for responses to people experiencing family violence specifically, but also the sort of horizontal connection to how are social service systems being organised and how are community safety strategies being given effect. As we move through that there will always be a place for place-based partnerships that bring together the professionals particularly focused on family violence, but they can be better supported, more structured and more accountable.⁴⁷

The Commission also heard that in some regions, overlapping and inconsistent administrative boundaries set by different portfolios have created difficulties for regional family violence governance and service provision. This in turn has implications for victims seeking access to services. Ms Smith told the Commission:

So we don't have a marrying up of the Department of Health boundaries with Department of Human Services boundaries and Victoria Police boundaries, which can create a few anomalies for some of our local government areas in terms of where they receive responses from and where our referrals go to in our region.⁴⁸

The Commission notes that an independent review of regional development, led by former Premier and Regional Development Minister Mr John Brumby, has been conducted for the Victorian Government. It examined the administrative arrangements for delivery of services and governance arrangements of various portfolios in the state.⁴⁹ The Victorian Government is working through the findings of the review. Ms Peake told the Commission that the intention is that any new regional governance arrangements will:

... connect government with local government, Commonwealth Government and community leaders to identify what the strategic plan is for a region, which then cascades down into what's the specific actions that are going to be taken in that place to advance family violence.⁵⁰

The departmental secretaries suggested it would be desirable that, as part of these arrangements, there should be:

- ▷ guidance from government about a number of common statewide priorities but flexibility to supplement these with local priorities⁵¹
- ▷ a focus on strategic place-based planning, including engaging non-government participants and obtaining information from local regions to inform central decision-making⁵²
- ▷ improved feedback in both directions, between government and the regional management forums⁵³
- ▷ a direct connection between the regional management forums and the regional integration committees,⁵⁴ with possibilities including the committee chairperson being a member of the forum or otherwise participating in its planning processes.

Mr Eccles, Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, told the Commission that 'regional governance is being addressed as part of a broader plan to set the direction of Victoria's regional policy'.⁵⁵

Victoria's Regional Statement

In November 2015 the Victorian Government released Victoria's Regional Statement: Your Voice, Your Region, Your State.⁵⁶ The statement outlines arrangements for government administration and community consultation in rural and regional Victoria as well as initiatives in a range of areas such as employment, tourism and telecommunications. It confirmed that from 1 July 2016, regional partnerships will be formed in nine regions in rural and regional Victoria, replacing the regional management forums. The regional partnerships will bring together representatives from local business, education, social services and community groups with the three tiers of government, with the aim of connecting regional priorities with government decision-making processes. The partnerships will develop existing regional strategic plans and determine 'actions and outcomes to progress economic and social priorities'.⁵⁷ Each partnership will communicate directly with a rural and regional ministerial committee, providing a direct pathway for regional priorities into resourcing decisions by ministers and departments. The statement acknowledged that knowledge, expertise, resources and experience are present in all sectors—public, private and community⁵⁸—and that a change to one-size-fits-all approach often does not work.⁵⁹

Leadership and a whole-of-government approach

In evidence to the Commission, Dr Cumberland stated that a whole-of-government approach was needed to ensure that family violence is treated as a priority:

The first thing we have to do is to get our public sector system more involved in family violence. We can't keep treating a mainstream problem in the margins. We have to move into this real whole government response ... It was an integrated response, but it was still deeply isolated from a whole-of-government perspective.

It would seem to me that we won't make inroads until we really start to look at our departments and our government in a holistic way, our courts in a holistic way, and once and for all accept that family violence is not the filtered down problem at the end of the spectrum ... Because if it's having such an impact on the work that you do, in courts, in hospitals and in police and in support services, if it is having that impact, then don't put it as number 10 on your list, put it at number one.⁶⁰

Strong political leadership

Overwhelmingly, the evidence put to the Commission pointed to the importance of strong political leadership in bringing about a whole-of-government approach to family violence. The Commission heard that until recently this leadership has been lacking.

Mr Ken Lay APM, Chair of the Council of Australian Governments Advisory Panel on Reducing Violence against Women and their Children, highlighted the contrast between the political leadership shown by government and opposition members in making changes to reduce road accident-related death and injury and the approach to family violence:

The political leadership was there that spoke about this, that understood it was important. Premiers, police ministers, road ministers knew what worked, knew what didn't work, and we had a model as a result where I had never seen a group of agency heads so tight as they were in the road safety space. I think it was because of the political leadership. They felt empowered. They were game to actually challenge politics. Innovation flowed, investment flowed, legislation flowed; and I always take it back to that political leadership.⁶¹

In the past decade, ministers with portfolio responsibility for women have typically taken a 'lead' role in family violence. The current Victorian Government has appointed a Minister for the Prevention of Family Violence, The Hon. Fiona Richardson, who has actively advocated for change. As Mr Lay observed, recent statements by the Prime Minister and the Victorian Premier have been '... enormously empowering, I suspect, for people like the Chief Commissioner, for agencies, for the community, and people start to understand'.⁶²

The Federation of Community Legal Centres submission emphasised the importance of government leadership on family violence:

... from the top-down [there] must be strong leadership and multi-ministerial responsibility on this issue, including sending an inspirational message to the community that male leaders are prepared to put men's violence towards women and girls at the forefront of public policy. It would demonstrate that violence is not only a women's issue, but also a crisis that affects all Victorians and which requires a well-resourced and concerted effort in order to be effectively addressed.⁶³

A whole-of-government approach

Submissions to the Commission argued that leadership on policy relating to family violence and violence against women must come from all parts of government at both political and bureaucratic levels. It should be backed up by clear arrangements to hold departments responsible for implementing the overall policy. For example, Women's Legal Service Victoria recommended that:

1. The State Government create a governance structure that places responsibility for addressing and eliminating family violence across multiple Departments and Ministerial Portfolios.
2. The State Government develop protocols and processes that strengthen communication, collaboration and accountability across Departments and Ministerial portfolios.⁶⁴

As part of the Victorian reforms of the 2000s, the Victorian Government supported the SAFER research project. This was an Australian Research Council Linkage Project and included a research stream into governance.⁶⁵ The researchers found that the elements needed to drive whole-of-government reform included:

... the demonstrated commitment to reform and leadership provided by ministers, agency heads and senior managers; the involvement of community sector representatives; and the role of the Department of Planning and Community Development.⁶⁶

The importance of bipartisanship

Individuals and organisations spoke of the importance of ensuring stability and continuity in family violence policy and argued for a process that ensured that family violence reform was not dismantled every time a new government was elected.⁶⁷

In reflecting on the adequacy of existing arrangements, the Victorian Government has acknowledged the lack of 'robust governance structures'.⁶⁸ In its submission to the Commission, the Victorian Government observed, 'We need lasting structures—with proper governance and accountability arrangements—which outlive the commitment of the current government to address the problem'.⁶⁹

The Commission notes that bipartisan commitment was shown by members of parliament at the joint sitting of the Legislative Assembly and Legislative Council on 26 November 2015.⁷⁰ At this joint sitting victims of family violence, the Chief Commissioner of Victoria Police and representatives of a number of specialist family violence services addressed Victorian Parliament. The Premier, the Leader of the Opposition, and members of parliament from all parties also made their own contributions on the topic of family violence, acknowledging the harm it causes, its prevalence, and its disproportionate impact on women and children. They also acknowledged the need for a suite of mutually reinforcing strategies to tackle family violence, for the implementation of measures that are proven to work, and for reforms that will bring about cultural and attitudinal change in the long term.⁷¹

System oversight

The Commission heard that there is no formal mechanism for planning and overseeing prevention of, and responses to, family violence. Such a mechanism is needed to ensure that departmental, functions, policies, services and funding relevant to family violence fit together rationally and respond to the needs of people affected by such violence.

Nor is there any process for evaluating the overall system or major system components such as police, courts or Integrated Family Services' responses to family violence.

The Commission notes that in its new program to ensure that government agencies respond to sexual and family violence more effectively, New Zealand has recognised that there needs to be a cohesive whole-of-government approach with a clear understanding of who is leading the areas of service response.⁷²

The recent New Zealand Productivity Commission report argued that there was a need for a 'system steward' in New Zealand to oversee and actively manage the social service system.⁷³ The responsibilities of a system steward include conscious oversight of the whole system, clearly defined outcomes, performance monitoring, consistent standards and regulations, data collection and dealing with system underperformance. The New Zealand Productivity Commission report treated these functions as falling within the concept of system stewardship. The report observed:

The role of system steward falls to the Government. This is because of its unique role as the major funder of social services, and its statutory and regulatory powers unavailable to other participants. Stewardship responsibilities can be spread over several bodies or agencies – for example, responsibility for monitoring performance could be assigned to a separate, independent, government entity. As part of stewardship, the Government has responsibility for the "enabling environment" for the social services system. Two particularly relevant enablers are budgeting for and funding social services, and ensuring a comprehensive data network that can boost the capabilities and effectiveness of all participants.⁷⁴

Overseeing implementation of reforms

In his evidence Mr Neil Comrie AO, APM, Implementation Monitor, Hazelwood Mine Fire Inquiry, warned that there was also a need for oversight to ensure that the recommendations of this Royal Commission were implemented. He commented:

[S]adly, with my long history in the government area ... there are many reports from reviews, inquiries that have not been fully implemented and I think it's worthy of note that some of these same issues keep re-emerging at subsequent inquiries. So I think the rigour and discipline that this monitoring process applies is really important to make sure that there is not only a commitment but a delivery of the undertaking.⁷⁵

The Victorian Government has previously established monitors to oversee implementation of recommendations made by previous Royal Commissions and other inquiries. Mr Comrie held the statutory position of implementation monitor for the Victorian Bushfires Royal Commission and now monitors implementation of the recommendations made by the Hazelwood Coal Mine Fire Inquiry.⁷⁶ In that capacity, Mr Comrie's role has been to 'ensure that the commitments made by the State in response to the Royal Commission and the Inquiry [were] implemented, and to comment on the efficacy of the implementation actions that were put in place'.⁷⁷

In his evidence to this Commission, Mr Comrie explained that the responsibilities of the Victorian Government in implementing the recommendations of the Victorian Bushfires Royal Commission were assigned to particular agencies and that discussion between the implementation monitor and the relevant agency sometimes resulted in a modification of priorities. Mr Comrie told this Commission that the implementation process:

... provided me with the opportunity to go back to the department or agency and say, "Look, you have done these things, but when we have examined them we don't actually think they are achieving what the Commission wanted to be achieved or we don't think that it's actually going to make a difference in the long run."

... I have made the point on a number of occasions that with the best of intentions sometimes an agency will commit to do something in the immediate aftermath of the inquiry or commission, but then with further examination they may find there's actually a better way of doing something. It makes no sense to me to lock in to doing something in a way which is superseded or not efficient when another way has been identified. So we consider that. On a few occasions in my reports I have actually said that the State has opted to undertake this a better way but we agree with that because we believe it's a more effective and efficient way of doing things.⁷⁸

Mr Comrie said that having an independent monitor:

... sends out a very strong signal about the importance of the issues that are being addressed. Having a legislative background ... really sends out a very strong signal that the state is serious about addressing these issues.⁷⁹

Independent oversight and monitoring of performance

One of the matters explored in the hearings was whether these two oversight functions— monitoring implementation of this Commission's recommendations and independently evaluating the performance of the system as a whole—should be combined in a single body.

The departmental secretaries who gave evidence to the Commission discussed various options. Mr Eccles put forward the tentative view that the functions of conducting research into the operation of the system and monitoring the implementation of the Commission's recommendations should be located in separate entities.⁸⁰ He recognised, however, that a 'blended' model of monitoring the implementation of the Commission's recommendations could then transition into a broader 'assurance and reporting' role.⁸¹

The importance of victims' voices in policy and service design

It was suggested to the Commission that listening to the experiences and voices of victims is crucial to assessing the effectiveness of the family violence system. There are several contexts in which victims might participate in policy development and system improvement. These include:

- ▷ having the opportunity to share their stories directly with those who have ongoing responsibility for making decisions, running agencies and delivering services, with a view to ensuring that people working in organisations that respond to family violence understand the nature and dynamics of that violence
- ▷ being consulted on policy proposals and reforms as a member of a standing committee or on an ad hoc basis
- ▷ providing direct feedback to services and agencies on their experience of the family violence system, with a view to guiding system improvement through either better complaints processes or surveys.

Various organisations representing victims of family violence already play a vital role in making sure that victims' stories and experiences are reflected in their advocacy. Some research projects also seek to record and reflect the experiences of victims. ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) is funding a range of projects that use participatory and qualitative research methodologies involving victims/survivors of family violence. In its submission to the Commission it noted the importance of researchers 'amplify[ing] the voice of women themselves, their articulation of their experience of violence, their needs and the needs of their children'.⁸²

The Commission heard that victims' voices should be heard more directly by policy makers and service providers. Vixen Collective, Victoria's peer-only sex worker organisation, emphasised the importance of women being allowed to speak on their own terms:

Key to addressing the ongoing safety and wellbeing of those affected by violence is:

- Listening directly to the voices of those affected.
- Understanding that those affected by violence must be considered the key stakeholders in the discussion.
- Recognising that when other interest groups are permitted to speak on behalf of those affected by violence, this both silences the voices of those directly affected and takes up space in which their lived experiences may be heard.⁸³

A similar point was made by the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, which noted the importance of maintaining a focus on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women's individual voices in community-led strategies to prevent and eliminate family violence in Aboriginal communities:

FVPLS Victoria wholeheartedly supports the notion that solutions to family violence impacting Aboriginal people lie within Aboriginal communities and that Aboriginal people must lead strategies to prevent and eradicate family violence in our communities. Community ownership and community-driven solutions are fundamentally important. However, it is crucial that community approaches do not result in the voices and perspectives of Aboriginal women being lost. Without reference to women or to gender, reliance on a 'community voice' can serve to reinforce pre-existing gendered power dynamics and silence Aboriginal women.⁸⁴

A number of other submissions to the Commission emphasised the importance of victims having a voice in the reform of the family violence system. For example, Women's Legal Service Victoria recommended strengthening victims' participation in influencing change through the establishment of a peak advocacy organisation led by victims.⁸⁵ It also supported government agencies, Victoria Police and the court system '[formalising] the participation of women who are victims of family violence in the development of reforms. This could be achieved through an advisory group structure'.⁸⁶

Mr Eccles noted that, in evaluating the performance and efficacy of programs, qualitative assessments are often best served by speaking with the program users:

Data is not going to be able to capture every element of system performance.
I would imagine they would be able to make a qualitative assessment of the system's performance by talking to victims, families and perpetrators ...⁸⁷

Community initiatives to capture victims' experiences

The Commission heard of a number of current community initiatives that seek to capture the experiences of people experiencing family violence.

The Centre for Non-Violence, an integrated family violence support service in the Loddon Campaspe region, is developing a 'listening post' model in consultation with women from the region who have suffered family violence and specialist family violence organisations.⁸⁸ The model is being developed under the auspices of the Loddon Campaspe Family Violence Advisory Committee. It will pilot 'listening post' workshops with the women, with a view to informing advocacy and consultation sessions with services, police and court registry staff to improve family violence responses. The Family Violence Advisory Committee told the Commission:

The 'listening post' project aims to improve the family violence system response (family violence stakeholder culture, practice and advocacy) and its systems of accountability for women and children experiencing family violence in the Loddon and Campaspe region (Maryborough, Bendigo, Echuca and Kyneton).

The 'listening post' is an evidence based evaluation method of the family violence system response that enables family violence stakeholders to hear directly from the women their lived experiences of their practice.

Women with lived experience of family violence are recruited through trusted family violence stakeholders and supported to convey their lived experience of their family violence system response to relevant family violence stakeholders in a confidential safe setting.⁸⁹

The Commission was made aware of The Listening Project: Victims and Survivors Voices Heard, a series of workshops held on 3 December 2015 and hosted by the Victorian Parliament. The project provided an opportunity for family violence victims to tell their stories and offer opinions on how the current system can be improved.⁹⁰

The Commission also heard about programs to promote advocacy work by victims, such as the Eastern Media Advocacy Program⁹¹ and the Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre's Media Advocacy Project.⁹²

Finally, the Commission learnt of another option for inviting victims' input—a legal system victim impact statement.⁹³ This involves victims describing the impact of the interaction with police on them in a written statement; has been said to serve 'an important expressive function for the victim, and be instrumental in the development of "best practices" in the field'.⁹⁴

The way forward

Preventing and responding to family violence is a complex endeavour. There is no simple solution, no single source of expertise, and no guarantee that solutions advanced today will continue to be the most appropriate solutions in the future.

The Commission was told by numerous organisations and individuals that previous measures to make family violence a priority for all parts of government have not been sustained. Among the reasons for this were said to be the following:

- ▷ a lack of shared understanding and agreement throughout the community and service systems about the goals of family violence responses and the best way to achieve them
- ▷ a lack of sustained leadership
- ▷ loss of momentum following a change of government
- ▷ a lack of bipartisanship on policy responses to family violence
- ▷ a lack of accountability and oversight of the system
- ▷ the absence of machinery to support service providers in working in a more integrated and consistent way.

In response to this, the Commission proposes a governance framework that makes family violence a central consideration for all levels of government. It is intended to provide strong leadership and support effective and coordinated strategies to address family violence. In summary, this framework comprises:

- ▷ a bipartisan standing parliamentary committee on family violence
- ▷ a Cabinet standing sub-committee chaired by the Premier of Victoria
- ▷ a requirement for all ministers to report regularly on the risks and opportunities in their portfolio relevant to family violence
- ▷ Victorian Secretaries Board oversight of government administration arrangements for family violence policy
- ▷ a family violence policy unit located in the Department of Premier and Cabinet
- ▷ a reinvigorated Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee, including representatives of the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum as members
- ▷ a continuation of the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum
- ▷ family violence regional integration committees, supported by Regional Integration Coordinators
- ▷ an independent Family Violence Agency established by statute
- ▷ mechanisms for ensuring that the voices of victims are heard and guide policy development and service delivery.

The Commission also proposes that the Victorian Government prepare a Statewide Family Violence Action Plan to guide implementation of the recommendations put forward in this report. This plan will include both prevention and response to family violence. In recognition of the importance of prevention the plan must include a discrete primary prevention strategy.

This section sets out the detail of the proposed framework, as well as the underpinning rationale and guiding principles.

Recommended principles for a statewide response to family violence

The Commission heard that although individuals, non-government organisations and government agencies have worked hard to respond to family violence, disparate approaches and the development of 'silos' have undermined coordinated efforts and consistency in responding to the problem. Reforms will succeed only if all parts of the system have a shared understanding of how best to prevent and respond to family violence. Defining the goals that guide the prevention of and the response to family violence will help to build this understanding.

The goals of the family violence system should be to:

- ▷ prevent family violence in all its forms and to establish and promote a culture of non-violence and gender equality
- ▷ keep victims safe—and in their homes and communities as much as possible
- ▷ hold perpetrators to account for their violence
- ▷ help victims find the assistance they need to rebuild their lives and reach their goals.

On the basis of the evidence and submissions, as well as its consultations, the Commission considers that the following principles should be adopted to guide the statewide response to family violence:

- ▷ Family violence is a fundamental violation of human rights. All members of society should be protected from such violence and be enabled to live free of it.
- ▷ Preventing family violence is the most effective way of protecting people from it in the long term.
- ▷ Ending family violence requires a change in the attitudes of individuals and in community attitudes that allow violence to be excused, justified or condoned. All elements of the community should be involved in ending family violence: government, business, non-government organisations, the media and communities should play a part.
- ▷ Priority should be given to early intervention in family relationships where violence is threatened or likely to escalate.
- ▷ Services for victims and perpetrators of family violence must be adequately funded.
- ▷ Family violence service systems must ensure the safety of all victims of family violence, regardless of the family relationship within which the violence occurs. The majority of those harmed by family violence are women and children. Services must be accessible and able to respond to a broad range of victims and types of family violence—including non-intimate partner violence and other less understood forms of family violence.
- ▷ All parts of the system should apply evidence based risk assessment and management and understand their roles and responsibilities for this.
- ▷ Services (whether universal or specialist) must treat victims with dignity and respect their choices. Service provision cannot be based on provider convenience. Services should:
 - ▷ empower victims and respect their needs and decisions
 - ▷ aim to reduce, as far as possible, the need to seek support from many different services
 - ▷ take account of factors that might increase the risk of someone being a victim or perpetrator of family violence—including poverty, locational disadvantage, disability, mental illness and substance misuse
 - ▷ respect differences in culture and identity while making it clear that family violence cannot be condoned in any community or culture
 - ▷ be consistent and predictable.
- ▷ Supporting children and young people should be central to family violence policies. This includes both child victims of family violence and children or young people who use family violence, some of whom might previously have been victims of it. Young people who use violence should be helped to change their behaviour.
- ▷ Services for victims of family violence should not be confined to providing crisis support but should also aim to support victims to recover from the effects of past violence and to rebuild their lives at their own pace.
- ▷ Those who use violence against family members should be held responsible for the violence and helped to change their behaviour. It should never be seen to be the victim's responsibility to stop the violence. Those who use violence should always be held responsible for their actions, although this might not always require a criminal justice response. Stopping the violence is the way to ensure the safety of victims.

Making family violence a central government concern

At present, responsibility for family violence is diffused across a variety of government departments and agencies. This fragmentation has led to family violence policy and service design being pushed to the margins of broader government policy making, rather than being a central concern for all parts of government. Family violence has not been given the priority—in policy development and investment—it deserves. As a consequence, policies are vulnerable to changes of government and bureaucratic arrangements.

Family violence is a complex phenomenon, no single area in government can take entire responsibility for responding to it. In many instances the way that different policy decisions intersect with family violence will not be immediately obvious: responses to natural disasters, tenancy matters and liquor licensing, prenatal care and equal opportunity initiatives are examples of areas that have a relationship with family violence. A failure to identify intersections and overlaps between different government initiatives can lead to unintended policy consequences or a failure to seize opportunities.

Accountability for achieving the goals of the family violence system needs to be held at each level of the system—cascading down from ministers to government agencies and the service providers who work on preventing and responding to family violence. There should also be horizontal accountability, so that each system that responds to family violence has a responsibility to act in ways that support an integrated approach. No single sector can assume responsibility for safety, accountability and recovery outcomes: all have a role to play in ensuring that the gaps that people might fall through, are closed.

The importance of bipartisanship

Family violence is a problem so deeply embedded in our society and culture, and so widespread, that bipartisan support is required to maintain a sustained and coherent strategy.

The Commission's recommendations are intended to encourage bipartisanship on family violence policy, to increase and build on community involvement in preventing family violence, and to support people who are affected by it. A bipartisan approach needs to be premised on a shared commitment to the principles set out in this chapter.

This commitment to addressing family violence means that the response to family violence can move beyond raising awareness of the nature and extent of the problem, towards a much more sustained focus on developing and evaluating initiatives that will have a real impact on the incidence of family violence. The Commission considers that Victoria is well placed to face the challenges ahead.

The establishment of a standing parliamentary family violence committee—as applies in the case of road accident deaths and injuries—would encourage development of a bipartisan approach to family violence. The family violence standing parliamentary committee should be clearly defined to support the goals of the family violence system and oversee matters relating to prevention and responses to family violence in Victoria. The role of the committee should be to:

- ▷ inquire into and report on any proposal, policy or legislation concerned with family violence
- ▷ examine and report to Victorian Parliament when legislation is introduced that might be relevant to family violence—including whether it has the potential to support or undermine the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan.

In doing so, the committee would need to liaise with the Scrutiny of Acts and Regulations Committee.

Integrated and effective system architecture

A whole-of-government response to family violence requires 'system stewardship'. The Commission proposes a governance architecture that ensures oversight of the overall government response to family violence.

The architecture would also distribute functions such as monitoring, evaluation, data collection and funding across different parts of government. As noted, the goals of the family violence system relate to the areas of prevention, safety, accountability and recovery. The governance architecture is intended to meet these goals.

The Commission also makes a number of related recommendations in relation to coordinated approaches to funding (Chapter 41), data collection (Chapter 39) and prevention of family violence (Chapter 36).

Continuing Cabinet involvement

The Commission welcomes the establishment of a Cabinet sub-committee dedicated to family violence and recommends that a standing Cabinet sub-committee on Family Violence, chaired by the Premier, continue into the future. Establishment of that sub-committee recognises the priority to be accorded to family violence in government policy, and will enable discussion and reconciliation of different ministerial views. It will support integrated whole-of-government decision-making processes at the highest levels.

The role of the Cabinet sub-committee

The primary role of the Cabinet sub-committee would be to oversee the development and implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan.

The Statewide Family Violence Action Plan

The Statewide Family Violence Action Plan should be based on the recommendations of this Commission. The plan should be a 10 year plan setting out the concrete outcomes to be achieved in the short and long term. It should also explain how performance will be measured and monitored. For example, short-term service outcomes could include a requirement that victims who leave their homes because of family violence are housed in particular accommodation within a specified period or a requirement that police conduct a regular audit of the response to family violence incidents, for example, investigation of breaches. A longer term prevention outcome might be reductions in the prevalence of family in particular communities and a reduction of the number of children taken into care because of family violence.

The Statewide Family Violence Action Plan should not be a static document: it should evolve over time in response to community experience and expert knowledge of the effect of particular approaches and programs. The plan should be developed by the Victorian Secretaries Board, which would also have responsibility for implementing and reviewing the plan. This process would be overseen by the Cabinet sub-committee and endorsed by Cabinet. The Family Violence Statewide Advisory Committee and the independent Family Violence Agency would provide advice on future strategy and necessary modifications to the action plan.

The Cabinet sub-committee should introduce a process whereby relevant ministers agree to make a joint budget submission to support implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. This will require sub-committee members to reach agreement about budget bids to ensure that investment is aligned with family violence plan priorities.

The Premier of Victoria should direct all ministers to review and regularly report on the family violence-related risks and opportunities within their portfolio areas and the Cabinet sub-committee should assess the potential impact of Cabinet submissions that might have an impact on family violence prevention or responses. One method that could be used to ensure that family violence is given priority is through the use of charter letters (also known as portfolio priority letters), which could be sent by the Premier to all ministers with instructions to this effect. The purpose of this reform would be to ensure that approaches taken in other areas of government responsibility support the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan and that other policy initiatives do not undermine the plan.

Another way of achieving this goal would be to require departments proposing legislative or policy change to submit a family violence impact statement, describing the relationship between the proposal and the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. Victorian government policy requires a legislative impact statement to be prepared if legislative proposals impose potentially significant effects on business or competition, or both. Along similar lines, the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) requires that all new bills be accompanied by a statement of compatibility assessing the extent to which the Bill is consistent with the human rights protected by the Charter.⁹⁵

On balance, the Commission decided against this latter approach. A large number of proposals put to Cabinet will have no relevance to family violence and departments already have to prepare impact statements in other contexts. There is a risk that requiring a family violence impact statement might be given lip service only. In the Commission's view, the requirement for regular reports, whether incorporated in charter letters or otherwise, offers a more effective way of requiring ministers to maintain family violence as a priority regardless of the extent to which their portfolio intersects with family violence.

The government is considering a means of introducing a more coordinated system, involving ministers being jointly responsible for achieving outcomes in priority areas, with funding allocation to occur across portfolio areas.⁹⁶ The Commission considers that family violence could be identified as a priority for the purpose of this initiative.

Bureaucratic leadership

Heads of relevant departments will have central responsibility for implementing the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan and 10 year industry plan, as endorsed by Cabinet.

The roles and responsibilities of departmental heads relate to their capacities as policy makers and advisors, service deliverers, service purchasers and employers. Further consideration of how the Victorian Secretaries Board oversees system matters associated with family violence will, however, be needed.

The Victorian Secretaries Board

The Commission envisages that the Victorian Secretaries Board will have collective responsibility for promoting a whole-of-government approach. In all matters, the board's focus will be on family violence system implications, regardless of how many (or few) portfolios are involved in policy and programming processes. The board should resolve working and decision-making arrangements to ensure that a whole-of-government perspective and oversight is maintained, without delaying or impeding the good efforts of individual portfolios.

The Victorian Secretaries Board should appoint a sub-committee to take primary responsibility and report to the board. The Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet should chair the sub-committee. The secretaries of Treasury and Finance, Justice and Regulation, Health and Human Services and Education and Training, the Chief Commissioner of Victoria Police and the Chief Executive Officer of Court Services Victoria should be members. In the case of prevention proposals, the Victorian Secretaries Board's working arrangements might include other members—for example, the portfolios of Local Government and Sports and Recreation.

Roles and responsibilities

Some of the 'siloeing' described in this chapter occurs within departments and could be dealt with by more effective planning and coordination. Ensuring better information sharing across programs could prevent the unintended effect of one policy or initiative undermining the purpose of another. It will also enable expertise acquired in one area to be shared throughout government.

The Commission envisages that the Victorian Secretaries Board will advise government on performance outcomes and be responsible for delivering and reporting on milestones associated with the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. It will also prepare the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan for the Cabinet sub-committee's consideration.

As part of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, it is envisaged that the Victorian Secretaries Board will oversee planning to implement the Commission's recommendations. The Secretaries Board should assume responsibility for developing the overarching performance framework for the action plan, as well as a framework to guide monitoring and evaluation at all levels of the system. Members of the Secretaries Board will be held jointly and individually accountable for meeting the objectives set by the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. The Secretaries Board should also play a crucial role in ensuring that activities in different areas of government are developed and implemented in ways that are coordinated and support intended policy outcomes for family violence.

In developing the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, the Victorian Secretaries Board should also consider the role of departmental secretaries as employers. Heads of departments should lead culture changes within their workplaces to help to prevent family violence. Secretaries have an important role to play in changing social attitudes—in the same way as leaders of business and organisations such as Victoria Police have done. For example, Victoria Police led the way in commissioning the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission's independent review of sex discrimination, sexual harassment and predatory behaviour in Victoria Police.⁹⁷ Leadership in the workplaces for which secretaries are responsible could model, build and track progress towards building respectful and inclusive workplaces and ensure that gender equity, and an understanding of its relationship to family violence, are enhanced in their respective workplaces.

The Secretaries Board should also advise the Cabinet sub-committee and relevant ministers on the relationship between the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan and relevant state policy and the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and Children 2010–2022.⁹⁸

Another important function of the Victorian Secretaries Board will be to consider the changes necessary to bring the family services, child protection and family violence systems closer together and maintain oversight of progress in individual portfolio areas. This will also require that police, the courts and service systems operating in these areas work together more effectively. The Commission notes that there is some common membership between the proposed sub-committee of the Victorian Secretaries Board and the Children's Services Coordination Board, which was established under the Child Wellbeing and Safety Act 2005 (Vic). As a result of the relationship between child services and family violence services, it would be useful for the Victorian Secretaries Board family violence sub-committee to engage with the Children's Services Coordination Board.

Both the standing Cabinet sub-committee and the Victorian Secretaries Board sub-committee should be able to seek advice from the independent Family Violence Agency—the establishment of which is proposed shortly.

The Victorian Secretaries Board should also oversee adjustments to the procurement requirements and processes of individual departments to ensure that the Victorian Government consistently and adequately specifies the type of and standards for services it intends to procure, as well as the way in which those service providers will be expected to interact with the wider family violence system.

As noted briefly in this chapter, and discussed more comprehensively in Chapter 39, there is an urgent need to purchase or redesign information technology to underpin and enable the collection of data that can be used to assess and improve risk management and system performance. Victoria needs databases that effectively link the courts, the police and other service systems. This is essential if we are to protect victims of family violence; it is also essential to enable evaluation of the overall effects of policy changes made in different service systems.

The Victorian Secretaries Board should also assume responsibility for ensuring that systems are established to permit the collection and sharing of data for these purposes. Further, the Victorian Secretaries Board should be responsible for ensuring that their member departments' regional implementation is consistent with the intent of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan.

As discussed elsewhere in this report, ongoing identification of government expenditure on family violence is required. An important function of the Victorian Secretaries Board will be to create the impetus for and propose comparable methodologies for department's reporting of expenditure, to make funding for family violence more transparent so that the costs and benefits of particular strategies can be assessed.

The Victorian Secretaries Board would advise and report to the Cabinet sub-committee on the implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, including the funding measures required to implement it. It is also envisaged that the board would report to the Cabinet sub-committee and relevant ministers on progress with the implementation of recommendations relating to core system factors such as information sharing, risk assessment and management mechanisms, Support and Safety Hubs, workforce development, the systems data platform, and procurement of the data system to support risk management.

Administrative support

The Commission proposes that the work of both the Cabinet sub-committee and the Victorian Secretaries Board be supported by a dedicated Family Violence Unit in the Department of Premier and Cabinet.

Systemic advocacy, from the community sector and from victims, will continue to have an important role in the design of prevention strategies and in liaising with the Victorian Government on response matters. For the reasons explained shortly, the Commission recommends the re-invigoration of statewide consultation recommends the arrangements with the establishment of a new Family Violence Statewide Advisory Committee. The dedicated family violence unit will provide secretariat support for the statewide consultation mechanism to support the design and implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan.

In addition to providing secretariat services to government and its advisory structures, the role of the dedicated family violence unit should be to:

- ▷ coordinate and provide strategic policy advice to government on directions and implementation of all aspects of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, including, in collaboration with the Office of Women's Policy, reporting on the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022
- ▷ manage and coordinate effective consultation with advisory bodies and stakeholders to guide the development and implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
- ▷ manage regional governance structures
- ▷ liaise with and consult throughout government to support and implement all efforts to prevent all forms of family violence and all forms of violence against women.

System accountability: an independent agency

Family violence systems are not static and new problems and concerns will arise in the future. There is need for an expert body, independent of government, that has, among other roles, the task of advising government about future responses to family violence, monitoring progress of systems processes and outcomes, identifying opportunities for improvement, and encouraging cultural change within systems to support those improvements.

The creation of an independent agency would recognise that family violence should be at the centre of government policy in an enduring way.

The primary function of the independent Family Violence Agency would be to advise government on the overall performance of systems designed to prevent and respond to family violence and to identify areas where the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan should be modified in the future. The agency would have the capacity to respond to requests for advice by the Cabinet sub-committee, the Premier and the Victorian Secretaries Board, as well as to conduct own-motion investigations of particular matters and perform or commission research for those purposes.

The Family Violence Agency's work would complement the research activities of ANROWS by focusing on Victorian practice, and encouraging communication between service providers in relation to policy successes and failures.

In relation to the question of whether this agency should have both a monitoring function and broader oversight one (as discussed earlier in this chapter), the Commission considers it appropriate that the agency have responsibility for monitoring implementation of the Commission's recommendations as well as the broader functions just described.

The Commission considered various independent bodies that have been created at the state and territory and Commonwealth levels. These bodies fulfil some combination of the following functions:

- ▷ engaging in primary prevention activities
- ▷ providing education programs to the community
- ▷ providing services in particular areas of government activity⁹⁹
- ▷ collecting and assessing data in relation to the relevant subject area¹⁰⁰ or coordinating data collection and impact assessment¹⁰¹
- ▷ conducting and disseminating research about the relevant subject area¹⁰²
- ▷ monitoring and reporting on performance of the relevant system as a whole¹⁰³
- ▷ conducting system-wide reviews¹⁰⁴
- ▷ issuing guidelines in the relevant area¹⁰⁵
- ▷ setting written performance indicators¹⁰⁶
- ▷ providing policy advice to the relevant minister,¹⁰⁷ Premier or a Cabinet committee—including advice on priorities for funding¹⁰⁸
- ▷ coordinating whole-of-government policy and implementing government reform initiatives¹⁰⁹
- ▷ providing or evaluating training to maintain and strengthen capability¹¹⁰
- ▷ independently monitoring implementation of the relevant scheme.¹¹¹

Many of these bodies are empowered to conduct research relevant to the area for which they have responsibility and to advise ministers or other bodies. Some of these bodies also have a function similar to that of an implementation monitor along with other functions, and some bodies are empowered to carry out system reviews or monitoring.

Monitoring implementation will require an examination of how the family violence system, or particular parts of it, is functioning. It is desirable that the function of monitoring implementation of the Commission's recommendations be brought together with that of carrying out applied research into the effectiveness of particular policies and systems that are currently in operation, and advising on new ways of addressing family violence. The proposed applied research functions of the agency will equip it to ascertain whether prevention activities or service initiatives have met their objectives or should be modified to make them more effective.

Functions and structure of the independent Family Violence Agency

Functions

The Commission proposes that the independent Family Violence Agency have the following functions:

- ▷ monitor implementation of the Commission's recommendations—including that of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
- ▷ provide expert policy advice on family violence at the request of Cabinet, the Premier or the Victorian Secretaries Board
- ▷ conduct and commission applied research, policy and evidence reviews as well as conduct own-motion inquiries into the operation of the family violence system
- ▷ liaise with relevant Commonwealth Government and national agencies to inform policy and practice to improve primary prevention efforts and responses to family violence
- ▷ establish a means by which service providers can share information about programs
- ▷ liaise with the Crime Statistics Agency and other agencies to coordinate data collection and sharing for the purpose of monitoring the overall performance of systems that respond to family violence.¹¹²

The agency should be required to report to parliament annually on the performance of its functions.

The independent Family Violence Agency would not be involved in the implementation or coordination of any programs or services. These would remain the role of government. Instead, the agency's role would be providing advice and monitoring and evaluating the program of work set out in the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. Among other matters to be reviewed, monitored and evaluated for their systems impact are risk assessment and management processes, workforce development strategy and standards, procurement, quality assurance processes, governance, and consultation and engagement processes to enhance the inclusiveness and impact of primary prevention and family violence responses across the state.

Any overlap between the monitoring role of the independent Family Violence Agency and the financial and performance audit functions of the Victorian Auditor-General would need to be considered and resolved in the establishment phase of the agency.

Structure

The Family Violence Agency should be established by statute as an independent entity and be chaired by a person who is independent of government. It should have a board of directors with primary responsibility for guiding the development of a family violence system that upholds safety, accountability and recovery. The agency should draw on contemporary evidence and good practice in performing its work.

The board of directors should include a person with broad experience in government, a senior member of the academic staff of a university who has broad expertise in family violence policies and systems, a person who has been a victim of family violence or represents victims of family violence, and the Commissioners for Children and Young People and Aboriginal Children and Young People.¹¹³

The independent Family Violence Agency should also have power to appoint an advisory committee of people involved in systems advocacy, either through service provision to people affected by family violence or through their experience of family violence. The advisory committee should include a representative of Victoria Police and a magistrate.

The independent Family Violence Agency should establish stakeholder engagement processes to help guide its monitoring and evaluation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, as well as to ensure its advisory function is able to meet contemporary challenges and opportunities.

The board of directors should reach early agreement with the Victorian Government on the nature of the agency's engagement with government policy development, planning and consultation processes in ways that both preserve the agency's independence and ensure it is involved in government processes in a timely manner.

The independence of the agency will be crucial to maintaining bipartisan support for its function.

The future role of family violence regional integration committees

In consultation with the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee, the Victorian Secretaries Board should determine the core roles and responsibilities of regional family violence governance committees in implementing the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. The role of these family violence regional integration committees should include developing supporting regional systems architecture to:

- ▷ guide, implement and report on workforce development at the regional level
- ▷ support and report on implementation of data system reforms and data collection and analysis
- ▷ create common platforms to support the integration of the Support and Safety Hubs into the regional family violence systems, as well as implementation of the Risk Assessment and Management Panels, and engagement with services associated with other risk factors—such as alcohol and drug services, disability services, and universal services
- ▷ extend engagement with systems advocates to all forms of family violence
- ▷ provide feedback to government on regional implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan to support intended systems outcomes
- ▷ ensure mutually supportive working relationships with regional primary prevention leaders and collaboratively determine appropriate regional governance arrangements.

The Commission was advised of different responses to family violence in different regions; it was also told about the particular challenges people face in obtaining services in regional, rural and remote Victoria. In defining the primary role of family violence regional integration committees, it is important that these committees promote consistent systems practices throughout the state, so that people experiencing family violence can expect consistent justice and service responses that are applicable to their needs, regardless of where they live. This does not preclude regional family violence governance committees from identifying matters of regional interest to pursue.

Regional governance overseeing both prevention and responses to family violence should be guided by and accountable to the proposed Family Violence Unit within the Department of Premier and Cabinet. The aim here is to ensure that regional family violence governance committees maintain a strong systems focus. Service delivery, as a subset of this, requires integration and seamless service delivery alongside justice and universal service processes. The engagement of the justice portfolio and the courts in the regional context is crucial.

A further consideration is that the ongoing role and funding of family violence regional integration committees should be independent of service funding. To support this focus, the role of the family violence Regional Integration Coordinator should be elevated. The coordinator should have expertise in family violence and strong strategic and stakeholder engagement skills and be funded on a continuing basis.

Regular consultation should be established between the Family Violence Unit and family violence regional integration committees to support implementation of the recommended system improvements. The objectives of the consultation process will be to define and monitor the role of regional family violence governance committees to achieve statewide consistency, to share experience and best practice, and to guide policy development, priorities and work sequencing.

Within the regions, the role of the regional family violence governance committees should be clearly recognised as the regional governance structure for matters relating to family violence at both the state and regional levels. The chairs of the committees should also be members of regional partnerships (the contemplated successor arrangements to the regional management forums) to support aligned and complementary regional efforts. Chairs should be resourced to reflect the level of involvement required for them to influence and effect the changes needed in their regions in order to implement the family violence system as intended.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait governance

The existing governance structure of the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum should be retained. The forum should continue to oversee the Indigenous Family Violence Strategy, and the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups should continue to report to the forum. In order to ensure consistency and integration with the broader framework, representatives of the Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum should be members of the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee, continuing their current role on the Violence Against Women and Children Forum.

At the regional level, the Commission supports and encourages the collaborative relationships between the family violence regional integration committees and the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups to pursue projects to support prevention and responses to family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities.

In Chapter 26, the Commission endorses the recommendations of the mid-term evaluation of the Indigenous Family Violence 10 year plan. Central to these recommendations is the need for the Victorian Government to commit to providing high-level oversight of implementation of the plan's objectives and reporting on achievements annually to the Cabinet Sub-committee on Family Violence.

Alignment with other regional place-based initiatives

Whole-of-government leadership is required to ensure that place-based initiatives take into account the risk assessment and management processes associated with family violence—and consult to ensure that their work does not generate unintended consequences. Such leadership should also ensure that place-based initiatives are supported to engage with implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan through suitable policy frameworks, guidance and capacity development.

Evaluation and oversight

It will be necessary to examine the entire area of family violence and assess the effectiveness of different interventions. Regular evaluation of the operation of systems-level mechanisms should be undertaken to ensure that processes for integrating systems, such as risk assessment and management and information sharing, are having the intended effect on the system as a whole and contribute to intended safety, accountability and recovery outcomes.

At the state level there is a lack of sufficiently robust and consistent data with which to assess current and future service needs and systems bottlenecks and to show the quality of service and system interventions. Reliable data is required, so that government knows whether primary prevention and response programs are working and to determine any necessary modifications and so there can be robust planning for future levels of service demand. These things are interrelated: for example, the success of an early intervention program might reduce pressure on Integrated Family Services or child protection programs and demand for police and courts in responding to family violence incidents.

Changes are necessary to ensure that the data required for evaluation or planning purposes can be effectively collected by the relevant department or agency and shared as required. Databases held by different parts of government need to be changed to make information more accessible across different systems, subject to privacy protection. We make recommendations about these matters in Chapter 7.

Consultative arrangements

A Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee

Non-government community organisations are the main source of support for women and children affected by family violence. The Commission was greatly assisted by submissions from specialist family violence service providers and their peak bodies. It is vital that the community organisations that are the repositories of expertise on family violence policy and practice continue to participate in advocacy and policy development and have the opportunity to bring gaps and weaknesses in service provision and possible solutions to the attention of government.

Revitalisation of a Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee is necessary. It should be underpinned by genuine consultation and co-design principles and should have functions similar to those of the previous Statewide Steering Committee. The previous Statewide Steering Committee focused on improving responses to family violence against women and children and supporting these groups of victims. As with previous advisory structures, the new Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee should have a wider role: it should deal with all forms of family violence and have a focus on enhancing perpetrator accountability and supporting men to change their behaviour, as well as including perspectives from victims of family violence whose needs have not been recognised or adequately responded to in the past.

In addition, the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee should include representation from experts, systems advocates and victims of family violence. It should reflect different perspectives to ensure that government is receiving the benefit of input from experts in a variety of disciplines. The committee should assist with the evaluation and implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. In developing the working arrangements for the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee, the Victorian Government should ensure that processes allow for comprehensive engagement with stakeholders engaged in both response and primary prevention work.

In relation to implementation, representation on the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee should continue to include representatives of regional governance committees; as noted, the committee should be accountable to the new dedicated Family Violence Unit in the Department of Premier and Cabinet.

The Commission also notes that the current Violence Against Women and Children Advisory Forum also considers other forms of violence against women such as sex trafficking and sexual assault (which may or may not be family violence). We contemplate that the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee would continue to do this work.

The government should also examine how it manages continuing governance and advisory structures for non-family violence forms of violence against women, such as sex trafficking, that are beyond the scope of the Commission's work.

Victims' voices

One of the main themes to emerge from the Commission's public hearings concerned the importance of involving victims of family violence in the design and review of systems and services, to ensure that their voices are heard and that their experiences help guide the system response. Effective family violence governance arrangements count for little if they fail to support a system that responds effectively to the needs of the victims—the very people the entire governance system is intended to serve. It is therefore important that governance arrangements for policy setting and service provision build in mechanisms for gathering the views and experiences of victims and use these to inform decision-making.

Providing opportunities for victims to talk about their experiences is important for other reasons too. First, for many, speaking about their experiences in a safe forum is important to their process of recovery. Secondly, victims need to feel that they have been heard and acknowledged in their interactions with police, courts and service providers. These two aspects of victims' voices are discussed in Chapter 20.

It is for these reasons that victims should be represented on the board of the proposed independent Family Violence Agency and on the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee.

As noted, organisations representing victims of family violence already play a vital role in making sure that victims' stories and experiences are reflected in their advocacy. This was certainly the case during the Commission's inquiry; a considerable number of submissions we received from organisations incorporated case studies and quotes from people who had experienced family violence and had subsequently had to navigate the various systems and processes. The Commission also heard about a range of ways in which victims might participate in policy development and system improvement—including the 'listening post' model and the Speaking Out program.

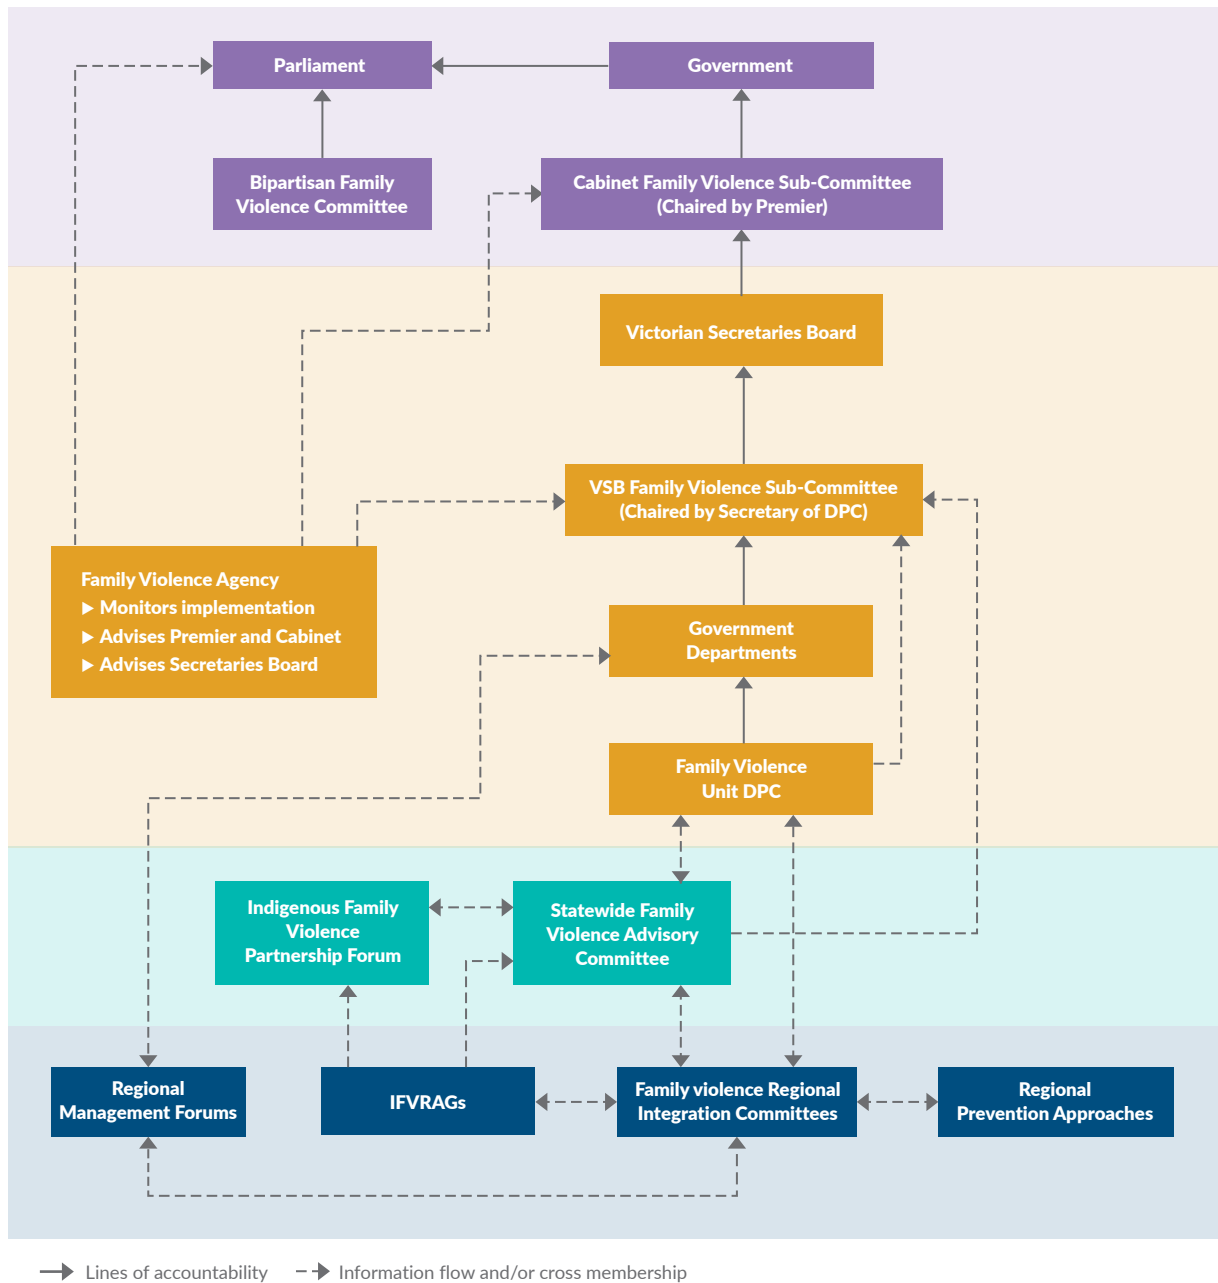

Other ways of giving government and service providers insight into the experience of victims might be through membership of statewide, regional and agency advisory committees, involving victims in professional development and training programs for people working in agencies that respond to family violence, and better monitoring and evaluation of clients' experiences of services such as the police, the courts and specialist family violence services. In addition, contracts for service providers could require organisations to specify how they will obtain feedback from victims. Agencies such as Victoria Police and the courts should introduce victim feedback mechanisms. Such mechanisms are to some extent currently in use on an ad hoc basis in the family violence system, but there is scope for developing them in a more coordinated and systemic way.

It is important that any such avenues for victim participation are safe, constructive and meaningful and that they are accessible to victims from diverse groups—including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities, people who identify as lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex, older people, people with disabilities and young people.

Table 38.1 Proposed governance architecture

Entity	Role
Bipartisan parliamentary committee	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Maintain parliamentary commitment to address family violence ▷ Inquire into and report on relevant legislative and policy proposals ▷ Examine and report on bills introduced
Cabinet family violence sub-committee	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Oversee development of Statewide Family Violence Action Plan ▷ Propose expenditure priorities, including facilitating joint budget submissions ▷ Assess the impact of Cabinet submissions on family violence
Victorian ministers	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Report on risks and opportunities within their portfolios relevant to family violence
Victorian Secretaries Board (including through sub-committee)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Oversee whole-of-government family violence prevention and response ▷ Develop, implement and coordinate the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, including developing the performance framework and reporting on milestones. Prepare family violence industry plan ▷ Coordinate budget bids and develop methodologies for reporting on family violence expenditure ▷ Coordinate common tools (for example, information sharing and IT systems)
Department of Premier & Cabinet Family Violence Unit	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Support the Cabinet sub-committee, Victorian Secretaries Board and Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee ▷ Coordinate and advise on whole-of-government work ▷ Manage regional governance structures ▷ Ensure Victoria meets its National Plan obligations
Family Violence Agency (supported by an Advisory Committee)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Monitor and report the implementation of this report's recommendations and the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, in order to advise on overall performance of systems responding to family violence ▷ Provide policy advice ▷ Undertake and commission research ▷ Liaise with Commonwealth Government and national agencies ▷ Liaise with the Crime Statistics Agency and other agencies to coordinate data collection and sharing ▷ Report annually to the Victorian Parliament
Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Engage with experts, victims and systems advocates with perspectives on both prevention of and responses to family violence ▷ Facilitate codesign ▷ Inform evolution and implementation of Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Oversee Indigenous Family Violence Strategy
Family Violence regional integration committees	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Chair serves as member of Regional Partnerships (successors to Regional Management Forums)
Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups (IFVRAGs)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Members of or input to Family Violence regional integration committees ▷ Report to Indigenous Family Violence Partnership Forum

Figure 38.2 Proposed governance architecture

Although the intention is that these changes, combined with clear leadership, will provide the guidance, oversight and accountability that has sometimes been lacking, the Commission is aware that these structures will be effective only if those who work within the system—in all its manifestations and at all levels—are open to new ideas and solutions. We are confident that this is the case.

The sound foundations of Victoria's family violence system, and the examples of best practice to be found in different settings around the state have evolved as a result of people working together in the face of pressing demand. Their efforts and the efforts of other parts of the community who are ready to play a greater role in tackling family violence, must be harnessed and supported through the provision of guidance, resources and infrastructure support and the dissemination of practice knowledge.

Extending responsibility for tackling family violence will require each sector or component of the system to re-inforce the work of the other, to collaborate with and trust others, and to understand the experience of family violence in all its manifestations and look outwardly. At present different sectors and service systems operate according to distinct underlying principles, service delivery models and ideological frameworks; this can create barriers to service integration, collaboration and innovation.

Our approach to family violence today has come a long way from the days when family violence was ignored and invisible. This has come about as a result of trust gradually built between women's services and agencies such as the police and the courts, which saw them overcome scepticism about each other's roles and objectives and forge a partnership that made family violence a priority for the justice system. This next step will build on that strong history in strengthening dialogue and partnership among the sectors, supported by a stable, independent system of governance.

Recommendations

Recommendation 193

The Victorian Government establish a governance structure for implementing the Commission's recommendations and overseeing systemic improvements in family violence policy [within two years]. The structure should consist of:

- ▷ a bipartisan standing parliamentary committee on family violence
- ▷ a Cabinet standing sub-committee chaired by the Premier of Victoria
- ▷ a family violence unit located in the Department of Premier and Cabinet
- ▷ a Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee
- ▷ Family Violence Regional Integration Committees, supported by Regional Integration Coordinators
- ▷ an independent Family Violence Agency established by statute.

Recommendation 194

The Cabinet Family Violence Sub-committee advise Cabinet on the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan based on the Commission's recommendations and be responsible for:

- ▷ specifying outcomes for achievement relating to prevention, early intervention and responses to family violence, supporting victims (including in their long-term recovery), and holding perpetrators to account
- ▷ proposing priorities for expenditure
- ▷ setting performance targets.

The sub-committee should report regularly to Cabinet on progress in implementing the plan [within 18 months].

Recommendation 195

The Victorian Government require all ministers to report regularly on the risks and opportunities in their portfolio relevant to family violence. The charter letters of all ministers should require them to consider the effect of proposed policies or legislation in their portfolios on the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan and family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 196

The Victorian Secretaries Board institute working arrangements—for example, the establishment of a sub-committee—to support effective oversight of family violence prevention and responses. Membership of the sub-committee should include, the Secretaries of Treasury and Finance, Justice and Regulation, Health and Human Services, and Education and Training, the Chief Commissioner of Police and the Chief Executive Officer of Court Services Victoria. The sub-committee should be chaired by the Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet [within 12 months].

Recommendation 197

The Victorian Secretaries Board advise the government [within 12 months] on all measures to be taken to develop, implement and coordinate the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan (including any adaptations that should be made to the plan in the future), among them:

- ▷ preparation of a 10-year industry plan for family violence prevention and response
- ▷ areas where joint budget bids should be made in order to give effect to new proposals
- ▷ collection, sharing and use of information to enhance system performance
- ▷ means of ensuring aligned policy development and implementation, as well as avoiding gaps and overlaps in departmental service provision
- ▷ oversight, development and adaptation of regional structures to give effect to the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
- ▷ development of processes for identifying Commonwealth and state and territory funding expended on matters relevant to family violence—including funding expended on universal services that are relevant to family and the cost of grants made for family violence-related projects
- ▷ a strategy for purchasing or modifying data collection systems relevant to family violence—including systems used by Victoria Police, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, the Children's Court of Victoria and the Department of Health and Human Services—to ensure there is capability to link information relevant to the safety of victims of family violence and their children.

Recommendation 198

The Victorian Government establish a family violence unit within the Department of Premier and Cabinet to support the work of the Cabinet Family Violence Sub-committee, the Victorian Secretaries Board, and the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee. The unit will lead whole-of-government work with other departments and policy units with family violence responsibilities (including the Office for Women) and should be responsible for ensuring that Victoria meets its obligations under the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children [within 12 months].

Recommendation 199

The Victorian Government establish an independent statutory Family Violence Agency [by 1 July 2017] to:

- ▷ monitor and report on the implementation of the Commission's recommendations and of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan
- ▷ provide expert policy advice on family violence at the request of Cabinet, the Premier or the Victorian Secretaries Board
- ▷ undertake and commission applied research, policy and evidence reviews and conduct own-motion inquiries into the operation of the family violence system
- ▷ liaise with relevant Commonwealth government and national agencies in developing policy and practice to enhance primary prevention efforts and improve responses to family violence
- ▷ establish a means by which service providers can share information about programs
- ▷ liaise with the Crime Statistics Agency and other agencies to coordinate data collection and sharing for the purposes of assessing the overall performance of systems that respond to family violence.

Recommendation 200

The Victorian Government re-establish the Violence against Women and Children Forum as the Statewide Family Violence Advisory Committee to advise the government on family violence policy and service provision [within 12 months]. The committee should include representation from experts, victims of family violence and system advocates with perspectives on both prevention of and support for victims of family violence. Consultation with the committee should inform the evolution and implementation of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan.

Recommendation 201

The Victorian Government and agencies that respond to family violence identify and develop safe and constructive ways to ensure that the voices of victims are heard and inform policy development and service delivery [within two years]

Recommendation 202

With the advice of the Family Violence Agency, the Victorian Secretaries Board Family Violence Sub-committee consider how to ensure that local council performance measures are used to encourage local council activities designed to prevent family violence and to assess the outcomes of any services they provide to victims and perpetrators of family violence [by 1 July 2018].

Endnotes

- 1 Royal Commission into Family Violence, Letters Patent—Terms of Reference (22 February 2015) <<http://www.rcfv.com.au/MediaLibraries/RCFamilyViolence/UploadedDocs/Terms-of-Reference.pdf>>.
- 2 Transcript of Cumberland, 13 July 2015, 40 [25]–41 [8].
- 3 Statement of Steendam, 9 July 2015, 7 [26].
- 4 Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence, 'Reforming the Family Violence System in Victoria' (Department for Victorian Communities, 2005).
- 5 Ibid 8.
- 6 Ibid 5.
- 7 Ibid.
- 8 Ibid 18.
- 9 Ibid 8.
- 10 Ibid 18.
- 11 Ibid 8.
- 12 Ibid.
- 13 Ibid 22–3.
- 14 Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence—A National Legal Response: Final Report ALRC Report No 114, NSWLRC Report No 128, Commonwealth of Australia (2010) 1364–1365.
- 15 Statewide Steering Committee to Reduce Family Violence, above n 4.
- 16 Aboriginal Affairs Victoria, Department of Planning and Community Development, 'Strong Culture, Strong Peoples, Strong Families: Towards a Safer Future for Indigenous Families and Communities—10 Year Plan' (October 2008).
- 17 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 31.
- 18 Ibid.
- 19 Ibid.
- 20 Ibid 32.
- 21 Ibid.
- 22 Transcript of Eccles, 16 October 2015, 3882 [29]–[31], 3883 [1]–[12].
- 23 Ibid 3883 [19]–[22].
- 24 Department of Human Services, 'Guiding Integrated Family Violence Service Reform 2006–2009' (October 2006) 5–9.
- 25 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Regional Family Violence Integration Governance Model', 7–9, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 26 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 31.
- 27 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 25.
- 28 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 31.
- 29 See, eg, Department of Human Services, 'Family Violence: Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework and Practice Guides 1–3—Edition 2' (April 2012) 7.
- 30 Court Network, Submission 927, 16.
- 31 Ibid.
- 32 Transcript of Cumberland, 13 July 2015, 69 [28]–70 [8].
- 33 Transcript of Campbell, 15 October 2015, 3724 [21]–[26].
- 34 Transcript of McCormack, 15 October 2015, 3739 [22]–[27].
- 35 Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, Submission 836, 13.
- 36 Transcript of Heatley, 15 October 2015, 3782 [26]–3783 [1].
- 37 Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, Submission 836, 12.
- 38 Anonymous, Submission 677, 3.
- 39 Transcript of Callister, 16 October 2015, 3855 [18]–3856 [7].
- 40 Stuart Ross et al, 'A Whole of Government Strategy for Family Violence Reform' (2011) 70(2) Australian Journal of Public Administration 131, 137.
- 41 Transcript of McCormack, 15 October 2015, 3740 [6]–[13].
- 42 Transcript of Campbell, 15 October 2015, 3738 [20]–[21]; Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3737 [15]–[24].
- 43 Gippsland Integrated Family Violence Service Reform Steering Committee, Submission 691, 3.
- 44 Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3737 [15]–[24].
- 45 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3874 [11]–[18].
- 46 See, eg, Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3734 [18]–3735 [3] and 3737 [20]–3738 [4]; Transcript of Campbell, 15 October 2015, 3738 [9]–[27].
- 47 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3872 [13]–3873 [8].
- 48 Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3756 [1]–3756 [6].
- 49 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3879 [2]–[4]; Department of Economic Development, Jobs, Transport and Resources, 'Regional Economic Development and Services Review' (Final Report, July 2015).
- 50 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3876 [14]–[19].
- 51 Ibid 3876 [29]–3877 [2].
- 52 Ibid 3880 [19]–[26].
- 53 Ibid 3879 [9]–[10].
- 54 Ibid 3879 [26]–[27].
- 55 Transcript of Eccles, 16 October 2015, 3880 [13]–[16].
- 56 Victorian Government, 'Victoria's Regional Statement: Your Voice, Your Region, Your State' (November 2015).
- 57 Ibid 18.
- 58 Ibid 15.
- 59 Ibid 18.
- 60 Transcript of Cumberland, 13 July 2015, 71 [7]–[25].
- 61 Transcript of Lay, 15 October 2015, 3706 [9]–[19].
- 62 Ibid 3707 [20]–[22].
- 63 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 54.
- 64 Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 5.
- 65 Centre of Excellence in Child and Family Welfare Inc, SAFER (2011) <<http://www.cfecfw.asn.au/know/research/sector-research-partnership/partnership-projects/family-violence/safer>>.

66 Ross et al, above n 40, 131.

67 See for example, Transcript of McCormack, 13 August 2015, 2990 [6]–[16]; Transcript of Kinnersly, 12 October 2015, 3349 [24]–[29].

68 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 46.

69 Ibid.

70 Parliament of Victoria, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 26 November 2015, 5067–5117.

71 Ibid.

72 Cabinet Social Policy Committee, Parliament of New Zealand, Progress Report on the Work Programme of the Ministerial Group on Family Violence and Sexual Violence (2015) 1.

73 New Zealand Productivity Commission, 'More Effective Social Services' (August 2015) 10–11.

74 Ibid 10–11.

75 Transcript of Comrie, 14 October 2015, 3558 [19]–[27].

76 Bushfires Royal Commission Implementation Monitor Act 2011 (Vic). See also Department of Premier and Cabinet, Hazelwood Mine Fire Inquiry (6 January 2016) <<http://www.dpc.vic.gov.au/index.php/news-publications/hazelwood-mine-fire-inquiry-implementation-monitor>>.

77 Transcript of Comrie, 14 October 2015, 3552 [11]–[15].

78 Ibid 3557 [19]–[30].

79 Ibid 3554 [25]–[30].

80 Transcript of Eccles, 16 October 2015, 3890 [22]–3891 [29].

81 Ibid 3892 [15]–[27].

82 Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, Submission 626, 5.

83 Vixen Collective, Submission 671, 6.

84 Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 22.

85 Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 5 [6].

86 Ibid.

87 Transcript of Eccles, 16 October 2015, 3910, [24]–[28].

88 Loddon Campaspe Family Violence Advisory Committee, 'Loddon and Campaspe "Listening post"', 1, provided by Loddon Campaspe Family Violence Advisory Committee to the Commission, 30 December 2015.

89 Ibid.

90 The Hon Daniel Andrews MP, Premier of Victoria, 'The Listening Project: Victims and Survivors Voices Heard' (Media Release, 3 December 2015).

91 Women's Health East, Submission 817, 17.

92 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 2.

93 Irina Elliott, Stuart D Thomas and James R Ogloff, 'Procedural Justice in Contacts with the Police: Testing a Relational Model of Authority in a Mixed Methods Study' (2011) 17(4) Psychology, Public Policy and Law 592, 607.

94 Ibid 607.

95 Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) ss 28 and 30.

96 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Governance of the Coordinating Entity—Shared Ministerial Accountability', provided by the Department of Premier and Cabinet to the Commission, 18 February 2016.

97 See Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, 'Independent Review into Sex Discrimination and Sexual Harassment, Including Predatory Behaviour in Victoria Police: Phase 1 Report' (December 2015).

98 Council of Australian Governments, 'The National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Children 2010–2022' (February 2011).

99 The first three functions listed are performed by the Victorian Responsible Gambling Foundation: Victorian Responsible Gambling Foundation Act 2011 (Vic) s 6(1)(a)–(c). Providing services (such as assessing claims for compensation) and engaging in prevention activities are also functions of the Transport Accident Commission: Transport Accident Act 1986 (Vic) ss 12(1)(b); 12(2).

100 Transport Accident Act 1986 (Vic) s 12(1)(i).

101 Emergency Management Act 2013 (Vic) s 32(1)(l).

102 Victorian Responsible Gambling Foundation Act 2011 (Vic) s 6(1)(f); Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 108C(1)(c); National Health Reform Act 2011 (Cth) s 9(1)(b). See, eg, Victorian Responsible Gambling Foundation, Foundation Research Program <<http://www.responsiblegambling.vic.gov.au/about-us/what-we-do/foundation-research-program>>; Monash University Accident Research Centre, Transport Safety (8 January 2016) <<http://www.monash.edu/muarc/research/research-areas/transport-safety>>; Sentencing Advisory Council, Establishment Functions (18 March 2014) <<http://www.sentencingcouncil.vic.gov.au/about-us/establishment-functions>>; National Health Performance Authority, Our Work (30 October 2015) <<http://www.nhpa.gov.au/internet/nhpa/publishing.nsf/Content/Our-work>>.

103 National Health Reform Act 2011 (Cth) s 9(1)(j). See, eg, National Health Performance Authority, above n 102.

104 Emergency Management Act 2013 (Vic) s 64(1)(b). See, eg, Department of Justice and Regulation, Inspector-General for Emergency Management (16 October 2014) <<http://www.justice.vic.gov.au/utility/contact+us/inspector-general+for+emergency+management.shtml>>.

105 National Health Reform Act 2011 (Cth) ss 9(1)(e)–(f). See, eg, National Health and Medical Research Council, How NHMRC Develops its Guidelines (5 November 2014) <<http://www.nhmrc.gov.au/guidelines-publications/how-nhmrc-develops-its-guidelines>>.

106 National Health Reform Act 2011 (Cth) s 9(1)(g). National Health Performance Authority, Performance Indicator Reporting (18 February 2016) <<http://www.nhpa.gov.au/internet/nhpa/publishing.nsf/Content/Performance-Indicator-Reporting>>.

107 Emergency Management Act 2013 (Vic) s 17(2)(b). See, eg, Emergency Management Victoria, 'Corporate Plan 2015–18: Shared Vision—"Safer and More Resilient Communities"' (2015) 8 <<https://www.emv.vic.gov.au/about-us/corporate-reporting/f>>.

108 See, eg, South Australian Social Inclusion Initiative Board and Social Inclusion Initiative Chair, which is to advise the Premier and Cabinet Committee on funding priorities and mechanisms and innovative and challenging models of co-operation and collaboration across the public sector for engaging other levels of Government, the community and business sectors.

109 Emergency Management Act 2013 (Vic) ss 17(2)(a), 17(2)(c). See, eg, Emergency Management Victoria, 'Corporate Plan 2015–18: Shared Vision—"Safer and More Resilient Communities"' (2015) 8 <<https://www.emv.vic.gov.au/about-us/corporate-reporting/f>>.

110 Emergency Management Act 2013 (Vic) s 64(1)(d). See, eg, Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 104.

111 Emergency Management Act 2013 (Vic) ss 64(1)(e)–(f). See, eg, Department of Justice and Regulation, above n 104.

112 See, eg, the functions of the Emergency Management Commissioner, Emergency Management Act 2013 (Vic) s 32.

113 See as a useful reference the composition of the board of directors for the Sentencing Advisory Council, Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) s 108F.

39 Data, research and evaluation

Introduction

The Commission's terms of reference require it to 'provide recommendations on how best to evaluate and measure the success of strategies, frameworks, policies, programs and services put in place to stop family violence'. The Commission was invited to consider 'systems and mechanisms to identify and appropriately prevent and respond to family violence, including information sharing and data systems'.

Many examples of data-collection and research practices relevant to family violence have been canvassed throughout this report. Gaps in family violence data and in systems for comprehensively capturing and assessing data were consistently raised with the Commission by service providers and stakeholders.

The Victorian Government's submission to the Commission identifies 10 gaps in the current family violence system. The first is 'poor measurability of the scale and breadth of family violence in Victoria'. The government notes that 'not all aspects of the ... system are evidence based, monitored or evaluated', which undermines a 'system wide understanding of the size of the family violence problem' and the capacity of the system 'to innovate or reduce the incidence or severity of violent incidents'.¹ In this chapter, the Commission considers how measuring family violence could be improved.

The Commission notes that some forms of family violence, particularly intimate partner violence, are increasingly well understood and that knowledge of family violence is constantly developing as new research emerges, new lines of inquiry arise and populations grow and change. In addition, the completeness of current data collections and research is a matter of degree. There is excellent research in areas that remain generally poorly understood, and gaps even in well-researched areas.

The first part of this chapter considers the aims of data collection and provides an overview of established principles relevant to data collection, including what data should be collected and how. The Commission is concerned with data collection for the purposes of better understanding family violence and what responses to it are most effective, to inform research and funding priorities.

The second part of this chapter considers common gaps in data and research relevant to individuals and population groups. These gaps include poor recording of demographic information, a lack of focus on children, limited data on perpetrators, and limitations on tracking individual pathways through the system. These gaps make it difficult to accurately assess the extent of family violence in the community. The third part of this chapter considers common gaps in data and research relevant to measuring the system's response to family violence. The Commission heard that there is a focus on measuring service outputs or activities, rather than evaluating whether a program makes a positive contribution to meeting the goals of the system. Collectively, these issues make it difficult for government and service providers to assess how people experiencing family violence can best be helped.

In the final part of this chapter, the Commission recommends a way forward to improve family violence data collection and research, including by developing a statewide data framework informed by relevant Commonwealth standards that adopt shared data definitions, and improving evaluation standards for those delivering family violence services.

The purpose of these recommendations is not to supplant current efforts to improve collective knowledge of family violence. Rather, the Victorian Government should work with existing bodies, including ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety), VicHealth (the Victorian Health Promotion Foundation) and the Australian Bureau of Statistics, and in addressing our recommendations, should be informed by the work these bodies have done to date. The Commission's expectation is that our recommendations will complement the efforts of these and other groups.

The Commission thanks the Crime Statistics Agency for preparing the report *An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14*² for the Commission. The report provides an update of the Victorian Family Violence Database, an analysis of recidivism among a cohort of alleged family violence perpetrators identified in family violence incident data; a discussion of some of the gaps that limit the utility of the Family Violence Database, and opportunities to strengthen the database.

Data-collection principles

The Australian Bureau of Statistics' 2013 report Defining the Data Challenge for Family, Domestic and Sexual Violence (Defining the Data Challenge) was developed to support the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children 2010–2022 (the 'National Plan')³—in particular, the National Plan's goal of developing a sound evidence base in family violence.⁴

Defining the Data Challenge was conceived as a step towards developing a national family violence data-collection and reporting framework, and explains some of the aims of a successful framework. These aims provide an indication of what a more robust data-collection framework in Victoria might look like.⁵ They include establishing a shared understanding of data priorities and needs, including shared priorities about where to invest effort and resources, and common indicators and variables within data sets. This in turn will facilitate:

- ▷ improved data quality (data which is timely, accessible, coherent, relevant, accurate and interpretable)
- ▷ a strong, collaborative network of data custodians in family violence and related areas
- ▷ improved statistical data integration to meet needs not satisfied in single data sets
- ▷ improved description and presentation of the family violence evidence base—including appropriate metadata and definitions to ensure the data is used in an informed and appropriate way
- ▷ ethical collection, storage and presentation of information relating to those affected by family violence.⁶

Collecting the right data

There is distinction between collecting 'point-in-time' data for performance monitoring or case-management purposes, and collecting data for analytical or evaluative purposes. For example, a specialist family violence service may collect information on the characteristics of a particular case (sometimes referred to as 'administrative by-product' data). That information will help them manage that case appropriately, and may be shared with other organisations managing the same case. In addition, that data may also be provided to the department funding the service's activities; or to consultants evaluating the organisation's performance; or to bodies like the Crime Statistics Agency, which undertakes and publishes research on crime and criminal justice issues in Victoria.

In this chapter, the Commission's focus is on the collection and use of data for the latter purpose—that is, the use of data to improve understanding of the incidence, prevalence and nature of family violence, how well it is responded to and which responses are most effective and efficient. Collecting and sharing data for case-management purposes raises distinct questions of law and policy, which are discussed in Chapter 7.

Defining the Data Challenge sets out six elements of data collection. For each element, the optimal data sources, and the obstacles to data collection, will vary. However, most deficiencies in data collection relate to one or more of these elements:

- ▷ the context or 'setting' within which family violence is taking place, either at a population level or in a particular case—this includes situational (e.g. socio-economic, geographical) and psychosocial (e.g. beliefs, attitudes, mental/physical health) circumstances within which family violence is taking place, either at a population level or in a particular case⁷
- ▷ the actual or perceived risk of a person being a victim of family violence—both population-level risk factors, including prevalence rates, and individual risk factors⁸

- ▷ the incident itself, including whether it was short-term or sustained, the type of family relationship, and the setting in which violence took place⁹
- ▷ responses to the incident, both formal and informal, from individuals, families, the community, institutions and services¹⁰
- ▷ impacts and outcomes of the violence for the individual, their family and the community¹¹
- ▷ research and evaluation into family violence and responses to it.¹²

On the ABS' analysis, sufficient information in respect of these elements will allow us to:

- ▷ analyse the current state of affairs in family violence
- ▷ measure the activity and performance of systems and services responding to family violence
- ▷ measure changes over time.

Further to Defining the Data Challenge, the Australian Bureau of Statistics released the Foundation for a National Data Collection and Reporting Framework for family, domestic and sexual violence.¹³ This document provides the basis for consistent collection of administrative data by organisations working in family violence. It sets out data items in relation to persons, events and transactions. These include:

- ▷ key individual characteristics, such as sex, date of birth, address, cultural and linguistic diversity characteristics, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status, disability status, mental health, and indicators relating to pregnancy and children, housing and income
- ▷ the date, location, type of relationship and type of violence applicable to episodes of family violence
- ▷ the date, organisation and outputs relating to the service provided.

How data should be collected

The 2009 Australian Bureau of Statistics' Data Quality Framework sets out seven dimensions of quality—institutional environment, accuracy, timeliness, relevance, coherence, interpretability and accessibility—and key aspects within each. For our purposes, some key points of this framework are useful. 'Quality' is understood as 'fitness for purpose'. Accordingly, good quality data will match its intended use.¹⁴

Data quality is partly determined by the organisational environment in which it is produced. High-quality data is more likely to be produced if collected and maintained in a transparent and impartial setting, and if the resources and authorising environment exist to allow data to be collected and its quality to be maintained.¹⁵

The data itself should be accurate, relevant and timely. Accuracy may be compromised if, for example, the target group is small, poorly selected or incompletely surveyed, or the questions asked or responses provided are incomplete or misleading.

Relevance is the capacity of the data source to meet the needs of those using it. This means, for example, aligning the reference period, target population, level of detail and standards and classifications used with the data's intended use.

Data is timely if it is released within a reasonable period after it is collected, and according to plan.¹⁶

The data set should also be coherent, interpretable and accessible. Coherent data is internally consistent and comparable with other data sources, over time and in a particular field of inquiry.¹⁷

A data set is best able to be interpreted when there is information available—including metadata about methods of calculation, variables and limitations—to explain the data, and when the data is presented and summarised in a clear way. Accessible data is easily available to the public and researchers.¹⁸

Measuring individuals, population groups and communities: common gaps

Prioritising individuals

The Commission heard that some important data sets report and measure service-based metrics, such as the number of ‘episodes of service’ provided by their organisation, rather than identifying unique clients, or how many individuals and families received the relevant service/s. Further, where individuals are identified within a particular data set, in many cases they are not identified in consistent ways between data sets (such as by a unique client number).

In such cases, it may be unclear:

- ▷ how many individuals account for the overall volume of family violence dealt with by a service or system, or across the system
- ▷ what proportion of individuals have multiple engagements with a service or system, and how many they have
- ▷ what range of services and systems are accessed by someone in relation to family violence.

It follows that significant correlations—for example, between specific relationships, risk factors, population groups or manifestations of family violence on the one hand, and multiple contacts with a given service or system, or engagements with a particular set of services and systems, on the other—may be indiscernible.¹⁹

An example within a particular area of the system is in Victoria’s state courts, and the Magistrates’ Court in particular. As noted in Chapter 16, significant efforts have been made to increase the links between the Victoria Police and the Magistrates’ Court databases. However, there is no common identifier for individuals involved in court proceedings which would allow, for example, a magistrate to readily discern whether a person involved in a magistrates’ court proceeding also had active proceedings in other jurisdictions (for example, the County Court, the Supreme Court, the Children’s Court, the federal courts or the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal).²⁰ Yet as is noted in Chapter 16, it is not uncommon for an individual or family to be involved in parallel legal proceedings in relation to the same family violence circumstances.

Similarly, the unit of purchase for services funded through the homelessness program (which is the funding source for the majority of specialist family violence services for women, including refuges and support), is ‘episodes of support’. This represents an occasion of providing assistance. One person may receive many episodes of support over a year, with each provider’s assistance for the same person recorded as a different episode of support.²¹

Ms Lisa Dunlop, Executive Director of Clinical Operations at the Royal Women’s Hospital, gave evidence that within hospitals, there are three data sets—emergency department, outpatients and inpatient—and that:

one of the problems is that the systems don’t necessarily gel at a patient level. So we have data from emergency presentations, we have data about inpatient episodes, but it’s not necessarily linked to an individual patient.²²

More broadly, as part of its work for the Commission, the Crime Statistics Agency analysed gaps and opportunities in the Victorian Family Violence Database, which is comprised of data sets from a range of sources across health and human services, homelessness services, legal services, courts and policing. Regarding the absence of a common identifier used in these data sets, the authors note:

One of the key drawbacks of the current database is its inability to use the same identifiers across the datasets to determine whether individuals are held in common across the datasets. This makes it difficult at present to use the various datasets together to better understand how an individual comes into contact, and interacts, with and across services in Victoria. With the exception of LEAP and Courtlink which share common identifiers in some cases, each of the other datasets contain identifiers that are specific to that dataset. This means that it is currently difficult, for example, to identify through the data which individuals have come into contact with police, homelessness services and victims assistance programs and which service they first contacted.²³

The Commission notes the evidence of Ms Kym Peake, Acting Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services (now Secretary), who stated that the Department of Health and Human Services was seeking to work towards the development of a 'single client view', linking DHHS' databases to feed into a single electronic file for each client.²⁴

The inability to track an individual's 'journey' through the system has particular implications for family violence perpetrators, which are discussed below. This issue is also considered in Chapter 38.

Prioritising children

One of the key deficiencies in current data collection relates to children. Domestic Violence Victoria noted that there is no single source of national or state level data collected on children and young people affected by family violence. Therefore measuring the extent to which Victorian children are impacted by violence is difficult. The submission went on to note that the data system for most specialist family violence services (the Specialist Homelessness Information Platform) quantifies children:²⁵

As 'add-ons' to their mothers but do not capture their individual support and counselling needs, rendering them invisible in case for funding children-specific services.

Domestic Violence Victoria proposed that the platform consider children as clients in their own right, recognising that they have a distinct experience and distinct needs.²⁶

The 2012 Report of the Protecting Victoria's Vulnerable Children Inquiry concluded that available data:

[D]o not provide the basis for a comprehensive assessment of the performance of child protection, out-of-home care and family services, in particular regarding the critical measure of their effect on the incidence and impact of child abuse and neglect.²⁷

The Victorian Auditor General's review of the Early Intervention Services for Vulnerable Children noted that the Department of Health and Human Services does not know whether Child FIRST and Family Services (that it funds to assist vulnerable children and families) are effective, due to 'significant data limitations and a lack of outcomes monitoring at the system level'.²⁸

The Commission makes recommendations below for the inclusion of more child-specific information in the Victorian Family Violence Database.²⁹

Demographic information

The Commission heard and observed evidence of deficits in the completeness and reliability of demographic information collected by agencies, departments, specialist family violence services and others responding to family violence.

The State of Victoria submitted that there was a need for improvement in the measurability and data capture of family violence incidents in high-risk groups and specific cohorts.³⁰

Basic demographics (age, sex, location) are maintained with reasonable consistency.³¹ However, population group information such as lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) status, mental health, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status, disability and culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) status may:³²

- ▷ not be provided for on forms and databases
- ▷ if provided for, may not be mandatory
- ▷ be reliant on unsolicited self-identification by individuals
- ▷ be reliant on a service provider's judgment that this data is required in the circumstances, or on a service provider's (untested) perceptions or assumptions (e.g. that someone is an Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander person or has a disability)³³
- ▷ if collected, not be cross-correlated with other demographic data.

Ms Fiona Dowsley, Chief Statistician at the Crime Statistics Agency, noted in her evidence:

When it comes to core identifiers about individuals—age, sex, the really basic building blocks—those are very well recorded. We have got good quality there. The areas where it tends to be a little bit more patchy ... [are] around the slightly more peripheral socio-demographic variables, which maybe aren't as tied to the core business of the agency doing the recording. Unfortunately, they tend to be areas of very high policy interest. So our Aboriginal identification is not always as we would like it to be. It's quite often of reasonably poor quality. Recording of disability is generally fairly poor and also difficult to define. So operationally there are challenges there as well. Similarly, CALD is an area of high interest but where there's very limited information available, and I would suspect a lack of agreement about what's really required there as well. So, depending on how far you move from the really core variables, the quality tends to get ... diminished.³⁴

In its report for the Commission, the CSA identifies Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status, culturally and linguistically diverse indicators and health and disability indicators as 'data items with varying quality', which are 'of a high priority for decision-makers'.³⁵

In relation to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status the CSA noted:

Understanding the experience of family violence as it relates to those who identify as Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander is highly desirable information for policy making that informs operations ...

... [T]here is significant room to improve the quality of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander data before coverage will be sufficient to enable robust statistical and research use across datasets ...³⁶

The CSA notes that agencies, departments and service providers do not uniformly use the Australian Bureau of Statistics' standards on the collection of an individual's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status.³⁷ In particular, an individual's identification as an Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander person should be confirmed by that person, not simply assumed by others.³⁸

In relation to CALD communities, the CSA notes that information about family violence experiences of people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities 'varies, and collection methodologies differ amongst data sources'.³⁹ In particular:

... some agencies collect information about an individual's country of birth or main language spoken at home, while others use operational information to estimate the number of people who come into contact with a service from CALD backgrounds. Most often this information relates to incidents or events where an interpreter is required, where the use of an interpreter is used as a proxy CALD indicator. As a result, there is an opportunity to increase the consistency of CALD data item collection across datasets ...⁴⁰

The CSA proposes standardising CALD data items as part of improving the governance of family violence data in Victoria.⁴¹ It recommends that health and disability indicators 'be collected with careful consideration and appropriate sensitivity', but that this should not preclude efforts to improve data collection in relation to people with disabilities.⁴²

The CSA also identifies LGBTI indicators as an area of less reliable data across the Victorian Family Violence Database.⁴³

These and similar concerns were reiterated in submissions to the Commission, which draw attention to a range of technical and practical barriers to collecting data on particular population groups.⁴⁴

Many organisations pointed out that agencies, departments and researchers who collect data often fail to record (at all, or accurately) the cultural, linguistic or ethnic status of individuals and families.⁴⁵ For example, the Multicultural Centre for Women's Health submitted that:

There has been very little comprehensive research that investigates the specific experiences of violence of immigrant and refugee women as a group in Australia. The majority of research that is conducted about women's experiences of violence excludes immigrant and refugee women due to methodological limitations: web-based and/or written surveys that only enable participation of research subjects who are English speaking, highly literate and web-savvy; or verbal interviews conducted in English only.⁴⁶

Similarly, several organisations that work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples note deficiencies in data collection.⁴⁷ For instance, the Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service stated:

... data issues are significant—at mid-term evaluation meeting of Indigenous Family Violence Ten Year Plan, almost 50% of [Victoria Police] Family Incident Reports have an unknown Aboriginal status. Unless we fully understand the data we can't be confident our service responses are hitting the mark.⁴⁸

With respect to people with disabilities, the Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children, submitted that:

Most [women with disabilities] live in the community and not in disability or aged-care settings; for example, one per cent of Victorian people with disabilities live in a non-private dwelling such as a group home or other cared-accommodation ... The living arrangements of people with disability, disaggregated by ability, age, gender, Aboriginality, cultural and linguistic background, age and state/territory is difficult to access publicly, or it is limited, or perhaps may not exist ...

Disaggregated, quantitative data relating to violence against people with disabilities is similarly lacking; for example, neither the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey (2012) nor the Survey of Disability, Ageing and Carers (2012) provides data that would help us understand the nature or extent of the problem of violence against [women with disabilities]. We rely, instead, on small-scale studies, often qualitative in nature, or on quantitative data generated in other countries where data disaggregation includes disability status.⁴⁹

Similar concerns were raised on behalf of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people.⁵⁰ For example, the joint submission of No To Violence and Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre stated that:

At a time when more research needs to be done, and specific needs within the LGBTIQ spectrum need to be identified, there is a lack of ... services available to collect any data on LGBTIQ people ...

Much of the Australian police crime data and larger scale surveys on sexual violence also [do] not take into account sexuality or that gender identity does not necessarily fit within a woman and man binary, nor the distinction between current gender and experience of having lived in another gender during one's lifetime ...⁵¹

The submission's authors suggest this means there are few available indicators of 'gay, bisexual or lesbian people (transgendered or cisgendered) who experience violence'.⁵² They also note that measuring family violence in LGBTI communities is hindered by limitations in collections not specific to family violence, such as the Australian Census. This makes it difficult, for example, to compare reports of family violence involving LGBTI people with total populations of LGBTI people.⁵³ In some cases, survey questions may not be posed in a way that corresponds with how LGBTI people describe themselves; the authors suggested:

... most LGBTIQ people in Australia do not describe themselves using the identity labels in this acronym, yet people's own ways of describing these life experiences are legitimate; such as 'queer', or a transgender woman who identifies as a 'woman' rather than a 'transwoman'.⁵⁴

Finally, the submission notes that the majority of research on community attitudes to violence is conducted from a heterosexual perspective, and that further research on LGBTI community attitudes to family violence would be beneficial.⁵⁵

Although many submissions raise concerns on behalf of population groups and communities that tend to be vulnerable to discrimination and disadvantage, it is worth considering that data sets and data-collection practices may also obscure the nature and incidence of family violence in more mainstream groups. One submission notes that administrative by-product data sets tend to under-represent the number of middle- to high-income families who may be experiencing family violence. This may be because people with greater wealth or more established social networks may not engage with the support services reflected in these data sets.⁵⁶

Issues specific to the communities and population groups mentioned in this section are discussed further in Chapters 10, 26, 27, 28, 30 and 33.⁵⁷

Survey data

The Commission notes the limitations of survey data in capturing the experience of particular population groups. The ABS Personal Safety Survey (PSS), is the foremost indicator of family violence prevalence,⁵⁸ and is of critical value for departments, agencies and funded services engaged with family violence.

The PSS seeks information from respondents that includes their age, sex, country of birth, first language and language spoken at home, education level, employment status, income level and disability status. However, it does not publish other demographic categories—including LGBTI status and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status. The published PSS data also has limited cross-correlations with existing demographic factors.⁵⁹

The 2012 PSS has other limitations:

- ▷ It only conducted interviews directly with the people surveyed. Family members, interpreters or other proxies were not used. A small number of interviewers with skills in languages other than English conducted interviews, but if an interviewer did not speak the respondent's language, no interview was conducted.⁶⁰ The authors of the 2012 PSS concede it is 'likely that the PSS will under represent those with a profound or severe communication disability' (which includes many people with disabilities), and 'possible that the PSS may under represent those from a non-English speaking background'.⁶¹
- ▷ It only surveyed residents in private dwellings. Motels, rooming houses and other non-private dwellings were excluded, as were 'people who usually reside in non-private dwellings'.⁶²
- ▷ It did not survey people living in 'very remote parts of Australia' or in discrete Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities.⁶³
- ▷ It did not survey households where all residents were less than 18 years old.
- ▷ It did not survey overseas visitors intending to stay in Australia for less than 12 months, and members of non-Australian defence forces stationed in Australia and their dependants.⁶⁴
- ▷ The survey definitions do not clearly delineate some forms of violence. For example, women are asked about experiences of emotional abuse, defined by reference to a range of experiences that include some forms of economic abuse, but the survey does not capture the prevalence of economic abuse.⁶⁵
- ▷ The response rate was 57 per cent, which the authors describe as 'relatively low'.⁶⁶

The Commission notes that the Senate Standing Committee on Finance and Public Administration's 2015 report on domestic violence in Australia calls for the Australian Bureau of Statistics to address, before the next PSS, deficiencies in 'the adequacy of sampling sizes of particular subgroups ... such as women with a disability, women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, immigrant and refugee women, and Indigenous communities'.⁶⁷

Perpetrators

The Commission looks in more detail at some of the difficulties in evaluating programs for perpetrators, together with the improvement of perpetrator risk factors, in Chapters 6 and 18. In relation to data collection and research, the Commission notes that numerous organisations and individuals gave evidence about gaps in the understanding of characteristics of, or outcomes for, perpetrators.

Dr Kristin Diemer, Senior Research Fellow, Department of Social Work, University of Melbourne, commenting on how to design a better system, told the Commission that:

The primary gap is we have very little data on perpetrators. There just isn't a body collecting much information. There is police data, but it is also limited on what you can get on perpetrators through the police dataset. The Corrections data is quite difficult to get access to. ... the police data and the Corrections data don't necessarily synchronise ...⁶⁸

This point was also made in a number of submissions.⁶⁹ For example, Caraniche, a psychological consulting firm whose services include providing drug, alcohol, violence prevention and rehabilitation services within adult prisons, juvenile justice and community corrections systems, noted that there is poor data on the prevalence of family violence in criminal offender populations, and little systematic study in areas such as the role of exposure to family violence in the development of offending, family violence as a component of general criminal offending, and the design and assessment of family violence perpetrator programs.⁷⁰

Perpetrators in the justice system

The Commission understands there are ongoing difficulties, both with establishing how many family violence-related matters are heard in Victoria's courts, and with linking data between police, courts and Corrections Victoria in order to chart a perpetrator's trajectory through the law enforcement and justice systems.⁷¹ The difficulty in tracing a perpetrator's journey through the justice system is part of the wider challenge of linking data sets to clarify an individual's engagement with different parts of the system.⁷² Both Victoria Police and the courts (and associated authorities) drew attention to these issues. In relation to courts data, Court Services Victoria (CSV) noted difficulties identifying family violence matters:

There are significant gaps in data collection and quality in relation to family violence across almost all jurisdictions. This limits CSV's ability to identify, analyse, report and forecast in relation to family violence matters. This means that evidence driven optimisation of service delivery, funding and staffing levels and skill sets is limited.

Data is generally collected from case management systems. Each jurisdiction has a different case management system ... Cases are generally categorised on these systems according to objectively ascertainable information on the face of the legal documents charged (i.e. the offence charge, the nature of the applications made) rather than the underlying circumstances (family violence). This contributes to the gaps in available data on the number and nature of family violence matters currently being addressed across the jurisdictions.⁷³

The Magistrates' and Children's Court joint submission noted that 'other than charges for contraventions for an intervention order, the court cannot collect accurate data on criminal offences, which take place in a family violence context'.⁷⁴

The County Court also reported:

Current County Court processes and systems do not record when a criminal law proceeding involves family violence ... Without this information it is difficult for the County Court to identify, report, plan and manage family violence matters before the court. In addition, poor data means that the court lacks evidence to drive service delivery improvements related to family violence matters.⁷⁵

The Judicial College of Victoria noted that:

In preparing this submission, we have been unable to access data on the number of family violence proceedings in the County Court. Information on the number of offences involving circumstances of family violence and the number of ... appeals is not publicly available. Measuring family violence-related cases is an important step in identifying the scale of family violence ...⁷⁶

Importantly, the College pointed out that:

Family violence can also manifest in civil litigation, such as property or contract disputes, testator family maintenance, guardianship and residential tenancy disputes. The prevalence and increasing awareness of family violence mean these issues appear more frequently in civil courts ...⁷⁷

Obstacles to data collection in the courts and in corrections are discussed further in Chapters 16, 17 and 18.

A 2013 Australian Bureau of Statistics report on addressing gaps in family violence data states this is a nationwide issue, and argues that 'a key limitation of police data are a lack of integration with other justice data sets which is where perpetrator outcomes are often determined'.⁷⁸

In addition, general criminal offences (assault, burglary, etc.) are not automatically classified in a way which discloses a relationship with family violence.

The Commission heard that difficulties also arise because of the range of intervening steps and the number of different institutions and agencies involved in charging, prosecuting, trying, sentencing and administering the sentence. For example, the police might lay multiple charges in relation to a single course of conduct. Some may be subsequently altered or withdrawn because the prosecutor decides before trial that this is the best course, or the courts refuse to permit some charges to proceed. The matter may be transferred from police prosecutors to the Office of Public Prosecutions if it is to be tried in the higher courts. This means transferring between different organisations, and between different courts—and some data will be lost in that process.

If the defendant pleads or is found guilty and sentenced, the sentence will be administered by Corrections Victoria. The Commission heard from Commissioner Jan Shuard, Corrections Victoria, that detecting a relationship between an offence and family violence is not ‘automatic’, and there are generally three ways it is discovered:

One will be either by self-disclosure through our assessment process in terms of the nature of the offence that the offender will self-disclose or that we will be able to glean that information. We will seek out the police summaries so that we ourselves or our staff can read the details of the offence and then know it was in the context of family violence, or in the higher courts obviously we will get access to the judge’s sentencing comments.⁷⁹

Issues relating to Corrections are discussed further in Chapter 18. In Chapter 17, the Commission looks at ways to resolve this issue through ‘flagging’ the relationship between an offence and family violence. As noted in Chapter 17 there has been recent work between the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria and Victoria Police on identifying the relationship between criminal matters and family violence, which ensures that the relationship between an offence and family violence is ‘flagged’ in Courtlink, and some individuals are identifiable in common between Victoria Police and the Magistrates’ Court records. However, given the complexities outlined above, this does not inevitably occur. Nor does it ensure that the individual will be identified through other courts and systems. The Commission also notes that $2.5 million has been allocated by the Victorian Government to the Department of Justice and Regulation to scope IT-based solutions to address current information-sharing barriers and needs in the family violence justice system in Victoria.

The Commission also notes Ms Dowsley’s comments that the CSA has been able to use a ‘statistical linkage key’ to join information from different data sets.⁸⁰ The Commission returns to this issue below. The CSA’s analysis of recidivism, conducted on the Commission’s behalf, used recorded police data only, but suggested that the incorporation of data from Corrections Victoria and courts would enable the development of a more comprehensive recidivism model.⁸¹

Recidivism

The CSA has undertaken research on recidivist perpetrators of family violence, based on a cohort identified in police family violence incident reports. The CSA explained:

Publicly available information about levels of recidivism and the characteristics and behaviours of perpetrators over time in Victoria could not be located by the CSA. A key component of the work undertaken by the CSA to support the Royal Commission into Family Violence (RCFV) sought to begin to address this gap in the existing evidence ...⁸²

As ‘begin to’ suggests, the CSA research did not aim to provide a comprehensive picture of family violence recidivism in Victoria. It is limited to family violence incidents recorded by police, and even where these incidents come to the attention of police, much information about victims and perpetrators is not recorded.⁸³ In addition, recidivism in this context may not be entirely negative; as the CSA explained:

While recidivism incidents are an adverse outcome to the extent that they indicate repetition of violent behaviour towards victims, they can also be interpreted as an indicator of increased victim willingness to contact police and/or police follow-up and involvement where there are ongoing concerns for victims’ safety.⁸⁴

The Commission acknowledges recent efforts to address gaps in understanding recidivism, including Victoria Legal Aid's 'Characteristics of respondents charged with breach of family violence intervention orders'⁸⁵ and the forthcoming Sentencing Advisory Council report on prior offending and reoffending among offenders sentenced for contravening a family violence intervention order or safety notice.⁸⁶

Hidden reporting and under-recording

Many of the issues identified above are exacerbated by under-reporting. The problem of under-reporting of family violence is well known and noted elsewhere in this report (see Chapter 3). Two dimensions of under-reporting are worth noting in this context:

- ▷ hidden reporting, where an incident is reported, but in a way that conceals its links to family violence⁸⁷
- ▷ under-recording, where the extent or nature of offending is incompletely or inaccurately recorded through 'process and procedural variations in recording incidents by authorities or services' or incidents being 'classified incorrectly, such as when a victim presents as a general assault victim and a judgment is made by the individual making the record about the nature of the incident.'⁸⁸

Hidden reporting and under-recording are made more likely by the complexity of family violence, and distinct responses to it. Family violence can be constituted by a complex pattern of behaviour. Different parts of that pattern will correspond with contact with different systems and services. People affected by family violence may characterise their experience differently, and it may be recorded differently, in each of these settings. They may also not appreciate which parts of their experience are relevant to which setting.⁸⁹ As the Australian Bureau of Statistics notes in Defining the Data Challenge for Family, Domestic and Sexual Violence:

Incidents of family, domestic and sexual violence are varied in nature and treated differently depending upon the disclosure of the incident. Disclosure may be made to authorities and classified as criminal under state or territory legislation. The incident may be disclosed to health personnel or other support services and, depending on the circumstances and the details of disclosure, the incident may or may not be perceived as family or domestic violence by the victim and/or perpetrator and/or support worker...⁹⁰

Similarly, the report notes that because family violence may be 'ongoing' and constituted by a 'pattern of behaviour', difficulties arise in classification and measurement:

... there may be a long history of incidents between the persons involved, incorporating different categories of family and domestic violence. Some of these may or may not be classified as criminal, be detected by the criminal or civil justice system or handled through a service agency.

Despite the ongoing pattern of behaviour and number of prior incidents, a civil or criminal justice system response may also be triggered by a single incident of assault. This one incident may be classified as family or domestic violence, recorded, processed and prosecuted in isolation. As a result the recorded incident may not clearly represent all that has occurred.⁹¹

Under-recording may be more likely in departments, agencies and services which are not primarily focused on family violence (even though a significant number of their clients may be experiencing family violence), and may arise simply because databases do not make sufficient provision for the collection of family violence-related information. A specific example is the Housing Establishment Fund, which among other things is the source of funding for ad hoc emergency accommodation for women who need alternative accommodation and for whom a refuge is not available. The Fund does not collect or record information about the expenditure where family violence is an issue.⁹² Similarly, Corrections Victoria advised that data is not collected on the family violence victim status of prisoners or offenders.⁹³

The Royal Women's Hospital drew attention in its submission to the risks of hidden reporting and under-recording in the health system:

Core inpatient, outpatient and emergency data systems in Victoria's hospitals are not mandated to capture and report the rate of disclosures of family violence, to capture social issues as a co-morbidity or to track outcomes for women and children. This renders family violence-related presentations and activity invisible in hospitals, with consequences for funding and service planning.⁹⁴

Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children corroborated these problems, noting that:

The limited research into disclosure to health practitioners (HPs) and inquiry by HPs reveals low rates of either with around one third of abused women ever disclosing and an inquiry rate of around 1 in 10. However, research suggests that women want to be asked directly about abuse by supportive HPs. Women suffering the effects of FV typically make 7-8 visits to health professionals before disclosure. Unfortunately, if women do disclose FV to their HP, there is evidence of an inappropriate, poor quality response.⁹⁵

Dr Diemer drew attention to under-recording and hidden reporting, using the example of housing and homelessness service providers:

... there is a lot of data that's missing, and it's not just because ... it's not filled in for the client but the client may not actually be recorded as a family violence client because of the way that the person entering the data is either asking the questions or what's available on their data screen ... they might not have the option of family violence appearing.

So even when people are seeking assistance we may be missing a whole lot of people who have family violence issues or are seeking a service for family violence-related matters. An example would be the housing data, homelessness data, where clients are asked for their main reason for seeking support or seeking housing support and that particular day it might be related to 'I can't afford my rent', so that goes in as their main reason, and then there might be other reasons that lead to that. Depending on how busy the worker is, they may or may not ask for the other reasons. They may not ask those questions well. The person may not want to disclose that there is family violence behind the reason that they can't afford their rent, for example. Through asking the rest of the questions the worker may determine that there is family violence issues but they may never go back and change that original data field for the main reason for seeking support.⁹⁶

Some of the above data gaps are associated with periods of high risk. Knowledge and practice in relation to heightened risk of experiencing and/or perpetrating family violence are discussed in Chapters 2, 6 and 18.

A number of initiatives seeking to improve hospital and health responses to women experiencing family violence are described in Chapter 19. For example, the Strengthening Hospitals Responses to Family Violence Initiative is a continuing, DHHS-funded project involving the Royal Women's and the Bendigo Hospitals, to improve hospital responses to women experiencing family violence. Part of the project involves mapping current data-collection processes, and reporting on options to develop a 'consistent, efficient and reliable system and process for data capture, retrieval and reporting'.⁹⁷

The Commission also acknowledges the launch of the Victorian Women's Health Atlas, an interactive database developed by Women's Health Victoria in collaboration with statewide and regional women's health services. The Atlas provides extensive health data, including data relating to family violence, and allows area-based comparisons in order to enhance evidence-based decision making about service design, program planning and priorities for health services.⁹⁸

Measuring the system's response to family violence: common gaps

The following section examines how current data-collection approaches lead to gaps in our knowledge about the nature and effectiveness of responses to family violence.

Outputs and outcomes

The Commission has observed how a range of departments, agencies and government-funded services measure and record service activities related to family violence—for example, number of hours of support, number of family violence incidents attended, number of referrals, number of applications and orders, and so on.

This is, of course, a necessary aspect of performance monitoring and evaluation. However, measures focused on goals—such as whether a victim of family violence remained safe, returned to work, experienced improved mental and physical health, and so on—are scarcer. As the State of Victoria's submission notes, 'Some departmental collections are focused on service outputs only and may not assist with measuring outcomes'.⁹⁹ Further, because the data collected by different organisations and sectors may be incommensurable—in particular, because they use different measures and definitions—there is limited capacity to aggregate data and measure our overall progress towards family violence-related outcomes.¹⁰⁰

This scarcity of outcome-based metrics is part of a broader problem with how government and government-funded service providers measure what they do. Mr Peter Shergold's 2013 report on service sector reform concludes that outcome measurement and accountability for outcomes are underdeveloped, and proposes that government be held jointly accountable with providers for the achievement of outcomes.¹⁰¹ Mr Shergold recommends that government and community service organisations work together to develop an outcomes framework that focuses on beneficial social impacts. This framework would establish metrics that can be used to monitor, audit, measure and report on programs.¹⁰² The report also suggests 'individual government departments should clearly articulate the outcomes sought from government investment in the services they fund and, wherever possible, link funding to the achievement of those outcomes'.¹⁰³

Domestic Violence Victoria has suggested specific outcomes relating to women's and children's safety as service targets: these include a reduction in the number of women and children having to leave home and live in refuges; a reduction in the number of children going into out-of-home care; a reduction in family violence deaths of women and children; increased feelings of safety; increased satisfaction with parenting arrangements; and reduced educational disruption for children due to having to change schools.¹⁰⁴

Ms Peake noted that one of the reasons that there had not been a decisive shift towards outcomes away from outputs is because they require both good definition of those outcomes and good data sources to measure progress against when managing contracts with external providers, and this is a work in progress.¹⁰⁵

The lack of a system-wide measure of success was a significant prompt for plans to develop a Family Violence Index. These plans are considered further below.

Evaluation

Two further issues that the Commission is aware of are that many services do not undertake evaluations regularly and that the quality of evaluations is inconsistent.

The Victorian Strategic Management Framework of 2011 notes that the role of public sector evaluation is to:

... objectively review and evaluate the success of the policy, program or project in achieving the stated goals, including their impact on achieving outcomes, and recommend appropriate actions.¹⁰⁶

Evaluation helps to answer critical questions, such as whether and why a program or approach is producing the intended (and any unintended) outcomes; whether there are better ways of achieving intended outcomes; whether the program might work in other settings; and so on.

Concerns were raised about a lack of time, resources and know-how to collect and provide data to support evaluation, to embed regular evaluation into service delivery, and to design programs, strategies and processes with evaluation in mind. Dr Diemer, referring to programs with which she has been involved, told the Commission that:

... a program might be funded ... for a short period of time ... usually a maximum of three years. Then they are requested to provide an evaluation so they can apply for additional funding when that expires.

That process is flawed both in terms of the time frame and the fact that you are asking service providers to do an evaluation who are not trained evaluators and who often don't have the data systems in place to be able to do an effective evaluation. If they have to purchase evaluation contractors to come in, they are often purchasing them mid-way through the program or towards the end and there's little scope to actually improve the data collection from the beginning. So the evaluation can be really flawed in terms of what they feasibly can evaluate. If there were better systems put in place where you had an evaluation component built into the program from the beginning and you had informed guidance on how that could proceed, then I think you would have much better evaluations coming out in this space.¹⁰⁷

Subject to consultation with funders and stakeholders, Dr Diemer suggested:

... you could fund a program for six years with an in-between three-year review so it gives you time to get a program running, have the evaluation with the expectation that the funding is going to continue, but if there is a real problem with the evaluation they might review the funding in that fourth year ...¹⁰⁸

Dr Diemer further added that funders:

... tend to fund for the program but they don't fund for the evaluation but expect an evaluation to happen ... funding also needs to include a component for evaluation so a proper evaluation can be done.¹⁰⁹

Ms Dowsley at the CSA offered an evaluator's perspective, noting:

It is often a challenge for particularly smaller organisations to handle evaluation. As someone who is often asked for information to try to support these things after the fact ... I would definitely support [evaluation being] part of the initial planning. It's very hard for us to find data about things well after they have happened. But if we know at the time we can provide assistance ...¹¹⁰

Evaluation also relies on having a clear and articulated understanding of what the program or strategy being evaluated is meant to achieve, and sharing that understanding with evaluators.¹¹¹

Several submissions reiterate these and similar concerns. For example, the Federation of Community Legal Centres submitted:

In order to assess the efficacy of the system and to improve strategies, accurate, timely and thorough data collection and independent evaluation are essential. However, data related to specific justice and legal assistance aspects of the family violence system is often not available or even not collected, making it hard to assess 'what works'.

...

Perhaps most importantly, it would be invaluable not to simply have access to a snapshot picture of CLC legal assistance in family violence, but to be able to gain a sense of how victims/survivors and perpetrators track over time, and the associated interventions that might make the most difference to safety and accountability.¹¹²

The Darebin Community Legal Centre noted:

All Darebin's family violence funding goes to providing the duty lawyer legal service. It has been stretched to encompass expanding needs of family violence clients. In the process of advising and representing clients Darebin collects a great deal of valuable information about where, when and how family violence is occurring, how it is perceived and responded to by those who perpetrate and endure it, and how the support services and institutions that have the responsibility to address it do so. Darebin, like many others in the community legal sector, does not have the resources to properly utilize this information for the purposes of research, policy development and law reform to address some of the underlying causes of family violence.¹¹³

The National Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Alliance writes:

Limited research and data on interventions – successful or otherwise – impedes effective and meaningful work with service users. While efforts to build the evidence base are vital, one must be mindful that such efforts can represent a significant impost on services, particularly smaller organisations. Research and evaluation comes at a cost and agencies need to be resourced to collect accurate and timely data, undertake evaluations and contribute to research. While national research conducted by large-scale bodies exists, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander data is deficient in accurate and timely data about the effectiveness of the services it provides, largely because of a lack of time, skills and resources to enable those providing services to undertake follow up, and other data collection activities that enhances research and analysis.¹¹⁴

Effective evaluations for some family violence interventions rely on accessibility of data across multiple service systems and data sets. Mr Rodney Vlasis, Manager, No To Violence, in explaining the lack of an evidence base for men's behaviour change programs, noted that evaluations were limited due to several factors including cost and access to data:

We need to triangulate data from police, Corrections, from women's own reports. As a result of that, there have been very few high quality evaluations being done.¹¹⁵

Dr Diemer expressed the view that an independent body could be set up to conduct evaluations, or provide tools and guidance for evaluations.¹¹⁶

Time for Action, The National Councils' Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children (2009–2021), highlights that 'data relating to violence against women and their children in Australia is poor', and that adequate data and evaluation to understand what works, what works best and why are consistently lacking.¹¹⁷

ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) submitted to the Commission that without robust longitudinal evaluative studies, it is difficult to ascertain the effectiveness of interventions in responding to violence against women. This means that the evidence base required by governments to draw upon when making resource allocation decisions is effectively reduced. The Commission heard that there is a need for strategic investment to support the research field of domestic and family violence response evaluation and to support services to embed a culture of evaluation in their work. This need is particularly acute in programs and services working with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities.¹¹⁸

Further to the need for evaluations of particular programs is the need for wider evaluations of the system and its parts. The Commission acknowledges the work that ANROWS has undertaken in this area, including a meta-evaluation of interagency partnerships, collaboration, coordination and integrated interventions and service responses to violence against women, and a meta-evaluation of the key features of effective 'safe at home' programs.¹¹⁹

This issue is explored further in Chapter 38. In Chapter 41, the Commission makes recommendations about the duration of funding periods.

Measuring the impacts of change

Forecasting and responding to levels of and changes in demand requires analysis of the influence of different drivers of demand, including policy changes and population shifts. The Commission heard that, to date, there have been only limited efforts to conduct such analyses, and that existing data sets are not robust enough to support them. In commenting on the limits of the existing Victorian Family Violence Database, Ms Dowsley suggested:

We see new things come into the system, but we have not been watching it at such a close grained level that we are actually effectively mapping what those impacts are ... if we can work on some of the quality and standardisation we have a much better evidence base through which we can then analyse what are the impacts and what are we seeing.¹²⁰

The Commission considers the issue of forecasting demand in greater detail in Chapter 41, and recommends the development of a robust demand-modelling tool or set of indicators so that government can better plan how departments and agencies respond to family violence. The effectiveness of this process will depend on access to high-quality data.

The Grampians Integrated Family Violence Committee noted that the lack of system-wide data impacted on its capacity to plan and identify priorities:

There is plenty of 'data' in the system: funded agencies, non-funded agencies, Victoria Police, and the Court system all gather, collect and to varying degrees communicate data and information about family violence. However there is no common system of data collection. This limits GIFVC's ability to understand and act upon priority issues and trends as they arise.

For instance, all agencies have reported growing demand following recent increase in profile of family violence as a community-wide issue. However there is currently no way of effectively monitoring the system-wide impact of these increases. The current service system makes it hard to adequately shift service resources while meeting increasing demand.

...

The current system means that the results and impacts of interventions are limited in their relevance, and at times limited to only one organisation.¹²¹

The Commission acknowledges that past efforts have been made to measure the impacts of reform.

For example, from 2007 to 2009 the Victorian Government initiated the Family Violence Benchmark Data Project,¹²² which collected two weeks of data biannually from the Magistrates' Court, Victoria Police, the Department of Health and Human Services and specialist services who volunteered to participate.¹²³ The aim was to measure the outcomes of the reforms that had occurred from 2005 onwards. The project arose from the Victorian Government's recognition that information and data to support and evaluate those reforms was 'partial and systemically fragmented', and more information was necessary 'to be able to understand better, and measure more effectively, the impacts of the new system'.¹²⁴ The project provided previously unavailable information relevant to the outcomes of the reforms, including the impacts on children and the capacity of women to remain safely at home and the use of the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF).¹²⁵

In 2007, an Australian Research Council Linkage grant was provided for a five year research program to a partnership between the University of Melbourne and Monash University, the (then) Department of Planning and Community Development, the (then) Department of Justice, Victoria Police and the (then) Department of Human Services. The research program was known as SAFER (Safety and Accountability in Families: Evidence and Research), and was provided to research Victoria's integrated family violence service system reforms.¹²⁶

The broad goal of the SAFER project was to gain an understanding of how Victorian family violence reforms are impacting on the safety and wellbeing of women and children and the accountability and responsibility of men who use violence.¹²⁷ Three different strands of research were chosen: a 'safe at home' strand, examining women's experiences and the decisions they make about how to remain safe from family violence in the home; the 'Men who use violence' project; and a governance stream of research, examining the translation of Victorian Government policy into service delivery practice.¹²⁸

Outcomes from this research have informed Victorian policy and practice development.¹²⁹ The final year of the project was dedicated to a review of the implementation of the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence that the Commission understands is being used to inform the ongoing development of policing family violence in Victoria.¹³⁰

Measuring unmet demand for services

The Commission notes the difficulties in measuring unmet demand, which can be defined in different ways to include:

- ▷ people who seek or are referred to assistance but are not able to access it
- ▷ people who seek or are referred to assistance for a range of needs, only some of which can be or are attended to
- ▷ people who, for various reasons, do not seek assistance although they need or are eligible for it.

The administrative by-product data currently produced is not particularly useful for measuring unmet demand, because it focuses on what services do rather than what they do not, or are not able to do. As the CSA noted in commenting on the limitations of the Victorian Family Violence Database:

In order for a record to be made in the recording systems of the various agencies which can then be forwarded to the Database, a report or call for service must first be made ... As a result, statistics held in this Database will not contain information relating to all incidences of family violence which may be experienced ...¹³¹

Proxy measures can be used to provide an indication of unmet demand. However, the reliability of these measures varies depending on the measure used and the context. For example, accommodation waiting lists may be used as a proxy measure for unmet demand for housing, even though the fact that a person is on a waiting list is not always a reliable indication of their current or ongoing level of need. Notably, the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, via the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection, does collect information from housing and homelessness services (including specialist family violence services such as Safe Steps) that includes unmet requests for assistance as well as needs recognised by service providers that were not met.¹³²

Some individuals not captured in administrative by-product data sets may be captured in survey data: the PSS, for example, records people who experienced family violence but did not report it.

Measuring the effectiveness of prevention programs

Measuring the effect of family violence prevention programs is also difficult, not least because the target of the program or campaign may be broad—a whole community, workplace or school—and its influence may be gradual, and mediated by a range of other variables. It may require a long time to pass before some programs have any effect.

VicHealth advocates for robust data-collection systems to support prevention and early intervention, and for the adoption of shared standards and definitions to enable standardised data collection nationwide. The Commission acknowledges the value of the *National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey*¹³³ in providing a measure of community attitudes among different population groups and over time.¹³⁴

These issues are explored further in Chapter 36.

The way forward

Despite extensive efforts and areas of excellent practice, there are serious gaps in our knowledge about the characteristics of victims and perpetrators of family violence, and about how the systems that respond to family violence are working. Limited linkage between data sets, and inconsistent practices and definitions in collecting data, inhibit a holistic evaluation of the family violence problem. Currently, the system captures insufficient information about, for example:

- ▷ particular demographics and population groups that may experience higher levels of unmet need for services
- ▷ the number of people affected by family violence who access various support systems, including Child FIRST, Integrated Family Services, homelessness services, courts, and police
- ▷ the extent of recidivism, which would allow a measure of the extent of the problem and patterns of demand for services
- ▷ the experience of perpetrators, including their trajectory through the justice system and use of other services
- ▷ family violence other than heterosexual intimate partner violence.

These gaps restrict the Victorian Government's ability to respond to family violence effectively or to plan for the future. They can result in some individuals or groups being overlooked, and others double-counted or overemphasised; overlapping data collection and service provision, rather than a coordinated response; poorly targeted prevention and early intervention strategies; ineffective expenditure on some responses to violence; and insufficient expenditure on others. Ultimately they can contribute to the continuation of family violence.

The evaluation of family violence-related programs and initiatives delivered by departments, agencies and funded services is often poorly planned and poorly resourced. The Commission heard that there is a tendency to measure system performance by using output-based metrics (for example, number of clients and episodes of service provision) rather than outcome-based metrics (that is, how effective particular programs, approaches or services are in addressing family violence or its effects). Evaluation is not, as a matter of course, undertaken during the life of a program to allow ongoing reflection and adaptation.

The Commission's recommendations are directed to addressing these issues to facilitate a more informed and effective approach to reducing family violence.

Addressing gaps in data collection and analysis

The Commission accepts that using a unique identifier system-wide to record each individual user of different systems and services would help to discern, among other things:

- ▷ the range of services that particular individuals (including children) and families use
- ▷ how many individuals and families account for the overall volume of family violence in particular systems and services, and in the system as a whole.

This information could inform resource allocation and case-management decisions.¹³⁵ The development of linkages between data sets is likely to be a valuable shorter-term measure to address this gap.

The Commission accepts that there are serious difficulties associated with collecting some types of demographic information. Demographic gaps are of concern not only because they obscure the experience of particular groups and communities, but because they may also point to deficient training or practices: if a question is not being asked about a particular characteristic of someone's identity, it may reflect the fact that a service provider is not attuned to this characteristic, and to the specific needs that might arise in connection with it. Continued efforts to close these gaps are urgently needed, precisely because the circumstances that make family violence more difficult to detect in general population surveys (geographical isolation, homelessness, social and cultural isolation), also tend to heighten the risk of family violence.¹³⁶

In relation to survey data, it is important to emphasise the extraordinary efforts that are made to ensure that the Personal Safety Survey is as comprehensive as possible. Its limitations are largely the product of design, cost constraints or practicalities.¹³⁷ The fact that no proxy interviews are conducted, for example, is intended to ensure participants' safety (as the respondent may live in the same household as the perpetrator) and the reliability of data (where a respondent may not be comfortable revealing information through a third party, particularly a family member or interpreter).¹³⁸ Effective surveys of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples will need culturally specific approaches. Some Australian Bureau of Statistics surveys use such approaches.¹³⁹

Nonetheless, the Commission's central concern is that some population groups at heightened risk of family violence are likely to be under-represented in family violence data collections. These groups include Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, people living in remote communities, people with disabilities, people from CALD backgrounds (including those with an insecure migration status) and people who, because of homelessness, live in non-private dwellings not covered by the Personal Safety Survey.¹⁴⁰ The fact that these limitations exist even in a survey of such exceptional breadth and depth demonstrates the complexity and challenge of collecting comprehensive data about particular population groups.

There are also shortcomings in our collection of perpetrator information. These issues are explored further in Chapter 18. The Commission notes that some advances have been made: for example, the initiatives between police and courts (noted above) offer a partial solution to some areas of information loss.

However, substantial improvements still need to be made to data sets and how they interact. The CSA's commissioned research on recidivism is first-rate: it is careful, thorough and informative, but its necessarily limited scope has highlighted the insufficiencies of existing data. The research was limited to police data, which tells us only so much about the characteristics of family violence. For example, the fact that police have not recorded repeated family violence incidents at a given address does not indicate that none have occurred; and where such incidents are recorded, police data does not capture the features of repeated violence that are relevant to understanding recidivism. More generally, there is a need for more departments and agencies to contribute to the Victorian Family Violence Database, improved quality within data sets, and improved links between data sets to gain a complete picture.

The Commission reiterates the importance of evaluative criteria that allow funders and service providers to determine whether services have been delivered in compliance with funding agreements and broader policy goals, and whether their delivery has been cost-effective and efficient. The way data is collected should reflect and inform the aims of a given initiative: what the program is, what it seeks to achieve, and how it will be measured against its objectives. The design and evaluation of programs and initiatives should be underpinned by a clear understanding of the program's medium and long-term goals, which should in turn reflect system-wide goals. The issue of clear and shared goals is discussed further below.

Funding arrangements also contribute to shortcomings in outcome measurement and evaluation. Data collection is shaped by how the Victorian Government defines the activities it funds, and the accountability and reporting requirements attached to funding. A focus on system-specific outputs (number of episodes of support and so on) can lead to siloed data collection that has little potential to improve our understanding of family violence or the effectiveness of our response to it.

The Commission accepts Dr Diemer's evidence that in some cases, programs are not designed or resourced to be comprehensively evaluated. Funding tends to be directed towards service delivery, which leaves limited resources for evaluation and research activities. We examine this issue in more detail in Chapter 41, and make recommendations there for changes to funding arrangements.

Effective evaluation requires funders to anticipate the need for evaluation and build it into the program design from the outset. This maximises the collection of data to assess the program against agreed objectives and performance criteria. The Commission expects that funders will involve service providers in the design. Further, government and agencies should make provision for adequately resourcing the evaluation component at the time of establishing new programs as well as making resources available for periodically evaluating longstanding programs to help programs adapt to emerging issues. They should also fund programs to operate for a long enough period to allow meaningful evaluation. Resourcing evaluation across government departments and agencies and applying it to both internally and externally delivered services will enrich decision making by both the funder and the service provider.

Where appropriate, evaluation should be conducted in parallel with a program's activities, rather than being restricted to a retrospective analysis of a period of operation. In the early stages of a program, there will be unforeseen complexities and areas of uncertainty. Particularly in such cases, evaluation should incorporate a variety of methodologies, including stakeholder reflection and 'action research'—that is, research conducted during the life of a program and feeding back into program design.¹⁴¹ This will enable continuing, 'on the ground' assessment of program delivery, and allow for periodic adaptations during the life of a program in response to findings. Monitoring and reflection that continue during the implementation of a program have the capacity to foster:

- ▷ confirmation that collection of required data is under way and effective
- ▷ management of unforeseen or unintended consequences
- ▷ mapping of, and adjustment for, changes in the external environment (beyond the direct control of the initiative)
- ▷ deeper qualitative understandings of the initiative, which can validate or challenge the design and theory behind the initiative
- ▷ confirmation of readiness for a further evaluation based on outcomes and value for money
- ▷ the development of a 'community of practice' among practitioners.

Equally, the Commission accepts the crucial role of demand forecasting, and the need to better capture unmet demand data and improved measurement of prevention programs.

Recommendation 203

The Victorian Government work with organisations it funds to provide family violence services, to improve evaluation standards [within 12 months] by, among other things:

- ▷ ensuring that where an evaluation is anticipated or expected, resources are provided to allow for the evaluation, including funding for the evaluation itself and for the design and/or implementation of processes and systems to support data collection
- ▷ ensuring that the initial period for which a program is funded contains a period of service delivery that is long enough to support a thorough evaluation of the program
- ▷ resourcing those delivering initiatives to conduct 'action research' during the life of the program, so that adaptations can be made to improve data collection and service delivery
- ▷ publishing evaluation outcomes where appropriate.

The need for a coordinated response

Over and above the gaps and inconsistencies outlined above, there is a lack of common purpose, accountability and leadership around family violence data collection. Different services, departments and sectors largely operate according to their own priorities and constraints. Data-collection systems have developed over years to enable services to measure their own performance and outputs. There are areas of excellent practice, but their value is limited by a lack of system-wide coordination.¹⁴²

A coordinated response to data collection is essential because of the diverse and diffuse nature of family violence. As is emphasised throughout this report, family violence is often characterised by complex patterns of behaviours perpetrated over time. Different aspects of the patterns register in different ways in different services and systems. To understand family violence—both in individual cases and as a continuing problem—there must be a clear view across different parts of the system and over time. Limitations in data, and in the aggregation of data sets, mean that family violence is not reported or recorded in a way that reflects its full extent.

The Commission acknowledges the challenges of a coordinated approach to data collection. Such an approach requires a clear and shared understanding of what family violence is, agreement about the objectives of family violence data collection, and the procedures and infrastructure to support it.

Departments, agencies and funded services sometimes use different definitions of family violence, as well as different definitions of the data items used to measure and respond to it. This can produce data sets that:

- ▷ are inconsistent and incommensurate with each other
- ▷ are of limited use for wider purposes, including policy development
- ▷ lead to to divergent conclusions about family violence.

The use of incommensurate data items partly reflects the variety of forms that family violence may take, and the disparate settings in which responses to it are made. Definitions are shaped 'by the context of enquiry and informed by the strategies, perspectives and agendas of individuals and organisations', including 'specific legal, policy, service provider or research perspectives'.¹⁴³ 'Units' of service provision vary enormously between contexts: one service may measure the number of counselling sessions; another, referrals; another, attendances at family violence incidents. Meaningful comparisons between these figures are difficult. Equally, each case of family violence is unique, involving as it does individuals with their own history, needs, capabilities and vulnerabilities.

The use of incommensurate data items and data-collection practices may also reflect disparate, program-specific goals: data items might suit those goals within a particular program but be unsuitable for wider purposes.¹⁴⁴ This often applies to administrative by-product data, collected by service providers in the context of routine service delivery and case management. Yet those who collect data in these contexts are often well positioned to seek more accurate or precise information than can be captured in surveys.¹⁴⁵ There could be advantages in expanding the categories of data collected in these situations to make it more useful for general purposes. This is more likely to happen if the agencies and departments collecting the data have shared goals, and a sense of how their data-collection activities might contribute to a wider body of knowledge.

Finally, incommensurate data items and practice may reflect different values: about family violence, and about data collection.¹⁴⁶ Recent research shows that one's definition of family violence can influence what data is selected for analysis and how it is analysed.¹⁴⁷ In addition, data collection itself is value-laden: the body of evidence reflects judgments about the relative value of different data items and different sources of knowledge.¹⁴⁸ This is exemplified by recent debates about the validity and weight of quantitative information compared to qualitative information or 'practice wisdom'.

It is not the Commission's role to adjudicate these disputes. Our purpose in raising them is to emphasise, first, that decisions about what data should be collected and how, are far-reaching. They affect evaluation and funding criteria, and practice standards, guidelines and protocols, and shape how services and systems understand and do their work. In this sense, the way the system is measured affects the system itself.

Secondly, shared data-collection practices and standards must be underpinned by shared goals and a shared understanding of family violence and the importance of data collection in family violence. Developing this framework requires continuing cooperation and governance.

As well as producing an update of the Victorian Family Violence Database, the CSA has considered ways to improve the database in the future. Some of these recommendations are of more general relevance for data collection in Victoria.

In particular, the CSA stresses the importance of governance to ensure the overall management of the availability, usability, integrity and security of data, and to provide consistent standards, goals, strategic direction and an authorising environment for data management.

Currently, the Victorian Family Violence Database is managed by the CSA and the Department of Justice and Regulation. The CSA and the Community Operations and Victims Support Agency at the Department of Justice and Regulation have established two working groups to provide advice, comment and feedback on data outputs and data quality issues. The CSA notes, however, the absence of a broader system for data governance:

... a high level steering committee whose role is to set strategic directions for coordinated family violence data activities across the state does not currently exist. High level leadership can be influential in ensuring coordination and alignment with cross-government needs. It is important for garnering commitment across government and helps to ensure efforts to improve Databases are afforded appropriate levels of authority and priority.¹⁴⁹

Further, noting that data sets included in the database operate in parallel and are of variable quality, the CSA recommend establishing a statewide data framework to 'consolidate data activities under an overarching strategic plan that guides the collection, provision and output of timely and relevant family violence information'.¹⁵⁰ This would also include prioritising key data gaps, and providing a structured set of activities to address these gaps.

The CSA suggest that ABS frameworks such as Defining the Data Challenge, and Bridging the Data Gaps, as well as the principles and concepts outlined in the National Data Collection and Reporting Framework, could serve as a basis for the Victorian framework.¹⁵¹

In relation to priority gaps, the CSA notes in particular that information gaps around Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status, CALD status and health and disability indicators inhibit the capacity of the database to contribute to policy and programs tailored towards these groups. In the Commission's view, this is true of gaps in Victorian data sets generally.

In terms of guiding the collection of data, the CSA recommends adopting practices to address variations in data quality and improve quality assurance practices. For example, the Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset incorporates a systematic audit of each hospital that contributes data every three years, to help maintain consistency and quality. Ensuring that similar practices are adopted across the family violence system is a priority.¹⁵²

The Commission endorses the CSA's observations. The Commission recommends that the Victorian Government, in consultation with the new Family Violence Agency discussed in Chapter 38 and the CSA, perform an ongoing governance role in relation to statewide data collection, including by implementing a statewide data framework.

The Commission notes that the new Statewide Family Violence Action Plan proposed in Chapter 38 could include progress towards shared objectives.

The Commission acknowledges previous efforts to devise shared standards. In addition to the Family Violence Benchmark project described above, work commenced in 2011 under the Family Violence Interdepartmental Committee to develop an optimum and minimum family violence data set.¹⁵³ The project reviewed current data collection, articulated what was available within data sets, and provided recommendations as to potential indicators that could support improved measuring of policies and programs.¹⁵⁴

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children recommends renewed efforts to introduce a family violence minimum and optimal data set. Their submission includes a table of items that might be included in the data set. For example, the minimum data set should include demographic characteristics and unique identifiers for victims and perpetrators; characteristics of the incident (including the presence of children, police involvement, the need for immediate protection); records of referrals and follow-ups; and characteristics of the violence, both in general and with respect to the perpetrator and victim specifically.¹⁵⁵ A model such as this may be a valuable component of the shared standards set by the Victorian Government.

The Commission also notes that the Senate Standing Committee on Finance and Public Administration has called for the ABS and other relevant organisations to investigate the feasibility of developing systems and tools to enable 'survey questions, delivery and data analysis developed pursuant to' the National Framework to 'be modified and made available for organisations to use on a local level'.¹⁵⁶

This system-wide approach to family violence data collection and research will need to be supported by individual improvements to particular data sets, and consideration should be given to developing a system-wide platform for communication between data sets. Recommendations for the improvement of IT infrastructure, and for improved integration of IT platforms, are made elsewhere in this report (see, for example Chapters 7 and 16).

Developing shared outcomes

To support the above, there is a need to develop shared, specific outcomes against which the efforts of organisations and systems working in family violence can be evaluated.

The Commission recommends that the Victorian Government develop these shared outcomes in consultation with the Family Violence Agency (and potentially in consultation with the CSA and other relevant parties). The outcomes should align with other family violence objectives that Victoria supports, such as those in the National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children 2010–22 and Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence against Women and Children, Everyone Has a Responsibility to Act 2012–2015.¹⁵⁷

The shared outcomes should be specific enough to be applied to the efforts of particular departments, agencies and funded services, and to design data-collection platforms used by these bodies to measure progress towards those outcomes.

As an example of broad but measurable goals, the Closing the Gap targets developed by the Council of Australian Governments to tackle disadvantage in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities include:

- ▷ halving the gap in life expectancy by 2031
- ▷ halving the gap in reading, writing and numeracy achievements for children by 2018
- ▷ halving the gap in Year 12 attainment rates by 2020.¹⁵⁸

As noted above, Domestic Violence Victoria has suggested shared outcomes relating to women's safety. Without seeking to pre-empt the task of framing shared outcomes, we suggest they might be usefully informed by Domestic Violence Victoria's suggestions.¹⁵⁹ We note that they should be consistent with the principles for the statewide response proposed in Chapter 38.

Recommendation 204

The Victorian Government work with the recommended Family Violence Agency and the Crime Statistics Agency to improve statewide family violence data collection and research [by 1 July 2018], including through:

- ▷ setting a strategic direction and addressing recurrent data gaps
- ▷ developing a statewide data framework, informed by relevant Commonwealth standards—for example, relevant Australian Bureau of Statistics frameworks such as the National Data Collection and Reporting Framework guidelines and ANROWS (Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety) guidance. This should include shared data definitions and performance indicators, guidelines on the collection of demographic information—in particular, on older people, people with disabilities and people from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander, culturally and linguistically diverse, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities—and shared best-practice and auditing standards and procedures to foster consistency and quality among Victorian data sets
- ▷ exploring opportunities for data linkage between existing data sets and other enhancements to increase the relevance and accessibility of existing data
- ▷ holding regular stakeholder meetings to review the function and quality of the Victorian Family Violence Database.

Building on existing data and research

Our understanding of family violence and the response to it could be improved by better use of existing resources. In particular, the Commission recommends making existing data sets and research efforts more accessible, conducting further analysis of existing data, increasing links between data sets, and where necessary, augmenting existing efforts.

Improving the Victorian Family Violence Database

The Commission has already noted above the CSA’s recommendations for improving the database through general governance. They also propose the following means to improve the database.¹⁶⁰

Add more data sets to the Database

Additional data sets could include call and dispatch data relating to ambulance callouts, and Ambulance Victoria data, as well as data from Child Protection and Child FIRST–Integrated Family Services, the criminal courts (including the County and Supreme Courts), Corrections Victoria and the youth justice system, community legal services and some health services. It may also be valuable to include data or data sets that shed light on non-physical (for example, economic, emotional) violence. In the Commission’s view, the addition of Integrated Family Services and Child Protection data should be a priority.

The CSA notes that family violence–related events need to be able to be differentiated from the general data in these data sets. This could be achieved by ‘flagging’ family violence episodes or linkage with other data sets. The CSA also proposes some preliminary work by family violence database custodians to ensure these data sets are commensurate with the database standards and definitions.

Statistical linkage

As already noted, there is an absence of unique identifiers for individuals across different data sets.

The CSA recommends that, given the immediate absence of IT and information-sharing systems and processes to support a system-wide identifier, more work could be done to create statistical linkages between data sets.

Statistical linkage is a process by which a person's identifiable details (such as name, date of birth, sex, and so on) are combined to create a de-identified unique key, which can be used across multiple data sets. The CSA describes this as 'a way of connecting disparate datasets to create a more useful source of information without significant investments in system upgrades or significant data manipulation'.¹⁶¹

The Commission notes that the Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children also advised establishing a confidential data linkage to 'enable better understanding of help seeking and service system pathways'.¹⁶²

Information sharing

The CSA notes a lack of clear information-sharing protocols across government, which makes the negotiation of content and time frames for the database more protracted. Information-sharing issues are discussed further in Chapter 7.

The Commission concurs with these recommendations and considers that the CSA is well-placed to maintain and develop the Victorian Family Violence Database.

Recommendation 205

The Crime Statistics Agency maintain and develop the Victorian Family Violence Database and consider what additional data sets should be incorporated in the database, how links between all relevant data sets can be created, and how the database can otherwise be developed [within 18 months].

Enhancement of existing information

As part of its 2014–16 research agenda, ANROWS is already making a valuable contribution to improving the state of our knowledge in relation to family violence. For example, in October 2015 they produced an analysis of the 2012 Personal Safety Survey. This included several hundred new statistical items related to violence against women, almost all of which had not been previously published or generated from the survey results.¹⁶³ ANROWS is currently conducting a further study on the burden of disease (including death and disability) of intimate partner violence.¹⁶⁴

This is very valuable work. The Commission notes that organisations designing policy or programs, or making a case for particular approaches, are poorly resourced to undertake research or extract relevant data from existing data sets. ANROWS helps perform that role, analysing existing data sources to provide accessible, selective, pertinent information that can inform and advance both the practice of service providers and their capacity to demonstrate their continuing value to funders.

The submission from ANROWS noted that its funding commenced on 1 July 2013 for a three-year period until 30 June 2016, and that the National Plan extends until 2022.¹⁶⁵

The Commission recommends that the Victorian Government continue to resource ANROWS for its work.

The Specialist Homelessness Services collection is another useful database that could be used. The collection is comprised of data provided to the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare by homelessness service providers. It utilises a unique identifier and includes information about, for example, the number of clients supported, the demographic characteristics of clients and the type of support provided. Each year, the AIHW produces reports on the collection.

The Commission heard that the collection of family violence-related information (including relevant risk factors) by homelessness service providers in Victoria was variable, that there was room for a greater focus on family violence, and that data collection relevant to family violence was in part constrained by the reporting platforms.¹⁶⁶ Domestic Violence Victoria submitted that because the SHIP database is a homelessness platform, data collected by agencies in this format ‘wildly underrepresents the work that they are doing’ in family violence.¹⁶⁷ To the extent that Specialist Homelessness Services collection is comprised of data supplied via these platforms, it will reflect these limitations. In the Commission’s view the AIHW should consider amending the collection to increase the focus on family violence, given the nexus between family violence and homelessness.

In addition, though the AIHW produces an annual Specialist Homelessness Services collection report and provides selected data for inclusion in the Victorian Family Violence Database, the Commission believes that the data could be more thoroughly used and interrogated by the Victorian Government.¹⁶⁸

Recommendation 206

The Victorian Government continue to fund ANROWS (Australia’s National Organisation for Women’s Safety) to do research in relation to preventing and responding to family violence.

Uptake of existing knowledge

The Commission also advises strengthening the processes by which research and current knowledge are translated into policy and practice.

ANROWS conducted a recent scoping paper on ‘knowledge translation and exchange’ (KTE).¹⁶⁹ KTE is an area of research concerned with the ‘science on how to more effectively promote and support the use of evidence, thereby building the research to policy and practice gap’.¹⁷⁰ ANROWS reviewed the results of 24 studies, 20 relating to ‘domestic violence or intimate partner violence’ and four to sexual assault.

There are different models of KTE. In some models, knowledge is translated into practice best when research questions are developed by those who will use the knowledge in a practical or policy setting; or if researchers build an intention to share the research with the target audience into their work strategies; or if the researchers’ empirical knowledge and the users’ tacit knowledge are both part of the research. Within these models there are specific strategies. The ANROWS review is explicitly preliminary and calls for further research, but it identifies a range of promising strategies, including:

- ▷ working with informal opinion leaders (competent, influential people within fields who can influence practitioners and policy makers)
- ▷ audit and feedback mechanisms that measure clinical performance (in a health setting, for example, medical records and patient observations may serve this purpose)
- ▷ educational interventions (such as continuing professional development), refresher training, and interventions that are multi-faceted and tailored to specific sectors.¹⁷¹

The Commission notes that factors that inhibited practitioners in applying their learning included discomfort in discussing violence or a fear of offending people, a lack of time and a lack of privacy.¹⁷² This underscores the fact that effective data collection is also about preparing those delivering services and collecting data to comfortably approach sometimes sensitive and difficult questions. In Chapter 40 we consider family violence training more broadly.

It is the Commission's view that practitioners, researchers, and those designing and funding research and policy programs need to consider appropriate KTE strategies—as well as factors that inhibit the ability of practitioners to apply their knowledge—and to include these considerations in their practice, design and funding models. Generally, it is important for data collectors to consider not just what data is for, but whom it is for.

Establishing an expert panel

One promising strategy is to establish an expert panel to assist service providers. The Commission notes the Australian Institute of Family Studies has recently been commissioned by the Commonwealth Department of Social Services (DSS) to establish an expert panel to support, strengthen and evaluate the department's Families and Children Activity. The expert panel is comprised of experts with a variety of relevant specialisations and backgrounds across service delivering research, training, academic and service support. Members of the panel provide expertise and tools to improve the service delivery of DSS-funded providers. For example, members of the panel assist with:

- ▷ implementation support and training in using evidence-based programs and practice
- ▷ developing outcome measures for evaluating services and programs
- ▷ training and support in developing, trialling and evaluating new programs and approaches
- ▷ research and evaluation activities.

The panel's work was referred to by Professor Leah Bromfield, Deputy Director of the Australian Centre for Child Protection at the University of South Australia and Professorial Fellow at the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses into Child Sexual Abuse. Professor Bromfield noted in evidence that the panel's functions included assisting services to 'use the best available evidence in selecting programs and in developing programs'; assisting organisations providing services to 'set up good evaluation parameters so that they can be developing the evidence base'; and providing 'implementation support', to overcome divergence between program selection and design and 'on the ground' program implementation.¹⁷³

The Commission also notes the relatively recent formation of the Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children. The alliance draws together experts on family violence in Australia, with a variety of experience and specialisations across social work, primary care, public policy and education. It encourages interdisciplinary research to end violence against women and children.

In the Commission's view, the Victorian Government might consider establishing an expert panel (or potentially multiple panels) to assist organisations and institutions in developing and delivering family violence initiatives. The Alliance may be a viable candidate for performing this role.

The Family Violence Index

The Victorian Government has announced its intention to produce an aggregate indicator of family violence, similar to the Consumer Price Index or the Housing Affordability Index, which will incorporate a range of metrics such as:

- ▷ numbers of perpetrator convictions
- ▷ rates of reporting to police
- ▷ rates of police referrals to family violence services
- ▷ the number of working days lost by employees affected by family violence
- ▷ the number of presentations to hospitals and the justice system connected with family violence.¹⁷⁴

The Victorian Government has commissioned ANROWS to advise on the scope and content of the project, including what indicators should form part of the proposed Victorian Family Violence Index (FVI).¹⁷⁵

The FVI could contribute to the improved measurement of family violence, as well as better coordination of the data sets that will underpin this process. The Commission endorses this initiative (as have a number of our stakeholders in submissions to the Commission).

The Commission notes that if the FVI is to be a single aggregated measure of multiple, disparate data sets, an appropriate methodology will need to be devised. Many measures related to family violence are, on their face, incommensurate, and their relationships complex and contestable. Producing an aggregate figure that reflects Victoria's performance in responding to family violence is likely to be challenging. Assessing what a change represents can also be challenging. For example, an increase in a demand indicator may be interpreted as a positive (greater willingness to report, better responsiveness by services such as police) or as a negative (a proxy for an increase in prevalence and incidence).

The FVI may nevertheless have a valuable role, particularly in maintaining community awareness of family violence and the need to continuously improve our responses to it.

The Commission understands that the FVI would build on existing research and data-collection efforts in Victoria. We commend that objective, and advise the Victorian Government to liaise with the Crime Statistics Agency to explore means of developing the FVI in a way that complements and builds on the Victorian Family Violence Database.

It is crucial that the Family Violence FVI include measures that reflect experiences of family violence in particular groups and communities, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, people with disabilities, children and young people, older people, LGBTI communities, people in rural and regional Victoria, and people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.

The Commission notes that at date of writing, the development of the FVI is under way, and that a recent review of international literature confirms it is a world first.¹⁷⁶

Endnotes

- 1 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 39.
- 2 A copy of the CSA report is in Volume VII.
- 3 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Defining the Data Challenge for Family, Domestic and Sexual Violence, 2013' (Catalogue No 4529.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, February 2013) 2–3.
- 4 Council of Australian Governments (COAG), 'The National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Children 2010–2022' (Department of Social Services, February 2011).
- 5 See generally, Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 3.
- 6 Ibid 4.
- 7 See, eg, ibid 23–6.
- 8 See, eg, ibid 29–32.
- 9 See, eg, ibid 35–8.
- 10 See, eg, ibid 39–46.
- 11 See, eg, ibid 49–53.
- 12 See, eg, ibid 55–58.
- 13 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Foundation for a National Data Collection and Reporting Framework for family, domestic and sexual violence, 2014' (Catalogue No 4529.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, September 2014) Introduction.
- 14 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'ABS Data Quality Framework' (Catalogue No 1520.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, May 2009) Introduction.
- 15 Ibid Institutional Environment.
- 16 Ibid Timeliness.
- 17 Ibid Coherence.
- 18 Ibid Interpretability, Accessibility.
- 19 We do not seek to suggest, of course, that multiple contacts with services carries negative implications. Often, a victim's path to safety will involve multiple interactions with service providers, and this is entirely appropriate. Equally, multiple interactions may signify that a service provider is prioritising and monitoring a family violence situation.
- 20 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 53.
- 21 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Attachment 10: Transitional support–20082', 3, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 13 October 2015.
- 22 Transcript of Dunlop, 12 August 2015, 2776 [8]–[25], 2778 [1]–[5].
- 23 Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14' (January 2016), 141, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 8 January 2016.
- 24 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3921 [24]–3922 [10].
- 25 Domestic Violence Victoria–04, Submission 943, 4, 10.
- 26 Ibid 10–11.
- 27 Victoria, Inquiry into Protecting Victoria's Vulnerable Children, Full Report (2012) vol 2 511.
- 28 Victorian Auditor-General's Office, 'Early Intervention Services for Vulnerable Children and Families' (May 2015) vii.
- 29 See also Australian Human Rights Commission, 'Children's Rights Report 2015' (2015). Among other things, the report recommends enhancing the Personal Safety Survey's collection of data on respondents' experiences of abuse as children.
- 30 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 43.
- 31 Transcript of Dowsley, 14 October 2015, 3581 [30]–3582 [2].
- 32 Ibid 3582 [2]–[17].
- 33 See eg, Transcript of Diemer, 14 October 2015, 3583 [3]–3584 [18]; Transcript of Dowsley, 14 October 2015, 3584 [22]–3585 [26]; Crime Statistics Agency, above n 23, 138.
- 34 Transcript of Dowsley, 14 October 2015, 3581 [30]–3582 [17].
- 35 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 23, 144.
- 36 Ibid.
- 37 Ibid.
- 38 For example, the ABS recommends that a person's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status be sought each time they come into contact with a service provider (as their understanding of it, or their willingness to report it, may change), and that they be asked to specify whether they are Aboriginal, Torres Strait Islander, both Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander or neither Aboriginal nor Torres Strait Islander. See ibid.
- 39 Ibid 145.
- 40 Ibid.
- 41 Ibid.
- 42 Ibid.
- 43 Ibid 139.
- 44 Victorian Refugee Health Network, Submission 939, 5; Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 1; National Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Alliance, Submission 912, 6; Koorie Youth Council, Submission 906, 5–6; Victorian Gay and Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 2.
- 45 See, eg, Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 1; Multicultural Centre for Women's Health, Submission 616, 8; Shakti Migrant and Refugee Women's Support Group Melbourne Inc., Submission 500, 5; Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights, Submission 728, 19; Victorian Refugee Health Network, Submission 939, 5; Australian Greek Welfare Society, Submission 578, 2.
- 46 Multicultural Centre for Women's Health, Submission 616, 8.
- 47 See, eg, National Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Alliance, Submission 912, 6; Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 7; Northern Metropolitan Region Indigenous Family Violence Action Group, Submission 934, 5; Koorie Youth Council, Submission 906, 5–6; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 6; Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 29.
- 48 Victorian Aboriginal Legal Service, Submission 826, 7.
- 49 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof. Cathy Humphreys et al)—02, Submission 840, Briefing Paper 8, 6.
- 50 See, eg, Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society–La Trobe University, Submission 821, 3–4; Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 2; No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 21–22.
- 51 No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 21–22.
- 52 Ibid 22.
- 53 Ibid.
- 54 Ibid.

55 Ibid.

56 See, eg, Sustainability Australia, Submission 845, 3–4.

57 We note that ANROWS has been commissioned to conduct a Diversity Data Project on the experiences of diverse groups, including Indigenous women, women from culturally and linguistically diverse communities, and women with disability. Its findings will inform the National Plan's Third Action Plan. See ANROWS, Diversity Data Project <<http://anrows.org.au/resources/news/diversity-data-project>>.

58 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Personal Safety, Australia, 2012' (Catalogue No 4906.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, December 2013).

59 Importantly, not all of the raw data collected as part of the PSS is published, and further data can be released and/or developed from the collected data on request.

60 Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 58, Explanatory Notes, Introduction [20]–[21].

61 Ibid Explanatory Notes, Introduction [21].

62 Ibid Explanatory Notes, Introduction [13].

63 Ibid Explanatory Notes, Introduction [33].

64 Ibid Explanatory Notes, Introduction [13].

65 A person was considered to have experienced emotional abuse where they reported they had been subjected to or experienced behaviours including 'Stopped or tried to stop them knowing about or having access to household money', and 'Stopped or tried to stop them from working or earning money': Ibid Explanatory Notes, Glossary.

66 Ibid Explanatory Notes, Introduction [29], [34].

67 Parliament of Australia, Senate Finance and Public Administration References Committee, 'Domestic Violence in Australia' (August 2015) ix.

68 See, eg, Transcript of Diemer, 14 October 2015, 3591 [19]–[27].

69 See, eg, Centre for Forensic Behavioural Science–Swinburne University of Technology, Submission 649, 9; Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Kelsey Hegarty et al), Submission 885, 25.

70 Caraniche, Submission 456, 1, 4.

71 The Commission notes that the Victorian Government has commenced a review information-sharing needs and barriers across the justice system. See Statement of De Cicco, 7 August 2015, 16–18 [48]–[57].

72 We note by way of analogy that in the 2015–16 Victorian Budget, the Victorian Government has allocated funding for real-time prescription monitoring, which will enable pharmacists and prescribers to access a patient's dispensing history of medications such as methadone and oxycodone at the time of consultation. The system requirements and benefits, of real-time prescription monitoring may be of interest to the Victorian Government in considering approaches to monitoring family violence perpetrators. See State of Victoria, '2015–16 Budget Paper No 3: Service Delivery' (Department of Treasury and Finance, 2015) 72.

73 Court Services Victoria, Submission 646, 17–18.

74 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 21.

75 County Court of Victoria, Submission 835, 9.

76 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 9.

77 Ibid 10.

78 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Bridging the Data Gaps for Family, Domestic and Sexual Violence, 2013' (Catalogue No 4529.0.00.002, Australian Bureau of Statistics, November 2013) 44.

79 Transcript of Shuard, 6 August 2015, 2191 [9].

80 Transcript of Dowsley, 14 October 2015, 3578 [26]–3579 [1].

81 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 23, 134–5.

82 Ibid 104.

83 Ibid.

84 Ibid.

85 Victoria Legal Aid, 'Characteristics of respondents charged with breach of family violence intervention orders: key findings' (2016). See Victoria Legal Aid, Research reveals risk factors for continuing family violence (18 February 2016) <<https://www.legalaid.vic.gov.au/about-us/news/research-reveals-risk-factors-for-continuing-family-violence>>.

86 Sentencing Advisory Council, Reoffending Following Sentencing for Contravening a Family Violence Intervention Order or Safety Notice (14 January 2016). <<https://www.sentencingcouncil.vic.gov.au/projects/reoffending-following-sentencing-contravening-family-violence-order>>. We also note that the Commonwealth Government has commissioned ANROWS to implement a dedicated Perpetrator Interventions Research Stream: ANROWS, Perpetrator Interventions Research Stream <<http://anrows.org.au/research-program/perpetrator-interventions-research-program>>.

87 Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 3, 15.

88 Ibid.

89 Ibid 14.

90 Ibid.

91 Ibid 14–15.

92 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Table of items where no relevant documents or data identified/available under Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015', 15, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

93 Ibid 23.

94 The Royal Women's Hospital, Submission 356, 3.

95 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Kelsey Hegarty et al), Submission 885, Briefing Paper 1, 1.

96 Transcript of Diemer, 14 October 2015, 3583 [4]–[28].

97 The Royal Women's Hospital, Submission 356, 3.

98 Women's Health Victoria, Victorian Women's Health Atlas (9 March 2016) <http://victorianwomenshealthatlas.net.au/#!/>.

99 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 39.

100 Statement of Eccles, 15 October 2015, 16 [77]–[82].

101 Peter Shergold, 'Service Sector Reform: A roadmap for community and human services reform—Final Report' (Victorian Council of Social Service, July 2013) 23–25.

102 Ibid 25.

103 Ibid.

104 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 24–5.

105 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3954 [12]–[16]; see also Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3909 [3]–[12].

106 Department of Treasury and Finance, 'Strategic Management Framework' (May 2011) 10.

107 Transcript of Diemer, 14 October 2015, 3596 [23]–3597 [12].

108 Ibid 3598 [6]–[12].

109 Ibid 3598 [26]–[30].

110 Transcript of Dowsley, 14 October 2015, 3599 [2]–[9].

111 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 55; Darebin Community Legal Centre, Submission 931, 16–17.

112 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 55.

- 113 Darebin Community Legal Centre, Submission 931, 16–17.
- 114 National Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Alliance, Submission 912, 6.
- 115 Transcript of Vlasis, 24 July 2015, 1443 [28]–1444 [1].
- 116 Transcript of Diemer, 14 October 2015, 3598 [22]–[25].
- 117 National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 'Time for Action: The National Council's Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021' (2009) 47.
- 118 Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, Submission 626, 12.
- 119 Jan Breckenridge et al, 'National Mapping and Meta-Evaluation Outlining Key Features of Effective "Safe at Home" Programs that Enhance Safety and Prevent Homelessness for Women and Their Children Who Have Experienced Domestic and Family Violence: State of Knowledge Paper' (Landscapes Issue 5, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, July 2015); Jan Breckenridge et al, 'Meta-Evaluation of Existing Interagency Partnerships, Collaboration, Coordination and/or Integrated Interventions and Service Responses to Violence Against Women: State of Knowledge Paper' (Landscapes Issue 11, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, September 2015).
- 120 Transcript of Dowsley, 14 October 2015, 3592 [13]–[19].
- 121 Grampians Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 399, 4.
- 122 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Development of a Benchmark evidence base for the family violence service system, project plan' (June 2007), produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 123 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Release of the Family Violence Benchmark Data Report' (September 2008), 2, 6, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 124 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Reporting and Information System Data on Family Violence' (24 September 2007), 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 125 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 123, 4.
- 126 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Safe at home' programs in the context of the Victorian Integrated Family Violence Service System Reforms', 6, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 127 Ibid 7.
- 128 Centre for Excellence in Child and Family Welfare Inc, SAFER (2011) <<http://www.cfecfw.asn.au/know/research/sector-research-partnership/partnership-projects/family-violence/safer>>.
- 129 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'ARC—Research Management System', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 130 Ibid 2.
- 131 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 23, 17.
- 132 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare (AIHW), 'Specialist Homelessness Services 2013–2014' (Cat. no. HOU 276, 2014) 61–66.
- 133 VicHealth, 'Australians' Attitudes to Violence Against Women: Findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey' (September 2014).
- 134 The Commission notes the publication of VicHealth's 'Evaluating Victorian projects for the primary prevention of violence against women: A concise guide' (2015). We also note evidence of individual initiatives in this area, such as the development of an evaluation framework by Inner North West Primary Care Partnerships with the University of Melbourne: see Victorian Primary Care Partnerships, Submission 248, 25; and the Identifying and responding to family violence project: Transcript of Fitzsimon, 12 October 2015, 3210, 17.
- 135 See Transcript of Eccles, 16 October 2015, 3918 [19]–[20].
- 136 See generally, Sarah Tayton et al, 'Groups and Communities at Risk of Domestic and Family Violence: A Review and Evaluation of Domestic and Family Violence Prevention and Early Intervention Services Focusing on At-Risk Groups and Communities' (August 2014).
- 137 Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Information Paper: Measuring Crime Victimization, Australia: The Impact of Different Collection Methodologies, 2002' (Catalogue No 4522.0.55.001, Australian Bureau of Statistics, February 2004).
- 138 Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 58, Introduction.
- 139 See, eg, Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'National Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Social Survey, 2008' (Catalogue No 4714.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, October 2009).
- 140 Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 58, Explanatory notes [13]. Tayton et al, above n 136, vi.
- 141 See, eg, Transcript of Frederico and Brown, 14 October 2015, 3647 [1]–[20], 3747 [23]–3650 [14].
- 142 See Statement of Peake, 14 October 2015, 33 [137]–35 [144].
- 143 Australian Bureau of Statistics, above n 78, 9.
- 144 Ibid 33.
- 145 Ibid 31.
- 146 This issue is also considered in Chapter 38.
- 147 Rochelle Braaf and Isabelle Meyering, 'The Gender Debate in Domestic Violence: The Role of Data' (Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2013) 2–4.
- 148 Jan Breckenridge and Jen Hamer, 'Issues Paper 26: Traversing the Maze of 'Evidence' and 'Best Practice' in Domestic and Family Violence Service Provision in Australia' (University of New South Wales, 2014) 5.
- 149 Crime Statistics Agency, above n 23, 143.
- 150 Ibid 140.
- 151 Ibid 141.
- 152 Ibid 142.
- 153 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Report on the development of a Family Violence Minimum Data Set (Victoria)' (February 2011) 17, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 154 Ibid 14.
- 155 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children, Submission 840 (Prof Cathy Humphreys et al)—02, Briefing Paper No 7, 4, 6.
- 156 Parliament of Australia, above n 67, 64.
- 157 Council of Australian Governments (COAG), above n 4, 14–29; Victorian Government, 'Victoria's Action Plan to Address Violence Against Women and Children: Everyone Has a Responsibility to Act' (October 2012).
- 158 Australian Government, 'Closing the Gap: Prime Minister's Report 2015' (2015) 5.
- 159 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 24–25. See also the work of Community Indicators Victoria, Community Indicators Victoria <<http://www.communityindicators.net.au/>>.
- 160 See Crime Statistics Agency, above n 23, 140–5.
- 161 Ibid 141.
- 162 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children, Submission 840 (Prof Cathy Humphreys et al)—02, Briefing Paper No 7, 4.

- 163 Peta Cox, 'Violence against women in Australia: Additional analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012' (Horizons: Research Paper No 01, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, October 2015).
- 164 Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, 'ANROWS Research Program 2014-16 (Part 1), October 2014, 10.
- 165 Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, Submission 626, 17.
- 166 Transcript of Holst, 21 July 2015, 946 [8]-[14]; Transcript of Springall, 21 July 2015, 950 [28]-951 [18].
- 167 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 8.
- 168 Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Homelessness publications (2016) <<http://www.aihw.gov.au/homelessness-publications/>>.
- 169 Kate Spalding et al, 'Review of the Evidence on Knowledge Translation and Exchange in the Violence Against Women Field: Key Findings and Future Directions' (Compass: Research to Policy and Practice, April 2015) 2.
- 170 Ibid.
- 171 Ibid 6.
- 172 Ibid 4.
- 173 Transcript of Bromfield, 12 October 2015, 3361 [2]-[3] -3362 [1]-[14]. Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Measuring the Toll: The Family Violence Index (18 May 2015)', 5-6, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 174 Ibid 7.
- 175 Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, Notepad (3 February 2016) <<http://anrows.org.au/notepad>>.
- 176 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Measuring the Toll: The Family Violence Index (18 May 2015)', 5-6, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

40 Industry planning

Introduction

In consultations across Victoria, the Commission was struck by the commitment, knowledge and expertise of hundreds of practitioners in a range of different roles who assist people affected by family violence—police, specialist family violence workers and integrated family service case workers and outreach workers, crisis workers, lawyers, magistrates, court-based support workers, prevention practitioners and policy experts. Despite working under enormous pressure, and facing unprecedented demand, these practitioners demonstrated their dedication to those they supported, and to ending family violence. In making recommendations to improve responses to family violence across all sectors that assist people affected by family violence, the Commission aims to build on the work of these dedicated practitioners.

While workforce issues are discussed in other chapters throughout this report, this chapter provides a comprehensive focus on the major workforce issues facing those who work in the area of family violence. Some issues are common across workforces, but each workforce also has unique needs. There is a particular focus in this chapter on specialist family violence services. Domestic Violence Victoria highlighted for the Commission the many skills that specialist family violence practitioners possess, and the first section of this chapter examines the capabilities a specialist family violence worker, or someone working in the specialist area of family violence prevention, must bring to their daily work. Workforce issues raised with the Commission regarding this sector are then discussed.

The next section of this chapter summarises the evidence the Commission received on workforce issues with regard to the police, the courts and legal practitioners. Since these matters are discussed in Chapters 14 and 16, this section of the present chapter is brief. Workforce issues in non-family violence specific services, such as health, education, Child Protection and other government departments are also discussed.

In the final section of this chapter, after considering the range of workforce issues across these sectors, the Commission proposes a way forward. The Commission recommends a comprehensive 10-year industry plan to ensure the right mix of highly skilled, appropriately remunerated family violence prevention and response specialists, as well as the police, and justice system workforces needed to meet the challenge of what is a highly complex problem as well as a high volume crime.

Given the pervasive nature of family violence, all service systems and professionals must be able to recognise family violence and respond safely and sensitively. Therefore the industry plan should also deliver family violence-literate health, welfare, children's and education workforces.

To achieve this, the Victorian Government should work with specialist family violence services, other government and non-government stakeholders, Victoria Police, business, unions, tertiary institutions, professional associations and community leaders to produce and implement the industry plan.

Careful, considered industry planning is essential in developing an effective response to family violence. This will take time, yet we know that family violence is an issue that demands an urgent response. In the final part of the discussion on the way forward, the Commission makes a number of recommendations about important actions that can be taken in the short term to forge stronger relationships; build capability across legal, family violence, universal services and non-family violence specific services; and improve service delivery for both victims and perpetrators.

Overview of the family violence workforce

There are many ways victims of family violence seek help. There are specialist family violence services with expertise in assessing and managing risks and providing support to victims during crisis and beyond. Police and courts respond to immediate safety needs. Universal services that are available to all Victorians—for example, schools, hospitals, health, ambulance and other emergency services—as well as specialist systems such as Child Protection and Integrated Family Services, also work with victims and perpetrators.

While all services have a role in responding to or preventing family violence, the nature of their involvement differs and, therefore, so do the issues in workforce training and industry planning. For victims of family violence the distinctions between universal and specialist services are irrelevant. What they need is a quick, informed and sensitive response to the situation that has resulted in them seeking help.

Specialist family violence services are never going to be able to support every single woman and child who is experiencing violence and nor support every man to change his behaviour who is perpetrating violence. That is just not a realistic expectation of the service, and nor do women always want to go to specialist services. But the focus on managing medium- to high-level risk is the particular and unique role ...¹

Whilst those other services do want to be able to identify and respond to that woman who is sitting in front of them, they don't want to be in control of managing that risk. It's too much for them to do, it's not their professional expertise and they have no desire to manage those high-risk cases where women are at risk of being murdered, and there are particular times and contexts within which it is really important to have a specialist family violence response.²

In evidence, Ms Emily Maguire, Chief Executive Officer of Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, described a tiered approach to mapping roles and competencies in family violence risk assessment.³ Although, her model relates specifically to risk assessment and management it also provides a good starting point for thinking about the competencies each part of the system needs to possess. Ms Maguire identified four tiers of service.

- ▶ Tier 1: specialist family violence and sexual assault services. These are agencies that spend 90 per cent or more of their time responding to women and children who are victims of violence. They have sole responsibility for dealing with medium to high-risk cases on an ongoing basis.⁴ This tier would also include those who work with perpetrators, for example, in men's behaviour change programs. Specialist family violence practitioners and teams may form part of larger organisations that provide a range of services, or they may be stand-alone services. What they have in common as practitioners is that their sole or major focus is on family violence (and/or sexual assault).
- ▶ Tier 2: core support or intervention agencies. These are agencies whose core business is not directly related to family violence but who spend a significant proportion of their time responding to victims or perpetrators of violence. This includes Victoria Police, courts, legal agencies and court services, Corrections Victoria and Child Protection. Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services might also be included in this tier since a significant proportion of the families they work with may be at risk of or are experiencing family violence.⁵
- ▶ Tier 3: mainstream services and non-family violence specific support or intervention agencies. These are agencies whose core business is not family violence but which work in sectors that respond to the impacts of family violence (such as homelessness and the health effects of depression and anxiety) or in sectors where disclosures of violence are more likely to occur. These services are also likely to come into contact with perpetrators, although responding to perpetrators is not their primary function.

Tier 3 services include the health-care system (GPs, community health, hospitals and so on.), drug and alcohol services, housing/accommodation/homelessness services, mental health services, agencies that support financial security (for example, Centrelink), and individuals providing therapeutic services (psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers, counsellors, family therapists, and so on.).⁶

- ▷ Tier 4: general organisations. A range of organisations in the community can support victims of family violence with whom they have regular and extended contact. They may also be able to respond to perpetrators of violence.⁷

Ms Maguire noted that each of these tiers has required competencies and skills. Some of these are common, for example all tiers need to be able to identify early warning signs or indicators of family violence.⁸ However responsibility for action is different in each tier. For example, a specialist family violence practitioner needs to be able to assess and manage risk, including high-risk⁹ and complex needs. In contrast, a health practitioner should have the ability to assess basic family violence risk, know how to get specialist support to help the victim to safety plan and manage risk, and then fulfil their usual role of responding to the health needs of the victim.

The specialist family violence workforce

Specialist family violence services are considered in detail in Chapter 8. This chapter focuses on workforce issues relevant to specialist family violence services.

Specialist family violence services are the services that respond to women and children experiencing family violence. A small number of services also respond to male perpetrators.

As noted, specialist family violence practitioners work primarily with the victims of family violence at medium to high-risk. To do this they need to be able to assess and manage ongoing risk.¹⁰ This is complex and demanding work, which requires a detailed knowledge of the dynamics of family violence, what risk looks like, how to communicate with victims without causing more trauma, and how to help victims develop a detailed plan for their ongoing safety.¹¹

There is a wide range of practice specialties in family violence services. These include legal specialists (such as Women's Legal Service Victoria and the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria), children's specialists, bi-cultural specialists and multi-disciplinary services that combine functions. This means that people who work in specialist family violence services are likely to come from a wide range of professions, including law, social work, health promotion, counselling, psychology and other 'helping' professions.

The family violence workforce is predominantly female (98 per cent).¹² This is probably because of the major role women's organisations played in establishing safe places for women, because the majority of services are for women and their children, and because most women who experience family violence are likely to be more comfortable talking to other women, rather than men.¹³ Some specialist family violence services have obtained exemptions under Victoria's equal opportunity legislation to employ only women.¹⁴

A 2007 workforce survey of 845 employees in the community-managed housing and support sector found that, compared with other parts of the sector, specialist family violence workers are substantially older, with almost a third of workers between 45 and 54 years of age. Of the 115 specialist family violence workers surveyed, only 26 per cent were under 35 years.¹⁵ Over half of the family violence workers worked part time (56 per cent).¹⁶

Capabilities and competencies of specialist family violence practitioners

Domestic Violence Victoria drew the Commission's attention to the diversity of skills that specialist family violence practitioners require.¹⁷ While the skills vary between response and prevention work, and between different agencies and services, workers generally need technical expertise in the area in which they work, and a complex set of high-level communication, organisation and management skills.

Family violence workers need to respond appropriately to clients who are traumatised; work with children who have witnessed and/or experienced violence; cooperate with other agencies to integrate their responses across regions or coordinate the package of services available to a victim; engage and develop protocols with a broad range of stakeholders outside the sector, including the health-care system, courts and police; network and cooperate with partner agencies, including those providing secondary consultation; support women through the court system with a working knowledge of relevant legislation and judicial processes; and, occasionally give evidence in court.¹⁸

It was submitted that relevant competencies are likely to include empathy, listening and communication skills, negotiation and advocacy.¹⁹ Many practitioners also contribute to policy making and practice reform in partnership with courts, police and other agencies.²⁰ Because funds are scarce many also have marketing, promotion and fundraising skills, and the budget and financial acumen needed to plan resources, account for and acquit funding, and run a service. Managing a service also requires good people management skills.

Prevention specialisation

The Commission heard that family violence prevention work is also highly skilled and may draw on some of these competencies. Prevention practitioners, however, have specific expertise that differs from that of those who work in family violence response, and their practice is therefore specialist in its own distinct way.

The Commission heard that much of the Victorian prevention specialisation has been developed using a public health lens.²¹ Prevention practitioners such as women's health services promote organisation and systems change and conduct health promotion and public health initiatives. 'This is because effective primary prevention strategy relies upon influencing public and organisational policy, targeting community engagement and action, and reorienting systems'.²²

Challenges

This section examines challenges faced by specialist family violence services. The Commission notes that some of these challenges—for example vicarious trauma and workplace stress—are also concerns for other workers who respond to family violence, among them police, magistrates and court staff and child protection workers.

A number of major workforce issues emerged in evidence. First, there may be gaps in the training and skills of people entering the specialist family violence sector. Secondly, the Commission consistently heard that services face major problems attracting and retaining staff because of:

- ▷ low remuneration
- ▷ the part-time nature of much of the work
- ▷ instability in employment due to short-term contracts and funding insecurity
- ▷ limited career development opportunities
- ▷ a lack of ongoing professional development
- ▷ vicarious trauma and stress.

Thirdly, there was concern that these problems are not being addressed through any systematic process of workforce planning and development for the sector.

Workforce skills

Information about the qualifications profile of the specialist family violence sector is not centrally collected. A 2007 KPMG report, however, identified higher rates of non-graduate qualifications in family violence services compared with other community-managed housing and support services.²³

At the time of the KPMG report, of 115 specialist family violence workers surveyed, 68 per cent held a university degree, 12 per cent had a vocational certificate and 20 per cent had secondary school completion as their highest qualification. The most common disciplines of higher education were welfare (27 per cent), social work and community development (both 24 per cent). Thirteen per cent had a management qualification.²⁴

There are no mandatory qualifications for employees who provide specialist family violence services to victims. It is typical for advertised positions to require a relevant tertiary or vocational qualification. This is consistent with the 2007 KPMG findings on qualification profiles.²⁵

The Chisholm Institute is concerned that the national vocational training competencies for family violence work are inadequate.²⁶

Primarily what you will find in the specialist sector is that you need a certificate in community development or community services, some will be social work trained, but there are also agencies who are willing to accept, given the history of this work and given there used to be in the '70s a significant focus on ensuring that the women who were working in this space were victims/survivors themselves, which is not so much the case now, but that was very much where it came from. Given that previous history, there are also services who are willing to accept history of work in the sector as the qualification for working. But there is no kind of consistent standard or framework, which is a significant gap.²⁷

As noted elsewhere in this report, the Commission heard evidence that family violence services do not always have the understanding and sensitivity necessary to respond to the diverse range of people who need their assistance. This can include older people, women with disabilities, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex Victorians, those from culturally and linguistically diverse communities, children and young people, and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.²⁸ These communities also face significant barriers accessing other parts of the family violence system, including police and the courts, as described in Chapters 14 and 16.

Similarly, building capability to deliver culturally appropriate services to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples who choose to access mainstream services was a strong theme in submissions,²⁹ along with calls for strategic investment to develop the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander workforce in family violence, including in leadership positions.³⁰

Domestic Violence Victoria reported its members' concerns that new social work graduates are inadequately prepared for work in the family violence sector.³¹ The Chisholm Institute noted that the tertiary education sector's approach to family violence qualifications was emerging and inconsistent. Only one institution offers a family violence-specific qualification in Victoria (and it focuses solely on perpetrator programs).³²

Other family violence-related subjects are dispersed through courses such as social work, public health, politics and law.³³ Only some social work degrees have family violence as a mandatory subject.³⁴ Deakin University, for example, offers a unit, Addressing Violence and Abuse, as part of its Master of Social Work professionally qualifying program. RMIT University has a similar elective unit as part of its Bachelor of Social Work program, and since 2014, Berry Street's Family Violence Service and Take Two program have been providing an elective to the La Trobe University Social Work program, providing specialist contemporary knowledge on family violence and trauma.³⁵ The University of Melbourne has postgraduate social work subjects in Assessing Risk and Vulnerability and Legal and Ethical Contexts of Practice.³⁶

Attracting and retaining staff

Domestic Violence Victoria reported that its member agencies are 'having increasing difficulty recruiting and retaining staff' and that services are 'now considering candidates for positions who would not have been deemed appropriately qualified or skilled as recently as three years ago'.³⁷

Similarly the peak body for men's behaviour change programs, No To Violence, has identified major problems recruiting and keeping quality staff. In 2010 it surveyed male family violence workers anonymously on issues related to pay and conditions.³⁸ The survey found a 'sheer lack of suitably qualified applicants' for facilitator positions—largely due to poor pay, particularly since most of the group work is conducted at night.³⁹

Another provider, Bethany Community Support, noted that current program funding 'does not acknowledge the highly specialist work that is required to work with men who use violence and the need for staff to be equipped, trained and highly supported to do this work'.⁴⁰

The Commission heard that these workforce challenges are acute in Aboriginal organisations and as a result the Aboriginal community controlled sector 'is quite variable in terms of the capacity across the state'.⁴¹

Retention and turnover

Retention and turnover was a common theme in submissions. As noted earlier, there is a higher proportion of older employees in the family violence workforce than in the general workforce. The Australian Services Union noted that this ageing workforce 'coupled with young women coming into the sector and then leaving after relatively short periods of time due to high cost of living, low pay, poor conditions and workplace stress is leading to significant brain drain in this highly specialised sector'.⁴²

A 2014 Australian Services Union survey found that 33 per cent of managers in family violence services reported a problem in retaining high-quality staff 'all the time', compared with other parts of community services where the rate was 17 per cent.⁴³

In 2007 the average turnover rate for the community-managed housing and support workforce (which includes specialist family violence services) was 25 per cent. Staff working in the family violence sector were most likely to leave their existing workplace in the following two years, with 39 per cent of the 115 workers surveyed indicating that this was their intention. Some of these workers intended to move to another employer in the sector, but 26 per cent intended to leave the sector in the next two years.⁴⁴

Problems in retaining staff were echoed by men's behaviour change program providers, who submitted that working with men who use violence is challenging and demanding and there is high staff 'burnout' and turnover.⁴⁵ Family Life Service Centre indicated that staff would extend themselves to meet demand and this contributed to 'workforce burn out and churn, irrespective of the workplace management and supervision support'.⁴⁶ It added, 'turning people in need away is not something which sits comfortably with our vocationally dedicated people. This pressure of demand, in turn [affects] service system stability'.⁴⁷

Remuneration

In 2012 Fair Work Australia (now the Fair Work Commission) made an Equal Remuneration Order for the social, community and disability services industry throughout Australia.⁴⁸ This order resulted in wage increases of between 23 and 45 per cent to be phased in over eight years.⁴⁹ While this change has been welcomed by the specialist family violence sector, adequate remuneration remains a significant issue.⁵⁰ The Australian Services Union submitted:

Since the equal remuneration order, the ASU has seen many instances of employers re-classifying roles in the family violence sector in order to avoid paying higher wages that the order requires. The outcome has been a de-skilling of the work such that lower qualified staff with less experience are delivering work, or employees are continuing to work at higher levels but "accepting" lower levels of pay for it.⁵¹

Information on the workforce and remuneration profile of the specialist family violence sector is not centrally collected and the Commission found it difficult to assess current remuneration patterns. Details of each service provider's cost structure, workforce profile and operating expenses are not collected by the Department of Health and Human Services.⁵²

Organisations are funded for the 'delivery of specific activity output targets'.⁵³ These refer to the episodes of support to be delivered rather than specifying the number of staff at particular grades or employee classifications. According to the Department of Health and Human Services, funding represents a reasonable cost of delivering services 'across a mix of agency sizes, structures and locations'.⁵⁴ For example, specialist family violence outreach and crisis support accommodation programs use a fixed funding base that increases annually through the application of non-government organisation indexation and increases ordered through the equal remuneration case just mentioned.⁵⁵

DHHS was, however, able to provide funding model workforce profiles for the Family Violence Counselling Services Program. Using this information the Commission compared the salary assumptions that inform funding levels for family violence counselling services with other human services working with families. This analysis is, however, based on only one of the program categories the department has for family violence and 'the actual mix of resources applied by agencies to deliver their agreed targets varies across service providers for the provision of an identical activity target, and could cover a diverse range of costs at the discretion of each service provider'.⁵⁶

The analysis showed that there are anomalies between the salary assumptions built into funding models between specialist family violence services and Integrated Family Services. Broadly, the funding model assumes that family violence counselling caseworkers are paid at least one award classification level below the majority of family services caseworkers (where there is a range of salaries).⁵⁷

Similarly, team leaders in family violence counselling services are assumed to be two employee classification levels below team leaders in family services.⁵⁸ Anomalies also exist between assumed salary grades in the funding model and remuneration of child protection practitioners.⁵⁹

Trade unions told the Commission that most specialist family violence workforce members are paid at the award rate rather than above award.⁶⁰ The 2007 KPMG report noted that most specialist family violence services provide salary packaging to employees.⁶¹

In a survey of 515 members across 106 workplaces, the Australian Services Union also found that 58 per cent of employees regularly worked more than their contracted hours (unpaid), with 88 per cent of these working up to an additional six hours a week.⁶² This is consistent with the KPMG survey which found that over 30 per cent of the 115 specialist family violence workers surveyed reported working more than 15 per cent of their paid hours as unpaid work each week.⁶³

Workers in men's behaviour change programs face similar workforce members issues as those women's family violence services. A survey of 28 men's behaviour change providers conducted by No To Violence in 2010 found that:

- ▷ The average hourly rate paid to workers within standard business hours was $28.35.
- ▷ The rate for out-of-hours work—which is when most group sessions are held—was $31.28 for non-casual workers and $33.12 for casual workers. No To Violence found that some casual out-of-hours workers were paid below the Social and Community Service Award (now the Social, Community, Home Care and Disability Services Industry Award 2010).
- ▷ Part-time positions are not attractive to potential facilitators, not all applicants are able to work nights and an 'exceptionally high commitment' was required of staff to do male family violence work well.⁶⁴

Career paths and professional development

The Commission heard evidence that professional development in the sector appears piecemeal and fragmented, with no requirement for continuing professional development to maintain registration or accreditation.⁶⁵ An exception to this is men's behaviour change contact workers and facilitators, who are required to attend at least four professional development activities each year.⁶⁶

Access to training was described as ad hoc, typically consisting of brief, one-off programs. The Commission was told that agencies are not given adequate funding for training and because agencies do not have the funding and staff to backfill positions, training is very likely to be deferred by agencies dealing with a crisis.⁶⁷

There are specific barriers for rural and regional practitioners. Women's Health Loddon Mallee noted that 'it is vitally important for workers from small communities and small organisations to be actively supported to attend conferences, forums and professional development' since these 'build, knowledge, commitment and collaboration'.⁶⁸

In its submission, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria noted that while there is an increased demand for training there is no sustainable strategy for ongoing delivery.⁶⁹ DVRCV recommended the development of a strategy that incorporates capability benchmarks, targets participants' skills and experiences and allocates sufficient training time, stating that ongoing and consistent funding is essential.⁷⁰ Ms Maguire, stated:

I think supporting practice is the particular key. I think delivering training is one useful function, and I think it is a function—that is something that [DVRCV] has been playing a role in for a number of years now. But training is not the only component of workforce development, and I think ongoing practice support and having a well-resourced system that allows professionals to have that time away from case management and to do that level of support is very useful.⁷¹

The concept of mentoring and supervision, as part of professional development, was a consistent theme in evidence. Ms Ilana Jaffe, Project Coordinator at Inner North West Primary Care Partnership noted:

The main thing I would talk about would be supervision, because it's great just to send a worker off to training, but if that's not then incorporated into your day-to-day practice and monitored and critical feedback provided if it is not managed well, then there's no point in training, to be honest. The policies and procedures of organisations and the frameworks of organisations need to incorporate all of those elements.⁷²

The Australia Services Union submitted that giving people opportunities to lead is very important:

There are limited opportunities for leadership roles in a non-management capacity in this sector. This leads to low morale and highly experienced employees leaving the sector.⁷³

In other areas of specialist expertise there are more programs to support front-line workers—for example, in the Department of Health and Human Services, the Office of Professional Practice supports the child protection workforce. Ms Tracy Beaton, Chief Practitioner and Director of the Office of Professional Practice, DHHS, gave some examples of their work:

We do a number of things which is about supporting front-line practitioners. So we might do complex case reviews. We might be called in to have a look at something. There might be some themes happening in a division and they might want the office to develop some resource and work alongside people to look at that. We do a lot of reflective practice, so where it is that we are trying to critically analyse what it is that's happened. For example, we might put a genogram up, have a look back through the family, how people understand that, is there anything missing, what else could we have looked at, where else might we consider we need to go with this family, what are the options for this family and so on, to large-scale trainings ...⁷⁴

The Child Protection Operating Model, which significantly restructured the child protection workforce, commenced on 5 November 2012.⁷⁵ It saw the introduction of advanced practice roles at the divisional level, with divisional teams comprising child protection practitioners, advanced child protection practitioners, senior child protection practitioners, team managers, practice leaders and principal practitioners.

The principle applied was that 'more experienced practitioners were given carriage of the most complex cases and increased support was made available in each team for less experienced practitioners'.⁷⁶

The Commission was told that the benefits of divisional roles that are aligned to differing levels of experience include that they provide for a 'systemic understanding of the workforce needs to support improved practice'.⁷⁷ The advanced practice roles have been credited with increasing retention rates among child/protection practitioners.⁷⁸

Workplace stress and vicarious trauma

Domestic Violence Victoria noted that family violence work is stressful, emotional and fatiguing.⁷⁹ This stress is exacerbated by difficulties accessing services and resources for their clients, lack of time to respond to the complexities of client needs, and limited access to supervision.⁸⁰

The majority of people working in this sector do so because of their personal commitment to address violence against women and this increases their personal investment in the work they do with individual women. This increases the risk of vicarious trauma for specialist family violence workers and the need for organisational support and professional supervision.⁸¹

These views are consistent with previous studies that found that personal commitment to helping others and human rights are prime motivators for seeking employment in family violence services.⁸² The Commission was told increasing workloads, limited resources and marginalisation by other systems demotivate workers in the sector.⁸³ The impact of these constraints on employee wellbeing and organisational health was also highlighted in submissions:

There is a huge demand on our system, continually and with very little or no reprieve ... Our intake workers are faced with the decision every day to triage the 2 most serious cases out of the 15 calls that we could work with which [we] receive every week. Additionally, we receive many calls each day which don't make it past the Intake desk and either have to be refused any service or receive a minimum service due to 'not being serious enough' ... The workers feel they can't do the job properly ... The workers constantly listen to stories of horrific trauma and this translates into compassion fatigue ... They are constantly frustrated due to broken systems, and feel hopeless and helpless in their role. Managers continually feel over burdened by inability to support staff adequately.⁸⁴

Vicarious trauma was a consistent theme in evidence across both family violence services and justice responses, including courts and police.⁸⁵ This was echoed by providers of men's behaviour change programs. For example, Bethany Community Care reported that staff were predisposed to suffer from vicarious trauma as a result of working with men who use violence.⁸⁶

It was recognised that providing 'counselling, debriefing and other support programs builds resilience, improves emotional wellbeing and can address secondary or vicarious trauma'.⁸⁷ Workers in other fields such as sexual assault, social work and counselling often receive regular clinical supervision and debriefing.⁸⁸ It was submitted, however, that this is not the case in family violence services. Gippsland Centre Against Sexual Assault noted this contrast:

We notice burnout as a significant factor in the Family Violence sector, this impacts service delivery. In contrast sexual assault support services (CASA's) have relatively high retention rates whilst managing material that correlates to the most violent end of the violence continuum (Braaf, 2011; Australian Women's Coalition, 2010). I believe the CASA's have needed to develop strong clinical governance and structures that support staff wellbeing as trauma is the core business. Over time CASAs have experienced and develop strategies for prevention and management of vicarious trauma and organisational trauma.⁸⁹

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria also submitted that 'consideration needs to be given to the cumulative impact of family violence on those who work in this area and how to manage this on an ongoing basis'.⁹⁰ In addition to external counselling and support through the Employee Assistance Program and critical incident debriefing, Court Services Victoria has started a vicarious trauma project, involving representatives from across the jurisdictions.⁹¹

Other workplace safety issues relate to the nature of the work. It was reported that family violence outreach workers generally work alone, particularly in rural and regional settings. Services reported that family violence workers are often subject to abuse and aggression in the course of their work, including when supporting women and children at court.⁹² The Australian Services Union reported that among its members:

Limited resources means that employees are forced to “choose” unsafe work practices due to resource shortages such as driving their own cars, on their own, to out-postings which are often dangerous. They may be faced by threats or actual violence by the perpetrator of the client they are supporting.⁹³

Workforce planning and development

Industry and employee bodies argued that a comprehensive workforce strategy for the family violence sector is needed to address workforce concerns. The lack of a workforce strategy was lamented by Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee, for example. The committee reflected that a key plank of the mid-2000 family violence reforms was specialisation as a strategy for achieving best practice. However, this was not accompanied by adequate investment or a comprehensive workforce development strategy, so ‘the intended benefits of a specialist response have not been fully realised’.⁹⁴

Domestic Violence Victoria and others similarly called for a workforce strategy.⁹⁵ No To Violence stated that ‘the lack of a workforce development strategy for specialist men’s family violence practitioners, including bicultural workers, constrains the scope and confidence that stakeholders have in this work’.⁹⁶

Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria raised concerns about the lack of training requirements and minimum standards of competency for different professionals responding to family violence.⁹⁷ It also recommended that the Victorian Government develop a comprehensive workforce strategy to improve consistency in Victoria’s family violence service system.⁹⁸

The supporters of such a strategy argued that it should be comprehensive and inclusive. For example, the Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch recommended that the strategy be facilitated and supported by the Victorian Government and include:

- (a) Training and development, including strategies to address current barriers faced by employees to participate in training and development.
- (b) Strategies to improve attraction, recruitment and selection of staff.
- (c) Developing case studies for best practice conditions of employment.
- (d) Resources and frame works for improved support and supervision.
- (e) Retention strategies for existing experienced staff.
- (f) Career development and pathways.⁹⁹

Among other elements of a comprehensive workforce strategy that were identified in submissions were:

- ▷ mandatory units on understanding violence against women and family violence as part of the core curriculum for social work, psychology, education, nursing and other relevant degrees transferring existing professional development and training courses to meet certificate, diploma and bachelor level qualification requirements
- ▷ attraction and recruitment of suitably qualified graduates and identifying strategies to ensure that working in the family violence sector is seen as a desirable career choice
- ▷ peer support and mentoring structures
- ▷ evaluation to assess the effect of workforce development strategies on work practice and service outcomes.¹⁰⁰

Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria stated that a workforce strategy needs to incorporate and review the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (also known as the Common Risk Assessment Framework or the CRAF), including developing family violence risk assessment competency benchmarks to 'identify core vocational competencies required across sectors in relation to the operation of risk assessment, detailing the levels of capability required depending on service or sectors involved, or the nature of service delivery'.¹⁰¹ In addition to family violence specialist services DVRCV identified statutory agencies; courts, judiciary and legal services; and other sectors that regularly work with clients experiencing family violence (such as maternal and child health, homelessness, mental health and hospital staff) as target groups for such benchmarking.¹⁰²

The Victorian Government has recognised the need for such a strategy in the past. The 2007 KPMG survey of the community-managed housing and support sector, including family violence services, was commissioned by the (then) Department of Human Services as the first step in the 'development of a workforce strategy to improve the qualifications, skills and career pathways of workers in the sector'.¹⁰³ The KPMG survey was part of an 'overall strategy to develop an industry plan for the community-managed housing and support sector,' which received $2.1 million in funding over three years.¹⁰⁴ To the Commission's knowledge, however, the workforce strategy and associated plan were not produced.

Supporters of a comprehensive workforce strategy also argued that efforts to do with workforce planning and development must address current and future requirements of workforce sectors such as prevention practitioners.¹⁰⁵ The submission from nine leading organisations noted:

The current 'demand' for initiatives to prevent violence against women – from sporting clubs, schools, workplaces, local governments and other sectors – greatly exceeds 'supply' of an adequately skilled workforce that is capable of designing, delivering and monitoring effective and safe interventions. Significant investment in workforce and organisational development and capacity building is required to meet existing demand safely and effectively, and essential if we are to expand the reach of current primary prevention activities across Victoria.¹⁰⁶

Specific client groups identified included older people; women with disabilities; lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex Victorians; those from culturally and linguistically diverse communities; children and young people; and Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples. Drummond Street Services recommended:

A defined and specific workforce training and capacity building strategy for LGBTIQ sensitivity practices which includes; the legal profession, counselling professionals, family dispute resolution practitioners, women's refuge staff and the homelessness sector. These professional groups are the most likely to intersect with families experiencing family violence as a result they need to improve their ability to respond to the emotional, psychological and physical needs of families at immediate risk of family violence.¹⁰⁷

The importance of any future workforce development strategy incorporating the specific needs of rural, regional and remote Victoria was also stressed.¹⁰⁸

Police, courts and legal services

Victoria Police

Specialised education and training are essential for effective police responses to family violence.¹⁰⁹ The evidence the Commission received on recent advancements in police training and current education and training arrangements is discussed in Chapter 14. Briefly, many submissions and participants in community consultations called for improved family violence training for police in relation to:

- ▷ understanding the nature and types of family violence and the harms it causes¹¹⁰
- ▷ identifying the primary aggressor¹¹¹
- ▷ understanding and sensitively responding to the needs of all population groups including:
 - ▷ people experiencing elder abuse¹¹²
 - ▷ culturally and linguistically diverse populations¹¹³
 - ▷ people with mental health or other disabilities¹¹⁴
 - ▷ the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities.¹¹⁵

The 2013 Review of the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence noted that 'only a limited amount of police practice can be taught through desk-based or formal learning' and that 'on-the-job, practical application is by far the most important element to build member confidence in attending incidents'.¹¹⁶ It further noted that supervision is critical to consistent and quality police practice.¹¹⁷

Courts

Courts are considered in detail in Chapter 16. The present chapter focuses on workforce issues relevant to the Magistrates' Court of Victoria.

In Chapter 16, the Commission described the role of the courts, and the practitioners who work in that setting. Submissions and consultations also discussed the training available to people working in the courts system; some of the initiatives to improve knowledge and practice around family violence by judicial members and court staff; and victims' perspectives on their experiences with that system. This is described below.

The Commission notes that, although family violence accounts for a sizeable proportion of court workloads, the majority of magistrates, registrars and court support staff are not specialised and work across all of the Magistrates' Court's jurisdictions. There are, however, some specialist positions in the Family Violence Court Division (at Ballarat and Heidelberg courts) and the Specialist Family Violence Services courts.

Experiences with the Magistrates' Court

Differing views were expressed about the attitudes, knowledge and skills of magistrates in relation to family violence. Women's Legal Service Victoria noted:

Magistrate interaction with victims can have a real impact on whether victims feel empowered or disempowered in the court process. Consistency in court craft and decision-making varies across the state.¹¹⁸

The Commission was told that, while some magistrates understand the dynamics of family violence, others either do not have sufficient experience in family violence matters or appear not to understand its features or its impact on victims.¹¹⁹ Research has referred to a 'diversity deficit' among Victorian magistrates and suggested that 'greater diversity in the magistracy is necessary to maintain community confidence'.¹²⁰ Submissions also noted that family violence specialisation and training for magistrates has had a positive impact:

There has been a notable shift in our region of late in the practice and commentary or reasons provided by Magistrates. Some have cited family violence training they have been provided with. Examples are Magistrate's [sic] increased sensitivity to women who may be being coerced into revoking orders, or respondents citing lack of contact with their children as to motivation of an applicant despite no efforts being made by a respondent to obtain contact by consent or court order.¹²¹

A number of submissions raised concerns about the ability of magistrates to understand and respond to diverse applicants and respondents in family violence matters, such as Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people, older people and people with disabilities.¹²² This issue has gained increasing prominence internationally and in Australia as the value of education to make the judiciary more aware of the barriers faced by victims from these groups is acknowledged.¹²³

In the ANROWS (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) survey described shortly, the majority of judicial officers felt they understood the dynamics of family violence, including its impact on people of different cultures.¹²⁴

Judicial education

The need for judicial education on family violence was a theme in submissions and has been highlighted in recent Australian reports. For example, the joint Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions' report Family Violence—A National Legal Response included recommendations for the family court system and magistrates' courts.¹²⁵

These issues were also explored in a state-of-knowledge paper prepared by ANROWS.¹²⁶ This included a voluntary survey of Queensland and Victorian magistrates. Thirty-eight participants were from Victoria. Across all participants 48.5 per cent said their primary work was family violence matters.¹²⁷ The survey found that, of the 47 participants in Queensland and Victoria:

- ▷ 96 per cent agreed or strongly agreed that they understood the dynamics of domestic and family violence
- ▷ 74.5 per cent agreed or strongly agreed that they were confident that they were able to engage and convey key messages to perpetrators in their courtrooms
- ▷ 72 per cent agreed or strongly agreed that they felt confident their decisions in court help make children safer
- ▷ 77 per cent agreed or strongly agreed that they understood family violence impacts for people from different cultures.¹²⁸

Of the 40 participants who responded to the relevant question, almost one in three agreed or strongly agreed that magistrates in their jurisdictions receive sufficient training in domestic and family violence to make informed decisions. Approximately 38 per cent had not had any family violence training in the previous year. Eleven participants had one session and 14 had between two and five sessions. Of the 39 participants who responded to questions on the constraints to taking up training, 28.5 per cent agreed or strongly agreed that time constraints prevented them from participating in domestic and family violence training, and 23 per cent agreed or strongly agreed that location was a constraint.¹²⁹

The Judicial College of Victoria has published and periodically updates the Family Violence Bench Book, a dedicated resource for magistrates and other judicial officers on family violence-related issues.¹³⁰ In its submission JCV recommended that funding be made available to update this resource.¹³¹ During this Commission the Commonwealth Government also announced funding for a national Family Violence Bench Book for judges across Australia, as recommended by the Australian Law Reform Commission and the NSW Law Reform Commission.¹³² This online resource will cover civil and criminal laws in federal, state and territory jurisdictions.¹³³ It is being developed by the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration and the University of Queensland and is expected to be available in June 2017.¹³⁴

In 2014 JCV began a specialised education project with the Magistrates' Court of Victoria to enhance magistrates' professional development. The 'program aims to deliver best practice education for Victorian magistrates in the hearing, determining and sentencing of family violence matters'.¹³⁵ In that year the JCV conducted a family violence program for magistrates, which included a specific session on the CRAF. Eighty-four magistrates attended, including six magistrates who sit exclusively in the Children's Court.¹³⁶

The Judicial College Victoria 2016 prospectus includes programs on family violence, such as a two-day program examining 'the challenges for magistrates confronting family violence matters in court'.¹³⁷ The program will cover causes of violence against women; how to increase the safety of women and children (in-depth risk assessment skills training); perpetrator accountability in the courtroom; men's behaviour change programs; cultural issues confronting people from immigrant and refugee backgrounds, family violence in Aboriginal communities; women with disabilities; and the victim's response to trauma (mental health outcomes, courtroom presentation). Other programs include a specific focus on Aboriginal peoples and family violence in the Koori Twilight Series.¹³⁸

In addition, the Magistrates' Court's internal professional development consists of initial one-on-one induction and mentoring for all new magistrates, based on that person's professional experience—followed by regular whole-of-court professional development days on 'aspects of family violence theory, practice, legislative and legal developments'.¹³⁹

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria submission explained the role of specialist family violence magistrates noting that 'having specially trained and assigned magistrates has strengthened the leadership across the MCV in the management of family violence matters'.¹⁴⁰

Qualifications and training for other magistrates' court staff

In its submission the Judicial College of Victoria proposed that a 'core' family violence curriculum relevant to judicial officers from all courts, supplemented by jurisdiction-specific education on the issues particular to each court, be developed. In addition, it proposed a Judicial Research Hub to support court-led research into family violence issues across the courts system—to support 'ongoing judicial education on family violence and contribute to public policy responses to family violence'.¹⁴¹ The Magistrates' and Children's Courts endorsed these recommendations.¹⁴²

The Magistrates' and Children's Courts also recommended funding to continue the development of a comprehensive family violence learning and development package, targeted to match the roles and functions of court registry and support staff, and support the professional development of state judicial officers, court registry and support staff in family law, particularly in the context of family violence and child protection. Statewide access to counselling, debriefing and support to ensure the wellbeing of judicial officers and court staff were recommended.¹⁴³

Registrars

Registrars of the Magistrates' Court perform a wide range of tasks. These include in-court (bench clerk) duties, client inquiries (telephone and counter), and back-of-office administrative responsibilities.¹⁴⁴ When a person attends the court to make a family violence intervention order application the registrar can assist them with completing the application form. In specialist courts, family violence registrars are employed and work 'alongside the judiciary, court registrars, support workers, police, legal services and other support services to effectively manage cases involving victims and perpetrators of family violence'.¹⁴⁵

The 2015 Landscapes of Violence report found positive and negative experiences with registrars and noted with concern wide variations in practice because the 'encounter with the registrar can shape women's subsequent experiences of court, particularly if the registrar is the first stranger with whom they discuss their abuse'.¹⁴⁶

In the Commission's community consultations, registrars were described as 'a critical point where a lot of extra support could be added'.¹⁴⁷ The Commission also heard about the value of professional support and debriefing for registrars including due to the risk of vicarious trauma that can affect staff across the family violence system described above. Ms Karen Field, Specialist Family Violence Service Registrar at Sunshine Magistrates' Court stated:

I think that better support services (such as more supervision and debriefing) for registrars should be implemented. This professional support is given to (for example) applicant support workers, but nothing is provided to the registry staff ... I think there is a risk that staff can suffer vicarious trauma if they are not properly supported, with less experienced staff members particularly at risk.¹⁴⁸

Dedicated family violence registrars work at the specialist family violence service and family violence division courts. They were described as the 'linchpin' of these courts and specialised induction programs are provided for these staff.¹⁴⁹ Many submissions focused on the benefits of specialist family violence registrars and recommended they be expanded to more magistrates' courts.¹⁵⁰

Registrars are recruited and trained through the Magistrates' Court Trainee Court Registrar program, which is open to people who 'have VCE/HSC (or equivalent), tertiary course or work experience in a relevant field'.¹⁵¹ Participants complete a Certificate in Court Services, which is delivered in-house by Court Services Victoria.¹⁵² Approximately 40 to 50 trainee court registrars complete the certificate each year.¹⁵³

CRAF training was provided to all magistrate court registrars on the commencement of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic).¹⁵⁴ The current Certificate in Court Services includes a specific family violence subject on providing crisis intervention and support for those experiencing domestic and family violence, which is inclusive of the CRAF.¹⁵⁵ There are also family violence components in the workplace-based subjects for staff working in the family violence intervention order registry—which includes bench clerking in intervention order proceedings, processing court orders, making appointments for intervention orders, observing the serving of documents, processing notices, providing advice to parties and observing interviews between an applicant and a registrar.¹⁵⁶

After completing this two-year program, trainees may be appointed as Qualified Court Registrars.¹⁵⁷ Non-specialist registrars are Victoria Public Service grade 3 positions.¹⁵⁸ Specialist family violence registrars are Victorian Public Service grade 4 positions.¹⁵⁹ In Chapter 16 the Commission makes recommendations regarding the role and qualifications of court staff.

Applicant and respondent workers

At the time of writing there are nine applicant support workers and seven respondent support workers in magistrates' courts. These roles are VPS 3 positions. They are being extended to every headquarter court and Moorabbin Magistrates' Court.¹⁶⁰ Workers in these roles must have 'relevant qualifications in welfare, social work, psychology, behavioural sciences, or other related field, and experience working with people who have perpetrated family violence'.¹⁶¹ However, no specific qualification is mandated.

All support workers are required to complete Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria's CRAF training when they commence their roles.¹⁶²

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria advised the Commission that they are finalising a comprehensive induction program for these positions. Applicant support workers will be also trained in conducting risk assessments and advocacy. Respondent support workers training will include engaging respondents in conversation, conducting eligibility assessments and explaining the consequences of breaching a family violence intervention order.¹⁶³

The Family Violence Programs and Initiatives Unit at the William Cooper Justice Centre (part of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria) is developing best practice standards and guidelines for the expansion of applicant and respondent workers, including a training schedule and plan for family violence registrars and support workers.¹⁶⁴

Other staff at all the magistrates' courts (such as administrative and support staff, and coordinators/listing staff) receive information about the definition of family violence, purpose of the Family Violence Protection Act, common terms, relationships covered by the Act, nature of intervention orders and the court's response to family violence as part of their induction.¹⁶⁵ The Magistrates' Court of Victoria's Family Violence Unit is working together with its Learning and Development Unit to develop a general training package for all staff across the court, including refresher training.¹⁶⁶

Legal practitioners

Legal practitioners are considered in detail in Chapter 16. This chapter focuses on workforce issues relevant to them.

Experiences with legal practitioners

Victims of family violence frequently described having negative experiences when dealing with the legal profession. The Commission was told that many lawyers displayed a limited understanding of the dynamics of family violence, which compounded victim trauma. Victims said:

I have been humiliated, degraded and been in tears all because of a solicitor that does not understand what family violence is and a system that hasn't even got any common sense.¹⁶⁷

He was a bully. He was ignorant of family violence and gave me misinformation and bad, bad, bad advice ... I felt like he didn't listen or understand my concerns ...¹⁶⁸

The Commission heard that:

- ▷ processes and procedures were not adequately explained to victims¹⁶⁹
- ▷ lawyers questioned the veracity of their client's allegations against perpetrators¹⁷⁰
- ▷ women were encouraged by their lawyers to accept terms that were not in their best interests¹⁷¹

There were however good experiences:

This lawyer provided a range of assistance which helped my daughter feel much more confident and safer. She referred her for some property law assistance, to counselling, made [an] application for victims of crime compensation and compiled a case (which was successful) to argue for a 5 year intervention order.¹⁷²

The need for family violence training

The need for lawyers to have family violence training was identified by the Law Institute of Victoria as important, particularly for lawyers in family law and child protection.¹⁷³ It was also suggested by Victoria Legal Aid that training more broadly would assist to change cultural in the profession:

Just as in the sexual assault space, training that also addresses cultural change and an understanding of the broader context of family violence offending will ensure all lawyers are sensitive to the complex and varied presentation of family violence victims and accused.¹⁷⁴

The Federation of Community Legal Centres raised concerns about the expertise of private lawyers who may be engaged in rural areas where there is greater potential for the body that provides duty lawyer services (a community legal centre or Victoria Legal Aid) to have a conflict in representing a particular person so that the person cannot be assisted by them.¹⁷⁵ It recommended that specialist family violence legal services be funded to train private lawyers, including in risk assessment and in legal issues arising from family violence such as family law, credit and debt and homelessness.¹⁷⁶

The Commission heard that family violence ‘has not featured as part of the formal training of lawyers at all’.¹⁷⁷ The Commission heard that family violence is not widely offered as a stand-alone subject in law schools and is not mandatory for practising lawyers. Instead the topic is likely to be dispersed across a number of subjects such as family law, criminal law and children and the law. Some law schools offer specific subjects—for example Monash University offers an externship in a family violence legal clinic and RMIT Law has a postgraduate course unit on working with family violence contexts within justice environments.¹⁷⁸

Practical Legal Training

In Victoria, once a person has graduated from university with either a Bachelor of Law or Juris Doctor they are required to undertake a Graduate Diploma of Legal Practice or legal traineeship, to enable them to apply for a legal practising certificate.¹⁷⁹ Legal traineeships or graduate programs are offered by private firms across the state where graduates are exposed to different areas of the law prior to specialising in a particular practice area.¹⁸⁰ The primary providers of the GDLP in Victoria are Australian National University, Leo Cussen Centre for Law and College of Law.

The College of Law program is a Graduate Diploma in Practical Legal Training and includes as electives family law and criminal practice.¹⁸¹ However, there is no specific training provided to law graduates about family violence either in terms of underlying causes of family violence, how it may affect people, the interrelation of the different courts, fields of law and jurisdiction that as a whole constitutes the current family violence system in Victoria, skills about how to engage with people who have experienced or are at risk of experiencing family violence or how to develop skills as a lawyer to limit the extent to which lawyers suffer from vicarious trauma.

The Leo Cussen program consists of the Practical Training Course (Graduate Diploma in Legal Practice).¹⁸² As with the College of Law, there is no specific training provided about family violence.

The Australian National University also offers a Graduate Diploma in Legal Practice.¹⁸³ There does not appear to be any specific training provided in relation to family violence.

Source: Law Institute of Victoria.

Continuing professional development

The Law Institute of Victoria provided a summary to the Commission of some of the professional development opportunities available, noting that at the time of preparing its submission most of the training that was available focused on particular aspects of family violence (for example, the process of applying for or responding to family violence intervention orders; parenting cases with family violence or child protection proceedings) and was aimed at practitioners who predominantly worked in the Magistrates’ Court and/or with clients who were applying or responding to a family violence intervention order.¹⁸⁴

The LIV advised that it intends to include further training sessions around family violence in its 2016 program, including cross-jurisdictional education seminars.¹⁸⁵ Topics being considered include CRAF training, financial and economic abuse, effects of family violence on a witnesses giving evidence, technology-perpetrated family violence and effects on children from being exposed to family violence, including suitable parenting orders and the child’s best interests.¹⁸⁶

Some practitioners also develop particular knowledge and awareness of family violence dynamics during the course of their work: ‘... it’s been something that’s evolved, if you will, organically lawyer by lawyer, but it’s not systemic and we certainly are not required to do it.’¹⁸⁷

The Commission heard that one of the challenges in providing continuing professional development on family violence is engaging legal practitioners when the topic does not appear to cover their area of practice specifically. However, ‘[l]ike the broader community, the legal community is increasingly aware of the impact of family violence.’¹⁸⁸ The Law Institute of Victoria is working with practitioners to highlight the connection between family violence and their day-to-day practice.¹⁸⁹

Victoria Legal Aid Family Violence Panel requirements

Practitioners who wish to be on the Family Violence Panel to receive work from Victoria Legal Aid have to meet requirements of specialisation. They must have:

- ▷ two years’ recent experience predominantly practising in at least one of VLA’s relevant practice areas (which include family violence, family law and child protection among others)
- ▷ had personal carriage of at least 10 intervention order matters in the Magistrates’ Court within the last 24 months and submitted a written outline of how the practitioner prepared one of these intervention order matters for contested hearing
- ▷ submitted a written outline of one family violence intervention order matter that the practitioner has had personal carriage of within the last 24 months, that has impacted on, or been relevant within, a family law or child protection matter that the client was also involved in
- ▷ completed at least three continuous professional development points covering child-related family law topics, within the last twelve months, or have completed CRAF training within the last 36 months.¹⁹⁰

Family violence duty lawyer training initiatives

Training packages are available for community legal centre and legal aid lawyers who act as family violence duty lawyers at magistrates’ courts. Victoria Legal Aid offers in-house training to their duty lawyers, delivered in collaboration with No To Violence. It includes content on working with respondents in a way that does not collude with or condone violence-supporting attitudes.¹⁹¹

Victoria Legal Aid also provides family violence training to its criminal law team.¹⁹² There is also a detailed family violence sub-program in the VLA Practice Essentials course and in the New Lawyers Program.¹⁹³ Continuing professional development courses delivered by VLA also include specific content on family violence.¹⁹⁴

Women’s Legal Service Victoria trains its staff and other community legal service lawyers working as duty lawyers.¹⁹⁵ It has two training packages on family violence. The first package is on working with women who have experienced trauma.¹⁹⁶ The second package is training for community legal centre lawyers called ‘Safer-Families’. It includes three-day training for family violence lawyers who act for applicants.¹⁹⁷

Family law practitioners

The Law Institute of Victoria told the Commission that in preparing its submission it identified:

... a lack of training available that was tailored to private family law practitioners or those who practice exclusively in the family courts. There was also limited training available about the family violence system as a whole as most focused on one aspect of a family violence matter and few training programs explored how the different courts and jurisdictions interact with each other as a whole.¹⁹⁸

It stated that the limited training on the interaction among courts was particularly concerning since many clients have concurrent matters in more than one court, including: family violence intervention orders in the Magistrates' Court; parenting and/or property orders in the family courts; child protection proceedings in the Children's Court where a child is at risk if a parent cannot protect them because of family violence; and the criminal courts, because of a criminal charge arising from a police family violence incident or a family violence intervention order being breached.¹⁹⁹

The LIV offers an Accredited Specialist program for family lawyers twice yearly. It is also considering introducing family violence awareness (in particular risk screening) as a required assessment area for accredited family law specialists for its next program in 2017. It submitted that '[t]his would be an important step to establish a level of family violence knowledge that the profession can use as a benchmark to work towards as they progress through their career'.²⁰⁰

Family violence-related training and education is available to family lawyers through the Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia. These include sessions at the Biennial National Family Law Conference; workshops as part of the Independent Children's Lawyer Training Program; National Family Law Intensives that examine significant decisions by the Family Court, including the Federal Circuit Court; a section on family violence in the Best Practice Guidelines for Lawyers Doing Family Law Work; and a specific project on the Family Court risk assessment tool for the separating families—the Detection of Overall Risks Screen.²⁰¹

Training aimed at disciplines that work in family law is also offered through the online Avert Family Violence training program. This training was developed by the Australian Institute of Social Relations, a division of Relationships Australia South Australia. The training aims to provide workers at all levels in the family law system 'with a sound and practical understanding of family violence and to promote a stronger capacity within the family law system for multidisciplinary collaboration'.²⁰² The package targets lawyers, judicial officers, counsellors, psychologists, social workers, legal advisers, court staff (including family report writers), family consultants, family dispute-resolution practitioners and child contact service workers. The training has a general intensive program and specific programs for these groups.²⁰³

Locally, the Law Institute of Victoria advised the Commission that as well as developing information to assist family lawyers to advise their clients on how to navigate the family violence system as whole, it is also looking at 'introducing family violence awareness (in particular risk screening) as a required training area for accredited family law specialists for its next program in 2017'.²⁰⁴ It considers this is 'an important step to establish a level of family violence knowledge that the profession can use as a benchmark to work towards as they progress through their career'.²⁰⁵

Family law practice is discussed further in Chapter 24.

Workers in non-family violence specific services

Workers in areas such as health, education, youth, drug and alcohol, corrections and child protection services may have disclosures of family violence made to them by victims. Perpetrators may also disclose their use of violence or practitioners may become aware of the violence and need to respond appropriately.

The Commission heard that psychologists, social workers, psychotherapists and generalist casework counsellors receive very little training in family violence in the course of obtaining foundational qualifications. No To Violence submitted that 'As a result, the potential for one-to-one interventions with family violence perpetrators to cause harm and accentuate risk is significant'. It was concerned that 'the vast majority of this one-to-one work is being conducted without any associated partner support, is devoid of interagency risk assessment and risk management contexts, and without great care is likely to be collusive with perpetrators' violence-supporting narratives'.²⁰⁶

Health workforce

The health system is considered in detail in Chapter 19. This section summarises workforce issues relevant to the health system.

Chapter 19 discusses the role of the universal health service system and the pivotal role that health professionals play in identifying family violence and getting victims and perpetrators plugged into the services they need. Health professionals are often a first point of disclosure, have the trust of patients and have a wide geographic reach. They may also have to respond to injuries caused by family violence, for example a dentist may have to treat a woman who has lost teeth in a violent assault.

The Commission heard, however, that there is little education provided in undergraduate or other courses for the health professions that directly speaks to family violence and 'so clinicians are not trained to manage this complex issue.'²⁰⁷ For example, The Royal Women's Hospital submitted:

Family violence is a common but invisible issue in health care in Victoria ... This pattern of invisibility begins in the undergraduate education of health professionals. As far as the Women's is aware, family violence is not part of core curriculum in the undergraduate training of health professionals or social workers in any university in Australia. Australian trained doctors, nurses, midwives, social workers and other allied health professionals therefore begin providing clinical care without being sensitised to the prevalence and dynamics of family violence, informed about its health impacts, trained to recognise the signs or to respond safely and effectively to a disclosure.²⁰⁸

The Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children cited a review of Australian medical schools that shows that some have no specific content, some provide three hours and others do up to 12 hours of training on family violence issues.²⁰⁹ The Royal Women's Hospital told the Commission that in its role as a training hospital it includes violence against women in its orientation for nurse and midwife clinical placement, and submitted that something similar should be considered for other training hospitals, including training for junior doctors.²¹⁰

After graduation, the Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists offers doctors a training module on sexual assault, titled Medical Responses to Adults Who Have Experienced Sexual Assault. This module informs doctors about the health outcomes experienced by adults who have been sexually assaulted; scenarios to assist doctors to become familiar with signs alerting them to the possibility that sexual assault has occurred; self-learning tasks to explore responses to disclosure of sexual assault; a section on self-care for doctors; a list of contacts for referrals to sexual assault services; and a list of further resources and additional reading in specialist areas. This module does not have an external assessment component.²¹¹ There does not appear to be a similar resource specifically for family violence.

The Royal Australian College of General Practitioners sets the curriculum which forms the basis for assessing GPs' competence to practice in the Australian community.²¹² They submitted that 'the knowledge, skills and attributes of GPs recognized by the RACGP as fundamental to responding to and managing family and domestic violence are reflected throughout the Curriculum'.²¹³

The Royal College produces a resource called Abuse and Violence: Working with our Patients in General Practice (sometimes called the 'white book') and provides an online active learning module for GPs.²¹⁴ The College is also developing a decision-making pathway for working with perpetrators as an adjunct resource to the white book; it identified this as an area 'needing more attention across the sector'.²¹⁵ The College stated that:

Domestic and family violence can test a GP's professional skills to the limit, as there are often life threatening, physical, emotional and complex family and legal issues that require a high level of professionalism in order to successfully assist patients. GPs are expected to reflect on their own attitudes towards family and domestic violence in their training, and how these might impact and influence their management strategies.²¹⁶

The College also recommended increased funding to enable more accessible training for GPs in identifying and managing family violence; a greater emphasis on training for psychologists, social workers and psychiatrists, particularly in family violence counselling; expanding its active learning module to a wider group of health professionals; extending its focus to men, including those who use violence and to men and boys who have been exposed to family violence; and additional training in safeguarding children.²¹⁷

The Royal Australian College of Surgeons submitted that it 'supports programs that help to identify and support family violence victims, including training programs that improve the confidence and competency of health professionals to identify and care for people experiencing family violence.'²¹⁸

The Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists Victorian Branch noted that mental health professionals are not required to obtain specialist family violence training through the curriculum of medical undergraduates, postgraduate training for psychiatry trainees or continuous professional development.²¹⁹ They submitted that it should be mandatory for all mental health professionals to be trained in family violence.²²⁰

Education workforce

Ongoing learning and development on family violence also appears limited for the education workforce. Ms Gill Callister, Secretary, Department of Education and Training, gave evidence that the main training for teachers on family violence is through an online training module on teachers' mandatory reporting obligations to Child Protection.²²¹ The training module must be undertaken every year by all teachers and principals registered by the Victorian Institute of Teaching, and includes how to identify child abuse, family violence and neglect, how to manage disclosures and how to make a report.²²² The training module includes an explanation of family violence and of some of the physical and behavioural indicators of family violence.²²³

Primary school welfare officers, primary school nurses, secondary school nurses, student welfare coordinators, student support officers, chaplains and other pastoral care staff who are DET employees also have access to this module. It must be completed annually by all principals, teachers and staff registered to teach.²²⁴

Ms Callister noted that primary school nurses in two regions have been trained in the Common Risk Assessment Framework.²²⁵

The Commission did not hear any specific evidence on whether or not pre-service teacher training (the training teachers receive before they are qualified to teach) includes a component on family violence. After broadly reviewing publicly available materials, the Commission found that most tertiary courses in education did not mention family violence as a component of the course.

Child Protection and family services

Child Protection is considered in detail in Chapter 11. This section summarises the workforce issues relevant to Child Protection.

Improving child protection practitioners' understanding of family violence was a consistent theme in evidence.²²⁶ Family violence victims were often afraid of Child Protection and did not always report the violence because they were afraid they would lose their children.²²⁷ This was particularly so for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.²²⁸

People spoke of the need for more collaboration between Child Protection, Child FIRST-Integrated Family Services and the specialist family violence sector, and said that this requires all these services to change.²²⁹ Cultural change could be encouraged by cross-sector training for workers in all the systems which come into contact with children affected by family violence and integrated practice models that focus on the perpetrator and shift the burden away from the mother as the 'protective parent'.²³⁰

The Department of Health and Human Services described several initiatives that are discussed in Chapter 11. In summary these are:

- ▷ Training to improve understanding of family violence among child protection practitioners—for example, as part of the compulsory induction program known as ‘Beginning Practice’.²³¹ Family violence is also included in the Best Interest Case Practice Series for child protection staff.²³²
- ▷ In June 2014, senior child protection practitioners statewide were trained on effective responses to family violence by No To Violence and the Office of Professional Practice within DHHS.²³³ In June 2014, the specialist practice resource, Working With Families Where an Adult is Violent was published.²³⁴
- ▷ Ms Beaton stated that Cumulative Harm Specialist Practice Resource also provides practical advice to workers in the area of child protection.²³⁵
- ▷ The introduction in 2012 of advanced practitioner roles in Child Protection.²³⁶ (See the discussion earlier in this chapter on career path and professional development).
- ▷ Co-location of family violence specialists in child protection offices (under the 2015–16 budget commitment of $3.9 million for ‘child protection flexible responses’).²³⁷

Office of Professional Practice

The position of Principal Practitioner, now the Chief Practitioner, was established in 2006 to support the legislative reforms associated with new child protection legislation—the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 (Vic). The role of the chief practitioner is to act as the principal clinician and adviser on child protection practice in DHHS, set and monitor service delivery standards, and ‘develop modes of service delivery and to lead and promote a strong learning culture’.²³⁸

In 2009 and 2010, two additional statewide principal practitioners were employed to embed these reforms and to assist the principal practitioner. In 2010 the Office of the Principal Practitioner was also created to support these functions.²³⁹

The Office of Professional Practice was established in 2012 by the amalgamation of the Office of Senior Practitioner (Disability) and the Office of the Principal Practitioner.²⁴⁰ Its purpose is to create an environment that continually improves workforce capability to meet the needs of the Department of Health and Human Services’ clients.²⁴¹ The office is now made up of a chief practitioner and director, a senior practitioner—disability, an assistant director and two statewide principal practitioners.²⁴² The principal practitioners are responsible for practice leadership, which includes supporting front-line practitioners and programs, monitoring and reviewing practice; practice research and evaluation; promoting professional development and training; being the expert spokesperson on professional practice; and influencing policy and program design.²⁴³

The office supports a workforce of about 7330 people, including 1410 Child Protection staff, 417 Secure Services staff and 5500 Disability Services staff.²⁴⁴ Child protection practitioners, for example, can contact the office for advice and support on a case they are working on. This is in addition to the support practitioners receive from the principal practitioners and other professionals in their divisional teams. In some cases the office provides direct practice leadership to external services that work with departmental clients, for example Integrated Family Services or out-of-home care providers.²⁴⁵

There is no specific principal practitioner for family violence. However as noted above family violence is a critical component of practice leadership given the intersections between child protection and family violence.²⁴⁶

Other sectors

Family violence units within relevant departments

In the Department of Justice and Regulation, the Family Violence and Sexual Assault Unit leads the development and implementation of family violence and sexual assault policy. This team is in the Community Operations and Victims Support Agency—Criminal Justice, and comprises nearly seven full-time equivalent staff. Additionally, there is a legal policy officer in the Criminal Law Policy Unit who works on family violence (0.8 FTE), and three staff in Corrections Victoria who are dedicated to family violence work. DJR noted that while there are no staff in the Koori Justice Unit specifically dedicated to family violence, staff spend a significant amount of time on family violence matters, equivalent to a 0.3–0.4 FTE role.²⁴⁷

There is a specialist family violence unit in the Department of Health and Human Services, known as the Family Violence and Sexual Assault Team. Its functions relate to the design and delivery of family violence and sexual assault services. It comprises nearly eight full-time equivalent staff and an additional four temporary staff members, to respond to the Commission and delivery of the Victorian Government's election commitments. DHHS also analyses data and develops and coordinates policy, advice and strategy on family violence. These roles are spread across multiple areas of DHHS, centrally and at the divisional and local area levels.²⁴⁸

There is no specialist family violence unit, or staff dedicated to family violence, in the Department of Education and Training.²⁴⁹

The Commission heard that other service systems—each with their own specialisation—such as youth justice, drug and alcohol, disability, aged care, homelessness, mental health and the corrections system—need to enhance their capability to recognise family violence and work more effectively with victims and perpetrators.²⁵⁰ Three areas of issues were identified:

- ▷ Family violence skill development and guidance has been piecemeal across sectors.
- ▷ Knowledge transfer is hindered by ad hoc relationships across other specialist and family violence services.
- ▷ Different practice methodologies and philosophies ('it's not part of my work') create barriers to engaging with family violence.

Family violence skill development and guidance across sectors

Several submissions described a piecemeal approach to family violence skill development and guidance in their sectors. For example, the Victorian Alcohol and Drug Association noted variability in the confidence and skill levels of alcohol and drug treatment clinicians who seek to explore family violence issues with clients.²⁵¹ It is not mandatory to assess family violence issues in the drug treatment sector. However recent reforms have standardised assessment tools.²⁵² Optional modules in the new assessment tool include one to identify and record family violence and one that explores the impact of alcohol and drug use on family members.²⁵³

Concerns were also raised that mental health workers are not being trained to identify and respond appropriately to family violence.²⁵⁴ Cobaw Community Health submitted that 'Mental Health workers have a tendency to focus on the presenting symptoms and do not always apply a lens of systematic issues such as [f]amily [v]iolence.'²⁵⁵

The Department of Health and Human Services advised the Commission that while the department does not specifically fund family violence education or training activities, funding is provided for training priorities determined by local workforce training needs analysis and delivered through department-funded mental health and alcohol and drug training providers. Examples, included a number of courses delivered by the Bouverie Centre on topics such as trauma informed sensitive family practice; gender sensitivity in Victoria's mental health services and working systematically with sexual abuse. Other courses included addressing male perpetrated domestic violence (delivered by No To Violence) and domestic violence and childhood trauma.²⁵⁶

The Commission requested information from the Victorian Government about professional development regarding family violence for practitioners in human services, aside from that contained in the CRAF training undertaken between 2008 and 2010, and from 2011 to 2013. Documentation indicates that family violence is identified in a number of foundational courses for DHHS for example, it is listed as an important practice consideration in the Introduction to Disability Practice course.²⁵⁷ The Ready4work Disability Support Work Induction Resource Kit—which is available to government and non-government disability workers—also considers family violence.²⁵⁸ The Beginning Practice in Youth Justice course materials also includes content on family violence, including the Family Violence Protection Act 2008.²⁵⁹

Ad hoc relationships hinder knowledge transfer

Victorian Council of Social Service submitted that workers' limited understanding of the interconnection between drugs, alcohol, and mental health, and organisations' capacity to build workforce understanding and clinical skill is a barrier to responding to family violence. Workers in each sector needed to understand the others' role better, through targeted training and workforce development.²⁶⁰ Although there are many local relationships between services these are not systematised and are largely dependent on individuals or where there have been sustained efforts to integrate services.²⁶¹ Some formal multi-agency service partnerships were described in evidence, for example in justice/legal partnerships supported by funding from the Legal Services Board.²⁶²

Barriers created by different practice methodologies and philosophies

The Commission heard that family violence is not seen as a priority by all crisis homelessness and transitional housing providers.²⁶³ Similarly, within family violence services 'there is a need for an understanding of the kind of theoretical frameworks used' in child protection, drug and alcohol and mental health.²⁶⁴

The importance of interdisciplinary and shared approaches to learning was a key theme that arose from the evidence with some examples given of successful initiatives that had been short term. In 2008, for example, Swinburne University and Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria developed and delivered joint training for staff from disability and family violence services 'designed to implement cross-program and cross-sectoral learning' so that women with disabilities experiencing family violence received greater support from both disciplines.²⁶⁵ Approximately 20 sessions were held across Victoria but the training was discontinued.²⁶⁶

The inadequacies of focusing solely on short course training for those from disciplines other than family violence was identified in evidence. For example, Ms Lorna McNamara, Director of the Education Centre Against Violence in NSW, stated that:

... one-off training is fine if you are getting training in an area of expertise that you know and it's actually providing additional information. That can be quite useful. But, if you are training a workforce in an area that they are completely unfamiliar with, one-off training tends not to be held over time because the dynamics within their own workplaces will take precedence and it will lose its influence over time.²⁶⁷

On health and other workforce training, Ms McNamara criticised the train the trainer approach, which she described as 'another very flawed model, particularly where the content of the training is so vastly different to what is being delivered within the service stream'. Her experience was that 'Usually, a worker attends a two or three day training session, and is then expected to deliver and answer complex questions in an area where they have almost no expertise. This too often results in incorrect ideas and beliefs being reinforced instead of challenged'.²⁶⁸

Workforce education across sectors

The Education Centre Against Violence is a unit in New South Wales Health. It is responsible for developing the statewide workforce and providing training in how to identify and respond to adults, young people and children who have experienced sexual assault, domestic violence, Aboriginal family violence, and childhood physical and emotional abuse and neglect.²⁶⁹ ECAV trains government and non-government providers, for example non-government drug and alcohol services.²⁷⁰

Ms McNamara explained that ECAV is funded to:

... provide training, undertake research, run pilot programs, develop resources, provide clinical supervision and run training programs for both governmental agencies and non-governmental organisations (NGOs) with the aim to provide a whole of system response, not just a departmental or organisational response.²⁷¹

Ms McNamara told the Commission that many courses are provided to specific target groups for free and other services are provided at a subsidised rate.²⁷² ECAV has approximately 24 full-time employees (including its administrative workforce) and engages around 50 contractors.²⁷³

On family violence training, Ms McNamara said that ECAV:

... would train nurses, social workers, psychologists. We would have doctors attending – that includes medical doctors, GPs, psychiatrists, forensic specialists ... We have also provided training to Victims Services, which is part of the justice department, the Department of Public Prosecutions. We have shared training with Family and Community services, so delivered with them; and then broadly the NGO sector.²⁷⁴

Specialist family violence courses are provided by ECAV and it has developed and maintains a comprehensive suite of materials to support the family violence training modules.²⁷⁵ In its training a co-facilitation model is commonly used.²⁷⁶

ECAV also provides introductory and advanced courses on child-focused and therapeutic approaches to working with children. A four-day foundation course around domestic violence, which includes training about its effects on children, is offered and used by non-government organisations to train new workers.²⁷⁷ The ECAV is also developing qualification pathways 'to support an Aboriginal work force skilled in case management and counselling in the areas of sexual assault, family violence and child abuse'.²⁷⁸

It was put to the Commission that the ECAV's experience in training government and non-government agencies puts it in a unique position, providing a broad perspective across these different organisations. Ms McNamara stated that this has

... allowed us to see where the gaps are across the whole system and where inter-agency processes do not function optimally. We are then able to advise on that and develop broad reaching training solutions to address the gaps. Without this line of sight, gaps in service provision would result in further isolation and silencing of victims.²⁷⁹

In comparison, the Victorian Government model is not centralised. Ms Frances Diver, Deputy Secretary, Health Service Performance and Programs, Department of Health and Human Services stated that the department funds health services, registered training organisations and other organisations to deliver professional development. 'The department does not, however, directly deliver or mandate professional development initiatives for the health workforce'.²⁸⁰

Noting Ms McNamara's evidence that the ECAV can influence policy because it is in the NSW health department, Ms Diver reflected:

That's interesting, and I guess that's also about how the department interacts with the sector in terms of where they get their policy advice from to inform what policies would occur. So there's a little bit about working with the sector to make sure that the policies that government are going to put together are informed by best practice. Does that mean that we have to have training units sitting in the Department of Health and Human Services? I'm not sure that's the only way. It's working for New South Wales. Could it work for us? Possibly. But there are other ways of doing it as well. Probably a distributed model fits more with the model of service delivery in Victoria where the department holds a kind of planning, policy, funding role and the sector holds much more of a delivery role.²⁸¹

In Victoria, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria (a registered training organisation that receives funding from the Department of Health and Human Services) plays a somewhat similar role to ECAV.²⁸² It provides training and workforce development and produces resources to assist in the response to family violence. It does not, however, have designated status as a whole-of-government provider of family violence education. Instead it has been contracted by government to deliver specific training programs and initiatives including, for example, the training of the maternal and child health nurse workforce on the CRAF.²⁸³

The Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria and training provision

Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria is the major provider of family violence training programs to the government and non-government sectors in Victoria.²⁸⁴ It also collaborates with organisations such as No To Violence, Women's Legal Service Victoria, Centres Against Sexual Assault, Victoria Police and the Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria.²⁸⁵

In 2008, the Victorian Government contracted DVRCV and Swinburne University to design and deliver training for the CRAF.

Over the years, this training has been contracted by various government departments and supported through non-government grants. Further sessions have been funded by DHHS in 2015–16.²⁸⁶

Currently, three different training packages are available reflecting different professional roles and the levels of risk assessment outlined in the CRAF.²⁸⁷ Workers from a broad range of disciplines have participated, including practitioners from Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services, Child Protection, health services (including drug and alcohol and mental health), homelessness services, disability services, youth services, counsellors, Aboriginal services and those services working with people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.²⁸⁸

In addition to CRAF training, DVRCV provides training on working with children experiencing family violence, strengthening hospital responses to family violence and supporting women with disabilities experiencing family violence. It also provides nationally accredited training units that can be credited towards qualifications in vocational education training courses.²⁸⁹ Recently, DVRCV and Domestic Violence Victoria developed online eCRAF training programs.²⁹⁰

The way forward

Family violence affects the lives of tens of thousands of Victorians. Yet we have never had a comprehensive industry plan considering the workforce needs of the various systems that work with family violence or the implications for workers in other systems who have contact with victims and perpetrators, or who work in the area of primary prevention.²⁹¹

Family violence work is a human service and, like all human services, it is complex. However, as the rest of this report makes plain, for too long it has been treated as a marginal addition to our human services system. We must invest in the people who work directly with victims and perpetrators. They are fundamental to our success in stopping family violence.

In relation to specialist family violence services, the evidence shows that the sector has not had the benefit of a workforce development strategy or a comprehensive government approach. As a result the sector:

- ▷ involves multiple and diverse employers
- ▷ has difficulties recruiting and retaining people because of insecurity of employment (due to short-term funding), low remuneration, large workloads and vicarious trauma
- ▷ lacks clarity on the core competencies of its workforce as it has tried to adapt to the vagaries of funding and deal with excessive demand
- ▷ does not have consistent, clearly articulated and up-to-date professional standards or mandatory qualifications for practice
- ▷ does not have a consistent approach to workforce training, professional development and career progression because this activity is not sufficiently resourced in existing funding models
- ▷ relies on training sessions or courses as its principal method of learning and development. While opportunities to critically review and reflect on practice may exist in individual organisations delivering family violence services, there does not appear to be a sector-wide approach
- ▷ needs to build capability in the employment of—and service delivery to—diverse groups including women with disabilities, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex Victorians, older people, children and young people, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples and people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities
- ▷ has a workforce that experiences high rates of burn-out and vicarious trauma because of the nature of the work, pressures created by heavy demand, and frustration due to external factors that stop the client's needs from being met. Vicarious trauma is also experienced by others working with family violence victims and perpetrators, including police and court staff.

It is difficult to profile the current qualifications or salaries of the specialist family violence workforce as this information is not centrally collected. This is itself a barrier to effective workforce planning.

The Commission looked at the capabilities needed by specialist family violence practitioners, and other people who respond to victims or perpetrators of family violence, or work in areas in which disclosures of violence are more likely to occur. It considered how the capacity of each of these sectors can be strengthened.

The Commission also considered the capabilities needed by prevention practitioners. There are distinct competencies required for this group, who are using the lessons of successful public health promotion initiatives to inform and change behaviours. Their challenge is not simply to educate, but use evidence to change hearts and minds. The demand for their expertise is also growing and this cannot be met without a corresponding focus on developing this workforce.

This will all require planning. A comprehensive industry plan is essential. That plan needs to cover the specialist family violence sector and related services, including prevention practitioners. It should address ongoing issues that include capability, qualifications and associated remuneration, with a focus on building practice that is sensitive to diversity and rewards collaboration across sectors (not just services). As such a plan will take time to develop, some interim steps should be taken to promote better career paths in the specialist family violence sector.

Action cannot be confined to the specialist sector. The industry plan must also address family violence capability in key justice, health, education and human services areas in recognition that all these professions have a role to play.

Capability requirements of specialists

In considering workforce capability it is essential to first define the competencies and skills each practitioner needs. In Victoria there is no agreed understanding of what the core vocational competencies are in family violence work, or for associated professions that have contact with family violence victims and perpetrators.

Many different people are involved in responding to family violence—each with their own role and skill set. Investing in the capability of each requires a clear focus on who does what, how and when.

For most victims their experience of family violence is not just one-off; while some leave after the first instance of violence, most do not act immediately. We heard of women experiencing violence for months, years, and even decades before seeking assistance, with some never seeking assistance. The reasons for this are complex and mean that supporting women experiencing violence takes time and skill.

As described throughout this report, specialist family violence services work primarily with victims of family violence at medium to high-risk. This is their unique role.

Staff carrying out these functions need to be confident about discussing a victim's experience. They need to understand how the violence affects a victim's thinking and how it affects children, and know that the risk posed by the perpetrator is not static—it can escalate quickly. Comprehensive risk assessment and management is in itself a complex task with a high degree of responsibility. For some victims the circumstances are literally about life or death.

Some victims may require assistance over time, particularly if they do not want to leave the relationship. The challenge of this work is to balance a desire and duty of care to offer assistance that will keep the victim and her children safe, while respecting her choices.

Acting to safeguard someone's safety is common in the helping professions. In some cases (such as in Child Protection) this can occur without consent. However, in family violence this does not apply (nor do we recommend that it should). This means that workers need to deliver support that works towards safety without the power of enforcement. This is delicate and skilled. Getting this process wrong has consequences, including putting the victim and children's life at risk. It can also result in victims being exposed to violence for longer than they would have been had they been listened to and offered appropriate support.

Similarly, work with perpetrators requires an ability to assist the perpetrator to recognise their use of violence and work to change their behaviour, as well as making sure the victim is safe through partner contact work. This also requires nuance and sophistication in working with men from all walks of life who have differing levels of motivation, insight and trust.

Family violence practitioners also need to have a good working knowledge of the law, be able to navigate multiple systems and secure resources for their client in the face of demand pressures across other systems. They need to look beyond their own service—including providing secondary consultation or advice to non-family violence practitioners. As closer links are built between services this work will become even more complex.

In the past, the system responded to family violence through a particular and specialised workforce located within family violence services. While some specialist family violence services have worked well across some sectors, this has relied on individual relationships rather than being a feature of the way things work. While this workforce has established deep and specialised skills, the disadvantage is that other systems have not developed some of the skills needed to contribute to the overall response. This needs to change.

The recommendations below aim to deliver the workforce needed to ensure that people experiencing family violence receive all the supports required to keep women and children safe and assist recovery from family violence—from both inside and outside the family violence system.

An industry plan for family violence prevention and response over the next ten years

There is widespread agreement that a comprehensive workforce development strategy is required. The evidence before the Commission was that attracting and retaining enough suitable people is becoming increasingly difficult in the face of relatively poor remuneration, job insecurity and workplace safety risks including vicarious trauma.

The Commission has had regard to the clear evidence from universal and other specialist systems that gaining confidence and literacy in family violence is increasingly seen as core business. This is a welcome acknowledgement of the scale and effect of family violence across all parts of our community and the role all service systems have in meeting that challenge.

We were also struck by the interest that professional bodies in health care, social work and legal practice had in progressing pre-service and post-qualification learning around family violence. This reflects the reality that in every classroom, GP's office, hospital and courtroom in Victoria there will be a person that has been affected by family violence. Every teacher, doctor, nurse, ambulance officer, child protection or family service worker, lawyer, magistrate and registrar needs to be able to recognise family violence and know what to do next.

In making recommendations on workforce development and planning, the Commission could propose that the Victorian Government work with the specialist family violence sector to develop a strategy to address the substantial challenges the sector faces in attracting and retaining well-qualified staff. There is no doubt that this is required.

However, we consider that while the specialist family violence workforce needs to be a primary focus, a much more ambitious and strategic approach needs to be taken: the strategy must be one that addresses the size and skillset of the direct family violence workforce (across response and prevention) as well as planning for the police, justice, health, family services and associated workers who are required for a truly intersectoral approach. This would involve workforces that respond effectively within their field of expertise and also collaborate with agencies in other sectors.

The Commission proposes that the Victorian Government work with specialist family violence services, other government and non-government stakeholders, Victoria Police, business, unions, the courts, community leaders, professional bodies and the tertiary education sector to develop a ten-year industry plan. This will form a key component of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan set out in Chapter 38. This should include an assessment of workforce requirements in metropolitan, regional and rural areas regarding:

- ▷ specialist family violence services
- ▷ perpetrator interventions including, but not limited to, men's behaviour change programs
- ▷ family services, sexual assault, health services, drug and alcohol, mental health and counselling services, maternal and child health services, Child Protection and other workforces in contact with victims and perpetrators of family violence
- ▷ justice services including Corrections Victoria, community legal services, Victoria Legal Aid, and court-based supports
- ▷ prevention work, including through local government, schools, women's health services and community initiatives
- ▷ community services for people with disabilities, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex Victorians, older people, children and young people, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples and people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities.

Once developed, the actions from the industry plan will need to be funded, so demand can be met over the medium term. Accordingly, the industry plan needs to be delivered by 31 December 2017 and include costed recommendations and actions on:

- ▷ workforce size requirements for each sector
- ▷ capability and skill requirements
- ▷ mechanisms to develop and deliver a family violence professional workforce that reflects the diversity of the Victorian community, including bi-cultural workers, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander workers and workers with lived experience of disability
- ▷ remuneration and career development for family violence professionals
- ▷ workforce development and learning in each sector, based on leading practice internationally
- ▷ intersections with tertiary and vocational training—including opportunities to mandate family violence subjects in key professions including social work, medical practice, nursing and law
- ▷ practice to ensure non-discrimination, including culturally appropriate service provision and provision of services to people with disabilities, children and young people, older people, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex people, people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities, and other marginalised groups
- ▷ actions to support the wellbeing and health and safety of the workforce including preventative actions and responses to vicarious trauma.

This is a substantial endeavour. The Royal Commission considers an industry plan to be a central plank in the program of change. The plan is required to take Victoria's approach to family violence to its next logical step, consistent with the principles of shared responsibility and integration and so clearly put in evidence to the Commission.

Recommendation 207

The Victorian Government develop or commission the development of a 10-year industry plan for family violence prevention and response in Victoria, to be delivered by 31 December 2017 with commensurate funding for workforce transition and enhancement to begin from that date.

The plan should cover:

- ▶ the workforce requirements of all government and non-government agencies and services that have or will have responsibility for preventing or responding to family violence—among them specialist family violence services, perpetrator interventions, police, legal and justice services, and universal and secondary service systems
- ▶ remuneration, capability and qualifications, workforce diversity, professional development needs, career development and workforce health.

Key issues for the industry plan

While the Commission considers that the details of the industry plan need to be developed through consultation with stakeholders, it has identified three issues that need to be included:

- ▶ establishing the qualifications and mandatory knowledge for those who work with people experiencing family violence
- ▶ building practice that is aware and sensitive to diversity and is delivered by a workforce that reflects the needs of the people they work with
- ▶ facilitating integration of family violence and family services, including through the establishment of Support and Safety Hubs (see Chapter 13).

This list is not exclusive. As noted above, the plan will also need to cover issues that include remuneration and workforce health, including responding to vicarious trauma.

Qualifications and mandatory knowledge

Currently, family violence is not a mandatory subject in social work degrees, or equivalent professional qualifications in psychology, nursing, drug and alcohol practice or other caring professions. Nor is it a mandatory stand-alone subject in legal qualifications or medicine, even though many health and legal practitioners deal with family violence frequently in their day-to-day work.

The Commission considers that work needs to start now to improve the skill base and professional standing of people working in the family violence sector. This will require an increase in the available training and encouragement for people to take up the training.

Mandating family violence as a required subject in a social work qualification

One option would be to require family violence to be a core subject in relevant degrees and professional qualifications, for example in a social work qualification. With this reform social workers would, over time, have consistent exposure to family violence knowledge and contemporary practice principles, regardless of where they studied or worked. It may also encourage some to enter the specialist family violence field having been exposed to the issues in their pre-service training.

The practical effect of including family violence as a mandatory subject would still be limited unless key competencies such as risk assessment and management were also undertaken. Despite this, the Commission's view is that family violence should be made a mandatory subject in social work.

The Australian Association of Social Workers stated in its submission:

The AASW has over 8500 members and regulates the profession by setting the standards for accreditation of university programs across Australia in regards to the entry-level professional training of social workers. These standards are set through the Australian Social Work Education and Accreditation Standards. During the upcoming review of these standards, the AASW will look to establish a 'working with family violence' subject as a component of the core curriculum in all social work education across Australia.²⁹²

Our recommendation supports this approach.

Requiring an appropriate tertiary qualification to work as a family violence practitioner

Requiring an appropriate tertiary qualification to practice in a government-funded family violence service would potentially enhance the professional standing of family violence practitioners, reflect the range and complexity of their work and lead to improved remuneration. This would be consistent with minimum qualifications for counsellor/advocates in sexual assault services where a degree in social work, behavioural sciences or psychology, or relevant postgraduate qualification, is a requirement.²⁹³

Services may wish to have a range of practice skills within their team and so equivalent qualifications should also be recognised. There is great value in bringing people from different backgrounds and disciplines into organisations, and employers will want to maintain flexibility in the skill base they deploy.

The Commission recognises that new requirements for practitioners to be qualified will require a period of transition and a realistic time frame would need to be set.

There are a number of options that could be considered by government in developing the industry plan and moving towards a minimum qualification system. One would be to include a 'grandfather clause' for all existing workers so that only new practitioners employed from a certain date require the qualification. Another would be to require existing workers to have a competency-based assessment that recognises prior on-the-job learning. This would enable them to have their skills and competencies accredited rather than having to complete a degree. This option combines respect for practitioners' experience and the need for consistency.

Other options would also need to be considered in moving towards a fully tertiary-qualified specialist family violence workforce. These will be important questions for the industry plan.

Regardless of how this is achieved, a transition period will be required to enable the current workforce to gain the requisite qualification, or have their existing qualification or skills and competencies recognised as equivalent. It is highly likely that many, if not most practitioners already have tertiary qualifications, but without comprehensive data on the workforce profile it is difficult to determine how many people in the current workforce this would affect.

... if we are talking about putting standards onto an existing system what that will do is place an additional undue burden on the services who are already trying to meet and struggling and not actually able to meet demand. So if we say that everyone from now on needs to be social worked trained or qualified, whatever that is, I think it is important to consider the realities of that and have a kind of extensive and a longer term strategy for supporting that. But I think in principle it is absolutely necessary.²⁹⁴

The Commission heard evidence about the 'grassroots culture' and practice wisdom that exists in the specialist family violence sector.²⁹⁵ This is of value and should be rewarded—including by utilising this skill in the delivery of family violence-related subjects in tertiary and vocational courses, as well as by providing advance standing in such courses when practitioners seek a formal qualification.

Encouraging talent—attracting the best and the brightest into family violence practice

The remaining question is how to encourage existing workers to seek a formal qualification or competency-based assessment equivalent where this is required and how to attract new people into the family violence workforce.

One way of encouraging talented people to specialise in family violence would be to establish a scheme under which graduates receive an amnesty from HECS-HELP repayments if they enter employment in a specialist family violence service within two years of completing their degree, and stay within the community family violence sector for a defined period of time. Potentially this could also apply to lawyers working in family violence legal services.

Examples of this approach already exist for some professions internationally and domestically. For example, in the United States various loan forgiveness schemes operate, including the 'Public Service Loan Forgiveness' scheme for employees of government or not-for-profit organisations.²⁹⁶ There is also a loan forgiveness program that is specific to teachers. Under this program, where the graduate teaches full-time for five complete and consecutive academic years in certain low income primary and secondary schools (and educational service agencies that serve low-income families), and meets certain other criteria, they may be eligible for forgiveness of up to a combined total of US$17,500 on their student loans.²⁹⁷

An analogous program exists here in Australia: the HECS-HELP Benefit, under which graduates of particular courses receive a reduction in their compulsory HELP repayments if they take up related occupations or work in specified locations. However, this scheme is less generous and applies to a limited range of professions and courses, including graduates in mathematics, statistics, science, education, early childhood, nursing or midwifery.²⁹⁸ The person can apply each financial year (for a maximum of 260 weeks or five years) for a reduction in their HECS-HELP repayments, to a maximum (for the 2015–16 financial year) of $1,918.39 for early childhood workers and $1,798.48 for mathematics, statistics or science or education, nursing or midwifery graduates.²⁹⁹

It should also be remembered that education costs and entry level remuneration are only one part of the picture. Specialist family violence services will continue to struggle to attract and retain staff unless the issues with greater remuneration, professional development, career pathways and action around vicarious trauma, workplace stress and reducing demand are addressed.

Recommendation 208

The Australian Association of Social Workers amend the Australian Social Work Education and Accreditation Standards to require that a 'working with family violence' subject be required as a component of the core curriculum in all social work undergraduate degrees [within two years].

Recommendation 209

The Victorian Government include in the 10-year industry plan for family violence prevention and response a staged process for the introduction of mandatory qualifications for specialist family violence practitioners, so that no later than 31 December 2020 all funded services must require family violence practitioners to hold a social work or equivalent degree [within five years].

Recommendation 210

The Victorian Government encourage the Commonwealth Government to extend the HECS-HELP benefit scheme to graduates employed in specialist family violence services and associated services (such as community legal services that provide legal services to victims of family violence) [within 12 months].

Working with diversity

The industry plan should ensure that the workforce understands how race, age, gender, disability and sexual and gender diversity intersect with family violence, and knows how to respond accordingly. The workforce should be diverse, including Aboriginal people and people with disabilities in leadership positions and be skilled in working with different cohorts. This applies equally to specialist family violence practitioners, those working with perpetrators, police, magistrates, lawyers, court staff and workers in universal services. Other specialists (including drug and alcohol, mental health, family services, Child Protection) also need to improve their practice with diverse clients who are at risk of, are experiencing or are using violence.

Chapter 26 discusses the over-representation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people as victims of family violence, and how family violence intersects with a history of dispossession and trauma in those communities. On the basis of that evidence, and the strong arguments made on the importance of those communities leading the response and prevention efforts locally, we believe that attracting, retaining and developing Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander practitioners needs particular attention. This applies for Aboriginal community controlled organisations and also non-Aboriginal family violence service providers who should also be employing Aboriginal people, along with the courts and Victoria Police.

Accordingly we recommend that a long-term strategy to increase the Aboriginal workforce in the family violence service system—including in front-line and leadership positions in the public and community sectors—should be a central feature of the family violence industry plan. This should build on existing effort in the public sector, for example the Koori Tertiary Scholarship Program, Indigenous Cadetship Program, Koori Graduate Recruitment and Development Scheme under the Department of Justice and Regulation Koori Employment Strategy.³⁰⁰ The Commission also notes that a Certificate IV in Aboriginal Family Violence Work was available at Swinburne University from 2009–2011 and in 2012–13.³⁰¹

The Commission also notes positive work by the Department of Justice and Regulation in offering a small number of university scholarships for people with disabilities to facilitate pathways into working in justice-related fields. Potentially such schemes could be extended across government departments and to areas of family violence specialisation, including social work, psychology and counselling and working with children affected by family violence. These need not be large-scale programs but could assist to diversify the range of people working as specialist family violence practitioners across disciplines.

Facilitating integration of family violence and family services

The plan to deliver on family violence workforce needs over the next ten years will need to accommodate the Commission's recommendations in Chapter 13. That chapter noted that a significant proportion of Integrated Family Services clients are affected by family violence.

For this and other reasons described in that chapter the Commission considers that the family violence sector and Child FIRST-Integrated Family Services need to work together as effectively as possible, so that the full range of a family's needs can be addressed. In other words, family violence needs to be core business of family services. This does not mean that family services would replace specialist family violence services as each service does different work. We do believe, that however, they can and should collaborate in responding to women and children affected by family violence.

To achieve this, in Chapter 13 we recommend establishing Support and Safety Hubs in the 17 local Department of Health and Human Services areas by 1 July 2018. The hubs would provide:

These hubs would create a new, consolidated intake into family violence services and Integrated Family Services, consolidating the current L17 police referral points and the Child FIRST intake.

Transitioning to the hubs with a combined intake system has implications for workforce planning. As such, the transition and the revised service model for the hubs must be a primary consideration in the industry plan.

The Commission noted earlier in this chapter that there are anomalies between funding and assumed remuneration rates between the specialist family violence and integrated family services workforces. It is unreasonable that colleagues in one setting, with the same level of responsibility, should be paid different amounts. These inequities will need to be resolved in the new funding arrangements for the hubs, and across the two sectors more broadly.

Short-term actions while the industry plan is finalised

Developing an effective plan will take time. In the meantime there are important actions that could be implemented in the short term to forge stronger relationships; build capability across legal, family violence, universal services and other specialisations; and align service delivery in a more seamless way for victims and perpetrators. These can form part of the industry plan but do not need to be delayed. We discuss these below.

Promoting a career pathway, leading practice and supporting secondary consultation

In the Commission's recommendations to establish Support and Safety Hubs, we also recommended that the minimum resource requirements for each hub include funding new positions for advanced family violence practitioners. This role would include providing secondary consultation to local GPs and health practitioners, schools and other service providers who have clients experiencing or at risk of family violence. They would also assist their colleagues at the hubs on complex cases and provide a point of additional expertise.

The Commission recognises that many family violence workers already undertake these activities. The differences would be that:

- ▷ the role is formalised and funded to a level commensurate with the knowledge and practice experience necessary to undertake this advanced level of practice
- ▷ there is a defined role of secondary consultation and capability building with non-family violence services
- ▷ it would provide a career pathway for specialist family violence practitioners who do not wish to be people managers.

In considering this recommendation, the Commission was persuaded by evidence across human services in Australia and internationally that a career pathway for those who wish to focus on advanced practice is an effective way to attract and retain quality practitioners. In larger organisations such pathways may already exist. But for smaller specialist family violence providers this may not be possible with current funding models that assume a relatively low level of remuneration.

One option for government would be to establish these advanced practitioner roles across specialist family violence services as part of a more realistic funding formula and increased allocation. At a minimum, however, we consider that having an advanced practitioner is a necessary pre-requisite for the success of the Support and Safety Hubs and so must be incorporated in that reform.

Given that it will take some time to establish the hubs, roles should be funded, until the hubs are established, in current L17 referral points and given the responsibility to articulate and strengthen secondary consultation with universal services. This function would transfer to the hubs once they are in operation.

Recommendation 211

The Victorian Government ensure advanced family violence practitioner positions are established at each of the 17 recommended Support and Safety Hubs [by 1 July 2018]. As an immediate measure additional resources should be provided to existing services, so that they can provide additional secondary consultation to universal services until the practitioner positions are established.

Ensuring family violence literacy across universal and other specialist systems

An effective response to family violence will depend on a cohesive coordinated approach across diverse disciplines. Victims of family violence may report family violence to, or prefer to be supported by, any number of services, or they or the perpetrator may have co-existing problems. When victims choose not to access specialist services, services assisting with other issues may be in the best position to provide support.

At the very least those delivering the other services need to understand how family violence interacts with their service. This requires a significant increase in capability across various service systems, such as education and health (including community health staff, GPs, hospital staff, ambulance and paramedics, maternal and child health nurses, midwives and dentists), family lawyers and others, so they are better able to identify family violence risk and respond accordingly. Equally, specialist family violence services need to understand the practice of other service systems and some of the other issues their clients may present with that affect their safety and wellbeing.

It is clear that professional responses to family violence for those working in universal and other specialist service systems need to be consistent, informed by a strong understanding of the nature and dynamics of family violence and reflective of its multi-dimensional nature.

We propose three key actions to facilitate this approach. These are:

- ▷ establishing a delivery mechanism for comprehensive workforce development and inter-sectoral learning (discussed below)
- ▷ creating family violence principal practitioner roles in the major service delivery departments—that is the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Justice and Regulation and the Department of Education and Training (discussed below)
- ▷ establishing specialist family violence advisors in major mental health and drug and alcohol services (as recommended in Chapter 19).

Family violence education

Victoria has made important attempts to educate workers in relevant areas about family violence. These include the training of maternal and child health nurses on family violence risk assessment (CRAF training), work in some hospitals, the introduction of family violence content into child protection professional development and efforts by the professional college and others to guide and support GPs. In other cases, family violence content is offered to clinicians as part of broader learning around working with trauma or vulnerable clients, or as part of induction training for service delivery roles.

However, the approach to date has been piecemeal and largely left to champions inside and outside government to drive the learning agenda about family violence. There has not been a system-wide approach for specialist family violence practitioners to learn and collaborate with their colleagues in other service systems. This is a lost opportunity.

The next step for Victoria, therefore, is to enhance family violence learning in universal and specialist systems and create greater opportunities for collaboration and co-learning.

One option would be to expand the family violence education and training that Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria is contracted to deliver, to make it more comprehensive and achieve greater reach. At present most education is provided through short courses, which are unlikely to meet the ongoing learning needs of most practitioners.

Although this would go some way towards improving understanding of family violence it would be unlikely to deliver the scale of workforce learning required.

Another option would be to establish a unit in government to oversee the delivery of education on family violence across departments, agencies and funded community service organisations. Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria or other organisations could be contracted to provide some or all of that education. A unit of this kind would be similar to the Education Centre Against Violence in NSW and could interact with and support the work of the family violence principal practitioner (described below) in the Department of Health and Human Services.

The unit could take a consolidated view of family violence education, and as in NSW, also coordinate learning on child abuse and sexual assault alongside family violence.

The advantage of this approach is that the unit could encourage and, in the case of employees, require participation in such training across the health and human services systems. It could also support other government departments and agencies including Corrections Victoria, emergency services and others, to achieve family violence literacy in their key workforces.

This would overcome the current piecemeal approach and provide a set of consistent learning and development resources and training courses, which a range of practitioners, including clinicians, could access without having to do the development work themselves. This would not duplicate effort at a hospital or other service level but would support practitioners to learn across disciplines by linking family violence with other areas of clinician learning.

Although this might require greater expenditure than simply boosting funding for existing programs, the Commission considers it is likely to deliver a more robust and comprehensive approach. For example, it could support a whole of health system approach to family violence from inside, rather than outside government, and engage a broad range of registered training providers, tertiary bodies and others with family violence practice knowledge.

The Commission found the insights of the NSW Education Centre Against Violence enlightening. In particular Ms McNamara's evidence that:

Any education program which seeks to improve industry wide, long-term change needs to be accompanied by embedded systems change, supported by policy and funding commitments. If there is a real intention to change the culture and practice of a service sector then a range of tools are required to ensure that this is delivered, and maintained, over time.³⁰²

The Commission notes that while some of ECAV's functions are mirrored in Victoria, Victoria does not have an equivalent unit in government. Ms McNamara stated that the location of ECAV within the NSW Department of Health ECAV provides it with the 'necessary influence, perspective and funding to identify and close capability gaps across the system.'³⁰³ Such a unit could also identify and have conversations about limitations and problems across agencies and services; and participate in policy development.³⁰⁴

Such a unit could potentially be in the Department of Health and Human Services as this department has either direct or funding responsibility for the key service systems that intersect with family violence including sexual assault, Child Protection and Integrated Family Services and health.

The Commission recognises, however, that the Victorian Government will wish to consider where these functions are best placed. As a result, rather than being prescriptive about how this should be done, we recommend that the Victorian Government should consider the best means of delivering these functions,

In doing so it should take account of the expertise and participation of non-government family violence practitioners and Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria in delivering learning across disciplines.

Recommendation 212

The Victorian Government determine the best means of delivering comprehensive workforce development and interdisciplinary learning about family violence across the health, human services and justice sectors. This should include consideration of the New South Wales Education Centre Against Violence model [within two years].

Family Violence Principal Practitioners in key departments

The Commission notes the positive gains made in child protection practice since the role of Principal Practitioner in the Children, Youth and Families Division of the Department of Health and Human Services was created and subsequently incorporated into the Office of Professional Practice. This role has provided statewide practice leadership, working in front-line practice with the most complex families, and leading policy and service development in child protection and associated areas, including family violence.

There are now a total of 12 clinically trained and experienced principal practitioners in Child Protection in Victoria. They are placed in all divisions of DHHS and have a regular presence in every office around the state.³⁰⁵ This welcome development reflects the value of practice leadership at all points of the child protection system.

There are valuable lessons to learn from this experience, as enhancing practice and leadership across a major department is also key issue in family violence. While the principal practitioners have promoted positive child protection practice and helped improved family violence knowledge generally, it is clear that further work is required. Improved clinical and professional practice when family violence is present needs to be embedded across other areas in the department, such as mental health, housing and youth justice. This would also help the department to shift its focus from viewing family violence mainly through the prism of child protection.

Family violence is different from Child Protection as family violence services are delivered by non-government organisations, rather than solely by statutory services. We note, however, that disability services are similarly provided by a mix of departmental and non-government providers and that the regulatory and advice functions of the Senior Practitioner—Disability straddle both sectors.

We further note Ms Beaton's evidence that in some cases the Office of Professional Practice has worked cooperatively with non-government providers of out-of-home care and Integrated Family Services where they have shared clients. This suggests that while the principal practitioner role is correctly focused on departmental staff, opportunities exist for effective collaboration and partnerships with non-statutory providers.

We are therefore of the view that a Principal Practitioner—Family Violence with a department-wide brief would be of substantial benefit. Whilst DHHS will wish to determine the appropriate location of this role within the departmental structure, such a position could potentially sit alongside the existing Principal Practitioner and the Senior Practitioner—Disability in the Office of Professional Practice. Their role would be to advise on family violence practice issues across the department, including in health services and in consultation with the Chief Psychiatrist. Liaison with the Family Violence and Sexual Assault Team would also be required.

The key functions of the family violence principal practitioners would be to:

- ▷ support the work of DHHS practitioners and programs in areas that intersect with family violence, including on complex casework
- ▷ monitor and review practice
- ▷ provide practice research and evaluation on intersections of family violence and departmental service delivery
- ▷ promote professional development and training on family violence
- ▷ be the expert spokesperson on professional practice on intersections between family violence in the casework and policy undertaken by DHHS.

Two other departments where establishing these positions would be of substantial benefit, are the Department of Education and Training and the Department of Justice and Regulation.

In the justice area, practice leadership is particularly important within Corrections Victoria, because community corrections is relevant to many perpetrators of family violence. It is also important to focus on perpetrators who are serving prison sentences. These would be key areas of focus for a principal practitioner.

The Department of Justice and Regulation has a dedicated policy unit for sexual and family violence. This is very positive and should continue to do its valuable work. The family violence principal practitioners should be attached to, or work closely with, that unit. The Commission also notes that Corrections Victoria has positions known as principal practitioners (parole) however these appear to be operational supervisory roles rather than a exercising a whole-of-organisation practice leadership function.³⁰⁶

The Department of Education and Training does not have a family violence unit. We consider that practice leadership and resource development for government schools, early childhood education and vocational and higher education are both necessary and strategic. In the case of schools, having such practice leadership would reinforce and support the roll-out of respectful relationship education, which we recommend elsewhere. The success of this program depends on a whole-of-school approach, including responding to disclosures of family violence by students and staff. Supportive practice leadership from the department on these and other family violence issues is vital for success.

Recommendation 213

The Victorian Government establish family violence principal practitioner positions in the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Education and Training and the Department of Justice and Regulation [by 31 December 2016].

Supporting police work in family violence

As noted in Chapter 14, the Commission supports the Victoria Police proposal to establish a faculty-style Centre for Learning for Family Violence in People Development Command. The centre, together with Family Violence Command, should complete a family violence education and training needs assessment across Victoria Police. The needs assessment should be used to develop and deliver a comprehensive education and training strategy with a mix of classroom-based, flexible and on-the-job training.

This strategy should cover all ranks and include a focus on training for promotion, investigative training and leadership training. It should also cover learning and development for police in the early stages of their career, who carry out the bulk of the daily response to family violence. In developing content, supporting materials and delivery mechanisms for the training strategy, Victoria Police should work closely with the specialist family violence sector and use co-design and delivery approaches as much as possible.

Recommendations on this are made in Chapter 14.

A clear focus on judicial and legal sector capability

Because family violence is a core part of the magistrates' court jurisdiction, it is essential that the magistracy has the skills and aptitude to preside over matters involving family violence. The people the Commission consulted emphasised how critical a magistrate's skill and approach are to the outcome of a hearing, the victim's safety, and a perpetrator's level of accountability.

While many magistrates hearing family violence matters are highly experienced at this type of work, some are not. Given the demand of family violence work on magistrates' courts in Victoria, the Commission believes that aptitude for undertaking family violence work should be a core part of all magistrates' skill sets. Although it will continue to be important for some magistrates to be highly specialised in family violence work, it is not feasible to expect that family violence matters can or should always be allocated to those particular magistrates.

In addition to ongoing training, therefore, the Commission recommends that, when appointments to the magistracy are recommended to Cabinet, the Attorney-General should consider the knowledge, experience and aptitude of candidates in relation to family violence, including aspects of federal family law. Magistrates are drawn from a pool of people with different practice and professional backgrounds, and not all appointees will have worked directly in the area of family violence. The expression of interest form for judicial appointments could be amended to invite applicants to provide information about their legal practice experience in the area of family violence.

The Judicial College of Victoria could also publish information about the skill set required to undertake family violence matters—for example, to complement the existing Framework of Judicial Abilities and Qualities published by the College.

It is clear that judicial officers, court staff, legal representatives, police and non-legal family violence support workers need ongoing training and professional development to foster expertise and specialisation in family violence, including knowledge and experience of family law and child protection. This includes training on identifying family violence risk factors and responding appropriately.

To support judicial members we recommend that the Judicial College of Victoria should continue offering regular programs on family violence to magistrates and include material on the dynamics and complexities of family violence in appropriate programs offered to judicial officers or Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal members. Examples could include sexual assault in the family violence context, family violence in lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities and older people and family violence. We further consider that the National Judicial College's orientation program for newly appointed judges should include material to educate judicial officers on the dynamics and complexities of family violence.

We also support the development of comprehensive family violence learning and development for court staff, the development and delivery of which should be supported by the Victorian Government.

The Australian Law Reform Commission and the New South Wales Law Reform Commission recommended that tertiary institutions offering legal qualifications should review their curriculums to ensure that legal issues concerning family violence are appropriately addressed, and that legal professional bodies should do the same for their ongoing professional development requirements. The Law Institute of Victoria and the Victorian Bar should show leadership by working with their colleagues in other jurisdictions and the university sector to develop curriculums on family violence as part of undergraduate qualifications in law.

The Victorian legal profession would also show national leadership by working with professional bodies in other Australian jurisdictions, the Law Council, legal aid authorities and state and Commonwealth Attorneys-General to pursue opportunities for an amnesty scheme for HECS repayments for lawyers who, upon graduating in law, enter practice as a family violence specialist in a community legal centre or legal aid body. This is consistent with our recommendation above for a HECS-HELP amnesty for social work and other graduates in specialist family violence services.

Finally, we noted above that the Commonwealth Government has asked the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration to work with the University of Queensland TC Beirne School of Law to develop a National Family Violence Bench Book. This is a welcome development and an excellent opportunity to improve the quality and consistency of the approach of judicial officers in each state and territory to family violence matters. Given that Victoria has already developed a Family Violence Bench Book, we assume that the views of the Judicial College of Victoria and other stakeholders, and the substance of the Victorian Bench Book, will be considered in the course of developing the Commonwealth Bench Book. Correspondingly, the Judicial College of Victoria should consider whether the Victorian Family Violence Bench Book needs to be revised in light of the development of the Commonwealth Bench Book.

Recommendation 214

The Victorian Attorney-General consider, when recommending appointments to the magistracy, potential appointees' knowledge, experience, skills and aptitude for hearing cases involving family violence, including their knowledge of relevant aspects of federal family law [within 12 months].

Recommendation 215

The Judicial College of Victoria include material on the dynamics and complexities of family violence in other general programs offered to all judicial officers and Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal members, in addition to the specific family violence programs and resources provided to date [within 12 months].

Recommendation 216

The Victorian Government provide funding to continue the development of comprehensive family violence learning and development training covering family violence, family law and child protection for court staff and judicial officers [within 12 months].

Endnotes

- 1 Transcript of Maguire, 13 October 2015, 3405 [22]–[30].
- 2 Ibid 3406 [3]–[11].
- 3 Ibid 3397 [12]–3398 [18].
- 4 Ibid 3397 [14]–[20].
- 5 Ibid 3397 [21]–[28].
- 6 Ibid 3397 [21]–3398 [8].
- 7 Ibid 3398 [9]–[13].
- 8 Ibid 3411 [27]–3412 [3].
- 9 Ibid 3405 [28]–[30].
- 10 Ibid 3406 [11]–[14].
- 11 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 43.
- 12 KPMG Management Consulting, 'Survey of the Community—Managed Housing and Support Workforce: Final Report' (Department of Human Services, September 2007) 11.
- 13 Transcript of Maguire, 13 October 2015, 3427 [13]–[16].
- 14 Transcript of Jenkins, 13 October 2015, 3532 [16]–3534 [5]. Exceptions are contained in the Equal Opportunity Act 2010 (Vic) s 60. The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission advises that based on existing jurisprudence it appears unlikely that a family violence service established for women would be considered a 'special measure' under section 12 of the Act, citing Georgina Martina Inc (Anti-Discrimination Exemption) 2012 VCAT 1384. See letter from Kate Jenkins, Commissioner, Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission to The Hon Marcia Neave AO, Commissioner, Royal Commission into Family Violence, 1 December 2015, 2.
- 15 KPMG Management Consulting, above n 12, 9–10, 79.
- 16 Ibid 17–18.
- 17 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 43.
- 18 Ibid.
- 19 Ibid 17–18.
- 20 See, eg, Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 40–41.
- 21 See, eg, Women's Health West Inc, Submission 239, 21–22.
- 22 Knox City Council, Submission 227, 15.
- 23 KPMG Management Consulting, above n 12, i.
- 24 Ibid 14–15, 79.
- 25 Ibid 32–33.
- 26 Chisholm Institute, Submission 803, 1, 9.
- 27 Transcript of Maguire, 13 October 2015, 3399 [10]–[22]. See also Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 24.
- 28 For example, the Youth Affairs Council of Victoria recommended that the Victorian Government Develop a Victorian Government workforce strategy that ensures all workers supporting young people, including DHS Services Connect case management staff, are familiar with the Victorian Code of Ethical Practice and undertake training in cultural competence in working with Aboriginal, refugee and migrant young people and their families. The Council submitted that '[t]hey should also undertake disability competence training, including planning for accessibility, working directly with young people with a disability, and involving young people with disabilities in decision making. (Cultural competence training has been embraced by many workers in the out-of-home care and family services sector, but should be more comprehensively available to all workers with young people.): Youth Affairs Council of Victoria Inc, Submission 938, 37.
- 29 See, eg, Indigenous Men's Resource and Advisory Service, Submission 771, 22; Hume Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Group; Regional Aboriginal Justice Advisory Committee, Submission 465, 2; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 6–7.
- 30 Transcript of Turfrey, 20 July 2015, 880 [16]–[27]. See also Commission for Children and Young People, Submission 790, 20.
- 31 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 43.
- 32 Chisholm Institute, Submission 803, 3. The Graduate Certificate of Social Science: Male Family Violence course is convened by No To Violence, in conjunction with Swinburne University of Technology at their Melbourne Campus. There is also a course titled 'In Telephone Counselling: Male Family Violence' (which is run by No To Violence, in conjunction with Swinburne University of Technology): No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 8–9.
- 33 Chisholm Institute, Submission 803, 3.
- 34 Transcript of Robinson, 13 October 2015, 3413 [10]–[24].
- 35 Berry Street, Submission 834, 21.
- 36 Chisholm Institute, Submission 803, Appendix 4.
- 37 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 43.
- 38 The survey collected data from those programs that receive a mix of voluntary and mandated referrals. Of 34 locations, fully or nearly completed surveys were provided by 28 locations: No To Violence Male Family Violence Prevention Association Inc, 'Men's Behaviour Change Programs in Victoria—a Sector Snapshot' (April 2011) 14.
- 39 Ibid 36.
- 40 Bethany Community Support, Submission 434, 8.
- 41 Transcript of Turfrey, 20 July 2015, 884 [19]–[27].
- 42 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 22. See also Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 43.
- 43 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 9, 20. The submission states that overall 515 employees participated in the survey. The number of managers who participated, and who answered this question, is not provided.
- 44 KPMG Management Consulting, above n 12, 48–49, 79.
- 45 Bethany Community Support, Submission 434, 8.
- 46 Family Life, Submission 758, 6.
- 47 Ibid.
- 48 Equal Remuneration Case—Australian Municipal, Administrative, Clerical and Services Union and others [2012] FWA 5184 (22 June 2012) 8; Equal Remuneration Case—Australian Municipal, Administrative, Clerical and Services Union and others, Order PR525485 (22 June 2012).
- 49 Equal Remuneration Case—Australian Municipal, Administrative, Clerical and Services Union and others, Order PR525485 (22 June 2012).
- 50 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 20; Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 42.
- 51 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 22.

- 52 Department of Health and Human Services, 'DHHS Response to Items 10-14 and 18', 5, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 13 October 2015.
- 53 Ibid 4.
- 54 Ibid.
- 55 Ibid 4-5.
- 56 Ibid 5.
- 57 The assumed family violence caseworker salary is set at employee classification level 5, pay point 3 of the Social, Community, Home Care and Disability Services Industry Award 2010 and the majority of the assumed family service caseworker salaries are set at employee classification level 6, pay point 2 of the Social, Community, Home Care and Disability Services Industry Award 2010: Department of Health and Human Services, above n 52, 6. As at 1 December 2015, the assumed family violence caseworker's hourly rate (in accordance with the funding model) was $32.98 (which on a standard 38 hour week would be approximately $65,168 per annum) compared to $34.91 per hour for family services caseworkers (which on a standard 38 hour week would be approximately $68,982 per annum): Fair Work Ombudsman, Pay Guide: Social, Community, Home Care and Disability Services Industry Award 2010 [MA0001000] and Social and Community Services—Victoria—Award 2000 [AP796561] (30 November 2015) 15 and 18 <<https://www.fairwork.gov.au/ArticleDocuments/872/social-and-community-services-victoria-award-ap796561-pay-guide.pdf.aspx>>.
- 58 The assumed team leader salary for family services is set at employee classification level 8, pay point 2 of the Social, Community, Home Care and Disability Services Industry Award 2010 and the assumed team leader salary for family violence counselling services is set at employee classification level 6, pay point 3 of the Social, Community, Home Care and Disability Services Industry Award 2010: Department of Health and Human Services, above n 57, 6. As at 1 December 2015, the assumed team leader's hourly rate for family services (in accordance with the funding model) was $39.51 (which on a standard 38 hour week would be approximately $78,071 per annum) and the hourly rate for a family violence counselling service team leader was $35.72 (which on a standard 38 hour week would be approximately $70,582): Fair Work Ombudsman, above n 57. This equates to a lesser salary of approximately $7489 per annum for family violence counselling services.
- 59 The assumed salary for a family violence counselling service program manager, who runs the service, is set at employee classification level 8, pay point 2 of the Social, Community, Home Care and Disability Services Industry Award 2010: Department of Health and Human Services, above n 57. As at 1 December 2015, the hourly rate applicable to that classification and pay point was $39.51 (which on a standard 38 hour week would be approximately $78,071 per annum): Fair Work Ombudsman, above n 57. This is between $8422 and $26,579 less than the salary of a team leader or senior practitioner in child protection: Department of Health and Human Services, Position Description—Child Protection Team Manager <http://childprotectionjobs.dhs.vic.gov.au/CPP5_Team_Manager.pdf>.
- 60 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 9, 20.
- 61 The sector-wide benefit which is most frequently offered is salary packaging: KPMG Management Consulting, above n 12, 35.
- 62 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 20.
- 63 KPMG Management Consulting, above n 12, 18, 79.
- 64 No To Violence, above n 38, 14, 54-55.
- 65 Transcript of Jaffe, 13 October 2015, 3414 [9]-[16].
- 66 At least two of these activities must be seminars or forums run by No To Violence: No To Violence, 'Men's Behaviour Change Group Work: Minimum Standards and Quality Practice' (February 2005) 51.
- 67 See, eg, Community consultation, Geelong 2, 28 April 2015; Chisholm Institute, Submission 803, 9; Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 24; Transcript of Jaffe, 13 October 2015, 3400 [3]-[10].
- 68 Women's Health Loddon Mallee, Submission 772, 3.
- 69 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 29.
- 70 Ibid 39-41.
- 71 Transcript of Maguire, 13 October 2015, 3405 [3]-[12].
- 72 Transcript of Jaffe, 13 October 2015, 3427 [1]-[9]. See also Community consultation, Maryborough 2, 21 April 2015; Gippsland Integrated Family Violence Service Reform Steering Committee, Submission 691, 7; Kara House Inc, Submission 618, 5.
- 73 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 22.
- 74 Transcript of Beaton, 13 October, 3402 [19]-3403 [1].
- 75 Statement of Miller, 14 July 2015, 25 [93]; Statement of Beaton, 12 October 2015, 9 [35], 10-11 [38].
- 76 Statement of Miller, 14 July 2015, 25 [93].
- 77 Statement of Beaton, 12 October 2015, 12 [42].
- 78 Ibid 9 [35], 10 [37].
- 79 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 43.
- 80 Ibid.
- 81 Ibid.
- 82 KPMG Management Consulting, above n 12.
- 83 Ibid 24, 58, 66.
- 84 WRISC Family Violence Support, Submission 260, 6-7.
- 85 See, eg, Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015; Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 21; Bethany Community Support, Submission 434, 8; Gippsland Centre against Sexual Assault, Submission 638, 10; Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 44; Safe Futures Foundation, Submission 228, 80; The Police Association of Victoria, Submission 636, 26.
- 86 Bethany Community Support, Submission 434, 8.
- 87 Court Services Victoria, Submission 646, 13.
- 88 'Clinical supervision is one of the major self-care strategies used by counsellors. It is also known to improve job performance and satisfaction': South Eastern Centre Against Sexual Assault and Family Violence, Professional services <<http://www.secasa.com.au/services/professional-services/>>.
- 89 Gippsland Centre Against Sexual Assault, Submission 638, 10.
- 90 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 55.
- 91 Court Services Victoria, Submission 646, 13.
- 92 Cobaw Community Health, Submission 396, 5; Women's Health West Inc, Submission 239, 37. See also Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 11-12.
- 93 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 21.
- 94 Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 893, 13.
- 95 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 24.
- 96 No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 17.
- 97 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 19.
- 98 Ibid 24.

- 99 Australian Services Union—Victorian and Tasmanian Authorities and Services Branch, Submission 482, 24. See also Bethany Community Support, Submission 434, 16; Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 44; Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 27.
- 100 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 44.
- 101 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 31.
- 102 Ibid.
- 103 KPMG Management Consulting, above n 12, iii.
- 104 Ibid i.
- 105 Nine Signatory Organisations, Submission 351, 9.
- 106 The nine organisations are: CASA Forum (Victorian Centres Against Sexual Assault); Domestic Violence Victoria; Multicultural Centre for Women's Health; No To Violence; Our Watch; Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission; Women with Disabilities Victoria; Women's Health Association of Victoria; Women's Health Victoria: Nine Signatory Organisations, Submission 351, 9. See also CASA Forum, Submission 828, 4; Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 42; Centre for Multicultural Youth, Submission 452, 9; No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 29; Our Watch—02, Submission 922, 32–33; Women with Disabilities Victoria, Submission 924, 9–10; Women's Health Association of Victoria, Submission 509, 5 .
- 107 Drummond Street Services, Submission 685, 14.
- 108 Loddon Campaspe Integrated Family Violence Services Consortium, Submission 914, 3.
- 109 Helen M Eigenberg, Victor E Kappeler and Karen McGuffee, 'Confronting the Complexities of Domestic Violence: A Social Prescription for Rethinking Police Training' (2012)(2) Journal of Police Crisis Negotiations 122, 122; Kristin Diemer et al, 'Review of the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence: Final Report' (December 2013), 17, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 110 Centre Against Violence, Submission 760, 2–3; Darebin Community Legal Centre, Submission 931, 9; Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 15; Australian Women Against Violence Alliance, Submission 838, 24; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 30. See also Diemer et al, above n 109, 16; Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence—A National Legal Response: Final Report, ALRC Report No 114, NSWLRC Report No 128 (2010) 406.
- 111 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 30. See also Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, above n 110, 409.
- 112 Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 31; Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 6; Eastern Elder Abuse Network, Submission 379, 9.
- 113 InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 45; Victorian Arabic Social Services, Submission 474, 9; Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 59; Whittlesea Community Connections, Submission 375, 22; JK Diversity Consultants, Submission 890, 11.
- 114 Women's Mental Health Network Victoria Inc, Submission 417, 10.
- 115 Victorian Gay & Lesbian Rights Lobby, Submission 684, 6; No To Violence; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 933, 24.
- 116 Diemer et al, above n 109, 13.
- 117 Ibid.
- 118 Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 38. See also Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, Attachment 1, 89–90; Mallee Family Violence Executive, Submission 617, 2.
- 119 See, eg, Community consultation, Werribee 2, 11 May 2015; Christine Craik, Submission 437, 6–7; Women's Legal Service Victoria—01, Submission 940, 38; Anonymous, Submission 373, 1–3; Nexus Primary Health, Submission 781, 4; Community consultation, Melbourne, 30 April 2015; Community consultation, Bendigo 1, 5 May 2015; Community consultation, Echuca 2, 7 May 2015; Peninsula Community Legal Centre, Submission 447, 18; Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, Attachment 1, 90, Attachment 2, 24–26; Statement of Field, 31 July 2015, 10 [40].
- 120 Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice—Deakin University, Submission 511, 19 citing Amanda George and Bridget Harris, 'Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria' (Deakin University School of Law Centre for Regional Law and Justice, 2014) 92–96.
- 121 Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, Submission 236, 9 [20.16].
- 122 Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria; Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health & Society—La Trobe University, Submission 821, 19; Opportunity Knocks—EDVOS; Safe Futures Foundation; Safe Steps; WISHIN; Victorian Women's Trust, Submission 898, 25–26; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 60–61; Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 42. See also InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 37.
- 123 For example, in the United States the Greenbook Initiative includes education materials on 'cultural competence': Annabel Taylor et al, 'Domestic and Family Violence Protection Orders in Australia: An Investigation of Information Sharing and Enforcement: State of Knowledge Paper' (Landscapes Issue 16, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, December 2015) 25, 36; Shellee Wakefield and Annabel Taylor, 'Judicial Education for Domestic and Family Violence' (Landscapes: State of Knowledge Paper 02, Australian National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, June 2015) 22. 'Equality benchbook' resources are available for judicial members in New South Wales, Queensland and the United Kingdom. See, eg, Judicial Commission of New South Wales, Equality Before the Law Bench Book (June 2014) <http://www.judcom.nsw.gov.au/publications/benchbks/equality/benchbook.pdf/at_download/fil>. The Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission will also be working with the Judicial College of Victoria to produce a resource for judicial members regarding accessibility for people with disabilities: Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, Beyond doubt: the experiences of people with disabilities reporting crime <<http://www.humanrightscommission.vic.gov.au/index.php/our-projects-a-initiatives/item/619-experiences-of-people-with-disabilities-reporting-crime#next-steps>>.
- 124 Wakefield and Taylor, above n 123, 22.
- 125 Australian Law Reform Commission and NSW Law Reform Commission, above n 110, 46–47.
- 126 Wakefield and Taylor, above n 123.
- 127 Ibid 38.
- 128 Ibid 22–23.
- 129 Ibid 25–26.
- 130 Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (11 November 2014) <<http://www.judicialcollege.vic.edu.au/publications/family-violence-resources>>. See also Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 11; Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 55.
- 131 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 5.
- 132 Senator The Hon George Brandis QC and Senator The Hon Michaelia Cash, 'National Family Violence Bench Book' (Media Release, 9 June 2015); Australian Law Reform Commission and NSW Law Reform Commission, above n 110, 46.
- 133 Senator The Hon George Brandis QC and Senator The Hon Michaelia Cash, above n 132.
- 134 Ibid.
- 135 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 11.

- 136 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court Victoria, 'Magistrates' and Children's Courts—Information Request Response', 9, provided in response to the Commission's request for information dated 5 June 2015.
- 137 Judicial College of Victoria, 2016 Season of Learning <http://www.judicialcollege.vic.edu.au/sites/default/files/jcv_prospectus_2016_web_lr.pdf>.
- 138 These evening events have been developed with the Judicial Officers' Aboriginal Cultural Awareness Committee, chaired by Justice Stephen Kaye AM: ibid.
- 139 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 30. 'The first of three, two day courses, focusing on the social context of family violence was held in February 2015. The remaining programs will run in August 2015 and February 2016': ibid.
- 140 Ibid.
- 141 Judicial College of Victoria, Submission 536, 4.
- 142 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, viii.
- 143 Ibid.
- 144 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, 'Court Services Victoria, Position Description: Registrar—Magistrates' Court', 1, produced by the Magistrates' Court of Victoria in response to the Commission's request for information dated 5 June 2015.
- 145 Ibid.
- 146 George and Harris, above n 120, 77.
- 147 Community consultation, Echuca 1, 7 May 2015.
- 148 Statement of Field, 31 July 2015, 9–10 [38].
- 149 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 29 [6.1.2]–[6.1.3].
- 150 See, eg, Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, vi; Ovens Murray Goulburn Integrated Family Violence Services, Submission 444, 6; Goulburn Valley Community Legal Centre, Submission 495, 7 [19.10]. See also Transcript of Hawkins, 4 August 2015, 1857 [19]–1858 [17].
- 151 See, eg, Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Careers in the Court <<https://www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au/about-us/careers-court>>.
- 152 This qualification replaces the Certificate IV in Government (Court Services) which was delivered by several Registered Training Organisations between 2003 and 2015: Magistrates' Court of Victoria, 'General Induction For All New Staff', 1, produced by the Magistrates' Court of Victoria in response to the Commission's request for information dated 5 June 2015.
- 153 Ibid 2.
- 154 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court Victoria, above n 136, 9.
- 155 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, above n 152, 2. See also ibid.
- 156 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, above n 152, 2; Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 30.
- 157 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Career as a Court Registrar FAQ (6 October 2015) <<https://www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au/faqs/frequently-asked-questions/career-court-registrar-faq>>.
- 158 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, above n 144, 1.
- 159 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, 'Court Services Victoria, Position Description: Family Violence Registrar—Magistrates' Court', 1, produced in response to the Commission's request for information dated 5 June 2015.
- 160 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 9.
- 161 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, above n 159, 2; Magistrates' Court of Victoria, 'Court Services Victoria, Position Description: Family Violence Respondent Support Worker—Frankston Magistrates' Court', 2, produced in response to the Commission's request for information dated 5 June 2015. See also Statement of Davies, 29 July 2015, 1 [2], 2 [8].
- 162 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court Victoria, above n 136, 9.
- 163 Magistrates' Court of Victoria and Children's Court of Victoria, Submission 978, 29.
- 164 Statement of Newman, 28 July 2015, 1 [3].
- 165 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, above n 152, 1. See also Statement of Newman, 28 July 2015, 1 [3].
- 166 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, above n 152, 2.
- 167 Anonymous, Submission 100, 2.
- 168 Anonymous, Submission 264, 3.
- 169 See, eg, Community consultation, Benalla 1, 19 May 2015; Community consultation, Melbourne 3, 24 April 2015; Anonymous, Submission 414, 3.
- 170 See, eg, Anonymous, Submission 739, 2.
- 171 See, eg, Statement of Jones, 7 August 2015, 11 [44]; Anonymous, Submission 263, 3.
- 172 Anonymous, Submission 583, 2.
- 173 Law Institute of Victoria, Submission 832, 5.
- 174 Statement of Fatouros, 6 August 2015, 7 [31].
- 175 Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 32.
- 176 Ibid 7.
- 177 Transcript of Matthews, 7 August 2015, 2320 [23]–[24].
- 178 Chisholm Institute, Submission 803, Appendix 4.
- 179 Law Institute of Victoria, 'Family Violence Education for Family Lawyers' (19 January 2016), 1, provided by the Law Institute of Victoria to the Commission, 19 January 2016.
- 180 Ibid.
- 181 The College of Law, Practical Legal Training Subject Outlines <<http://www.collaw.edu.au/what-we-offer/law-students-and-graduates/practical-legal-training-subject-outlines/>>.
- 182 Leo Cussen Centre for Law, Course Structure of the Practical Training Course (Graduate Diploma in Legal Practice) <http://www.leocussen.edu.au/cb_pages/ptc_course_structure.php>.
- 183 Australian National University, Graduate Diploma of Legal Practice <<https://legalworkshop.law.anu.edu.au/gdip>>.
- 184 Law Institute of Victoria, above n 179, 1–2.
- 185 As part of the 2015 program, the LIV hosted sessions with panellists having expertise in family violence, children, police and criminal law: Law Institute of Victoria, above n 179, 3.
- 186 Ibid 4.
- 187 Transcript of Counsel, 7 August 2015, 2320 [17]–[19].
- 188 Law Institute of Victoria, above n 179, 4.
- 189 Ibid.
- 190 Victoria Legal Aid, Information package: Family Violence Panel 2014 (28 May 2014) 3–4. <<http://www.legalaid.vic.gov.au/sites/www.legalaid.vic.gov.au/files/vla-information-package-family-violence-panel-20141209.pdf>>.
- 191 Statement of Sinclair, 3 August 2015, 2 [9].
- 192 Victoria Legal Aid, Training helps lawyers walk the talk in dealing with family violence (19 August 2015) <<https://www.legalaid.vic.gov.au/about-us/news/training-helps-lawyers-walk-talk-in-dealing-with-family-violence>>.

- 193 Victoria Legal Aid, 'VLA Practice Essentials', provided by Victoria Legal Aid in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015; Victoria Legal Aid, 'New Lawyers Program' (2014), provided by Victoria Legal Aid in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 194 See, eg, Victoria Legal Aid, 'Training in Family Violence and Child Protection Guidelines— Description of Video Lecture', provided by Victoria Legal Aid in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 195 Transcript of Matthews, 7 August 2015, 2320 [30]–2321 [12].
- 196 Women's Legal Service Victoria, 'Presenter's Manual: A Workshop on Assisting Traumatized Clients—When Justice Takes its Toll', 1, provided by Women's Legal Service Victoria, 11 February 2016.
- 197 Women's Legal Service Victoria, 'Safer Families Program Description', 1, provided by Women's Legal Service Victoria, 11 February 2016. See also, Emma Pritchard, 'Safer Families Program Evaluation' (September 2014) provided by Victoria Legal Aid in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 198 Law Institute of Victoria, above n 179, 3.
- 199 Ibid.
- 200 Ibid 4.
- 201 Family Law Section—Law Council of Australia, Submission 863, 10–12. For information regarding the Detection of Overall Risk Screen tool see The Family Law DOORS <<http://www.familylawdoors.com.au/>>.
- 202 AVERT Family Violence, What is AVERT Family Violence? <<http://www.avertfamilyviolence.com.au/about-avert/>>.
- 203 Ibid.
- 204 Law Institute of Victoria, above n 179, 4.
- 205 Ibid.
- 206 No To Violence; Men's Referral Service, Submission 944, 40.
- 207 The Royal Women's Hospital, Submission 356, 2.
- 208 Ibid 7.
- 209 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Kelsey Hegarty et al), Submission 885, Briefing Paper 1, 3.
- 210 The Royal Women's Hospital, Submission 356, 7.
- 211 The Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, Medical Responses to Adults Who Have Experienced Sexual Assault (5 June 2012) <<https://www.ranzcog.edu.au/sexual-assault-module.html>>.
- 212 Royal Australian College of General Practitioners, Submission 486, 2.
- 213 Ibid.
- 214 Ibid 3.
- 215 Ibid.
- 216 Ibid.
- 217 Ibid 4.
- 218 Ibid 3.
- 219 Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists, Submission 395, 11–12.
- 220 Ibid 13.
- 221 Transcript of Callister, 10 August 2015, 2459 [13]–[16]. The module is entitled 'Protecting Children—Mandatory Reporting and other Obligations': Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Table of items where no relevant documents or data identified/available under Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015' (21 October 2015), 8–11, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 222 Statement of Callister, 4 August 2015, 39 [168], Attachment 16. Ms Callister also gave evidence that an adapted version of the module will be developed for early childhood teachers who were required to be registered with the Victorian Institute of Teaching from 30 September 2015 and who will therefore also become 'mandatory reporters': Statement of Callister, 4 August 2015, 39 [168].
- 223 Ibid Attachment 16, screen [21].
- 224 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 221, 8–11.
- 225 Transcript of Callister, 10 August 2015, 2458 [28]–[30].
- 226 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 10; Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Cathy Humphreys et al)—01, Submission 840, Briefing Paper 4, 7; Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 8; Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission 388, 4. See also Community consultation, Bendigo 2, 5 May 2015.
- 227 Confidential transcript of 'Ryan', 23 July 2015, C66 [1]–[8], C68 [15]–[17]; Confidential, Submission 38, 3–4; Confidential, Submission 883, 4; Anonymous, Submission 534, 21.
- 228 See, eg, Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency, Submission 947, 12; Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention and Legal Service Victoria, Submission 941, 23.
- 229 See, eg, Bethany Community Support, Submission 434, 13–14; Integrated Family Violence Partnership—Southern Melbourne, Submission 224, 4; Domestic Violence Victoria—04, Submission 943, 11–13.
- 230 Melbourne Research Alliance to end violence against women and their children (Prof Cathy Humphreys et al)—01, Submission 840, 7; Federation of Community Legal Centres, Submission 958, 8–9.
- 231 Statement of Allen, 13 July 2015, 26 [125]–[126].
- 232 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Child Protection Learning and Development Strategy 2014–15' (2014), 8, produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 233 Statement of Beaton, 12 October 2015, 6 [26]–[27].
- 234 Jenny Dwyer and Robyn Miller, 'Working with Families Where an Adult is Violent: Best Interests Case Practice Model' (Specialist Practice Resource, Department of Human Services, 2014).
- 235 Statement of Beaton, 12 October 2015, 8–9 [33].
- 236 Ibid 9 [35], 10 [37].
- 237 Ibid; State of Victoria, '2015–16 Budget Paper No 3: Service Delivery' (Department of Treasury and Finance, 2015) 5, 7.
- 238 Statement of Beaton, 12 October 2015, 2–3 [14].
- 239 Ibid 3 [15]–[16]. By October 2013 there were principal practitioners placed in every DHHS division across Victoria and they had a regular presence in every Child Protection office across the state: Statement of Miller, 14 July 2015, 25 [93].
- 240 Statement of Beaton, 12 October 2015, 3 [17].
- 241 Ibid 4 [20].
- 242 Ibid 4 [21].
- 243 Ibid 5 [23].
- 244 Ibid 3 [19].
- 245 Ibid 6 [24]–[25].

246 'As Chief Practitioner, I was very focussed on the knowledge from family violence services being well understood by child protection practitioners and trying to share the knowledge from child protection with the family violence sector and the family support sector': Statement of Miller, 14 July 2015, 22 [84].

247 Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Request #161', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

248 Department of Premier and Cabinet, above n 221, 20.

249 Department of Education and Training, 'Royal Commission into Family Violence - Notice to Produce 5 June 2015—Department of Education and Training Response', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

250 See, eg, Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 23; Seniors Rights Victoria, Submission 915, 31; Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 68. Family violence training, including risk assessment by Correction Victoria staff, is discussed in Chapters 18 and 34.

251 Victorian Alcohol and Drug Association, Submission 581, 18. See also Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 69.

252 Statement of Gruenert, 8 July 2015, 5 [31]; Statement of Abbott, 14 July 2015, 19 [72]. See also Department of Health and Human Services, 'The Adult AOD Screening and Assessment Instrument: Clinician Guide' (June 2013), 12–14, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

253 Statement of Abbott, 14 July 2015, 19 [73.3].

254 See, eg, Gippsland Integrated Family Violence Service Reform Steering Committee, Submission 691, 12.

255 Cobaw Community Health, Submission 396, 3.

256 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Request for information for the Royal Commission into Family Violence', 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

257 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Introduction to Disability Practice' (28 April 2015), 74, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

258 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Ready4work Disability Support Work Induction Resource Kit' (2014), 77–80, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to produce dated 5 June 2015.

259 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Beginning Practice in Youth Justice: Practice Clinic 3, Day 2', 17–23, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

260 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 69.

261 See, eg, NorthWestern Mental Health, Submission 993, 2.

262 The Royal Women's Hospital, Submission 356, 12; InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission 612, 20.

263 Grampians Community Health, Submission 520, 8. In regard to training required, see Justice Connect Homeless Law, Submission 889, 6, 40–41.

264 Transcript of Maguire, 13 October 2015, 3407 [15]–[28].

265 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 22.

266 Ibid.

267 Transcript of McNamara, 12 August 2015, 2828 [2]–[9]. See also Statement of McNamara, 12 August 2015, 8–9 [44].

268 Statement of McNamara, 12 August 2015, 8–9 [45].

269 Ibid 3–4 [23].

270 Ibid 4 [25].

271 Ibid 3 [21].

272 Ibid 18 [88].

273 Transcript of McNamara, 12 August 2015, 2825 [7]–[9].

274 Ibid 2826 [7]–[15].

275 Statement of McNamara, 12 August 2015, 10 [52]–[53].

276 'For example a 'highly skilled and experienced domestic violence employee might co-facilitate with someone who is highly skilled and experienced in working with drug and alcohol issues': ibid 6 [34].

277 Ibid 17–18 [87].

278 Ibid 2 [9].

279 Ibid 18 [90].

280 Statement of Diver, 3 August 2015, 22 [85].

281 Transcript of Diver, 12 August 2015, 2868 [23]–2869 [6].

282 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 19–20.

283 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945.

284 Ibid 19–20.

285 Ibid 20.

286 Ibid 20–1.

287 Ibid 29.

288 Department of Health and Human Services 'Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework Training: Final Report Nov 2011–Dec 2013' (prepared by Swinburne University of Technology in partnership with Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria and No To Violence), 3–5, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

289 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, Submission 945, 22.

290 Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, eLearning, The Lookout <<http://www.thelookout.org.au/training-events/craf/elearning>>.

291 In 2007 the then Department of Human Services allocated $2.1 million over three years as part of a strategy to develop an industry plan for the community managed housing and support sector, of which specialist family violence services form a part. The Commission understands the workforce strategy and industry plan did not proceed, however a workforce survey was conducted. This survey is referred to throughout this chapter: see KPMG Management Consulting, above n 12, 17–18.

292 Australian Association of Social Workers, Submission 388, 2.

293 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Victorian Centres Against Sexual Assault: Standards of Practice' (2008), 109, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

294 Transcript of Maguire, 13 October 2015, 3404 [18]–[27].

295 Transcript of Jaffe, 13 October 2015, 3399 [28]–[31].

296 Federal Student Aid, An Office of the US Department of Education, Public Service Loan Forgiveness <<https://studentaid.ed.gov/sa/repay-loans/forgiveness-cancellation/public-service>>.

297 Federal Student Aid, An Office of the US Department of Education, Teacher Loan Forgiveness <<https://studentaid.ed.gov/sa/repay-loans/forgiveness-cancellation/teacher>>.

298 HECS-HELP Benefit Guidelines No 1 made under section 238–10 of the Higher Education Support Act 2003 (Cth), Chapter 2.

299 Australian Government, HECS-HELP Benefit, Study Assist, <<http://studyassist.gov.au/sites/studyassist/payingbackmyloan/hecs-help-benefit/pages/hecs-help-benefit>>. The maximum amount will be indexed for later years.

- ³⁰⁰ Department of Justice and Regulation, Koori employment <<http://www.justice.vic.gov.au/utility/careers/koori+employment>>. See also Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Karreeta Yirramboi—Victorian Aboriginal Public Sector Employment and Career Development Action Plan 2010–2015' <<http://www.dpc.vic.gov.au/index.php/aboriginal-affairs/aboriginal-affairs-policy/victorian-aboriginal-economic-priorities>>.
- ³⁰¹ See Department of Health and Human Services, 'Certificate IV in Aboriginal Family Violence Work 22040VIC: Pilot Course evaluation—November 2009–May 2011', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015; Department of Health and Human Services, 'Delivery of Certificate IV Aboriginal Family Violence 2012–13', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- ³⁰² Statement of McNamara, 12 August 2015, 8 [42].
- ³⁰³ Ibid 3 [22].
- ³⁰⁴ Transcript of McNamara, 12 August 2015, 2833 [25]–2834 [8].
- ³⁰⁵ Statement of Miller, 14 July 2015, 25 [93].
- ³⁰⁶ See Corrections Prisons and Parole, Careers <<http://www.corrections.vic.gov.au/utility/careers/>>.

41 Investment

Introduction

This chapter considers current funding levels for programs aimed at preventing and responding to family violence. The Commission heard that funding is inadequate to meet existing demand and that further investment will be required to meet increasing levels of demand in the future.

We know that family violence affects physical health, mental wellbeing and financial security. Beyond the personal harm that family violence causes, it also has a significant economic cost at a societal level. This arises from the direct costs of preventing and responding to family violence (for example, policing, courts and crisis services) and also the indirect costs associated with its effects (for example, health costs or work absences).

Identifying the economic costs of family violence to individuals, government and the community as a whole is important when considering arguments for increasing government investment to prevent such violence and reduce its long-term impact on victims.

In this chapter, we outline recent efforts to estimate the overall economic cost of family violence. Different reports have different assumptions underpinning their estimates; however, all studies suggest that family violence imposes a large economic burden on individuals, government and the whole community. The most recent report estimates the cost of violence against women in Australia in 2014–15 at $21.6 billion.

The Victorian Government estimated that it spent $80.6 million in 2014–15 on family violence initiatives; however, this figure does not capture broader justice and health and human services costs and does not represent total family violence expenditure. Current state government budget structures and departmental funding processes make it difficult to quantify expenditure on family violence. This restricts the Victorian Government's capacity to determine the costs and benefits of particular interventions and plan for the future.

The Commission was told that existing funding arrangements obscure family violence costs—with homelessness funding highlighted as a key example. In addition, funding is currently heavily weighted to crisis responses, with prevention, early intervention and long-term recovery receiving only modest funding. The inadequacy of funding to keep pace with significant spikes in demand, compounded by funding fragmentation and a lack of statewide coordination, is placing significant pressure on service providers and failing to meet the needs of those experiencing family violence.

The Commission recommends additional investment to meet the significant costs associated with family violence. Increased investment in prevention and early intervention initiatives is critical to reducing these costs in the long term. Other proposed changes (including defining specific family violence-related performance measures) will help make family violence expenditure more transparent and make it easier to forecast demand, gauge the success of government policies and measure the performance of service providers and the system as a whole.

A more coordinated and strategic investment framework, that places victims' needs at its centre, is required to meet the enormous challenges of this serious social problem.

Context and current practice

Understanding the economic costs of family violence on society as a whole is an important starting point when considering further investment in policies and systems to prevent and respond to family violence. It assists in determining the appropriate level of investment, as well as demonstrating the economic benefits of investing to reduce rates of violence. In its submission, Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand observed:

Family violence comes at a financial cost to every Australian citizen ... Not discounting the fact that the prevention of family violence may well be a financially costly endeavour, without such investments, family violence will continue to erode our community and diminish the lives, security and independence, of thousands within it.¹

This section examines how both the economic cost on family violence and current government expenditure are measured. Three recent reports that seek to measure the societal costs of family violence and other violence against women are described. The most recent report by PwC found that the cost of violence against women in Australia in 2014–15 was $21.6 billion.

The discussion on government expenditure highlights the fact that the Victorian Government does not currently measure the full cost of family violence on its budget. The figure provided to the Commission of $80.6 million relates only to funding for specialist family violence services and does not take into account the many other services accessed by people experiencing family violence. These include Victoria Police, the court system and universal services, such as health services, as well as Child Protection and associated family services expenditure. The Commission requested that the Victorian Government undertake the process of measuring this total cost for 2013–14 and 2014–15. The result shows that while the overall expenditure by the Victorian Government cannot be precisely quantified, it is substantial.

Measuring the overall economic costs of family violence

The approach to estimating the economic burden imposed by family violence is similar to epidemiological approaches that model the economic costs of particular diseases in order to demonstrate the case for public health interventions. Researchers in New Zealand, Canada, the United Kingdom, the United States² and Australia³ have tried to measure the costs in this way.

Since the early 2000s three Australian reports on the economic costs of intimate partner violence have been commissioned by government and non-government organisations. The estimates they contain are based on assumptions about the prevalence of family violence and the particular effects such violence is likely to have on individual victims (including children) and perpetrators.⁴

Access Economics study

The federal Office of the Status of Women (now the Office for Women) commissioned Access Economics to conduct a study in order to raise community awareness of the costs of domestic violence and assist government policy makers in the allocation of resources.⁵ The study was based on 2002–03 data and estimated the economic costs of all forms of intimate partner violence—including violence in same-sex relationships. Domestic violence covered physical and sexual violence, threats and intimidation, and emotional and social abuse.⁶

In its report Access Economics cautioned that there are severe problems associated with ‘obtaining accurate estimates of many of the detailed components of costs’ and stated that ‘a considerable margin of uncertainty surrounded [the] estimates, many of which were based on limited data and parameters reflecting a large element of judgement’. The study team was particularly cautious about estimating the cost of a victim’s pain and suffering.⁷ Nevertheless, Access Economics estimated that in Australia in 2002–03 the total annual cost of domestic violence (as defined) was $8.1 billion,⁸ of which $3.5 billion was said to relate to pain, suffering and premature death.⁹

KPMG study

In 2009, the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children prepared a study to guide the development of the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022.¹⁰ The study, undertaken by KPMG, provided an estimate of the costs of violence by 2021–22 and the costs that could be avoided by reducing the levels of violence. Unlike the Access Economics study, the KPMG study included violence that is outside the scope of the Commission's work, for example, assault by strangers.¹¹

The KPMG study was a desk-top analysis that focused mainly on updating the Access Economics study. In contrast with the Access Economics study, it did not include the economic costs of violence by women against men. Using a methodology similar to that used by Access Economics, KPMG estimated the total cost of violence against women in 2008–09 in Australia (including violence by strangers) to be $13.6 billion.¹² The KPMG report said:

Without appropriate action to address violence against women and their children, an estimated three-quarters of a million Australian women will experience and report violence in the period 2021–22, costing the Australian economy an estimated $15.6 billion.¹³

The study referred to the proposed plan to reduce violence against women and children and said its 'estimates of cost savings were not based on specific proposals' in the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children but that these 'could be considered as part of a detailed business case for investment'.¹⁴

PwC Australia report

The most recent examination of the economic costs of family violence to the Australian community was conducted by PwC Australia under a contract with Our Watch and VicHealth.¹⁵ Its report was published in November 2015 (PwC report). Like the KPMG study, it covers both intimate partner violence against women and violence by strangers.¹⁶

The PwC report arrives at an economic cost of violence against Australian women by updating the Access Economics estimates and using more recent Australian Bureau of Statistics data on the prevalence of this violence.¹⁷ It estimates that the 2014–15 cost of all violence against Australian women¹⁸ was $21.7 billion, of which $12.6 billion was related to violence by a partner.¹⁹

The PwC report takes account of the costs borne by children in the care of a woman when violence was inflicted, but it does not estimate the cost of the long-term effects that children might suffer as a result of family violence against their mother.²⁰ It tries to measure the benefits of preventing violence against women through community mobilisation and individual and group participation programs directed at helping people 'sustain equal, respectful, non-violent relationships'.²¹ Using assumptions about the reductions that would be achieved by implementing these programs, it produced various estimates of the costs that would be avoided. The estimates of cost savings in both the KPMG and the PwC reports do not relate to savings in government expenditure: they are estimated reductions in the overall cost of family violence.

As noted, the scope of the Access Economics, KPMG and PwC studies differs, although each uses the same categories to estimate costs and allocate the proportion of the costs borne by victims, perpetrators, children, employers and government. Table 41.1 summarises the findings of each of the studies.

Table 41.1 Australian studies' estimates of the costs of reported violence against women and family violence

Study	Scope	Year	Estimate (A$)
Access Economics	Domestic violence (male and female victims)	2002–03	8.1 billion
KPMG	Domestic violence against women and children (excludes male victims) and non-domestic sexual assault (excludes male victims)	2007–08	13.6 billion
		2021–22	15.6 billion (forecast)
PwC	Partner violence—physical violence, sexual violence or emotional abuse by current or previous partner perpetrated against women (excludes male victims)	2014–15	12.6 billion
	All violence against women—physical violence, sexual violence, emotional abuse (by a partner) or stalking by any person perpetrated against women (excludes male victims)	2014–15	21.6 billion

Like the previous studies, the PwC report found that victims bear the greatest proportion of the overall cost: PwC's estimate was 31 per cent.²² The proportion of costs allocated to others includes 26 per cent to the Commonwealth Government, 14 per cent to society and the community, and 10 per cent to state and territory governments. Children accounted for seven per cent of the costs and perpetrators six per cent.²³ Appendix H provides the estimates and definitions for each of the cost categories in the study.

The PwC report found that pain, suffering and premature mortality accounted for about 48 per cent ($10.4 billion) of the cost associated with all violence against women (and 38 per cent of partner violence costs).²⁴ It stated, 'It [pain, suffering and premature mortality] represents a conceptual (rather than direct or indirect) cost of violence associated with the loss in quality of life either due to morbidity or premature death following violence.'²⁵ Excluding the cost of pain and suffering, the largest category of costs is described as 'consumption-related' costs, which the PwC report defines as 'the cost to repair or replace damaged or destroyed property and lost economies of scale' when women separate from violent partners and maintain separate households.²⁶

Application of estimates to Victoria

All three reports produce Australia-wide estimates.²⁷ The Victorian Government's submission arrived at a figure of $3.4 billion for Victoria.²⁸ This is derived from the KPMG report's Australia-wide estimate for 2007–08 and is calculated by reference to the proportion of the Australian population living in Victoria. Like the KPMG report, it includes violence committed against women by strangers, as well as intimate partners.

Differences in victims' circumstances—for example, higher Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander populations in some states—and in state-based responses to family violence, may affect the accuracy of the calculations. Assuming, however, that a calculation based on the population of Victoria is appropriate, that amount should now reflect the more recent Australia-wide figure calculated by PwC.

Applying the same methodology to apportion the cost estimate on a population-share basis of the PwC estimates indicates that the cost of intimate partner violence in Victoria was $3.1 billion in 2014–15.²⁹

Measuring government expenditure on family violence

The output budgeting process

The Commission heard that the Victorian Government uses 'output' budgeting processes. Under this process the government allocates a budget for each of a number of outputs, each of which is comprised of many programs and services.³⁰

A budget output consists of programs, initiatives and services designed to deliver a set of common objectives. Examples of budget outputs are policing services, child protection and family services, housing assistance, and mental health community support services.

Ms Melissa Skilbeck, Deputy Secretary of the Department of Treasury and Finance, told the Commission:

Outputs are the final products, or goods and services produced or delivered by, or on behalf of, a Department or public body and include products and services delivered to the community (e.g. education, health services), or products and services provided to other Departments (e.g. services provided by the Victorian Public Sector Commission to support the public sector).³¹

Through this process, responsibility is devolved to individual portfolio ministers and departments that manage a global budget to deliver agreed outputs, in line with departmental objectives.³²

The annual state budget shows the government's allocation of funding and the performance measures for each output. A department's budget is made up of the funding allocated to each of its outputs.

The Commission was informed:

Output performance measures specify a Department's expected service delivery performance. They are used to demonstrate the efficiency and effectiveness of output delivery (quantity, quality and timeliness) and the achievement of value for money (cost). As such they must be selected on the basis of their capacity to measure the extent and standard of output delivery.³³

The following are examples of output performance measures:

- ▷ the number of clients receiving case-management services—the Disability output³⁴
- ▷ the number of family services cases provided to Aboriginal families—the Child Protection and Family Services output³⁵
- ▷ the number of households assisted with crisis and transitional accommodation—the Housing Assistance output³⁶
- ▷ the case clearance rate (for example, Family Division matters disposed of in the Children's Court)—the Courts output.³⁷

Budget papers include both the target for each output performance measure for that budget year and performance against each measure's target. They also include the expected result for the year preceding the budget year and the actual result for the year before that.³⁸

The Commission was told that the main purpose of outputs and associated performance measures is to make state budget commitments visible to the public and to ensure that government is held financially accountable to Parliament each year.³⁹

There is no family violence output in the budget. Instead, family violence-related programs and activities form part of several outputs. For example, crisis (including refuge) accommodation⁴⁰ and specialist family violence case-management and outreach services,⁴¹ which are important components of the specialist family violence service system, come within the housing assistance output, while family violence counselling services are part of the child protection and family services output.⁴²

Of the estimated 1000 performance measures applicable to all outputs delivered by government, only three relate to family violence. Two of these are in the policing services output.⁴³ There are no output performance measures relevant to family violence in the housing assistance or child protection and family services outputs, or any of the numerous health-related outputs.⁴⁴

Victorian government expenditure on family violence

The Victorian Government's submission advised the Commission that the total budget for Victorian government-funded family violence services and programs was $80.6 million in 2014–15, consisting of $77.6 million for family violence-specific initiatives and $3 million for two non-specialist programs that have a significant family violence component.⁴⁵

Appendix J shows a full list of the programs that make up the $80.6 million total. The government's submission did not define family violence-specific initiatives, and the breakdown provided did not always make it clear what is covered. It appears, however, that this expenditure relates largely to specialist family violence services and includes some prevention costs. Because of the overlap between family violence and sexual assault, some of the $40 million provided for sexual assault services is also relevant to family violence. These figures are shown in Table 41.2.

Table 41.2 The Victorian Government's budget for family violence, 2014–15

Service/program	Funding ($ million)
Programs with significant family violence component ^a	3.0
Family violence-specific services	77.6
Total family violence services	80.6

a. This comprises two initiatives—the Homelessness Innovation Action Project (Family Violence), called Families at Home ($1 million), and Reducing Violence against Women and Their Children grants ($2 million).

Note: Subtotals do not add to total due to rounding.

Source: Based on State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix B.

The submission advises that a further $35.3 million is allocated for sexual assault programs services.⁴⁶

The figure of $80.6 million does not capture all expenditure on family violence-specific programs.⁴⁷ For example, it omits some programs delivered through Corrections Victoria and the cost of responding to male victims, which is delivered as part of the Victims Support Agency program administered by the Department of Justice and Regulation.⁴⁸

Table 41.3 shows how the $80.6 million is allocated between departments. The majority of the funded programs are administered through the Department of Health and Human Services, accounting for 88 per cent of all such funding.

Table 41.3 The Victorian Government's budget for family violence-specific services, by department, 2014–15

Government department/agency	Funding ($ million)	Percentage
Department of Health and Human Services	71.6	88.8
Court Services Victoria	5.4	6.7
Department of Justice and Regulation	2.2	2.7
Department of Premier and Cabinet—Office for Women's Policy	1.4	1.7
Total	80.6	100

Note: Percentages do not add to 100 due to rounding.

Source: Based on State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix B.

Additional funding for family violence services in 2015–16

Both the previous and the current Victorian governments have committed considerable additional funding to dealing with family violence.⁴⁹

The 2015–16 Victorian State Budget allocated an additional $81.3 million over five years for measures related to family violence.⁵⁰ A full list of the programs and services is provided in Appendix J. The Commonwealth Government also allocated additional funding in late 2015 for a range of measures. At the time of writing the exact allocation to Victoria had not been finalised.⁵¹

As far as the Commission can determine, the 2015–16 Victorian State Budget allocated an additional $15.7 million for 2015–16 for specialist family violence services. This is shown in Table 41.4.⁵² Assuming that the $80.6 million related to specialist family violence services in 2014–15 was maintained into 2015–16, this would result in the total Victorian government allocation to specialist family violence services growing to $96.3 million for 2015–16.

The state budget also allocated a further $9 million in 2015–16 to programs and services that, although not specific to family violence, would nonetheless contribute to the response to people experiencing family violence, for example, legal assistance.⁵³

Table 41.4 Additional investment in specialist family violence services and services that contribute towards addressing family violence funded from the 2015–16 Victorian State Budget⁵⁴

Service	($ million)
	2015–16	2016–17	2017–18	2018–19
Specialist family violence services	15.7	2.4	0.4	0.4
Services that contribute to family violence response (e.g. legal assistance)	9.0	1.4	0.4	0.4

Source: See Appendix J. This sets out a full list of initiatives that comprises the categories.

Note: Includes $2 million for the Family Violence Access Workers initiative, which provides additional staff to specialist family violence services to respond to L17 referrals and which was reported in the Budget as funded from the Family Violence Fund. State of Victoria, '2015–16 Budget Paper No 3: Service Delivery' (Department of Treasury and Finance, 2015), 6

As Table 41.4 shows, the majority of the additional investment is for one year only (2015–16). Considerable additional funding would need to be allocated from 2016–17 onwards to maintain this level of investment. The Commission understands that the Victorian Government will consider the recommendations made in this report as part of the 2016–17 budget process.

The importance of homelessness funding

Most specialist family violence services, including women's refuges and outreach services, are funded from homelessness funding as part of the housing assistance output in the state budget.⁵⁵ Homelessness funding was the main source of funding for the embryonic family violence service that began in the late 1970s with the establishment of women's refuges.⁵⁶ Homelessness funding was later extended to fund other specialist family violence support services.⁵⁷

The Housing Assistance output

Budget Paper No. 3 describes the Housing Assistance output as follows:

The Housing Assistance output, through the provision of homelessness services, crisis and transitional accommodation and long-term adequate, affordable and accessible housing assistance, coordinated with support services where required, home renovation assistance and the management of the home loan portfolio, aims to make a positive difference for Victorians experiencing disadvantage by providing excellent housing and community services to meet clients' needs.

This output provides:

- housing assistance for low-income families, older people, singles, young people and other households. It responds to the needs of clients through the provision of appropriate accommodation, including short-term and long-term properties that assist in reducing and preventing homelessness;
- housing support services to people who are homeless or at risk of homelessness and are in short-term housing or crisis situations. Support will assist clients in accessing and maintaining tenancies in appropriate accommodation. Services provided will assist in the prevention and overall reduction of homelessness and decrease demand for social housing.

This output supports the Department of Health and Human Services' immediate support and quality-of-life objectives.⁵⁸

Homelessness funding is administered by the Victorian Government, although both the Victorian and Commonwealth governments provide funds for this purpose. There are two main sources of funding:

- ▷ the National Affordable Housing Agreement (NAHA), under which the Commonwealth provides funding to states and territories as a contribution towards the provision of affordable, safe and sustainable housing. The funds are directed towards both social housing and homelessness assistance programs.⁵⁹ The Victorian Government also contributes funding.
- ▷ the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness (NPAH), which is a joint Commonwealth–state agreement focusing on people who are experiencing homelessness or are at risk of homelessness. NPAH includes prevention and early intervention services, and women escaping family violence are a primary target group. In 2015–16 the total value of the NPAH in Victoria was $53.2 million, comprising $22.8 million from the Commonwealth and $30.4 million from the Victorian Government.⁶⁰

The contributions made under these agreements, as well as the State's funding of social housing and homelessness programs that assist women and their children experiencing family violence, come under the housing assistance output.⁶¹

The NPAH was initially a four-year agreement (from July 2009 to June 2013) but it has been extended a number of times. At this stage, the Victorian Government has made its commitment under the NPAH until 2018.⁶² The Commonwealth commitment expires in June 2017.⁶³

Although NPAH-funded services are not restricted to family violence, $9.7 million from this source went to support the family violence programs that are set out in Table 41.5 in 2014–15.

Table 41.5 Family violence programs funded through the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness which lapse in June 2017, 2014–15

Program	Funds ($ million)
Safe at Home	1.8
Extended after-hours response	1.9
Indigenous family violence support responses (including two Indigenous refuge facilities, in Mallee and Inner Gippsland)	2.5
Aboriginal legal assistance	0.2
Men's case management (mainstream)	0.5
Men's case management (Indigenous)	0.6
Intensive case management	2.2
Total	9.7

Note: The value of the NPAH-funded initiatives shown here is an estimate at 2014–15 funding levels.

Source: Based on Department of Health and Human Services, 'Department of Health and Human Services—Response to Notice to Produce 20 August 2015 items 2(a)(ii) and 2(a)(iii)' produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August and 20 October 2015).

Funding for these family violence services will lapse in June 2017 (Commonwealth contribution) or June 2018 (Victorian contribution) unless the current financial commitments under the NPAH are extended. This uncertainty makes it difficult for providers to plan services for people experiencing family violence.

Overall government expenditure on family violence

As noted, the Victorian Government submitted a figure of $80.6 million as the budget for specialist family violence services in 2014–15. This figure does not, however, include many other services relevant to family violence.

The costs incurred by the police and the courts in dealing with family violence are high (as discussed later) and should be included in the overall cost. They can be described as follows:

- ▷ Victoria Police costs. These are costs incurred in responding to family violence—for attending incidents and processing police-initiated intervention orders, for criminal investigations and prosecutions, and for specialist staffing resources dedicated to redressing family violence.

- ▷ Court costs. These are the costs arising from hearing:
 - ▷ family violence intervention order applications in the Magistrates' Court
 - ▷ family violence–related family, youth and child protection matters in the Magistrates' and Children's Courts
 - ▷ criminal matters arising from contraventions (breaches) of family violence intervention orders and family violence that constitutes criminal offending (for example, physical and sexual assault and homicide).

Also included are court services such as the Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal, the Coroners Court, and the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal.

Additionally, the $80.6 million does not include the cost of Child Protection, including out-of-home care and the cost of Integrated Family Services that offer parenting assistance and early intervention for families, to the extent that these services are relevant to children affected by family violence.⁶⁴

An accurate estimate of expenditure should also account for the costs to government of other mainstream services used by victims of family violence, among them the following:

- ▷ hospitals and maternal and child health services
- ▷ mental health services provided to victims (and possibly perpetrators)
- ▷ generalist homelessness services—both accommodation and associated support
- ▷ sexual assault services, to the extent that the assaults occur in the context of family violence
- ▷ drug and alcohol services for victims or perpetrators, or both
- ▷ legal assistance provided through Victoria Legal Aid and community legal centre services
- ▷ corrections—both custodial and community-based services
- ▷ education services relating to prevention of family violence.

In August 2015 the Commission served a notice to produce asking that the Victorian Government provide information about the overall cost of family violence.⁶⁵ On 7 October 2015 the Commission met with representatives of the Departments of Premier and Cabinet, Treasury and Finance, Health and Human Services, Justice and Regulation and Education and Training and Victoria Police to discuss ways in which that information could be provided in comparable form.

The Victorian Government provided detailed spreadsheets outlining the total annual expenditure for a range of programs and the proportion of that expenditure estimated to be attributable to family violence—for example, hospital emergency department services. This material is summarised in Table 41.6. The government was not, however, able to provide an overall cost.

The Department of Premier and Cabinet provided information relating to costs incurred by particular programs prepared by several departments and agencies. It prefaced the information with the following remarks:

In preparing this information for the Commission the State has multiple challenges in compiling the data. Whilst the State provides services to people who experience or use family violence across a wide range of portfolios, there is no accepted and universal manner in which the information about this use is captured.

The difficulty in capturing this information is for a number of reasons. Primary amongst these is the way that data is captured and used by various services, programs or areas of Government. These difficulties include that some services do not inquire into the presence of family violence; others may inquire into the presence of family violence, but do not have a mechanism for flagging its existence in their data collection system; and others again do record the presence of family violence, but have case management systems which do not allow the mining of that data.

Ultimately, the State has compiled the attached information on the cost to the Government of family violence. However, there are strong reasons why this information should not be aggregated and presented as the total cost to the Government of family violence. These include:

- the different methodologies of the departments and agencies in collating this data, and associated costs;
- the clear gaps in the data provided; and
- the strong caveats attached to this information.

In addition, departments and agencies have applied [different] approaches to the cost of service provision including, the inclusion in some instance of 'back of house' support.

This exercise has served to reinforce what the Commission has heard through evidence and submissions, that the State does not currently have a way of collecting and using data on its service users consistently across services, programs and areas. The Government is pursuing reforms to change the way that data is captured, stored and used across agencies and departments. In particular, it anticipates that the Commission will make recommendations on the necessity of flagging the presence of family violence across the databases of services that assist people who experience and use family violence.

Further, scoping work is currently being undertaken, led by the Department of Premier and Cabinet, on information sharing in response to recommendations from the findings of the Coroner into the death of Luke Batty. Part of this work will look at how that information is gathered and stored, as well as shared.⁶⁶

Table 41.6 shows the individual estimates provided to the Commission. In the case of Victoria Police, which gave a range, the lowest cost is included. The cost estimates attributed to family violence are likely to be underestimates because some databases do not record, or under-record, whether the case is family violence-related.

A full list of the cost estimates and methodologies, caveats and qualifications can be found at www.rcfv.com.au.

Table 41.6 Estimates of the cost of family violence for programs funded or delivered by the Victorian Government, by department or agency, 2013–14 and 2014–15

($ million)
Department/agency	2013–14		2014–15
	Total budget	Attributable to family violence	Total budget	Attributable to family violence
Department of Education and Training
Schools
Student Support Officers—social workers and psychologists	19.3	n.p.	20.4	n.p.
Primary School Nursing Program	6.7	0.2	7.3	0.2
Secondary School Nursing Program	9.2	n.a.	9.9	n.a.
Early childhood
Maternal and Child Health—universal (state government share of budget)	35.0	1.8	36.2	n.a.
Maternal and Child Health—enhanced	13.0	0.1	13.4	0.1
Department of Health and Human Services
Community Services
Child FIRST	9.7	3.9	10.1	4.3
Family Services	78.7	26.6	84.1	27.8

($ million)
Department/agency	2013-14		2014-15
	Total budget	Attributable to family violence	Total budget	Attributable to family violence
Sexual assault support services	24.5	0.9	27.5	0.7
Child Protection	n.p.	84.9	n.p.	108.8
Out-of-home Care	283.7	136.4	316.3	166.4
Youth Justice (custodial)	n.p.	n.p.	n.p.	n.p.
Disability
Disability services	n.p.	n.p.	n.p.	n.p.
Housing and Homelessness
Homelessness	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
Public housing	843.3	58.4	780.6	54.0
Health
Hospitals—in-patient	n.p.	3.3	n.p.	4.1
Hospitals—emergency	n.p.	0.3	n.p.	0.3
Community Health Services—general counselling and casework	n.p.	0.1	n.p.	0.1
Community Health—community nursing, primary health and allied health	n.p.	0.0	n.p.	0.0
Ambulance—emergency	n.p.	7.8	n.p.	8.9
Ambulance—non-emergency	n.p.	n.p.	n.p.	n.p.
Ambulance—treat not transport	n.p.	n.p.	n.p.	n.p.
Drug and alcohol treatment services	136.0	27.0	145.5	29.1
Mental Health—clinical services, community care	364.5	19.7	364.3	19.7
Mental Health—community support services	114.0	6.2	119.0	6.4
Department of Justice and Regulation
Child Witness Service	n.p.	n.p.	0.8	0.4
Victims Assistance Program	8.5	2.9	9.4	3.8
Magistrates' Court of Victoria	n.p.	n.p.	126.1	43.5
Corrections Victoria
Community-based	n.p.	9.2	n.p.	10.5
Custodial	n.p.	27.9	n.p.	39.5
Office of Public Prosecutions	57.8	7.1	60.0	8.4
Victoria Police
Policing services	2.3 billion	704.4	2.5 billion	779.0

n.p. Not provided.

n.a. Not available.

All figures rounded to one decimal place.

Source: Based on data provided by the State of Victoria.⁶⁷

There is no other public information showing how much the Victorian Government spends on services relevant to family violence.⁶⁸

Challenges and opportunities

Many submissions argued that it is necessary to make changes to the funding levels and arrangements that guide family violence expenditure. Comments and criticisms related to the following:

- ▷ the absence of a discrete funding stream for family violence in the state budget
- ▷ the lack of transparency in relation to overall state expenditure on family violence
- ▷ the failure to ensure that funding arrangements are suitable for family violence.

Various proposals for resolving this situation were advanced. There was some support for the establishment of a specific family violence funding stream.⁶⁹ There was also support for funding arrangements that are tailored to respond to family violence.⁷⁰

Budget structures emphasise homelessness funding

Some submissions argued that reliance on housing and homelessness funding limits the development of family violence-related policy:⁷¹

By positioning family violence policy and funding under housing and homelessness streams, family violence remains restricted by the limitations of a policy and funding environment dominated by public housing, tenancy management and chronic homelessness.⁷²

The Department of Health and Human Services funds homelessness services, including refuges and outreach family violence services, delivered by non-government agencies. These agencies receive funding to provide 'episodes of support'.⁷³ The primary performance measure is '[t]he number of new support periods provided to address and prevent homelessness'.⁷⁴ This emphasises accommodation needs, or 'shelter', rather than safety. Some criticised this approach:

Most specialist family violence organisations are funded through homelessness funding streams. The focus of this funding is naturally on reducing homelessness and supporting people into secure accommodation. However this focus on accommodation does not adequately recognise the importance of safety for victims of family violence.⁷⁵

The key challenge ... that it presents is that all of the emphasis is on finding accommodation for women and not on providing safety to women. So the focus of safety is not central to the targeted funding that is available. It's all about providing beds and accommodation for women.⁷⁶

Some submissions also argued that the focus on the Housing Assistance output affects the visibility and costs of specialist family violence services:

The funding for family violence services – the 'system' is funded as though family violence is incidental and temporary, primarily buried within state homelessness budget programs and other community service funding streams.⁷⁷

The Commission was informed that relying on this funding source might also not take into account children's unique needs:

The current funding model for family violence services based on the prevention of homelessness rather than comprehensive family violence support services ensures that children are not considered as service clients in their own right.⁷⁸

Domestic Violence Victoria submitted:

Funding through budget programs that are not family violence-specific results in funding agreements on outputs – and therefore, most importantly, collected data – does not match the work family violence specialist services actually do. Funding and service agreements based on homelessness measure outcomes against preventing women and children from becoming homeless but do not address the range of other resource-intensive service supports women and children experiencing family violence need. Failure to adequately capture this need through the data results in the continuation of inadequate funding and system overload.⁷⁹

Some submissions supported the idea of a separate funding stream solely for family violence programs:

A new funding channel for family violence services is required to proactively drive a holistic approach, enable comprehensive data collection, and set out clear outcome measures, about a range of family violence interventions.⁸⁰

DHHS delink domestic/family violence funding model from the homelessness sector because their outcomes do not focus on safety, education and domestic violence support or perpetrator accountability.⁸¹

The Royal Commission [should] investigate the benefits of a separate funding stream for specialist family violence services that is focused on safety and support as well as accommodation outcomes.⁸²

The Commission heard that South Australia considered separating funding for homelessness from family violence funding but decided not to do so. Instead, South Australia decided to establish performance indicators that were more sensitive to the goals of preventing family violence, keeping victims safe and providing necessary support:

It was recognised that there were some real limitations for domestic violence services being funded under the homelessness banner, however it was decided that would not be changed. Instead we focused on shifting the Key Performance Indicators ... for the sector. We noted, for example, that under homelessness, a repeat user is seen as a negative outcome, whereas for domestic violence, that is actually a good outcome. It means that the woman is connecting with us and it gives us the opportunity to work with them to develop safety plans, to conduct risk assessments and to ensure that the appropriate services are wrapped around that family.⁸³

In response to questions from the Commission during hearings, departmental secretaries addressed the option of establishing a separate family violence output in each of the relevant departments.⁸⁴ For example, funding for Victoria Police could include an output that captured the full range of activities, services and programs and the cost of responding to family violence.

The Commission has also considered the possibility of retaining the existing output structure but adding output performance measures that reflected various aspects of family violence to relevant outputs—particularly Housing Assistance, Child Protection and Family Services, and Policing Services. For example, these could include measures relating to the proportion of women seeking refuge accommodation who are admitted within a specific period or women’s and children’s waiting times for family violence counselling. Ms Kym Peake, Acting Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services (now Secretary), said ‘it would signal very strongly the priority that is given to family violence to have clear performance measures in the budget papers’.⁸⁵ Such measures would then guide departmental contracting arrangements with service providers.

Another option put forward by Mr Chris Eccles, Secretary of the Department of Premier and Cabinet, involves funding being structured to support a whole-of-system outcomes model.⁸⁶ While noting benefits such as ‘build[ing] coalitions that are motivated by a shared purpose’,⁸⁷ he acknowledged that robust data would be required and this approach would be inhibited by data limitations. He cautioned that there were risks associated with moving to an outcomes approach without assurance mechanisms that provided assurance to ensure funding was properly and efficiently expended.⁸⁸

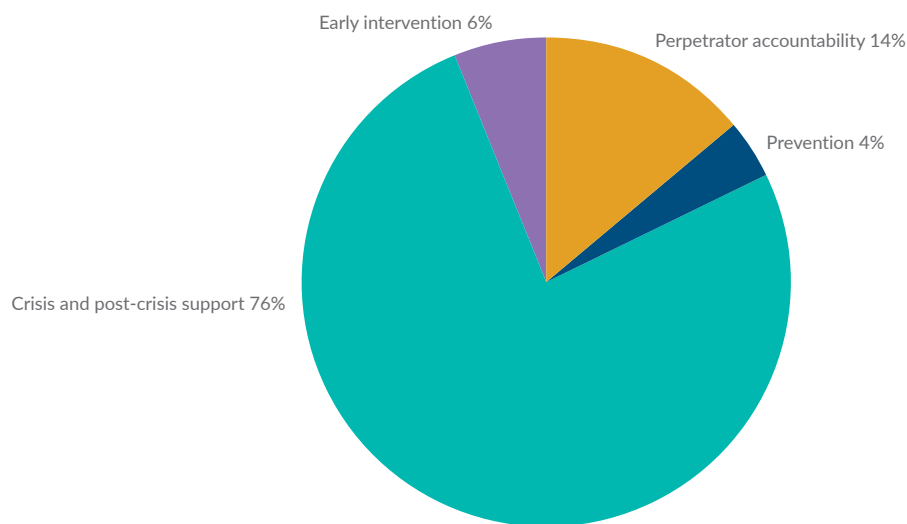

A focus on crisis response

The bulk of Victorian government funding is directed towards meeting the needs of family violence victims when they are in crisis. In comparison, relatively small amounts are directed towards prevention, early intervention or the longer term recovery of victims. Figure 41.1 shows how the $80.6 million the Victorian Government spent on specialist family violence services in 2014–15 is split between prevention, early intervention, crisis and post-crisis support, and perpetrator accountability. Seventy-six per cent is allocated to services classified in the Victorian Government’s submission as ‘Crisis response and post-crisis support’. The Commission assumes these support services are largely directed towards victims, since the Victorian Government’s submission identifies perpetrator accountability as a separate service category.⁸⁹

Prevention and early intervention account for four per cent and six per cent respectively. This imbalance would be even greater if the resources expended on the police and courts were taken into account. This is consistent with evidence the Commission received suggesting that prevention and the longer-term recovery of victims are poorly funded.⁹⁰

A similar pattern was evident in the New Zealand examination of government expenditure on family violence.⁹¹ The New Zealand situation is further examined later in this chapter, under the heading ‘The way forward’.

Figure 41.1 Victorian government budget for family violence, by service category, 2014–15

Source: Based on State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix B.

Demand exceeding supply

Submissions demonstrated that current funding levels for services for victims, perpetrators and children are inadequate to meet demand.⁹² The Victorian Government submission acknowledged there is ‘significant unmet demand’ in the family violence system:

Despite recent investment, there is still significant unmet demand for family violence service response for victims. This is particularly the case for early intervention and crisis responses (including services handling referrals from Victoria Police), but it has also been raised in relation to prevention and perpetrator accountability initiatives, too.⁹³

A number of specialist family violence services informed the Commission they have difficulty balancing their response to police L17 referrals with the need to provide support to victims who seek it.⁹⁴ The Commission was also told that few women who need refuge accommodation are able to secure it immediately. Instead, they are placed in ad hoc interim accommodation such as motels and boarding houses.⁹⁵ The Commission was told by Safe Steps that every night about 35 per cent of beds available remain empty because women and families do not ‘match’ the provider’s criteria.⁹⁶

Perpetrators of violence against their female partners also have to wait for access to behaviour change programs.⁹⁷ In addition, these programs are designed mainly for men responsible for intimate partner violence, so there is little support for people who are responsible for other forms of family violence.⁹⁸

Figures 41.2 and 41.3 illustrate the relationship between the demand for services and funding for services. They use formal police referrals for female victims and perpetrators as indicators of demand for family violence services. They plot the growth in these referrals against the primary specialist family violence services provided to female victims and men’s services.

Figure 41.2 Cumulative percentage increase in formal police referrals for female affected family members and funding for specialist family violence services for women and their children, 2009–10 to 2013–14

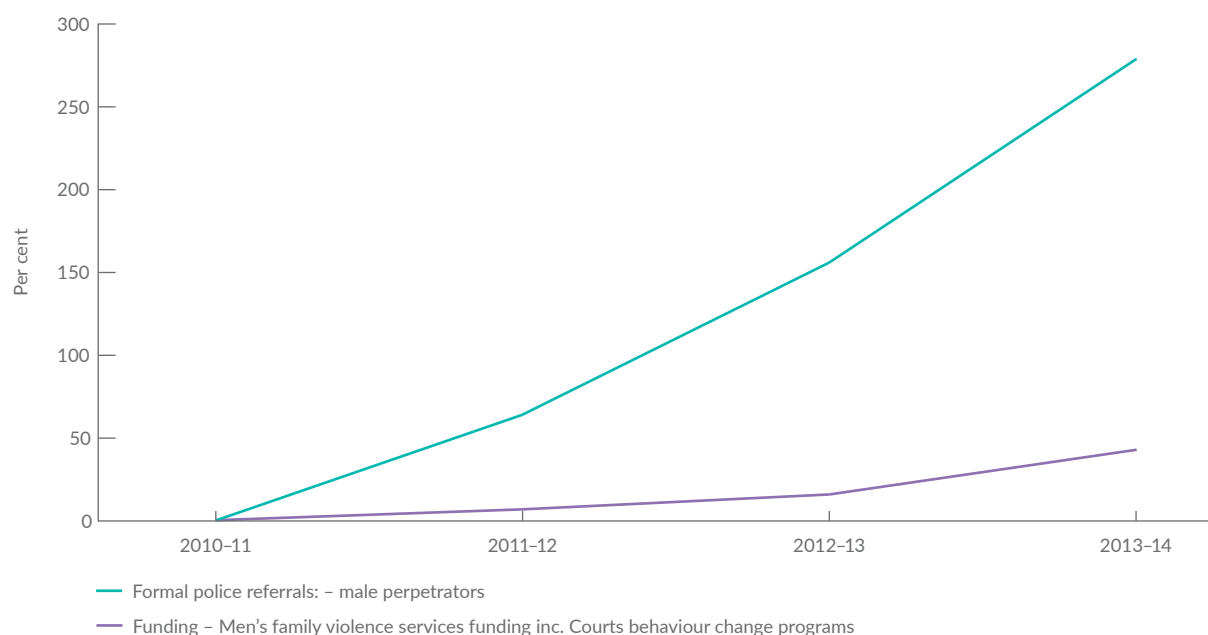

Notes: ‘Specialist family violence services’ includes funding for refuges (crisis supported accommodation for family violence services), specialist family violence support services (transition support for family violence services) and family violence counselling.

Sources: Based on Crime Statistics Agency, An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14 (January 2016), Tab 31, Table 31: Referrals made by Victoria Police by police region and gender of affected family member, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015; Department of Health and Human Services, ‘Royal Commission into Family Violence SAMS Data Request (2009–2014)’ (1 January 2014), Department of Health and Human Services, ‘Query 70’, Tab Q70(94671_FamViolenceStage2), and Department of Health and Human Services, ‘Query 66 MASTER 1 July—sent to RC’, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission’s Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

It is evident that supply has not kept pace with demand. Formal police referrals for female victims rose by 317 per cent between 2009–10 and 2013–14,⁹⁹ while funding for specialist family violence services for women and their children increased by only 17 per cent during the period.

Funding for men’s family violence services—including voluntary men’s behaviour change programs—grew by 34 per cent (not including funding allocated by the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria for mandated men’s behaviour change programs), while formal police referrals for perpetrators grew by 592 per cent between 2009–10 and 2013–14.

Figure 41.3 Cumulative percentage increase in formal police referrals for perpetrators and funding for men's family violence services, 2009–10 to 2013–14

Notes: Men's Family Violence services, funded by the Department of Health and Human Services, include Men's Referral Service, and voluntary men's behaviour change programs which includes funding for the Enhanced Service Intake.

Source: Based on Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14' (January 2016), Tab 31, Table 31: Referrals made by Victoria Police by police region and gender of affected family member, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015; Department of Health and Human Services, 'Query 66 MASTER 1 July—sent to RC', produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.

Formal referrals have an impact on services as they require an action, including triaging and follow-up. However, the Commission notes that referrals require the services that receive L17s to attempt to contact victims and perpetrators and advise them they can seek support. The Commission was unable to ascertain the proportion of victims and perpetrators who actually sought and received further help from the service that received the L17. Some people decline offers of assistance or cannot be contacted. Nevertheless, the scale of the growth in demand is significant, and may well have had a sizeable flow on effect in terms of the number of people requiring assistance.

Additional funding for core services was provided in the 2015–16 State Budget, but it was for that year alone.¹⁰⁰ As Table 41.4 shows, the amounts allocated in forward estimates for the ensuing years are very small.

Inadequate planning to meet demand

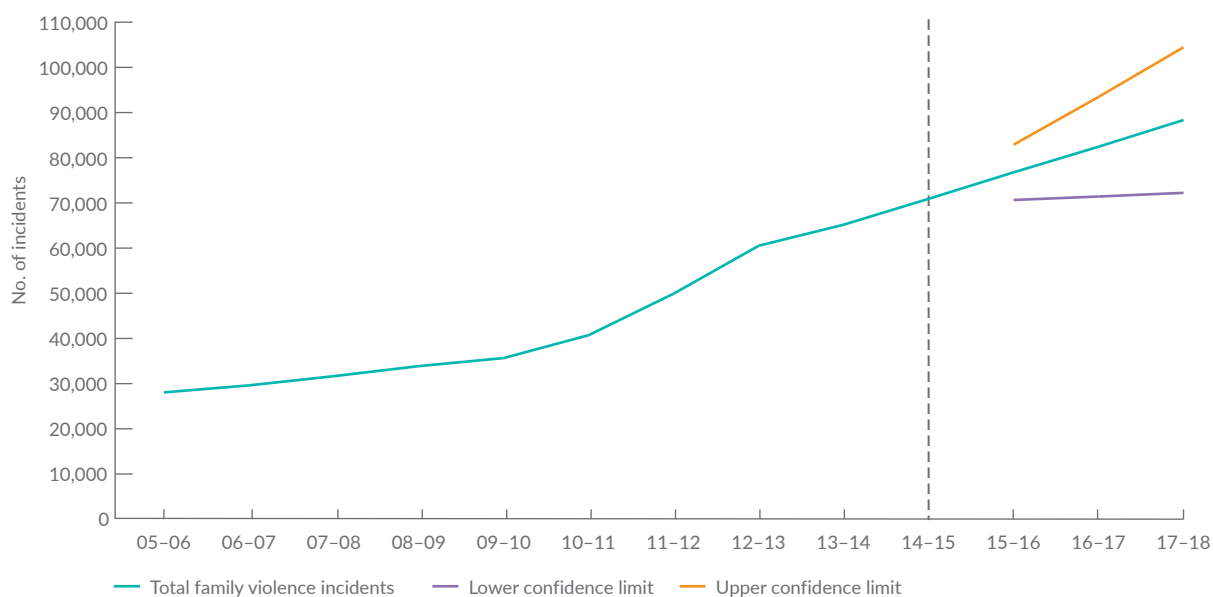

The Commission heard that there is no whole-of-government process for systematically and regularly forecasting the demand and resource requirements for family violence services. Individual departments and agencies generally measure the growth and, in many cases, seek to anticipate the future growth as part of considering how best to respond.

Both Victoria Police and DHHS prepare forecasts of police family violence incidents using the crime statistics produced by the Crime Statistics Agency, which are compiled from information recorded in the Victorian Police Law Enforcement Assistance Program, or LEAP, database.¹⁰¹ DHHS advised the Commission that its 'forecasts do not make any assumptions about specific demand drivers—the purpose is to accurately predict the volume of family violence incidents into the future based on the trends and patterns evident in the time series data.'¹⁰² The methodology involves a number of forecast models.

At the request of the Commission, DHHS updated its forecasts using the most recent data until June 2015.¹⁰³

Figure 41.4 shows the forecast until 2017–18, including the upper and lower confidence levels at 95 per cent. The graph predicts a steadily increasing number of incidents in the three years from 2015–16 to 2017–18. The number of incidents is predicted to rise to 88,347 by 2017–18; a 25 per cent increase on 2014–15.¹⁰⁴

Figure 41.4 Family violence incidents attended by Victoria Police: 2005–06 to 2014–15 and forecast to 2017–18

Note: Figure includes lower and upper 95 per cent confidence limits.

Source: Department of Health and Human Services, 'Total Family Violence Incidents Forecast for Victoria prepared for the Royal Commission into Family Violence', 4, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 2 September 2015.

Funding arrangements for family violence services

The Commission also heard criticisms of administrative arrangements that determine the way departments and agencies purchase services and oversee the performance of contractual requirements relating to family violence services. Because the budget structure and processes influence internal departmental practices, these criticisms are discussed here.

The main concerns expressed relate to the following:

- ▷ the lack of funding for coordination between services
- ▷ fragmentation of service delivery
- ▷ a lack of focus on outcomes for victims and perpetrators
- ▷ a short term rather than strategic focus
- ▷ the need for better measurement of what is delivered.

The Commission notes that a number of these criticisms are not confined to responses to family violence but instead apply more broadly to human services. They have often been the subject of earlier studies and attempted reforms.¹⁰⁵

Lack of funding for coordination activities

The Commission was told of the need for collaboration and coordination between services to achieve the best results for victims of family violence.¹⁰⁶ Many submissions noted that this requires staff specifically funded for such activities:

Government expects these services and their employees to be able to work in an integrated way – within and across sectors – on complex solutions for vulnerable people yet fails to adequately resource programs or recognise the obstacles such as limited time, opportunity and sometimes goodwill for this to be effectively achieved.¹⁰⁷

Any initiative to coordinate, collaborate or co-deliver with other agencies must therefore come from a re-prioritisation of agency funds (i.e. taking people, time and resources from one activity to give to another).¹⁰⁸

In the development of the Go Goldfields Project, there have been barriers to implementation due to insufficient resources and capacity to promote integration and co-ordination.¹⁰⁹

The Commission was also told that a lack of diversity among service providers in rural communities can severely hamper the responsiveness and effectiveness of services.¹¹⁰ This is discussed in Chapter 33.

Fragmentation of service delivery

As discussed in Chapter 8 and 13, there are a large number of service providers offering various combinations of programs but few providers who deliver a full suite of services. Ms Peake remarked, 'It is absolutely the case currently that we have a proliferation of small programs that have very prescriptive description of what is to be delivered'.¹¹¹ Ms Peake told the Commission that funding at the departmental or program level has been shaped by historical arrangements that hinder the holistic delivery of services for people with complex needs:

We have a system which is really devised according to historical programmatic interventions. If I just give you a bit of a picture of that, within child and family and community services there are over 5,000 activity level service agreements across more than 200 programs. Each of those programs is designed around historical groupings of clients and doesn't reflect, as this report highlights, the complex needs of both disadvantaged people and their communities, and doesn't really enable there to be service responses that cross over program boundaries.¹¹²

Multiple discrete allocations mean that service providers need to go to considerable lengths to bring together multiple different funding sources in order to construct a service response that is viable.

The Commission was also informed that this approach results in uneven service provision—adversely affecting service users and posing difficulties for service providers—which must often meet multiple reporting requirements. This creates a heavy administrative burden associated with reporting and accounting for multiple disparate sets of funding.¹¹³ For example, Mr Rudolph Kirby, Chief Executive Officer of Mallee District Aboriginal Services, said that up to 30 per cent of funded time is spent on reporting and accounting for funding.¹¹⁴

Similar weaknesses were identified in the New Zealand social service system in a recent review by the New Zealand Productivity Commission. Mr David Heatley from the New Zealand Productivity Commission demonstrated how multiple funding lines can result in fragmentation:

This was a case study of one provider that received – the numbers are from memory but they are approximately right – had approximately 12 funders, ran about 30 programs, and for them when faced with a client their problem was how to match the client to the programs they were funded for. They represented it as 30 jam jars and each jam jar has a sticker on it with a bunch of eligibility criteria and they are trying to work out which pot they can dip into to get some funding and resources to apply to that client.

The rules around spending from each jam jar were different. The reporting requirements around each jam jar were different. They estimated they spent around 25 per cent of their total time just on reporting and contract management. So that's a pretty high administrative load.¹¹⁵

The Commission's research shows that, of the 28 agencies that provide specialist family violence support services, nine receive funding for between 10 and 13 different programs—such as outreach case management, Safe at Home, private rental brokerage, crisis accommodation and court support—and a further 10 provide between five and nine programs. The details of this are in Appendix K.

As a consequence of these arrangements, people affected by family violence cannot expect to receive the same services or the same level of services in different parts of Victoria. The situation has other consequences too:

- ▷ Service users must contact many different service providers in order to receive the combination of services that best meets their needs.
- ▷ People must tell their story repeatedly.
- ▷ Services might not be delivered in the right combination or sequence because each service provider has different offerings and priorities.

The level of fragmentation is even greater among Aboriginal community controlled organisations. Unlike mainstream services, most Aboriginal agencies receive funding for only one or two programs and there are only two such agencies funded to deliver three programs from eight funding streams.¹¹⁶

In Chapter 38 the Commission recommends that the Victorian Secretaries Board oversee the implementation of the proposed Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, to facilitate development of a whole-of-government response to family violence. In the Commission's view, this plan should explore ways of consolidating service provision, ensuring more even access to services throughout Victoria and reducing the need for service providers to account for expenditure in many different funding streams.

Contractual arrangements not focusing on outcomes

The Department of Health and Human Services purchases specialist family violence services, such as refuges and men's behaviour change programs from community service organisations.¹¹⁷ The Victorian Government argued that departmental arrangements should place more emphasis on outcome monitoring:

Current performance-monitoring arrangements encourage community service organisations to deliver against agreed target outputs. There is a requirement that community service providers funded by government will adhere to documented standards. Monitoring service delivery outcomes is limited within existing frameworks. This has been affirmed by the recent VAGO audit of early intervention services for vulnerable children and families which concluded that Child FIRST and Integrated Family Services had limitations in service performance data and a lack of outcomes monitoring at the system level.¹¹⁸

Many agreed that current processes do not focus on the outcomes.¹¹⁹ Submissions to the Commission suggested that the outcomes should capture the goal for the client, rather than measuring what is provided by the service.¹²⁰ It was noted by Safe Steps, however, that outcomes-focused funding requires agreed objectives as the basis of performance measurement.¹²¹ Chapter 38 notes that currently there are no cohesive and agreed whole-of-government objectives to guide the prevention of and responses to family violence.

The focus of submissions on outputs rather than outcomes largely relates to services funded by DHHS, which is the department responsible for a high proportion of the funded services delivered to people affected by family violence. Comments generally related to contractual agreements with funded providers. Some of the comments discussed here are, however, also relevant to services delivered directly by the Victorian Government, such as police and court services.

Poor measurement of what is purchased

The Victorian Government provided the Commission with data about the level of services it had purchased across a range of programs as well as the level of services actually delivered. However, it told the Commission it was not able to provide actual performance data against the level of service purchased for those family violence services funded through the homelessness stream, which takes in refuges and specialist family violence services such as support for women, Stay at Home, Private Rental Brokerage and Intensive Case Management.¹²² This is because the way the Victorian Government buys its services does not align with the data-collection system.¹²³

A national data-collection system exists for all homelessness-funded services, including those for women experiencing family violence. The Australian Institute of Health and Welfare administers this system, which produces annual reports on service activity that includes both national and jurisdictional data.¹²⁴ It is not clear what, if any, data is provided directly by the AIHW to the Victorian Government to enable it to measure and monitor performance at either an individual provider level or across particular sectors such as specialist family violence services funded through homelessness.

Short-term funding

The Commission heard that family violence funding is often allocated on a short-term basis, and it was submitted that this approach inhibits effective responses to family violence:

Funding uncertainty means that services divert limited time and staff resources to chasing funding through tenders and philanthropy. Programs are often short-term and project-based with insufficient time for proper evaluation or the capacity of successful programs to be continued, frustrating and demoralising both clients and workers.¹²⁵

Some argued that uncertainty associated with short-term funding inhibits recruitment and retention of staff, makes it difficult to build relationships with clients over time, and affects planning for the future.¹²⁶ This was a strong message from the Indigenous Family Violence Regional Action Groups:

In the northern region the IFVRAG receive $59,000 for small Aboriginal family violence projects such as [W]hite [R]ibbon promotions, educational programs for youth and women/men's camps. Limitations of both the amount of funding and the one off projects funded through the IFVRAGS pose real risks for sustainable change in the Aboriginal community.¹²⁷

Short funding windows means that [the] community are regularly engaged with a project and then disengaged with when funding runs out. This can leave communities disenchanting.¹²⁸

This issue is considered further in Chapter 26.

It was also argued that short-term funding prevents effective evaluation:

Much energy, time and resource is spent by organisations navigating funding opportunities to complement base SHS [Specialist Homelessness Service] funding with bizarre partnership tendering for 'one of' [sic] projects that include a natural sunset clause as they are only funded for [a] limited period. Rarely are they long enough to collect any real research and evidence and before long they end and the money dries up.¹²⁹

The long term nature of prevention activities means that organisations such as ANROWS and Our Watch need to know that they have access to funding over many years if they are going to achieve the results we anticipate they can. Such funding would also enable the development of a dedicated and skilled workforce of practitioners who can lead this work over the next decades and the development of appropriate evidence and resources to drive this work.¹³⁰

Additionally, the Commission was informed that this approach limits the Victorian Government's ability to move towards funding and measuring outcomes, rather than outputs and inputs:

[F]unding acquittals are increasingly focussing on the notion of 'outcomes' that are inherently difficult, if not impossible, to demonstrate in the current funding model. Essentially, MonashLink is being asked to prove its service's efficacy without the capacity to do so.¹³¹

The way forward

The Royal Commission's terms of reference emphasise the importance of establishing a culture of non-violence. This culture needs to be promoted both within families and throughout the broader community.

The Commission considers that further investment is necessary to prevent family violence and to improve early intervention to support families where there is a risk of violence occurring. Investment is also required to keep victims safe, to help them recover from the emotional and economic effects of past violence and, wherever possible, to help perpetrators stop using violence.

The current economic costs of and state expenditure on family violence are substantial. Reforms that meet the objectives just stated should, in the long term, reduce violence and enable former victims and perpetrators to become productive members of society. It is the Commission's view that the Victorian community would support increased Victorian government expenditure on family violence in order to achieve these purposes.

Later in this chapter we recommend that the Victorian Government should identify revenue sources to support that investment. Alterations to funding processes should be made to help to bring about these changes. These include the following:

- ▷ making the costs associated with family violence more transparent
- ▷ introducing family violence performance measures in the state budget
- ▷ giving greater emphasis to prevention, early intervention (including family support) and recovery
- ▷ stabilising the service system
- ▷ forecasting service demand
- ▷ changing the way departments and agencies fund and monitor service provision
- ▷ investigating the possibility of partnership agreements with the Commonwealth.

Making family violence expenditure more transparent

Although it is not possible to ascertain the overall costs family violence imposes on the community, there is no doubt that they are substantial. Using the PwC report's estimate of the cost of intimate partner violence in Australia, the overall cost in Victoria would have been $3.1 billion in 2014–15.¹³²

The three studies discussed earlier in the chapter—the Access Economics, KPMG and PwC reports—also demonstrate that a major portion of these costs is borne by individual victims, particularly when pain and suffering are included.

Because of the caveats on the accuracy and usefulness of the figures provided to it, the Commission did not attempt to estimate total Victorian government expenditure on family violence. Nevertheless, all the evidence suggests that both the overall economic costs of family violence and Victorian government expenditure on responding to it are likely to increase in the absence of adequate government funding for programs to prevent violence, support victims and hold perpetrators to account. In the Commission's view, the Victorian community could reasonably accept the argument that further government investment in this area is necessary and would support such an investment.

Unfortunately, however, the fact that there is inadequate information on family violence expenditure inhibits the development of whole-of-government policies aimed at preventing such violence and helping those who are affected by it. At present it is difficult, if not impossible, for the Victorian Government to do a number of things:

- ▷ consider areas in which services could be provided more effectively and efficiently. For example, a better understanding of the costs of policing related to family violence could result in the development of more effective models for policing that make victims safer by preventing an escalation of family violence
- ▷ compare the cost–benefits of particular interventions, especially those delivered by a mainstream service such as a hospital
- ▷ ascertain the resources that could be released for other purposes if there was a reduction in the prevalence of family violence or an increase in the effectiveness and efficiency of services
- ▷ identify particular areas where expenditure is inadequate to meet the needs of people affected by family violence, so as to allow decisions to be made about whether additional funding is needed
- ▷ set a baseline against which changes over time could be measured
- ▷ identify areas where workforce increases are required in order to support workforce planning.

Having faced a similar situation in 2014, the New Zealand Government embarked on an exercise to determine its expenditure on family violence, child abuse and sexual violence services—including courts, police and support services. It concluded that annual expenditure is about NZ$1.4 billion a year. Because New Zealand is a unitary state rather than a federation, the NZ$1.4 billion estimate includes costs that would be met by the Commonwealth Government in the Australian system.¹³³

The New Zealand exercise found that most government expenditure is for services delivered to respond to the immediate impact of a violent incident, going to generalist services—specifically prisons for perpetrators and hospitals and general practitioner services for victims. Only a small proportion of total spending is directed to specialist services, with those responding to child abuse and neglect accounting for the largest proportion in this category. Similarly, only a small proportion of the funding is spent on primary prevention and screening.¹³⁴

The fact that generalist services absorbed the largest proportion of government expenditure on family violence in New Zealand reinforces the case that Victoria needs to understand how much family violence costs all service systems. It is important that this includes expenditure on family violence–related child abuse and neglect. The New Zealand Government demonstrated that it is possible to conduct an exercise of this kind.

The Victorian Government acknowledges that family violence makes up much of the work of mainstream services. When the Victorian Government knows how much it spends on family violence, it will be easier to determine the value of particular interventions. The Commission considers it imperative for Victoria to embark on this process. It might not be possible or appropriate to replicate the New Zealand methodology, but lessons can be learnt from the experience there. There is a need to establish a system for continuing identification of family violence–related costs within Victorian government departments. This will significantly assist with evaluating the costs and benefits of particular programs.

The Commission believes that the Victorian Government should know the explicit cost of family violence to its budget, beyond the funding it provides for specialist family violence services. To put this beyond doubt, we propose that the Victorian Government develop a methodology for measuring the cost of family violence across services and programs that respond to family violence—for example, the costs of policing-related responses to family violence, or the cost of hospital emergency departments in treating victims of family violence. We propose that the Victorian Government publicly report data pertaining to the cost of family violence regularly.

The Commission agrees that a reduction in the incidence of family violence through greater expenditure on prevention and early intervention will, in time, reduce costs to government (both state and federal) and to the community as a whole. However, robust research is required, so that we know which programs, services and interventions achieve their objectives. Cost–benefit analyses could help determine whether the value of the benefits outweighs the costs incurred to achieve the desired results. This information could contribute to policy and funding decision makers' deliberations about which interventions, programs and services provide the best return on investment.

Although there is emerging evidence that governments can intervene in ways that will generate social and economic benefits, further research is needed in order to understand what works. ANROWS (the Australian National Research Organisation for Women's Safety) has noted the need for such research.¹³⁵ In Chapter 38 the Commission proposes the establishment of an independent Family Violence Agency. Such an agency could provide advice to the Victorian Government on how to cost the impacts of family violence across government and the effect of initiatives to reduce or prevent family violence.

Family violence-related performance measures

As explained, the lack of performance measures in budget outputs relevant to family violence makes it difficult for the Victorian Government to assess whether current expenditure is being suitably directed.

The Commission agrees with the argument that the provision of a significant proportion of family violence funding under the aegis of homelessness contributes to the lack of transparency about the funding of family violence services. But, despite the possible symbolic value of providing a separate stream of family violence funding for specialist family violence services, it is doubtful that this approach would make it easier to identify family violence expenditure throughout the Victorian Government. There are ways of resolving this problem without altering the existing budget output structure.

The Commission also rejects the approach of creating a family violence output for each relevant department. One risk of doing this would be that departments without such an output would not consider they had a role in relation to family violence, and this would be inconsistent with the Commission's view that there should be a whole-of-government approach to preventing and responding to family violence. We also note the warning in the evidence of Ms Peake about the possible unintended effects of such an approach:

... pulling out the specialist services to have a particular output would just be the risk of sending a signal that for all the rest of the services that are funded—health services, the rest of the child protection—the whole of the child protection system, the whole of the housing system—that there is a suggestion that it's only the small part that is specifically funded for specialist family services that is relevant to tackling family violence.¹³⁶

Instead, the Commission favours the introduction of additional output performance measures in the budget so as to capture all aspects of the Victorian Government's response to family violence. This would increase the visibility of family violence in the budget papers and demonstrate how various outputs, such as indications of performance over time, contribute to resolving the problem of family violence. Introducing more output performance measures will also reflect the priority government attaches to the area. As Ms Skilbeck told the Commission:

[Performance measures] should reflect the priorities of the government and the department of the day. They are able to be adjusted to those changed priorities, and certainly additional output performance measures can be added too. With the focus on family violence I would expect that that would change accordingly.¹³⁷

The Commission understands that the inclusion of family violence performance measures in existing budget outputs would be administratively straightforward and could be accomplished as part of an ongoing review process. Ministers are able to propose changes before publication of the budget.¹³⁸ The Commission heeds, however, the advice given in evidence by Ms Skilbeck—that new output performance measures will need to ensure they are meaningful and the data exists so that reporting performance is possible within the cycle of budget publication.¹³⁹ Further, we expect that the new performance measures will be informed by the proposed Statewide Family Violence Action Plan. For this reason the Commission suggests that the measures should be introduced in the 2017–18 budget.

The Commission expects that the introduction of family violence–related performance measures in the budget will influence the way departments and agencies allocate resources so that investment is sufficient in particular programs to meet the targets attached to any new performance measures, for example, timeliness of access to crisis accommodation by women escaping family violence. Departments and agencies' contracts with service providers may also need to be amended so that the performance expected from funded providers aligns with any new family violence-related performance measures in the budget, although at the contract level there may be further measures that are specific to the type of service being funded. Measuring achievement of performance measures at both the budget and service contract levels will necessitate appropriate data collection. This is discussed further in Chapter 39.

Recommendation 217

The Victorian Government introduce in the 2017–18 State Budget additional output performance measures relating to the prevention of family violence and the assistance provided to victims and perpetrators in order to increase the visibility of family violence in budgetary processes.

Recommendation 218

The Victorian Government, in preparing the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan, consider whether further changes should be made to budget systems to better reflect the central role of government in preventing and responding to family violence [within 12 months].

Recommendation 219

The Victorian Government [within 12 months]:

- ▷ commission or itself perform rigorous and consistent measurement of the cost of family violence to government, the community and individuals
- ▷ require departments and agencies to establish consistent methods of collecting data—including data on costs incurred by generalist services—on activities relating to family violence prevention and response and include that information in their annual reports.

Greater emphasis on prevention, early intervention and recovery

There should be greater emphasis on prevention and early intervention. There should also be greater investment in helping victims recover from family violence, so that their need for long-term services is reduced and they can enjoy good health, genuine safety, connection with their community and full social and economic participation.

Prevention is discussed in Chapter 36; it deals with community awareness activities conducted at the general and local levels, respectful relationship education in schools, and support programs for individuals and families—for example, programs designed to support families after the birth of a child. Policies aimed at supporting the emotional and economic recovery of victims are discussed in Chapters 9, 20 and 21; this includes the provision of individualised packages to provide support in obtaining employment and housing.

A focus on prevention, early intervention and recovery could in the long term reduce the costs borne by individuals, as well as future budgetary costs—including costs associated with children’s experience of family violence.

Although the Commission supports greater investment in these activities, this is not an argument for redirecting funds currently allocated to crisis intervention. For the reasons explained below, expenditure on prevention should not come at the expense of providing adequate funding to services so that they can support victims at a time of crisis and help perpetrators change their behaviour.

Recommendation 220

The Victorian Government ensure that the recommended Statewide Family Violence Action Plan emphasises prevention, early intervention and supporting the long-term recovery of victims. It should also identify the funding that will be required to pursue these goals [within 18 months].

Resolving immediate pressures and stabilising the service system

The demand for family violence services is high and increasing and cannot be met from existing resources. Some organisations provide services to a level beyond that for which they are funded, but this cannot be sustained indefinitely. The lack of reliable data makes it difficult to determine the overall extent of the shortfall in service funding.

Specialist family violence services, homelessness services, the police and the courts are struggling to deal with the increasing number of victims seeking help. Recent publicity about the pervasiveness of family violence and its long-term effects on families will probably lead to increased reporting and might well have done so already.

In order to maintain existing service delivery levels, the additional investment in family violence provided for in the 2015–16 State Budget needs to be extended since most of it was for one year only. As part of maintaining current service levels, the Victorian Government must urgently pursue the extension of the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness with the Commonwealth Government, so that the funding continues beyond June 2017.

Reforms such as the proposed integrated intake system (discussed in Chapter 13) will require additional funding for extra capacity to make safety and needs assessments and ensure that referrals can flow properly. In the longer term, this system should reduce costs by giving priority to early intervention with perpetrators and helping victims recover.

The recommendations the Commission makes will, however, be undermined if service systems lack the capacity to do the work asked of them. This justifies an injection of additional funds to stabilise the system and ensure that it can meet the increased demand that has arisen in the past five years. The opacity of current funding arrangements and the limited time available to the Commission make it impossible to estimate the precise amount required. In future, determining the level of investment will be guided by the modelling work discussed in the next section.

Recommendation 221

In the 2016–17 State Budget the Victorian Government give priority to:

- ▷ providing an immediate funding boost to increase the capacity of specialist family violence services and Integrated Family Services to respond to existing demand
- ▷ implementation of the Commission's recommendations that relate to that budget period.

Recommendation 222

The Victorian Government treat the extension of the National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness as a matter of urgency and pursue it immediately with the Commonwealth Government [within 12 months].

Demand forecasting

The lack of resources to meet demand is in part a consequence of inadequate planning. The Commission understands that Victorian government agencies do not systematically forecast demand for family violence services in various parts of the service system or use such forecasts to determine whether funding needs to be increased to respond to anticipated demand.

The Commission notes that both Victoria Police and DHHS prepare forecasts of family violence incidents using the crime statistics produced by the Crime Statistics Agency. Although the Commission welcomes the forecast as a step in the right direction, the forecast remains focused on the projected number of Victoria Police family violence incidents. There is limited systematic forecasting of demand for family violence response services that individual departments and agencies deliver or fund, or for determining the impact of growth in demand for future funding requirements.

DHHS advised the Commission that its family violence forecasts have been used to guide policy and strategy development as well as assist area managements as 'internal business intelligence'.¹⁴⁰ However, forecasts of family violence incidents do not appear to be used in forecasting the demand for family violence specialist services. For example, a recent forecast of future demand of homelessness, commissioned by DHHS, factored in Victoria Police family violence incident data as one of four key drivers of homelessness demand, yet the projections regarding the number of people experiencing homelessness were not disaggregated in terms of family violence.¹⁴¹

Without an agreed methodology for forecasting demand for family violence services that applies across the entire government, the Victorian Government cannot effectively plan for and respond to future needs. It is unable to anticipate the scale and nature of demand. It cannot know what level of resourcing is likely to be required.

In the Commission's view, the Victorian Government should develop a robust demand-modelling tool or set of indicators so that it can better plan how departments and agencies respond to family violence and predict any associated funding requirements. This modelling tool or set of indicators should take into account the interdependencies between various parts of the service system; for example, it should consider the effect of increased police activity on the demand for legal assistance and court services.

Furthermore, such a model must capture the dynamic nature of the family violence service system, particularly in view of the fact that the Commission recommends a number of reforms. Some of the proposed reforms should reduce demand; for example, a stronger focus on prevention and on recovery might reduce the number of victims who need support in the future. Other reforms might lead to increased demand for support services—for example, by providing referrals from the proposed Support and Safety Hubs.

In Chapter 38, the Commission recommends the development of a Statewide Family Violence Action Plan to guide government efforts in responding to family violence. Modelling future demand will be an important element of the plan.

Recommendation 223

The Victorian Government develop a demand-modelling tool or set of indicators to be used for planning how government as a whole and relevant departments and agencies themselves (including those providing or funding universal services) respond to family violence [within two years]. Budget processes should take account of the cost of forecast demand.

Funding and monitoring service provision

In this section the discussion moves away from budget-level decision making to briefly discuss the administrative processes that affect the way departments and agencies fund and monitor service provision.

In broad terms, the Commission agrees with the following remark:

Uncertain, inadequate and short-term funding promotes fragmented, localised service responses rather than a consistent, comprehensive and best practice response that supports statewide system integration.¹⁴²

Such criticism is not specific to family violence: it is voiced about funding processes for community-based services generally. The Commission accepts that there are problems with current arrangements relating to the following:

- ▷ lack of funding for coordination between services
- ▷ fragmentation of service delivery
- ▷ a short-term rather than strategic focus
- ▷ a lack of focus on outcomes for victims
- ▷ measuring results of perpetrator interventions.

The Commission is persuaded that there is a need for reform of the contractual arrangements departments make with service providers and how they measure their performance.

Further work should be done in this regard. The Commission expects that this would be done by a sub-committee of the Victorian Secretaries Board, the creation of which would be expected to consult with the Statewide Advisory Committee on Family Violence which is recommended in Chapter 38.

In the meantime, however, the Commission considers the Victorian Government should require departments to make contractual arrangements that encourage the building of links between service providers, including funding the work done to improve these links.

Reform of contractual arrangements should extend to putting in place performance measures that are tailored to the requirements of family violence victims and perpetrators. In the Commission's view, performance measures should include a focus on reducing and managing risks to victims. Earlier the Commission recommended the inclusion of additional family violence-specific budget output performance measures in the budget papers. We would expect that measures in service providers' contracts for the delivery of services relevant to family violence would align with these output budget-level measures and include further measures that reflect that purpose of the funding.

Lack of support for collaborative activities

An effective family violence system requires collaboration and coordination between services. Elsewhere in this report the Commission makes recommendations aimed at ensuring that, as far as possible, victims and perpetrators can approach a single source for assistance and receive warm referrals to other services. One of the important roles of workers in the proposed Support and Safety Hubs will be to help people find their way through the service system.

There is also a need to encourage liaison between services in order to resolve problems beyond the needs of particular clients. When services struggle to meet increasing demand, they can be forced to choose between responding to immediate client needs and liaising with other services. Funding should take account of the costs incurred in service planning and the collaboration required for that purpose.

Further, the Victorian Government should foster collaboration between potential providers when contracting for service provision, emphasising consultation and collaborative relationships rather than competition.

Short-term funding

The Commission was alerted to the difficulties caused by short-term funding of projects. Projects should be funded for a period that provides some stability for service providers and allows sufficient time for evaluation and adaptation based on experience.

When funding is provided for a service innovation, it should include some funding for determining whether the project has achieved its goals. The Commission does not want to set an arbitrary time limit, but it considers it would normally be difficult to justify funding for periods shorter than three years. It is also important that departments and agencies have mechanisms for identifying projects and services that are not performing well, so that a decision can be made about whether an initiative should be withdrawn or supported in making changes.

As part of that work, the Victorian Secretaries Board should establish a set of principles to guide contractual arrangements for the provision of family violence-related services. The purpose of these principles would be to ensure that funding for service providers:

- ▷ covers costs related to coordination between services and, where relevant, evaluation of programs
- ▷ encourages the collapsing of multiple small allocations where appropriate, to enable clients to receive a broader range of services
- ▷ simplifies accountability and reporting requirements
- ▷ is based on best-practice research into the duration and intensity of services, so that assistance achieves sustainable outcomes
- ▷ is accompanied by a robust data-allocation and performance-management regime
- ▷ lasts for a period sufficient to enable pilot programs to be evaluated and, if necessary, to adapt during the course of the program.

This approach is in keeping with evidence provided about the need to aggregate some programs and increase the funding certainty for providers:

... moving to a model where there are fewer programs, so some broadbanding of programs, with more certainty in the duration of the funding agreement and clearer ... definition of the outcomes that are to be achieved and the evidence-based interventions that will achieve them is certainly where we need to go.¹⁴³

The Commission also proposes that departments establish processes for regular overview and evaluation of services and programs—both departmental programs and funded services—based on the principles adopted by the Victorian Secretaries Board. That process should involve independent experts, including academics, as well as departmental staff.

A focus on outcomes for victims and perpetrators

The Commission has already recommended that budget outputs include performance measures relevant to family violence.

Similarly, service contracts should include requirements that are tailored to meeting the needs of victims and perpetrators such as safety planning and moves towards stability. Elsewhere we also recommend updating guidance material that will be reflected in service contracts, better guiding the practice and focus of services.

Beyond better measuring the work of contracted services through improved performance measures, the Commission agrees that there should also be a greater focus on outcomes for victims (including children) and perpetrators of family violence. This needs to be across the range of services that respond to family violence, both funded services and those delivered by government departments and agencies. This would require both a clear idea of what outcomes are to be pursued and how these will be measured, noting that we make recommendations about the need to address the current data limitations in Chapter 39. The proposed Statewide Family Violence Action Plan will be a good starting point as it will specify the specialist family violence service system's goals and inform the development of appropriate outcomes. The Commission urges the Victorian Government, in partnership with the service sector, to explore the design of funding arrangements, including contracts with providers, so that working towards such outcomes is encouraged and measurement of performance is possible.

Recommendation 224

The Victorian Secretaries Board develop and promulgate principles for purchasing services that will contribute to achieving the goals of the Statewide Family Violence Action Plan [within 18 months]. These principles should include:

- ▶ measures to encourage service providers to collaborate in order to enable clients to receive a broader range of services
- ▶ ways of simplifying pathways of support
- ▶ ensuring victims and their children have access to a comprehensive range of services, regardless of where they live in Victoria
- ▶ allowing sufficient time for piloting, evaluation and adaptive management of new programs.

Recommendation 225

The Victorian Government require departments and agencies to introduce measures of contractual performance by service providers that more accurately reflect the objectives of ensuring victims' safety, preventing family violence and supporting those affected by it, and keeping perpetrators accountable [within 12 months].

Recommendation 226

Victorian government departments and agencies establish processes for regular overview and evaluation of funded services and programs, based on the recommended principles adopted by the Victorian Secretaries Board. The processes should involve independent experts as well as departmental staff [within 12 months].

Funding options

In the Commission's view, investing in family violence prevention and earlier intervention and improving services that respond to victims and perpetrators could well reduce demands on the state budget in the long term. At least in the short to medium term, however, some increase in funding will be required to support family violence prevention and the delivery of services for victims and perpetrators.

The pervasive and damaging effects of family violence require prevention and support to be assigned high priority. It is encouraging that this has been accepted by the Victorian Government.

It is for the Victorian Government to determine how finite resources should be allocated between areas of competing need. Arguably, it is beyond the Commission's terms of reference to nominate specific sources of revenue or possible savings in other non-family violence related programs that could be used to fund family violence programs and services. Even if that is not the case, making such recommendations would require a detailed analysis of the viability of creating new sources of tax revenue and of the amounts that could be raised by doing so or by relying on existing revenue sources. The Commission is not in a position to undertake the tasks necessary to make such judgments.

Some new funding sources were proposed to the Commission as potential options for funding family violence services. One was to establish a Family Violence Tenancy Fund funded through the interest earned on tenants' bond monies held by the Residential Tenancies Bond Authority to finance the economic costs of losses sustained as a result of family violence, such as the cost of property damage.¹⁴⁴ Another, suggested by the Chief Commissioner of Victoria Police, Graham Ashton AM APM, was the opportunity to use proceeds of crime funds for some family violence initiatives, such as preventative and research work.¹⁴⁵

In the Commission's view it is likely that these sources alone would be insufficient to meet the urgent demand for additional funding required for investment in family violence prevention and support. Another option, which the Commission has not considered in detail, would be to identify new sources of revenue, including a broad-based tax or levy, to fund all or part of the family violence system. The community may well support tangible actions that recognise the urgent need to address the serious social problem of family violence, including the possibility of introducing a new revenue source. Any new revenue source would have to be sufficiently broad based to meet the funding demand, sustainable over time to give certainty to funders and service providers and structured to distribute its impact fairly across the community.

A partnership agreement with the Commonwealth

Another possibility is to seek funding through Commonwealth–state agreements. In recent years the Commonwealth and state and territory governments have reached multilateral and bilateral agreements for reform in circumstances where greater quality and efficiency can be achieved through partnerships in such areas as health, disability and education. The National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness is an example. As noted, however, Commonwealth involvement in that program is uncertain beyond June 2017.

Agreements of this kind are intended to deliver nationally significant reforms and are supported by the adoption of mutually agreed objectives, outcomes and performance measures. In the case of family violence, the following are some of the areas that could be covered by such agreements:

- ▷ rapid rehousing initiatives through rental subsidies for victims who have to leave their home because of family violence
- ▷ expansion of individualised funding to support recovery
- ▷ provision of increased support for people involved in family law disputes—for example, increased funding of child contact centres
- ▷ funding for magistrates' courts to exercise their jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (see Chapter 16)
- ▷ Centrelink changes that take account of the need for people leaving a violent relationship to receive support quickly
- ▷ establishment of systems for recording information relevant to both Commonwealth and state and territory bodies—for example, court orders
- ▷ co-location of specialist family violence or child protection workers in family courts and of Family Court registrars in some magistrates' courts (see Chapter 24)
- ▷ sharing of data—for example, funding the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare to provide more detailed and informative data from the specialist homelessness data collection to assist in planning services for family violence victims and to assess the effectiveness of those services.

Agreements of this nature could enable cost sharing in some areas and also increase collaboration between relevant state and territory and federal bodies in areas where previously suggested reforms have not been implemented—for example, the interaction between family law courts and state courts. However, such agreements also have their risks. They should not detract from the need for the Victorian Government to increase investment to prevent and respond to family violence. It would also be important to ensure that the possibility of making such agreements does not delay the changes that should be made immediately and that such agreements last for a reasonable period.

The Commission considers that Victoria should explore opportunities to work with the Commonwealth Government to improve collaboration between systems.

Recommendation 227

The Victorian Government investigate options for increasing its capacity to invest in preventing and responding to family violence, including by:

- ▷ redirecting existing revenue sources towards family violence expenditure
- ▷ identifying new revenue sources
- ▷ exploring the possibility of entering into a partnership agreement with the Commonwealth Government in areas of overlapping responsibility.

Endnotes

- 1 Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, Submission 836, 25.
- 2 For New Zealand see Suzanne Snively, 'The New Zealand Economic Cost of Family Violence' (1995) 4 Social Policy Journal of New Zealand; for Canada see Lorraine Greaves, Olena Hankivsky and JoAnn Kingston-Riechers, 'Selected Estimates of the Costs of Violence against Women' (Centre for Research on Violence Against Women and Children, 1995) 7; Tanis Day, 'The Health Related Costs of Violence Against Women: The Tip of the Iceberg' (University of Western Ontario, Centre for Research on Violence Against Women and Children, 1995) 34; for the United Kingdom see Sylvia Walby, 'The Cost of Domestic Violence' (Department of Trade and Industry, Women and Equality Unit, September 2004); for the United States see Julie Gerberding et al, 'Costs of Intimate Partner Violence Against Women in the United States' (Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, March 2003).
- 3 For an overview of the Australian studies see Access Economics, 'The Cost of Domestic Violence to the Australian Economy: Part 1' (Office of the Status of Women, 2004) 11–12.
- 4 The Commission notes that these estimates do not include the long-term effects on children.
- 5 Access Economics, above n 3, VI.
- 6 Ibid 3.
- 7 Ibid VI–VIII.
- 8 Ibid VI–VII.
- 9 Ibid.
- 10 At the request of the then federal Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs (now the Department of Social Security): National Council to Reduce Violence Against Women (Cth), 'The Cost of Violence Against Women and their Children' (Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs (Cth), March 2009) ('KPMG study').
- 11 Ibid 65.
- 12 Ibid 4.
- 13 Ibid.
- 14 Ibid 5.
- 15 PricewaterhouseCoopers Australia, 'A High Price to Pay: The Economic Case for Preventing Violence Against Women' (prepared for Our Watch and VicHealth, November 2015).
- 16 Ibid 5.
- 17 Ibid 9.
- 18 Although the report refers to violence against women it also took account of the indirect effects of violence on children. It did not include direct abuse of children.
- 19 PricewaterhouseCoopers Australia, above n 15, 11.
- 20 Ibid 13–14.
- 21 Ibid 24. It looked at the effects of three programs: one, Stepping Stones, was a South African Study that has been evaluated. This was considered relevant because the South African experience was 'relatively the most applicable to Australia' (see Appendix 57); the other two were in Uganda and India.
- 22 PricewaterhouseCoopers Australia, above n 15, 13.
- 23 Ibid.
- 24 In the health context pain, suffering and mortality is typically measured using Disability Adjusted Life Years (DALY) which is a measure of overall disease burden expressed as the number of years lost due to ill-health, disability or early death.
- 25 PricewaterhouseCoopers Australia, above n 15, 12.
- 26 Ibid.
- 27 PwC did include a Victorian figure for costs avoided by individual or group participation programs.
- 28 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 19. The cost estimate reflects 2007–08 dollars and was not adjusted to 2015–16 value.
- 29 Based on Victoria's population being 24.9 per cent of Australia's population at the end of the June quarter 2015: see Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Australian Demographic Statistics, June 2015' (Catalogue No 3101.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, December 2015). Using the same methodology, the cost of all violence against women in Victoria would be $5.4 billion in 2014–15.
- 30 Statement of Skilbeck, 12 October 2015, 4 [12], [15], 5 [20], [22].
- 31 Ibid 4 [15].
- 32 Ibid 4 [12].
- 33 Ibid 5 [16].
- 34 State of Victoria, '2015-16 Budget Paper No 3: Service Delivery' (Department of Treasury and Finance, 2015) 250.
- 35 Ibid 253.
- 36 Ibid 260.
- 37 Ibid 347.
- 38 Ibid 113.
- 39 Statement of Skilbeck, 12 October 2015, 5 [18].
- 40 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Crisis Supported Accommodation 20081', 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 41 Department of Health and Human Services 'Transition Support 20082', 1, 2, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 42 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Family Violence Support Services 31233', 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 43 The three output measures are: Crimes against property – excluding family violence–related crime (rate per 100,000 population); and Crimes against property – family violence–related crime (rate per 100,000 population); and Women and the Prevention of Family Violence projects and programs which support the prevention of family violence and the social and economic participation of women are delivered on time (Women and Equality Policy and Programs Output). Refer to State of Victoria, above n 34, 271, 272 and 304.
- 44 Key health-related outputs include: Admitted Services, Non Admitted Services, Emergency Services, Ambulance Emergency Services, Ambulance Non Emergency Services, Community Health, Clinical Care (Mental Health) and Mental Health Community Support Services. Refer to ibid 225–228; 230–234.
- 45 State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix B.
- 46 Ibid Appendix B, 3.

47 The government submission noted that the $80.6 million does not include the following: Addressing Family Violence in Acute Health program ($0.25 million in 2014–15); lapsed programs funded by the Office for Women for which funding was allocated in 2013–14 but implementation delayed until 2014–14; Victoria Police, Legal Aid or Koori and CALD support agency funding; funding for Magistrates' Court of Victoria's Koori Family Support program which is funded internally by the Magistrates' Court of Victoria and does not have specific funding; funding for Forensicare Problem Behaviour Program which provides treatment for people with problem behaviours associated with offending such as physical violence, sexual offending and stalking. Ibid Appendix B, 15.

48 The cost of these programs was not provided to the Commission.

49 Funding of $109.8 million for services and programs between 2014–15 and 2017–18, and $8.3 million for capital projects was allocated in Pre-Election Budget Update, November 2014. The Commission understands that some of this funding was replaced by the subsequent Government's election commitments related to family violence, while other funding continued to be implemented as committed. State of Victoria, '2014 Pre-Election Budget Update' (Department of Treasury and Finance, November 2014) 77, 88.

50 State of Victoria, above n 34, 5. This includes $36 million for the Commission.

51 Prime Minister of Australia, The Hon. Malcolm Turnbull, 'Women's Safety Package to Stop Violence' (Media Release, 24 September 2015) 1.

52 This figure represents the additional funding allocated to specialist family services that were comparable to those included in the State Government's submission which comprised the $80.6 million budget for 2014–15. Appendix K contains the full list of the funded initiatives and the attribution as specialist family violence services or other programs contributing to addressing family violence. To ensure consistency with the 2014–15 figures we have not added amounts for purposes not included in the $80.6 million figure.

53 See Table 41.4. The $9 million was not included in the aggregate figure since the purpose was to compare the funding for specialist family violence services in 2014–15 ($80.6 million) and the impact of additional funding provided for these services in 2015–16; the $80.6 million did not include broader programs that contributed towards addressing family violence, so inclusion would nullify the value of the comparison between years.

54 Excludes funding allocated for the Royal Commission into Family Violence and for the State Government's engagement with the Commission.

55 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 7.

56 Suellen Murray, 'The Origins and Development of the Australian Women's Refuge Movement', 19(10) PARITY 11.

57 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Attachment 10: Transitional support—20082', 1, produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 13 October 2015.

58 State of Victoria, above n 34, 260.

59 Council of Australian Governments, 'National Affordable Housing Agreement' (2009) 3.

60 Council of Australian Governments, 'National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness 2015–2017' (September 2015) 9; State of Victoria, 'Victorian Budget 2014–2015: Building a Better Victoria—Service Delivery Budget Paper No 3' (Department of Treasury and Finance, 2014) 28.

61 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Department of Health and Human Services Policy and Funding Guidelines 2015: Volume 3—Human Services Policy and Funding Plan 2015–18', Chapter 4—Activity Descriptions (Family Violence Support Services 31233, July 2015).

62 State of Victoria, above n 60, 31.

63 Council of Australian Governments, above n 60, 3.

64 State of Victoria, above n 34, Appendix B, 4.

65 Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August 2015 and 20 October 2015).

66 Department of Premier and Cabinet, 'Narrative for Cost to Government of Family Violence', 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 20 August 2015.

67 Department of Education and Training data based on Department of Education and Training, 'Table 1: Apportionment of the cost of key services and programs to family violence' (17 December 2015) 1–2; Department of Health and Human Services data based on Department of Health and Human Services, 'Table 1: Apportionment of the cost of key services to family violence, Tranche 1, 2013–14' (17 December 2015), 1, Department of Health and Human Services, 'Table 2: Apportionment of the cost of key services to family violence', Tranche 1, 2014–15' (17 December 2015), 1, Department of Health and Human Services, 'Table 1: Apportionment of the cost of key services to family violence: Extended Information' (18 November 2015); Department of Justice and Regulation data based on Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Table 1. Apportionment of the cost of key services to family violence' (Victims Assistance Program) (1 December 2015), 1, 'Table 1. Apportionment of the cost of key services to family violence' (Child Witness Service) (1 December 2015), 1; Magistrates' Court of Victoria data based on Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Family Violence Related Effort Summary Magistrates' Court', 1; Corrections Victoria data based on Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Cost of Family Violence to the corrections system – indicative estimate' (22 October 2015), 1–2; Office of Public Prosecution data based on Department of Justice and Regulation, 'Office of the Public Prosecutions - costs of family violence' (29 October 2015), 1; Victoria Police data based on Victoria Police, 'Modelling of Victoria Police Global expenditure for Family Violence 2013–14 and 2014–15' (1 December 2015) 1–4; Victoria Police, 'Modelling of Costs' (1 December 2015), 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August and 20 October).

68 The Australian Government Productivity Commission's annual report on government services provides information on each jurisdiction's government services, including expenditure, but expenditure on family violence is not separately reported: see, eg, Productivity Commission (Cth), Report on Government Services (January 2016) <<http://www.pc.gov.au/research/ongoing/report-on-government-services>>.

69 Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 893, 25; Transcript of Smith, 15 October 2015, 3750 [21]–[26]; Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, i; Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 8. This submission proposed there should be a designated Commonwealth budget stream.

70 Australian Women Against Violence Alliance, Submission 838, 5.

71 See, eg, Transcript of Cumberland, 13 July 2015, 59 [8]–[15]; Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 7; Statement of Gillespie, 10 July 2015, 6 [29]–[31].

72 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 10.

73 Transcript of Rogers, 21 July 2015, 1050 [18]–[19]. An 'episode of support', also known as a 'support period' is the period of time during which a client receives assistance from a service. A support period starts on the day the client first receives a service and ends when the relationship with the service end, the client has reached the maximum amount of support that the service can offer, or the client has not received any services for a whole calendar month and there is no ongoing relationship: Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Specialist Homelessness Services Collection manual (July 2013) 10 <www.aihw.gov.au/shsc-resources/>.

74 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 10.

75 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 53.

76 Transcript of Gillespie, 21 July 2015, 967 [1]–[6].

77 Australian Women Against Violence Alliance, Submission 838, 20.

78 Domestic Violence Victoria—04, Submission 943, 10.

79 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 7.

80 Good Shepherd Australia New Zealand, Submission 836, 44.

81 Deborah McCormick Consulting, Submission 496, 5.

82 Victorian Council of Social Service, Submission 467, 9.

83 Statement of Hagias, 7 July 2015, 9 [34].

- 84 Transcript of Skilbeck, Peake and Eccles, 16 October 2015, 3936 [3]–3943 [11].
- 85 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3939 [1]–[3].
- 86 Transcript of Eccles, 16 October 2015, 3955 [2]–[24].
- 87 Ibid 3955 [18].
- 88 Ibid 3956 [5]–[8].
- 89 See State of Victoria, Submission 717, 10.
- 90 See, eg, ibid 39; Transcript of Gregory, 12 October 2015, 3226 [6]–[22], 3247 [1]–[8]; Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 893, 13, 20.
- 91 Cabinet Social Policy Committee, 'Progress Report on the Work Programme of the Ministerial Group on Family Violence and Sexual Violence' (Ministry of Justice (NZ), 28 July 2015) 4 [27].
- 92 See, eg, Berry Street, Submission 834, 11; Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 893, 9, 15; Opportunity Knocks—EDVOS; Safe Futures Foundation; Safe Steps; WISHIN; Victorian Women's Trust, Submission 898, 23; Women's Health West Inc., Submission 239, 16–17, 18; Whitehorse Community Health Service, trading as Carrington Health, Submission 777, 2; WRISC Family Violence Support, Submission 260, 6–7.
- 93 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 42.
- 94 See, eg, Berry Street, Submission 834, 27–30; Opportunity Knocks—EDVOS; Safe Futures Foundation; Safe Steps; WISHIN; Victorian Women's Trust, Submission 898, 23; Women's Health West Inc., Submission 239, 16–17, 18, 19.
- 95 See, eg, Opportunity Knocks—EDVOS; Safe Futures Foundation; Safe Steps; WISHIN; Victorian Women's Trust, Submission 898, 14, 15, 23; WISHIN, Submission 446, 5; Berry Street, Submission 834, 42; Transcript of Smith, 21 July 2015, 901 [6]–[18].
- 96 Transcript of Gillespie, 21 July 2015, 969 [27]–[29].
- 97 See, eg, Transcript of Vlasis, 24 July 2015, 1436 [12]–1437 [19]; Transcript of Brandenburg, 24 July 2015, 1495 [30]–[31]; Transcript of Reaper, 24 July 2015, 1533 [8]–[10]; Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 893, 16.
- 98 Transcript of Vlasis, 24 July 2015, 1440 [1]–[23].
- 99 During that same period the number of Victoria Police Family Violence incidents increased from 35,666 (2009–10) to 65,154 (2013–14), an increase of 83 per cent: Crime Statistics Agency, 'An Overview of Family Violence in Victoria: Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14' (January 2016), Victoria Police data source, Tab 1, Table 1: Family incidents recorded and family incident rate per 100,000 population, July 2009 to June 2014, provided to the Commission by the Crime Statistics Agency, 30 September 2015..
- 100 State of Victoria, above n 34, 5.
- 101 Victoria Police, 'Criminal Justice Steering Committee—Family Violence—Current Trends and Changes over the Last 12 Months', 4, produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015; Department of Health and Human Services, 'DHS Family Violence Incidents Demand Forecasting Factsheet (26 June 2014), 1, produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 5 June 2015.
- 102 Department of Health and Human Services, above n 101, 1.
- 103 Department of Health and Human Services, 'Total Family Violence Incidents Forecast for Victoria prepared for the Royal Commission into Family Violence', 1, produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 2 September 2015.
- 104 Ibid.
- 105 See, eg, Peter Shergold, 'Service Sector Reform: A Roadmap for Community and Human Services Reform—Final Report' (Victorian Council of Social Service, July 2013), 12; Department of Health and Human Services, 'Options Paper for the Minister for Housing: Reform of the Victorian Homelessness Service System', 35, produced in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August 2015 and 20 October 2015); Victoria, Inquiry into Protecting Victoria's Vulnerable Children, Full Report (2012) 469–70.
- 106 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 32–38.
- 107 EACH Social and Community Health, Submission 569, 53.
- 108 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 30.
- 109 Loddon Campaspe Integrated Family Violence Services Consortium, Submission 914, 27.
- 110 Community consultation, Traralgon, 13 May 2015; Community consultation, Maryborough 1, 21 April 2015.
- 111 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3952 [14]–[16].
- 112 Ibid 3853 [29]–3854 [8].
- 113 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 7.
- 114 Transcript of Kirby, 13 August 2015, 2915 [12]–[22].
- 115 Transcript of Heatley, 15 October 2015, 3771 [21]–3772 [5].
- 116 See Appendix K.
- 117 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 51.
- 118 State of Victoria, Submission 717, 28.
- 119 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 52.
- 120 Victoria Police, Submission 923, 30; Domestic Violence Victoria—03, Submission 943, 7, 9; Grampians Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 399, 4.
- 121 Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre, Submission 942, 11.
- 122 Department of Health and Human Services, 'DHHS Response to Request Items 2–9', 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 13 October 2015.
- 123 Ibid.
- 124 See, eg, Australian Institute of Health and Welfare (AIHW), 'Specialist Homelessness Services 2013–2014' (Cat. no. HOU 276, 2014).
- 125 Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 8.
- 126 See, eg, Barwon Area Integrated Family Violence Committee, Submission 893, 14; Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 8, 43–44.
- 127 Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Limited, Submission 837, 5.
- 128 Mallee Family Violence Executive, Submission 617, 20.
- 129 Anonymous, Submission 195, 1.
- 130 Young Men's Christian Association of Victoria, Submission 196, 9.
- 131 MonashLink Community Health Services Ltd, Submission 121, 11.
- 132 Based on Victoria's population being 24.9 per cent of Australia's population at the end of the 2015 June quarter: see Australian Bureau of Statistics, 'Australian Demographic Statistics, June 2015' (Catalogue no. 3101.0, Australian Bureau of Statistics, December 2015). This was applied to PWC's report estimate of $12.6 billion cost of violence against women in intimate relationships nationally: PricewaterhouseCoopers Australia, above n 15, 11. Using the same methodology, the cost of all violence against women in Victoria would be $5.4 billion.
- 133 Cabinet Social Policy Committee, above n 91, 2 [7], Attachment 2.
- 134 Ibid 4 [27].
- 135 Australian National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, 'ANROWS Research Program 2014–16: Part 1' (2015) 21.
- 136 Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3939 [1]–[3].
- 137 Transcript of Skilbeck, 16 October 2015, 3938 [23]–[29].
- 138 Ibid 3945 [20]–[26].

- ¹³⁹ Ibid 3946 [14]–[18].
- ¹⁴⁰ Department of Health and Human Services, above n 101, 1.
- ¹⁴¹ Department of Health and Human Services, 'VHAP System Reform Project—Projecting the Demand for Services by People Experiencing Homelessness in Victoria—Final Report', 13, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 14 August 2015 (as varied on 20 August 2015 and 20 October 2015). In relation to this report, the Department of Health and Human Services notes that while regression analysis undertaken as part of the study demonstrated a link between the increase in reports of family violence incidents and experiences of homelessness, the methodology and base data did not allow forecasts of the number of people who will experience homelessness as a direct result of family violence.
- ¹⁴² Domestic Violence Victoria—02, Submission 943, 7.
- ¹⁴³ Transcript of Peake, 16 October 2015, 3952 [17]–[23].
- ¹⁴⁴ Fitzroy Legal Service Inc, 'Submission of Fitzroy Legal Service: Residential Tenancies Act Review', 11 <<http://fairersaferhousing.vic.gov.au/public-submissions/documents>>.
- ¹⁴⁵ Transcript of Ashton, 16 October 2015, 3969 [16]–3970 [15].

Appendix H Cost categories of PwC report

The table below shows the annual cost to the Australian economy of violence against women, 2014–15, by cost category and stakeholders incurring the costs according to PwC.

Cost category	Cost ($ million)		Description	Stakeholder(s)
	Partner violence	All violence against women
Pain, suffering and premature mortality	4,783.3	10,405.6	Lost quality of life.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Women ▷ Children ▷ Perpetrators
Health costs	617.2	1,355.6	Costs to deliver health services to victims. Covers the costs associated with the extended health effects of violence, not just the treatment of the initial trauma—for example, costs associated with the treatment of depression and anxiety.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Women ▷ Commonwealth Government ▷ State and territory governments ▷ Society/community ▷ Private insurance providers ▷ Perpetrators
Production-related costs	926.1	2,031.9	Lost productivity through absenteeism, being late or attending court. Includes lost productivity from unpaid/voluntary work.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Women ▷ Employers ▷ Society/community ▷ Perpetrators
Consumption-related costs	4,316.9	4,316.9	In the immediate short-term, costs cover the damage to property and belongings but this also covers the lost economies of scale that victims of domestic violence would experience due to being less likely to be in further relationships in the future. In calculating costs for non-partner violence, it was assumed that this cost is not applicable.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Women ▷ Children ▷ Society/community ▷ Perpetrators
Second-generation costs	883.9	1,721.8	For children who were in households experiencing violence but are not necessarily the target of violence themselves, there would be costs associated with their care or government intervention. It was also assumed that this cost will not be incurred by those experiencing violence by non-partners.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Women ▷ State and territory governments
Administrative and other costs	300.7	300.7	This category largely consists of the criminal justice costs for police, the courts, and incarceration of indicted perpetrators. Also includes the costs of other services such as interpreters, funerals and temporary accommodation.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Women ▷ Friends/family ▷ State and territory governments ▷ Commonwealth Government ▷ Society and community ▷ Perpetrators

Cost category	Cost ($ million)		Description	Stakeholder(s)
	Partner violence	All violence against women
Transfer costs	811.9	1,515.6	Costs such as income support, victim compensation and lost taxes are not lost costs to society per se but are instead shifts in the economic powers of consumption from one part of society to another. Following violence against women this results in a loss of economic efficiency, which is known as a deadweight loss. It can also be thought of as the cost of the excess burden of taxation.	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▷ Women ▷ Friends/family ▷ State and territory governments ▷ Commonwealth Government ▷ Society/community
Total	12,595.0	21,648.0

Notes: To enable comparison, the cost categories are the same as those used in previous costings of violence against women, those being Access Economics' The Cost of Domestic Violence to the Australian Economy: Parts I and II (2004) and KPMG's The Cost of Violence against Women and their Children (2009).

The PwC report assumed that consumption costs and second-generation costs are not applicable to nonpartner violence, which is the same approach used in the KPMG report.

Source: PricewaterhouseCoopers Australia, 'A High Price to Pay: The Economic Case for Preventing Violence Against Women' (prepared for Our Watch and VicHealth, November 2015).

Appendix I The Victorian Government's budget for specialist family violence services, 2014–15

Government-funded program or service	2014–15 funding ($ million)
Crisis response and post-crisis support	61.0
Crisis support and accommodation	13.4
Family Violence Regional Service Integration	2.0
Family violence support	5.8
High-risk family violence response	8.6
Homeless services support (peak organisations)	0.7
Indigenous Family Violence	3.3
National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	7.5
National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence stage 2	2.2
Seniors Rights Victoria	0.6
Telephone information and referral	1.7
Transition support	15.1
Early intervention response	4.8
Addressing family violence and sexual assault in acute health	0.5
Adolescent family violence	0.6
Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework	0.8
Homelessness Innovation Action Project (Family Violence)—Families at Home	1.0
Strengthening Hospitals Responses to Family Violence Project—Our Watch	0.3
The Identifying and Responding to Family Violence project	0.9
Women's Information and Referral Exchange	0.7
Perpetrator accountability	11.2
Expansion of specialist family violence response to all headquarter courts	2.1
Family Violence Counselling Orders Program—men's behaviour change programs at Moorabbin and Frankston	0.8
Magistrates' Court, Family Violence Court Intervention program—men's behaviour change programs at Heidelberg and Ballarat	0.8
Magistrates' Court, Family Violence Court Divisions	1.1
Magistrates' Court, Specialist Family Violence Services	0.7
Men's Family Violence—including men's behaviour change programs, Men's Referrals Service	5.6
No To Violence	0.1
Prevention	3.6
Community of Practice—reducing violence against women and their children	0.04
Elder Abuse Prevention Online—professional education training	0.1
Engaging local government in the prevention of violence against women	0.2
Prevention of Violence against Women and Children in CALD communities—Our Watch	0.6
Raising Awareness of Elder Abuse in CALD communities	0.2
Respectful Relationships Education in Schools—Our Watch	0.6
Reducing violence against women and their children grants	2.0
Total	80.6

a. These programs were shown as broader initiatives with a significant family violence component.

Note: Totals may not add due to rounding.

Source: Based on State of Victoria, Submission 717, Appendix B.

Appendix J Funding in the Victorian Government 2015–16 Budget for family violence initiatives

The following table reflects the initiatives funded in the 2015–16 Budget for 2015–16 to 2018–19 and the amounts in each of those years as applicable. The key purpose of this table is to establish an update on the Victorian Government submission's advice of what it allocated in 2014–15. As such, the Commission undertook the task of attributing each initiative to one of the following categories:

- ▷ Specialist family violence initiatives comparable to those in the Victorian Government submission's budget estimate for 2014–15 (to ensure comparability with the 2014–15 figure)
- ▷ Initiatives that contribute towards responding to family violence
- ▷ Royal Commission into Family Violence.

($ million)
Service/program	2015–16	2016–17	2017–18	2018–19
Specialist family violence initiatives comparable to those in the Victorian Government submission's budget estimate for 2014–15
Boost to Domestic Violence Victoria	0.4	0.4	0.4	0.4
Crisis support and transport for women and children	2.5	–	–	–
Counselling services for women and children	2.5	–	–	–
Culturally and linguistically diverse family violence response	1	1	–	–
Men's behaviour change programs—Corrections Victoria	1	1	–	–
Men's behaviour change programs—Courts	0.5	–	–	–
Men's family violence services	1	–	–	–
Personal safety	0.9	–	–	–
Pet welfare ^a	–	–	–	–
Prevention of violence against women and children	2	–	–	–
Reducing Aboriginal family violence	1.3	–	–	–
Responses for Aboriginal people	0.6	–	–	–
Family violence access workers ^b	2.0	–	–	–
Subtotal	15.7	2.4	0.4	0.4
Programs contributing towards responding to family violence
Family violence duty lawyers at community legal centres	1.2	–	–	–
Child protection flexible responses	3.9	–	–	–
Community Legal Centre assistance fund	1.0	1.0	–	–
Coroners Court Death Review Unit	0.3	0.3	0.3	0.3
Family violence legal assistance	2.1	–	–	–
Victorian court safety audit	0.1	–	–	–
Sexual assault services demand	0.3	–	–	–
Support for Ballarat Centre Against Sexual Assault	0.1	0.1	0.1	0.1
Subtotal	9.0	1.4	0.4	0.4

($ million)
Service/program	2015-16	2016-17	2017-18	2018-19
Royal Commission into Family Violence
Family Violence Royal Commission engagement	1.2	-	-	-
Royal Commission into Family Violence ^c	20	-	-	-
Subtotal	21.2	-	-	-
Family Violence Fund ^d	12.0	-	-	-
Total	57.9	3.8	0.8	0.8

Notes:

- = zero.

a. Funding is $25,000 each year but does not show due to rounding.

b. This initiative was funded from the Family Violence Fund.

c. Funding of $16 million was allocated in 2014-15 to the Royal Commission into Family Violence.

d. The Family Violence Fund, created to deal with urgent and unforeseen demand for services arising from the Royal Commission, was allocated $16 million in 2015-16 but $2 million was for family violence access workers, which is included in the list of specialist family violence initiatives.

Source: Based on State of Victoria, Submission 717, 10; 5-6, State of Victoria, '2015-16 Budget Paper No 3: Service Delivery' (Department of Treasury and Finance, 2015) 5-6.

Appendix K List of the activities and activity sub-elements for family violence service providers who receive funding

Table begins on next page.

	Refuges		Outreach/Specialist Family Violence Services										High-Risk Responses		Counselling
Activity	Crisis support and accommodation	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—Family Violence Stage 2	High risk family violence response	High risk family violence response	Family violence support
Activity Element	Refuges and crisis accommodation designated for family violence.	Refuge re-establishment	Outreach	Intensive case management	Access to private rental	After hours service	Court support	Emergency accommodation for women	Emergency accommodation for men	Safe at Home	Extended after hours response	Intensive case management	Case management	RAMP coordination	Women and children's counselling, including Court Network
Aboriginal Community Elders Services Inc. (Conference funding)
Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention & Legal Service (Victoria)
Aboriginal & Torres Strait Islander Corporation Family Violence Prevention & Legal Service (Vic)
Aborigines Advancement League
Anglicare Victoria																✓
Annie North	✓	✓
Austin Health
Australian Childhood Foundation																✓
Ballarat and District Aboriginal Co-operative Ltd.
Ballarat CASA
Barwon CASA
Bass Coast Health																✓
Berry Street Inc	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Bethany Community Support			✓			✓		✓	✓		✓			✓*
Brophy Family and Youth Services																✓
Casey City Council
Centre Against Violence	✓	✓	✓							✓			✓	✓
Centre for Non-Violence	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Child & Family Services Ballarat								✓
Children's Protection Society
Colac Area Health			✓

	Refuges		Outreach/Specialist Family Violence Services										High-Risk Responses		Counselling
Activity	Crisis support and accommodation	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—Family Violence Stage 2	High risk family violence response	High risk family violence response	Family violence support
Activity Element	Refuges and crisis accommodation designated for family violence.	Refuge re-establishment	Outreach	Intensive case management	Access to private rental	After hours service	Court support	Emergency accommodation for women	Emergency accommodation for men	Safe at Home	Extended after hours response	Intensive case management	Case management	RAMP coordination	Women and children's counselling, including Court Network
Community Housing (Vic) Ltd								✓	✓
Connections UnitingCare
Connections UnitingCare Southern																✓
Djerriwarrh Health
Doncaster Community Care and Counselling Centre																✓
EACH												✓				✓
EACH (Auspicing Boorndawan William Healing Service)
Eastern Domestic Violence Service		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓				✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Eastern Health																✓
Elizabeth Morgan House Aboriginal Women's Services (previously known as Elizabeth Hoffman House)	✓	✓	✓				✓									✓
Emerge Women & Children's Support Network	✓	✓	✓
Emma House Domestic Violence Services	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓			✓		✓		✓	✓	✓
Gatehouse Centre
Gateway Community Health Service			✓													✓
Georgina Collective	✓	✓								✓	✓
Gippsland and East Gippsland Aboriginal Cooperative Limited	✓	✓
Gippsland CASA
Gippsland Lakes Community Health			✓	✓						✓		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓

Men's Programs		Adolescent Programs		Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander-specific							Regional Coordination	Information And Referral
Men's case management (mainstream)	Men's Family Violence (including men's behaviour change programs)	Sexually abusive behaviour treatment service	Adolescent Family Violence	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness – family violence initiatives		Indigenous Family Violence					National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness – family violence initiatives	Family Violence Regional Service Integration	Telephone information and referral	Women's Information and referral exchange
				Indigenous family violence support	Aboriginal legal assistance	Healing and Time Out	Men's Resource Advocacy Service	Men's groups program	Regional Action Groups	Community Initiative Fund
	✓
	✓									✓
								✓
	✓				✓							✓
	✓
										✓
			✓
	✓
					✓
			✓
	✓

	Refuges		Outreach/Specialist Family Violence Services										High-Risk Responses		Counselling
Activity	Crisis support and accommodation	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—Family Violence Stage 2	High risk family violence response	High risk family violence response	Family violence support
Activity Element	Refuges and crisis accommodation designated for family violence.	Refuge re-establishment	Outreach	Intensive case management	Access to private rental	After hours service	Court support	Emergency accommodation for women	Emergency accommodation for men	Safe at Home	Extended after hours response	Intensive case management	Case management	RAMP coordination	Women and children's counselling, including Court Network
Gippsland Lakes Community Health (Auspicing Yoowinna Wuranlong Healing and Time Out Service)
Gippsland Women's Health Service
Good Shepherd Youth and Family Service	✓	✓	✓	✓		✓		✓		✓		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Goolum-Goolum Aboriginal Co-operative
Goulburn Valley Aboriginal Education Consultative Inc.
Goulburn Valley Health
Grampians Community Health			✓		✓					✓		✓		✓
Gunditjmara Aboriginal Co-operative			✓									✓
Hanover Welfare Services									✓
Haven									✓
HomeGround Services									✓
Inner South Community Health Service																✓
InTouch			✓				✓					✓				✓
Junction Support Services				✓												✓
Kara House	1	✓
Kildonan UnitingCare
Lake Tyers Health and Childrens Services Association Inc.
Latrobe Community Health Service																✓

	Refuges		Outreach/Specialist Family Violence Services										High-Risk Responses		Counselling
Activity	Crisis support and accommodation	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—Family Violence Stage 2	High risk family violence response	High risk family violence response	Family violence support
Activity Element	Refuges and crisis accommodation designated for family violence.	Refuge re-establishment	Outreach	Intensive case management	Access to private rental	After hours service	Court support	Emergency accommodation for women	Emergency accommodation for men	Safe at Home	Extended after hours response	Intensive case management	Case management	RAMP coordination	Women and children's counselling, including Court Network
Lifeworks Relationship Counselling and Education Services
Loddon Mallee Housing Services Limited
Loddon-Campaspe CASA
Mallee Family Care
Mallee Sexual Assault Unit	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓		✓		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Mallee District Aboriginal Service
McAuley Community Services for Women	✓									✓
Mens' Referral Service
Migrant Information Centre (Eastern Melbourne) Ltd.																✓
Mildura Aboriginal Corporation
Minerva Community Services	✓	✓	✓							✓			✓
Mitchum Community House Inc.																✓
Monash Health											✓					✓
MonashLink Community Health Service Ltd.																✓
Mungabareena Aboriginal Cooperation
Murray Valley Aboriginal Cooperative
Nexus Primary Health			✓	✓												✓
Ngwala Willumbong Co-operative Ltd.										✓
Njernda Aboriginal Corporation			✓

	Refuges		Outreach/Specialist Family Violence Services										High-Risk Responses		Counselling
Activity	Crisis support and accommodation	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—Family Violence Stage 2	High risk family violence response	High risk family violence response	Family violence support
Activity Element	Refuges and crisis accommodation designated for family violence.	Refuge re-establishment	Outreach	Intensive case management	Access to private rental	After hours service	Court support	Emergency accommodation for women	Emergency accommodation for men	Safe at Home	Extended after hours response	Intensive case management	Case management	RAMP coordination	Women and children's counselling, including Court Network
Peninsula Health Community Health
Plenty Valley Community Health
Primary Care Connect			✓										✓	✓
Quantum Support Services	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓				✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Ramahyuck
Ranges Community Health																✓
Relationships Australia (Victoria)																✓
Rights Information and Advocacy Centre
Royal Women's Hospital
Rumbalara Aboriginal Co-operative Ltd.												✓
Rural Housing Network Limited					✓			✓	✓
Safe Futures Foundation	✓	✓	✓	✓				✓		✓	✓
Safe Steps Family Violence Response Centre (Statewide Service Response)	✓	✓	✓							✓	✓
Salvation Army (Victoria) Property Trust - Barwon Region		✓		✓	✓				✓
Salvation Army (Victoria) Property Trust										✓		✓
Salvation Army (Victoria) Property Trust - Gippsland Region (Gippscare)			✓	✓					✓	✓
Salvation Army (Victoria) Property Trust - Western (Mary Anderson Family Violence Service)	✓	✓

	Refuges		Outreach/Specialist Family Violence Services										High-Risk Responses		Counselling
Activity	Crisis support and accommodation	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness – family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness – family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness – Family Violence Stage 2	High risk family violence response	High risk family violence response	Family violence support
Activity Element	Refuges and crisis accommodation designated for family violence.	Refuge re-establishment	Outreach	Intensive case management	Access to private rental	After hours service	Court support	Emergency accommodation for women	Emergency accommodation for men	Safe at Home	Extended after hours response	Intensive case management	Case management	RAMP coordination	Women and children's counselling, including Court Network
Salvation Army (Victoria) Property Trust - Southern			✓	✓	✓	✓		✓		✓	✓		✓
Shekinah Homeless Services Inc.										✓
South Eastern CASA
South West CASA
Southern Family Life Service Association																✓
Southern Health						✓
Springvale Indo-Chinese Mutual Assistance Association																✓
Sunbury Community Health
Sunrasia Community Health
Time for Youth
UnitingCare Gippsland																✓
Upper Murray CASA
Victoria University
Victorian Aboriginal Child Care Agency Co-operative Ltd. (OG)												✓
Victorian Aboriginal Community Services Association Ltd.
Victorian Aboriginal Health Service
Victorian Institute for Forensic Mental Health
VincentCare Victoria (including Marion House)	✓	✓				✓				✓	✓	✓
Wathaurong Aboriginal Co-operative Ltd.
WAYSS Limited	✓		✓	✓	✓	✓		✓		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓

	Refuges		Outreach/Specialist Family Violence Services										High-Risk Responses		Counselling
Activity	Crisis support and accommodation	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	Transition support	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—family violence initiatives	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness—Family Violence Stage 2	High risk family violence response	High risk family violence response	Family violence support
Activity Element	Refuges and crisis accommodation designated for family violence.	Refuge re-establishment	Outreach	Intensive case management	Access to private rental	After hours service	Court support	Emergency accommodation for women	Emergency accommodation for men	Safe at Home	Extended after hours response	Intensive case management	Case management	RAMP coordination	Women and children's counselling, including Court Network
Wesley Mission Victoria	✓								✓
West CASA
West Gippsland Healthcare Group																✓
Whitehorse Community Health Service Ltd.																✓
Windermere Child and Family Services																✓
Winda-Mara Aboriginal Corporation Ltd.
Women with Disabilities Victoria												✓
Women's Health Goulburn North-East
Women's Health Loddon Mallee Inc.
Women's Health in the North																✓
Women's Health West	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓		✓		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Women's Information and referral exchange
Women's Liberation Halfway House	✓	✓
WRISC Family Violence Support			✓		✓		✓			✓		✓
Total providers funded	23	22	28	16	13	12	4	12	11	24	14	20	14	13	35

Based on: Department of Health and Human Services, 'Attached Mapping of FV providers by funded activity DHHS comments', Sheet 1, produced by the State of Victoria in response to the Commission's Notice to Produce dated 21 September 2015.

*Funded through NPAH in 2014-15 but did not specify which element of NPAH

From Bumbalara Aboriginal Co-operative Ltd.

^The Male Centre

Men's Programs		Adolescent Programs		Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander-specific								Regional Coordination	Information And Referral
Men's case management (mainstream)	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness – family violence initiatives	Men's Family Violence (including men's behaviour change programs)	Sexually abusive behaviour treatment service	Adolescent Family Violence	National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness – family violence initiatives		Indigenous Family Violence					National Partnership Agreement on Homelessness – family violence initiatives	Family Violence Regional Service Integration	Telephone information and referral	Women's information and referral exchange
					Indigenous family violence support	Aboriginal legal assistance	Healing and Time Out	Men's Resource Advocacy Service	Men's groups program	Regional Action Groups	Community Initiative Fund
										✓	✓
													✓
											✓
													✓
													✓
														✓
					✓
4	29	11	3	12	1	5	0	3	7	19	5	12

Glossary

Affected family member	A person who is to be protected by a family violence intervention order. This terminology is also used by Victoria Police to describe victims of family violence.
Affidavit	A written statement made under oath or affirmation.
Applicant	A person who applies for a family violence intervention order (or other court process). This can be the affected family member or a Victoria Police member acting on behalf of the affected family member.
Applicant support worker	A worker at some magistrates' courts who advises and assists an applicant with court procedures (for example, applying for a family violence intervention order).
Bail	The release of a person from legal custody into the community on condition that they promise to re-appear later for a court hearing to answer the charges. The person may have to agree to certain conditions, such as reporting to the police or living at a particular place.
Breach	A failure to comply with a legal obligation, for example the conditions of a family violence safety notice or family violence intervention order. Breaching a notice or order is a criminal offence. In this report the terms 'breach' and 'contravention' are used interchangeably.
Brokerage	A pool of funds allocated to a service provider to purchase goods and/or services for its clients according to relevant guidelines. For example, brokerage funds could be used to pay for rental accommodation, health services and other community services.
Child	A person under the age of 18 years.
CISP	The Court Integrated Services Program is a case-management and referral service operating in certain magistrates' courts for people who are on bail or summons and are accused of criminal offences.
Cold referral	A referral to a service where it is up to the client to make contact, rather than a third party. For example, where a phone number or address is provided to a victim.
Committal proceeding	A hearing in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, to determine if there is sufficient evidence for a person charged with a crime to be required to stand trial.
Contravention	A breach, as defined above. In this report, the terms 'breach' and 'contravention' are used interchangeably.
Crimonogenic	Producing or leading to crime or criminality.
Culturally and linguistically diverse	People from a range of different countries or ethnic and cultural groups. Includes people from non-English speaking backgrounds as well as those born outside Australia whose first language is English. In the context of this report, CALD includes migrants, refugees and humanitarian entrants, international students, unaccompanied minors, 'trafficked' women and tourists. Far from suggesting a homogenous group, it encompasses a wide range of experiences and needs.
Culturally safe	An approach to service delivery that is respectful of a person's culture and beliefs, is free from discrimination and does not question their cultural identity. Cultural safety is often used in relation to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.
Directions hearing	A court hearing to resolve procedural matters before a substantive hearing.

Duty lawyer	A lawyer who advises and assists people who do not have their own lawyer on the day of their court hearing and can represent them for free in court.
Ex parte hearing	A court hearing conducted in the absence of one of the parties.
Expert witness	A witness who is an expert or has special knowledge on a particular topic.
Family violence intervention order	An order made by either the Magistrates' Court of Victoria or the Children's Court of Victoria, to protect an affected family member from family violence.
Family violence safety notice	A notice issued by Victoria Police to protect a family member from violence. It is valid for a maximum of five working days. A notice constitutes an application by the relevant police officer for a family violence intervention order.
Federal Circuit Court	A lower level federal court (formerly known as the Federal Magistrates' Court). The court's jurisdiction includes family law and child support, administrative law, admiralty law, bankruptcy, copyright, human rights, industrial law, migration, privacy and trade practices. The court shares those jurisdictions with the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Court of Australia.
First mention	The first court hearing date on which a matter is listed before a court.
Genograms	A graphic representation of a family tree that includes information about the history of, and relationship between, different family members. It goes beyond a traditional family tree by allowing repetitive patterns to be analysed.
Headquarter court	In the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, there is a headquarter court for each of its 12 regions at which most, if not all, of the court's important functions are performed. All Magistrates' Court headquarter courts have family violence intervention order lists.
Heteronormative/heteronormatism	The assumption or belief that heterosexuality is the only normal sexual orientation.
Indictable offence	A serious offence heard before a judge in a higher court. Some indictable offences may be triable summarily.
Informant	The Victoria Police officer who prepares the information in respect of a criminal charge. The informant may be called to give evidence in the court hearing about what they did, heard or saw.
Intake	A point of entry or 'doorway' into a service or set of services.
Interim order	A temporary order made pending a final order.
L17	The Victoria Police family violence risk assessment and risk management report. The L17 form records risks identified at family violence incidents and is completed when a report of family violence is made. It also forms the basis for referrals to specialist family violence services.
Lay witness	A witness who does not testify as an expert witness.
Mandatory sentence	A sentence set by legislation (for example, a minimum penalty) which does not permit the court to exercise its discretion to impose a different sentence.
Other party	A term used by Victoria Police to describe the person against whom an allegation of family violence has been made (the alleged perpetrator).

Prescribed organisation	An organisation empowered to share information relevant to risk assessment and risk management under the Commission’s recommended information-sharing regime to be established under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) . Such organisations could include, for example, Support and Safety Hubs, specialist family violence services, drug and alcohol services, mental health services, courts, general practitioners and nurses. The proposed regime is discussed in Chapter 7.
Protected person	A person who is protected by a family violence intervention order or a family violence safety notice.
Recidivist	A repeat offender who continues to commit crimes despite previous findings of guilt and punishment. In this report this term is also used to describe perpetrators against whom more than one report of family violence has been made to Victoria Police, including where no criminal charge has been brought.
Registrar	An administrative court official.
Respondent	A person who responds to an application for a family violence intervention orders (or other court process). This includes a person against whom a family violence safety notice has been issued.
Respondent support worker	A worker based at some magistrates’ courts who advises and assists respondents with court procedures, (for example, a family violence intervention order proceeding).
Risk assessment and risk management report	A Victoria Police referral L17 form, completed for every family violence incident reported to police.
Risk Assessment and Management Panels	Also known as RAMPs, these are multi-agency partnerships that manage high-risk cases where victims are at risk of serious injury or death. These are described in Chapter 6.
Summary offence	A less serious offence than an indictable offence, which is usually heard by a magistrate.
Summons	A document issued by a court requiring a person to attend a hearing at a particular time and place.
Triable summarily	Specific indictable offences that can be prosecuted in the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria, subject to the consent of the accused and the magistrate.
Universal services	A service provider to the entire community, such as health services in public hospitals or education in public schools.
Warm referral	A referral to a service where the person making the referral facilitates the contact—for example, by introducing and making an appointment for the client.
Young person	A person up to the age of 25 years.

If you would like to receive this publication in an accessible format, including large print or audio, please call the Victorian Government Contact Centre on 1300 366 356.

Royal Commission
into Family Violence

www.rcfv.com.au

ISBN 978-0-9944439-6-0

Royal Commission
into Family Violence

Volume VII

Commissioned research

March 2016

Royal Commission into Family Violence

Volume VII

Commissioned research

The Hon. Marcia Neave AO – Commissioner
Patricia Faulkner AO – Deputy Commissioner
Tony Nicholson – Deputy Commissioner

ORDER TO BE PUBLISHED

Victorian Government Printer
March 2016

Volume VII Commissioned research
ISBN 978-0-9944439-0-8

Published March 2016

ISBN

Summary and recommendations

978-0-9944440-1-1

Volume I Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-1-5

Volume II Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-2-2

Volume III Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-3-9

Volume IV Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-4-6

Volume V Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-5-3

Volume VI Report and recommendations

978-0-9944439-6-0

Suggested citation: State of Victoria, Royal Commission into Family Violence: Report and recommendations, Vol VII, Parl Paper No 132 (2014–16).

In addition to relying on the work of its research team, the Royal Commission into Family Violence commissioned two specific pieces of research—a report on family violence trends in Victoria from 2009–10 to 2013–14 and a report on the impact of family violence proceedings in the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria.

Both reports are included in this volume in full.

Contents

An overview of family violence in Victoria: findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14	1
Understanding family violence court proceedings: the impact of family violence on the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria	161

An overview of family violence in Victoria: findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009–10 to 2013–14

The Victorian Family Violence Database operated between 1999 and 2010 and was the repository for data from a range of sources—Victoria Police, the Magistrates’ and Children’s Courts, the Magistrates’ Court Family Violence Division Courts and specialist family violence courts, the Victims of Crime Helpline and the Victims Assistance and Counselling Program, the Department of Health and Human Services Integrated Risk Information database, the Victorian Supported Accommodation Assistance Program (now the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection), Victorian public hospital emergency departments, the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal, and Victoria Legal Aid.

The most recent publication from the database, covering the period 1999 to 2010, was released in 2012, which means there has been no publicly available compilation of trend data for a number of years. Although the database had many limitations, its cessation has been a major loss for effective policy-making. During this time data has continued to be collated, but information has generally been reported separately by each department and agency. Even within the same department or agency there is often more than one database and limited capacity for linking the information held in each source. For example, the Magistrates’ Court holds data in separate civil and criminal law databases that are not linked.

To overcome this problem, the Commission sought data from departments under notices to produce and from Victoria Police, agencies, and the Magistrates’ and Children’s courts. We then engaged the Crime Statistics Agency to analyse the data and report on family violence trends for the five years from July 2009 to June 2014. This data appears throughout the Commission’s report.

The Commission thanks the Crime Statistics Agency for performing this complex task in a very short time. We would also like to thank the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare for its contribution to the CSA’s work. We note that the Victims Support Agency is working towards the production of more regular and focused data reports from the Family Violence Database (collated by the CSA). This is a positive development.

An overview of family violence in Victoria

Findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database 2009-10 to 2013-14

Produced on behalf of the Royal Commission into Family
Violence by the Crime Statistics Agency

Unless indicated otherwise, content in this publication is provided under a Creative Commons Attribution 3.0 Australia Licence. To view a copy of this licence, visit creativecommons.org/licenses/by/3.0/au. It is a condition of the Creative Commons Attribution 3.0 Licence that you must give credit to the original author who is the State of Victoria.

If you would like to receive this publication in an accessible format, such as large print or audio, please telephone Crime Statistics Agency on 03 8684 1808 or email info@crimestatistics.vic.gov.au.

For further information or additional copies, please contact:
Crime Statistics Agency

121 Exhibition Street, Melbourne, VIC 3000

Tel 03 8684 1808

Acknowledgements

This report, updating in part the Victorian Family Violence Database, has involved the work of representatives of many agencies to make data collection, analysis and production possible.

We would like to acknowledge the Royal Commission into Family Violence, who commissioned the Crime Statistics Agency to produce this work. We would also like to acknowledge all the agencies who provided data and expertise supporting this iteration of the database: Victoria Police, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Victoria Legal Aid, the Victims Support Agency in the Department of Justice and Regulation, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare.

Authors

Courtney Van Tongeren

Melanie Millstead

Brad Petry

This page is intentionally blank.

Contents

Acknowledgements.....	3
Authors.....	3
List of tables.....	6
List of figures.....	9
1. Key themes.....	12
Prevalence of family violence in Victoria.....	12
Gender of victims of family violence	12
Gender of perpetrators of family violence	13
Relationships of victims to perpetrators	13
Children as victims of family violence	13
Children as perpetrators of family violence.....	14
Family violence recidivism recorded by Victoria Police	14
Specific population groups.....	14
Culturally and Linguistically Diverse (CALD).....	14
Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander.....	15
Disability	15
Family violence across the regions	15
2. Introduction.....	16
Purpose and uses of the Victorian Family Violence Database	16
What the Victorian Family Violence Database Does.....	16
Challenges in collating the Database	17
Comparisons over time.....	17
Past, present and future of the Victorian Family Violence Database	17
In this report.....	19
3. Victorian Family Violence Database: 2009-10 to 2013-14	20
Data sources	20
Victoria Police	20
Magistrates' and Children's Courts	20
Specialist Family Violence Court Services	20
Department of Health and Human Services – Integrated Reports and Information System (IRIS).....	21
Department of Health and Human Services – Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset (VEMD)	21
Victims Assistance Program (VAP).....	21
Victims of Crime (VoC) helpline	21
Victoria Legal Aid (VLA)	22
Specialist Homelessness Services Collection (SHSC).....	22
Supported Accommodation Assistance Program (SAAP).....	22

4. Victoria Police	24
Family incidents recorded.....	24
Family incidents across Victoria.....	25
Demographics of affected family members and other parties	26
Age and sex of affected family members	26
Age and sex of other parties	27
Relationship between affected family members and other parties	29
Parent-Child relationships in family incidents.....	31
Children affected family members to parent other parties	31
Adult parent affected family members to youth children other parties	32
Adult children as the other party to adult parent affected family members.....	33
Domestic partner and spousal relationships in family incidents.....	33
Family incidents involving current partners	33
Family incidents involving former partners	34
Children present at family incidents	35
Fear level of affected family member at time of the incident.....	35
Risk factors recorded on L17 Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report.....	36
Actions taken by Victoria Police	39
Family Violence Intervention Orders and Family Violence Safety Notices sought by police	40
Referrals made by police	40
5. Magistrates' Court	41
Applications for Family Violence Intervention Orders	41
Types of applications.....	42
Mode of issue	42
Application complainant	43
Outcome of applications	44
Demographic characteristics of affected family members and respondents	45
Gender and age of affected family members.....	45
Gender and age of respondents.....	46
Relationship between affected family members and respondents.....	47
Children as affected family members.....	49
Affected family members across Victoria	50
Interpreter requirements.....	51
Applications heard in the Family Violence Court Division	51
6. Children's Court	52
Applications for Family Violence Intervention Orders	52
Types of applications.....	53
Mode of issue	53

Application complainant	54
Outcome of applications	55
Demographic characteristics of affected family members and respondents	56
Gender and age of affected family members.....	56
Gender and age of respondents.....	57
Affected family members under 17 years old.....	58
Affected family members over 18 years old	59
Relationship of affected family member to respondents	60
Parent/step-parent affected family members of a young respondent	61
Affected family members across Victoria	62
7. Specialist Family Violence Courts Services	63
Applicants and respondents accessing a specialist court support worker	63
Applicants accessing a support worker.....	63
Respondents accessing a support worker	64
Demographics of applicants and respondents accessing a support worker	65
Applicants accessing a support worker.....	65
Respondents accessing a support worker	66
Source of referrals to support worker.....	67
Specialist courts across Victoria	69
Disability status of applicants and respondents accessing a support worker	70
Interpreter requirements of clients accessing a support worker.....	70
Applicants with children in their care	71
8. Integrated Reporting Information System (IRIS) – Department of Health and Human Services	72
Cases and issues recorded by IRIS agencies.....	72
Source of referral for family violence related cases.....	73
Point of closure.....	74
Safety plans & risk assessment completed.....	75
Intervention order at referral.....	75
Clients presenting to IRIS agencies	76
Family violence related clients accessing men’s behaviour change programs and women and children’s family violence services	76
Clients accessing men’s behaviour change programs across Victoria.....	77
Clients accessing women and children’s family violence services across Victoria.....	78
Age of men accessing men’s behaviour change programs.....	79
Demographics of clients accessing women and children’s family violence services.....	80
Country of birth	80
Indigenous status.....	81

9.	Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset (VEMD).....	82
	Demographic characteristics of VEMD patients.....	83
	Gender and age of family violence patients	83
	Indigenous status.....	84
	Country of birth	84
	VEMD patients across Victoria	85
	Cause of injury	86
	Nature of main injury	87
10.	Victims Assistance Program (VAP)	88
	Victims of family violence.....	88
	Demographic characteristics of family violence related victims.....	89
	Gender and age of victims.....	89
	Indigenous status.....	89
	Cultural background	90
	Victims of family violence across Victoria	90
11.	Victims of Crime Helpline (VoC).....	91
	Victims of family violence.....	91
	Demographic characteristics of victims	91
12.	Victoria Legal Aid (VLA)	92
	Victoria Legal Aid services.....	92
	Referrals to Victoria Legal Aid	93
	Demographics of clients accessing Victoria Legal Aid services	93
	Gender and age of clients	93
	Culturally and linguistically diverse clients.....	95
	Disability status of clients	96
	Outcomes of duty lawyer services	97
13.	Specialist Homelessness Services Collection (SHSC).....	98
	Support periods for clients seeking housing assistance in Victoria.....	98
	Demographics of clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons	99
	Main reason clients sought housing assistance.....	100
	Young people seeking assistance on their own.....	101
	Indigenous status	101
	Country of birth.....	102
	Clients with mental health issues	102
	Main source of income.....	103
14.	Further analysis: police recorded family violence recidivism.....	104
	Introduction	104

4 Contents

Background	105
Methodology	108
Data	109
Statistical analysis	110
Findings	110
Perpetrator characteristics	110
Perpetrators' recorded family violence histories	113
Index incident characteristics	114
Police actions	118
Overall recidivism rates	119
Recidivism by perpetrator and index incident characteristics	120
Final recidivism model	127
Time between index incident and recidivism incident	129
Discussion	134
15. Gaps and opportunities to improve the family violence database	136
Introduction	136
About the datasets	137
Overview of data collection activities	137
Improving the family violence evidence base in Victoria	139
Inclusion of additional data sources	140
A Victorian family violence data framework	140
Application of common identifiers	141
Data consistency and quality	142
Data Governance	142
Information sharing across government	144
High priority data items	144
Conclusion	145
16. Conclusion	146
17. Explanatory notes	147
Reference periods	147
Rates per 100,000 population	147
Regional statistics	147
Confidentialisation	149
18. Glossary	150
19. References	152

List of tables

Table 1. Previous major iterations and products of the Victorian Family Violence Database	18
Table 2. Overview of data sources	23
Table 3. Family incidents recorded and family incident rate per 100,000 population – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	24
Table 4. Family incidents by police region – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	25
Table 5. Sex of other party by age group of associated affected family member, July 2009 to June 2014	27
Table 6. Children affected family members aged 17 years and under where the other party is a parent – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014	31
Table 7. Parents as the affected family member where the other party is 17 years or younger, by gender of OTH and gender and age of AFM, July 2009 to June 2014 combined	32
Table 8. Parents as affected family member where the other party is 18 years and older by gender and age of AFM and age of OTH – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014 combined	33
Table 9. Former partner relationships where both affected family member and other party are over 18 years by gender of AFM and age group of other party – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014 combined	34
Table 10. Number of family incidents where a child/children were present – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	35
Table 11. Proportion of incidents where each risk factor relating to the affected family member was recorded at the time of the incident – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	36
Table 12. Proportion of incidents where each risk factor relating to the other party was recorded at the time of the incident – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	37
Table 13. Proportion of incidents where other risk factors were recorded at the time of the incident – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	38
Table 14. Incidents by type of action taken by police – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	39
Table 15. Number of family incidents where FVIO or FVSN sought – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	40
Table 16. Total referrals made following a family incident – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	40
Table 17. Proportion of finalised applications by mode of issue – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	42
Table 18. Affected family members by region of residence – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	50
Table 19. Finalised original applications heard in the Family Violence Court Division, by final court location – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	51
Table 20. Proportion of finalised applications by mode of issue – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	53
Table 21. Number of family violence intervention order applications by complainant – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	54
Table 22. Affected family members who were a parent/step-parent to a respondent aged 17 years or younger, by gender of the respondent – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	61
Table 23. Affected family members by region – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	62
Table 24. Applicants accessing a specialist court support worker by court location – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014	63

Table 25. Respondents accessing a specialist court support worker by court location – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014	64
Table 26. Applicants who accessed a specialist court support worker by region of residence and court where they saw the support worker – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014	69
Table 27. Cases recorded by IRIS agencies by issue recorded – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	72
Table 28. Issues presented to men’s behaviour change programs and women and children’s family violence services – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	73
Table 29. Source of referral for cases with at least one family violence issue – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	73
Table 30. Number of family violence related cases by point of closure – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	74
Table 31. Clients accessing men’s behaviour change programs by client’s region of residence – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	77
Table 32. Clients accessing women and children’s family violence services by client’s region of residence – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	79
Table 33. Patients by region of residence – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014	85
Table 34. Gender of VAP clients who were victims of family violence – VAP, July 2009 to June 2014	89
Table 35. Number of victims of family violence by region – VAP, July 2009 to June 2014	90
Table 36. Victims by the type of crime – Victims of Crime, July 2010 to June 2014	91
Table 37. Services provided by VLA where primary matter is family violence related – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014	92
Table 38. Gender and age group of clients applying for substantive grants – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014	94
Table 39. Top 5 main reasons for clients seeking assistance by gender – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014	100
Table 40. Young people seeking assistance on their own, by gender – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014	101
Table 41. Support periods of clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons by main source of income at first contact – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014	103
Table 42. Number and proportion of incidents recorded for perpetrators who committed 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 or more incidents between 2004-05 and 2013-14	106
Table 43. Proportion of unique perpetrators per year who committed 1, 2, 3, and 4 or more incidents within that year	107
Table 44. Existing, new and total family violence perpetrators each year, 2005 – 2014	108
Table 45. Data items	109
Table 46. Age and sex of perpetrators	111
Table 47. Relationship type by perpetrator sex	112
Table 48. Victim and relationship risk factors present at index incidents	114
Table 49. Perpetrator risk factors present at index incidents	115
Table 50. Number of risk factors by relationship between perpetrator and victim	117
Table 51. Actions recorded by police at index incidents	118
Table 52. Relationships between perpetrator characteristics and recidivism	121

7 An overview of family violence in Victoria

Table 53. Relationships between index incident characteristics and recidivism	123
Table 54. Bivariate relationships between victim and relationship risk factors and recidivism	124
Table 55. Bivariate relationships between perpetrator risk factors and recidivism	125
Table 56. Bivariate relationships between police recorded	126
Table 57. Logistic regression model comparing odds of recidivism versus no recidivism	128
Table 58. Proportion of perpetrators recorded for recidivism incidents at 6, 12 and 24 months post-index incident	130
Table 59. Overview of family violence datasets	138
Table 60. Date variable used in each data source to determine the relevant reference period	147
Table 61. Department of Health and Human Services Regions	148
Table 62. Victoria Police Regions	149

List of figures

Figure 1. Number of recorded family incidents – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	24
Figure 2. Family incident rate per 100,000 population by Local Government Area – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014	25
Figure 3. Affected family members by sex – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	26
Figure 4. Sex and age of affected family members – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014	27
Figure 5. Sex and age of other parties – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014	28
Figure 6. Relationship of affected family member to other party where AFM is male – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	29
Figure 7. Relationship of affected family member to other party where AFM is female – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	30
Figure 8. Proportion of incidents where a child/children were present – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014	35
Figure 9. Finalised applications for family violence intervention orders – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	41
Figure 10. Proportion of finalised applications by type of application – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	42
Figure 11. Proportion of finalised applications by complainant – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	43
Figure 12. Proportion of finalised applications by outcome of application – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	44
Figure 13. Affected family members by gender and age – Magistrates' Court, July 2013 to June 2014	45
Figure 14. Respondents on original applications by gender and age – Magistrates' Court, July 2013 to June 2014	46
Figure 15. Relationship between the primary AFM and Respondent where the AFM is female – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	47
Figure 16. Relationship between the primary AFM and Respondent where the AFM is male – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	48
Figure 17. Children as affected family members on original applications by age group – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014	49
Figure 18. Affected family members by region of residence – Magistrates' Court, July 2013 to June 2014	50
Figure 19. Finalised applications for family violence intervention orders – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	52
Figure 20. Proportion of finalised applications by type of application – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	53
Figure 21. Proportion of finalised applications by complainant – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	54
Figure 22. Proportion of finalised applications by outcome of application – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	55
Figure 23. Affected family members by gender and age – Children's Court, July 2013 to June 2014	56
Figure 24. Respondents on finalised original FVIO applications by gender – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	57
Figure 25. Gender and age of respondents – Children's Court, July 2013 to June 2014	58
Figure 26. Age of respondents on applications where the affected family member was 18 years or older, Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014	59

9 An overview of family violence in Victoria

Figure 27. Relationship between primary AFM and respondent where the AFM is male – Children’s Court, July 2009 to June 2014	60
Figure 28. Relationship between the primary AFM and respondent where the AFM is female, Children’s Court – July 2009 to June 2014	61
Figure 29. Affected family members by region – Children’s Court, July 2013 to June 2014	62
Figure 30. Age of female applicants accessing a support worker – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2013 to June 2014	65
Figure 31. Age of male respondents accessing a support worker – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2013 to June 2014	66
Figure 32. Proportion of applicants accessing a specialist court support worker by referral source – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014	67
Figure 33. Proportion of respondents by referral source – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014	68
Figure 34. Proportion of applicants who had a child/children in their care during their session with a support worker – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2013 to June 2014	71
Figure 35. Proportion of cases in which a safety plan was completed – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	75
Figure 36. Clients presenting to IRIS agencies by type of program – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	76
Figure 37. Clients accessing men’s behaviour change programs by client’s region of residence – IRIS, July 2013 to June 2014	77
Figure 38. Clients accessing women and children’s family violence services by client’s region of residence – IRIS, July 2013 to June 2014	78
Figure 39. Age of men accessing men’s behaviour change programs – IRIS, July 2013 to June 2014	79
Figure 40. Gender and age of clients accessing women and children’s family violence services – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014	80
Figure 41. Patients presenting with injuries caused by a family member – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014	82
Figure 42. Patients presenting with injuries caused by a family member by gender and age – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014	83
Figure 43. Patients by DHHS region of residence – VEMD, July 2013 to June 2014	85
Figure 44. Proportion of total causes of injury by gender – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014 combined	86
Figure 45. Proportion of the nature of main injury by gender – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014 combined	87
Figure 46. Proportion of Victims Assistance Program clients that were victims of family violence – VAP, July 2009 to June 2014	88
Figure 47. Gender and age of victims of family violence – VAP, July 2013 to June 2014	89
Figure 48. Victims of family violence by gender and age – Victims of Crime, July 2013 to June 2014	91
Figure 49. Services provided by VLA where primary matter is family violence related – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014	92
Figure 50. Gender and age of clients accessing duty lawyer services – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014	93
Figure 51. Proportion of clients who required an interpreter by type of service – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014	95

List of figures 10

Figure 52. Proportion of clients who identified as having a disability by type of service – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014	96
Figure 53. Outcome of duty lawyer services by gender of client – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014	97
Figure 54. Proportion of support periods for clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014	98
Figure 55. Clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons by gender and age – SHSC, July 2013 to June 2014	99
Figure 56. Proportion of support periods for clients experiencing family violence by indigenous status and gender – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014	101
Figure 57. Number of incidents per perpetrator, 2004-05 to 2013-14	105
Figure 58. Proportion of unique perpetrators per year who committed 1, 2, 3, and 4 or more incidents	106
Figure 59. Existing, new and total family violence perpetrators each year, 2005 – 2014	107
Figure 60. Methodology for identification of index and recidivism incidents	109
Figure 61. Relationship type by perpetrator sex	111
Figure 62. Number of prior family violence incidents recorded	113
Figure 63. Total number of risk factors recorded at index incident	116
Figure 64. Number of risk factors recorded at index incident by relationship between perpetrator and victim	117
Figure 65. Types of recorded offences arising from index incidents	119
Figure 66. Number of repeat incidents perpetrated	120
Figure 67. Recidivism by age group at time of index incident	122
Figure 68. Recidivism by relationship type between perpetrator and victim	122
Figure 69. Overall proportion recorded for a recidivism incident over time	129
Figure 70. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident over time by sex	131
Figure 71. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident by age at index incident	131
Figure 72. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident over time by relationship type	132
Figure 73. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident over time by incident history	132
Figure 74. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident over time by recorded breach of family violence orders history	133

1. Key themes

Prevalence of family violence in Victoria

In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014, the incidence of family violence has increased across all aspects of the family violence system represented within the Victorian Family Violence Database. The number of family incidents recorded by Victoria Police increased by 82.7% from 35,666 incidents in the 2009-10 financial year to 65,154 in 2013-14. This increase has resulted in a family incident rate of 1,115.3 per 100,000 people in Victoria in 2013-14.

The number of finalised applications heard in the Magistrates' and Children's court increased in the five years from July 2009. The number of applications heard in the Magistrates' Court increased by 34.5% to 35,147 in 2013-14 while the number of applications heard in the Children's Court increased by 33.0% to 1,872 in 2013-14. These increases in applications have largely been driven by an increase in the number of police initiated applications.

In the five year period the number of people accessing family violence services has risen, with 4,425 people accessing women and children's family violence services in 2013-14, an increase of 11.7%, and 20,624 men presenting to behaviour change programs in 2013-14, up 446.9% from 2009-10. In addition, there were 16,240 people who accessed the Victims Assistance Program as victims of family violence in 2013-14.

Family violence was identified as a key factor contributing to homelessness, with just under 40% of all people seeking assistance from Specialist Homelessness Services in 2013-14 doing so for family violence reasons.

The total number of services provided by Victoria Legal Aid where the primary matter was family violence related has also increased in the five years from July 2009. In 2013-14 21,172 services were provided by Victoria Legal Aid for family violence matters, up 8.5% from 2009-10. This increase has largely been driven by increases in in-house duty lawyer services and legal help services.

Gender of victims of family violence

In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of female and male victims of family violence has remained stable across all of the agencies. In family incidents attended by police, three quarters of affected family members were female and one quarter were male.

On applications for family violence intervention orders made in the Magistrates' Court and Children's Court in 2013-14, the proportion of male and female affected family members is almost the same across both courts. On applications heard in the Magistrates' Court in 2013-14, 64% of affected family members were female and 36% were male. Similarly on applications heard in the Children's Court, 65% of affected family members were female and 35% were male. However, when children are removed from the analysis the proportion of female affected family members is higher.

In 2013-14, two-thirds of the patients presenting to emergency departments for family violence reasons were female while a third were male and, similarly, 69% of family violence victims accessing the Victims Assistance Program were female and 31% were male.

Gender of perpetrators of family violence

The proportion of male and female perpetrators across relevant agencies has also remained relatively stable over the five year period. In family incidents recorded by Victoria Police, 77% of other parties with a known sex were male and 23% were female. There was a similar proportion of respondents on applications for family violence intervention orders in the Magistrates' Court, with male respondents making up 78% and females making up 22% of all respondents.

There was a slightly different breakdown in the Children's Court, with 69% of respondents on family violence intervention orders being male and 31% female.

Relationships of victims to perpetrators

Across each of the relevant datasets, the relationship of the victim to the perpetrator varied depending upon the gender of the victim.

In family incidents recorded by police, female affected family members were more likely to be a current or former partner of the other party, as opposed to male affected family members who were more likely to be a family member of the other party.

In 2013-14, 68% of female affected family members were a current or former partner of the other party and 31% were a family member of the other party. This is in comparison to male affected family members, of which 52% were either a child, parent or other family member to the other party and 33% were a current partner of the other party.

Similarly, on applications for family violence intervention orders heard in the Magistrates' Court, female victims were more likely to be in a current/former partner relationship with the respondent than male victims.

73% of female victims were in a current/former partner relationship, and 10% were a parent of the respondent. 52% of male victims were in a current/former partner relationship, 14% were the parent/step-parent of the respondent and 10% were a sibling.

In the Children's Court, 51% of female affected family members in 2013-14 were a parent/step parent of the respondent while 36% of male affected family members were the parent/step-parent of the respondent.

Children as victims of family violence

In 2013-14, 3,341 family violence incidents recorded by Victoria Police had children listed as victims. Forty-four percent of these child victims were male and 56% were female. Children aged between 12 and 17 made up the greatest proportion of child victims. Incidents where male children were recorded as victims were perpetrated by males 63% of the time. Those incidents where female children were recorded as victims were perpetrated by males 55% of the time. In addition, children were present in around one third of all family violence incidents in 2013/14. This proportion has not changed significantly over the past five years.

The number of children listed as victims on intervention order applications to the Magistrates' Court increased by 20.6% between 2009-10 and 2013-14, from 19,353 to 23,332. Younger children aged under 13 made up the greatest proportion of child victims listed on these applications. Children also made up the largest proportion of victims on applications for intervention orders to the Children's Court in 2013-14, and the number of child victims increased by 20.3% over the past five years, from 1,222 in 2009-10 to 1,470 in 2013-14. The majority of perpetrators listed on intervention order applications to the Children's Court with child victims were male (84%). 1,559 clients who accessed women and children's family violence services between 2009 and 2014 were aged 17 or less.

Children as perpetrators of family violence

In 2013-14, people aged under 18 made up relatively small proportions of the overall number of perpetrators recorded by Victoria Police on family violence incident reports. Over the past five years, 11,861 family violence incidents were recorded by police with child perpetrators and adult parent victims. Sixty-four percent of perpetrators on these incidents were male and 36% were female.

A very small number of intervention order applications to the Magistrates' Court in 2013-14 listed perpetrators aged under 18 (n=72). Two thirds of male perpetrators listed on intervention order applications to the Children's Court in 2013-14 were aged between 15 and 19 and 13% were aged between 10 and 14. Fifteen to 19 year olds made up 57% of female perpetrators on these applications, and 10 to 14 year olds made up 16% of female perpetrators. In 2013-14, 744 parent/step-parents were listed on applications where the perpetrator was under 18.

Family violence recidivism recorded by Victoria Police

Police recorded family violence data was used to analyse patterns of recidivism over the past ten years. Overall, 63% (n=125,044) of family violence perpetrators had only one family violence incident recorded by police over that time and the remaining 37% (n=72,778) were recidivist perpetrators. Nine percent (n=16,914) of all perpetrators had five or more incidents recorded, yet this group accounted for 34% (n=136,349) of all incidents. The analysis revealed that recidivist perpetrators were more likely to:

- be male than female.
- be younger at the time of their first incident.
- perpetrate violence against a current or former partner as opposed to another family member.
- have a history of family violence incidents and/or offences for breaches of family violence orders.

In addition, police were more likely to record the following factors at the time of recidivist perpetrators' index family violence incidents: presence of children; perpetrator unemployed; perpetrator depression/mental health issue; victim pregnancy or new birth; recent escalation/increase in severity or frequency of violence; perpetrator drug use possible or definite; and/or victim alcohol use possible or definite. Recidivist perpetrators were more likely to have recorded offences arising from their index incident, and were more likely to have a police recorded action at the index incident of criminal charges pending for a breach of family violence.

Specific population groups

Culturally and Linguistically Diverse (CALD)

Where country of birth information was recorded across datasets, a large proportion of people were born in Australia. In Victorian Legal Aid records, the top five countries of birth of clients born outside of Australia were India, New Zealand, England, Vietnam and Sudan. Of clients seeking housing assistance for family violence reasons who had a known country of birth in 2013-14, 3% were born in North Africa & the Middle East and 2% were born in South-East Asia.

In the Magistrates' Court, on average 1.8% of all affected family members required an interpreter while 1.6% of all respondents required one. The languages required most frequently by respondents across the five years were Vietnamese, Mandarin and Arabic, including Lebanese. In 2013-14, 5% of applicants in the Specialist Family Violence Courts were recorded as requiring an interpreter when seeing the support worker.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander data were only available for in the VEMD, VAP and SHSC datasets, with data either not recorded or of low quality amongst the other contributing datasets.

In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of recorded indigenous status across these three datasets has remained relatively stable. In 2013–14, 5% of patients in the VEMD and VAP datasets identified as Indigenous, and in the three years to July 2011, on average 10% of SHSC clients identified as Indigenous.

Disability

Identification of victims with a disability in police data has remained stable in the last five years, with the proportion of family incidents recorded where there was the presence of a disability remaining between 2 and 3 per cent each year.

In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of Specialist Family Violence Court applicants who identified as having a disability fluctuated between 9% and 12% of all applicants who had accessed a support worker. Victorian Legal Aid data showed that in 2013-14, the proportion of applicants for a substantive grant who identified as having a disability was 19%, while the proportion of clients accessing a duty lawyer or legal advice service who had a disability was 22% and 25% respectively.

Family violence across the regions

Over the past 12 months, family incidents recorded by police have increased across all regions in Victoria. The North West Metro and Eastern regions have increased by the greatest proportion, up by 10.4% and 10% respectively in 2014–15. The North West Metro region now has the highest recorded proportion across the state, comprising 31.6% of all family incidents recorded.

In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014 in the Magistrates' Court, the highest proportion of affected family members lived in the North & West Metropolitan and Southern Metropolitan regions, on average making up 32% and 22% respectively. These regions also recorded the highest proportions of affected family members in the Children's Courts during the same period.

Of the 2,337 applicants who accessed a support worker from the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services 2014–15, almost half (44%) lived in the North and West Metropolitan regions. In addition, of the 31% of applicants who lived in the Southern Metropolitan region, three quarters of these applicants accessed a support worker at the Frankston Magistrates' Court.

2. Introduction

Family violence has been identified as the most significant law and order issue confronting the State of Victoria, and a national emergency (State Government of Victoria, 2015a). The impacts of family violence across the community are profound, complex and present many challenges for individuals, communities and service providers (State of Victoria, 2015b).

The Terms of Reference for the Royal Commission into Family Violence invite the Royal Commission to explore issues relating to “systems and mechanisms to identify and appropriately prevent and respond to family violence, including information sharing and data systems” (State of Victoria, 2015b). The Victorian Family Violence Database (FVDB) is a long-standing project in the State of Victoria focused upon the collation of data relating to family violence from across a range of responding services and government agencies. This report presents a range of findings from this database to support the considerations of the Royal Commission and provides a picture of what can be gleaned from the available information about family violence in the state of Victoria. It follows on from five previous reports, which in totality represent 15 years of research and analysis into family violence trends.

Purpose and uses of the Victorian Family Violence Database

What the Victorian Family Violence Database Does

The Victorian Family Violence Database is a repository for a range of different datasets relating to family violence clients and service use, extracted from the data holdings of a variety of government agencies. The Database has expanded since its inception to include a broader range of datasets, as robust information has become available.

By collating these various different datasets in one place, the Database enables complementary analysis of disparate datasets, which would otherwise be a challenging exercise. Volume 5 of the database sets out its purpose clearly:

“The Victorian Family Violence Database (the Database) was developed because access to reliable and meaningful statistics on family violence is essential for the development of effective policy responses to family violence.

“The Database contributes to a more comprehensive picture of family violence in Victoria, and has the capacity to improve future planning and coordination of resources and responses. It is an important tool for government and stakeholders developing evidence-based policy for family violence.

“The ability to identify and advise on trends, gaps and system weaknesses through cross-sector data analysis and reporting allows for assessment of the impact of legislation, policy and programs, improvement in programs service delivery and measurement of current family violence patterns of demand.”

(Department of Justice, 2012)

While there are limitations (discussed below), the database provides a valid and useful picture of the demand for family violence related service recorded by responding agencies, and the trends and characteristics of those seeking help over time.

Challenges in collating the Database

All forms of administrative by-product data used for statistical purposes have limitations, and the data contained within the Victorian Family Violence Database is no exception. In order for a record to be made in the recording systems of the various agencies which can then be forwarded to the Database, a report or call for service must first be made to the responding agency. As a result, statistics held in this Database will not contain information relating to all incidences of family violence which may be experienced within the community, and will only contain a subset of this broader population of incidents. If not reported or recorded, the family violence incident will not be captured within the Database.

Unless the service is one dedicated to family violence cases only, the data will also usually require a flag or other variable to be recorded indicating that it does, in fact, relate to family violence. For a variety of reasons, this may not be disclosed to the person making the record. The client may not be asked or relevant family violence information may not be recorded. This contributes to a potential undercount of family violence related events covered by the Database. Additionally, simple data entry error may create false positives and false negatives in the datasets, impacting upon the quality of the information in the Database. Some variables are also subject to high levels of missing or unknown data, which may impact on the ability to draw firm conclusions based upon the remaining completed data.

The scope of data collected is often less than may be desirable or useful for research purposes, as the data is sourced from systems which have primarily been designed to meet business requirements, rather than statistical or research purposes. Additionally, as the Database contains data provided separately by each contributing agency, it is possible that individuals may appear in more than one dataset. The Database does not include any linked or integrated data to identify where individuals appear in more than one dataset. Therefore, figures from different sources cannot be summed to create a total representative figure for the prevalence of family violence seen by service agencies in Victoria. It should also be noted that not all agencies in Victoria who respond to family violence victims or perpetrators are currently contributors to the Victorian Family Violence Database.

Data relating to family violence collected by the agencies contributing to the Database is collected according to counting rules and classifications unique to each service. Details about each data source contained in the Database are provided in Chapter 2. For a broader discussion about the gaps relating to standardisation and governance of family violence data, please see Chapter 4.

Comparisons over time

While the Victorian Family Violence Database has now covered a period of 15 years, it should be highlighted that the significant cultural, legislative, policy and practice changes that have occurred during that period of time can impact upon the data that is collected by different agencies. In this report, where there have been significant known changes to business or recording practices impacting upon major counts, these have been noted and should be taken into account when drawing conclusions from these data. However, there will have been a wide range of more subtle changes which may have impacted upon the comparability of data over time and which are less obvious or not as well documented. As such, it is recommended that readers keep this in mind when reviewing data over the period of the database (especially between data held in this publication and previous volumes produced from the database) and treat the time series with caution.

Past, present and future of the Victorian Family Violence Database

The development of the Victorian Family Violence Database was initially funded in 2000 by Partnerships Against Domestic Violence, an Australian Government initiative. The database was conceived as a solution to the fragmented data collection often found across agencies with involvement in family violence, bringing together information collated from a range of sources to provide a single, statewide repository of data relating to family violence (Department of Justice & Regulation, 2012). In 2007, management of the Victorian Family Violence Database moved to the Victims Support Agency within the then Department of Justice.

Five previous iterations of the Victorian Family Violence Database have been produced and resulting reports published in five separate volumes. These volumes have been produced and published by the Victorian Community Council Against Violence (volumes 1 and 2) and the Department of Justice & Regulation's Victims Support Agency (volumes 3, 4 and 5). The reports generated from the Database remain the only comprehensive source of patterns and trends about family violence reporting in Victoria in the context of family violence initiatives at the present time.

Table 1. Previous major iterations and products of the Victorian Family Violence Database

Years covered	Major outputs	Year published
1999 to 2001	Victorian Family Violence Database: First Report (Volume 1)	2002
1999 to 2004	Victorian Family Violence Database: Five Year Report 1999–2004 (Volume 2)	2005
1999 to 2006	Measuring Family Violence in Victoria: Victorian Family Violence Database: Seven Year Trend Analysis 1999-2006 (Volume 3)	2008
1999 to 2008	Measuring family violence in Victoria : Victorian family violence database: nine year trend analysis 1999-2008 (Volume 4)	2009
1999 to 2010	Measuring Family Violence in Victoria - Victorian Family Violence Database: Eleven Year Trend Analysis (Volume 5)	2012

The last published report was released in 2012, when the then Victorian Department of Justice published a trend analysis report entitled 'Measuring Family Violence in Victoria – Victorian Family Violence Database: Eleven Year Trend Analysis'. The report drew on data contained in the Database that was recorded by a variety of agencies between 1999 and 2010. It provided an overview of the recorded prevalence of family violence, characteristics of perpetrators and victims, justice system responses and other services provided to perpetrators and victims of family violence.

To support the work of the Royal Commission into Family Violence, the Crime Statistics Agency was asked to produce an updated set of family violence statistics for the five years from July 2009 to June 2014 based on analysis of all of the existing data sources contained within the FVDB. Information was provided to the Royal Commission into Family Violence by agencies as part of the processes of the Royal Commission, and subsequently collated by the Crime Statistics Agency on their behalf. This report, and the accompanying set of data spreadsheets comprise the outputs of this supporting work. Data has been validated by agencies contributing their information to ensure accuracy and representativeness of the final findings.

Since 2014, the Victorian Family Violence Database has been collated by the Crime Statistics Agency and continues to be administered by the Community Operations and Victims Support Agency in the Department of Justice & Regulation. Operation of the Database is supported and guided by a Technical Data Working Group and represents a significant collaboration across the Victorian Government.

In this report

The following sections of this report provide findings from the Victorian Family Violence Database, a further exploratory analysis of family violence recidivism and a summary of gaps and opportunities to improve the database.

The overview of the Victorian Family Violence Database for the 2009-10 to 2013-14 period (Chapter 2) describes the data sources contained within the database, highlights in particular the current snapshot of family violence in Victoria, and summarises key changes visible in the database in the years since 2009-10. This section of the report updates findings since the last report was produced (Volume 5) for the following data sources:

- The Law Enforcement Assistance Program (Victoria Police)
- Lizard (Court Services Victoria)
- Courtlink (Court Services Victoria)
- Victorian Emergency Management Dataset (Department of Health and Human Services)
- Victorian Legal Aid datasets
- Victims Assistance Program and Victims of Crime helpline (Department of Justice and Regulation)
- Integrated Reporting Information System
- Supported Accommodation Assistance Program/Specialist Housing Services Collection (Department of Health and Human Services and the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare)

The findings include information on the number of clients of these agencies, their characteristics, services provided to clients, and trends in the data over the time. These sections of the report summarise and complement the 'Family Violence Data Tables' produced in conjunction with this report.

Chapter 14 explores recidivism within a cohort of alleged family violence perpetrators (other parties to family incidents) using their reappearance in Victoria Police's recorded crime data to explore the factors contributing to reappearance and patterns of recidivism. This further analysis demonstrates the value of datasets which can allow the robust identification of individual people and show information about their involvement in family violence over time.

In Chapter 15 we describe some of the gaps that limit the utility of the Victorian Family Violence Database and outline opportunities to strengthen the database to support an improved evidence base for family violence policy and practice.

Chapter 16 summarises the findings from across this report.

3. Victorian Family Violence Database: 2009-10 to 2013-14

Data sources

This report includes data from 11 data sources, extracted from 6 different agencies. Each data source uses different counting units and methodology to collect and report on family violence. This section outlines each of the data sources contained within the report and table 1 provides an overview of the agency or department who provided the data, the scope and reference period of the dataset requested for the analysis, as well as the counting units used in the analysis of this report.

Victoria Police

The Victoria Police data included in this report was extracted from the Law Enforcement Assistance Program (LEAP) on 18 April 2015. LEAP is a live database, and the data included in the report is subject to change over time. The primary source of family violence data from Victoria Police is the information collected on the L17 Risk Assessment and Risk Management report. Victoria Police are required to complete the L17 report after they have attended a family incident. It includes information on the incident itself, the affected family member and other party, risk factors present at the time of the incident and any actions taken by Victoria Police following the incident. The quantity and accuracy of the data collected by Victoria Police on family violence is dependent upon the recording of information by police members at the time of the incident.

Magistrates' and Children's Courts

The Magistrates' and Children's Courts data included in this report was extracted from the Courtlink database. The data includes all finalised applications for Family Violence Intervention Orders in which the final hearing took place between 1 July 2009 and 30 June 2014. This includes original applications as well as applications for variation, extension and revocation.

The analysis of the courts data looks at the number of applications heard in the Magistrates' and Children's Courts, the affected family members on the application and the person responding to the order. On each application there is one associated respondent, however, there can be multiple affected family members.

For the purposes of analysing the demographic characteristics of affected family members and respondents, the report focuses on those on original applications for family violence intervention orders. This ensures that affected family members and respondents are not double counted if subsequent applications for variation, extension or revocation were made.

Specialist Family Violence Court Services

The data included in this report on applicants and respondents who accessed a support worker at a Specialist Family Violence Service is extracted from the Lizard database. During the reference period, support workers operated at Melbourne, Frankston, Ballarat, Werribee, Sunshine, Heidelberg and Moorabbin Magistrates' Courts.

The Lizard database allows for the collection of demographic information on the applicants and respondents seeking assistance from a support worker, some location based information and data on children associated with the clients. Data contained within Lizard is collected by the support worker at the time of the session with a client.

Department of Health and Human Services – Integrated Reports and Information System (IRIS)

The Integrated Reports and Information System is a data collection system used by service organisations that are funded by the Department of Health and Human Services. For the purposes of this report, the data extracted from IRIS relates to women and children accessing family violence services and men accessing behaviour change programs.

The data extracted from IRIS includes information on the cases presented to agencies, demographic information of clients and issues that they present with.

Department of Health and Human Services – Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset (VEMD)

The Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset (VEMD) contains information detailing presentations at Victorian public hospitals with designated Emergency Departments. For the purposes of this report, patients presenting for family violence reasons are identified by the 'human intent' data item.

At the Emergency Department, the clinician assesses the most likely human intent in the occurrence of the injury or poisoning (Department of Health and Human Services, 2015). Patients presenting for family violence reasons are those that presented with a human intent injury of either 'Child neglect, maltreatment by parent, guardian' or 'Maltreatment, assault by domestic partner'.

The VEMD information in this report focuses on the demographic characteristics of the patients as well as the nature and cause of their injuries.

Victims Assistance Program (VAP)

The Victims Assistance Program (VAP), which operates under the Victims Support Agency in the Department of Justice & Regulation, is a network of agencies across Victoria providing services to victims of crime.

Data collected from the VAP includes demographic information of the victim, location data, information on the crime type and how the client was referred to the agency.

In the years prior to 2012-13, family violence related victims were identified by generic family violence crime types. In the 2012-13 financial year, a family violence indicator was introduced which allowed specific crime types to be recorded and then flagged if it was family violence related.

Victims of Crime (VoC) helpline

The Victims of Crime (VoC) helpline is an anonymous telephone support line, which operates under the Victims Support Agency in the Department of Justice & Regulation. The helpline assists victims by providing information and advice about reporting a crime and provides referrals to other services that can assist victims. The data provided from the VoC helpline for this report covers the period from 2010-11 to 2013-14.

Data collected by the VoC helpline is limited as it is an anonymous service. This means that not every client provides demographic information, however, there is some data collected on the age, sex, disability and language spoken by the client.

In the 2012-13 financial year, a family violence indicator was introduced to identify any victims of crime that were family violence related.

21 An overview of family violence in Victoria

Victoria Legal Aid (VLA)

Victoria Legal Aid (VLA) operates across the state and aims to assist Victorians by providing free legal information, services and education. The VLA data analysed in this report includes services provided to individuals where the primary matter was recorded as family violence related. These services include; legal advice, legal help, in-house duty lawyer services, minor work and substantive grants.

It is important to note that within the data collected by VLA, we are unable to determine whether the client was an applicant/victim or respondent/perpetrator. Therefore, the information contained in this report only represents the services provided by VLA but not the type of client.

It should also be noted that in the Victorian Family Violence Database: Volume 5, Substantive grants were referred to as Casework, while Legal help was previously called Telephone support.

Specialist Homelessness Services Collection (SHSC)

The Specialist Homelessness Services Collection (SHSC) began on 1 July 2011, replacing the Supported Accommodation Assistance Program (SAAP). The SHSC is operated by the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare and is designed to collect data from SHSC agencies providing homelessness services across Australia.

The data provided by AIHW for the purposes of this report covers information on the support periods provided by the agencies and the clients accessing these services. Information was also provided on the clients' reasons for seeking assistance and this is used to identify clients seeking homelessness services for family violence reasons.

Supported Accommodation Assistance Program (SAAP)

The Supported Accommodation Assistance Program (SAAP) was replaced by the SHSC on 1 July 2011. Data in this report for the SAAP covers the period from July 2009 to June 2011 and looks at basic demographic information about the clients accessing homelessness services as well as their main reason for seeking these services.

Table 2. Overview of data sources

Agency/Department	Scope of dataset provided by agency/department	Reference period	Counting units
Victoria Police	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Data collected on L17 Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report - Offences recorded in Law Enforcement Assistance Program (LEAP) - Finalised applications for family violence intervention order extracted from Courtlink 	2009-10 to 2013-14	Family incident Affected family member Other party
Magistrates' and Children's Court	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Applicants and respondents accessing family violence support worker at a Specialist Family Violence Court extracted from Lizard 	2009-10 to 2013-14	Application Affected family member Respondent
Specialist Family Violence Courts	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Men accessing behaviour change programs - Women and children accessing family violence services 	2009-10 to 2013-14	Session Applicant Respondent
Department of Health and Human Services – Integrated Reports and Information System (IRIS)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Patients presenting at Victorian public hospitals with designated Emergency Departments with human intent injury classified as either 'Child neglect, maltreatment by parent, guardian' or 'Maltreatment, assault by domestic partner' 	2009-10 to 2013-14	Client
Department of Health and Human Services – Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset (VEMD)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Victims of crime accessing the Victims Assistance Program - Victims of crime accessing the Victims of Crime helpline - Duty lawyer services, Legal advice services, Legal help services, Minor work, Substantive grants where the primary matter was family violence related 	2009-10 to 2013-14	Patient
Victims Assistance Program (VAP)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Support periods provided to people seeking assistance from homelessness agencies for family violence reasons 	2009-10 to 2013-14	Victim
Victims of Crime (VoC) helpline	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Support periods provided to people seeking assistance from homelessness agencies for family violence reasons 	2010-11 to 2013-14	Victim
Victoria Legal Aid	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Support periods provided to people seeking assistance from homelessness agencies for family violence reasons 	2009-10 to 2013-14	Client
Specialist Homelessness Services Collection (SHSC)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Support periods provided to people seeking assistance from homelessness agencies for family violence reasons 	2011-12 to 2013-14	Support periods provided by agency
Supported Accommodation Assistance Program (SAAP)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Support periods provided to people seeking assistance from homelessness agencies for family violence reasons 	2009-10 to 2010-11	Support periods provided by agency

23 An overview of family violence in Victoria

4. Victoria Police

Family incidents recorded

In the five years from July 2009 the number of family incidents recorded by Victoria Police has increased by 82.7%, from 35,666 incidents in 2009-10 to 65,154 in 2013-14.

In the same five years, the family incident rate per 100,000 people increased by 70.8% to 1,115.3 incidents per 100,000 people in 2013-14.

Figure 1. Number of recorded family incidents – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

Table 3. Family incidents recorded and family incident rate per 100,000 population – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14	% change 2013-2014
Number of family incidents	35,666	40,733	49,927	60,408	65,154	7.9%
Family incident rate per 100,000	653.1	735.5	886.4	1,052.5	1,115.3	6.0%

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Family incidents across Victoria

The increase in recorded family incidents over the five years from 2009-10 to 2013-14 was distributed across Victoria. The number of incidents in the Eastern and Western regions doubled in the five years to 2013-14, while the number of incidents in the North West Metro and Southern Metro regions increased by 80% and 62% respectively.

Table 4. Family incidents by police region – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14	% change 2012-13 to 2013-14
North West Metro region	11,426	12,921	15,377	18,672	20,619	10.4%
Eastern region	8,525	9,842	12,571	14,968	16,468	10.0%
Southern Metro region	9,379	10,468	12,453	14,797	15,195	2.7%
Western region	6,335	7,500	9,511	11,963	12,855	7.5%

Figure 2. Family incident rate per 100,000 population by Local Government Area – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014

When the variation in population levels across the state are taken into account, the Local Government Areas with the highest incident rate per 100,000 were La Trobe (2,769.7 per 100,000), Swan Hill (2,463.6 per 100,000), Mildura (2,458.7 per 100,000), Horsham (2,285.3 per 100,000) and East Gippsland (2,280.0 per 100,000).

The data used in this section can be found in tables 2 and 3 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Demographics of affected family members and other parties

An 'affected family member' (AFM) is the individual who is deemed to be affected by events occurring during the family incident. Where an affected family member has been in an incident with more than one other party, they will be counted for each involvement.

The other individual involved in a family incident is referred to as the 'other party'. The other party could be a current partner, former partner or a family member. Where the other party is involved with multiple affected family members in an incident, they will be counted for each involvement.

Age and sex of affected family members

In 2013-14, three quarters (75%, n=49,082) of the 65,157 affected family members were female. In the five years from July 2009 the proportion of male and female AFMs has remained relatively stable, with on average 76% female and 24% male affected family members.

Figure 3. Affected family members by sex – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

In 2013-14 there were 49,082 female affected family members. Approximately 65% (n=31,715) of those were aged between 20 and 44 years at the time of the incident. The largest age group of female affected family members was 25 – 29 years (n=6,583).

In the same year there were 15,828 male affected family members, of which 51% (n=8,025) were between 20 and 44 years of age. The largest age group of male affected family members was 40 – 44 years (n=1,776).

Approximately 1 in 10 of all affected family members recorded in 2013-14 were 17 years or younger (9%, n=5,781). Of these AFMs, 62% were female and 38% male.

Figure 4. Sex and age of affected family members – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 4 and 5 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Age and sex of other parties

In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014, the proportion of male and female other parties has remained stable, with an approximate split of 22% female and 78% male other parties.

The proportion of male and female other parties changes depending on the age group of the associated affected family member. For example, where the affected family member is 17 years or younger, the proportion of female other parties increased to approximately a third (32%, n=1,850) of all relevant other parties.

The gender split of other parties, where the affected family members were aged 18 years and older, is in line with that of the total population of other parties.

Table 5. Sex of other party by age group of associated affected family member, July 2009 to June 2014

		2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
Sex of other party where affected family member is 17 years or younger	Male	65.3%	66.9%	67.0%	66.7%	66.6%
	Female	34.1%	32.3%	32.0%	32.0%	32.0%
Sex of other party where affected family member is 18 years or older	Male	79.6%	78.8%	78.7%	77.9%	78.1%
	Female	20.0%	20.7%	20.8%	21.6%	21.4%
Sex of all other parties	Male	78.5%	77.8%	77.6%	76.9%	77.0%
	Female	21.1%	21.6%	21.9%	22.5%	22.4%

In 2013-14, there were 50,165 male other parties recorded, of which a third were between the age of 20 and 29 years at the time of the incident.

In 2009-10 and 2010-11 the largest age group of male other parties was 35 – 39 years, however, between 2011-12 and 2013-14, the largest age group was 30 – 34 years. Similarly, between 2009-10 and 2011-12 the largest age group of female other parties was 35 – 39 years, but in more recent years has been 30 – 34 years, indicating a slight shift in the age of other parties.

Figure 5. Sex and age of other parties – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in tables 6 and 7 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Relationship between affected family members and other parties

The proportion of relationship types between an affected family member and other party differs depending on the gender of the affected family member.

Of the 15,829 male affected family members in 2013-14, just over half (52%, n=8,216) were a family member of the other party. This means they were either a child, parent or other family member to the other party. One third (33%, n=5,185) of the male affected family members were a current partner of the other party, while the remainder (15%, n=2,360) were a former partner of the other party.

Figure 6. Relationship of affected family member to other party where AFM is male – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

The proportion of relationships is quite different where the affected family member is female, with 45% (n=22,233) of females recorded as a current partner of the other party at the time of the incident, 31% (n=15,175) a family member and 23% (n=11,533) a former partner of the other party.

Figure 7. Relationship of affected family member to other party where AFM is female – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 12 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Parent-Child relationships in family incidents

This section of the report highlights the affected family members and other parties involved in parent-child relationships at the time of the family incident. The following focuses on incidents where young children were the affected family member of their parent, as well as where young children were the other party towards their parent and where older parents were the victim in a family incident.

Children affected family members to parent other parties

In 2013-14, there were 3,341 affected family members 17 years and under who were the child of the other party. Of the 3,341 children, 44% (n=1,481) were male while 56% (n=1,860) were female.

In 63% (n=927) of incidents where the affected family member was a male child, the other party was a male parent and in the other 37% (n=554) of incidents, the parent was female. The largest age groups of male child affected family members were 12 – 14 years and 15 – 17 years.

In 55% (n=1,019) of incidents where the affected family member was a female child, the other party was a male parent and in the other 45% (n=841) the parent was female. As with male children, the largest age groups of female affected family members were 12 – 14 years and 15 – 17 years, making up 66% (n=670) of incidents where the parent was male and 68% (n=574) of incidents where the parent was female.

Table 6. Children affected family members aged 17 years and under where the other party is a parent – Victoria Police, July 2013 to June 2014

		Male parent other party	Female parent other party
Male child affected family member	0 – 4 years	92	71
	5 - 8 years	200	110
	9 - 11 years	165	101
	12 - 14 years	241	150
	15 - 17 years	229	122
	Total male child AFMs	927	554
Female child affected family member	0 – 4 years	100	68
	5 - 8 years	129	93
	9 - 11 years	120	106
	12 - 14 years	331	277
	15 - 17 years	339	297
	Total female child AFMs	1,019	841

The data used in this section can be found in table 13 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Adult parent affected family members to youth children other parties

In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014, there were a total of 11,861 incidents that involved an adult parent affected family member and a child other party who was under 17 years old. 64% (n=7,608) involved a male other party while 36% (n=4,253) involved a female other party.

Of the 9,542 incidents that involved a female affected family member, 54% (n=5,148) of those were aged 35 – 44 years at the time of the incident and 31% (n=2,991) were between 45 – 54 years. In 2013-14, there were 3,200 incidents that involved a male other party under 17 years and a female parent aged 35 – 44 years.

Of the 2,319 incidents that involved a male parent affected family member, 85% (n=1,964) were between 35 – 54 years old. In the five years from 2009-10 to 2013-14 there were also 150 incidents that involved a male parent over 65 years and a male other party aged 17 years and under.

Table 7. Parents as the affected family member where the other party is 17 years or younger, by gender of OTH and gender and age of AFM, July 2009 to June 2014 combined

		Male other party	Female other party
Male parent affected family members	18 - 24 years	≤ 3	≤ 3
	25 - 34 years	55	21
	35 - 44 years	629	252
	45 - 54 years	799	284
	55 - 64 years	150	68
	65 +	43	14
	Total male AFMs	1,678	641
Female parent affected family members	18 - 24 years	13	≤ 3
	25 - 34 years	645	409
	35 - 44 years	3,200	1,948
	45 - 54 years	1,872	1,119
	55 - 64 years	183	121
	65 +	17	13
	Total female AFMs	5,930	3,612

Note: In order to maintain confidentiality, person-based counts with a value less than 3 are displayed as ≤ 3 and are given a value of 2 to calculate totals

The data used in this section can be found in table 14 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Adult children as the other party to adult parent affected family members

In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014, there were 21,716 recorded incidents that involved an adult parent affected family member and an adult child other party. 31% (n=6,625) involved a male affected family member and 69% (n=15,091) involved a female affected family member.

The largest group of affected family members was females aged 45 – 54 years where the other party was between 18 and 34 years. This group made up over a quarter of all incidents (27%, n= 5,922). Of those 5,922 incidents, 73% involved a male other party.

Table 8. Parents as affected family member where the other party is 18 years and older by gender and age of AFM and age of OTH – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014 combined

		Age of other party					Total
		18 - 34 years	35 - 44 years	45 - 54 years	55 - 64 years	65 years and older
Adult male affected family member	18 - 34	41	0	0	0	0	41
	35 - 44	567	6	0	0	0	573
	45 - 54	2,128	21	6	0	0	2,155
	55 - 64	1,905	339	8	4	0	2,256
	65 years and older	562	749	250	37	2	1,598
Adult female affected family member	18 - 34	101	0	0	0	0	101
	35 - 44	2,954	19	0	0	0	2,973
	45 - 54	5,922	77	9	0	0	6,008
	55 - 64	2,912	978	33	5	0	3,928
	65 years and older	330	994	623	123	11	2,070

The data used in this section can be found in table 15 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Domestic partner and spousal relationships in family incidents

Family incidents involving current partners

In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014, there were 101,606 incidents involving adult affected family members and other parties in a current partner relationship.

Of those incidents, 82% (n=83,555) involved a male other party and 18% (n=18,051) involved a female other party.

Parties of similar age contributing largest number of incidents

- Incidents involving a female affected family member aged 25 – 34 and a male other party aged 25 – 35 accounted for 16% (n=16,461) of all current partner incidents.
- Incidents involving a female affected family member aged 35 – 44 and a male other party aged 35 – 44 accounted for 13% (n=13,279) of all current partner incidents
- Incidents involving a female affected family member aged 18 – 24 and a male other party aged 18 – 24 accounted for 9% (n=9,495) of all current partner incidents

The data used in this section can be found in table 16 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Family incidents involving former partners

In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014, there were 41,012 incidents that involved adult affected family members and other parties in a former partner relationship. This includes those who were recorded as 'divorced', 'separated' or 'previously defacto'.

Incidents where the other party was a male between 25 – 34 years made up over a quarter (27%, n=11,037) of all incidents involving a former partner.

Over the five years, there were 6,895 incidents that involved a female affected family member aged 25 – 34 years and a male other party aged 25 – 34 years. There were also 6,782 incidents involving a female affected family member aged 35 – 44 years and a male other party in the same age group.

Table 9. Former partner relationships where both affected family member and other party are over 18 years by gender of AFM and age group of other party – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014 combined

	Age of other party
	18 - 24 years	25 - 34 years	35 - 44 years	45 - 54 years	55 - 64 years	65 years and older
Adult male affected family members	1,115	2,378	2,437	957	168	37
Adult female affected family members	3,998	11,040	12,224	5,250	1,094	314
Total former partner incidents	5,113	13,418	14,661	6,207	1,262	351

The data used in this section can be found in table 17 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Children present at family incidents

Table 10. Number of family incidents where a child/children were present – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
Incidents where child/children were present	12,688	14,448	18,127	18,861	22,376
Incidents where no children present/not recorded	22,978	26,285	31,800	41,547	42,778
Total family incidents	35,666	40,733	49,927	60,408	65,154

Victoria Police record the number of children present at the time of a family incident. In approximately a third (34%, n=22,376) of all incidents recorded in 2013-14, there was at least one child present. Over the past five years the proportion of incidents where children have been present has remained relatively constant.

Figure 8. Proportion of incidents where a child/children were present – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 21 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Fear level of affected family member at time of the incident

On the L17 Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report, the level of fear felt by the affected family member is collected at the time of the incident. In 2013-14, 99.8% of incidents had this data item collected.

Of the 65,157 incidents recorded in 2013-14, 60% (n=39,219) of affected family members were recorded as not fearful at the time of the incident while 34% (n=22,346) reported feeling fearful and 5% (3,433) felt very fearful.

In 2013-14 there were 49,081 incidents that involved a female affected family member. Of these affected family members, 39% (n=18,907) reported feeling fearful and 6% (n=3,115) felt very fearful. In the same year there were 15,827 incidents that involved a male affected family member, of which 21% (n=3,350) felt fearful and 2% (n=306) very fearful.

The data used in this section can be found in table 27 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Risk factors recorded on L17 Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report.

The following three tables outline the proportion of each risk factor that was identified and recorded on all L17 Risk Assessment and Risk Management Reports from July 2009 to June 2014.

The first table looks at risk factors that relate to the affected family member, the second looks at risk factors that relate to the other party and the third shows other factors present in the relationship between the parties.

Table 11. Proportion of incidents where each risk factor relating to the affected family member was recorded at the time of the incident – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

		2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
AFM Pregnancy/Birth	Not recorded	94%	94%	94%	97%	100%
	Recorded	6%	6%	6%	3%	0%
AFM Mental Health	Not recorded	91%	90%	90%	89%	85%
	Recorded	9%	10%	10%	11%	15%
AFM Suicidal	Not recorded	99%	99%	99%	99%	99%
	Recorded	1%	1%	1%	1%	1%
AFM Isolation	Not recorded	98%	97%	97%	96%	94%
	Recorded	2%	3%	3%	4%	6%
AFM Alcohol Possible	Not recorded	87%	86%	85%	87%	89%
	Recorded	13%	14%	15%	13%	11%
AFM Alcohol Definite	Not recorded	83%	85%	87%	89%	89%
	Recorded	17%	15%	13%	11%	11%
AFM Drugs Possible	Not recorded	90%	89%	88%	89%	88%
	Recorded	10%	11%	12%	11%	12%
AFM Drugs Definite	Not recorded	98%	98%	98%	97%	97%
	Recorded	2%	2%	2%	3%	3%
AFM Other Substance	Not recorded	100%	100%	100%	99%	99%
	Recorded	0%	0%	0%	1%	1%

The risk factors relating to the affected family member that are most often recorded appear to be drug and alcohol related with 11% of all incidents possibly involving alcohol and another 11% definitely involving alcohol in 2013-14.

In the same year, in 12% of incidents, Victoria Police identified that it was possible drugs were a factor at the time of the incident.

It should be noted that the AFM risk factor for pregnancy/birth was replaced by a relationship pregnancy for pregnancy/new birth in June 2012.

Table 12. Proportion of incidents where each risk factor relating to the other party was recorded at the time of the incident – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

		2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
OTH Harm Threat	Not recorded	83%	82%	82%	82%	82%
	Recorded	17%	18%	18%	18%	18%
OTH Choke	Not recorded	97%	97%	96%	97%	97%
	Recorded	3%	3%	4%	3%	3%
OTH Threat/Kill	Not recorded	95%	95%	94%	95%	96%
	Recorded	5%	5%	6%	5%	4%
OTH Harm/Threat Child	Not recorded	99%	99%	98%	99%	99%
	Recorded	1%	1%	2%	1%	1%
OTH Harm/Threat Family	Not recorded	98%	98%	98%	98%	97%
	Recorded	2%	2%	2%	2%	3%
OTH Harm/Threat Pets	Not recorded	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%
	Recorded	0%	0%	0%	0%	0%
OTH Suicidal	Not recorded	97%	97%	96%	97%	96%
	Recorded	3%	3%	4%	3%	4%
OTH Stalking	Not recorded	98%	98%	98%	98%	98%
	Recorded	2%	2%	2%	2%	2%
OTH Sexual Assault	Not recorded	99%	99%	98%	98%	98%
	Recorded	1%	1%	2%	2%	2%
OTH Controlling	Not recorded	84%	84%	84%	84%	81%
	Recorded	16%	16%	16%	16%	19%
OTH Unemployed	Not recorded	90%	90%	89%	88%	87%
	Recorded	10%	10%	11%	12%	13%
OTH Mental Health	Not recorded	86%	85%	85%	84%	80%
	Recorded	14%	15%	15%	16%	20%
OTH History Violence	Not recorded	92%	91%	91%	96%	100%
	Recorded	8%	9%	9%	4%	0%
OTH Alcohol Possible	Not recorded	85%	84%	82%	83%	84%
	Recorded	15%	16%	18%	17%	16%
OTH Alcohol Definite	Not recorded	74%	75%	78%	80%	81%
	Recorded	26%	25%	22%	20%	19%
OTH Drugs Possible	Not recorded	84%	83%	80%	81%	79%
	Recorded	16%	17%	20%	19%	21%
OTH Drugs Definite	Not recorded	95%	95%	94%	93%	91%
	Recorded	5%	5%	6%	7%	9%
OTH Other Substance	Not recorded	99%	99%	99%	99%	98%
	Recorded	1%	1%	1%	1%	2%
OTH Suicide Attempted	Not recorded	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%
	Recorded	0%	0%	0%	0%	0%

The proportion of incidents where each of the other party risk factors were identified has remained relatively stable over the five years from July 2009. As with those relating to the affected family member, the proportion of incidents with risk factors associated with drug and alcohol use have increased in the five years.

In 2013-14, Victoria Police identified that in 16% of incidents it was possible that alcohol was an issue for the other party, while in 19% it was identified that alcohol was definitely present at the time of the incident.

Table 13. Proportion of incidents where other risk factors were recorded at the time of the incident – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

		2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Recent separation	Not recorded	74%	74%	74%	79%	84%
	Recorded	26%	26%	26%	21%	16%
Escalation – increase in severity and/or frequency	Not recorded	93%	92%	91%	89%	86%
	Recorded	7%	8%	9%	11%	14%
Presence of a disability	Not recorded	98%	97%	97%	98%	97%
	Recorded	2%	3%	3%	2%	3%
Financial difficulties	Not recorded	90%	90%	91%	90%	89%
	Recorded	10%	10%	9%	10%	11%
Pregnancy/New birth	Not recorded	100%	100%	100%	97%	94%
	Recorded	0%	0%	0%	3%	6%

In the five years from July 2009 the proportion of incidents where recent separation was identified as a risk factor has decreased from 26% to 15% of all incidents, while the proportion of incidents where financial difficulties were identified as an issue has remained stable over the five years at on average 10% of all incidents.

It should be noted that pregnancy/new birth was introduced as a relationship risk factor in June 2012, replacing the pregnancy/birth factor associated with the affected family member.

The data used in this section can be found in table 23 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Actions taken by Victoria Police

On the L17 Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report, Victoria Police indicate all actions that are taken to protect the affected family member and any children from risks and criminal behaviour at the time of the incident. The four types of action that can be taken are:

- Criminal action, including; charges pending (breach & other), charges pending (breach FVIO/FVSN), charges pending (other only), perpetrator bailed with conditions and perpetrator remanded in custody.
- Civil action, including; exclusion conditions used, FVSN issued, police applying via arrest & warrant, police applying via arrest & summons, police applying for FVIO, police applying for FVIO, AFM applying for FVIO, FVIO variation required
- Referral action, including; recommended high risk client, WDVCS (immediate assistance 24/7), formal referral AFM, formal referral perpetrator, informal referral AFM, informal referral perpetrator, child protection, child FIRST
- Other action, including; holding powers (direction), holding powers (detention), firearms seized, weapons seized, revoked f/a license pending

The following table outlines the actions recorded by Victoria Police in each incident over the five years from July 2009 to June 2014. The table shows where no action was taken, where one type of action was taken and where multiple types of action were taken.

Table 14. Incidents by type of action taken by police – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
No action taken	2,594	2,688	3,089	3,412	2,494
Civil only	1,279	1,032	835	574	146
Criminal only	610	777	865	1,560	1,008
Referral only	20,001	22,785	26,913	28,434	27,801
Other only	14	9	9	9	7
Civil and Criminal	410	371	385	453	154
Civil and Criminal and Referral	2,686	3,343	5,016	8,222	11,457
Civil and Criminal and Other	37	34	40	48	17
Civil and Other	125	80	75	59	7
Civil and Referral and Other	744	936	1,159	1,540	1,742
Civil and Referral	4,574	4,957	5,690	5,719	5,822
Criminal and Other	9	6	8	20	5
Criminal and Referral and Other	41	66	94	233	307
Criminal and Referral	2,021	2,885	4,584	7,671	10,746
Referral and Other	71	93	113	149	145
Civil and Criminal and Referral and Other	450	671	1,052	2,305	3,296
Total family incidents	35,666	40,733	49,927	60,408	65,154

The data used in this section can be found in table 32 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Family Violence Intervention Orders and Family Violence Safety Notices sought by police

In 17% (n=11,091) of the 65,154 family incidents recorded in 2013-14, Victoria Police indicated that a Family Violence Intervention Order would be sought. Victoria Police record this on the L17 Family Violence Risk Assessment Report as an indicator that they intend to seek a FVIO. This doesn't represent where an intervention order was actually applied for or where an order was applied for by the affected family member.

Table 15. Number of family incidents where FVIO or FVSN sought – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
Incidents where Family Violence Intervention Orders sought by Victoria Police (FVIO)	5,841	6,699	8,667	10,433	11,091
Incidents where Family Violence Safety Notice issued by Victoria Police (FVSN)	3,378	3,793	4,610	6,163	8,288

The data used in this section can be found in table 19 of the Victoria Police data tables.

Referrals made by police

The following table outlines all referrals made by Victoria Police at a family incident, by the type of referral. Multiple referrals can be made at the one family incident for all parties involved. The most common referrals made in the 2013-14 financial year were a formal referral for the AFM, followed by a formal referral for the perpetrator.

Table 16. Total referrals made following a family incident – Victoria Police, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
Formal referral for AFM	11,445	16,356	23,980	35,528	51,628
Formal referral for perpetrator	6,297	11,499	18,897	29,453	43,578
Notify child protection	4,811	5,967	8,382	9,985	11,042
Informal referral for perpetrator	11,837	14,258	16,327	15,300	9,031
Informal referral for AFM	18,965	19,350	20,737	17,399	7,407
Recommended high risk client	0	0	0	1,190	3,311
Child first	0	0	0	618	1,901
Women's Domestic Violence Crisis Service	467	584	734	805	945

The data used in this section can be found in table 31 of the Victoria Police data tables.

5. Magistrates' Court

Applications for Family Violence Intervention Orders

From July 2009 to June 2014, the number of finalised applications for a family violence intervention order in the Magistrates' Court increased by 34.5%, from 26,124 in 2009-10 to 35,147 in 2013-14. The number of applications has been steadily increasing over the five years.

Figure 9. Finalised applications for family violence intervention orders – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Magistrates' Court data tables.

Types of applications

Of the 35,147 applications finalised in 2013-14, 85% (n=29,987) of these were for original matters and 9% (n=3,048) were applications for variation. Overall, the number of original applications increased by 30.2% in the five years from July 2009, however, the proportion of original matters has slightly decreased and has been replaced by a small increase in applications for variation.

Figure 10. Proportion of finalised applications by type of application – Magistrates’ Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Magistrates’ Court data tables.

Mode of issue

In 2013-14, 53% (n=18,704) of finalised applications were issued by a Complaint and Summons, while 29% (n=10,309) were issued by a Family Violence Safety Notice (FVSN) and 17% (n=6,134) from a Warrant. Since 2009-10, there has been an increase in the proportion of finalised applications that were issued by a FVSN and a decrease in the proportion that were issued by a Complaint and Summons and Warrant.

Table 17. Proportion of finalised applications by mode of issue – Magistrates’ Court, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Complaint and Summons	57%	55%	52%	51%	53%
Family Violence Safety Notice	21%	22%	23%	26%	29%
Warrant	22%	23%	25%	23%	17%

The data used in this section can be found in table 2 of the Magistrates’ Court data tables.

Application complainant

In 2013-14, 66% (n=23,216) of all finalised applications were initiated by police, while 33% (n=11,690) were initiated by the affected family member. In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of applications initiated by the police has increased from 52% (n=13,670) to 66% (n=23,216). There was a corresponding decrease in the proportion that were initiated by the affected family member.

Figure 11. Proportion of finalised applications by complainant – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 3 of the Magistrates' Court data tables.

Outcome of applications

In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of family violence intervention order applications resulting in an IVO increased from 65% (n=16,899) in 2009-10 to 71% (n=24,947) in 2013-14. This was accompanied by a decrease in the proportion of applications that were struck out, which dropped from 18% (n=4,764) of all applications in 2009-10 to 12% (n=4,111) in 2013-14.

Figure 12. Proportion of finalised applications by outcome of application – Magistrates’ Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The proportion of outcomes of FVIO applications differs slightly depending on the gender of the respondent on the application.

Of the 27,989 applications finalised in 2013-14 where the respondent was male, 75% (n=20,981) resulted in the intervention order being made while 10% (n=2,926) were struck out and another 10% (n=2,683) were withdrawn. Where the respondent was female (n=7,159), only 56% (n=3,966) of applications resulted in an intervention order while 17% (n=1,185) were struck out and another 17% (n=1,202) were withdrawn.

The data used in this section can be found in tables 4 and 5 of the Magistrates’ Court data tables.

Demographic characteristics of affected family members and respondents

For the purposes of analysing the demographic characteristics of affected family members and respondents, this part of the report focuses on those parties to original applications for family violence intervention orders. This ensures that affected family members and respondents are not double counted if they made subsequent applications for variation, extension or revocation

Gender and age of affected family members

In the 2009-10 financial year, there were 42,333 affected family members on original applications. In the five years since then the number of affected family members increased by 24.7% to 52,777 in 2013-14. This is a lower rate than the increase in original applications which rose by 30.2% in the same five years.

In 2013-14, 36% (n=18,826) of affected family members were male while 64% (n=33,951) were female. In the five years from 2009-10 the proportion of male and female affected family members has remained stable.

For both male and female affected family members the largest age groups were 0 – 4 years and 5 – 9 years, together making up 29% (n=15,200) of all affected family members. There can be multiple children on the same application and this results in a large number of child affected family members.

Females between 20 and 44 years made up 46% (n=15,644) of female affected family members. The same ages accounted for 23% (n=4,258) of male affected family members.

In 2013-14 there were 1,314 affected family members aged 65 years or older on original family violence intervention order applications.

Figure 13. Affected family members by gender and age – Magistrates' Court, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 8 of the Magistrates' Court data tables.

Gender and age of respondents

Each application for an intervention order is made against one respondent. This means there is a one-to-one ratio between the number of applications and the number of respondents.

In 2013-14 there were 29,987 respondents on an original application, an increase of 30.2% from 2009-10. Of the total respondents, 78% (n=23,388) of them were male and 22% (n=6,599) were female. The proportion of male and female respondents has remained stable over the five years from 2009-10.

Of the 23,388 male respondents in 2013-14, 73% (n=17,138) were between 20 and 44 years of age, with the largest age group being those between 30 – 34 years.

Of the 6,599 female affected family members, 70% (n=4,625) were between 20 and 44 years of age. In the four years from 2009-10 to 2012-13, the largest age group of female affected family members was 35 – 39 years. In 2013-14, the largest age group was 30 – 34 years.

Figure 14. Respondents on original applications by gender and age – Magistrates' Court, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 6 of the Magistrates' Court data tables.

Relationship between affected family members and respondents

The relationship between an affected family member and the related respondent is taken from the primary affected family member on an application. This means that where there are multiple affected family members on an application, the primary affected family member's relationship with the respondent will be represented.

The proportion of relationship types between a primary affected family member and respondent differs considerably depending on the gender of the affected family member.

In 2013-14, 73% (n=16,465) of female affected family members were a current/former domestic partner of the respondent or were in a current/former intimate personal relationship with the respondent, while 10% (n=2,155) were a parent of the respondent.

Figure 15. Relationship between the primary AFM and Respondent where the AFM is female – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014

This is in contrast to applications where the primary affected family member was male. In 2013-14, 52% (n=3,819) of male affected family members were a current/former domestic partner of the respondent or were in a current/former intimate personal relationship with the respondent. In 14% (n=1,051) of applications, the affected family member was a parent/step-parent and in 10% (n =769) they were a sibling of the respondent.

Figure 16. Relationship between the primary AFM and Respondent where the AFM is male – Magistrates’ Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 9 of the Magistrates’ Court data tables.

Children as affected family members

In the five years from July 2009, the number of affected family members aged 17 years and younger increased by 20.6% from 19,353 in 2009-10 to 23,332 in 2013-14. Of these 23,332 young affected family members, 50% (n=11,574) were male and 50% (n=11,758) were female.

Figure 17. Children as affected family members on original applications by age group – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The largest age group of young affected family members was 5 – 12 years, making up 35% (n=10,417) of young affected family members, followed by 0 – 4 years (35%, n=8,170), 13 - 15 years (13%, n=3,074) and 16 – 17 years (7%, n=1,671).

On applications where the affected family member was under 17 years, the related respondent was most likely between 30 – 44 years of age. In 2013-14, of the 23,332 young affected family members, 56% (n=13,047) of their related respondents were between 30 – 44 years. Of these respondents, 84% (n=10,941) were male and 16% (n=2,106) were female.

The data used in this section can be found in table 15 of the Magistrates' Court data tables.

Affected family members across Victoria

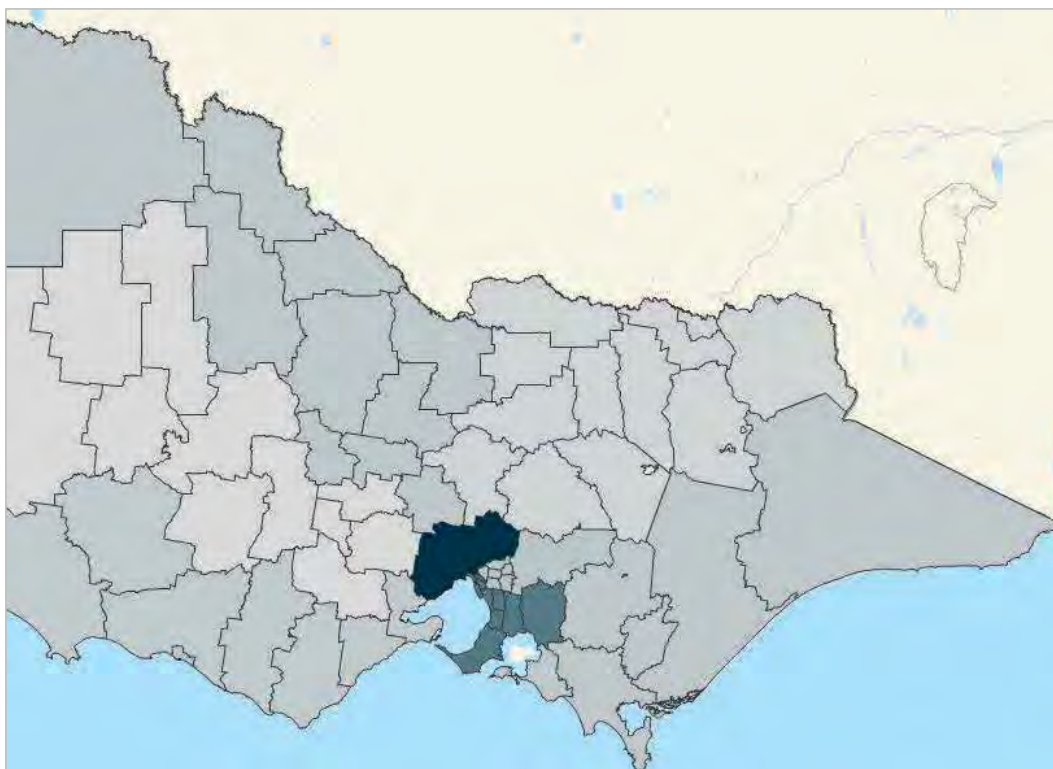

The residential postcode of the affected family member is used to determine the region in which they live.

Table 18. Affected family members by region of residence – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Barwon South Western Region	3,284	3,157	3,807	3,893	4,093
Eastern Metropolitan Region	3,948	4,331	4,558	4,648	4,588
Gippsland Region	3,342	3,590	4,358	4,214	4,350
Grampians Region	2,283	2,403	2,788	2,694	2,989
Hume Region	2,555	2,829	2,774	3,402	3,357
Loddon Mallee Region	3,678	3,707	4,442	4,450	4,336
North & West Metropolitan Region	13,794	15,113	15,822	16,616	17,097
Southern Metropolitan Region	9,006	9,853	10,949	11,440	11,194

In the five years from July 2009 to June 2014, the numbers of affected family members who lived in the Gippsland, Grampians and Hume regions have increased the most, rising by 30.8% on average since 2009-10. Across the five years, the regions with the highest proportion of affected family members were the North & West Metropolitan and Southern Metropolitan regions, on average making up 32% and 22% respectively.

Figure 18. Affected family members by region of residence – Magistrates' Court, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 17 of the Magistrates' Court data tables.

Interpreter requirements

For the purposes of this analysis, the interpreter requirements of the primary affected family member on an original application have been used as a culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) indicator. In the five years from 2009-10 to 2013-14, on average 1.8% of all affected family members required an interpreter while 1.6% of all respondents required one. The languages required most frequently by respondents across the five years were Vietnamese, Mandarin and Arabic, including Lebanese. Of the 2,124 respondents requiring an interpreter, these languages made up 19% (n=83), 11% (n=56) and 10% (n=42) respectively. Of the 4,229 applicants who required an interpreter, the top languages required were Vietnamese (17%, n=736), Arabic, including Lebanese (10%, n=433) and Mandarin (8%, n=339).

The data used in this section can be found in table 18 and 19 of the Magistrates' Court data tables.

Applications heard in the Family Violence Court Division

The Family Violence Court Division of the Magistrates' Court of Victoria specialises in hearing family violence cases and operates in Heidelberg and Ballarat Magistrates' Courts (Magistrates' Court of Victoria, 2012)

Since 2009-10, the number of applications that were heard in the Family Violence Court Division has increased by 30.6% from 2,738 to 3,575 in 2013-14. This is in line with the 30.2% increase in the total number of original family violence intervention order applications made in the Magistrates' Courts.

Table 19. Finalised original applications heard in the Family Violence Court Division, by final court location – Magistrates' Court, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Heidelberg Magistrates' Court	1,882	1,886	2,085	2,223	2,572
Ballarat Magistrates' Court	721	736	908	835	933
Other Courts	135	200	121	107	70
Total applications heard in the Family Violence Court Division	2,738	2,822	3,114	3,165	3,575

Note: All family violence intervention order applications heard at the Heidelberg and Ballarat Magistrates' Court are heard in the Family Violence Court Division. An application that has been heard at a Family Violence Court Division and then had the final hearing elsewhere is included in 'Other Courts'

The data used in this section can be found in table 21 of the Magistrates' Court data tables.

6.Children’s Court

Applications for Family Violence Intervention Orders

Applications for family violence intervention orders can be heard in the Children’s Court when either the affected family member or the respondent is under 18 years of age. An application for an intervention order can also be heard in the Children’s Court if both affected family member and respondent are adults but there is a related child protection proceeding (Children’s Court of Victoria, 2015)

From July 2009 to June 2014, the number of finalised applications for a family violence intervention order in the Children’s Court increased by 33.0%, from 1,407 in 2009-10 to 1,872 in 2013-14. The number of applications steadily increased from 2009-10 to 2012-13 before slightly dropping off in 2013-14.

Figure 19. Finalised applications for family violence intervention orders – Children’s Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Children’s Court data tables.

Types of applications

Of the 1,872 applications finalised in 2013-14, 92% (n=1,728) were for original matters while only 5% (n=85) were applications for variation. Since 2009-10 the proportion of applications that were original matters has declined, while the proportion of applications for variation has risen slightly.

Figure 20. Proportion of finalised applications by type of application – Children’s Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Children’s Court data tables.

Mode of issue

In 2013-14, 97% (n=1,822) of finalised applications were issued by a Complaint and Summons and only 3% (n=50) were issued by a Warrant.

Table 20. Proportion of finalised applications by mode of issue – Children’s Court, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Complaint and Summons	92%	94%	94%	96%	97%
Warrant	8%	6%	6%	4%	3%
Total FVIO applications	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%

The data used in this section can be found in table 2 of the Children’s Court data tables.

Application complainant

In 2013-14, 75% (n=1,395) of all finalised applications were initiated by police, while 15% (n=279) were initiated by the affected family member and 8% (n=152) by a parent. In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of applications initiated by police increased, from 55% (n=773) of applications in 2009-10 to 75% (n=1,395) in 2013-14. There was a corresponding decrease in the proportion of applications initiated by an affected family member or a parent.

Figure 21. Proportion of finalised applications by complainant – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014

Table 21. Number of family violence intervention order applications by complainant – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Affected family member	437	497	399	328	279
Police	773	997	1,149	1,365	1,395
Parent	152	151	178	157	152
Other	45	40	55	49	46
Total Family Violence Intervention Order applications	1,407	1,685	1,781	1,899	1,872

The data used in this section can be found in table 3 of the Children's Court data tables.

Outcome of applications

In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of family violence intervention order applications, that resulted in an intervention order, increased from 49% (n=694) in 2009-10 to 62% (n=1,167) in 2013-14. The proportion of applications that were struck out decreased from 25% (n=349) in 2009-10 to 17% (n=325) in 2013-14.

Figure 22. Proportion of finalised applications by outcome of application – Children’s Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The proportion of outcomes of FVIO applications differs slightly depending on the gender of the respondent on the application.

Of the 1,310 original applications finalised in 2013-14 where the respondent was male, 65% (n=852) resulted in an intervention order being made, while 16% (n=211) were struck out and 14% (n=182) were withdrawn.

Where the respondent was female (n=562), 56% (n=315) of applications resulted in an intervention order, while 20% (n=114) were struck out and 15% (n=87) were withdrawn.

The data used in this section can be found in tables 4 and 5 of the Children’s Court data tables.

Demographic characteristics of affected family members and respondents

For the purposes of analysing the demographic characteristics of affected family members and respondents, this part of the report focuses on those on original applications for family violence intervention orders. This ensures that affected family members and respondents are not double counted if they had subsequent applications for variation, extension or revocation.

Gender and age of affected family members

In 2009-10 there were 2,013 affected family members on finalised original applications. In the five years since then the number of affected family members has increased by 28.8% to 2,593 in 2013-14. This is a slightly lower increase than the rise in total applications, but like both the original and total number of applications, showed the same trends. The number of affected family members increased between 2009-10 and 2012-13 before dropping slightly in 2013-14.

The proportion of male and female affected family members has remained relatively stable across the five years with an average of 35% male and 65% female affected family members. In 2013-14, there were 910 male and 1,683 female affected family members.

Figure 23. Affected family members by gender and age – Children’s Court, July 2013 to June 2014

Of the 910 male affected family members, the largest age group was 10 – 14 (n=220), years followed by 15 – 19 (n=171) years. Only 7% (n=65) of male affected family members were between the ages of 20 and 39, while those aged 40 years and older made up 19% (n=171).

Of the 1,683 female affected family members, the largest age group was 15 – 19 years (n=387). Those aged between 5 and 19 years made up 48% (n=808) of all female affected family members, while only 7% (n=123) were aged between 20 and 34 years. In the same year there were 526 female affected family members between the age of 35 and 49 years, making up 31% of all female affected family members.

The data used in this section can be found in table 9 of the Children’s Court data tables.

Gender and age of respondents

Each application has one corresponding respondent which means there is a one-to-one ratio between the number of applications and the number of respondents.

In 2009-10 there were 1,330 respondents on original FVIO applications. In the five years to 2013-14, this increased by 29.9% to 1,728 respondents.

Over the five years the proportion of male and female respondents has remained stable and in 2013-14, 69% (n=1,199) were male and 31% (n=529) were female.

Figure 24. Respondents on finalised original FVIO applications by gender – Children’s Court, July 2009 to June 2014

Of the 1,199 male respondents on original applications in 2013-14, approximately two thirds (65%, n=780) were between 15 – 19 years old, while 13% (n=153) were 10 - 14 years old.

Similarly, the largest age groups of female respondents were 15 – 19 years and 10 – 14 years making up 57% (n=301) and 16% (n=83) respectively.

Figure 25. Gender and age of respondents – Children’s Court, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 7 of the Children’s Court data tables.

Affected family members under 17 years old

In the five years from July 2009, the number of affected family members aged 17 years or younger increased by 20.3%, from 1,222 in 2009-10 to 1,470 in 2013-14.

Of the 1,470 young affected family members in 2013-14, 70% (n=1,028) applied for an intervention order against a male respondent while 30% (n=442) applied for an intervention order against a female respondent. The largest age groups of respondents on applications of a young affected family member were 13 – 15 years and 16 – 17 years, making up 26% (n=828) of all applications by a young affected family member.

The data used in this section can be found in table 12 of the Children’s Court data tables.

Affected family members over 18 years old

In 2013-14 there were 1,123 applications with affected family members aged 18 years or older. 69% (n=778) of these applications had a male respondent, of which 298 were between 13 – 15 years old and 430 were 16 – 17 years old.

Of the 31% of applications where the respondent was female, 139 were aged 13 – 15 years and 182 were 16 – 17 years.

Figure 26. Age of respondents on applications where the affected family member was 18 years or older, Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 11 of the Children's Court data tables.

Relationship of affected family member to respondents

The relationship of the affected family member to the respondent is taken from the primary affected family member on an application. This means that where there are multiple affected family members on an application, the primary affected family member's relationship with the respondent will be represented.

The proportion of relationship types between a primary affected family member and respondent differs depending on the gender of the affected family member.

Figure 27. Relationship between primary AFM and respondent where the AFM is male – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014

In 2013-14, 36% (n=168) of male affected family members were the parent/step-parent of the respondent. In 27% (n=129) of applications they were the child/step-child of the respondent and 13% (n=63) they were a sibling.

Figure 28. Relationship between the primary AFM and respondent where the AFM is female, Children's Court – July 2009 to June 2014

Where the affected family member was female, the proportion of applications where they were the parent/step-parent to the respondent is much higher than for male affected family members. In 2013-14, 51% (n=638) of female affected family members were the parent/step-parent of the respondent, and 14% (n=172) were the child/step-child of the respondent.

In 13% (n=160) of applications the female affected family member was in a current/former intimate personal relationship with the respondent.

The data used in this section can be found in table 10 of the Children's Court data tables.

Parent/step-parent affected family members of a young respondent

In 2013-14, there were 774 affected family members who were a parent/step-parent to a respondent aged 17 years or younger. On 72% (n=555) of these applications the respondent was male, while 28% (n=219) were female.

Table 22. Affected family members who were a parent/step-parent to a respondent aged 17 years or younger, by gender of the respondent – Children's Court, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Male respondent	382	455	487	537	555
Female respondent	128	171	200	209	219
Total parent/step-parent affected family members	510	626	687	746	774

The data used in this section can be found in table 13 of the Children's Court data tables.

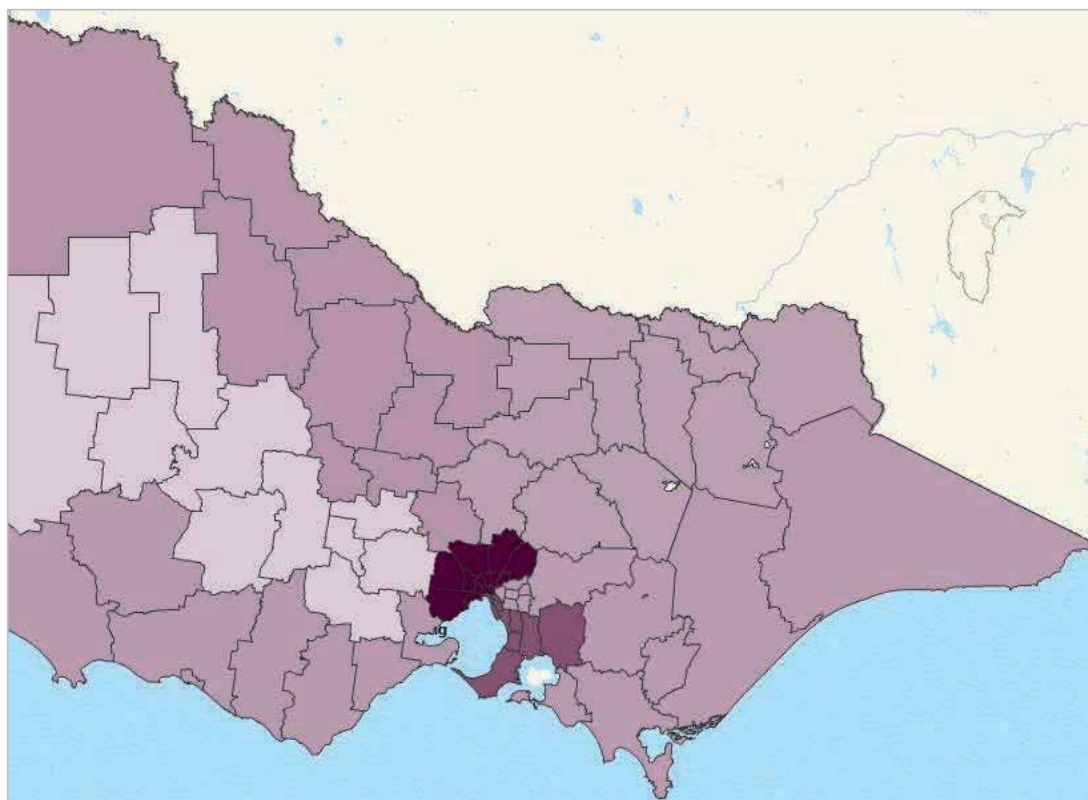

Affected family members across Victoria

Table 23. Affected family members by region – Children’s Court, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Barwon South Western Region	211	228	243	244	264
Eastern Metropolitan Region	198	203	203	224	254
Gippsland Region	171	180	224	249	260
Grampians Region	110	115	169	203	135
Hume Region	91	173	174	215	248
Loddon Mallee Region	212	229	249	262	276
North & West Metropolitan Region	598	750	795	755	644
Southern Metropolitan Region	415	481	472	488	470

In 2013-14, the regions with the highest proportion of affected family members were the North & West Metropolitan and Southern Metropolitan regions, making up 25% (n=644) and 18% (n=470) respectively.

Figure 29. Affected family members by region – Children’s Court, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 14 of the Children’s Court data tables.

7. Specialist Family Violence Courts Services

Applicants and respondents accessing a specialist court support worker

Both applicants and respondents are given the opportunity to access a specialist family violence court support worker. The following section focuses on clients who have accessed a specialist court support worker in the five years from July 2009 to June 2014.

It should be noted that although there are specific support workers for applicants and respondents, it is possible for an applicant to see a respondent support worker and vice versa.

Applicants accessing a support worker

Between 2009-10 and 2011-12 the number of applicants accessing a support worker almost doubled (increase of 98.1%), from 1,238 in 2009-10 to 2,453 in 2011-12. Since then, the number of applicants who saw a support worker dropped in 2012-13 to 2,188 and then increased again in 2013-14 to 2,337.

Table 24. Applicants accessing a specialist court support worker by court location – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Ballarat	198	349	480	413	461
Frankston	317	497	572	608	555
Heidelberg	6	390	358	281	350
Melbourne	322	553	693	572	605
Sunshine	308	367	298	244	259
Other courts	88	74	53	70	106
Total applicants	1,238	2,229	2,453	2,188	2,337

Note: Other courts includes Moorabbin and Werribee

Of those 2,337 applicants in 2013-14, 26% (n=605) accessed a support worker at the Melbourne Magistrates' Court, 24% (n=555) accessed a support worker at the Frankston Magistrates' Court and 20% (n=461) accessed a support worker at the Ballarat Magistrates' Court.

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

Respondents accessing a support worker

The number of respondents who accessed a specialist court support worker increased considerably between 2009-10 and 2011-12, from 47 respondents in 2009-10 to 708 in 2011-12. Prior to this period, the number of respondent support workers and the recording of clients who had seen them was quite low. This is reflected in the large increase in the years following. The number of respondents who accessed a support worker then dropped off in 2012-13, before increasing to 715 in 2013-14.

Table 25. Respondents accessing a specialist court support worker by court location – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Ballarat	40	220	324	296	342
Heidelberg	2	282	322	254	346
Melbourne	2	2	47	36	8
Other courts	4	10	15	9	19
Total respondents	47	516	708	594	715

Note: Other courts includes Moorabbin, Sunshine and Werribee

Of those 715 respondents, 48% (n=342) accessed a support worker at the Ballarat Magistrates' Court, while another 48% (n=346) accessed one at the Heidelberg Magistrates' Court.

The data used in this section can be found in table 2 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

Demographics of applicants and respondents accessing a support worker

Applicants accessing a support worker

In 2013-14, there were 2,337 applicants who accessed a support worker at a Specialist Family Violence Court. Of those applicants, 97% (n=2,257) were female and 3% (n=80) were male.

Of the female applicants who accessed a support worker, the largest age groups were between 25 and 44 years old, making up 62% (n=1,385) of all female applicants. In the same year there were 93 applicants under 19 years of age and 102 over 60 years of age.

Figure 30. Age of female applicants accessing a support worker – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2013 to June 2014

Of those applicants in 2013-14 who were male (n=80), the largest age group was 60 years and over (n=19), followed by 30 – 39 years (n=15) and 40 – 49 years (n=14).

The data used in this section can be found in table 3 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

Respondents accessing a support worker

In 2013-14, there were 714 respondents who accessed a support worker, of which 95% (n=677) were male and 5% (n=37) were female.

The largest age group of male respondents, who accessed a support worker in 2013-14, was 35 – 39 years, making up 17% (n=113) of total male respondents. This was followed by those aged 40 – 44 years (15%, n=99) and 30 – 34 years (15%, n=98). In the same year, there were 33 male respondents under 19 years of age.

Figure 31. Age of male respondents accessing a support worker – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 4 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

Source of referrals to support worker

The majority of applicants were referred to the specialist court support worker from the registrar/coordinator's counter. 54% (n=1,265) of all applicants were referred from the registrar/coordinator's counter.

13% (n=296) of applicants who saw a support worker were referred by police, 9% (n=204) were approached by a support worker, 7% (n=156) were referred from a magistrate and 5% (n=116) were referred from an external agency.

Figure 32. Proportion of applicants accessing a specialist court support worker by referral source – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014

The referral source of respondents was quite different to that of applicants in 2013-14, with 41% (n=290) referred by a magistrate and 20% (n=140) referred to the support worker by a family lawyer. Only 8% (n=60) were referred from the registrar/coordinator's counter.

Figure 33. Proportion of respondents by referral source – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in tables 5 and 6 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

Specialist courts across Victoria

Of the 2,337 applicants who accessed a support worker in 2013-14, almost half (44%, n=1,032) lived in the North & West Metropolitan region. Of these applicants, 339 accessed the support worker at the Melbourne Magistrates' Court, 329 at the Heidelberg Magistrates' Court and 250 at Sunshine Magistrates' Court.

31% of applicants (n=718) lived in the Southern Metropolitan region, and the majority of these applicants (75%, n=540) accessed a support worker at the Frankston Magistrates' Court and 23% (n=162) accessed a support worker at the Melbourne Magistrates' Court.

In 2013-14 there were 23 applicants with an unknown residential postcode.

Table 26. Applicants who accessed a specialist court support worker by region of residence and court where they saw the support worker – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2009 to June 2014

		2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Barwon South Western Region	Melbourne	42	89	98	82	79
	Heidelberg	0	24	17	15	13
	Other court locations	4	7	2	4	4
	Sub total	46	120	117	101	96
Grampians Region	Ballarat	187	336	466	391	442
	Other court locations	6	8	4	3	8
	Sub total	193	344	470	394	450
North & West Metropolitan Region	Melbourne	148	259	327	268	339
	Heidelberg	4	359	337	258	329
	Sunshine	296	353	293	238	250
	Werribee	86	71	51	68	99
	Other court locations	4	9	10	9	15
	Sub total	538	1,051	1,018	841	1,032
Southern Metropolitan Region	Frankston	316	488	559	595	540
	Melbourne	123	187	239	188	162
	Other court locations	4	5	4	13	16
	Sub total	443	680	802	796	718
Eastern Metropolitan Region	All court locations	6	6	4	3	7
Hume Region	All court locations	1	5	6	5	3
Loddon Mallee Region	All court locations	7	8	5	7	5
Gippsland Region	All court locations	1	4	2	4	3
Total		1,238	2,229	2,453	2,188	2,337

Note: Total figures include affected family members without a recorded postcode

The data used in this section can be found in table 9 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

Disability status of applicants and respondents accessing a support worker

In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of applicants who identified as having a disability fluctuated between 9% and 12% of all applicants who had accessed a support worker. In 2013-14, just under a quarter of applicants (23%, n=541) did not disclose whether they had a disability, while 11% (n=264) identified as having a disability and 66% (n=1,532) said they did not have a disability.

Between July 2009 and June 2014, the proportion of respondents who identified as having a disability has also fluctuated, between 17% and 29% of all respondents who accessed a specialist family violence court support worker. In 2013-14, 6% (n=46) of respondents did not disclose their disability status, while 22% (n=155) identified as having a disability and 72% (n=513) did not have a disability.

The data used in this section can be found in table 11 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

Interpreter requirements of clients accessing a support worker

In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of applicants who required an interpreter ranged between 3% and 6% of all applicants accessing a support worker. In 2013-14, 5% (n=118) of applicants were recorded as requiring an interpreter when seeing the support worker.

Between 2009-10 and 2013-14, the proportion of respondents who needed an interpreter fluctuated between 0% and 4%. In 2013-14, just 3% (n=24) of respondents required an interpreter.

The data used in this section can be found in tables 12 and 13 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

Applicants with children in their care

The proportion of applicants who had a child or children in their care at the time of their session with a support worker has remained relatively stable over the five years from July 2009 to June 2014. In 2013-14, 57% (n=1,329) of applicants had at least one child in their care at the time of their session, while 39% (n=920) did not have a child in their care.

Figure 34. Proportion of applicants who had a child/children in their care during their session with a support worker – Specialist Family Violence Courts, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 14 of the Specialist Family Violence Courts Services data tables.

8. Integrated Reporting Information System (IRIS) – Department of Health and Human Services

Data in this section is extracted from the Integrated Reporting Information System (IRIS) and includes information on women and children receiving family violence services as well as men accessing a behaviour change program. Other agencies that report through IRIS are excluded from this analysis. This analysis includes all cases that have been recorded by the agency. A case may be closed at any time from when the client presents or is referred to an agency, and they may not complete all service activities.

In the 2013-14 financial year, 25,786 individual clients presented to a men's behaviour change program or women and children's family violence service agency. These 25,786 clients generated 26,268 cases for these agencies and presented with 30,933 separately identified issues. In the five years from July 2009, there has been a substantial increase in the number of family violence clients accessing these services.

Cases and issues recorded by IRIS agencies

The number of cases recorded by IRIS agencies increased by 218.0% from 8,229 in 2009-10 to 26,168 in 2013-14. Of these cases, 97% (n=25,357) had at least one family violence issue recorded. 1% (n=251) of cases did not have a specific family violence issue recorded and 2% (n=560) had no recorded issue.

Those cases that presented without a specific family violence issue had other relevant issues recorded including, financial, housing & gambling issues, medical, alcohol & drug issues, disability & mental health issues, child protection issues, sexual assault and sexual abuse issues, adult pregnancy and other issues.

Table 27. Cases recorded by IRIS agencies by issue recorded – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Cases where at least one family violence issue was recorded	7,827	18,131	21,278	21,670	25,357
Cases where no family violence issue was recorded	98	169	257	280	251
Cases where no issue was recorded	304	287	295	301	560
Total cases	8,229	18,587	21,830	22,251	26,168

From the 26,168 cases in 2013-14, there were a total of 30,933 issues recorded by IRIS agencies. The following table outlines the number of issues recorded in the five years from July 2009 by the type of issue.

Table 28. Issues presented to men's behaviour change programs and women and children's family violence services – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Family violence issue	9,279	22,074	25,650	26,904	30,301
Medical, alcohol or drug issues	117	298	303	170	157
Financial, housing, gambling issues	8	21	116	141	154
Disability and mental health issue	195	280	264	179	132
Child protection issue	118	169	169	77	99
Sexual assault and sexual abuse issue	30	69	55	58	48
Other issues	3	20	84	47	42
Total issues	9,750	22,931	26,641	27,576	30,933

Of the 26,168 cases recorded by IRIS agencies in 2013-14, just 2% (n=560) did not have an issue recorded, while 85% (n=22,180) had only one issue recorded, 9% (n=2,380) had two issues recorded and 4% (n=1,048) had more than 3 issues recorded.

The data used in this section can be found in tables 1, 2 and 3 of the IRIS data tables.

Source of referral for family violence related cases

The majority of cases recorded by IRIS agencies were referred to an agency through the Men's Behavioural Change central intake – L17 form which made up 69% (n=17,522) of all referral sources in 2013-14. 8% (n=2,038) of cases in 2013-14 were self-referred or referred by a family member or friend. 7% (n=1,742) were referred from a community welfare or local government welfare service and 6% (n=1,471) were referred from police.

Table 29. Source of referral for cases with at least one family violence issue – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Men's Behavioural Change central intake - L17 form	181	7,704	13,369	14,261	17,522
Self, family friend	2,078	2,228	2,151	2,044	2,038
Community welfare and local government welfare	1,575	1,817	1,752	1,740	1,742
Police	2,375	4,456	2,114	1,419	1,471
DHHS	716	706	692	718	843
Courts	281	312	323	430	407
Corrections	4	9	135	250	270
Men's Referral Service	39	144	81	216	482
Medical and hospital agencies	70	106	109	104	96
School (primary and secondary)	46	70	57	85	88
Other referral source	451	569	487	392	379
Not stated	11	10	8	11	19
Total family violence related cases	7,827	18,131	21,278	21,670	25,357

The data used in this section can be found in table 4 of the IRIS data tables.

Point of closure

In 2013-14, 70% (n=17,741) of cases were closed at intake, 8% (n=2,084) were closed at the completion of all service plan activities, 7% (n=1,807) were closed prior to assessment and 5% (n=1,354) were closed after assessment but before the service plan was complete.

Table 30. Number of family violence related cases by point of closure – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
After assessment, before service plan complete	1,702	1,857	1,577	1,590	1,354
At assessment	415	409	346	247	295
At completion of all service plan activities	1,944	2,387	2,597	2,452	2,084
At intake	2,096	9,650	13,806	14,228	17,741
Not required for this case	14	64	156	256	267
Not stated	539	1,866	1,017	1,378	1,809
Prior to assessment	1,117	1,898	1,779	1,519	1,807
Total family violence related cases	7,827	18,131	21,278	21,670	25,357

The data used in this section can be found in table 5 of the IRIS data tables.

Safety plans & risk assessment completed

In the 2013-14 financial year, just 12% (n=3,025) of family violence related cases had a safety plan completed. This is a much lower proportion than in 2009-10, when 40% (n=3,093) of cases had one completed. In 2013-14, 10% (n=2,524) were not applicable for a safety plan and in 18% (n=4,613) of cases it was not known whether a plan was completed.

Since 2009-10, the proportion of cases in which a safety plan was completed has decreased each year from 2009-10 to 2013-14.

Figure 35. Proportion of cases in which a safety plan was completed – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

In 83% (n=20,939) of cases in 2013-14, the level of risk was unable to be determined by the agency. In 8% (n=1,935) of cases it was determined that there was a low level of risk, in 4% (n=993) there was a medium level and in 3% (n=831) of cases there was deemed to be a high level of risk.

The data used in this section can be found in tables 6 and 7 of the IRIS data tables.

Intervention order at referral

Of the 25,357 family violence related cases in 2013-14, only 1% (n=369) of them were recorded as having an intervention order in place at referral. 98% (n=24,743) of the cases did not state whether there was an intervention order in place at referral.

The data used in this section can be found in table 8 of the IRIS data tables.

Clients presenting to IRIS agencies

Family violence related clients accessing men's behaviour change programs and women and children's family violence services

Figure 36. Clients presenting to IRIS agencies by type of program – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

In the five years from July 2009, the number of clients accessing men's behaviour change programs has increased by 446.9%, from 3,771 in 2009-10 to 20,624 in 2013-14.

The number of clients accessing women and children's family violence services has also increased in the five years by 11.7%, from 3,963 in 2009-10 to 4,425 in 2013-14.

The data used in this section can be found in table 9 of the IRIS data tables.

Clients accessing men's behaviour change programs across Victoria

Figure 37. Clients accessing men's behaviour change programs by client's region of residence – IRIS, July 2013 to June 2014

Across Victoria, the number of clients accessing a men's behaviour change program is highest in the metropolitan regions, with 33% (n=6,831) of clients in 2013-14 residing in the North & West Metropolitan region, 25% (n=5,080) in the Southern Metropolitan region and 11% (n=2,333) in the Eastern Metropolitan region.

Table 31. Clients accessing men's behaviour change programs by client's region of residence – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Barwon South Western Region	179	740	670	640	1,363
Eastern Metropolitan Region	282	1,016	1,100	1,459	2,333
Gippsland Region	587	1,228	1,894	1,685	1,842
Grampians Region	502	804	748	598	713
Hume Region	172	708	860	768	929
Loddon Mallee Region	257	982	1,353	1,111	774
North & West Metropolitan Region	602	4,315	5,621	6,196	6,831
Southern Metropolitan Region	1,153	3,012	4,050	4,120	5,080

The data used in this section can be found in table 15 of the IRIS data tables.

Clients accessing women and children's family violence services across Victoria

Figure 38. Clients accessing women and children's family violence services by client's region of residence – IRIS, July 2013 to June 2014

In the 2013-14 financial year, just under a quarter (24%, n=1,041) of all clients accessing a women and children's family violence service lived in the Loddon Mallee region. Approximately half of all clients lived in a metropolitan region with 19% (n=843) in the North & West Metropolitan region, 18% (n=789) in the Southern Metropolitan region and 12% (n=549) in the Eastern Metropolitan region.

The number of clients accessing a women and children's family violence service in the Gippsland and Southern Metropolitan regions has decreased in the five years between 2009-10 and 2013-14. In the same period, the number of clients in the Hume region increased from 172 in 2009-10 to 929 in 2013-14.

Table 32. Clients accessing women and children's family violence services by client's region of residence – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Barwon South Western Region	179	740	670	640	1,363
Eastern Metropolitan Region	282	1,016	1,100	1,459	2,333
Gippsland Region	587	1,228	1,894	1,685	1,842
Grampians Region	502	804	748	598	713
Hume Region	172	708	860	768	929
Loddon Mallee Region	257	982	1,353	1,111	774
North & West Metropolitan Region	602	4,315	5,621	6,196	6,831
Southern Metropolitan Region	1,153	3,012	4,050	4,120	5,080

The data used in this section can be found in table 16 of the IRIS data tables.

Age of men accessing men's behaviour change programs

Of the 20,624 clients accessing a behaviour change program in 2013-14, 99% (n=20,383) had a recorded age. The largest age group of men was 18 – 24 years, making up 18% (n=3,695) of clients, followed by those aged 30 – 34 years, which made up 16% of clients.

Figure 39. Age of men accessing men's behaviour change programs – IRIS, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 11 of the IRIS data tables.

Demographics of clients accessing women and children's family violence services

In 2013-14, there were 2,693 female adult clients who accessed a women and children's family violence service. Of these clients, the largest age groups were 30 – 34, 35 – 39 and 40 – 44 years. Together these age groups made up half (50%, n=1,336) of all female adult clients.

In the same year there were 1,559 clients under 17 years of age, of which, 49% (n=761) were male and 51% (n=798) were female.

Figure 40. Gender and age of clients accessing women and children's family violence services – IRIS, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 10 of the IRIS data tables.

Country of birth

In 2013-14, the country of birth of 77% (n=15,892) of men accessing a behaviour change program could not be ascertained as the client did not meet with the agency. 20% (n=4,166) of clients identified that they were born in Australia and just 3% (n=562) identified that they were born in another country.

Of the 4,425 clients accessing a women and children's family violence service in 2013-14, 84% (n=3,731) identified that they were born in Australia, while 13% (n=570) identified that they were born in another country. Only 3% (n=120) of clients' country of birth could not be ascertained.

The data used in this section can be found in table 13 of the IRIS data tables.

Indigenous status

In 2013-14, the indigenous status of 58% (n=11,940) of clients accessing a men's behaviour change program could not be ascertained. 40% (n=8,223) of clients identified as neither Aboriginal nor Torres Strait Islander, 2% (n=417) identified as Aboriginal but not Torres Strait Islander and only 0.1% identified as Torres Strait Islander but not Aboriginal or both Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander.

In the same year, 83% (n=3,688) of clients accessing women and children's family violence services identified as neither Aboriginal nor Torres Strait Islander and 8% (n=356) identified as Aboriginal but not Torres Strait Islander, and another 8% (n=356) of clients' indigenous status could not be ascertained.

The data used in this section can be found in table 12 of the IRIS data tables.

9. Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset (VEMD)

For the purposes of identifying patients presenting for family violence reasons, this report focuses on those patients who presented with a human intent injury of either; 'Child neglect, maltreatment by parent, guardian' or 'Maltreatment, assault by domestic partner'.

Since July 2009, the number of patients presenting to emergency departments for family violence reasons has fluctuated between 485 and 629 per year.

Figure 41. Patients presenting with injuries caused by a family member – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the VEMD data tables.

Demographic characteristics of VEMD patients

Gender and age of family violence patients

In 2013-14, 485 patients presented to the emergency department with a human intent injury of either 'Child neglect, maltreatment by parent, guardian' or 'Maltreatment, assault by domestic partner'. Two thirds of these patients (67%, n=323) were recorded as female and one third (33%, n=162) male.

Of the male patients that presented with a human intent injury, approximately 50% (n=82) of them were aged between 20 and 44 years. This age group accounted for 60% (n=196) of female patients.

The proportion of males and females in each age group has fluctuated across the five years, however, the numbers are quite small and variations can be expected in such a small group.

Figure 42. Patients presenting with injuries caused by a family member by gender and age – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the VEMD data tables.

Indigenous status

In the five years from July 2009, the proportion of recorded indigenous status has remained relatively stable. In 2013-14, 93% (n=455) of patients identified as Neither Aboriginal nor Torres Strait islander while 5% identified as Aboriginal but not Torres Strait Islander. Less than 3 patients identified as Both Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander.

The data used in this section can be found in table 4 of the VEMD data tables.

Country of birth

The proportion of patients who identified a country of birth outside of Australia has remained stable over the five years from July 2009. In 2013-14, approximately 80% (n=390) of patients were born in Australia, 18% (n=85) were born outside of Australia and 2% (n=10) of patients did not state a country of birth. Of those patients born outside of Australia, 15 were born in North West Europe, 14 in Oceania, 13 in South East Asia.

The data used in this section can be found in table 3 of the VEMD data tables.

VEMD patients across Victoria

Figure 43. Patients by DHHS region of residence – VEMD, July 2013 to June 2014

Based on the residential postcode of the patient, the largest number of patients lived in the metropolitan regions, with 28% (n=135) of patients in 2013-14 residing in the Southern Metro region, 18% (n=84) in the North and West Metropolitan region and 16% (n=77) in the Eastern Metropolitan region.

It is also the metropolitan regions that differ the most in the split between male and female patients. A greater proportion of female patients lived in the North & West and Eastern Metropolitan regions, and a greater proportion of male patients lived in the Southern Metropolitan region.

Table 33. Patients by region of residence – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
Barwon South Western Region	41	30	41	28	27
Eastern Metropolitan Region	54	43	62	61	77
Gippsland Region	26	31	37	36	37
Grampians Region	113	119	141	82	57
Hume Region	13	19	26	21	23
Loddon Mallee Region	30	30	26	28	34
North & West Metropolitan Region	116	116	132	101	84
Southern Metropolitan Region	158	131	147	146	135

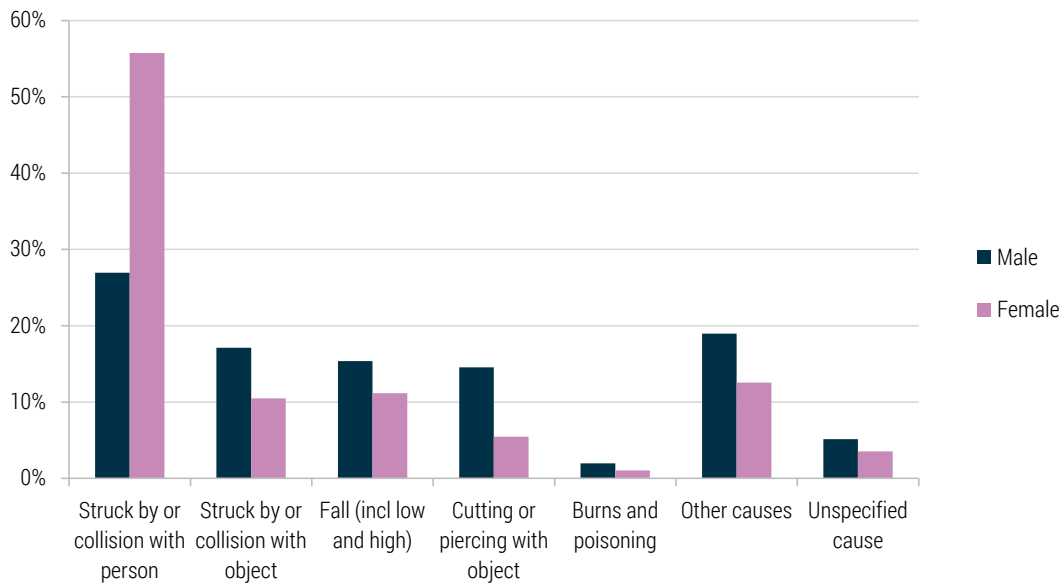

The data used in this section can be found in table 2 of the VEMD data tables.

Cause of injury

The cause of injury is self-reported by patients at the time they present to an emergency department. Looking at the five years from July 2009, there is a marked difference in the cause of injury reported depending on the gender of the patient.

Female patients were more likely to present with an injury from being struck by or colliding with a person than any other cause (56%). Whereas males were more likely to present with every other cause of injury.

Figure 44. Proportion of total causes of injury by gender – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014 combined

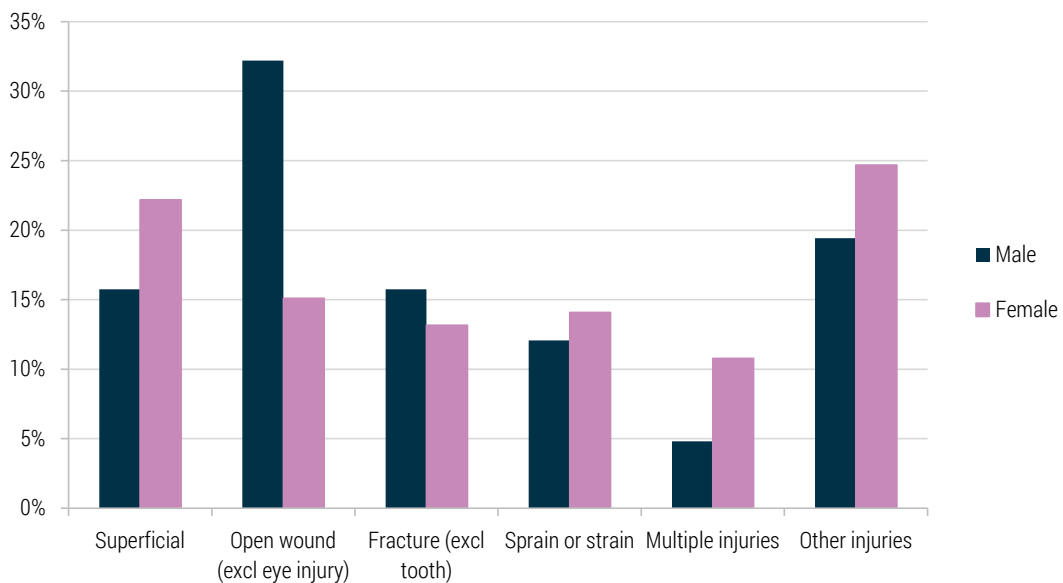

The data used in this section can be found in table 5 of the VEMD data tables.

Nature of main injury

Similar to the cause of injury, the nature of the main injury that females present with was very different to the nature of injury that a male was likely to present with.

Male patients were more likely to present with an open wound and fractures, whereas females were more likely to present with superficial injuries, sprains or strains and other injuries.

Figure 45. Proportion of the nature of main injury by gender – VEMD, July 2009 to June 2014 combined

The data used in this section can be found in table 7 of the VEMD data tables.

10. Victims Assistance Program (VAP)

Victims of family violence

In 2013-14, the proportion of Victims Assistance Program (VAP) clients that were victims of a family violence crime was 36% (n=16,240) of total clients. This is up from 2009-10 when the proportion of family violence victims was 16% (n=5,133). In the 2012-13 financial, the recording of family violence crimes changed from recording specific family violence crimes to identifying all family violence related crimes with a flag.

Figure 46. Proportion of Victims Assistance Program clients that were victims of family violence – VAP, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Victims Support Agency data tables.

Demographic characteristics of family violence related victims

Gender and age of victims

Over the five years from July 2009, the proportion of male victims has increased and in 2013-14 male victims made up 31% (n=5,052) of total victims of family violence. The largest age group of male victims was 0 – 14 years (n=1,402) followed by 40 – 54 years (n=1,122).

In the 2013-14 financial year, there were 11,141 female victims, of which the largest age group was 25 – 39 years. This accounted for 37% (4,106) of total female victims.

Table 34. Gender of VAP clients who were victims of family violence – VAP, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
Male victims	23%	24%	31%	36%	31%
Female victims	77%	76%	69%	63%	69%

In the same period there were more female victims than male victims in all age groups, except for 0 – 14 years and 65 years and over.

Figure 47. Gender and age of victims of family violence – VAP, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 2 of the Victims Support Agency data tables.

Indigenous status

In 2013-14, the indigenous status of 5% (n=780) of family violence related VAP clients was unknown. Another 5% (n=847) were recorded as Aboriginal and 90% (n=14,582) were recorded as neither Aboriginal nor Torres Strait Islander. Only 31 clients identified as Torres Strait Islander.

The data used in this section can be found in table 3 of the Victim Support Agency data tables.

Cultural background

Cultural background is not indicative of the client's country of birth but is a broader indicator of the culture that they identify with. In the five years from July 2009, the recording of cultural background of VAP family violence clients greatly increased. In 2013-14, the proportion of clients who identified their cultural background as Australia accounted for 81% (n=13,190) of all family violence clients. This was followed by New Zealand (2%, n=283), then Greece (1.2%, n=190), India (1.1%, n=179) and Vietnam (1%, n=159).

The data used in this section can be found in table 5 of the Victims Support Agency data tables.

Victims of family violence across Victoria

Table 35. Number of victims of family violence by region – VAP, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009 – 10	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
Barwon South West	455	1,190	1,497	1,760	2,128
Gippsland	1,414	870	1,325	1,795	1,654
Grampians	373	677	898	962	1,034
Hume	705	1,210	1,258	923	1,438
Loddon-Mallee	223	657	913	939	1,010
Metropolitan - East	532	820	1,089	1,480	2,101
Metropolitan - North	271	1,437	1,359	1,185	1,626
Metropolitan - South	1,027	1,913	2,380	3,585	2,755
Metropolitan - Western	133	1,595	1,518	1,474	2,494

In 2013-14 the southern metropolitan and western metropolitan regions had the highest number of family violence clients with 2,755 and 2,494 respectively. Loddon-Mallee and the Grampians regions had the lowest number of family violence clients with 1,010 and 1,034. It should be noted that these figures are dependent on the number and location of service agencies in each of these regions.

The data used in this section can be found in table 6 of the Victims Support Agency data tables.

11. Victims of Crime Helpline (VoC)

The Victims of Crime helpline is a telephone support service for victims of crime in Victoria. The helpline is a program within the Victim Support Agency in the Department of Justice & Regulation. In 2012-13, the VSA introduced a field to identify where a client had been a victim of family violence as opposed to another type of crime. Data for the period 2009-10 is not available from the Victims of Crime helpline.

Victims of family violence

Table 36. Victims by the type of crime – Victims of Crime, July 2010 to June 2014

	2010 – 11	2011 – 12	2012 – 13	2013 – 14
Clients identified as victims of family violence	0	0	260	1,143
Clients identified as victims of other crime	0	0	1,054	4,205
Unknown crime type	4,311	8,035	7,509	15,157
Total VoC Helpline clients	4,311	8,035	8,823	20,505

The data used in this section can be found in table 7 of the Victims Support Agency data tables.

Demographic characteristics of victims

Of the 1,143 victims who identified themselves as a victim of family violence in the 2013-14 financial year, 48% (n=548) were male and 52% (n=590) were female.

The largest age group of victims in 2013-14 was 25 – 39 years, accounting for 34% (n=188) of male victims and 40% (n=237) of female victims. In 2013-14, there were more female victims recorded between the age of 0 and 39 years, whereas there were more male victims aged 40 years and older.

Figure 48. Victims of family violence by gender and age – Victims of Crime, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 8 of the Victims Support Agency data tables.

12. Victoria Legal Aid (VLA)

This section focuses on the services provided by Victoria Legal Aid (VLA), where the primary matter was recorded as family violence related. The data looks at the number of services provided as well as the demographics of the clients accessing these services. The data collected by VLA does not identify whether a client was accessing a service as an affected family member/victim or other party/respondent/perpetrator.

Victoria Legal Aid services

In the five years from July 2009, the number of services provided by VLA where the primary matter was family violence related has increased by 8.5% from 19,511 in 2009-10 to 21,172 in 2013-14. In those five years, there was a decline in the number of legal advice services and substantive grants.

It should be noted that a change in the counting methodology of minor work services has resulted in a large drop in the number of services from years prior to 2009-10.

Figure 49. Services provided by VLA where primary matter is family violence related – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014

Table 37. Services provided by VLA where primary matter is family violence related – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014

	2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Duty lawyer services	9,427	9,664	11,061	10,655	10,610
Legal help	4,890	4,435	4,452	4,998	6,672
Minor work	491	546	706	506	161
Substantive grants	2,204	2,139	2,169	1,793	1,722
Legal advice	2,499	2,340	2,188	2,081	2,007
Total services	19,511	19,124	20,576	20,033	21,172

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

Referrals to Victoria Legal Aid

VLA began collecting the client's referral source in 2010-11. Over the four years to 2013-14, the recording of this data item has continually improved in quality.

In 2013-14, 48% (n=4,843) of duty lawyer clients were referred to VLA from the courts, 42% (n=4,263) were self-referred and 6% (n=625) were an existing or previous client of VLA.

66% (n=4,404) of legal help clients were self-referred or no referral was made, while 5% (n=310) were referred from police and 4% (n=244) from the courts.

The data used in this section can be found in tables 2 and 14 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

Demographics of clients accessing Victoria Legal Aid services

Gender and age of clients

Gender and age of clients accessing duty lawyer services

In 2013-14, there were 10,610 clients accessing duty lawyer services, of which 72% (n=7,631) were male and 28% (n=2,976) female.

The largest age group of male clients was 40 – 44 year olds, of which there were 1,183 in 2013-14. Those aged between 30 and 44 years accounted for 44% (n=3,372) of all male clients.

Figure 50. Gender and age of clients accessing duty lawyer services – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 3 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

Gender of clients accessing legal advice services

In 2009-10, the proportion of clients accessing legal advice services who were male was 51% (n=1,278) and the proportion who were female was 49% (n=1,219). In 2013-14, the proportion of male clients had decreased to 46% (n=921) and the proportion of female clients had increased to 54% (n=1,086).

Of the 921 male clients in 2013-14, the largest age group was 30 – 34 years (n=166) with those aged 30 – 44 making up 49% (n=448) of all male clients.

The age breakdown of the 1,086 female clients in 2013-14 was very similar to that of male clients with 48% (n=521) aged between 30 – 44 years of age. A quarter (25%, n=272) of all female clients were between the ages of 18 – 29 years.

The data used in this section can be found in table 10 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

Gender and age of clients applying for substantive grants

In 2013-14, 56% (n=964) of clients who applied for a substantive grant were female, while 44% (n=755) were male. Of the 1,722 applicants, 1,485 were 18 years or older while 237 were under 17 years old.

Table 38. Gender and age group of clients applying for substantive grants – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014

		2009-10	2010-11	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Male	Child (17 years and younger)	224	253	209	151	135
	Adult (18 years and older)	718	714	740	686	620
	Subtotal	942	967	949	837	755
Female	Child (17 years and younger)	207	197	155	108	102
	Adult (18 years and older)	1,051	975	1,065	848	862
	Subtotal	1,258	1,172	1,220	956	964
Total	Child (17 years and younger)	431	450	364	259	237
	Adult (18 years and older)	1,773	1,689	1,805	1,534	1,485
	Total	2,204	2,139	2,169	1,793	1,722

The data used in this section can be found in tables 19 and 20 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

Culturally and linguistically diverse clients

Country of birth of clients accessing duty lawyer services

In the five years from July 2009, the recording of a client's country of birth has considerably increased in quality. In 2013-14, only 3% (n=330) of clients accessing a duty lawyer had an unknown country of birth compared to 44% (n=3,894) in 2009-10.

Of those clients with a known country of birth in 2013-14 (n=9,806), 70% (n=6,884) were born in Australia and 30% (2,922) were born overseas.

The top five countries of birth for those clients born outside of Australia were India (n=265), New Zealand (n=244), England (n=170), Vietnam (n=160) and Sudan (n=135).

The data used in this section can be found in table 8 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

Interpreter requirements of Victoria Legal Aid clients

Between July 2009 and June 2014, the proportion of clients who required an interpreter while accessing a VLA service has fluctuated between 2% and 8% of clients, depending on the service type. In 2013-14, 8% of clients accessing either a legal advice service (n=161) or minor work service (n=11) required an interpreter while 6% (n=616) of those accessing a duty lawyer required one and just 3% (n=220) of legal help clients required an interpreter.

Figure 51. Proportion of clients who required an interpreter by type of service – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in tables 7, 12, 15 and 17 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

Disability status of clients

The proportion of clients who identified as having a disability has steadily increased across all VLA services since July 2009. In 2013-14, the proportion of applicants for a substantive grant who identified as having a disability was 19% (n=282), while the proportion of clients accessing a duty lawyer or legal advice service who had a disability was 22% (n=2,220) and 25% (n=489) respectively.

Of the 489 clients accessing legal advice services who identified as having a disability, just over half (51%, n=247) had a mental health issue, while 28% (n=136) had a physical disability.

Of the 2,220 duty lawyer clients who identified as having a disability, 46% (n=1,022) identified as having a mental health issue, and 27% (n=605) had a physical disability.

Figure 52. Proportion of clients who identified as having a disability by type of service – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in tables 6, 11 and 21 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

Outcomes of duty lawyer services

In 2013-14, where the client was male, 44% (n=3,211) of matters resulted in an order being made, while 26% (n=1,929) resulted in an adjournment and in 20% (n=1,464) of cases only information and advice was obtained.

Where the client was female, 34% (n=957) of matters were adjourned, another 34% (n=950) resulted in an order being made and 17% (482) of clients only received information and advice.

Figure 53. Outcome of duty lawyer services by gender of client – Victoria Legal Aid, July 2009 to June 2014

In the five years from July 2009, there has been a shift in the outcomes of duty lawyer services where clients were 17 years or younger. In 2009-10, the proportion of services that resulted in an adjournment was 37% (n=220), compared to 2013-14 where 29% (n=139) resulted in an adjournment.

There was also a drop in the proportion of services that resulted in the matter being struck out or withdrawn. In 2009-10, 18% (n=104) were struck out or withdrawn and in 2013-14, this was down to 9% (n=45).

Conversely, there was an increase in the proportion of matters that resulted in an order being made, increasing from 25% (n=149) in 2009-10 to 48% (n=229) in 2013-14.

The data used in this section can be found in tables 4 and 5 of the Victoria Legal Aid data tables.

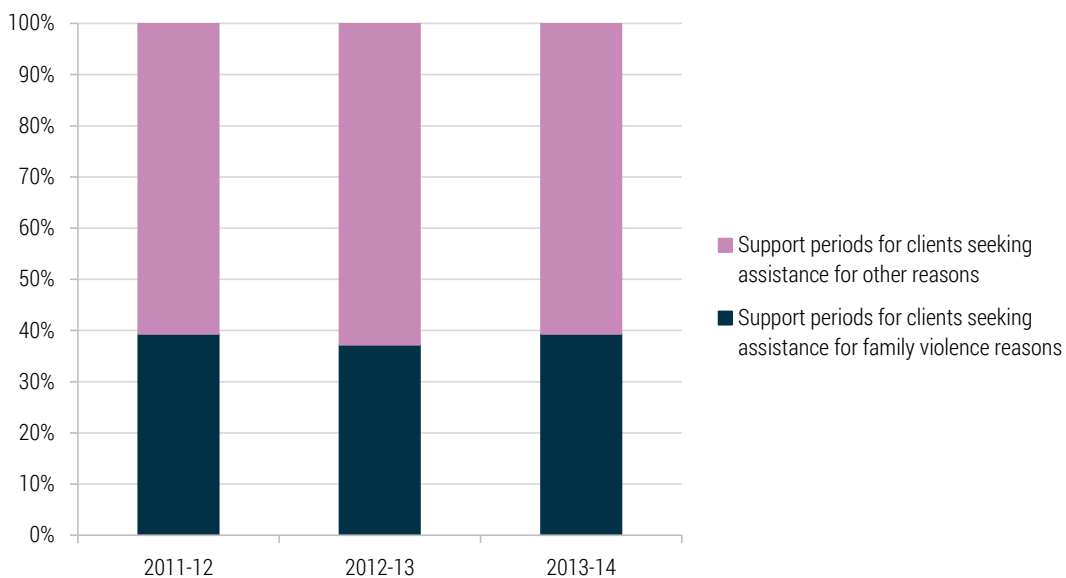

13. Specialist Homelessness Services Collection (SHSC)

Support periods for clients seeking housing assistance in Victoria

Since July 2011, when the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection (SHSC) replaced the Supported Accommodation Assistance Program (SAAP), the number of support periods provided to clients seeking assistance in Victoria has increased by 46.7% from 128,694 in 2011-12 to 188,775 in 2013-14.

The proportion of support periods for clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons has remained relatively stable over those three years and in 2013-14, 39% (n=74,292) of all support periods were family violence related.

Figure 54. Proportion of support periods for clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 1 of the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data tables.

Demographics of clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons

In the three years from July 2011, the proportion of male and female clients has remained relatively stable. On average, 83% of clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons were female and 17% were male.

In 2013-14, there were 62,174 female clients and 12,118 male clients. Due to confidentialisation, there were 2,459 male clients with an unknown age and 5,854 female clients with an unknown age.

Of the female clients with a known age (n=56,246) the largest age group was 25 – 34 years, making up 30% (n=15,098) of female clients, followed by 35 – 44 years (n=16,904) and 15 – 24 years (n=10,668).

Of the male clients with a known age (n=9,659), the largest age group was 0 – 14, of which there were 4,038 clients seeking assistance. In the same age group there were 4,337 female clients seeking assistance in 2013-14 for family violence reasons.

Figure 55. Clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons by gender and age – SHSC, July 2013 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 2 of the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data tables.

Main reason clients sought housing assistance

When a client presents to an SHSC service provider they are asked to identify all reasons why they are seeking housing assistance. They are also asked to identify the main reason they are seeking assistance. Table 39 outlines the five main reasons for clients seeking housing assistance.

In 2013-14, the proportion of support periods for male clients where the main reason was domestic and family violence was 35% (n=4,283), while for female clients 61% (n=37,879) identified their main reason as domestic and family violence. 15% (n=1,855) of male clients and 9% (n=5,497) of female clients identified their main reason as a housing crisis

Table 39. Top 5 main reasons for clients seeking assistance by gender – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014

Male	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Domestic and family violence	2,724	3,051	4,283
Housing crisis (e.g. recently evicted)	1,074	1,818	1,855
Inadequate or inappropriate dwelling conditions	335	604	799
Relationship/family breakdown	497	581	723
Financial difficulties	331	645	569
All other reasons	1,678	2,005	2,085
Unknown	2,059	2,393	1,804
Sub total	8,703	11,097	12,118
Female	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Domestic and family violence	25,445	31,580	37,879
Housing crisis (e.g. recently evicted)	3,010	4,277	5,497
Financial difficulties	1,478	2,604	2,984
Inadequate or inappropriate dwelling conditions	1,516	2,564	2,972
Relationship/family breakdown	1,216	1,901	2,171
All other reasons	3,619	4,903	5,588
Unknown	5,599	6,693	5,083
Sub total	41,883	54,522	62,174

The data used in this section can be found in table 3 of the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data tables.

Young people seeking assistance on their own

In the three years from July 2011, the number of young clients seeking assistance on their own increased by 39.3%, from 9,812 in 2011-12 to 13,665 in 2013-14. Of the 13,665, 17% (n=2,383) were male and 83% (n=11,282) were female.

Table 40. Young people seeking assistance on their own, by gender – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014

	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Male	1,728	2,370	2,383
Female	8,084	10,951	11,282
Total	9,812	13,321	13,665

The data used in this section can be found in table 4 of the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data tables.

Indigenous status

In the three years from July 2011, the proportion of support periods for indigenous clients has remained relatively stable, with on average 10% of clients identifying as indigenous. In the three years the proportion of clients who did not state an indigenous status has increased from 14% (n=7,033) in 2011-12 to 17% (n=12,790) in 2013-14.

The proportion of female clients who identified as indigenous is almost the same as that of male clients, with 10% (n=5,940) of female clients and 11% (n=1,293) of male clients identifying as indigenous.

Figure 56. Proportion of support periods for clients experiencing family violence by indigenous status and gender – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014

The data used in this section can be found in table 6 of the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data tables.

Country of birth

In 2013-14, 51,602 of clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons had a known country of birth. Of these clients, 89% (46,175) were born in Australia, 3% (n=1,447) were born in North Africa & Middle East and 2% (n=1,122) were born in South-East Asia.

The proportion of clients who had an unknown, or missing country of birth, has slightly increased in the three years from July 2011 from 11% (n=5,326) of clients in 2011-12 to 15% (n=10,853) in 2013-14.

The data used in this section can be found in table 7 of the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data tables.

Clients with mental health issues

At the time a client presents to an SHSC agency they are asked to identify whether they have ever been diagnosed with a mental health issue. In the three years from July 2011, the proportion of clients who identified as ever having a mental health issue increased from 32% (n=16,171) in 2011-12 to 37% (n=27,414) in 2013-14

The data used in this section can be found in table 9 of the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data tables.

Main source of income

The main source of income reported by the client on their first contact with an agency differs considerably depending on the gender of the client. Of the 12,118 male clients, the main source of income reported by the client was the Newstart allowance (n=1,724) followed by the Disability support pension (n=1,377) and Youth allowance (n=766).

Of the 62,174 female clients, the main source of income was a Parenting payment, with 10,210 clients identifying this as their main source of income. This was followed by the Newstart allowance (n=5,235) and the Disability support pension (n=4,414).

Table 41. Support periods of clients seeking assistance for family violence reasons by main source of income at first contact – SHSC, July 2011 to June 2014

Male	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Newstart allowance	1,280	1,938	1,724
Disability support pension	959	1,326	1,377
Youth allowance	555	626	766
Employee income	238	266	326
Parenting payment	122	144	154
All other income sources	207	384	280
Nil income	288	1,286	2,179
Unknown	1,473	2,890	2,204
Not applicable	3,581	2,237	3,108
Sub total	8,703	11,097	12,118
Female	2011-12	2012-13	2013-14
Parenting payment	7,624	9,322	10,210
Newstart allowance	2,764	3,827	5,235
Disability support pension	3,116	3,927	4,414
Employee income	2,501	2,493	3,195
Youth allowance	1,471	1,728	2,100
All other income sources	1,585	1,891	2,589
Nil income	1,276	2,544	3,469
Unknown	18,285	26,883	27,973
Not applicable	3,261	1,907	2,989
Sub total	41,883	54,522	62,174
Total support periods	50,586	65,619	74,292

The data used in this section can be found in table 8 of the Specialist Homelessness Services Collection data tables.

14. Further analysis: police recorded family violence recidivism

Introduction

A detailed understanding of the characteristics and behavioural patterns of family violence perpetrators is vital for ensuring that intervention policies and practices are appropriately targeted. Publicly available information about levels of recidivism and the characteristics and behaviours of perpetrators over time in Victoria could not be located by the CSA. A key component of the work undertaken by the CSA to support the Royal Commission into Family Violence (RCFV) sought to begin to address this gap in the existing evidence base by conducting a research study to statistically analyse the levels and predictors of recidivism amongst family violence perpetrators in Victoria.

Victoria Police data was used for the research because it is the most comprehensive source of information available within the Victorian Family Violence Database that can be drawn upon to examine recidivism across Victoria. Unique identifiers within the police data enable longitudinal tracking of individuals over time. As such, the research presented in this chapter also serves as a case study example of what improvements in the evidence base would be possible if comprehensive family violence data was consistently collected over time across agencies, and analysed using rigorous research methods. Where feasible, the possibilities for improved evidence would be further strengthened if linkages were made across different sources of Victorian family violence data. Some examples of research that could be conducted where linkage between datasets is feasible are outlined at the end of this chapter.

Though this analysis draws only on Victoria Police data, it is acknowledged that many family violence incidents do not come to the attention of police. There are also a wide range of contextual factors that are not systematically recorded by police, but that impact on the frequency and seriousness of family violence incidents. Further, it should be noted that police recorded recidivism is just one of a variety of outcome indicators associated with family violence intervention policy and practice. While recidivism incidents are an adverse outcome to the extent that they indicate repetition of violent behaviour towards victims, they can also be interpreted as an indicator of increased victim willingness to contact police and/or police follow-up and involvement where there are ongoing concerns for victims' safety.

Specifically, this research discussed aimed to answer the following research questions:

1. How many family violence perpetrators are recorded for more than one family violence incident?
2. How often are they recorded for family violence incidents, and what is the time between incidents?
3. What are the differences between recidivist and non-recidivist perpetrators in terms of their characteristics, family violence histories and other risk factors?
4. Is it possible to predict which perpetrators will have a recorded recidivism incident based on their characteristics or risk factors recorded by police at the first incident?
5. Are differences in police responses related to differences in re-perpetration outcomes?

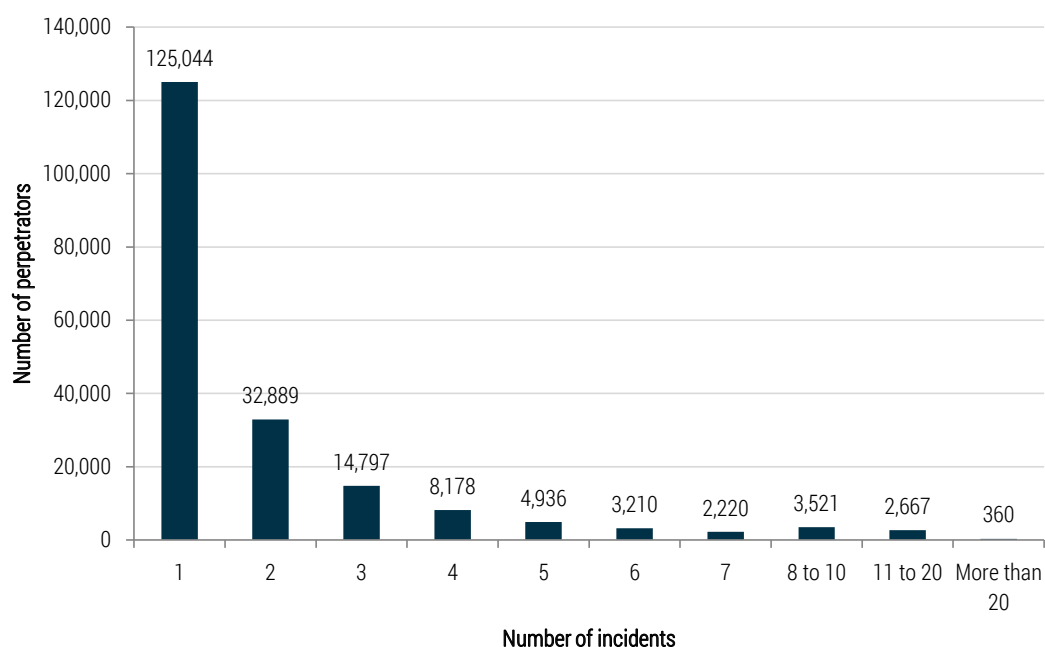

This chapter begins by outlining the results of some background analysis on overall rates of family violence recidivism in Victoria over the past ten years. Next, a detailed summary of the method and results of the recidivism analyses conducted to answer the research questions is provided. Finally, the study limitations and opportunities for further work in this area are discussed.

Background

This section provides information about the overall number of incidents, alleged perpetrators, and recidivist incidents recorded by Victoria Police over the past ten years. This information is intended to provide context for the analysis presented throughout the rest of the chapter, which examines a specific cohort of perpetrators in more detail.

Between 1 July 2004 and 30 June 2014, 403,991 family violence incidents were recorded against 197,822 alleged perpetrators¹. Over the ten year period, the majority of perpetrators had only a single family violence incident recorded by police (63% or 125,044 perpetrators), as shown in Figure 57. Seventeen percent (n=32,889) of perpetrators had two incidents recorded, 7% (n=14,797) had three incidents recorded and the remaining 13% (n=25,092) had four or more incidents recorded. Seven perpetrators had more than 50 incidents recorded over the ten year period.

Figure 57. Number of incidents per perpetrator, 2004-05 to 2013-14

As shown in Table 42, the 125,044 perpetrators who were recorded for a single incident over the ten year period accounted for 31% of all family violence incidents. Though they only represented 9% of all unique perpetrators, the 16,914 recidivist perpetrators who were recorded for five or more incidents accounted for 34% of all incidents.

¹ A family violence incident is an incident recorded by police on an L17 form. 'Perpetrators' are alleged rather than proven perpetrators, and are defined as those individuals recorded by police as the 'Other Party' (OTH) or other parties to a family violence incident on an L17 form.

Table 42. Number and proportion of incidents recorded for perpetrators who committed 1, 2, 3 and 4 or more incidents between 2004-05 and 2013-14

Number of incidents recorded per perpetrator	Perpetrators		Incidents
	n	%	n	%
1 incident	125,044	63%	125,044	31%
2 incidents	32,889	17%	65,778	16%
3 incidents	14,797	7%	44,391	11%
4 incidents	8,178	4%	32,712	8%
5 or more incidents	16,914	9%	136,349	34%

Figure 58 and Table 43 show the proportion of family violence incidents recorded for each unique perpetrator per financial year over the ten year period. In this figure and table perpetrators may be counted more than once over the ten year period. They are counted as a unique perpetrator for each year in which they were recorded for one or more incident(s). The majority of perpetrators were recorded for a single incident each year. However, the proportion that were recorded for more than one family violence incident within a year has increased over the past ten years, from 18% (or 4,157 perpetrators) in the year ending June 30 2005 to 25% (or 11,160) in the year ending June 30 2014.

Figure 58. Proportion of unique perpetrators per year who committed 1, 2, 3, and 4 or more incidents

Table 43. Proportion of unique perpetrators per year who committed 1, 2, 3, and 4 or more incidents within that year

Financial year ending	1 incident per year		2 incidents per year		3 incidents per year		4 or more incidents per year
	n	%	n	%	n	%	n	%
2005	19,333	82%	2,856	12%	801	3%	500	2%
2006	18,218	82%	2,687	12%	727	3%	514	2%
2007	18,728	82%	2,792	12%	805	4%	534	2%
2008	19,787	81%	3,092	13%	899	4%	583	2%
2009	21,098	81%	3,331	13%	981	4%	622	2%
2010	22,353	81%	3,589	13%	989	4%	621	2%
2011	24,551	80%	4,073	13%	1,199	4%	882	3%
2012	28,107	78%	5,121	14%	1,625	4%	1,309	4%
2013	32,105	76%	6,223	15%	2,065	5%	1,878	4%
2014	33,217	75%	6,566	15%	2,419	5%	2,175	5%

Figure 59 and Table 44 show the number of additional or ‘new’ unique perpetrators (i.e., those who have not appeared in any previous year of the ten year period) recorded for family violence incidents each year as a proportion of the total number of unique perpetrators recorded each year. The initial years presented in this graph should be interpreted with caution as those represented as ‘new perpetrators’ may have been recorded for incidents prior to the starting point for this dataset in 2004/05. Nevertheless, the number of new perpetrators recorded increased gradually between 2008 and 2011, increased to a greater extent between 2011 and 2013, and appears to have plateaued somewhat between 2013 and 2014.

Figure 59. Existing, new and total family violence perpetrators each year, 2005 – 2014

Table 44. Existing, new and total family violence perpetrators each year, 2005 – 2014

Financial year ending	Existing unique perpetrators		New unique perpetrators		All unique perpetrators
	n	%	n	%	n	%
2005	0	0%	23,490	100%	23,490	100%
2006	4,176	19%	17,970	81%	22,146	100%
2007	6,196	27%	16,663	73%	22,859	100%
2008	7,678	32%	16,682	68%	24,360	100%
2009	9,144	35%	16,888	65%	26,032	100%
2010	9,977	36%	17,575	64%	27,552	100%
2011	12,130	40%	18,575	60%	30,705	100%
2012	14,478	40%	21,683	60%	36,161	100%
2013	18,224	43%	24,109	57%	42,333	100%
2014	20,201	46%	24,187	54%	44,388	100%

Methodology

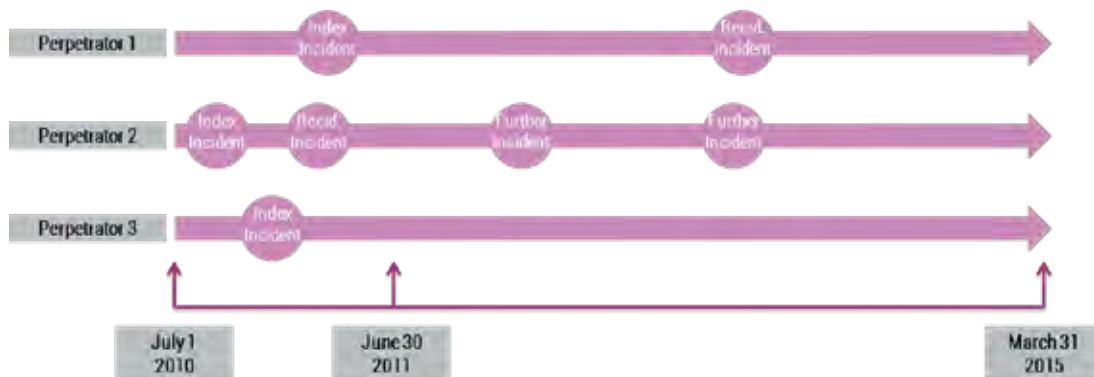

This study used data about family violence incidents recorded by police from the 2004/05 financial year to the 30th of March 2015. This data includes all information recorded by police on the L17 Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report form (the L17 form) and lodged on Victoria Police's Law Enforcement Assistance Program (LEAP) database. The Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence states that police complete the form for all family violence incidents, interfamilial-related sexual offences and instances of child abuse reported to them, and that prior to leaving the scene of a family violence incident, police officers must collect 'all the information needed to complete the Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report (Victoria Police, 2014: p.10).

To identify patterns and predictors of recidivism in more detail, a cohort of perpetrators whose behaviour could be tracked over time within the dataset was selected. The cohort of all individuals who were recorded by police as perpetrating at least one family violence incident in the 2010/11 financial year was selected for the purpose of this analysis. These are individuals who were recorded by police as "Other Parties" on at least one L17 form in 2010/11. This cohort was selected because it enabled analysis of recidivism behaviour for a minimum of three years and nine months for each perpetrator to the end of March 2015. In addition, selecting this cohort meant that the analysis could examine whether a perpetrator's recorded historical family violence behaviour in prior years (between July 2004 and June 2010), impacted on their propensity to reappear in the dataset as a recidivist perpetrator.

In this study a perpetrator's index incident was defined as the first time they were recorded for a family violence incident by police on or after 1 July 2010. If a perpetrator was recorded for a further incident after their index incident but prior to 31 March 2015, they were considered to be a recidivist perpetrator, and this second incident was defined as their recidivism incident. Any incidents recorded against perpetrators after their recidivism incident but prior to 31 March 2015 were defined as further incidents. Figure 60 provides examples of how this methodology could apply to individual perpetrators.

For the purpose of this report, references to perpetrators and incidents refer to alleged rather than proven perpetrators and incidents. References to recorded offences arising from family violence incidents also refer to alleged rather than proven offences as the CSA does not hold court outcome data regarding whether offences recorded by police went on to be proven in court.

Figure 60. Methodology for identification of index and recidivism incidents

Data

The dataset used for the recidivism analysis included perpetrator characteristics, items related to perpetrators' family violence histories, characteristics of perpetrators' index incidents as recorded by police, and data relating to recidivism outcomes. A summary of all of the data items included is provided in Table 45.

Table 45. Data items

Category	Data items
Perpetrator characteristics	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Sex Age at time of index incident Relationship between perpetrator and victim
Perpetrator family violence incident history	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Total number of recorded family violence incidents prior to July 1 2010 Total number of breaches of family violence orders prior to July 1 2010
Characteristics of index incident	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Risk factors recorded by police at index incident Police assessment of overall risk of future violence (unlikely, likely) Victim fear level (not fearful, fearful, very fearful) Whether children were present at the index incident Whether presence of a disability was recorded at the index incident Actions recorded by police on the L17 form (including criminal, civil and referral actions) Recorded offences arising from the family violence incident
Recidivism outcomes	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Whether a perpetrator was recorded for a further incident Total number of recorded recidivism and further incidents Time between index and recidivism incidents

Statistical analysis

Chi-square analyses (indicated by the symbol: χ^2) were used to examine whether there were bivariate relationships between potential predictors of recidivism (including perpetrators' characteristics, perpetrators' recorded family violence histories and/or the characteristics of their index incident), and whether or not they were recorded for a recidivism incident. Where the significance level (indicated by the symbol p) is less than .05, this indicates that there was a statistically significant relationship between the predictor variable being tested and recidivism. The closer the significance level is to zero, the less likely it is that the results of the statistical test presented could have occurred by chance, or conversely, the more likely it is that the results represent true relationships between factors tested and recidivism in the population, as opposed to random variation in the data.

Following these initial chi-square analyses, potential predictors that had a statistically significant bivariate relationship with recidivism (at the $p < .05$ level) were included in a logistic regression model. This overall model was used to determine which combination of explanatory factors is most useful in determining whether or not someone will be recorded for a recidivism incident, and how likely it is that this combination of factors will correctly identify recidivist and non-recidivist perpetrators.

Kaplan-Meier estimates were used to determine the proportion of perpetrators who were recorded for recidivism incidents at various points in time following their index incidents. Log-rank tests were used to identify whether there were differences in time to a recidivism incident based on perpetrators' characteristics or recorded family violence histories.

Findings

Perpetrator characteristics

A total of 30,695 unique perpetrators were recorded by police for at least one family violence incident in 2010/11, though not all data items were recorded for every perpetrator or every index incident. Of those where sex of the perpetrator was recorded ($n=30,562$), 77% ($n=23,427$) were male and 23% ($n=7,135$) were female. The median age of perpetrators at the time of their index incident was 34 years old, and the mean age was 34.29 ($SD=12.52$).

Within the cohort, sex and age group at time of index incident were statistically associated ($p < .01$), with female perpetrators more likely to fall into younger age categories: 4% of females compared with 2% of males were aged 10 to 14; 13% of females compared with 9% of males were aged 15 to 19; and 14% of females compared with 13% of males were aged 20 to 24 at the time of their index incident. On the other hand, male perpetrators more likely to fall into slightly older age categories at the time of their index incident: 13% of males compared with 11% of females were aged 25 to 29; 15% of males compared with 13% of females were aged 30 to 34; and 15% of males compared with 14% of females were 35 to 39 years old. The proportions and numbers of male and female perpetrators that fell into each age category are detailed in Table 46.

Table 46. Age and sex of perpetrators

Age group at index incident	Male perpetrators		Female perpetrators		All perpetrators
	n	%	n	%	n	%
10 to 14	428	2%	266	4%	694	2%
15 to 19	2,031	9%	900	13%	2,931	10%
20 to 24	3,020	13%	975	14%	3,995	13%
25 to 29	3,111	13%	803	11%	3,914	13%
30 to 34	3,378	15%	880	13%	4,258	14%
35 to 39	3,440	15%	1,011	14%	4,451	15%
40 to 44	3,025	13%	916	13%	3,941	13%
45 to 49	2,020	9%	573	8%	2,593	9%
50 to 54	1,186	5%	325	5%	1,511	5%
55 to 59	644	3%	169	2%	813	3%
60 to 64	371	2%	89	1%	460	2%
65 to 69	220	1%	42	1%	262	1%
70 to 79	187	1%	44	1%	231	1%
80 or older	45	0.2%	5	0.1%	50	0.2%
Total	23,106	100%	6,698	100%	30,104	100%

Relationship between perpetrator and victim was recorded for the majority (89% or 27,422) of index incidents. Overall, for 65% of those incidents the type of relationship between perpetrator and victim was current or former partner and for 35% the type of relationship was other family member. Figure 61 and Table 47 show the proportion and number of index incidents by relationship type according to whether the perpetrator was male or female.

Figure 61. Relationship type by perpetrator sex

Table 47. Relationship type by perpetrator sex

Relationship Type	Male perpetrators		Female perpetrators		All perpetrators
	n	%	n	%	n	%
Boyfriend/ Girlfriend	2,316	10%	518	7%	2,834	9%
De facto	5,185	22%	1,187	17%	6,372	21%
Married	3,812	16%	765	11%	4,577	15%
Same sex	86	0%	71	1%	157	1%
Separated	2,745	12%	653	9%	3,398	11%
Divorced	343	2%	90	1%	433	1%
Subtotal – Current or Former Partner	14,487	62%	3,284	46%	17,771	58%
Parent/Child	4,030	17%	2,125	30%	6,155	20%
Other family member	2,411	10%	959	13%	3,370	11%
Subtotal – Other family relationships	6,441	27%	3,084	43%	9,525	31%
Relationship type not recorded	2,499	11%	767	11%	3,266	11%
Total	23,427	100%	7,135	100%	30,562	100%

Perpetrators' recorded family violence histories

Data was extracted to determine perpetrators' number of prior recorded family violence incidents. As shown in Figure 62, the majority of perpetrators (60%, n=18,598) did not have a prior family violence incident recorded by police. However, 17% (n=5,135) had one prior incident recorded and a further 13% (n=3,965) had two or three prior incidents recorded. These prior incidents did not necessarily relate to the same victims.

Data relating to recorded offences for breaches of family violence intervention orders (dating back to the 2004/05 financial year) prior to the date of their index incident was also extracted. Again, these orders were not necessarily related to the victim involved in the index incident. Nevertheless, 91% (n=27,843) of perpetrators had no prior recorded breaches of family violence orders, 7% (n=2,087) had one prior breach of a family violence order and 2% (n=765) had two or more breaches of family violence orders.

Figure 62. Number of prior family violence incidents recorded

Index incident characteristics

In 2010/11 the risk factors recorded on the L17 were similar but not identical to those outlined in the Common Risk Assessment Framework (CRAF; Department of Human Services, 2012). Both the L17 and the CRAF include risk factors that are relevant to victims, perpetrators and relationships between victims and perpetrators. Tables 48 and 49 show the risk factors that are included on the CRAF, the equivalent risk factors that were included on the L17 in 2010/11 and the proportion and number of index incidents where these risk factors were recorded as being present by police. As shown, most risk factors were only recorded for a very small proportion of index incidents. It should be noted, however, that while a number of CRAF risk factors in fact relate to the perpetrator's entire history of family violence behaviour, the equivalent L17 risk factors in 2010/11 appear to be related only to the current family violence incident police were recording at the time. For example, the CRAF indicates an escalated risk if the perpetrator 'has ever tried to choke victim', and the equivalent L17 risk factor seems to indicate escalated risk if the perpetrator 'choked AFM' in the current incident.

Table 48. Victim and relationship risk factors present at index incidents

CRAF risk factor description	L17 Risk Factor(s) description	Police recorded initial incidents in 2010/11 with risk factor present
		%	n
Victim risk factors
Pregnancy/new birth	Pregnancy/new birth	5.5	1,685
Depression/ mental health issue	Depression/mental health issue	9.5	2,912
Drug/alcohol misuse	Alcohol use possible	13.1	4,012
	Alcohol use definite	14.9	4,578
	Drug use possible	9.5	2,918
	Drug use definite	1.7	522
Suicidal ideas/attempted suicide	Suicidal ideas/ attempted suicide	1.0	300
Social isolation	Isolation	2.9	876
Relationship risk factors
Recent separation	Recent separation	24.7	7,593
Escalation/increase in severity/frequency	Escalation – increase in severity or frequency	6.7	2,046
Financial difficulties	Financial difficulties	9.5	2,918

Table 49. Perpetrator risk factors present at index incidents

CRAF risk factor description	L17 Risk Factor(s) description	Police recorded index incidents in 2010/11 with risk factor present
		%	n
Perpetrator risk factors
Use of weapon in most recent event	Firearms threatened/ used	0.7	210
	Weapons (not firearms) used	1.3	411
Access to weapons	Perpetrator has firearms license	1.5	451
	Firearm(s) present at address	0.5	149
Has ever harmed/threatened to harm victim	Harmed/threatened to harm AFM	15.1	4,642
Has ever tried to choke victim	Choked AFM	2.8	852
Has ever threatened to kill victim	Threatened to kill AFM	4.2	1,283
Has ever harmed/threatened to harm/kill children	Harmed or threatened harm/kill children	1.2	360
Has ever harmed/threatened to harm/kill other family members	Harmed or threatened harm/kill family	1.5	453
Has ever harmed/threatened to harm/kill pets	Harmed or threatened harm/kill pets	0.4	138
Has ever threatened/ attempted suicide	Suicidal ideas/attempted suicide	3.0	918
Stalking of the victim	Stalked AFM	1.5	457
Sexual assault of the victim	Sexual assault of AFM	1.2	367
Previous/current breach of intervention order	Breach of current/previous IO	3.5	1,064
Drug/alcohol misuse	Alcohol use possible	15.2	4,658
	Alcohol use definite	24.0	7,354
	Drug use possible	15.4	4,723
	Drug use definite	4.5	1,368
Obsession/jealous behaviour towards victim	No L17 equivalent	-	-
Controlling behaviour	Controlling behaviours	15.4	4,719
Unemployment	Unemployed	8.5	2,618
Depression/ mental health issue	Depression/mental health issue	13.5	4,154
History of violent behaviour	History violent behaviour	7.1	2,165

Of the 33 risk factors listed in Table 49 above, the maximum number recorded at any incident was 20. Figure 63 shows the total number of risk factors recorded at each incident and Figure 64 shows the number of risk factors recorded by police by relationship type between perpetrator and victim. As shown, the majority of incidents across all relationship types had between one and four risk factors recorded and a slightly higher proportion of incidents between those who were separated or in a de facto relationship had five or more risk factors recorded at the index incident.

Figure 63. Total number of risk factors recorded at index incident

Figure 64. Number of risk factors recorded at index incident by relationship between perpetrator and victim

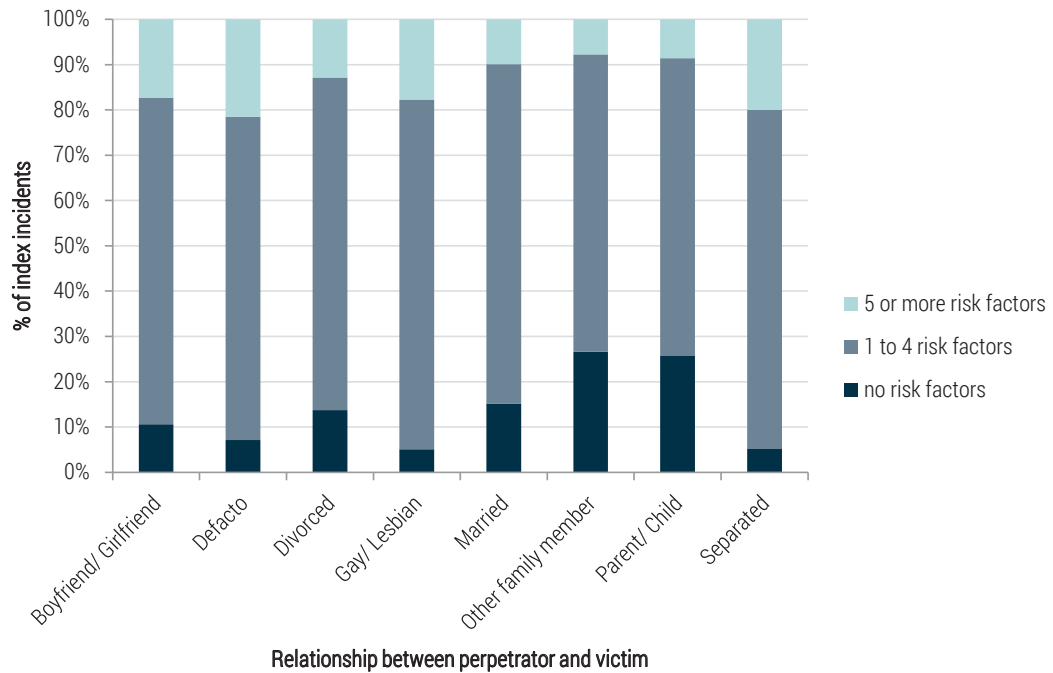

Table 50. Number of risk factors by relationship between perpetrator and victim

Relationship Type	No risk factors		1 to 4 risk factors		5 or more risk factors
	n	%	n	%	n	%
Boyfriend/ Girlfriend	301	11%	2,050	72%	492	17%
De facto	455	7%	4,562	71%	1,373	21%
Married	699	15%	3,462	75%	457	10%
Same sex	8	5%	122	77%	28	18%
Separated	177	5%	2,559	75%	683	20%
Divorced	60	14%	321	73%	56	13%
Parent/Child	1,585	26%	4,059	66%	529	9%
Other family member	901	27%	2,221	66%	262	8%
Relationship type not recorded	753	23%	2,144	66%	376	11%

Children were recorded by police as being present at 36% (n=10,945) of index incidents, and police noted the presence of a disability in 3% (n=761) of incidents, though the L17 form did not require police officers to specify whether the victim, the perpetrator or a child present at the time of the incident had a disability. Victim fear level at the time of the incident was recorded for the majority of index incidents (94% or 28,962) incidents. Where this was recorded, 61% (n=17,652) were recorded as 'not fearful', 29% (n=8,299) were recorded as 'fearful', and 10% (n=3,011) were recorded as 'very fearful'. Police also provided an overall risk assessment for 65% (n=19,901) of all index incidents. They assessed the overall risk of further violence as likely for 48% (n=9,465) of those index incidents and as unlikely for the remaining 52% (n=10,436) of incidents.

Police actions

In addition to indicating which risk factors were present at an incident, police officers can record which criminal, civil, referral or other actions they took or intended to take as a result of the family violence incident on the L17 form.

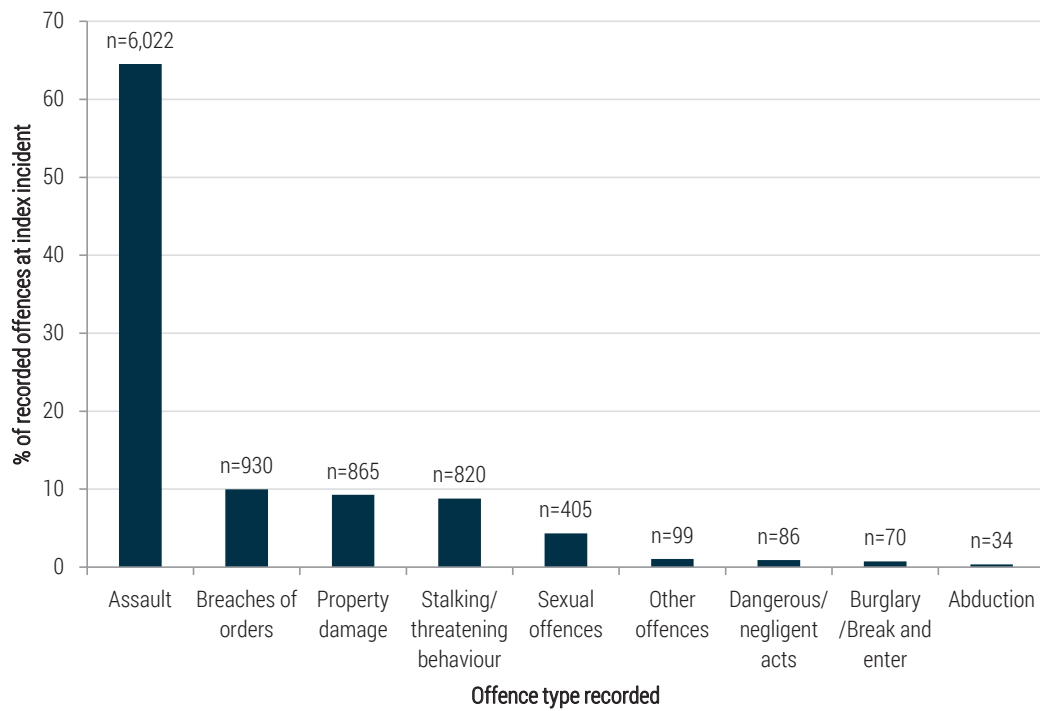

Table 51 shows which police actions were recorded on the L17 for the 30,695 index incidents. In total, 7% (n=2,049) of index incidents did not have any police action recorded. Referral actions were most frequently recorded, with 88% (n=27,058) of incidents recorded as having at least one referral action. Though police recorded taking criminal action for only 17% (n=5,163) of incidents, police offence records arising from these index incidents indicate that criminal offences were actually recorded as a result of 30% (n=9,331) of incidents. While these criminal offences are alleged rather than proven, this may indicate that police criminal actions arising as a result of this cohorts' index incidents were underreported on the L17 form.

Table 51. Actions recorded by police at index incidents

Action Type	Action	Police recorded initial incidents in 2010/11 with action recorded
		%	n
Criminal	Charges pending (breach and other)	1.7	513
	Charges pending (breach only)	2.1	641
	Charges pending (other only)	11.8	3,617
	Perpetrator bailed with conditions	3.1	947
	Perpetrator remanded in custody	0.5	162
Sub-total of incidents with one or more criminal actions		16.8	5,163
Civil	FVSN issued	9.8	3,010
	FVIO application and warrant	10.9	3,350
	FVIO application and summons	4.2	1,286
	Police applying for FVIO	2.4	742
	AFM applying for FVIO	2.9	905
Sub-total of incidents with one or more civil actions		28.6	8,771
Referral	Women's Domestic Violence Crisis Centre	1.4	439
	Formal referral AFM	39.1	12,004
	Formal referral perpetrator	27.7	8,488
	Informal referral AFM	48.8	14,981
	Informal referral perpetrator	36.3	11,123
	Child protection (DHS)	14.4	4,419
Sub-total of incidents with one or more referral actions		88.2	27,058
Other	Holding direction	2.7	826
	Holding detention	1.9	579
	Weapons seized	0.4	122
	Revoke firearm license	0.2	51
Sub-total of incidents with one or more other actions		4.7	1,449

Figure 65 shows the principal offence for the 30% of family violence index incidents that resulted in offences being recorded. The principal offence is the most serious offence recorded for the incident, as defined by the CSA's offence index (Crime Statistics Agency, 2015). As shown, assault offences were by far the most commonly recorded offences (65% or 6,022 of all recorded offences).

Figure 65. Types of recorded offences arising from index incidents

Overall recidivism rates

Overall, just over half (51%, n=15,611) of all perpetrators recorded for at least one incident in 2010/11 were recorded for a further family violence incident between the time of their index incident and the end of March 2015, and 49% (n=15,084) were not recorded for a further incident. Figure 66 shows the number of incidents recorded per perpetrator for all recidivist perpetrators. The median number of re-incidents amongst recidivist perpetrators who did have a recidivism incident was two and the mean number of re-incidents was 3.35 (SD=3.43).

Figure 66. Number of repeat incidents perpetrated

Recidivism by perpetrator and index incident characteristics

Table 52 presents the results for the analyses of the bivariate relationships between perpetrator characteristics and history factors, and whether or not perpetrators were recorded for a recidivism incident. Significant relationships were found between all of the perpetrator characteristics analysed and recidivism. Specifically, the nature of these relationships was that:

- Males were more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident: they made up 81% of those recorded for a recidivism incident were males compared with only 72% of those not recorded for a recidivism incident.
- People aged younger than 34 at the time of their index incident were more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident, whereas people aged 45 or older were less likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident.
- A higher proportion of perpetrators were recorded for recidivism incidents where the relationship type between perpetrator and victim was de facto (24% of recidivist perpetrators compared to 17% of non-recidivist perpetrators) or boyfriend/girlfriend (10% of recidivist perpetrators compared to 8% of non-recidivist perpetrators). Where the relationship was divorced, married or other family member, perpetrators were less likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident.
- Perpetrators who had previously been recorded for family violence incidents were more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident. Those recorded for one or two prior incidents made up 31% of recidivist perpetrators compared with 19% of non-recidivist perpetrators, and those recorded for three or more prior incidents made up 23% of recidivist perpetrators compared with just 6% of non-recidivist perpetrators. On the other hand those with no prior recorded incidents made up 76% of non-recidivist perpetrators and 46% of recidivist perpetrators.
- Perpetrators who were recorded for a breach of a family violence order prior to their index incident were more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident. They made up 14% of recidivist perpetrators compared with just 4% of non-recidivist perpetrators.

Further analysis: police recorded family violence recidivism 120

Table 52. Relationships between perpetrator characteristics and recidivism

	Perpetrators not recorded for further incidents		Recidivist perpetrators		Significance p
	n	%	n	%
Sex (n=30,562)					<.0001
Male	10,740	72	12,687	81
Female	4,206	28	2,929	19
Age at index incident (n=30,221)					<.0001
10 to 14	278	1.9	418	2.7
15 to 19	1,267	8.5	1,668	10.9
20 to 24	1,785	11.9	2,215	14.5
25 to 29	1,719	11.5	2,202	14.4
30 to 34	1,970	13.2	2,306	15.1
35 to 39	2,119	14.2	2,350	15.4
40 to 44	2,033	13.6	1,926	12.6
45 to 49	1,491	10.0	1,119	7.3
50 to 54	948	6.3	575	3.8
55 to 59	574	3.8	249	1.6
60 to 64	339	2.3	124	0.8
65 to 69	199	1.3	63	0.4
70 to 79	170	1.1	61	0.2
80 or older	44	0.3	9	0.1
Relationship between victim and perpetrator (n=27,422)					<.0001
Boyfriend/girlfriend	1,288	8.4	1,555	10.1
De facto	2,569	16.8	3,821	24.8
Divorced	266	1.7	171	1.1
Gay/lesbian	91	0.6	67	0.4
Married	2,746	18.0	1,872	12.1
Separated	1,639	10.7	1,780	11.6
Parent/child	3,160	20.7	3,013	19.6
Other family member	1,896	12.4	1,488	9.7
Perpetrator's number of recorded prior FV incidents (n=30,695)					<.0001
None	11,540	75.5	7,058	45.8
1 to 2	2,891	18.9	4,769	30.9
3 or more	853	5.6	3,584	23.3
Whether perpetrator has prior recorded breaches of FV orders (n= 30,695)					<.0001
No	14,652	95.9	13,191	85.6
Yes	632	4.1	2,220	14.4

The relationships between age group at time of index incident and recidivism and relationship type and recidivism are also depicted graphically in Figures 67 and 68 below.

Figure 67. Recidivism by age group at time of index incident

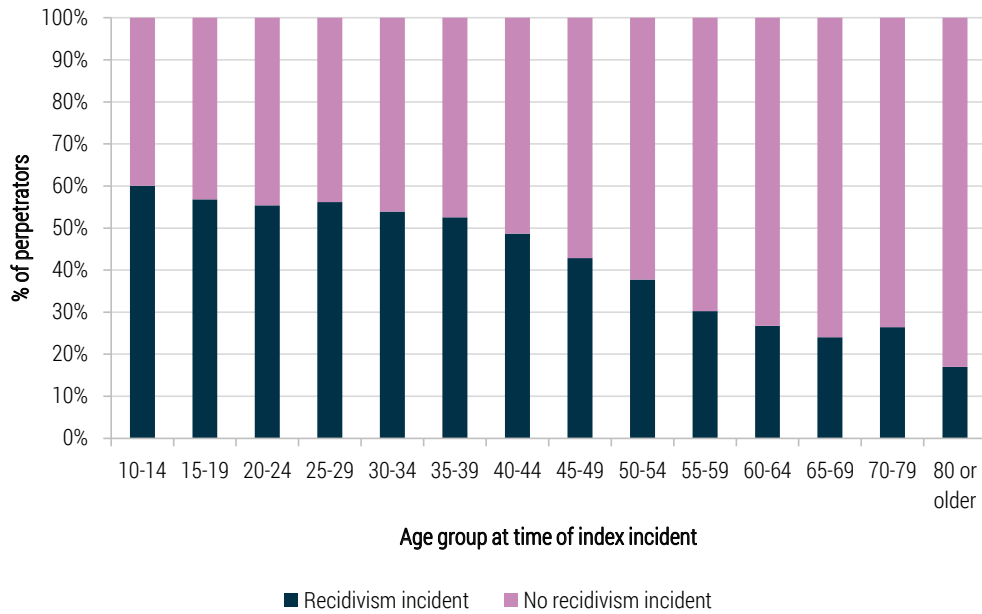

Figure 68. Recidivism by relationship type between perpetrator and victim

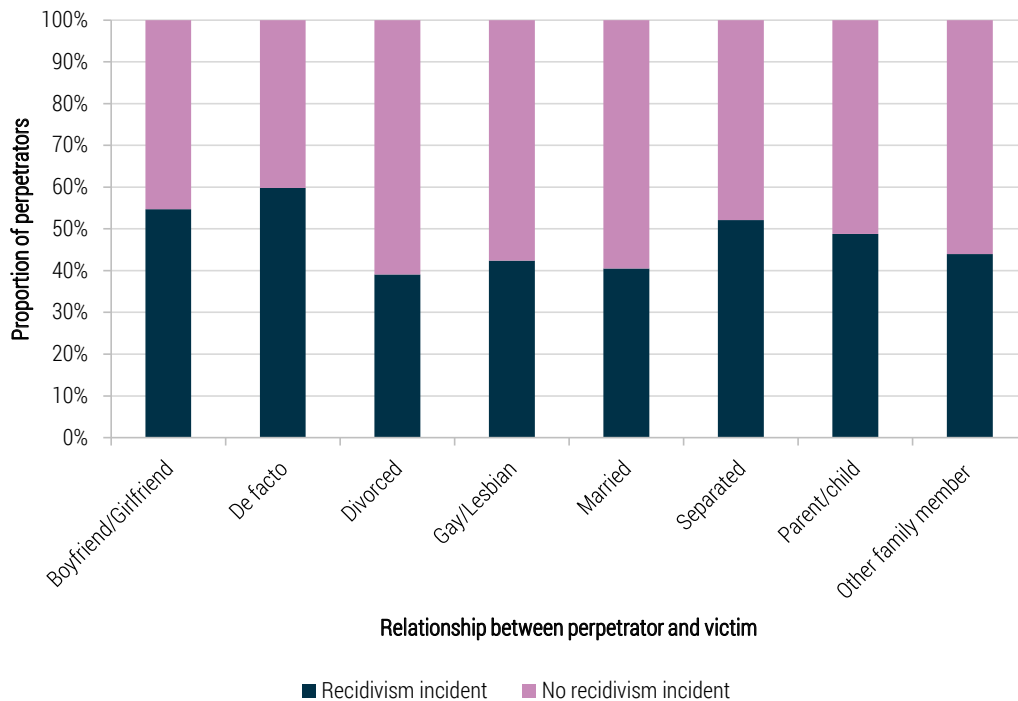

Table 53 shows the relationship between recorded index incident characteristics and recidivism. Again, all of these characteristics had significant relationships with recidivism. Where victim fear level was recorded as 'not fearful' at the index incident, perpetrators were less likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident. These perpetrators made up 58% of recidivist perpetrators compared with 64% of non-recidivist perpetrators. On the other hand, where victim fear level was 'fearful' or 'very fearful' perpetrators were more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident. They made up 30% of recidivist compared with 27% of non-recidivist perpetrators where victims were 'fearful', and 11% of recidivist compared with 9% of non-recidivist perpetrators where victims were 'very fearful'.

Where police made an assessment of future risk of violence, they assessed the risk as 'unlikely' for 45% of recidivist perpetrators and as 'likely' for the remaining 55%. Conversely, they assessed the risk as 'unlikely' for 60% of non-recidivist perpetrators, and as 'likely' for the remaining 40%. Overall, the police officer's assessment of further violence was 'correct' (to the extent that further incidents did or did not come to the attention of police within the analysis window) in 57% (n=11,369) of index incidents, indicating that their assessments were slightly better than chance at predicting recidivism over this timeframe. Recorded presence of children and presence of a disability at the index incident were both associated with a slightly increased likelihood of recidivism.

Table 53. Relationships between index incident characteristics and recidivism

	Perpetrators not recorded for further incidents		Recidivist perpetrators		Significance P
	n	%	n	%
Victim fear level (n=28,962)					<.0001
Not fearful	9,007	63.6	8,645	58.3
Fearful	3,836	27.1	4,463	30.2
Very fearful	1,319	9.4	1,692	11.4
Police overall assessment of risk of further violence (n=19,901)					<.0001
Unlikely	5,837	59.7	4,599	45.3
Likely	3,933	40.3	5,532	54.7
Whether children were present at index incident (n=30,695)					<.0001
No	10,132	66.3	9,618	62.4
Yes	5,152	33.7	5,793	37.6
Whether disability was present at index incident (n=30,695)					.02
No	14,937	97.7	14,997	97.3
Yes	347	2.3	414	2.7

Tables 54 and 55 show the bivariate relationships between recidivism and each of the risk factors recorded by police at the index incident. These tables provides slightly different information to the previous tables in this section. They present both the number and proportion of recidivist perpetrators who did not have a specific risk factor recorded at their index incident compared to those that did have the risk factor recorded. Where the 'significance level' column indicates a significant relationship, and the proportion of recidivists that did have the risk factor present is larger than the proportion that did not, this indicates a positive relationship between presence of the risk factor and recidivism.

As shown, the analyses indicated that there were significant associations between the majority of risk factors and recidivism. Risk factors that did not have an association with recidivism included: victim depression/mental health issue; victim suicidal ideas/attempted suicide; recent separation; perpetrator use of weapons (not firearms); perpetrator harmed or threatened to harm/kill children; and, perpetrator stalked victim.

Table 54. Bivariate relationships between victim and relationship risk factors and recidivism

L17 form risk factors	Perpetrators without risk factor present who had a recidivism incident		Perpetrators with risk factor present who had a recidivism incident		Significance p
	n	%	n	%
Victim risk factors
Pregnancy/new birth	14,323	49.4	1,088	64.6	<.001
Depression/mental health issue	13,949	50.2	1,462	50.2	Not Significant
Alcohol use possible	13,155	49.3	2,256	56.2	<.001
Alcohol use definite	12,876	49.3	2,535	55.4	<.001
Drug use possible	13,556	48.8	1,855	63.6	<.001
Drug use definite	15,060	49.9	351	67.2	<.001
Suicidal ideas/attempted suicide	15,249	50.2	162	54.0	Not Significant
Social isolation	15,011	50.3	400	45.7	.01
Relationship risk factors
Recent separation	11,617	50.3	3,794	50.0	Not Significant
Escalation – increase in severity or frequency	14,238	49.7	1,173	57.3	<.001
Financial difficulties	13,815	49.7	1,596	54.7	<.001

Table 55. Bivariate relationships between perpetrator risk factors and recidivism

L17 form risk factors	Perpetrators without risk factor present who had a recidivism incident		Perpetrators with risk factor present who had a recidivism incident		Significance level
	n	%	n	%	p
Perpetrator risk factors present
Firearms threatened/used	15,322	50.3	89	42.4	.02
Weapons (not firearms) used	15,187	50.1	224	54.5	Not Significant
Perpetrator has firearms license	15,245	50.4	166	36.8	<.001
Firearms present	15,356	50.3	55	36.9	<.001
Harmed/threatened to harm AFM	12,663	48.6	2,748	59.2	<.001
Choked AFM	14,927	50.0	484	56.8	<.001
Threatened to kill AFM	14,657	49.8	754	58.8	<.001
Harmed or threatened harm/kill children	15,213	50.1	198	55.0	Not Significant
Harmed or threatened harm/kill family	15,136	50.0	275	60.7	<.001
Harmed or threatened harm/kill pets	15,328	50.2	83	60.1	<.001
Suicidal ideas/attempted suicide	14,887	50.0	524	57.1	<.001
Stalked AFM	15,166	50.2	245	53.6	Not significant
Sexual assault of AFM	15,272	50.4	139	37.9	<.001
Breach of current/previous Intervention Order	14,676	49.5	735	69.1	<.001
Alcohol use possible	12,805	49.2	2,606	55.9	<.001
Alcohol use definite	11,295	48.4	4,116	56.0	<.001
Drug use possible	12,372	47.6	3,039	64.3	<.001
Drug use definite	14,498	49.4	913	66.7	<.001
Controlling behaviours	12,902	49.7	2,509	53.2	<.001
Unemployment	13,744	49.0	1,667	63.7	<.001
Depression/mental health issue	13,098	49.4	2,313	55.7	<.001
History of violent behaviour	13,994	49.1	1,417	65.7	<.001

Finally, analyses were conducted to determine whether there were bivariate relationships between police actions recorded on the L17 and whether a perpetrator goes on to be recorded for a recidivism incident. The results of these analyses are presented in Table 56. All actions taken by police that had significant relationships with recidivism were associated with a slightly increased likelihood of recidivism, with the exception of informal referrals for both perpetrators and victims, and revocation of firearms licenses. For example, of all perpetrators where police recorded the criminal action 'charges pending (breach and other)', 68% were recorded for a recidivism incident, whereas when police did not record this action, 50% went on to be recorded for a recidivism incident.

A significant relationship was found between whether recorded criminal offences arose from the index incident and recidivism, though the size of the relationship was very small. Where offences were recorded, 51% (n=4,800) of perpetrators were recorded for a recidivism incident, whereas where no offences were recorded 50% (n=10,611) were recorded for a recidivism incident.

Table 56. Bivariate relationships between police recorded

Action	Recidivism following index incidents where action was not recorded		Recidivism following index incidents where action was recorded		Significance level
	n	%	n	%
Criminal Actions
Charges pending (breach and other)	15,062	49.9	349	68.0	<.001
Charges pending (breach only)	14,993	49.9	418	65.2	<.001
Charges pending (other only)	13,555	50.1	1,856	51.3	Not Significant
Perpetrator bailed with conditions	14,867	50.0	544	57.4	<.001
Perpetrator remanded in custody	15,310	50.1	101	62.3	.002
Civil Actions
FVSN issued	13,785	49.8	1,626	54.0	<.001
FVIO application and warrant	13,564	49.6	1,847	55.1	<.001
FVIO application and summons	14,745	50.1	666	51.8	Not Significant
Police applying for FVIO	15,022	50.2	389	52.4	Not Significant
AFM applying for FVIO	14,944	50.2	467	51.6	Not Significant
Referral Actions
Women's Domestic Violence Crisis Centre	15,178	50.2	233	53.1	Not Significant
Formal referral AFM	9,088	48.6	6,323	52.7	<.001
Formal referral perpetrator	10,966	49.4	4,445	52.4	<.001
Informal referral AFM	8,045	51.2	7,366	49.2	<.001
Informal referral perpetrator	9,948	50.8	5,463	49.1	.004
Child protection (DHS)	13,035	49.6	2,376	53.8	<.001
Other Actions
Holding direction	14,955	50.1	456	55.2	.004
Holding detention	15,063	50.0	348	60.1	<.001
Weapons seized	15,356	50.2	55	45.1	Not Significant
Revoke firearm license	15,393	50.2	18	35.3	.03

Final recidivism model

All of the factors that were identified as having significant bivariate relationships with likelihood of recidivism in the previous section were included in a logistic regression model to explore which combination of these variables had the most predictive validity in determining who, following their index incident, went on to be recorded for a recidivism incident. The final model excludes any variables that do not have any relationship with recidivism, when the effects of all other possible predictor variables are taken into account.

Note that this technique excludes perpetrators who had missing data on one or more of the variables included in the model. The final model was based on 17,792 perpetrators. The majority of perpetrators excluded were missing data on police assessment of risk of future violence at the index incident.

The overall adequacy of the model was assessed according to its ability to discriminate between those perpetrators who went on to be recorded for a recidivism incident and those who were not, using the ROC Area Under the Curve statistic (AUC). In other words, this statistic can be interpreted as the likelihood that the model will produce a higher predicted probability of recidivism for recidivist perpetrators compared with non-recidivist perpetrators. The better the model's overall ability to discriminate between recidivist and non-recidivist perpetrators, the more accuracy the model, (and the information on factors included in the model as recorded by police at the index incident), have in predicting recidivism. An AUC of 0.5 indicates the model has no ability to discriminate, an AUC between 0.7 and 0.8 indicates acceptable ability to discriminate, an AUC between 0.8 and 0.9 is considered to have excellent ability to discriminate, and an AUC greater than 0.9 is considered to have outstanding discrimination (Hosmer and Lemeshow, 2000). The AUC for the final model presented here was 0.72 (95% Confidence Interval: 0.71, 0.73), indicating that there is a 72% chance that the final recidivism model will produce a higher probability of recidivism for recidivist perpetrators in the 2010/11 cohort, and the model has acceptable ability to discriminate between those who will and will not go on to be recorded for a recidivism incident.

The final predictor variables included in the model are presented in Table 57. These are the factors that contribute significantly to predicting recidivism, taking into account the effects of all other variables included in the model. The odds ratio column can be interpreted as the likelihood that a perpetrator with that characteristic will go on to be recorded for a recidivism incident. For example, males were 1.53 times more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident than females.

In summary, the odds ratios presented in Table 57 indicate that:

- Perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident are more likely to be male than female.
- For every year of increase in age at time of incident, the likelihood of being recorded for a recidivism incident decreases slightly.
- Perpetrators whose index incident is against a current or former partner are more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident than those whose index incident is against another type of family member.
- Perpetrators with one to two prior recorded family violence incidents are 2.26 times more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident than those with no prior recorded incidents, and perpetrators with three or more prior recorded incidents are 4.5 times more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident.
- Perpetrators with a prior recorded offence for a breach of a family violence incident are more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident.
- Where police assess future risk of violence as 'likely' at the index incident, perpetrators are more likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident.
- If recorded criminal offences arose from the index incident, perpetrators were slightly less likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident.

- Recidivist perpetrators were more likely to have the following risk factors recorded by police at the time of their index incident: perpetrator unemployed; perpetrator depression/mental health issue; victim pregnancy or new birth; escalation – increase in severity or frequency; perpetrator drug use possible or definite; and/or victim alcohol use possible or definite.
- Perpetrators were less likely to be recorded for a recidivism incident when police recorded victim social isolation or perpetrator possession of a firearms license at the index incident.
- Presence of children at the index incident was associated with a higher likelihood of recidivism.
- The only police recorded action on the L17 form at the index incident that contributed significantly to predicting recidivism in the final model was for criminal charges pending for a breach of a family violence order. Where this action was recorded, it was associated with an increased likelihood of recidivism.

Table 57. Logistic regression model comparing odds of recidivism versus no recidivism

Predictor	Odds Ratio	95% Confidence Interval of the Odds Ratio	Significance level (p)
Sex (male vs female)	1.53	1.42, 1.65	<.001
Age at time of index incident (per additional year of age)	0.98	0.97, 0.98	<.001
Relationship between perpetrator and victim (current or former partner vs other family member)	1.12	1.04, 1.20	.002
Number of prior incidents
1-2 prior incidents	2.26	2.09, 2.43	<.001
3 or more prior incidents	4.50	4.00, 5.06	<.001
Prior breach of FV order	1.47	1.27, 1.69	<.001
Police risk assessment (likely vs unlikely)	1.33	1.24, 1.43	<.001
Whether recorded offences arose from index incident	0.81	0.76, 0.88	<.001
Perpetrator unemployed	1.20	1.06, 1.35	.003
Perpetrator depression/mental health issue	1.56	1.35, 1.80	.002
Perpetrator has firearms license	0.68	0.52, 0.88	.004
Victim pregnancy or new birth	1.83	1.53, 2.19	<.001
Victim isolation	0.78	0.65, 0.94	.009
Escalation – increase in severity or frequency	1.15	1.02, 1.31	.03
Children present at index incident	1.15	1.07, 1.22	<.001
Perpetrator – drug use possible	1.49	1.36, 1.64	<.001
Perpetrator – drug use definite	1.37	1.16, 1.61	.001
Victim – alcohol use possible	1.19	1.08, 1.31	<.001
Victim – alcohol use definite	1.21	1.10, 1.32	<.001
Criminal charges pending for breach of family violence order	1.37	1.07, 1.76	.01

Time between index incident and recidivism incident

The final part of this study explored the time in number of days between index incidents and any recidivism incidents perpetrated, and what factors at the index incident might impact on how long it takes a perpetrator to be recorded for a recidivism incident. Overall for the 2010/11 perpetrator cohort, as the number of incidents they perpetrated increased the time between the incidents decreased. The median number of days between an index and a recidivism incident was 275. For those recorded for a further incident (a third incident), the median number of days between their recidivism and third incident was 156, and for those recorded for a fourth incident, the median number of days between their third and fourth incident was 109 days.

Preliminary analyses were conducted using the Kaplan-Meier procedure to estimate the cumulative proportion of perpetrators who were recorded for a recidivism incident over time. Figure 69 and the final row in Table 58 show the overall proportions of perpetrators who committed a recidivism incident over time. At the six month point around 21% of all perpetrators had been recorded for a recidivism incident, which increased to 39% at 24 months post index incident. Log rank tests were used to examine whether there were differences in these proportions across key groups of perpetrators and the results of these tests are presented in Table 58 and Figures 70 through 74. In summary, these tests showed that recidivism incidents occurred more quickly following the index incident for perpetrators who: were male, fell into a younger age category at the time of their index incident, perpetrated violence against a current or former partner at the index incident, had a history of recorded violence incidents, and/or had previously recorded offences for breaches of family violence orders. In particular, those with a recorded incident and/or breach history were much more likely to have had a recidivism incident six months after their index incident. At the six month point, 40% of those with three or more prior recorded family violence incidents compared with just 14% of those with no prior recorded incidents had been recorded for a recidivism incident, and 39% of those with a prior breach compared to 19% of those with a prior breach had been recorded for a recidivism incident. The differences in time to a recidivism incident based on the relationship between perpetrator and victim were small but still statistically significant.

Figure 69. Overall proportion recorded for a recidivism incident over time

Table 58. Proportion of perpetrators recorded for recidivism incidents at 6, 12 and 24 months post-index incident

Grouping variable	Proportion recorded for a recidivism incident at 6 months post-index incident	Proportion recorded for a recidivism incident at 12 months post-index incident	Proportion recorded for a recidivism incident at 24 months post-index incident	Significance level for difference between groups (p)
Sex				<.001
Male	22.2%	31.0%	41.9%
Female	15.9%	22.0%	29.9%
Age at index incident				<.001
Younger than 18	25.2%	34.9%	45.4%
18 to 34	22.6%	31.3%	43.0%
35 to 49	20.0%	28.4%	37.8%
50 or older	13.3%	18.0%	25.1%
Relationship between perpetrator and victim				<.001
Current or former partner	21.7%	30.2%	40.9%
Other family member	18.8%	26.2%	35.8%
Number FV incidents recorded prior to index incident				<.001
None	14.0%	19.7%	27.8%
1 to 2	25.5%	36.3%	48.7%
3 or more	40.0%	54.0%	69.1%
Whether a prior breach of an FV order was recorded prior to index incident				<.001
No	18.8%	26.5%	36.2%
Yes	38.7%	51.9%	66.3%
Overall recidivism rate	20.6%	28.8%	39.0%

Figure 70. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident over time by sex

Figure 71. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident by age at index incident

Figure 72. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident over time by relationship type

Figure 73. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident over time by incident history

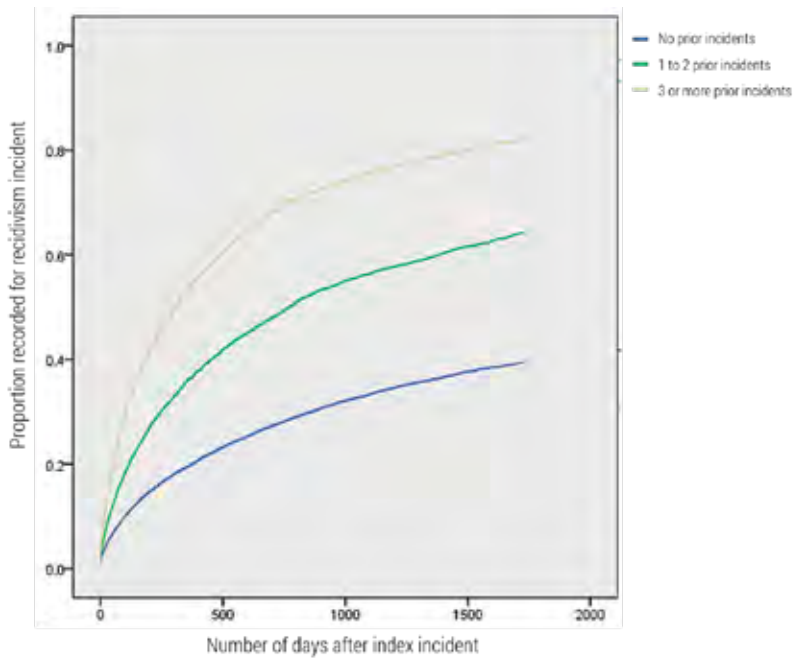

Figure 74. Proportions of perpetrators recorded for a recidivism incident over time by recorded breach of family violence orders history

Discussion

Between 2004/05 and 2013/14, 197,822 individuals were recorded by police as having perpetrated at least one family violence incident. Thirty-seven percent of family violence perpetrators were recorded by police for more than one family violence incident. Of those, 55% were recorded for two incidents, 25% were recorded for three incidents, 14% were recorded for four incidents and the remaining 6% were recorded for five or more incidents. Within the 2010/11 cohort of perpetrators whose recidivism behaviour was analysed in more detail for this research, just over half were recorded for at least one further family violence incident by 30 March 2015.

The median number of days between a first and second incident for recidivist perpetrators in the 2010/11 cohort was 275, and the time between incidents tended to decrease as the number of incidents a perpetrator was recorded for increased. However, a limitation of this study was that some perpetrators may have spent time in custody throughout the study period, reducing their 'free time' to perpetrate offences and data on this was not available to the CSA for inclusion in the study. The potential effect of this is that it could artificially inflate the results of analyses related to time between incidents. This research did not account for unequal 'free time' between perpetrators to commit incidents, which could also lead to imprecise estimations of the true proportions of recidivist perpetrators.

The overall recidivism model highlighted a number of perpetrator, family violence history, and index incident characteristics that contribute significantly to predicting who will go on to be recorded for a recidivism incident. Taken together, all of the information collected by police recorded at index incidents in 2010/11 could only be used to develop a model that, statistically, had 'acceptable' ability to discriminate between recidivist and non-recidivist perpetrators.

A number of L17 risk factors were identified that did not contribute significantly to predicting whether a perpetrator would be recorded for a further incident, though this information may have other value for police in the assessment and management of family incidents and harm arising from them. Perhaps it is the case, for example, that police make use of this information to assess the risk of increased seriousness or frequency, or to establish a risk management strategy for the perpetrator and/or victim. Some of the items that were non-significant predictors in the overall model related to potential harms to victims, information that is of potential relevance for referral agencies. Depending on the objectives of the L17 in terms of what, specifically, it is attempting to predict, this research could be extended to determine which perpetrator or index incident characteristics have validity in predicting seriousness or frequency of recidivism.

Where police recorded their intended actions on the L17 form these were, for the most part, associated with a slightly increased likelihood of recidivism. These results may be biased in the sense that police might be more likely to take action in response to a family violence incident where they perceive an elevated risk of recidivism. In other words, perpetrators involved in incidents where police record actions could already have a higher propensity to perpetrate further incidents before police take such action. A research method termed propensity score matching could be used to control for these existing differences in propensity to re-perpetrate, which would enable more precise evaluation of the true impact of actions taken by police on recidivism levels. Again, this could be an avenue for further analysis in the future.

A number of additional opportunities for further research were identified through the process of conducting the exploratory analysis presented here. First, refinement of the modelling presented here could be achieved by testing the validity of the model for other cohorts of perpetrators (for example, by defining the index incident based on a different year and re-running the modelling process).

Linking data from additional sources to the Victoria Police data used for this analysis could also improve the adequacy of the modelling. As noted above, this study did not include a measure of 'free time to offend'.

Incorporating correctional services data on any time that perpetrators spent in custody following their index incident would enable a more accurate comparison of who goes on to perpetrate further incidents and improved analysis of the time between an index and a recidivism incident. Further, incorporating courts data on whether family violence intervention orders were in place throughout the study period, and the start and end dates of these orders, would enable analysis of the impact of these orders, both on the propensity and time to perpetrate a recidivism incident. Linking these datasets would enable development of a more comprehensive 'time to recidivism' model, incorporating all potential predictors of recidivism.

Prior to the state wide rollout of any new or modified risk assessment tools, a piloting and evaluation process incorporating similar modelling methods to those presented here would assist in determining the validity of these tools in predicting recidivism (or other outcomes of interest). Ideally, any pilots undertaken would involve the identification and use of both control sites and pilot sites so that new tools can be adequately compared with existing practice. Identification of required evaluation data in the planning stage of any pilot would also be vital to ensure the success and rigour of the evaluation.

The background analysis presented in this chapter identified that the 9% of perpetrators that committed five or more family incidents between 2004/05 and 2013/14 were responsible for 34% of all family violence incidents. Statistical analysis to determine whether these perpetrators are significantly different from other perpetrators recorded for family violence could provide useful insights for targeting family violence policy and practice. It could also be instructive to analyse in detail the characteristics and family violence histories of those who perpetrate very serious family violence incidents.

This study did not consider the extent to which an individual perpetrator commits violence against one or multiple victims, though future research could examine this. Finally, analysis of the relationships between perpetrators' recorded family violence incidents and other recorded offence types, such as drug offences and non-family violence related assaults, could provide additional insights into the behaviours of family violence perpetrators over time.

15. Gaps and opportunities to improve the family violence database

Introduction

The Family Violence Database (FVDB) offers a rich source of information about the incidence and prevalence of family violence from a range of perspectives. The Database provides value by bringing together information from disparate datasets and providing an evidence base for understanding family violence in Victoria. While these datasets offer a useful overall picture, there are opportunities to amend and improve the FVDB.

The Crime Statistics Agency (CSA), as part of its work for the Royal Commission into Family Violence, conducted a data gap analysis exercise, in conjunction with the collection and production of the most recent statistics for the FVDB. This was conducted to ascertain how data that contributes to the Database is collected and whether data is collected consistently across agencies, to highlight any areas for improvement and to identify opportunities to implement best practice initiatives aimed at ensuring the FVDB is of maximum utility going forward.

This chapter outlines the data gap analysis conducted. The chapter:

- provides an overview of the datasets currently collected under the FVDB,
- summarises the common data items collected within each of the datasets,
- outlines the findings of data provider consultations conducted by the CSA,
- notes some of the challenges associated with collecting consistent, high-quality family violence information, and,
- identifies opportunities to improve the family violence evidence base in Victoria to support decision-making and service provision.

At a micro level, there are specific advantages and disadvantages associated with the way data is collected within each of the datasets included in the FVDB. However, the gap analysis presented here focuses on general themes and practices across the Database and provides recommendations based on its key overarching limitations. It also highlights agencies that undertake best practice data collection activities, with the aim of promoting consistency across datasets to ultimately improve the overall quality and efficacy of the data contained in the FVDB.

About the datasets

At present, the following datasets are included in the Victorian FVDB:

- The Law Enforcement Assistance Program (LEAP) – Victoria Police
- Lizard (Court Services Victoria)
- Courtlink (Court Services Victoria)
- Victorian Emergency Management Dataset (VEMD) – Department of Health and Human Services
- Victorian Legal Aid datasets (VLA)
- Victims Assistance Program (VAP) and Victims of Crime (VoC) helpline – Department of Justice and Regulation
- Integrated Reporting Information System (IRIS)
- Supported Accommodation Assistance Program(SAAP)/Specialist Housing Services Collection(SHSC) – Department of Health and Human Services and the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare

These datasets are described in more detail in Chapter 2. Datasets are derived from different systems, and the age and technological capacity of the systems used to generate the data varies greatly across agencies. This means that data collection activities are more difficult for some agencies than others.

Overview of data collection activities

In general, information collected by each agency was of a high quality, as all agencies reliably recorded the relevant family violence indicators and primary personal characteristics of people. Each of the 6 agencies (across 11 datasets) made family violence data collection a priority, and because of this, each of the data custodians interviewed were acutely aware of technical aspects of data collection activities, as well as the strengths and limitations of their datasets.

The following table provides an overview of information provided by agencies in relation to key characteristics of their datasets and variables collected. This information was obtained through interviews with FVDB data providers. Key demographic characteristics (e.g. age and sex variables) were consistently collected across datasets. However, there were differences across agencies because data items collected by some agencies were peripheral or irrelevant to another agency's core business needs, or because the circumstances under which an individual came into contact with a particular agency were not conducive to the collection or recording of specific data items.

Table 59. Overview of family violence datasets

	LEAP	Lizard	Courtlink	VEMD	VLA	IRIS	VAP/ VoC	SAAP/ SHSC
Size of staff responsible for data entry (approx)	LGE	SML	LGE	LGE	MED	LGE	SML	LGE
Collection of specific variables:
Age	✓	✓	✓*	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Sex	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Aboriginal/ Torres Strait Islander Status	P	P	P	X	✓	P	✓	✓
CALD indicators	P	✓	P	P	✓	✓	P	✓
Disability status	X	P	X	X	✓	P	✓	P
Relationship between parties	✓	✓	✓	X	P	X	X	X
Geographic location	P	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Identifiers recorded that are used across other datasets	P	P	✓	X	X	X	X	X
Data can be linked to other datasets	P	✓	✓	X	P	X	X	X
Automated date fields generated and used	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
High priority data items are mandatory	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Data is compliant with relevant standards and classifications	P	P	P	✓	P	✓	✓	✓
Data quality processes in place to ensure data consistency	P	P	P	✓	P	P	✓	✓

✓ - Yes; X - No; P- Partially collected or quality issues with data

* Courtlink collects approximate age where date of birth cannot be obtained

 Courtlink began collecting Indigenous status information since 2014

 VEMD contains 4 options for recording sex but if the patient is unconscious staff assign a sex based on appearance

As noted, the overall quality of the data contained in the Database was of a good quality, with all datasets containing basic demographic characteristics recorded in similar ways. However, some data items contained less reliable information. These primarily included Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status, and CALD and LGBTI indicators. Only some datasets complied with relevant data standards and classifications. Data quality assurance processes differed between agencies and the existence of such processes was largely dependent upon the size and scale of the dataset, and the priority placed on data quality by the agency.

It should be noted that the CSA has not conducted full quality assurance audits on each of the datasets to assess the accuracy of recording and data input within each agency. Rather, the assessments in this section are based on information provided by data custodians through consultation, along with the CSA's assessment of the level of unknown or missing data in data provided to the FVDB.

Improving the family violence evidence base in Victoria

Through the course of the gap analysis, a series of potential enhancements emerged that would serve to ensure the Database is comprehensive. In turn, these improvements would help to ensure that the Database is of maximum utility as an evidence base to inform family violence related policy and service delivery. The identified enhancements include:

- inclusion of additional data sources
- application of common identifiers to be used for statistical linkage (if deemed feasible)
- more consistent and regular data collection and process audits across all family violence datasets, to improve or retain existing high levels of data quality
- introduction of a family violence data governance group, to facilitate further enhancement to the FVDB into the future, and to enable sharing of best practice amongst data custodians
- compilation of a family violence data framework, which utilises a nationally consistent set of common data items for collection
- clear articulation of whole of government information sharing protocols to reduce the challenges arising from sharing data relating to family violence between agencies for statistical purposes
- commitment to improving the data capture and quality of information in relation to Indigenous and CALD communities, mental health and those with a disability.

At the core of all current and potential future activities related to the Victorian Family Violence Database is an acknowledgment that any data relating to an individual's experience of family violence should be considered privileged and sensitive, and as such should be treated under the appropriate privacy and confidentiality principles outlined by the Victorian Commissioner for Privacy and Data Protection.

Each of these opportunities are discussed in more detail below.

Inclusion of additional data sources

While the current datasets included in the FVDB provide a broad base of information on the prevalence and incidence of family violence relative to specific services or programs delivered by participating agencies, other data holdings are potentially available that would further enhance the evidence available through the Database. Inclusion of additional data may serve to fill gaps identified in existing datasets. Examples of other datasets that may support the current data holdings include:

- Call and Dispatch (CAD) data, specifically related to police and ambulance callouts;
- Ambulance Victoria data;
- Child Protection data;
- Criminal courts data (currently only civil courts data are collected);
- Corrections Victoria data (relating to custodial and community corrections);
- Youth Justice (relating to custodial and community corrections).

Other ancillary datasets, for example, relating to the housing establishment fund, or to family violence identified through emergency responses to natural disasters, may also be useful inclusions. This is not necessarily a comprehensive list of potential datasets that may broaden the scope of the Database.

Additionally, it should be noted that the potential inclusion of further datasets is based on the assumption that family violence related incidents or events can be differentiated in some way from the general events contained in these datasets. This may be by way of an indicator that flags those records related to family violence, or by linking data with other datasets to identify an individual's experience of family violence. For example, police data may be used to identify which individuals under corrections supervision have been involved in a family incident prior to their corrections episode.

Inclusion of additional data sources would of course be dependent upon agreement of data custodians to provide their data in line with FVDB requirements. This may involve preliminary work by FVDB administrators and custodians to ensure their data is prepared appropriately for inclusion.

A Victorian family violence data framework

Although the FVDB incorporates a range of data sources from multiple agencies, the availability of data items and frequency with which this data is collected and disseminated varies. Further, the datasets included in the Database are collected and used independently, without cross-agency consideration of data recording practices or standards.

A family violence data framework could consolidate data activities under an overarching strategic plan that guides the collection, provision and output of timely and relevant family violence information. A framework would also assist in identifying and prioritising key data gaps, and providing a structured set of activities to address these gaps and further improve the FVDB.

The Australian Bureau of Statistics has produced a series of information papers about the collection of nationally consistent family violence data.

These papers could provide the basis for a similar data framework to be designed and implemented in Victoria. Of particular relevance are the following publications:

- Defining the data challenge for family, domestic and sexual violence, Australia, 2013 (Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2013a)
- Bridging the data gaps for family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia, 2013 (Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2013b); and
- Foundation for a National Data Collection and Reporting Framework for family, domestic and sexual violence, 2014 (Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2014a)

Defining the data challenge provides a conceptual framework for family, domestic and sexual violence information. Bridging the data gaps outlines an inventory of the current issues associated with data collection and highlights data gaps present at the national level. It presents priority family violence related policy and research questions that currently remain unanswered due to the lack of consistently available data, and offers strategies and actions required to address critical data gaps. This publication could be used to direct discussions about the utility of Victoria's current family violence data holdings, to align and prioritise current data gaps to those identified as a high priority at the national level, and to identify strategies to address these gaps.

The National Data Collection and Reporting Framework built on the gap analysis, and provides a systematic way of organising data about experiences of family, domestic and sexual violence into information units for statistical collection. It also provides a set of common variables and national standards relating to the person, event and transaction information units relevant to the collection of family violence data. The principles and concepts outlined in this publication could be used to as a foundation document for the compilation of a localised data framework for the consistent collection of high quality family violence data in Victoria.

The purpose of a Victorian family violence data framework document would be to provide a consolidated, single point of reference about the data collection activities and priorities for family violence data in Victoria, including frequency of information provision. A framework would also ensure that any additional dataset or data item inclusions were in line with agreed standards and definitions.

Application of common identifiers

One of the key drawbacks of the current database is the inability to use the same identifiers across the datasets to determine whether individuals are held in common across the datasets. This makes it difficult at present to use the various datasets together to better understand how an individual comes into contact, and interacts, with and across services in Victoria. With the exception of LEAP and Courtlink which share common identifiers in some cases, each of the other datasets contain identifiers that are specific to that dataset. This means that it is currently difficult, for example, to identify through the data which individuals who have come into contact with police, homelessness services and victim assistance programs, and which service they first contacted.

While it is impractical in the current service delivery and ICT environment to expect each agency to implement an identifier that is common amongst all services, and there is often difficulty in reaching agreement as to how the common identifier should be constructed, post-hoc statistical linkages between some datasets may be a feasible option to more effectively understand system pathways of affected family members and perpetrators.

Statistical linkage is a process by which a combination of a person's identifiable details (i.e. name, date of birth, sex for example) are combined to create a de-identified, unique key. Once created, this key can be applied and used across multiple datasets to link information from one dataset to another, through the use of probabilistic matching. As such, it is a way of connecting disparate datasets to create a more useful source of information without significant investments in system upgrades or significant data manipulation.

Linked family violence datasets would allow researchers and data analysts to better understand the lived experience of individuals experiencing family violence, to track their engagement with multiple services through the system and to identify where people are most likely to become disengaged or lose contact with service providers or support programs. Linkages also offer potential utility in terms of enabling identification of the characteristics of high-risk clients (such as those who come into contact with multiple services and programs over extended periods of time). Such information would likely add value to the evidence base for service planning and delivery.

Data consistency and quality

As noted above, the majority of data items currently collected within the FVDB are of a good quality. However, there are particular items that have high proportions of unknown or missing values, which means it is not necessarily possible to use these data items for decision-making.

The overall consistency and quality of the data included in the family violence database varies depending on the agency collecting the data, the demands of their core business and the number of staff responsible for data entry. The gap analysis found that those agencies that restrict data entry to a small number of staff (for example, courts clerks entering data on the Courtlink system, and victims support call takers in entering data into VAP and the victims of crime helpline) had higher levels of quality across their datasets than those agencies who had a large number of staff entering data (for example, Victoria Police).

There are some examples in Victoria of best practice initiatives that agencies have used to address data quality issues in order to ensure data are collected consistently over time. The data in the Victorian Emergency Management Dataset (VEMD), for example, is collected by a number of hospital emergency departments with a variety of IT systems and software. However, a systematic data audit is undertaken across each hospital once every three years, which assists in maintaining consistency and quality between systems and over time. The aim of the audit is to assess each hospital's business processes and data collection activities to ensure compliance with the requirements of the VEMD, and identify business process improvements where required. Such a process could be considered by other agencies collecting family violence related data and scaled relative to the size of the agency to ensure feasibility.

Other examples of quality assurance activities that could be implemented include making key data variables mandatory for completion and/or aligning responses to particular data items to set industry-specific, state, national or international standards.

Data Governance

A transparent governance structure is fundamental to successful implementation of any planned improvements to the FVDB. Data governance involves the overall management of the availability, usability, integrity and security of data assets to ensure that these assets are used appropriately and effectively.

Butler (2011) describes the main objectives of data governance, which are to:

- define, approve, and communicate data strategies, policies, standards, architecture, procedures, and metrics;
- track and enforce conformance to data policies, standards, architecture, and procedures;
- sponsor, track, and oversee the delivery of data management projects and services;
- manage and resolve data related issues; and
- understand and promote the value of data assets.

Senior level steering input is key to an effective data governance structure, in order to set strategic direction and provide an authorising environment for the overall management of data assets in a systematic and accountable way. Some centralisation and coordination of data management, improvement and output activities, and creation of standards and classifications for use across government can be beneficial in coordinating across portfolios and agencies.

At present, the FVDB is managed by two entities (the CSA and the Community Operations and Victims Support Agency) within the Department of Justice and Regulation. The CSA manages the data assets within the Database in line with general data management policies and procedures, and the Community Operations and Victims Support Agency utilise this data in order to create and publish external reports and publications. Under recent changes to FVDB custodianship arrangements, the CSA and the Community Operations and Victims Support Agency have established two working groups to assist in the delivery of data for the database, and to enable broad involvement in the development of content scheduled for output. The primary aim of these groups is to provide advice, comment and feedback to both agencies on outputs to ensure data are being accurately portrayed, and advise about areas where data quality issues may exist on an ongoing basis.

Functionally, these groups are intended to play a key role in the collection, maintenance and output of information from the Database. However, a high level steering committee whose role is to set strategic directions for coordinated family violence data activities across the state does not currently exist. High level leadership can be influential in ensuring coordination and alignment with cross-government needs. It is important for garnering commitment across government and helps to ensure efforts to improve Databases are afforded appropriate levels of authority and priority.

Information sharing across government

Historically, information sharing across government agencies for the purposes of collection, collation and release of findings has been challenging for the FVDB project. While agencies have supported the project and endorsed its value, lack of shared understanding about what data can and cannot be shared between agencies has resulted in lengthy negotiations and timeframes for the provision of data and release of reports summarising findings from the Database. Clarity for data owners about the appropriate processes for data sharing would smooth and speed the process for future iterations of the Database, enabling provision of broader and timelier data for use.

High priority data items

Other sections of this gap analysis have discussed overall data consistency and quality, and the promotion and use of data standards. However, it is worth discussing some specific data items with varying quality, which are collected by some agencies and are of high priority for decision-makers.

This particularly applies to data items collected in relation to the following:

- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Status
- Culturally And Linguistically Diverse (CALD) indicators
- health and disability indicators

A key outcome of more consistently collected data in these areas would enable the development of more tailored and culturally appropriate services and programs. The following sections discuss these in more detail and outline considerations specific to each indicator.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status

Understanding the experience of family violence as it relates to those who identify as Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait islander is highly desirable information for policy making that informs operations and service planning. The collection of an individual's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander status has been standardised by the ABS, who suggest the following standardised question and series of responses be used to determine an individual's Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander status:

Do you identify as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander?

- Yes, Aboriginal
- Yes, Torres Strait Islander
- Yes, both Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander
- Neither Aboriginal nor Torres Strait Islander

According to the ABS, a person should be asked whether they identify as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander each time they come into contact with a service, as it is reasonable to assume that a person's Indigenous status and willingness to self-identify as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander may change over time. Hence, information should continue to be collected even if a person comes into repeat contact with a service, and should be stored appropriately so that a history of responses can be kept within the data.

It is acknowledged that it may not always be possible to record a person's Indigenous status for every incident where an individual comes into contact with an agency or service. However, there is significant room to improve the quality of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander data before coverage will be sufficient to enable robust statistical and research use across datasets within the FVDB.

Culturally and Linguistically Diverse (CALD) indicators

The extent to which information pertaining to family violence experienced by people from CALD backgrounds is available varies, and collection methodologies differ amongst data sources that comprise the FVDB. For example, some agencies collect information about an individual's country of birth or main language spoken at home, while others use operational information to estimate the number of people who come into contact with a service from CALD backgrounds. Most often this information relates to incidents or events where an interpreter is required, where the use of an interpreter is used as a proxy CALD indicator. As a result, there is an opportunity to increase the consistency of CALD data item collection across datasets (though this may be dependent on service context).

Health and disability indicators

Health and disability indicators relate to information collected on whether an individual has a health-related concern or disability that may require a service provider or support agency to provide other facilities or services to accommodate these needs. This relates not only to physical disabilities, but also to mental health.

This information needs to be collected with careful consideration and appropriate sensitivity, and could be collected as a voluntary data item as opposed to being a mandatory field for data collection. This area is a significant challenge from a data collection perspective, but should not be precluded from data enhancement activities.

Conclusion

Overall, the CSA's assessment of the FVDB identified significant value in the existing data holdings. However, there are a number of clear areas where the Database can be strengthened to provide a higher value evidence base to support policy development and operational decision-making. Consideration of the opportunities for improvement identified in this chapter is important in ensuring the continued relevance and utility of the Database going forward.

16. Conclusion

The Victorian FVDB has existed for 15 years, documenting family violence across an increasing range of datasets through a period of immense legislative, cultural, policy and procedural change. The Database remains the sole whole of government project providing a statistical overview of family violence demand and service provision recorded by key agencies involved in responding to family violence in the state. It provides information about the profiles and characteristics of victims and offenders, their service requirements and interactions.

This report has provided an overview of the period of time since the last significant findings from the Database were released, focusing on the 2009-10 to 2013-14 period. In this time increasing demand for family violence-related service has been visible across the datasets included in the Database and across all areas of the state.

The findings in this report indicate that family violence still remains a gendered crime, with the proportion of male and female victims of family violence stable across all agencies in the past 5 years. In 2013-14, three quarters of affected family members in family violence incidents attended by police, two-thirds of the patients presenting to emergency departments for family violence reasons and 69% of family violence victims accessing the Victims Assistance Program were female. In 2013-14, 77% of other parties in family violence incidents attended by police and 78% of respondents to intervention orders in the Magistrates' Court were male.

Family incidents recorded by police show family violence most likely to arise in the context of intimate partnerships for female affected family members, whereas male affected family members who were more likely to be a family member of the other party. The different picture arising for children as victims and witnesses of family violence and for parents and siblings as victims of family violence shows the complexity of the types of incidents the service system has been recording and responding to in the past 5 years.

For the first time in Victoria, the CSA has conducted a recidivism study of alleged family violence perpetrators using Victoria Police data, showing the high proportion of repeat incidents. The analysis revealed that recidivist perpetrators were more likely to be male, younger, perpetrate violence against a current or former partner and have a history of family violence incidents or offences recorded for breaching family violence orders. This study highlights factors predictive of future reappearance in Victoria Police data in relation to a family incident and highlights a range of further work which could shed more light on the factors correlating with recidivism.

The Victorian FVDB has a robust core of datasets and represents a valuable source of diverse information from across government relating to family violence. However, there are elements where the Database can be expanded and improved to ensure it can make an even more significant contribution to the evidence base relating to family violence for Victoria, informing policy, research and decision-making. This paper outlines key gaps and opportunities for enhancement of the Database.

17. Explanatory notes

Reference periods

The data contained within this report covers an annual breakdown of the period from July 2009 to June 2014. Each dataset uses a different date variable to determine which year each counting unit belongs to. The following table outlines the date that is used to determine the relevant year.

Table 60. Date variable used in each data source to determine the relevant reference period

Data source	Date variable
Victoria Police	Create date – date incident was entered into LEAP
Magistrates' and Children's Court	Hearing date – date of the final hearing
Specialist Family Violence Services	First contact date – date of first contact with client
Integrated Reports and Information System	Referral date – referral date of the case
Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset	Date patient presented at emergency department
Victims Assistance Program
Victims of Crime	Date of phone call
Victoria Legal Aid	Date of service – date service was provided
Specialist Homelessness Services Collection	Date support period commenced
Supported Accommodation Assistance Program	Date support period commenced

Rates per 100,000 population

Rates per 100,000 population are derived using the family incident count for the reference period and the most recent Estimated Resident Population (ERP) data.

The family incident rate per 100,000 is calculated using the following formulae:

$$\text{Family incident rate} = (\text{Family incident count} / \text{ERP count}) * 100,000$$

ERPs for both Victoria and Local Government Areas are based on populations provided by the Australian Bureau of Statistics. ERPs for the data in the current reference period are based on population projection estimates developed by the Department of Economic Development, Jobs, Transport and Resources 'Victoria in Future' program. For years prior to the current reference period, the ERP used to calculate offence rates comes from the Regional Population Growth (3218.0) publication.

Regional statistics

In order to produce statistics at a regional level based on a person's residential postcode a concordance was done to map the postcode to a Local Government Area and then to the relevant region.

The postcode to Local Government Area concordance was obtained from the Australian Bureau of Statistics publication, Australian Statistical Geography Standard (ASGS): Correspondences, July 2011 (1270.0.55.006). Where a postcode boundary crossed multiple Local Government Area the area that contained the largest proportion of the postcode was selected.

The regional statistics in this report do not include units that did not have a postcode or had a postcode outside of Victoria.

Table 61. Department of Health and Human Services Regions

Eastern Metropolitan Region	Southern Metropolitan Region	Gippsland Region
Boroondara	Bayside	Bass Coast
Knox	Cardinia	Baw Baw
Manningham	Casey	East Gippsland
Maroondah	Frankston	Latrobe
Monash	Glen Eira	South Gippsland
Whitehorse	Greater Dandenong	Wellington
Yarra Ranges	Kingston
	Mornington Peninsula
	Port Phillip
	Stonnington
Grampians Region	Barwon South Western Region	Loddon Mallee Region
Ararat	Colac-Otway	Buloke
Ballarat	Corangamite	Campaspe
Golden Plains	Glenelg	Central Goldfields
Hepburn	Greater Geelong	Gannawarra
Hindmarsh	Moyne	Greater Bendigo
Horsham	Queenscliffe	Loddon
Moorabool	Southern Grampians	Macedon Ranges
Northern Grampians	Surf Coast	Mildura
Pyrenees	Warrnambool	Mount Alexander
West Wimmera		Swan Hill
Yarriambiack
North & West Metropolitan Region	Hume Region
Banyule	Alpine
Brimbank	Benalla
Darebin	Greater Shepparton
Hobsons Bay	Indigo
Hume	Mansfield
Maribyrnong	Mitchell
Melbourne	Moira
Melton	Murrindindi
Moonee Valley	Strathbogie
Moreland	Towong
Nillumbik	Wangaratta
Whittlesea	Wodonga
Wyndham
Yarra

Table 62. Victoria Police Regions

Eastern Region	Western Region	Southern Metro Region	North West Metro Region
Boroondara	Greater Geelong	Port Phillip	Melbourne
Manningham	Queenscliffe	Stonnington	Yarra
Monash	Surf Coast	Bayside	Hobsons Bay
Whitehorse	Colac-Otway	Glen Eira	Maribyrnong
Knox	Glenelg	Kingston	Wyndham
Maroondah	Southern Grampians	Cardinia	Brimbank
Yarra Ranges	Corangamite	Casey	Melton
Benalla	Moyne	Greater Dandenong	Hume
Mansfield	Warrnambool	Frankston	Moonee Valley
Mitchell	Ballarat	Mornington Peninsula	Moreland
Strathbogie	Pyrenees		Banyule
Greater Shepparton	Golden Plains		Darebin
Alpine	Hepburn		Nilumbik
Moira	Moorabool		Whittlesea
Wangaratta	Hindmarsh
Indigo	Horsham
Towong	West Wimmera
Wodonga	Ararat
Bass Coast	Northern Grampians
South Gippsland	Yarriambiack
Baw	Greater Bendigo
Latrobe	Campaspe
East Gippsland	Central Goldfields
Wellington	Loddon
	Macedon Ranges
	Mount Alexander
	Mildura
	Buloke
	Gannawarra
	Swan Hill

Confidentialisation

Confidentialising data involves removing or altering information or collapsing detail (through application of statistical disclosure controls) to mitigate the risk that a person or organisation may be identified in the data (either directly or indirectly).

Where data contained in this report uses person-based variables and include demographics information the datasets are subject to confidentialisation to ensure the anonymity of individuals is protected. Where cells in a table are between 1 and 3 and there is a reasonable likelihood that a person may be identified from the data published the value is denoted by the figure " ≤ 3 ".

For the purpose of calculating row and column totals, each cell between 1 and 3 is assigned a value of 2, regardless of the true number of that cell. This methodology allows for totals to be calculated in tables with small cells, but does mean that totals for certain variables may not be the same across tables within a set of data tables.

18. Glossary

Family incident

An incident attended by Victoria Police where a Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report (also known as an L17 form) was completed. The report is completed when family violence incidents, interfamilial-related sexual offences, and child abuse are reported to police.

Family incident flag

A family incident flag is attached to any offence arising from an incident where Victoria Police completed a Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report (L17 form). The family incident flag allows the identification of offences that are related to a family incident.

Affected family member – Victoria Police

An 'affected family member' is the individual who is deemed to be affected by events occurring during the family incident. Where an affected family member has been affected by more than one other party within a family incident, they will be counted for each involvement.

Other party

The other individual involved in a family incident is referred to as the 'other party'. The other party could be a current partner, former partner or a family member. Where the other party is involved with multiple affected family members, they will be counted for each involvement.

Police region

A Police Region is a geographical area defined by Victoria Police for operational purposes. There are 4 regions across Victoria each contains a number of Police Service Areas.

L17 Victoria Police Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report

An L17 form refers to the Victoria Police Risk Assessment and Management Report that Victoria Police are required to complete after they have attended a family incident. The report is completed when family violence incidents, interfamilial-related sexual offences, and child abuse are reported to police.

Offence

Any criminal act or omission by a person or organisation for which a penalty could be imposed by the Victorian legal system.

For the purposes of this report, an offence is counted and included in the data where it:

- occurred in Victoria;
- was reported to or detected by Victoria Police; and,
- was first recorded in LEAP within the reference period.

Offences related to a family incident

Offences relating to a family incident refer to those offences that have been linked to a family incident by Victoria Police.

Hazards/Risk factors

The risk factors identified on the Risk Assessment and Risk Management Report are the evidence-based risk and vulnerability factors outlined in the Victoria Police Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence. There are three types of hazards, those relating to the AFM, those relating to the perpetrator and those present in the relationship.

Applicant/Affected family member – Magistrates’ and Children’s Court/Specialist Family Violence Services

An applicant or affected family member is the person/people who have applied for a family violence and have applied for a family violence intervention order. There can be multiple affected family members on the one application.

Respondent

A respondent is the person responding to the application for a family violence intervention order. There is only one respondent on each application.

Duty lawyer services

Duty lawyers provide free legal information, advice and representation to clients. Duty lawyers do not represent everyone and VLA prioritise serious cases, including people who are in custody or at risk of going into custody and people who need intensive support

Legal advice services

Legal advice services include sessions over the telephone or face-to-face at Victoria Legal Aid offices or via outreach services. (Victoria Legal Aid, 2014)

Minor work

Minor work includes assistance and advice (including advocacy services) where there is a need for ongoing assistance and there is a tangible benefit for the client. (Victoria Legal Aid, 2014)

Legal help

Legal help is a service provider of VLA that can give legal advice over the telephone. (Victoria Legal Aid, 2014)

Substantive grants

VLA provide grants of legal assistance to people who are experiencing a legal problem and meet the agency’s eligibility criteria. Grants are provided for certain criminal, family and civil law matters. (Victoria Legal Aid, 2014)

Specialist family violence services

The Specialist Family Violence Service aims to simplify access for affected family members and affected children’s access to the justice system and enhance the safety of affected family members and affected children.

Support worker

Applicant and respondent support workers are available to adults who have experienced family violence and have a case in the Family Violence Court Division.

19. References

Australian Bureau of Statistics, (2013a). Defining the data challenge for family, domestic and sexual violence, Australia.

[online] Canberra: Commonwealth of Australia. Available at:

<http://www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/mf/4529.0/>

Australian Bureau of Statistics, (2013b). Bridging the data gaps for family, domestic and sexual violence, Australia.

[online] Canberra: Commonwealth of Australia. Available at:

<http://www.abs.gov.au/AUSSTATS/abs@.nsf/Lookup/4529.0.00.002Main+Features12013?OpenDocument>

[Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Australian Bureau of Statistics, (2014). Foundation for a National Data Collection and Reporting Framework for family, domestic and sexual violence. [online] Canberra: Commonwealth of Australia. Available at:

<http://www.abs.gov.au/AUSSTATS/abs@.nsf/Lookup/4529.0.00.003Main+Features12014?OpenDocument>

[Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Butler, D. (2011). Master Data Management. [online] Redwood Shores: Oracle. Available at:

<http://www.oracle.com/us/products/applications/master-data-management/resources/index.html> [Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Children's Court of Victoria, (2015). Intervention Orders. [online] Available at:

<http://www.childrenscourt.vic.gov.au/jurisdictions/intervention-orders> [Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Crime Statistics Agency Victoria, (2015). Explanatory notes. [online] Available at:

<http://www.crimestatistics.vic.gov.au/home/about+the+data/explanatory+notes/> [Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Department of Health and Human Services, (2015). Victorian Emergency Minimum Dataset (VEMD) User Manual. 20th

ed. [online] Melbourne: Victorian Government Department of Health and Human Services. Available at:

<http://health.vic.gov.au/hdss/vemd/vemd-manual.htm> [Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Department of Human Services, (2012). Family violence risk assessment and risk management framework and practice guides 1-3. 2nd ed. [online] Melbourne: Victorian Government Department of Human Services. Available at:

http://www.dhs.vic.gov.au/about-the-department/documents-and-resources/policies,-guidelines-and-

legislation/family-violence-risk-assessment-risk-management-framework-manual [Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Department of Justice, (2012). Measuring family violence in Victoria – Victorian Family Violence Database Volume 5: Eleven Year Trend Analysis. Melbourne: Victorian Government Department of Justice.

Hosmer, D. and Lemeshow, S. (2000). Applied Logistic Regression. 2nd ed. Hoboken: John Wiley & Sons.

Magistrates' Court of Victoria, (2015). Family Violence Court Programs. [online] Available at: <https://www.magistratescourt.vic.gov.au/jurisdictions/intervention-orders/family-violence-court-programs> [Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

State Government of Victoria, (2015a). Nothing off limits in family violence royal commission. [online] Available at: <https://4a5b508b5f92124e39ff-ccd8d0b92a93a9c1ab1bc91ad6c9bfdb.ssl.cf4.rackcdn.com/2015/01/150119-Nothing-Off-Limits-In-Family-Violence-Royal-Commission.pdf> [Accessed 30 Sep. 2015].

State Government of Victoria, (2015b). Proposed Terms of Reference – Royal Commission into Family Violence. [online] Available at: <https://4a5b508b5f92124e39ff-ccd8d0b92a93a9c1ab1bc91ad6c9bfdb.ssl.cf4.rackcdn.com/2015/01/150119-Proposed-Terms-of-Reference2.pdf> [Accessed 30 Sep. 2015].

Victoria Legal Aid, (2014). Nineteenth Statutory Annual Report. [online] Melbourne: Victoria Legal Aid. Available at: <http://annualreport.vla.vic.gov.au/> [Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Victoria Police, (2014). Code of practice for the investigation of family violence. 3rd ed. [online] Melbourne: Victoria Police. Available at: http://www.police.vic.gov.au/content.asp?a=internetBridgingPage&Media_ID=464 [Accessed 29 Sep. 2015].

Understanding family violence court proceedings: the impact of family violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria

In recent years there has been a big increase in the number and complexity of family violence-related matters initiated in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria. This has placed unprecedented pressure on the operations of the court and on court users. The Commission wanted to gain a better understanding of the substance and outcomes of particular hearings than could be understood from existing data, as well as of the daily impact of family violence cases on the court and its lists. As part of that, we sought to determine whether courts have sufficient capacity to give adequate time and attention to each matter, provide a considered and appropriate outcome, and ensure safety for victims. This information was used to inform many recommendations made by the Commission.

In collaboration with the Magistrates' Court, the Commission engaged Dr Karen Gelb, a researcher and criminologist, to conduct the research, which involved observation of a number of courts in metropolitan and regional locations and analysis of de-identified case data. Access to individuals' files was restricted to court personnel, so ethics approval was not required.

The courts were chosen on the basis of a 'typical' spread of family violence cases in each type of court. The locations chosen were as follows:

- ▶ Ballarat, Family Violence Division—a large regional court; the region's headquarter court; 1044 family violence intervention order applications finalised in 2014–15
- ▶ Geelong—a large regional court; the region's headquarter court; neither a Family Violence Division nor a specialist court; 1879 FVIO applications finalised
- ▶ Wangaratta—a mid-size regional court; neither a Family Violence Division nor a specialist court; 334 FVIO applications finalised
- ▶ Maryborough—a small regional court; neither a Family Violence Division nor a specialist court; 142 FVIO applications finalised
- ▶ Melbourne—a large metropolitan court; the region's headquarter court, with specialist family violence services; 2656 FVIO applications finalised
- ▶ Sunshine—a busy suburban court, with specialist family violence services; 2907 FVIO applications finalised
- ▶ Dandenong—a large suburban court; neither a Family Violence Division nor a specialist court but does have community-based family violence service providers; the busiest court for finalised FVIO applications in 2014–15, with 3228 finalised applications.

The research methodology included interviews with judicial officers, court staff, duty lawyers from Victoria Legal Aid and community legal services, police, representatives of specialist family violence services, Court Network volunteers and representatives of other services at each court. Applicant and respondent workers were also interviewed in locations where these services are provided. The Commission thanks participants—and, in particular, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria—for their cooperation and assistance.

UNDERSTANDING FAMILY VIOLENCE COURT PROCEEDINGS: THE IMPACT OF FAMILY VIOLENCE ON THE MAGISTRATES' COURT OF VICTORIA

PREPARED FOR THE ROYAL COMMISSION INTO FAMILY VIOLENCE BY

DR KAREN GELB

KAREN GELB CONSULTING
DRKARENGELB@GMAIL.COM

The views expressed in this report are entirely those of Dr Gelb.

CONTENTS

Executive summary	IV
1. Introduction	01
1.1 Aim of the research	01
1.2 Scope of the research	01
1.3 Methodological approach	02
1.4 Methodological limitations	04
1.5 Structure of the report	04
2. Characteristics of people who attend court for family violence matters	05
2.1 Ballarat	05
2.2 Geelong	09
2.3 Melbourne	11
2.4 Sunshine	13
2.5 Dandenong	15
2.6 Wangaratta	16
2.7 Maryborough	18
2.8 Neighbourhood Justice Centre	19
2.9 Discussion: Understanding the characteristics of people who attend court for family violence matters	22
Police versus private applications	23
Presence of parties at court	23
Relationship between victim and perpetrator	23
History of family violence	24
Service provision	24
Demographic characteristics	25
2.10 Implications for the family violence system	26
Presence of parties at court	26
History of family violence	26
Service provision	26
Demographic characteristics	27
2.11 Issues for further consideration	27
3. Outcomes of family violence matters	28
3.1 Ballarat	28
3.2 Geelong	31
3.3 Melbourne	32
3.4 Sunshine	33
3.5 Dandenong	34
3.6 Wangaratta	35
3.7 Maryborough	36
3.8 Neighbourhood Justice Centre	37
3.9 Discussion: Understanding outcomes of family violence matters	38
Orders imposed	40
Adjournments	40
Conditions	42
Consent orders	42
Referrals to support services	43

3.10 Implications for the family violence system	44
Adjournments	44
Conditions	45
Referrals to legal and support services	45
3.11 Issues for further consideration	46
4. Court processes in family violence matters	47
4.1 Ballarat	47
4.2 Geelong	48
4.3 Melbourne	49
4.4 Sunshine	50
4.5 Dandenong	51
4.6 Wangaratta	51
4.7 Maryborough	52
4.8 Neighbourhood Justice Centre	53
4.9 Discussion: Understanding court processes in family violence matters	53
Processing of family violence cases	55
Consistent approaches to family violence matters	55
Inconsistent approaches to family violence matters	55
Addressing inconsistency in responses to family violence	56
Managing time constraints in family violence matters	59
Alternative legal responses to family violence	63
4.10 Implications for the family violence system	64
4.11 Issues for further consideration	65
Appendix A: Interview participants	66
Appendix B: Intervention order conditions: Clauses 1 through 8	68

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Recent years have seen a significant increase in the number of family violence-related matters initiated in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria. This increase has placed unprecedented pressure on the court and associated personnel such as court staff, duty lawyers and service providers.

In order to understand the impact of family violence on the court, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria has collaborated with the Royal Commission into Family Violence ('the Commission') in research to provide a better understanding of the family violence workload of the Magistrates' Court. In particular, the Commission's research aims to determine if there is sufficient capacity for dealing with cases properly, both in terms of dedicating adequate time and attention to each matter, and in providing a considered and appropriate outcome.

Analysis of data from the courtroom observations and the file reviews identified a number of key findings about the characteristics of people attending court for family violence matters, about the outcome of family violence cases, and about court processes in these matters. These key findings may be summarised as follows:

- Lists in the busier courts are very large, with two courts (Ballarat and Dandenong) hearing more than 40 matters in a day, while the average number of matters across all courts is 30.
- Applications in intervention order matters are brought by the police in just under two-thirds (64 per cent) of all matters.
- The vast majority of victims of family violence who appear in court are female (76 per cent), and the vast majority of perpetrators are male (82 per cent).
- Intervention orders are most commonly sought against former partners (35 per cent) and current partners (33 per cent).
- More than half of all matters (53 per cent) involve people with a history of prior family violence, but only one-quarter (25 per cent) had previously called police or sought an intervention order from the court, highlighting the significant attrition between experiencing family violence and seeking assistance from the police or the courts.
- Just over half (53 per cent) of all parties had some sort of private or legal aid representation, or representation by the local community legal centre, leaving 47 per cent unrepresented.
- In two-thirds of all matters (67 per cent) an order is imposed, but there are still many adjournments (14 per cent) where no order is made. These adjournments are commonly made due to lack of information, with the magistrate adjourning the matter for the police to follow up with further investigation.

Analysis of the interviews uncovered several consistent themes that were discussed time and again by interview participants. Broadly, these may be summarised as follows:

- The time pressures imposed by the increase in family violence are felt throughout the system. The implications of these pressures may be felt both in court outcomes and in court processes. Court outcomes may be compromised if registry staff, support staff and duty lawyers are unable to elicit the complete story from a victim of family violence, so that the magistrate must make a decision with less than complete information. Court processes may be compromised if parties at court feel that they have not had the time to make themselves heard, or if support staff cannot spend sufficient time with a client to undertake assessments, create a safety plan, provide support at court or make proper referrals. This is the foundational issue in dealing with family violence matters: it underlies most of the issues identified in the research.
- Further professional development is needed for all people who deal with family violence matters. Participants identified a need for ongoing education about the nature and impact of family violence for magistrates, police, duty lawyers and court staff. Lack of experience and understanding was blamed for dismissive responses to victims and for continuing difficulty in securing protection from perpetrators. In particular, the data show significant inconsistencies among magistrates in the way they approach family violence matters and manage their interactions with the parties involved. For example, there is substantial variation in both magistrates' practices regarding the inclusion of children on intervention orders, and in the level of detail provided by magistrates in their explanations of intervention orders.
- Associated with education is the value of specialisation: magistrates, police, duty lawyers and court staff who have a deeper understanding of family violence are able to respond more appropriately and to provide a more efficient and effective service. In particular, specialist experience allows police, duty lawyers and court staff to elicit precisely the sort of information that the magistrate will require in order to make an informed decision, and specialist experience among magistrates enhances the court craft used to engage with parties and provide appropriately tailored responses to family violence. In addition, specialist units in the police provide better opportunities for engagement with affected family members, more effective investigation and better outcomes at court when a family violence court liaison officer is employed.

- Better information is needed in family violence matters. Police need to improve their collection of information from affected family members so that police prosecutors can be fully briefed about the circumstances of both the affected family member and the respondent, to be ready to answer the magistrates' questions at court. Arrangements need to be implemented to facilitate sharing of information between the Department of Health and Human Services and the courts, and among the courts, on matters involving child protection issues and family law issues. This would reduce the number of matters that need to be adjourned for follow-up investigation or for 'further and better particulars'.
- Improved service provision is needed to meet the demands of family violence matters. Part of an improved response is the installation of both applicant and respondent support workers (ASWs and RSWs) in more courts around Victoria. More broadly, inadequate funding for family violence services means that there are not enough workers available to support clients effectively. Duty lawyers are unable to provide legal representation to all parties, resulting in a high proportion of unrepresented people. Family violence service providers and behaviour change program providers also struggle to keep up with demand. The end result is that clients do not have enough time with their support workers, so many issues remain unresolved. This has potentially serious implications in terms of the capacity to reduce family violence and protect its victims.
- Better coordination is needed within the court to manage existing time constraints more effectively. Instituting morning coordination meetings would help to ensure that duty lawyers and registry staff identify who will be seen and the order in which this will happen, while additional staff would assist in seeing more people more quickly, rather than allowing some parties to wait all day before being seen. List management practices also need to be reviewed to identify possible ways to reduce the ever-increasing numbers of matters that need to be heard by a single magistrate in a single day.
- Improved court structures are needed to enhance the safety of victims of family violence when they attend court. Renovations to allow greater use of remote witness facilities, separate waiting areas and separate entrances would allow victims of family violence to feel more secure when attending court, and would improve their confidence in being able to seek the court's assistance. The current physical layout in some of the courts visited increases the risk of further intimidation and control.

“I think we have the skeleton of a really effective service.
But it’s crushed by demand”.

Anonymous Magistrate

1. INTRODUCTION

Recent years have seen a significant increase in the number of family violence-related matters initiated in the Magistrates' Court of Victoria. In 2013–14 the Magistrates' Court finalised just over 35,000 applications.¹ Breaches of family violence intervention orders were the fifth most common criminal offence heard in the Magistrates' Court during the year, with 15,016 charges of contravention of a family violence intervention order in 2013–14.²

According to the Magistrates' Court itself, the 'significant increase in numbers and complexity of proceedings has placed unprecedented pressure on the operations of the Court and upon court users'.³ The Court seeks to ensure that community safety is not being compromised in this environment.

The Magistrates' Court of Victoria has collaborated with the Royal Commission into Family Violence ('the Commission') in research to provide a better understanding of the family violence workload of the Magistrates' Court. In particular, the Commission requires a better understanding of the daily impact of family violence cases on the court and its lists in order to determine if there is sufficient capacity for dealing with cases properly, both in terms of dedicating adequate time and attention to each matter, and in providing a considered and appropriate outcome.

1.1 AIM OF THE RESEARCH

The aim of this research was to gain a better understanding of the demands placed on the Magistrates' Court by family violence cases. In particular, the research aimed to identify the implications of these cases for courts and for their capacity to provide effective, appropriate and just responses to promote the safety of Victorian families.

The following issues were identified by the Magistrates' Court and the Commission as being priority areas for investigation in this research:⁴

- the characteristics of parties appearing for family violence matters
- the size of family violence court lists
- outcomes for family violence matters
- the prevalence of cross-applications and consent orders in family violence matters
- the way family violence orders are explained in court by the magistrate
- the duration of each matter in the family violence list and the duration of the court day as a whole
- the processing of family violence cases through the courts
- the use of services at court by alleged victims and perpetrators in family violence matters
- the amount of time available for parties to spend with services related to family violence matters.

1.2 SCOPE OF THE RESEARCH

The focus of this research was on understanding the impact of family violence on the workload of the Magistrates' Court as it currently stands. That is, the focus was on current court cases, rather than either broader historical patterns or future projections.

The bulk of the research was undertaken in the civil jurisdiction of the Magistrates' Court, although the criminal jurisdiction was included in those court locations where both civil and criminal matters share the list.⁵

1 Magistrates' Court of Victoria, Annual Report 2013/2014 (Magistrates' Court of Victoria, 2014) 91. In 2013–14, 23,210 applications were made by Victoria Police (66 per cent of all applications) and 11,925 were private applications, for a total of 35,135 applications. This figure includes both family violence intervention orders that were granted and those that were not (for example, after being withdrawn or struck out or otherwise not being successful).

2 Ibid 84.

3 Memorandum from Magistrates' Court to the Royal Commission into Family Violence, 14 May 2015.

4 Memorandum from Magistrates' Court to the Royal Commission into Family Violence, 14 May 2015.

5 It is difficult to identify those cases in the criminal jurisdiction that involve some element of family violence from the court's Courtlink database. While Victoria Police has implemented a family violence flag in their LEAP database, this information has only been collected since December 2014 and has only been reliably transferred to the Magistrates' Court since about April 2015. Nonetheless, criminal matters involving family violence were identified during courtroom observations.

The research was designed to concentrate on proceedings within the courtroom itself. Processes and procedures outside the courtroom (such as time spent by registry staff preparing files for court, or time spent by service providers with clients) were not included in the observational data collection itself, although they were discussed with interview participants.⁶ That is, the research did not involve tracking individual matters from beginning to end to ascertain the time taken at each point. Where information about practices in the broader court was made available via the interviews, this is included in the report. As practices and processes outside the courtroom inevitably affect those within, the court could consider undertaking additional research in the future.

1.3 METHODOLOGICAL APPROACH

There were three main phases of this research, using three primary methodologies:

Phase 1: Courtroom observations

The only way to assess courtroom interactions is to observe actual matters appearing before the court. This approach, while time-consuming, allows for the collection of data that cannot be collected in any other way (such as the nature of the interaction between the magistrate and the parties) and allows for a more qualitative understanding of family violence matters in the court. The observations thus provide some measure of the court experience from the perspective of the court user.

For this phase, courtroom observations were conducted primarily in the civil jurisdiction⁷ of various Magistrates' Court locations, although criminal matters were also included in those courts where criminal and civil cases were heard in the same courtroom on the day.⁸ For each court location, all matters being heard in a given courtroom were observed over one or two days to build up a small sample of family violence cases. While this sample was not representative of every family violence-related matter to come before the courts, it may be considered broadly typical, and therefore informative to the Commission.

The courts that were observed were selected in such a way as to allow for a range of approaches to be observed—those with specialist lists, those without any specialisation, regional⁹ and metropolitan courts of varying size, and the family violence division of the court.

Following consultation with the Magistrates' Court, the court locations involved in this research were:

1. Ballarat—Family Violence Division (a large regional court—the region's headquarter court).
2. Geelong (a large regional court—the region's headquarter court—but neither a family violence division nor a specialist court).
3. Melbourne (a large metropolitan court—the region's headquarter court—with specialist family violence services).
4. Sunshine (a large suburban court, with specialist family violence services).
5. Dandenong (a large suburban court—not a Family Violence Division or specialist court but does have community-based family violence service providers).
6. Wangaratta (a mid-size regional court—neither a family violence division nor a specialist).
7. Maryborough (a small regional court—neither a family violence division nor a specialist).
8. The Neighbourhood Justice Centre (NJC) (chosen on the basis of its unique, problem-solving approach to justice more generally).

Table 1 shows the number of original intervention order applications finalised in each of these eight courts during 2013–14. An application is considered 'finalised' if it is struck out, withdrawn, refused, or if a final intervention order is made.¹⁰

⁶ This research in no way constitutes a process evaluation of the court.

⁷ As the intervention order process is the main entry point to the courts for most family violence cases, this represents an appropriate method for the research.

⁸ Criminal and civil matters were heard together in Ballarat, Wangaratta, Maryborough and the Neighbourhood Justice Centre.

⁹ Observations in a smaller regional court were considered important to allow assessment of both issues particular to regional areas and also those particular to Indigenous families. Indigenous status data are now collected in Courtlink for all private applicant intervention order (IVO) applications. However, given that these private applications comprise only about one-third of all IVO applications, Courtlink data on Indigenous status should not be considered complete, and findings from this research with regard to Indigenous parties in family violence matters should not be considered representative.

¹⁰ 'Original' applications exclude secondary applications for variation, extension or revocation. 'Finalised' applications exclude interim orders. These figures therefore do not represent the total family violence workload of the courts and do not reflect the total number of people coming before the court for family violence matters. A final intervention order is typically preceded by multiple appearances at court before being finalised.

TABLE 1: NUMBER OF ORIGINAL INTERVENTION ORDER APPLICATIONS FINALISED IN EACH COURT, 2013–14

COURT	NUMBER OF IVOS 2013–14
Ballarat	956
Geelong	1533
Melbourne	1988
Sunshine	2568
Dandenong	2738
Wangaratta	295
Maryborough	113
NJC	253

The days of courtroom observation were selected in such a way as to be able to assess a ‘typical’ spread of family violence cases in each court. For example, two days of observation were undertaken in Ballarat: one on the police application day and the other on the private applicant day. A single day of observation was undertaken at each of the other courts.

A detailed observation protocol was created in order to ensure that each observation resulted in the collection of the same set of information.¹¹ The observational data collection was conducted using this protocol.

Phase 2: File reviews

Phase 2 involved a review of court documents and associated data collected for each of the observed cases.¹²

In order to address ethical considerations associated with privacy issues, the Magistrates’ Court itself conducted this part of the research. The court was provided with the names of cases observed on each day, along with the observational data. The court then matched these data to the appropriate files, entered the data from the files, then de-identified the spread sheet to return it to the researcher for analysis.

A detailed coding guide was developed to ensure that each case was coded according to set standards and definitions.

Phase 3: Interviews with key personnel

The final phase of the research involved a series of 74 interviews with almost 100 key personnel who play a role in family violence matters in each of the court locations visited. The following types of people were identified as key personnel for this phase of the research:

- magistrates
- court registrars and registry staff
- duty lawyers
- community family violence service providers
- Victoria Police personnel
- applicant and respondent support workers
- interpreters
- security staff.

A full list of the organisations that participated in the interviews for this research is included at Appendix A.

Participants were interviewed about the nature of their family violence work, allowing them to reflect on how the demand on their time affected the quality of their services.

The observations and interviews were undertaken from 13 July 2015 to 20 August 2015. The file reviews were conducted from 21 July 2015 to 4 September 2015. This report thus reflects observations undertaken, comments received from interview participants and available Courtlink data during these periods.

¹¹ At least the potential was the same for each matter; given variation across matters and among magistrates, the exact nature of the data able to be collected varied considerably from court to court and matter to matter.

¹² ‘Court documents’ includes both hard copy files kept at each court location and also the court’s electronic Courtlink database.

1.4 METHODOLOGICAL LIMITATIONS

While every effort was made to record all required data from both the observations and the Magistrates' Court's Courtlink database, not all data were able to be collected reliably. In particular, the observations were not successful in identifying each person's Indigenous status, disability status, and whether people were from a culturally and linguistically diverse background. The observational data presented in this report on these factors are based on clear visual identification only, unless the issue was raised during courtroom discussions. Likewise, information from the Courtlink database was not always available for these factors. The numbers should therefore be considered an underestimate of the true numbers of Indigenous people, people with a disability and people from a culturally and linguistically diverse background who appeared at court for intervention order matters.

In addition, the one or two days of observation undertaken at each court do not necessarily reflect every single day in that court. The observation days should be broadly reflective of a typical day in that court, but there will be fluctuation on any given day in the number of matters listed, the nature and outcomes of the matters being heard and the characteristics of the people appearing in court.¹³

1.5 STRUCTURE OF THE REPORT

This report is structured around the original issues identified by the Commission and the Magistrates' Court as priority areas for investigation. Each of the issues is allocated its own chapter, in which discussion is presented based on the observational data, the file review data and the consultation process.

The issues are divided broadly into those relating to the people and matters appearing before the court, those relating to outcomes for family violence matters, and those relating to court processes in dealing with family violence matters.

Table 2 presents an overview of the contents of each chapter.

TABLE 2: REPORT STRUCTURE

CHAPTER	SUBJECT	ISSUES
Chapter 2	People	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • the size of family violence court lists • the characteristics of parties appearing for family violence matters • the prevalence of cross-applications in family violence matters • the use of services at court by people appearing for family violence matters
Chapter 3	Outcomes	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • outcomes of family violence matters
Chapter 4	Processes	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • the processing of family violence cases through the courts • the way family violence orders are explained in court by the magistrate • the duration of each matter in the family violence list and the duration of the court day as a whole • the amount of time available for parties to spend with services related to family violence matters

To account for variations across court types, the discussion is presented individually for each court, with a synthesis of the findings at the end of each chapter.

¹³ The focus of the report was on providing a descriptive overview of family violence court proceedings. More detailed analysis, such as examining interactions between various measures, is not included but may warrant consideration in future research.

2. CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS

This chapter draws on the courtroom observations and associated file reviews to examine the characteristics of people who attend court for family violence matters, and the characteristics of their matters. The findings are presented separately for each court location in order to identify potential differences in court communities across the state and to highlight variations that may exist based on the levels of family violence specialisation in each court.

2.1 BALLARAT

Two days of observation were undertaken in Ballarat: a day of police applications and a second day of private applications.

The police application day included 45 matters on the list, which was the largest list seen in any court included in the research. The 45 matters included eight family violence-related criminal matters and six that were actually private applications. The private applicant day included 23 matters on the list.

Tables 3A (police matters) and 3B (private matters) present the key data from Ballarat.

TABLE 3A: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—BALLARAT POLICE APPLICATION DAY (SUMMARY DATA)

45 MATTERS (37 IVO; 8 CRIMINAL)—(6 PRIVATE IVO; 31 POLICE IVO)
	Applicants (of 37 IVO matters)		Respondents (of 45 police matters) ^a
People present	18	49%	23	51%
People absent	19	51%	21	47%
	Applicants (of 37 IVO matters)		Respondents (of 45 police matters)
Average age	35		34
Gender
Female	33	89%	6	13%
Male	4	11%	39	87%
Respondent type (of 37 IVO matters)
Current partner	14	38%
Former partner	12	32%
Parent/child	6	16%
Other family	5	14%
Prior history of violence
Prior FV incident	17	38%
Prior calls to police	3	7%
Prior IVO sought	1	2%
Prior IVO issued	1	2%
	Applicants (of 18 present)		Respondents (of 23 present)
Legal representation	2	11%	19	83%
In-court service support	8	44%	2	9%
Referral to ASW/RSW	7	39%	8	35%
Access court FV services	21 ^b	100%	18	78%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

a The 45 police matters include both civil intervention order matters and criminal matters.

b Observational data indicate that 18 applicants were present in court but Courtlink data record

TABLE 3B: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—BALLARAT PRIVATE APPLICATION DAY (SUMMARY DATA)

23 MATTERS (ALL PRIVATE)
	Applicants		Respondents
People present	21	91%	15	65%
People absent	2	9%	8	35%
	Applicants		Respondents
Average age	41		45
Gender
Female	19	83%	10	43%
Male	4	17%	13	57%
Respondent type
Current partner	0	0%
Former partner	10	43%
Parent/child	2	9%
Other family	10	43%
Prior history of violence
Prior FV incident	21	91%
Prior calls to police	2	9%
Prior IVO sought	3	13%
Prior IVO issued	unknown
	Applicants (of 21 present)		Respondents (of 15 present)
Legal representation	16	76%	12	80%
In-court service support	2	10%	2	13%
Referral to ASW/RSW	0	0%	1	7%
Access court FV services	9	43%	5	33%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

On the police day, the applicant¹⁴ was present for 18 matters and absent for 19 (eight matters were criminal matters so it was not clear if the affected family member was present in court). The respondent was present for 23 matters (including six of the criminal matters) and absent for 21 matters (including two of the criminal matters).¹⁵ There were no children in the courtroom, although children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in two out of the 37 intervention order matters.¹⁶ It was not possible from the observations to identify the number of matters where there were children in the relationship but where they were not included on the intervention order.

¹⁴ The definition of 'applicant' is those people who are listed as applicants on the day. In some instances this may not be indicative of the broader story behind the matter. In particular, people who are respondents on an intervention order who then seek to vary the order become applicants on the day of the variation hearing. They are recorded as applicants for the purposes of this research as this is their defined role on the day of observation.

¹⁵ Note that the numbers do not always tally to the total as there are times when a definitive response to the observation question was unable to be determined. For example, it was not always clear if the affected family member was present in the courtroom when a police prosecutor was applying for the order.

¹⁶ Section 4L of the Magistrates' Court Act 1989 (Vic) and ss 67 and 150 of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) regulate the presence of children in family violence intervention order proceedings. The combined effect of these sections is that a child who is the affected family member or protected person, or is a child of an affected family member, protected person or respondent in a family violence intervention order matter, may not be present in the courtroom without the leave of the court. Thus the observed absence of children in these matters should be seen as standard. Across all the observation days there were only three matters in which a child was present in the courtroom. In one, the child was a very young infant who attended in his pram with his mother, while in another the magistrate ordered that an older child, of about four or five years of age, be removed from the courtroom (she was taken out by someone who appeared to be an older relative). Outside of the courtrooms, however, a number of children were observed in various court locations but were not counted in the observation process. The restrictions placed on the presence of children in court make the provision of appropriate childcare facilities at court essential.

On the private applicant day, the applicant was present for 21 matters and absent for two matters. The respondent was present for 15 matters and absent for eight matters. Children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in three of the 23 matters.

The average age of applicants across both days was 37, with respondents being slightly older (38). However, the average age was higher on the private applicant day (41 for applicants and 45 for respondents) than on the police day (35 for applicants and 34 for respondents). It is unclear why this difference exists. On both police and private applicant days, the vast majority of applicants or affected family members were female (in 33 out of 37 intervention order matters on the police day and 19 of the 23 matters on the private day), while the majority of respondents were male (39 out of 45 respondents/defendants on the police day and 13 of the 23 respondents on the private day).¹⁷

On the police day, three applicants and three respondents were identified by the observer as being from a culturally and linguistically diverse background, with two matters requiring a Farsi interpreter (both matters related to a single respondent, and the affected family members were his wife and sister). On the private applicant day, one applicant appeared to be from a culturally and linguistically diverse background, but no interpreter was required. This is based on visual identification only, so for many parties this was unclear.

Of the 37 intervention order matters on the police day, 14 were current intimate partners and 12 were former partners. A further six involved a parent-child relationship (including step children and in-laws) while five involved other family, including four sisters/sisters-in-law.

Of the 23 intervention order matters on the private applicant day, 10 matters were being sought against a former domestic/intimate partner and one against a former (unspecified) relative. Two matters involved parent-child relationships and one a cousin. A single family with eight matters across four people (all with cross-applications) involved four sisters and a niece.

Courtlink data indicated that one applicant had a mental health disability and two a physical disability, while four respondents had a mental health disability, two had a cognitive disability, one had both and two had a physical disability. However, given the amount of missing data, this should be interpreted with caution.

A prior history of family violence was common among parties appearing at Ballarat Magistrates' Court, especially on the private applicant day. Seventeen of the 45 police day matters (38 per cent) and 21 of the 23 private day matters (91 per cent) involved people with prior family violence incidents, some of them lasting as long as 15 years. The difference across the two days in the proportion of people with previous family violence incidents is notable, although the reasons for this discrepancy are unclear. Data showed that victims of family violence often did not call the police: only three of the people involved in police applications and two involved in private matters had previously called police, although most of the data were missing so these data should be treated with caution. Only one person from the police day and three from the private day seem to have previously applied for an order (all under either the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) or the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic)), although again there is much missing data.¹⁸ One person from the police day had four previous orders imposed under this act but no information was available on people from the private day.

Data on whether parties had a related matter in the court were not entirely clear from the courtroom observations, but it appears that 11 of the 37 intervention order respondents from the police day had criminal matters, one had a custody matter and one a child protection matter. One person from the 23 matters on the private applicant day seemed to have a related criminal matter (he was the respondent in one matter and the applicant in the cross-application). No data were available from Courtlink.¹⁹

There were two cross-applications recorded in Courtlink from the police day and 13 were observed on the private applicant day, all sought by respondents. There was a single family that had eight applications—three sisters and a niece had all sought an intervention order against a fourth sister, and she had sought an intervention order against each of the four.

¹⁷ The 10 female respondents out of 23 on the private applicant day is unusual when compared with the other courts. This is likely due to a single family in which four women sought an intervention order against a sister, and the sister sought an intervention order against each of the four. This single family accounted for 8 of the matters heard in the list that day.

¹⁸ Courtlink does not differentiate between the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic). Data on previous intervention orders sought and imposed thus can only be presented about the two acts combined.

¹⁹ Across all the courts visited, it was difficult to gather an accurate measure of the number of people with related criminal, custody or child protection matters. For the most part, this information was only available from observations if the magistrate specifically asked about related matters. Courtlink contained some limited data on related matters, but the data were not always reliable, with much missing information. Criminal matters that have not yet been initiated would not yet be recorded in Courtlink. The figures on the number of people with related matters are thus likely to represent a conservative estimate.

Given that Ballarat is a specialist family violence division court with a well-developed service model in place, there is extensive use of services within court and referrals to services outside of court. Observational data indicated that, on the police day, eight applicants and two respondents had support in court from a service provider.²⁰ The magistrate for the police day at Ballarat made frequent use of referrals to the in-court support services, particularly the applicant support workers.²¹ On that day, 16 people out of the 18 applicants and 23 respondents who were present were referred to services by the magistrate—eight to the respondent support worker and seven to the applicant support worker and Berry Street family violence services. One was encouraged to continue with a psychiatrist and ACSO (Australian Community Support Organisation) and another with counselling for alcohol abuse in addition to seeing the respondent support worker.

Even though there was a substantial use of referrals to services in Ballarat, the frequency of referrals may still reflect the limited capacity of support services to deal with the large number of people on the list. Magistrates are likely aware of the impact of large lists on service providers, so may undertake some level of triage in their referral process, only referring those parties deemed most in need of support. Nonetheless, the availability of support services in Ballarat is an important part of the local response to family violence.

On the private applicant day (under a different, non-specialist magistrate), one person out of the 21 applicants and 15 respondents who were present was referred to the respondent support worker. Observational data indicated that two applicants and two respondents had support in court from a service provider.

Courtlink data for Ballarat provide a more accurate and detailed picture of the use of services that may not always be evident from the courtroom discussions. The data showed that 21 applicants²² and 18 respondents from the police day and nine applicants and five respondents from the private applicant day had accessed specialist family violence services at court.²³ In addition, two applicants on the police day had seen a police prosecutor and one a civil advocate.²⁴ Five applicants on the police day had also been referred to services outside court: one to legal services, one to counselling, one to children's services/counselling and two to 'other' services. On the private day, two applicants were referred to welfare services. On the police day, four respondents had been referred to services outside court: one to drug and alcohol services, one to welfare, one to disability services and one to children's services/counselling. On the private day, three respondents were referred to services outside court: one to legal services, one to children's services and one to some other service. The Courtlink data do not record whether people accessed these services on the basis of a referral made by the magistrate in court or by one of the workers outside the courtroom (such as the applicant support worker or registry staff).

Even with the significant presence of service providers in Ballarat, the number of people accessing these services remains limited by the providers' capacity to cope with substantial demand.

Of the police day applications, two affected family members had legal representation (these were two of the six private applications that were heard on the police day). No affected family members had legal representation in addition to the police. Nineteen respondents of the 23 present in court had legal representation. On the private application day, of the 21 applicants present in court, 16 had legal representation. Of the 15 respondents present in court, 12 had legal representation. This pattern is replicated in the other courts: while most applicants on private days are represented by duty lawyers, it appears that affected family members in police matters are not receiving additional legal representation, but are being deemed to be 'represented' by the police. This may cause difficulties in those matters where the affected family member does not wish the matter to proceed, but the police prosecutor continues to seek an order nonetheless.

The amount of time people actually spend with the various services is highly constrained due to the number of matters coming before the court. This issue is discussed in Chapter 4, as part of a broader discussion of time pressures on the courts with regard to family violence matters.

20 Data were not collected on whether the service provider was the applicant support worker, the respondent support worker, a person from Court Network or someone from an external family violence service provider. In addition, the presence or absence of a support worker was not always easily determined, with observations relying on an obvious indication (such as a Magistrates' Court of Victoria lanyard or a Court Network identity card) that the person accompanying the party was indeed a support provider.

21 The magistrate for the police day at Ballarat was the same magistrate who was observed at Sunshine. At both locations, the magistrate frequently made referrals to in-court and community support services.

22 Observational data indicate that 18 applicants were present in court. It is possible that the observations were not able to identify every applicant in the courtroom, or that the applicant had accessed the services at court but had not attended the hearing itself.

23 While the data show whether a person accessed services, they do not provide information on what that access entailed—whether an extended discussion with appointments made for subsequent meetings, or a brief chat about court processes, or some other discussion. The data also do not record which specialist service was used or when the services were accessed (either on the hearing day, prior to or following the hearing day). Such nuanced information was not collected as part of the research.

24 Some people received multiple referrals to a number of different types of support service.

2.2 GEELONG

Of the 21 matters in the list in Geelong, there was a private applicant in 12 matters and a police applicant in the remaining nine.²⁵ Table 4 presents the key data from Geelong.

TABLE 4: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—GEELONG (SUMMARY DATA)

21 MATTERS (12 PRIVATE; 9 POLICE)
	Applicants		Respondents
People present	14	67%	7	33%
People absent	6	29%	11	52%
	Applicants		Respondents
Average age	34		37
Gender
Female	17	81%	4	19%
Male	4	19%	17	81%
Respondent type
Current partner	6	29%
Former partner	6	29%
Parent/child	8	38%
Other	1	5%
Prior history of violence
Prior FV incident	10	48%
Prior calls to police	6	29%
Prior IVO/other order sought ^a	5	24%
Prior IVO/other order issued	3	14%
	Applicants (of 14 present)		Respondents (of 7 present)
Legal representation	5	36%	6	86%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

a In some courts, prior orders sought or issued were not intervention orders but were some form of family law order. These are clearly identified in the text.

For 14 matters the applicant was present and for six the applicant was absent, while the respondent was present for seven matters and absent for 11.²⁶ Of the police applications, seven of nine applicants were present (78 per cent), compared with seven of 12 for the private applications (58 per cent).²⁷ Children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in seven matters.

The average age of applicants was 34, with respondents being slightly older (37), probably reflecting the fact that most applicants (17 out of 21) were women and most respondents (also 17 out of 21) were men. Although Courtlink data on Indigenous status should not be considered entirely reliable,²⁸ it appears that one respondent was Indigenous. No one was recorded as being from a culturally and linguistically diverse background, with no interpreters required.

Most of the applications were being made against current (six) or former (six) intimate partners, although there were also eight matters that involved parent/child relationships. One application involved a current partner's former partner.

²⁵ Geelong was observed on a Friday, which is notionally designated as a day for police applications for family violence intervention orders. However, private applications are also allowed, which is reflected in the data.

²⁶ Note that the numbers do not always tally to the total as there are times when a definitive response to the observation question was unable to be determined. For example, it was not always clear if the affected family member was present in the courtroom when a police prosecutor was applying for the order.

²⁷ For one private application, it was unclear whether the applicant was present.

²⁸ There was a large amount of missing information for this in Courtlink.

Courtlink recorded three applicants as having a disability (one cognitive, one mental health and one physical), while six respondents were recorded as having a disability (three mental health, two drug/alcohol and one combined).

About half of the matters (10) involved people with previous experience of family violence incidents, most of which involved ‘numerous’ individual incidents. In six of the cases someone had previously called police for a family violence incident, while in three someone had previously sought a family violence intervention order. In addition, two people had previously sought a Family Court order under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). Finally, in three of the cases, a court order had previously been issued (two family law orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and one family violence intervention order under either the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) or the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic)).²⁹

Data on whether parties have a related matter in the court were not entirely clear from the courtroom observations, although Courtlink data indicated that two respondents and one applicant had a related criminal matter and one respondent had a related child protection matter. The observational data seemed to indicate that one respondent and three applicants also had another intervention order matter pending. There seemed to be only a single cross-application among matters heard on the day, although again this was difficult to determine from either observations or Courtlink, due to missing data.

Most people seem not to be accessing available services in Geelong, although as Geelong is neither a specialist division nor a specialist court, this is perhaps to be expected. The most common service accessed was the police prosecutor, with Courtlink data indicating that seven applicants spoke with the prosecutor, while five were recorded as having sought legal services. Of the seven respondents present at court, three accessed legal services (duty lawyers) at court. There are no data available in Courtlink on whether parties had accessed relevant services prior to attending court, although the reason for this omission is unclear. Given the large amount of missing data on the use of services in Geelong, these data are not included in the summary table.

Of the private applicants, five had legal representation, while none of the police applications also had legal representation in addition to the police. Of the seven respondents present in court, six had legal representation.

²⁹ The Magistrates’ Court asks people who apply for a family violence intervention order whether they have previously sought or been granted any family law orders. Where a person discloses such an order, it is recorded in Courtlink. When the police apply for the family violence intervention order, however, this information is not available. The data relating to orders under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) are therefore not a complete count of all people who have previously had family law orders; rather, they are an undercount to some (unknown) extent.

2.3 MELBOURNE

Of the 32 matters in the list in Melbourne, there was a private applicant in six matters and a police applicant in 25, with one being unclear.³⁰ Table 5 presents the key data from Melbourne.

TABLE 5: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—MELBOURNE (SUMMARY DATA)

32 MATTERS (6 PRIVATE; 25 POLICE; 1 UNCLEAR)
	Applicants		Respondents
People present	17	53%	15	47%
People absent	9	28%	15	47%
	Applicants		Respondents
Average age	38		39
Gender
Female	25	78%	4	12.5%
Male	7	22%	28	87.5%
Respondent type
Current partner	16	50%
Former partner	9	28%
Parent/child	3	9%
Other family	3	9%
Prior history of violence
Prior FV incident	16	50%
Prior calls to police	10	31%
Prior IVO sought	8	25%
Prior IVO issued	8	25%
	Applicants (of 17 present)		Respondents (of 15 present)
Legal representation	6	35%	7	47%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

For 17 matters the applicant was present and for nine the applicant was absent, with the remaining six unclear. The respondent was present for 15 matters and absent for 15, with two being unclear. Of the police applications, 12 of 25 applicants were present (50 per cent), compared with five of the six private applications (83 per cent). Children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in 12 matters.

The average age of applicants was 38, with respondents being slightly older (39). Most applicants (25 out of 32) were women and most respondents (28 out of 32) were men. No one was recorded in Courtlink as being Indigenous and one respondent was recorded as pregnant. Courtlink data showed that 12 applicants and 16 respondents were from a culturally and linguistically diverse background, and two interpreters were required—one for an applicant (language unknown) and one for a respondent (in Japanese).

Most of the applications were being sought against current (16) or former (nine) intimate partners, although there were also three matters that involved parent/child relationships and three other family members.

³⁰ Melbourne was observed on a Monday, which is notionally designated as a day for police applications for family violence intervention orders. However, private applications are also allowed, which is reflected in the data.

Courtlink recorded one applicant with a cognitive disability, but there was a significant amount of missing data. The data were somewhat better for respondents: eight respondents had a disability (one cognitive, three mental health, three drug and alcohol and one physical disability).

Half of the matters (16) involved people with previous experience of family violence incidents, most of which involved 'numerous' individual incidents. The longest period over which family violence had occurred was 26 years. In 10 of the cases someone had previously called police for a family violence incident, while in eight someone had previously sought a family violence intervention order. Finally, in eight of the cases, a family violence intervention order had previously been issued under either the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) or the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic). In one of these matters a person had previously been issued a family law order under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) as well.

Courtlink data indicated that one respondent and two applicants had another intervention order matter, while three respondents had a related criminal matter. There seemed to be only a single cross-application among matters heard on the day, although again this was difficult to determine from either observations or Courtlink, due to missing data.

Some of the people appearing at Melbourne had accessed available services. The most common service accessed was legal services, with Courtlink data indicating that 17 applicants spoke with legal services, as did 15 respondents. It appears that no one accessed family violence services at court, although it may be that, while services were accessed, the data were not recorded in Courtlink.³¹

Courtlink showed that six applicants had also already accessed other services: three legal services, one Court Network and two family violence specialists, while two respondents had accessed legal services. As Melbourne has both an applicant and a respondent support worker, it is possible that these were the family violence specialists accessed, although Courtlink data did not include such a fine level of classification. In addition, three applicants and three respondents were referred to counselling services outside court.

Of the private applicants, six had legal representation, while none of the police applications also had legal representation in addition to the police. Of the 15 respondents present in court, seven had legal representation.

³¹ Observational data indicate that only one person was supported in the courtroom by a family violence support worker, although there was too much missing data on this measure to make any definitive statement. Given the uncertainty around the data quality for these measures in Melbourne, they are not included in the summary table.

2.4 SUNSHINE

Sunshine had a large list on the day of the courtroom observation, with 35 matters. Of these, there was a police applicant in 26 matters and a private applicant in the remaining nine.³² Table 6 presents the key data from Sunshine.

TABLE 6: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—SUNSHINE (SUMMARY DATA)

35 MATTERS (9 PRIVATE; 26 POLICE)
	Applicants		Respondents
People present	18	51%	22	63%
People absent	17	49%	13	37%
	Applicants		Respondents
Average age	37		36
Gender
Female	29	83%	7	20%
Male	6	17%	28	80%
Respondent type
Current partner	17	49%
Former partner	6	17%
Parent/child	7	20%
Other family	3	9%
Prior history of violence
Prior FV incident	24	69%
Prior calls to police	5	14%
Prior IVO sought	6	17%
Prior IVO issued	6	17%
	Applicants (of 18 present)		Respondents (of 22 present)
Legal representation	10	56%	12	56%
In-court service support	2	11%	1	5%
Referral to ASW/RSW	1	6%	n/a
Access court FV services	3	17%	0	0%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

Applicants were present for about half the matters (18 present and 17 absent), while the respondent was present for 22 matters and absent for 13. Of the police applications, 12 of 26 applicants were present (46 per cent), compared with six of the nine private applications (67 per cent). Children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in 11 matters.

The average age of all parties was very similar, at 37 for applicants and 36 for respondents. Most applicants (29) were female, while most respondents (28) were male. Courtlink data showed that one respondent was Indigenous and one applicant was pregnant.

Court participants reflected the culturally diverse community that is found in the Sunshine area, with eight applicants and nine respondents being recorded as having a culturally and linguistically diverse background. Interpreters were required in three matters, for both applicant and respondent: two in Tamil and one in Urdu. This was the highest number of interpreters seen in any of the courts visited.

³² Sunshine was observed on a Wednesday, which is notionally designated as a day for police applications for family violence intervention orders. However, private applications are also allowed, which is reflected in the data.

Half of all applications (17) were being sought against current intimate partners, while six were against former partners. There were also seven matters that involved parent/child relationships and three involving siblings.

Courtlink recorded one applicant as having a mental health disability, while six respondents were recorded as having a drug and alcohol disability.

Two-thirds of the matters (24) involved people with previous experience of family violence incidents, most of which involved 'numerous' individual incidents. In five of the cases someone had previously called police for a family violence incident, while in six someone had previously (once or twice) sought a family violence intervention order under either the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) or the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic). In each of these six matters, an order had been issued.

Courtlink data indicated that five respondents had a related criminal matter, but observational data suggested that this was actually eight. There was also one child protection matter. There were two cross-applications among matters heard on the day, one by a private applicant and one by police.

Sunshine seems to have much greater use of services among people who attend court for family violence matters than most of the other courts. Courtlink indicated that 17 applicants accessed services at court: three family violence services only, two police prosecutor plus legal services, and 12 legal services only. Almost all applicants (32) accessed additional services: two a family violence specialist³³ and 30 a police prosecutor.³⁴ In addition to services accessed at court, eight applicants were referred to services outside court: two to children's services/counselling, two a family violence specialist, one to a legal/family law service and three 'other' (unspecified) services. Among respondents, 13 accessed legal services at court, while three respondents accessed other services and six referrals were made to services outside court: two legal/family law and four unspecified. Although the magistrate made an explicit referral to the applicant support worker as part of her decision in only one matter, in the vast majority of cases where the affected family member was present, early in the hearing the magistrate asked whether she had yet seen the applicant support worker. Thus the data for referrals do not represent the full conversation that was occurring in the courtroom and should be treated with caution.³⁵

Of the nine private applicants, six had legal representation,³⁶ while one of the 26 police applications also had legal representation in addition to the police. Of the 22 respondents present in court, 12 had legal representation.

33 Courtlink does not identify which type of family violence specialist service was accessed, just that a 'family violence specialist' was seen.

34 There were 26 police initiated matters in Sunshine but Courtlink records that 30 people had accessed 'other' additional services. These services include those accessed outside of court at different times, so are not expected to reflect directly the number of people at court on the observation day.

35 In most of the matters observed, the applicant support worker had already been visited. In those where the affected family member had not yet seen the applicant support worker, the magistrate would sometimes adjourn proceedings to allow her to do so, providing the opportunity for her to return to the courtroom having had this discussion. No data were collected on this form of referral.

36 It was not possible to identify whether the legal representatives were from Victoria Legal Aid or from the Western Community Legal Centre.

2.5 DANDENONG

Dandenong had the second largest list of all courts on the day of the courtroom observation, with 42 matters, including one criminal matter. Of the 41 intervention order matters, there was a police applicant in 39 matters and a private applicant in only two.³⁷ Table 7 presents the key data from Dandenong.

TABLE 7: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—DANDENONG (SUMMARY DATA)

42 MATTERS (41 IVO; 1 CRIMINAL)—(2 PRIVATE IVO; 39 POLICE IVO)
	Applicants (of 41 IVO matters)		Respondents (of all 42 matters)
People present	15	37%	17	40%
People absent	26	63%	24	57%
	Applicants (of 41 IVO matters)		Respondents (of all 42 matters)
Average age	36		33
Gender
Female	34	83%	3	7%
Male	7	17%	39	93%
Respondent type
Current partner	15	36%
Former partner	12	29%
Parent/child	6	14%
Other family	8	19%
Prior history of violence
Prior FV incident	18	43%
Prior calls to police	8	19%
Prior IVO sought	11	26%
Prior IVO issued	9	21%
	Applicants (of 15 present)		Respondents (of 17 present)
Legal representation	1	7%	2	12%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

The applicant was present in 15 matters and absent in 26, while the respondent was present for 17 matters and absent for 24. Of the police applications (including both the 39 civil intervention order matters and the one criminal matter), 13 of 40 applicants were present (33 per cent) and one was unclear, compared with both of the private applicants being present (100 per cent). It is unclear why so many family violence victims were absent in Dandenong, but it is possible that police had told them that they were not required at court. Children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in 21 matters. This is the highest proportion of matters in which children were included (50 per cent); for most of the other courts, about one-third of matters included children on intervention orders.³⁸

³⁷ Dandenong was observed on a Thursday, which is notionally designated as a day for police applications for family violence intervention orders. However, private applications are also allowed, which is reflected in the data.

³⁸ This was not the case, however, in Ballarat, where children were included on intervention orders in two of the 37 intervention order matters on the police day and three of the 23 private matters. Maryborough also saw a small proportion of matters with children included on the order, in two out of the 10 intervention order matters heard that day. It is unclear whether there are any particular reasons for these disparities, or whether they are in fact artefacts of differential Courtlink recording practices.

The average age of applicants was 36, with respondents being somewhat younger (33). Most applicants (34) were female, with seven male applicants. Most respondents (39) were male, with three female respondents. Courtlink was not able to provide reliable data on Indigenous status, pregnancy status or culturally and linguistically diverse status, however observations suggested that eight applicants and seven respondents could be clearly classified (on the basis of visual identification only) as having a culturally and linguistically diverse background.³⁹ Five people needed interpreters: one applicant and one respondent in Farsi, one applicant in Dari, one respondent in Sinhalese and another respondent in Burmese.

Most of the applications were being sought against current (15) or former (12) intimate partners, although there were also six matters that involved parent/child relationships and eight that involved other family members.

While Courtlink data on disability were unreliable, observations suggested that one applicant had a cognitive disability and five respondents had a disability (one physical, one drug and alcohol, one cognitive, and two with a combination of mental health and drug and alcohol issues).

Almost half of the matters (18) involved people with previous experience of family violence incidents (although there was also a lot of missing data in Courtlink for this). In eight of the cases someone had previously called police for a family violence incident, while in 11 someone had previously sought a family violence intervention order (usually once or twice, but up to seven times), all of which were sought under either the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) or the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic). Finally, in nine of the cases, a family violence court order had previously been issued (usually once or twice), all of which were also issued under either the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) or the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic).

Courtlink data indicated that five applicants had a related proceeding: two family law, two another intervention order and one unknown. In addition, the observational data indicated one child protection matter as well. For respondents, 18 had related matters: 11 had additional intervention orders, eight had criminal matters and there were two family law matters (with some having more than one related matter). Observational data showed two additional child protection matters. There seemed to be only a single cross-application among matters heard on the day.

Courtlink data on service access are unreliable for Dandenong, due to missing data. While four applicants appeared to have support in the courtroom from a service provider, only one of the respondents appeared to have such support. A formal referral to a family violence support service was made in only one case, however in the vast majority of matters discussions with both the affected family member and the respondent included mention of the value of seeking assistance from Relationships Australia.⁴⁰ Indeed, the representative of this organisation entered court to answer the magistrate's questions at times. The limited data available from the observations indicated that legal representation was not used much in Dandenong: of the two private applicants, neither had legal representation, while one of the 39 police applications also had legal representation in addition to the police. Of the 17 respondents present in court, only two had legal representation. The reasons for this lack of use of legal services is not clear from the observational data, but may be due to the very large number of people in Dandenong Magistrates' Court generally. The proportion of parties—especially respondents—using duty lawyers in this court is significantly lower than in the other courts.

2.6 WANGARATTA

There were 11 intervention order matters and two family violence-related criminal matters on the list in Wangaratta. This is the second smallest list in the observational data, next to Maryborough, where there were 12 matters, including two family violence-related criminal matters.

Of the 11 intervention order matters, seven were private applicants (including one who was the parent of the affected family member) and four were police applications. Among all the courts observed, Wangaratta had the lowest proportion of all applications that were led by police (four of 11 intervention order matters, or 36 per cent), with only Geelong also having less than half (nine of 21 matters, or 43 per cent) of all matters being brought by the police. The small number of matters on the list in Wangaratta may mean that this proportion fluctuates substantially.

Table 8 presents the key data from Wangaratta.

³⁹ This is based on visual identification only, and might thus be missing a large number of people who identify as culturally and linguistically diverse but who do not immediately appear so. These data should therefore be treated with much caution.

⁴⁰ Data were not collected on the precise number of these mentions of Relationships Australia. Due to the lack of reliable data on referrals or services accessed at court, these measures are not included in the summary table.

TABLE 8: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—WANGARATTA (SUMMARY DATA)

13 MATTERS (11 IVO; 2 CRIMINAL)—(7 PRIVATE IVO; 4 POLICE IVO)
	Applicants (of 11 IVO matters)		Respondents (of all 13 matters)
People present	8	73%	5	38%
People absent	3	27%	6	46%
	Applicants (of 11 IVO matters)		Respondents (of all 13 matters)
Average age	33		40
Gender
Female	7	64%	1	8%
Male	4	36%	12	92%
Respondent type (of 11 IVO matters)
Current partner	1	9%
Former partner	7	64%
Parent/child	1	9%
Other	1	9%
Prior history of violence (of all 13 matters)
Prior FV incident	7	54%
Prior calls to police	unknown
Prior IVO/other order sought	5	38%
Prior IVO/other order issued	4	31%
	Applicants (of 8 present)		Respondents (of 5 present)
Legal representation	4	50%	3	60%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

The applicant was present for eight matters and absent for the remaining three. In three of the intervention order matters the respondent was present and in both criminal matters the defendant was present. The respondent was absent for six of the intervention order matters and the remaining two were unclear. Of the four police applications, the applicant was present in half, compared with six of the seven private applicants being present (86 per cent). Children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in four matters.

The average age of applicants was 33, with respondents being significantly older (40). This age gap is not seen in the other court locations. It is unlikely to be explained by the gender of the applicants and the respondents; while all but one of the respondents (and the two defendants) were male, the gender difference among the applicants was less stark, with seven females and four males. Courtlink data on Indigenous status, pregnancy status, culturally and linguistically diverse status and disability were too unreliable to be analysed, but on the basis of visual identification only, no parties were from a culturally and linguistically diverse background and no interpreters were required. This likely reflects the demographics of the local population in Wangaratta. Observational data suggest that no applicants had a disability but one respondent had a combination of cognitive, mental health and drug and alcohol issues.

Most of the applications (seven) were being sought against former intimate partners, with one against a current partner. One matter involved a parent/child relationship and one a former partner's new partner.

More than half of the matters (seven) involved people with previous experience of family violence incidents, although the data do not clearly identify the number who had previously called police. People in five matters had previously sought a family law order under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and orders had previously been issued under this act in four matters. According to Courtlink data, there were no previous family violence intervention order applications made or orders issued among the people appearing at Wangaratta Magistrates' Court on this day.

The observational data seemed to indicate that three respondents had related criminal matters and one had a related custody matter. While Courtlink identifies only a single cross-application among matters heard on the day, observational data suggest there may have been two.

Based on the observational data only, four of the eight applicants present and three of the five respondents/defendants present had legal representation (one of the criminal defendants and two of the intervention order respondents). There are no data available on whether parties had accessed relevant services prior to attending court and whether they had been referred to services.

2.7 MARYBOROUGH

Of the 10 intervention order matters in the list in Maryborough, there was a private applicant in four matters and a police applicant in the remaining six. Table 9 presents the key data from Maryborough.

TABLE 9: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—MARYBOROUGH (SUMMARY DATA)

12 MATTERS (10 IVO; 2 CRIMINAL)—(4 PRIVATE IVO; 6 POLICE IVO)
	Applicants (of 10 IVO matters)		Respondents (of all 12 matters)
People present	6	60%	7	58%
People absent	2	20%	2	17%
	Applicants (of 10 IVO matters)		Respondents (of all 12 matters)
Average age	42		38
Gender
Female	6	60%	4	33%
Male	4	40%	8	67%
Respondent type (of 10 IVO matters)
Current partner	4	40%
Former partner	3	30%
Parent/child	3	30%
Other family	0	0%
Prior history of violence (of all 12 matters)
Prior FV incident	8	67%
Prior calls to police	6	50%
Prior IVO sought	4	33%
Prior IVO issued	5	42%
	Applicants (of 6 present)		Respondents (of 7 present)
Legal representation	4	67%	2	29%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

For six of the intervention order matters the applicant was present and for two the applicant was absent, while the respondent was present for seven matters (including one of the criminal matters) and absent for two. The remainder were unclear for both applicants and respondents. Of the six police applications, the applicant was present in two (33 per cent), although two were unclear, compared with all of the four private applicants being present (100 per cent). Children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in two matters.

The average age of applicants was 42, with respondents being somewhat younger (38). Of the applicants in the 10 intervention order matters, six were female and four male, while four of the respondents were female and six were male. Both defendants in the criminal matters were male. Courtlink data recorded no Indigenous people and no pregnant parties, but there was substantial missing data. No one was recorded as being from a culturally and linguistically diverse background, with no interpreters required.

Applications were being sought against current (four) or former (three) intimate partners, with three matters that involved parent/child relationships.

Courtlink recorded six respondents as having a disability (three with drug and alcohol issues, two with mental health problems and one with both). This is the highest proportion (50 per cent of respondents/defendants) found in all the courts.

Two-thirds of the matters (eight) involved people with previous experience of family violence incidents, all of which involved 'numerous' individual incidents. In six of the cases someone had previously called police for a family violence incident, while in four someone had previously sought a family violence intervention order, up to five times (under either the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) or the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic)). Finally, in five of the cases, a family violence court order had previously been issued (under either the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) or the Crimes (Family Violence) Act 1987 (Vic)). The additional order imposed was possibly a police-led application, so may not have been recorded under 'previous applications'.

Courtlink data indicated that four out of the 10 intervention order respondents had a related criminal matter. Again, this is the highest proportion seen among the various courts.

There were two matters with cross-applications.

There is no information available in Courtlink of services accessed. From observations, all of the four private applicants had legal representation, while none of the police applications also had legal representation in addition to the police. Of the seven respondents present in court, two had legal representation, including in one of the criminal matters.

2.8 NEIGHBOURHOOD JUSTICE CENTRE

The Neighbourhood Justice Centre (NJC) heard both intervention order (16) and criminal matters (one that was family violence-related) on the day of observation. Of the intervention orders, half (eight) were sought by private applicants and half (eight) by police. Table 10 presents the key data from the Neighbourhood Justice Centre.

TABLE 10: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—NEIGHBOURHOOD JUSTICE CENTRE (SUMMARY DATA)

17 MATTERS (16 IVO; 1 CRIMINAL)—(8 PRIVATE IVO; 8 POLICE IVO)
	Applicants (of 16 IVO matters)		Respondents (of all 17 matters)
People present	8	50%	7	41%
People absent	8	50%	9	53%
	Applicants (of 16 IVO matters)		Respondents (of all 17 matters)
Average age	34		37
Gender
Female	12	75%	3	18%
Male	4	25%	14	82%
Respondent type (of 16 IVO matters)
Current partner	5	31%
Former partner	7	44%
Parent/child	3	19%
Other family	1	6%
Prior history of violence (of all 17 matters)
Prior FV incident	6	35%
Prior calls to police	5	29%
Prior IVO/other order sought	5	29%
Prior IVO/other order issued	4	24%
	Applicants (of 8 present)		Respondents (of 7 present)
Legal representation	7	88%	6	86%

Note: The numbers under 'people present/absent', 'gender' and 'respondent type' should sum to the number of matters but may not, due to missing data.

The applicant was present in half of the matters, while the respondent was present for seven matters and absent for nine. Of the eight police applications, the applicant was present in only one (13 per cent), compared with seven of the eight private applicants being present (88 per cent). Children were included as affected family members on the intervention order in three matters.

The average age of applicants was 34, with respondents being slightly older (37). Most of the applicants (12 out of 16) were women and most respondents (14) were men. Courtlink data indicate that two applicants were Indigenous, although there is a substantial amount of missing data. Five applicants and seven respondents are recorded as being from a culturally and linguistically diverse background, with one interpreter required, for a Vietnamese applicant.

Most of the applications were being sought against former (seven) or current (five) intimate partners, although there were also three matters that involved parent/child relationships and one that involved extended family.

From the observational data, two respondents appeared to have a disability: one with a drug and alcohol issue and the other with a combined mental health and drug and alcohol problem.

Although there was substantial missing data in Courtlink, six matters seemed to involve people with previous experience of family violence incidents. In five of the cases someone had previously called police for a family violence incident and in five someone had previously sought a family law order under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). In four of the cases, an order had previously been issued under this act. According to Courtlink data, there were no previous family violence intervention order applications made or orders issued among the people appearing at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre on this day.

Courtlink data indicated that three respondents and one applicant had another intervention order matter, while the observational data seemed to indicate that two respondents had a related criminal matter and one couple had a child protection matter. There were four cross-applications among matters heard on the day, two of which seemed to be police applications and two of which were unclear.

In contrast to all the other courts, most people at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre had accessed services at some point. On the day, seven of the eight private applicants present had legal representation, as did six of the seven respondents who were present. This is likely due to the higher level of service provision available at this court, with its focus on holistic, wrap-around support.

Courtlink data show nine applicants accessed services at court: four people saw a police prosecutor (all of these also saw a family violence service provider), one saw legal services only, one saw both legal services and a family violence service provider, and one saw a family violence service provider only. Other service types were accessed by seven applicants. A referral to a community-based service was made for eight applicants: four to a family violence service provider, two to a non-specialist service, two to counselling, and one to drug and alcohol services.⁴¹

Among respondents, seven accessed services at court—one accessed legal services and one spoke with Court Network plus legal services (data were not available on the other five respondents). These same seven respondents also had other legal services involved, while six of them were referred to services outside court: three to a family violence service provider, four to a non-specialist service, four to counselling, one to a drug and alcohol service provider and three to some other (unspecified) form of service.

The significant use of services among both applicants and respondents at the NJC reflects the unique approach of the Centre, which is to provide referrals and services to parties in a holistic, immediate fashion. The ability to link people with support on the day of court and beyond is one of the key characteristics of this more therapeutic approach to justice.

2.9 DISCUSSION: UNDERSTANDING THE CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS

To facilitate direct comparison across the eight courts visited, Table 11 compiles the data from Sections 2.1 to 2.8, and includes an overall average percentage on each measure.⁴²

⁴¹ Data allow for people to have accessed more than one type of service provider.

⁴² Only those measures that are relevant across all eight courts are included in the comparison table. Therefore, data are not included on the proportion of parties being supported in court by support workers, being referred to applicant or respondent support workers, or accessing court family violence services as these services are only available in some of the courts.

TABLE 11: CHARACTERISTICS OF PEOPLE WHO ATTEND COURT FOR FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS: SUMMARY

	BALLARAT (2 DAYS)	GEELONG	MELBOURNE	SUNSHINE	DANDENONG	WANGARATTA	MARYBOROUGH	NJC	AVERAGE
Total number of FV matters	68	21	32	35	42	13	12	17	30
Number FV-related criminal matters	8	-	-	-	1	2	2	1	-
Private applicants	43%	57%	19%	26%	5%	54%	33%	47%	35%
Police applicants	57%	43%	78%	74%	95%	46%	67%	53%	64%
Applicant present	65%	67%	53%	51%	36%	73%	60%	50%	57%
Applicant absent	35%	29%	28%	49%	62%	27%	20%	50%	38%
Respondent present	56%	33%	47%	63%	40%	38%	58%	41%	47%
Respondent absent	43%	52%	47%	37%	57%	46%	17%	53%	44%
Female applicant	87%	81%	78%	83%	81%	64%	60%	75%	76%
Male applicant	13%	19%	22%	17%	17%	36%	40%	25%	24%
Female respondent	24%	19%	12.5%	20%	7%	8%	33%	18%	18%
Male respondent	76%	81%	87.5%	80%	93%	92%	67%	82%	82%
Respondent: Current partner	23%	29%	50%	49%	36%	9%	40%	31%	33%
Respondent: Former partner	37%	29%	28%	17%	29%	64%	30%	44%	35%
Respondent: Parent/child	13%	38%	9%	20%	14%	9%	30%	19%	19%
Respondent: Other	25%	5%	9%	9%	19%	9%	0%	6%	10%
Prior FV incident	56%	48%	50%	69%	43%	54%	67%	35%	53%
Prior police call	6%	29%	31%	14%	19%	-	50%	29%	25%
Prior IVO/other order sought	6%	24%	25%	17%	26%	38%	33%	29%	25%
Prior IVO/other order issued	1%	14%	25%	17%	21%	31%	42%	24%	22%
Applicants represented (of those present)	46%	36%	35%	56%	7%	50%	67%	88%	48%
Respondent represented (of those present)	82%	86%	47%	56%	12%	60%	29%	86%	57%

Note: The averages for each measure do not necessarily sum to 100 per cent, due to missing data. The averages for the three measures under 'prior family violence incident' are subsets of the proportion for which there was a prior incident, so should not sum to 100 per cent.

Police versus private applications

According to interview participants, about 70 per cent of all intervention order applications across Victoria are made by police rather than by individuals. This figure is generally supported by the data, which show that an average of 64 per cent of all applications on the observation days were brought by police. This ranged from a low of 43 per cent in Geelong to a high of 95 per cent in Dandenong.⁴³

Many participants felt that police should be the applicant in more intervention order matters than they are currently. There are still severe incidents of family violence in which affected family members are being told to seek their own court orders. In court, the role of the police was seen as more than a prosecutorial role, but serving an important symbolic role as well. Having a police officer in uniform at the table lends an air of authority to the situation and makes it clear that this is a matter with the State, not with the individual victim. This can send a powerful message to the abuser that may not exist in private applicant matters.

Presence of parties at court

In many cases the respondent did not appear in court: on average, respondents were present in less than half of all matters (47 per cent). This can be problematic, as without a respondent present there is no opportunity for the court to impart the seriousness of the order and the consequences of breach and to hold the perpetrator accountable. Respondent absence also raises concerns with regard to procedural justice:⁴⁴ if the respondent is absent, there is no opportunity for him (and the vast majority of respondents are men) to be heard at court.

Although affected family members were more likely to attend court than were respondents, there was still a sizeable number of matters where the affected family member (even when she was listed as the applicant) did not appear, with an average of 57 per cent of applicants being present. When comparing applicant presence for police versus private applications, however, there are significant differences: on average, applicants are present in 44 per cent of police applications compared with 84 per cent of private applications. While affected family members may not be attending court in police-led matters, as they believe that the police can represent them properly and have maintained good communication with them, their absence nonetheless raises concerns about the effectiveness of the court process, its impact on women's safety and procedural justice issues. It also raises issues of court structure, as some women may be too frightened to come to a court that cannot provide safe, separate entrances, exits and waiting areas for victims of family violence.

Without an affected family member present—or at least without her consent—the police are not able to seek a ‘comprehensive’ intervention order.⁴⁵ Instead, a ‘limited’ order may be sought, prohibiting the respondent from committing further family violence and damaging property. While these orders clearly still include the most important prohibition—no family violence—they may be less effective in promoting safety in that they are not able to prevent contact and surveillance and cannot exclude the respondent from where the affected family member resides or works.

The question of whether affected family members should be required to attend court is fraught. On the one hand, the legislative limit on the form of the order means that police prefer the affected family member to be present. Attending court allows a family violence victim to be heard and to feel that the law is working to protect her. This is important for procedural justice and confidence in the system. Attending court also allows a family violence victim to access support services and to be provided with specialist advice to facilitate making informed decisions. On the other hand, attending court can be a traumatic experience for victims of family violence, especially in those courts where safe facilities are limited and the court building itself places the victim in danger. For example, Dandenong Magistrates’ Court provides a single waiting area that is cramped and crowded, and where physical assaults have been known to occur. Maryborough Magistrates’ Court is a single room so people all have to wait out the front of the building until their matter is called, or else sit in the courtroom. Even at Ballarat Magistrates’ Court, where there are separate waiting areas for applicants (downstairs) and respondents (upstairs), there is still only one entrance and abusers can peer down on victims from the balcony.

Relationship between victim and perpetrator

The most common relationship seen between applicants and respondents was between former intimate partners, comprising an average of 35 per cent of all relationships. The second most common relationship was current intimate partners, comprising 33 per cent of all matters. There was a significant minority of parent/child relationships as well, accounting for 19 per cent of the relationships overall.

43 The visit to Dandenong was undertaken on a notionally dedicated police application day. Different courts have different approaches to managing their two lists.

44 Procedural justice refers to the idea of fairness of process in the administration of justice and legal proceedings. It relates to participants’ perceptions of fairness in the process itself (such as the opportunity to have one’s say in court), rather than in the outcome.

45 A ‘comprehensive’ intervention order is one that includes clauses 1 through 8 of the legislation. A ‘limited’ order is one that involves fewer conditions than the full list, typically clauses 1 (no family violence) and 2 (no damaging property) and perhaps 8 (no causing others to do so). See Appendix B for a list of conditions that may be attached to intervention orders.

There was substantial variation across the courts in the nature of relationships among family violence intervention order matters. Current partner relationships accounted for half of all matters in Melbourne and almost half (49 per cent) in Sunshine, but only nine per cent in Wangaratta, where former partner relationships were seen in 64 per cent of all matters. On the other hand, former partners were involved in only 17 per cent of matters at Sunshine. In Geelong, the most common relationship (in 38 per cent of matters) was between a parent and a child.

The reasons for this variation are unclear, but interview participants suggested that there has been an increase in the number of matters brought by parents against their adult children—particularly their sons—due to violence associated with drug use, especially methylamphetamine, or ‘ice’. The use of this drug had also resulted in an increase in the severity of family violence injuries.

History of family violence

Many of the parties were not new to family violence, with some having not only called police before but also having been involved with intervention orders previously. On average, just over half (53 per cent) of all matters involved people who had experienced family violence previously. This varied across the courts, from a low of 35 per cent at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre to a high of 69 per cent in Sunshine. Despite more than half of all matters involving prior family violence, only one quarter (25 per cent) involved prior calls to the police and prior intervention order applications (also 25 per cent). Intervention orders had previously been issued in 22 per cent of matters.

There is thus significant attrition in the figures between the prevalence of family violence in the observed sample and the prevalence of people seeking assistance from the police or the courts. This may indicate a lack of confidence in the system’s ability to respond effectively to family violence, or perhaps a level of fear on the part of the affected family member to report the violence to authorities. It may also be indicative of insufficient support for women who are seeking to take action against the perpetrator.

Courtlink data show that some people had been experiencing family violence for many years—up to 26 years in one instance in Melbourne. Data from Geelong, Sunshine and Maryborough show that people had experienced ‘numerous’ incidents over the years, and data from Dandenong show that one person had sought an intervention order on seven previous occasions. One applicant at Ballarat had been granted an intervention order on four previous occasions. The data on prior experiences thus indicate that victims of family violence are often repeat victims, but that they suffer multiple incidents of violence before calling police or coming to court.

This raises questions not only for the court but for the family violence system as a whole: why are we unable to break the cycle of family violence for some people? Although intervention orders are but one mechanism within the system for preventing family violence, the repeated use of these orders does raise the issue of the extent to which intervention orders are actually effective in preventing family violence.

In some of the locations included in this research, Victoria Police has a dedicated ‘family violence unit’.⁴⁶ While each station adopts its own approach to the work of the family violence unit, for some the focus is on these repeat offenders and high-risk families who appear time and again in family violence incidents. It would also be useful for the court and its associated services to have an understanding of its repeat clients, to identify what else may be done to stop the violence among this group.

Service provision

Despite there being a range of services available in some courts, the most common service that was accessed was legal in nature. That is, many people (an average of 48 per cent of applicants and 57 per cent of respondents, or an average of 53 per cent overall) had some sort of private or legal aid representation, or representation by the local community legal centre. Not all parties, however, were represented, with enormous variation across the courts in the proportion of respondents represented, ranging from a very low 12 per cent in Dandenong to a high of 86 per cent in Geelong⁴⁷ and at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre.

Self-represented parties often struggle to keep up with court processes. Their matters tend to take additional court time as the magistrate has to explain both substantive (content) issues and more administrative (procedural) ones. Where additional services were available—such as applicant or respondent support workers—they were frequently used, with both the magistrate and the registry staff making referrals. Not all of the courts observed, however, have these support workers: a respondent support worker is only available in Ballarat, while applicant support workers are available in Ballarat, Melbourne, Sunshine and Dandenong. Interview participants unanimously highlighted the value of these staff. For example, representatives from one community legal centre felt that support workers ‘make a big difference’, contributing to perceptions of fairness among respondents and to perceptions of having their voices heard among applicants. Courts Services Victoria has also identified their value, with respondent support workers currently being installed in all of the state’s headquarter courts.

⁴⁶ The family violence unit that has been established in some police stations typically comprises a small team of two or three people dedicated to investigation, follow-up and liaison with victims in family violence matters.

⁴⁷ The low proportion of legal representation in Dandenong may be partly due to the very high proportion of police applicants, with fully 95 per cent of all matters being led by police. In contrast, Geelong had the highest proportion of private applicants (57 per cent, despite the observation occurring on a notional police application day), which may partly explain the widespread use of legal representation at that court.

The only court where a greater range of services was accessed, and where most parties had accessed services at court and also in the community, was at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre. Given that the fundamental approach of the Centre revolves around holistic service provision, this is to be expected, but it would require significant input of resources and funding to allow this approach to be adopted elsewhere.

Demographic characteristics

Gender

Across all the court locations visited, the vast majority of applicants were female⁴⁸ (76 per cent) and respondents, male (82 per cent), with Dandenong having fully 93 per cent of respondents being male. This is consistent with the general understanding that in family violence, while both men and women may be victims, the vast majority of victims are women and the vast majority of perpetrators are men.

Compared with these overall figures, there was a higher proportion (28 per cent, or 14 out of 51 matters) of female respondents in cases involving non-intimate partner violence.⁴⁹ These cases typically involved a parent or parent figure (such as a step-parent) applying for an intervention order against an adult daughter (eight matters), although there were also a handful of cases (three matters) involving applications sought by one sister against another. In the 37 matters where an intervention order was sought against a male non-intimate partner, a similar pattern emerged, with most (24 matters) being sought by a parent or parent figure against an adult son and some (nine matters) being sought by a sibling against a brother.

Cultural and linguistic diversity

Although varying significantly by court location, the number of people of culturally and linguistically diverse background was small overall, with only a handful requiring interpreters. The most diverse court populations seemed to be in Dandenong and Sunshine, reflecting their local communities. This has implications for the family violence service providers in those areas, in that specialist providers need to ensure that they are able to provide services that are both culturally appropriate and linguistically suitable. For example, inTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence—a service provider for people of non-English speaking backgrounds—provides assistance at both Dandenong and Sunshine Magistrates' Courts one day per week. There is also a dedicated South Asian men's behaviour change program that is designed specifically for perpetrators from this community.⁵⁰

While there were few Indigenous people identified in this research, a culturally appropriate response needs to be available for this community as well. Women's Resource Information and Support Centre (WRISC) Family Violence Support Service provides a service to Indigenous women one day a week at Ballarat Magistrates' Court in order to address issues particular to this community. For example, Indigenous women tend not to seek help or report family violence as readily as non-Indigenous women. By the time the police are notified or assistance is sought from WRISC, the violence has typically escalated to severe levels.

In both of these instances, it is clearly important not only for service providers to be able to provide a culturally sensitive response, but for the court itself to do so. In particular, magistrates must understand the subtleties of family violence in various communities in order to appreciate the dynamics of the violent situations and to tailor an appropriate response in the circumstance.

Disability

Given the difficulty of collecting data on disability status through observation (as the presence of a disability is not always obvious), and the paucity of reliable data in the court's Courtlink system, little may be determined about the prevalence of disability among parties in family violence matters. Where data are available, they indicate that, when there is a disability, it tends to co-exist with drug and alcohol abuse.

⁴⁸ More than two-thirds (68 per cent) of the applicants were current or former intimate partners of the respondent.

⁴⁹ The counts in this paragraph exclude the group of eight matters involving the single family of four women in Ballarat as they would substantially skew the data: this one family accounted for eight of the 23 matters (35 per cent) heard in Ballarat on the day of observation.

⁵⁰ South Asian victims of family violence tend to experience significant pressure from their own families and those of their husbands to withdraw their applications for intervention orders. They are often subject to pressure via Facebook and telephone, with concerns about 'saving face' taking priority over concerns about the safety of women and their children.

2.10 IMPLICATIONS FOR THE FAMILY VIOLENCE SYSTEM

Presence of parties at court

Given the importance of affected family members attending court—both in terms of the type of order that may be imposed and in terms of having an opportunity to be heard—the court experience should be made as simple and safe as possible. All participants, even at the newest courts, bemoaned the lack of appropriate facilities for family violence matters. Court should be a safe environment for people to attend and have their matters heard. Instead, in most of the courts visited, there were obvious and significant problems with court layout and architecture that clearly could compromise people's safety.

One magistrate said that the physical structure of the court is a 'real issue'. In some courts there is no safe haven and people are in a confrontational situation where anxiety levels are high. In small regional courts where there is no waiting area, or even larger courts where the layout is poor and cramped, affected family members 'have to run the gauntlet at the courthouse when they go in to seek their orders'. At the very least, the availability of a separate family violence counter would seem a useful addition.

While the new court building under development at Shepparton is being built with precisely such safety considerations at the fore, the older and smaller buildings remain in dire need of renovation to provide a safe, secure and calm environment.

While a wholesale rebuilding of all courts to make them safer is unlikely to be possible, the Magistrates' Court may nonetheless be able to introduce changes that can help victims of family violence to feel more confident in attending court. These might include an improvement to (or installation of) remote witness facilities, as well as greater and easier use of such facilities. For example, there is a remote witness facility in Sunshine, but it is somewhat isolated from court staff and people waiting to be called can feel as if they have been forgotten. This sort of isolation is unlikely to help victims' feelings of safety.

A greater separation of spaces for applicants and respondents would also be helpful, with careful consideration being given to the location of associated services. Again Sunshine may be used to illustrate this point, as applicant support services are located at the far end of the waiting area, such that victims of family violence must walk past everyone (possibly including the perpetrator) to reach them.

Some of the courts make use of side entrances when there are safety concerns, allowing security personnel to escort women into and out of the building without risk being seen. This is only possible in those building that provide a side entrance, but thought could be given to installing additional entrances in those without them.

History of family violence

Given that more than half of all matters involved people with a history of family violence, a focus on repeat offenders and high-risk families might provide an effective way to address a substantial proportion of family violence incidents. Some of the dedicated family violence units within Victoria Police focus specifically on families with a history of family violence as a way of reducing repeat offending. Interview participants in those areas where a dedicated unit exists believe that it contributes significantly to the system's response to family violence, providing improved investigation, better communication with affected family members and better outcomes at court. A focus on high-risk families is consistent with research from other fields such as community treatment and supervision of offenders, which shows that more intensive interventions work better with higher-risk people.

The data also highlight the attrition in family violence matters, with only one-quarter of victims reporting their prior incidents to police or applying for orders in the courts. If this reticence is based on lack of trust in the authorities to respond appropriately or effectively, then both police and courts need to examine their processes and practices to ensure that obstacles are not being placed in the way of people reporting.

Service provision

Providing a broader range of services, and more staff from each provider, depends on the availability of funding. Legal services in particular should be sufficiently funded to ensure that all parties are represented at court, and having dedicated family violence support services is critical as well.

All interview participants were supportive of having, at the very least, applicant support workers at court, as well as respondent support workers where possible. The value of this sort of service lies in easing people through the court process and referring and linking them with support services.

In some courts, such as Ballarat, extensive referrals were made to local services. This is possibly due in part to a certain confidence that magistrates have in the service providers, likely based on a good relationship between the Magistrates' Court and the support services. The value of such a relationship means that magistrates can have confidence that the referrals they make will result in people being successfully linked in with support. Having support services attend court gives them a presence that undoubtedly contributes to fostering this relationship.

Demographic characteristics

Although the data were not able to provide an accurate picture of the prevalence among family violence matters of people from a culturally and linguistically diverse background or people with a disability, interview participants nonetheless identified a need for more targeted service provision, such as men's behaviour change programs in different languages, but also in terms of having more interpreters available at court. Service provision for Indigenous communities was also identified as requiring additional funding, especially given the reluctance of Indigenous women to seek help until the violence has become severe.

2.11 ISSUES FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION

While some of the issues identified during the research were beyond the original remit of the work, they are included within this section in each chapter as a way of reflecting the full range of issues that were raised.

These issues for further consideration (and those throughout this report—in Chapter 3 and Chapter 4) are based primarily on the interviews, having been raised by various participants. The points raised were all supported by the observations.

Based on both the data and the interviews, the following issues offer opportunities for further consideration and discussion:

1. Improve court structure: Undertake a review of court facilities to determine if any improvements can be made to improve safety, thus facilitating the presence of affected family members at court.
2. Focus on repeat offending: Implement a permanent, dedicated family violence unit within Victoria Police stations to focus on high-risk families (but not to the exclusion of others) and to improve investigation of family violence matters, to enhance communication with family violence victims and to facilitate better outcomes at court.
3. Address lack of trust in the family violence system: Review police and court processes and practices to ensure that they do not present obstacles to people seeking help. For example, ensure that the Victoria Police Code of Practice is being adhered to as intended.
4. Increase service provision at court: Implement applicant and respondent support workers at additional courts, provide sufficient funding to legal services so that all parties can have representation, and provide funding to family violence support services so that they can be active both in the court and in the community.
5. Provide culturally appropriate services: Increase the funding available for culturally and linguistically appropriate support services, including those for Indigenous communities.

3. OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS

This chapter draws on the courtroom observations and associated file reviews to examine the outcomes⁵¹ of family violence matters heard in the various court locations. As in Chapter 2, the findings are presented separately for each court location in order to allow for any differences among courts to become evident.

3.1 BALLARAT

Tables 12a (police matters) and 12b (private matters) present the key data on outcomes of family violence matters from Ballarat.⁵²

TABLE 12A: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—BALLARAT POLICE APPLICATION DAY (SUMMARY DATA)

37 IVO MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	4
Adjourned with order	2
Adjourned no order	1
Interim order	14
Final order	17
Variations	6
Extensions	1
Revocations	3
Orders with conditions	24
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	10
Limited conditions	10
Other condition combinations	4
Referral to services	17
Orders of 12 months	9
Orders more than 12 months	7
Orders less than 12 months	2
Consent orders	14 of 17 respondents present (82%)

Note: The numbers indented under 'orders with conditions' should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters due either to missing data or, in some instances, where more than one outcome was recorded for a particular case.^a The data in this table refer to intervention order matters only.

a Some matters included more than one outcome. For example, matters could be adjourned and then later in the day, struck out. There is also double counting of the 'adjourned with order' matters, which are also counted in the 'interim order' category as these matters were adjourned with an interim order in place. Thus the values in the tables in this chapter should not be expected to sum to the number of matters in each table.

⁵¹ Data on the number and nature of orders issued (interim versus final and whether a variation, extension or revocation) have largely been taken from Courtlink rather than from the courtroom observations, as these were not always clear on the day.

⁵² In each of the tables in this chapter, outcomes relating to criminal matters (that is, 'adjourned criminal proceedings' and 'sentence imposed') have been removed for the sake of clarity of focus on intervention order matter outcomes.

TABLE 12B: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—BALLARAT PRIVATE APPLICATION DAY (SUMMARY DATA)

23 MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	4
Adjourned with order	10
Adjourned no order	2
Interim order	14
Final order	3
Variations	1
Extensions	3
Revocations	0
Orders with conditions	17
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	16
Limited conditions	1
Other condition combinations	0
Referral to services	1
Orders of 12 months	2
Orders more than 12 months	0
Orders less than 12 months	10
Consent orders	12 of 15 respondents present (80%)

Note: The numbers indented under 'orders with conditions' should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters.

Of the 45 matters (37 intervention order and eight criminal matters) heard on the police application day, eight matters were adjourned with criminal proceedings on foot while in three criminal matters a sentence was imposed: one matter that included three breach charges and two resist emergency worker charges was sentenced to a community correction order (CCO) with judicial monitoring, including conditions to participate in mental health treatment and men's behaviour change program; one matter including assault, breach, recklessly causing injury charges was sentenced to a 12 month CCO with a Justice Plan (intellectual/cognitive impairment); the third criminal sentence was also given a CCO for breach of intervention order, with the full order remaining in place.⁵³ In one criminal matter of contravention of an intervention order the accused failed to appear, so an arrest warrant was issued.

One additional intervention order matter was adjourned with no intervention order in place and two were adjourned but with an interim variation made. Four matters were struck out or withdrawn, three of which had been applications for revocation.

Of the remaining police applications, 14 interim and 17 final orders were made, with 24 of the orders having conditions imposed. No conditions were imposed to attend a men's behaviour change program, but six people were ordered to be assessed for a men's behaviour change program order.⁵⁴ After assessment, according to the respondent support worker, one person did not require the program (reason not stated) but was being referred to additional services; two were eligible and would sign up for a program; one had already completed a men's behaviour change program so was receiving referrals only; and two would be assessed the next day (the matters finished too late to be assessed on the day).

⁵³ There were only five sentences imposed across all the courts: the three in Ballarat and two in Wangaratta. While the three in Ballarat were definitely CCOs, one of the two in Wangaratta was probably a CCO and the other was possibly a CCO. None was clearly a prison term. Based on the observations, it appears that imprisonment is not commonly imposed for a breach of an intervention order. While the very small sample of sentences imposed means that no definitive statement may be made on this issue, the observations do accord with interview participants' views that threats of imprisonment for breach that are made when the order is imposed are rarely followed through when the order is breached.

⁵⁴ Only the family violence division courts at Ballarat and Heidelberg may issue an order that a respondent attend a men's behavior change program.

Of the police-initiated intervention orders imposed, 10 orders had ‘full’ conditions, while 10 were clause 1 (no family violence) and 2 (no damaging property) or clauses 1, 2 and 8 (no causing others to act) orders.⁵⁵ Two orders had an additional condition—an exclusion order from the affected family member’s home or work. One order included clauses 1, 2, 8 and an exclusion, as well as conditions prohibiting surveillance or electronic publication of information about the affected family member. Finally, one order had only clause 1 as a condition. There was thus quite a bit of variation among conditions imposed, being tailored to the specific circumstances of each case.

In seven matters the affected family member was referred to the applicant support worker and/or Berry Street, while in 10 the respondent was referred to the respondent support worker.

Of the 31 orders made on the police day, nine were for 12 months, four were for five years, two were ‘until further order’, one was for 24 months, one was for six months and one was a three-week extension. The remainder were unclear. These orders were among the longest made in any of the courts.

Of the 23 private matters, four were struck out or withdrawn and two were adjourned with no order made. Fourteen interim orders and three final orders were made. All 17 of the orders had conditions imposed. No conditions were imposed to attend a men’s behaviour change program and no respondents were referred for men’s behaviour change program assessment.⁵⁶ One respondent was referred to the respondent support worker. All but one of the orders was a ‘full’ order (16), while one was a clause 1, 2 and 8 order.

Of the 17 orders made on the private application day, two were issued for 12 months. Ten short-term orders (eight weeks or shorter) were imposed ‘until the case is finalised’ and then adjourned—eight of them, involving a single family, for ‘further and better particulars’. The durations of the remainder were unclear, but overall they were far shorter than on the police application day.

Fourteen of the police matters and 12 of the private applicant matters were finalised by consent (17 of the intervention order respondents were present on the police day and 15 on the private applicant day).⁵⁷

⁵⁵ See Appendix B for a full description of conditions available under each clause.

⁵⁶ While six people from the police day were ordered to be assessed for a men’s behavior change program, none was on the private applicant day. It is unclear whether this is a function of the type of applicant (police versus private) or whether the difference reflects different approaches and preferences of the individual magistrates.

⁵⁷ This count—replicated in the Ballarat table in this section—excludes six of the defendants in the criminal matters who were also present at court. The number of respondents in Table 12a therefore differs from the number seen in Table 3a in Section 2.1 above, which includes the 17 intervention order respondents plus the six criminal defendants who were present.

3.2 GEELONG

Table 13 presents the key data on outcomes of family violence matters from Geelong.

TABLE 13: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—GEELONG (SUMMARY DATA)

21 MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	2
Adjourned with order	4
Adjourned no order	4
Interim order	7
Final order	7
Variations	3
Extensions	0
Revocations	2
Orders with conditions	14
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	4
Limited conditions	10
Other condition combinations	0
Referral to services	0
Orders of 12 months	5
Orders more than 12 months	0
Orders less than 12 months	4
Consent orders	3 of 7 respondents present (43%)

Note: The numbers indented under 'orders with conditions' should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters.

Of the 21 matters heard at Geelong, two of the matters were struck out or withdrawn, while eight were adjourned or stood down, with four having just an adjournment and four with both an adjournment and an order made. There were 15 orders made: seven interim orders and seven final orders with one unclear, three of which were variations, while two were revocations. Fourteen orders had conditions imposed, four of which included all eight of the main legislated clauses. None of the orders included a condition to attend a men's behaviour change program and none involved a referral to services.⁵⁸ Geelong was one of only two courts (in addition to Sunshine) to issue a condition to cancel or suspend a firearm license in one matter.

Of the 15 orders made, five were for 12 months, one was for one month, and three were until the next hearing or until the order would be finalised. The remainder were unclear. These orders are generally shorter than those seen on the police day at Ballarat.

Of the seven matters where the respondent was present, three were finalised by consent.

⁵⁸ While the power to issue a counseling order, requiring assessment of suitability to attend a men's behavior change program, is vested only in Ballarat, Heidelberg, Frankston and Moorabbin courts, magistrates at some other courts have the practice of imposing a condition to an intervention order that requires attendance at such a program. If the respondent consents to this condition, it is enforceable.

3.3 MELBOURNE

Table 14 presents the key data on outcomes of family violence matters from Melbourne.

TABLE 14: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—MELBOURNE (SUMMARY DATA)

32 MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	4
Adjourned with order	0
Adjourned no order	4
Interim order	6
Final order	16
Substituted service	1
Variations	3
Extensions	1
Revocations	0
Orders with conditions	22
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	7
Limited conditions	8
Other condition combinations	1
Referral to services	10
Orders of 12 months	7
Orders more than 12 months	2
Orders less than 12 months	5
Consent orders	10 of 15 respondents present (67%)

Note: The numbers indented under 'orders with conditions' should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters.

Of the 32 matters heard at Melbourne, four of the matters were struck out or withdrawn, while four were adjourned or stood down with no order made and one was adjourned with criminal proceedings on foot. There were 22 orders issued: six interim orders and 16 final orders, as well as one order made for substituted service. Three of the orders were variations. All of the 22 orders had conditions imposed, seven of which included all of the main legislated clauses and eight of which were 'limited' orders, with clause 1 and 2 or clause 1, 2 and 8. Of these 'limited' orders, two also included a condition of contacting the Men's Referral Service. One of the orders was more tailored, containing clauses 1, 2 and 8 as well as a specified distance condition and an exclusion condition. In addition, six people were referred to services: two to a victims' assistance program, one to the Department of Health and Human Services, one to ISIS Primary Care and one to mediation. Finally, two of the orders included a condition to attend a men's behaviour change program.⁵⁹

Only the family violence division courts at Ballarat and Heidelberg, and more recently the courts at Frankston and Moorabbin, may issue a counselling order that requires a respondent to be assessed for suitability to attend a behaviour change program. Those respondents ordered for assessment at Ballarat were typically assessed on the day and, upon returning to the courtroom immediately after assessment, were mandated to attend.⁶⁰ However, magistrates at other courts are being innovative in the way they craft their orders, attaching conditions to attend programs in place of orders. Hence the magistrate in Melbourne imposed conditions on two respondents to contact the Men's Referral Service and on two other respondents to attend a behaviour change program.

⁵⁹ In the summary table for Melbourne, 'referral to services' includes both a condition to contact a service provider and a referral to a service provider without a discrete condition being imposed.

⁶⁰ Only one person in Ballarat did not see the respondent support worker on the same day for assessment, due to the lateness of the hour when his matter was first heard. He was ordered to return the next day for assessment.

Of the 22 orders made, seven were for 12 months, three were for six months, two were until the next hearing or until the order is finalised, one was indefinite, one was for two years and four were unclear.

Of the 15 matters where the respondent was present, 10 were finalised by consent.

3.4 SUNSHINE

Table 15 presents the key data on outcomes of family violence matters from Sunshine.

TABLE 15: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—SUNSHINE (SUMMARY DATA)

35 MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	3
Adjourned with order	0
Adjourned no order	14
Interim order	5
Final order	13
Variations	3
Extensions	0
Revocations	1
Orders with conditions	18
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	8
Limited conditions	8
Other condition combinations	1
Referral to services	31
Orders of 12 months	7
Orders more than 12 months	1
Orders less than 12 months	3
Consent orders	14 of 22 respondents present (64%)

Note: The numbers indented under 'orders with conditions' should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters.

Of the 35 matters heard at Sunshine, three of the matters were struck out or withdrawn, while 14 were adjourned or stood down, apparently without orders made.⁶¹ There were 18 orders issued: five interim orders and 13 final orders, three of which were variations, while one was a revocation. All 18 of the orders had conditions imposed, nine of which included a condition to attend a men's behaviour change program. Of the 18 orders, eight could be classified as 'comprehensive' or 'full' orders while eight were a version of a 'limited' order, with just clause 1 (no family violence), clause 1 and 2 (no damage property), or clause 1, 2 and 8 (no causing others to do so). In addition, six orders involved a condition to contact the Men's Referral Service. Sunshine was the only other court (in addition to Geelong) to issue a condition to cancel or suspend a firearm license in one matter.

⁶¹ While these matters were clearly adjourned, it was unclear from observations whether an order was also made, and Courtlink did not have data on any orders. As such, these adjournments are counted as being with no orders made.

The magistrate at Sunshine made much use of referrals to specialist family violence services either within the court or in the community. Of all the parties at court, 13 were referred to services of some kind: one respondent was referred to both the Courts Integrated Services Program (CISP) for drug and alcohol assistance and to the mental health nurse, one matter involved respondent referrals to both CISP and a men's behaviour change program as well as applicant referral to the in-court applicant support worker, seven respondents were referred to the Men's Referral Service, one to both the South Asian men's behaviour change program and family violence services, two to both the South Asian men's behaviour change program and inTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, and one person was referred to Relationships Australia. In addition, every one of the 18 applicants or affected family members present at court was asked if she had spoken with the applicant support worker, whose role in Sunshine Magistrates' Court is clearly pivotal. The availability of comprehensive support services both within Sunshine Magistrates' Court and in the local community is obviously a valuable resource.

The extensive use of referrals to family violence services in Sunshine may also be partly due to the specialist family violence knowledge and experience of the magistrate, who also sat at Ballarat's Family Violence Court Division on one of the observation days.⁶²

Of the 18 orders made, seven were for 12 months, one was for six months, two were for one month or less and one was 'until further order'. Durations for the remainder of the cases were unclear.

Of the 22 matters where the respondent was present, 14 were finalised by consent, although many were unclear.

3.5 DANDENONG

Table 16 presents the key data on outcomes of family violence matters from Dandenong.

TABLE 16: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—DANDENONG (SUMMARY DATA)

41 IVO MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	4
Adjourned with order	4
Adjourned no order	0
Interim order	17
Final order	20
Variations	7
Extensions	3
Revocations	0
Orders with conditions	37
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	20
Limited conditions	12
Other condition combinations	0
Referral to services	7
Orders of 12 months	11
Orders more than 12 months	5
Orders less than 12 months	1
Consent orders	13 of 17 respondents present (77%)

Note: The numbers indented under 'orders with conditions' should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters. The data in this table refer to intervention order matters only.

⁶² Pursuant to s 4H(3) of the Magistrates' Court Act 1989 (Vic), the Family Violence Court Division courts may only be constituted by magistrates assigned to the Division by the Chief Magistrate, who must have regard to the magistrates' knowledge and experience relating to family violence. As a 'gazetted' role, it is a defined position for which particular candidates are selected and in which they work for an indefinite period, rather than being a task that is allocated to different magistrates at different times as part of an ordinary magistrate's duties. In practice, this means that more highly specialised and experienced magistrates fill the role in the Family Violence Court Division courts, making the role part of a specific career path for those individuals.

Of the 42 matters (41 intervention order matters and one criminal matter) heard at Dandenong, four were struck out or withdrawn, one was adjourned with criminal proceedings on foot and four were adjourned or stood down but resulted in orders being issued. Altogether, there were 37 orders issued: 17 interim orders and 20 final orders, three of which were extensions, seven were variations, plus an additional one that was both an extension and a variation. All of the orders had conditions imposed. From observations, two matters included a condition to attend a men’s behaviour change program. Of the 37 orders, 20 were ‘full’ orders, one was clause 1 only, while 11 were ‘limited’ orders, with clause 1, 2 and 8. The remainder were unclear.

There were a number of referrals made to Relationships Australia,⁶³ which had a support worker present on the day either in the courtroom itself (to answer questions directly from the magistrate) or in the building. Seven people were referred to services of some kind: two were referred to legal representation, one to both the Victims Register with regard to the release of her abuser from prison and to the applicant support worker to develop a safety plan, and five were referred to a combination of a men’s behaviour change program, Relationships Australia and/or the Salvation Army.

Of the 37 orders made, 11 were for 12 months, four were for five years, one was ‘until further order’ and one was for 10 months. Durations for the remainder of the cases were unclear. The Dandenong orders, like those at Ballarat, thus tended to be long.

Of the 17 matters where the respondent was present, 13 were finalised by consent, although others were unclear.

3.6 WANGARATTA

Table 17 presents the key data on outcomes of family violence matters from Wangaratta.

TABLE 17: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—WANGARATTA (SUMMARY DATA)

11 IVO MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	3
Adjourned with order	1
Adjourned no order	2
Interim order	3
Final order	3
Variations	2
Extensions	0
Revocations	0
Orders with conditions	6
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	6
Limited conditions	0
Other condition combinations	1
Referral to services	0
Orders of 12 months	2
Orders more than 12 months	0
Orders less than 12 months	2
Consent orders	2 of 3 respondents present (67%)

Note: The numbers indented under ‘orders with conditions’ should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters. The data in this table refer to intervention order matters only.

⁶³ Relationships Australia is the men’s referral service and men’s behaviour change program provider for Dandenong Magistrates’ Court.

Of the 13 matters (11 intervention order and two criminal matters) heard at Wangaratta, each of the two criminal matters received a sentence,⁶⁴ while three of the intervention order matters were struck out or withdrawn. One matter was adjourned with an interim order and two were adjourned with no order. Six orders were issued: three interim orders and three final orders, two of which were variations. All of the six orders had conditions imposed, none of which included a condition to attend a men's behaviour change program. All of these orders were 'full' orders. In one matter an additional condition was imposed relating to not hacking the other party's Facebook account and not stealing their identity. No referrals to services were made in court.

Of the six orders made, two were for 12 months, two for one month and the remainder were unclear.

There were three intervention order matters where the respondent was clearly present, six where the respondent was clearly absent and in two it was unclear.⁶⁵ Of the three matters where the respondent was clearly present, two were finalised by consent.

3.7 MARYBOROUGH

Table 18 presents the key data on outcomes of family violence matters from Maryborough.

TABLE 18: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—MARYBOROUGH (SUMMARY DATA)

10 IVO MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	0
Adjourned with order	0
Adjourned no order	2
Interim order	2
Final order	5
Unknown order type	1
Variations	2
Extensions	0
Revocations	0
Orders with conditions	8
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	3
Limited conditions	2
Other condition combinations	1
Referral to services	0
Orders of 12 months	4
Orders more than 12 months	0
Orders less than 12 months	2
Consent orders	5 of 6 respondents present (83%)

Note: The numbers indented under 'orders with conditions' should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters. The data in this table refer to intervention order matters only.

⁶⁴ In one matter involving an assault the defendant was to be assessed for a community correction order. The other matter involved multiple charges, including assault and recklessly causing injury. The defendant was already in prison on remand and had a long history of offending, as well as an acquired brain injury and bipolar disorder. He had a sentence indication that he was likely to receive a prison term, but he was also to be assessed for a community correction order. For both, courtroom observations suggested that the matters were adjourned pending the assessments, but Courtlink data recorded a sentence imposed for each. While the first matter would most likely have been a community correction order, it is not possible to deduce the sentence for the second matter.

⁶⁵ This count—replicated in the Wangaratta table in this section—excludes the defendants in the two criminal matters. The number of respondents in Table 17 therefore differs from the number seen in Table 8 in Section 2.6 above, which includes the three intervention order respondents plus the two criminal defendants who were present.

Of the 12 matters (10 intervention order and two criminal matters) heard at Maryborough, two matters were adjourned or stood down with no orders being issued, while two matters were adjourned with criminal proceedings on foot. Altogether, there were eight orders issued: two interim orders, five final orders and one that was unclear. All eight of the orders had conditions imposed: three were ‘full’ orders, two were ‘limited’ orders, with clause 1 and 2, and one order included clauses 1 and 2 plus a prohibition on electronic publication about the affected family member. No referrals were made to services (there are very limited services available in Maryborough) and no conditions were imposed to attend a men’s behaviour change program.

Of the eight orders made, four were for 12 months, one was for six months and one was for one month. The remainder were unclear.

Respondents were present for six of the intervention order matters and one of the criminal matters. Of the six intervention order matters where the respondent was present, five were finalised by consent, although the other was unclear.⁶⁶

3.8 NEIGHBOURHOOD JUSTICE CENTRE

Table 19 presents the key data on outcomes of family violence matters from the Neighbourhood Justice Centre.

TABLE 19: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—NEIGHBOURHOOD JUSTICE CENTRE (SUMMARY DATA)

16 IVO MATTERS
Struck out/withdrawn	2
Adjourned with order	1
Adjourned no order	0
Interim order	6
Final order	8
Variations	5
Extensions	0
Revocations	0
Orders with conditions	14
Full (clause 1–8) conditions	1
Limited conditions	4
Other condition combinations	1
Referral to services	8
Orders of 12 months	6
Orders more than 12 months	3
Orders less than 12 months	0
Consent orders	4 of 6 respondents present (67%)

Note: The numbers indented under ‘orders with conditions’ should sum to the number of orders with conditions but do not necessarily, due to missing data. Generally, the numbers in the table do not sum to the number of matters. The data in this table refer to intervention order matters only.

Of the 17 matters (16 intervention order matters and one criminal matter) heard at the NJC, two of the matters were struck out or withdrawn, one was adjourned but an interim order was issued and one was adjourned with criminal proceedings on foot. There were 14 orders issued: six interim orders and eight final orders, five of which were variations. All 14 of the orders had conditions imposed: two with clause 1 only, two with clauses 1 and 2, one ‘full’ order and one with clauses 1, 8 and an exclusion clause. The remainder were unclear. No orders included a condition to attend a men’s behaviour change program.

⁶⁶ This count—replicated in the Maryborough table in this section—excludes the defendants in the two criminal matters. The number of respondents in Table 18 therefore differs from the number seen in Table 9 in Section 2.7 above, which includes the six intervention order respondents who were present plus the one criminal defendant who was present.

Courtlink data show that there were some referrals made to specialist family violence services either within the court or in the community. Of all the parties at court, eight were referred to services of some kind: six to CoHealth community health centre, three to the Salvation Army, six to Berry Street, four to Victoria Legal Aid, one to Court Network, one to Fitzroy Legal Service, and one to the Koori Justice worker.⁶⁷

Of the 14 orders made, six were for 12 months, two were for two years, one was indefinite and the remainder were unclear.

The defendant in the criminal matter was present in court, as were six of the respondents from intervention order matters. Of these six matters where the respondent was clearly present, four were finalised by consent.⁶⁸

3.9 DISCUSSION: UNDERSTANDING OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS

To facilitate direct comparison across the eight courts visited, Table 20 compiles the data from Sections 3.1 to 3.8, and includes an overall average on each measure. The data in the table are proportions of the number of matters, except for the order duration data, which are proportions of the number of orders imposed.

⁶⁷ Some of the people were referred to more than one service.

⁶⁸ This count—replicated in the Neighbourhood Justice Centre table in this section—excludes the defendant in the criminal matter. The number of respondents in Table 19 therefore differs from the number seen in Table 10 in Section 2.8 above, which includes the six intervention order respondents who were present plus the one criminal defendant who was present.

TABLE 20: OUTCOMES OF FAMILY VIOLENCE INTERVENTION ORDER MATTERS—SUMMARY

	BALLARAT (60 MATTERS)	GEELONG (21 MATTERS)	MELBOURNE (32 MATTERS)	SUNSHINE (35 MATTERS)	DANDENONG (41 MATTERS)	WANGARATTA (11 MATTERS)	MARYBOROUGH (10 MATTERS)	NJC AVERAGE (16 MATTERS)
Struck out/ withdrawn	13%	10%	13%	9%	10%	27%	0%	13%
Adjourned with order	20%	19%	0%	0%	10%	9%	20%	11%
Adjourned no order	5%	19%	13%	40%	0%	18%	20%	14%
Interim order	47%	33%	19%	14%	41%	27%	20%	30%
Final order	33%	33%	50%	37%	49%	27%	50%	41%
Interim + Final	80%	71%	69%	51%	90%	55%	80%	73%
Variations	12%	14%	9%	9%	17%	18%	20%	16%
Extensions	7%	0%	3%	0%	7%	0%	0%	2%
Revocations	5%	10%	0%	3%	0%	0%	0%	2%
Orders with conditions	68%	67%	69%	51%	90%	55%	80%	71%
Full conditions	43%	19%	22%	23%	49%	55%	30%	31%
Limited conditions	18%	48%	25%	23%	29%	0%	20%	24%
Other condition combinations	7%	0%	3%	3%	0%	9%	10%	5%
Referral to services	30%	0%	31%	89%	17%	0%	0%	27%
Orders of 12 months	23%	33%	32%	39%	30%	33%	50%	35%
Orders more than 12 months	15%	0%	9%	6%	14%	0%	0%	8%
Orders less than 12 months	25%	27%	23%	17%	3%	33%	25%	19%
Consent orders	26 of 32 respondents present (81%)	3 of 7 respondents present (43%)	10 of 15 respondents present (67%)	14 of 22 respondents present (64%)	13 of 17 respondents present (77%)	2 of 3 respondents present (67%)	5 of 6 respondents present (83%)	4 of 6 respondents present (67%)

Note: The figures for interim plus final orders for Geelong and Maryborough include one additional order of unknown type.

Orders imposed

Overall, the most common outcome in the court is for an order to be issued: in almost three-quarters of matters (73 per cent) an interim or final order was issued. Final orders were more common than interim orders (41 per cent of matters received a final order, compared with 30 per cent receiving an interim order). Depending on the progression of the matter through the court, an interim order was often imposed until a final order could be put in place.

Only a small proportion of matters were struck out or withdrawn (12 per cent), often in police matters where the affected family member had failed to appear multiple times. In one police application for variation from a safe contact order to a full no contact order, the affected family member did not appear. The magistrate did not want to grant the variation without her being at court, asking ‘why would I change the order if no one is here?’ before striking out the application. Matters were also struck out or withdrawn in private applications when the applicant failed to appear and had not contacted the court about her preferences, or when the court had been notified that the parties had reconciled or mediation had been successful. Applications for variation were generally struck out if the applicant did not appear at court.

Overall, 16 per cent of matters involved the variation of an existing order, although this varied substantially by court location, from nine per cent in Melbourne and Sunshine to 31 per cent at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre. Very few extensions or revocations were recorded, with each accounting for only two per cent of matters.

Adjournments

While the court most commonly issues an order in intervention order matters, there are still many adjournments being made. An adjournment without any order imposed was made in 14 per cent of matters overall, ranging from none in Dandenong and the Neighbourhood Justice Centre to 40 per cent in Sunshine. This significant variation may be a function of the ability of the local police prosecutor or civil advocate to provide the magistrate with the information needed to make an informed decision about the matter at hand; without adequate information, a matter is often adjourned for ‘further and better particulars’. A further 11 per cent of orders were adjourned, but with an interim order issued as well.

In some instances, matters are adjourned in order to synchronise with the hearing date for an associated criminal matter. In others, though, adjournments are made to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident. The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again).

Adjournments for criminal hearings

Although only occurring in five per cent of matters across the eight courts, interview participants were particularly concerned about adjourning intervention order matters until criminal matter hearings when there is a substantial delay in bringing a criminal matter before the court. Criminal matters can take months before they are heard, while intervention order matters can be brought to court within days. The delay in hearing a family violence-related criminal matter has implications for the affected family member in terms of the trauma involved with returning to court, and also for police, who find it more difficult to run a successful prosecution after a substantial delay. With the passing of time, affected family members may change their mind and request that charges or intervention orders be withdrawn, or they may refuse to provide a statement to police, or they may be pressured to change their minds about proceeding. The burden of proof required for a criminal charge contributes to this delay, in that police must spend more time on a criminal matter than a civil one, investigating it to a level of ‘beyond reasonable doubt’. This then becomes a resourcing issue, as more police time is required for the investigation.

To address this problem, Dandenong has recently implemented a ‘fast-track’ program that aims to reduce the time required to bring family violence-related criminal matters to court. Since 1 January 2015, police have prioritised family violence-related criminal matters, working to complete investigations on these matters as soon as possible. Anecdotally, this pilot program has been a great success, with defendants pleading guilty earlier in the process. According to police, the pilot has been having excellent results at court. They are having significantly more success in running a matter at contest because matters are coming to court faster and there are ‘significantly fewer withdrawals’. When a matter takes too long to come to court, affected family members typically lose confidence in the system, so this pilot has likely had broader positive consequences as well.

Adjournments for further information

Most of the adjournments, though, seemed to be needed to allow police to conduct additional investigation for the civil application.⁶⁹ At times this involved providing further and better particulars about the incident—perhaps when police had not had sufficient time with the victim to elicit the full details of what happened. Other times the police prosecutor or civil advocate was not able to inform the magistrate about the affected family member’s wishes with regard to the intervention order. For example, if the police informant had not spoken to the victim since the initial police report, then it could be unclear to the prosecutor if the conditions sought by police would be appropriate. In these circumstances, the matter was adjourned to allow the police to contact the victim to ascertain her or his wishes. One police prosecutor noted that these briefs tend, on the whole, not to contain as much information as criminal briefs, and suggested a mandatory checklist for police informants to complete when preparing briefs. There were also many adjournments to allow police to determine if any other orders were in place in a matter—orders such as family law orders or child protection orders.

The lack of adequate information in some applications—especially around the associated orders—was a source of particular frustration for every magistrate interviewed and for many of the police prosecutors. Magistrates bemoaned the problem of ‘silo data’, and often had to ask about related family law or child protection matters, experiencing significant frustration when told the police did not know. The concern for magistrates was two-fold: they did not want to issue an order that would be contrary to an order already in place (especially with regard to child contact orders made under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)), and they felt they could not adequately tailor an order without knowing what else was happening with the family. According to one magistrate, this lack of information means that ‘it takes too long to work out what’s going on’.

Magistrates noted that there is no information sharing even within the courts environment. The Children’s Court Conciliation Conference, for example, includes an extensive risk assessment. None of this information, however, is available to magistrates hearing related family violence intervention order matters, with one magistrate lamenting that a lack of information sharing means she has no access to the valuable information therein. Part of this issue is the different court management systems used by the courts; while Magistrates’ Court clerks use Courtlink to enter their information, the Children’s Court uses LEX, to which the clerks only seem to have limited access.⁷⁰

Police prosecutors felt a similar sense of frustration. One police prosecutor sends a copy of the next day’s list to the Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS) to ask if any of the list people are also DHHS clients. But he is only able to do that as he has a personal relationship with the DHHS employee. According to this police prosecutor, a ‘big glitch in the system is I don’t know what DHHS is up to’. He suggests that DHHS should appear in court each week on intervention order list days, as ‘that’s the missing link’. Other prosecutors also suggested that DHHS be directly involved, sharing information more readily and participating in better coordination across agencies, allowing for a more collective approach to family violence.

With inadequate sharing of information across systems, the intersections among them can be obscured. Outcomes in related criminal matters, child protection matters or family law matters can affect both risk management and safety planning for victims of family violence. Decisions may be made that do not take into account all relevant circumstances. The consequences of lack of information sharing are thus potentially substantial. Instead, a magistrate suggested that a more holistic, integrated approach is needed, using a ‘public health model’ that allows proper information sharing. Family violence is not just a justice issue, but an issue for health, mental health, education, human services, homelessness, drug and alcohol services and youth support workers. Information sharing across fields is critical.

The RAMPS trial—adopting a multi-agency approach to developing risk assessment management plans for high-risk families—allows agencies to come together to discuss holistic approaches to particular families. It would be useful to expand this integrated model, but, according to one participant, ‘piecemeal silo funding causes significant issues for an integrated sector’. Without integration, a more holistic approach remains elusive.

⁶⁹ An exact count of these matters was not recorded.

⁷⁰ It is unclear how much access the Magistrates’ Court has to the Children’s Court case management system, as this was not discussed in interviews. Regardless, though, the court does not have time for the clerk to be looking up the name of every individual in every matter.

Conditions

In the majority of matters (71 per cent), an order was imposed with conditions that were clearly articulated by the magistrate. In every court except Ballarat and Geelong, every order imposed clearly included at least one condition.⁷¹ There are two main combinations of orders used: the ‘full’ or ‘comprehensive’ order that typically includes clauses 1 to 8 (with or without exceptions, as appropriate), and the ‘limited’ order that typically includes clauses 1 (no family violence) and 2 (no damaging property), with or without clause 8 (no causing others to do so).⁷² While occasionally additional conditions were attached to address specific circumstances of a family, these were uncommon. In addition, when children were included as affected family members on intervention orders, their conditions were the same as the parent’s conditions—they did not have a separate regime of conditions attached.

The absence of affected family members had a substantial impact on the conditions imposed, as police cannot seek to exclude the respondent from his home without the affected family member’s consent. In a number of matters, the affected family member was not present and so police, even though wanting a comprehensive order, had to be willing to seek a more limited order instead. In one interesting matter, the affected family member was adamant that she did not want an intervention order at all. She testified that she understood the consequences of this and that, as an articulate and thoughtful person, she appreciated police concern but did not want an order in place. This was an interesting example of how police interests are not always the same as those of the victims of family violence. Indeed, one police prosecutor recommended that every family violence victim should have her own legal representation, as police are not there to represent the victim but to represent the State.

Few conditions included referrals to men’s behaviour change programs, Men’s Referral Service or other providers. While magistrates may have mentioned such services in their remarks to the parties, the referrals seemed informal rather than a formal requirement of a condition. This may be a function of the availability of services in the local area, or else may be reflective of the general approach of each magistrate. Those who did impose conditions for a respondent to connect with a support service were being creative in attempting to tailor an appropriate response for people who seemed in need of access to such services.

Consent orders

Most of the orders where respondents were present were finalised by consent (69 per cent), with only a small proportion of matters being adjourned for contest. For example, only one matter was adjourned for a directions hearing at Geelong, Melbourne, the Neighbourhood Justice Centre, and Maryborough, with no such adjournments on the day of observation at Wangaratta. At Dandenong, three of the 41 matters were adjourned for a directions hearing, while at Sunshine there were four (although two of these were cross-applications, so matters were contested for two families). There were more such adjournments at Ballarat: on the police application day, one matter was adjourned for directions and two were adjourned to hear the intervention order matter and the criminal matter at the same time. On the private applicant day, there were 10 adjournments for preparing ‘further and better particulars’ for the directions hearing (this was the family of three sisters plus a niece, all of whom had cross-applications, and another family of two with cross-applications). A further one was adjourned to the criminal hearing date.⁷³

There seems to be no (observable) specific relationship between the nature of the conditions imposed and the willingness of the respondent to consent to the order.⁷⁴ Consent orders were observed in matters where limited conditions were imposed, in matters where comprehensive conditions were imposed and in matters where a men’s behaviour change program order or condition was included.

The most common duration for orders was 12 months (35 per cent of orders imposed were for 12 months), although 19 per cent were for less than 12 months, with some extremely short orders, such as a one-week adjournment with an interim order issued until the next hearing. Only eight per cent of orders were for more than 12 months, with some being extremely long (indefinite, or ‘until further order’).

⁷¹ In Ballarat, 41 out of the 48 orders imposed appeared to have conditions included. However, the inclusion of conditions was not always clear during courtroom observations. In Geelong, 14 out of 15 orders appeared to have conditions included. Given that every intervention order must include at least one condition, this finding is a function of the difficulty of observation rather than the nature of the orders imposed.

⁷² Many people used the terminology of ‘full’ and ‘limited’ orders during both the courtroom observations and the interviews. This is not to suggest that a ‘limited’ order is less adequate or effective in protecting victims of family violence. As one magistrate noted, it is clause 1—no family violence—that is the most important of all the conditions. The terminology is replicated here to provide an accurate representation of the information that was collected for this research.

⁷³ Although it is not uncommon for magistrates to adjourn an intervention order matter so that it can be heard alongside a criminal matter, a real problem arises when the police are unsure of the date of the criminal hearing. This occurred several times in Ballarat, such that the magistrate said it was a ‘waste of everyone’s time’ to be hearing matters with no parties present and with police unable to say when the criminal matter was listed.

⁷⁴ No specific relationship was observed in the courtroom: the nature of the conditions and the willingness of the respondent to consent to the order are both likely to be subject to negotiations outside the courtroom.

Referrals to support services

Another issue to become evident from the observational and file review data is the differential use of referrals to support services across the courts. In all courts there was little use of conditions to attend a men's behaviour change program or to contact the Men's Referral Service. Some courts made more use of local community or in-court services, such as the prolific referrals to Relationships Australia seen in Dandenong or the regular referral to the applicant support worker in Sunshine and the respondent support worker in Ballarat.

Although Ballarat, as the only family violence division court included in this research, was the only court able to order participation in a men's behaviour change program, the order was used less frequently than expected. On the police application day, six respondents were ordered to be assessed for a men's behaviour change program order. As part of her decision making, the magistrate checked whether respondents were eligible for the program, based initially on their postcodes (as the order is only available for respondents who live within nine postcodes around the Ballarat local area).⁷⁵ From observations, it seemed as though the postcode restriction disqualified a number of respondents from being considered for this order, which would have had implications for the magistrate's decisions about the nature of the order to be imposed.

A number of participants felt that the ability to order participation in a men's behaviour change program (to impose a counselling order) should be expanded. One magistrate suggested it would make 'a huge difference' to be able to do so. Participants at Ballarat were split on whether the ability to order program participation has an impact on consent rates. For some, respondents may be less likely to consent to an order if they think they will be made to undertake a program, but by the time they get to a directions hearing, they are likely to consent. For others, consent rates are not affected by these orders; the big issue in Ballarat is gun licensing, with people refusing to consent as they become 'prohibited persons' under law.⁷⁶ For these interviewees, the ability to order program participation should be expanded to other courts and should also be expanded to include same-sex and non-intimate partner relationships.⁷⁷

Referral to services does not take place in a vacuum. Magistrates seem well aware of the services available and do not refer people to non-existent services. In those parts of the state where services are limited, referrals are not used. But in those areas where services are good, referrals are common. The Neighbourhood Justice Centre is a good example of this, where the combination of community organisations and in-court wrap-around services mean that the magistrate can be confident that his referrals are acted upon. One legal service provider was proud to say that 'people get much more holistic service provision here than in other courts', with the Neighbourhood Justice Centre 'much better at making links between family violence and interrelated issues'.

Adequate resourcing of service providers was a common theme among interview participants. One community family violence service provider, whose organisation has been working at 60 per cent above capacity for the last year, says that staff cannot cope. She herself says that 'I don't feel I'm giving clients the best I can give'. As another support worker said, without additional resources, 'women are going to slip through the cracks and be left behind'. She felt that her service could be duplicated and still struggle to meet the demand. For her, the pressure of increasing demand has been felt acutely: 'it's just getting ridiculous', and 'calls are coming in all the time'.

The need for better resourcing for men's behaviour change programs was also noted. Some programs have wait lists of seven or eight months (one location reported that, as of April 2015, no places were available until February 2016). To address demand for these programs more generally (in the context of both family violence and criminal sentencing), Corrections Victoria is currently in the process of purchasing additional programs for men who have been sentenced and placed on a community correction order. In addition, the court is considering the option of purchasing additional places through the current arrangements of the court-mandated counselling programs.

Timely initiation in these programs is seen as critical. One magistrate noted that the research shows that the speed of responding to the action, certainty of consequences and monitoring of behaviour all work to reduce reoffending, but for this to work a program must be available in a timely fashion. If a respondent has to wait many months to join a program, the window of opportunity to involve him while he's open to intervention may close. As one community legal centre participant said, there is a need to ensure that 'everyone who wants to help themselves can help themselves'.

One of the solicitors interviewed suggested that there is an 'illusion of safety' in the court: magistrates feel that they are helping to protect the community by ordering men to complete programs, but programs are simply not available. The lack of availability of programs is a significant gap in responding to family violence.

75 In addition to the postcode criterion, orders may only be imposed if the relationship is with a current or former intimate partner (not, for example, with a parent or sibling), if the respondent is male and the affected family member female (therefore not in same-sex intimate relationships), and if the respondent is over the age of 18.

76 On the two observation days in Ballarat, none of the orders made included a condition to cancel or suspend a firearm license. Across all the courts observed, this condition was only imposed in two matters: one in Geelong and one in Sunshine.

77 These cohorts would likely require a different program model, as men's behaviour change programs have been designed for addressing intimate partner violence in the context of heterosexual relationships.

Lack of availability of support services in court may have unforeseen but serious consequences. In those courts where support services are only present in court on family violence listing days, there may be differential court outcomes based on the day one's matter is heard. Assessment of risk levels will be affected by whether the person can be linked in with support; if the matter is heard on a day when support services are not present at court, the person may be assessed as presenting a greater risk. According to a police prosecutor, this 'changes the dynamic of how decisions are made' and is essentially a form of 'postcode justice'. The prosecutor called for more consistent availability of support services, so that their presence or absence does not differentially affect decision making.

As one magistrate said, 'if the court hasn't made a referral, what are we doing?'

Participants also noted the value of having an applicant support worker, and expressed a desire to have respondent support workers as well, as in Ballarat. Having specialist in-court support makes 'a massive difference' to people's perceptions that they are being supported. It facilitates the 'best possible outcome in court' and 'makes the process a lot smoother for everybody', as people feel 'less angry because they feel they're being heard'.

The applicant support worker is important in helping the applicant to understand court processes and outcomes. This is particularly important as applicants need to be fully informed about the conditions of the order and to participate in the tailoring of conditions to provide the best protection possible in the specific circumstances of the case. Some participants expressed concern that, at times, women do not understand what they are agreeing to, especially when they agree to accept an undertaking. An undertaking does not provide the protection of an order, and can seriously compromise safety.⁷⁸ Without dedicated support, victims who are confused, or who have a poor command of the language, or who are pressured by others may accept an undertaking when an intervention order would be more appropriate. And according to a family violence service provider, an undertaking is 'not worth the paper it's written on'. Even a police prosecutor said that he 'never agrees' to an undertaking as it simply cannot protect properly. Having an applicant support worker can therefore have implications for applicants' safety, as well as helping them through the difficult court process.

3.10 IMPLICATIONS FOR THE FAMILY VIOLENCE SYSTEM

Adjournments

There seems to be substantial value in reducing the time required to bring family violence-related criminal matters before the court. The fast-track pilot in Dandenong began on 1 December 2014.⁷⁹ It was implemented following recognition of research and experience both in Australia and internationally that lengthy delays in responding to family violence can lead to further, possibly more severe offending. Since its inception, the program has expanded to include Broadmeadows, Shepparton, Ringwood and Ballarat, with Frankston to join in 2016. It represents a significant investment of resources by both the Magistrates' Court and Victoria Police.

The fast-track program appears to be working well to bring matters before the court substantially faster, improving outcomes for police and, presumably, for affected family members as well, who are more likely to remain willing to take part in the court process. By facilitating participation in court, affected family members are less likely to lose confidence in the process. Indeed, the Magistrates' Court has seen a significant decrease in the number of cases being withdrawn in the fast-track courts, dropping dramatically from 30 per cent to just under four per cent.⁸⁰

This approach could be implemented in other locations around the state, with the support of the police, to expedite the progression of family violence matters through the courts. This would not only make the justice process easier on victims of family violence, but would also save the court time and resources with fewer contested matters.

There is clearly a need for better information sharing between the courts and DHHS. Magistrates are attempting to craft orders without access to compete information, which may have implications for the effectiveness of the intervention orders and ultimately for people's safety. Even within the courts environment itself, information sharing could be improved. Better flows of information between the Magistrates' Court and the Children's Court, for example, could provide magistrates with far better information on the family situation. While there would certainly be jurisdictional issues to be addressed before information could be shared more readily, the role of information in effective decision making renders this issue an urgent one.

There is also an argument for the police informants providing better information to police prosecutors or civil advocates, in order to reduce the need for adjournments to seek further and better particulars. Having complete information readily available at court would significantly reduce the work of the court in family violence matters.

⁷⁸ Police may still respond to criminal offences committed in the context of family violence, but they are not responding to the breach of an order per se.

⁷⁹ The pilot program was given effect under Practice Direction No. 10 of 2014.

⁸⁰ Documentation provided by the Magistrates' Court of Victoria, 30 September 2015.

Conditions

Given the restriction that a comprehensive order may not be imposed without the affected family member present, some of the police interviewed suggested that this requirement be removed. However, this may be a contentious issue, as in a handful of matters the affected family member did not appear because they objected to police intervention. Nonetheless, it may be worthy of further consideration.

On a related issue, some participants suggested that affected family members in police applications should have their own legal representation. This was rare in the matters observed, with only a handful of people in police applications being represented separately. While most of the time this arrangement may work, as police typically act in the best interests of the affected family member, there were several matters where the affected family member made it extremely clear that she did not want the application to proceed. This presented a difficulty to the magistrate when the affected family member was in court, as discussed in section 3.9 above.⁸¹

Referrals to legal and support services

One of the most consistent messages to come from this research is the need for service providers to be better funded, which would allow them to operate with more staff. While the number of family violence incidents both in the community and in the justice system has increased ‘exponentially’ over the last few years, there has been little or no concomitant increase in the amount of funding, meaning that service providers are being stretched ever more thinly. This applies both to in-court providers, such as community legal centres and Victoria Legal Aid, and to community-based organisations as well.

There are particular issues around funding for service provision in small regional areas such as Maryborough. Interview participants noted the unique nature of such towns that makes the need for local services more pressing. Services such as duty lawyers attend Maryborough Magistrates’ Court from Bendigo or Ballarat, but the local community maintains a certain disconnection from the work of outsiders. Maryborough residents tend to ‘look after their own stuff’, with a common attitude of ‘why would you go to the cops?’ In a community without trust in the justice system (or perhaps institutions more generally), a lack of local service providers adds an additional obstacle to people seeking help for family violence issues.

The implications of this are significant and worrying. Lack of sufficient service provision for respondents means that men are not able to access programs in a timely way, increasing the likelihood of subsequent violence. Lack of sufficient service provision for applicants means that women are more likely to find it difficult to deal with violent situations and to keep their children safe, having to manage violent partners without access to appropriate services or support. Lack of sufficient legal support in court means that applicants may accept orders that they do not fully understand and that do not fully protect them, and that respondents are unlikely to appreciate fully the consequences and terms of their orders.

Additionally, and perhaps less a matter of funding than organisational priorities, every participant at a court where the local police had a dedicated family violence court liaison officer was strongly supportive of the need for this position. The court liaison officer is critical in assisting negotiations, following up with affected family members both before and after hearings, and generally ensuring that court processes run far more smoothly. The need for permanent, gazetted court liaison officers within the police is clear.

Additional court resources dedicated to family violence would clearly be extremely valuable. For example, the placement of respondent support workers in every headquarter court has just commenced, which will make a substantial difference. With this worker in place, the door is opened for the possibility of expanding the ability of the court to order participation in a men’s behaviour change program; in Ballarat, the magistrate first orders an assessment with the respondent support worker and, if deemed suitable, will then order program participation. Although not all participants were sure of its influence on consent rates, and actual participation would of course be limited by the practical constraints on the availability of placements in these programs, the value of the order in pushing respondents to seek help seems undeniable.

With the obvious value that applicant and respondent support workers bring to parties in those courts where they are present, it is clear that their presence should be expanded as much as possible around the state. In small courts this is not necessarily practicable, but in the larger, busier courts, they could provide a valuable service indeed.

⁸¹ In those matters where the affected family member was not in court but had expressed her wishes not to have an order in place, her absence meant that the magistrate took the word of the police prosecutor and granted an interim order, albeit a ‘limited’ one, per legislative requirements.

As well as allocating additional court resources, one magistrate suggested that the court needs to focus more on what she called ‘trifecta men’—men who are subject to an intervention order, who are facing criminal charges and who have an associated child protection matter for the children to be removed. These men often have unresolved mental health issues and substance abuse problems, are unemployed and are angry. ‘Statistically, they produce the most amount of work for the court’: they appear in lots of variations (the applicant may have her own mental health and other issues), they often breach intervention orders and bail conditions, and they have many secondary child protection matters as the child is removed, then returned, then removed again, and so on. Adding to the complexity, the applicant may decide to reconcile, then change her mind, then change it once again. This magistrate has spent substantial time convincing both service providers and the court (via its therapeutic justice project) that a special focus is needed on these men: ‘If we provided a better level of service to his problems, the flow on for our throughput of work would be much more dramatic’.

If the court and services providers could make better use of triage processes based on risk assessment, then the small proportion of men who account for a large proportion of the workload of the court could be better serviced, potentially having a significant impact on reducing demand on the court across criminal, civil and child protection spheres.

3.11 ISSUES FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION

Based on both the data and the interviews, the following issues offer opportunities for further consideration and discussion:

1. Fast-track family violence-related criminal matters: Consider expanding the program into other courts to reduce the delay in bringing family violence-related criminal matters to court. This will have substantial resource implications for both police and the court.
2. Improve information-sharing across agencies: Investigate mechanisms for allowing police and the courts to access information from, in particular, the Department of Health and Human Services, possibly by asking DHHS to attend court. This would facilitate the magistrate making a more informed decision and also a more integrated response to family violence.
3. Improve information-gathering within Victoria Police: Develop both a checklist of information for police officers to investigate and include in their briefs, as well as a training course on preparing briefs of evidence in family violence matters. Develop guidelines for the Police Code of Practice stipulating timelines for completion of follow-up investigations.
4. Review the need for affected family members to be at court: Consider the appropriateness of the requirement for affected family members to be present to be able to grant a comprehensive order. Enable affected family members to attend court via secure, remote video facilities that still allow them to participate in the process—with its potential to empower victims of family violence—while not compromising safety.
5. Review the counselling order: Expand the ability of courts beyond the family violence divisions to make counselling orders for men to attend behaviour change programs. Such programs must be sufficiently funded so that they may adopt best practice principles based on research about the effectiveness of programs of varying duration and intensity.⁸²
6. Institute family violence court liaison officers: Work with Victoria Police to insert a family violence court liaison officer in more court locations to negotiate between parties, assist police prosecutors and provide an additional specialist service to family violence victims.

⁸² See, for example, Durham University’s Project Mirabal research (available at <https://www.dur.ac.uk/criva/projectmirabal/>).

4. COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS

This chapter draws primarily on the interviews conducted with key personnel to examine court processes in family violence matters heard in the various court locations. Once again, the findings are presented separately for each court location as differences in court specialisation are likely to have a profound effect on court processes.

4.1 BALLARAT

Ballarat is one of Victoria's two specialist family violence court divisions. As such, it has a high level of specialisation across all aspects of the court: specialist magistrates with significant family violence experience, a functionally and physically separate family violence registrar, separate waiting areas for applicants and respondents, both an applicant and a respondent support worker, a police family violence unit and family violence court liaison officer, and family violence service providers in the community that attend court.

Tables 21a (police matters) and 21b (private matters) present the key data on court processes in family violence matters for Ballarat.⁸³

TABLE 21A: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—BALLARAT POLICE APPLICATION DAY (SUMMARY DATA)

45 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	37
Entering as criminal	3
IVO applicant present	18
IVO respondent present	17
Explanation given—total	15
Explanation given—terms only	0
Explanation given—penalties only	3
Explanation given—both	12
Average duration	6:59

Note: The numbers in this table for how cases originally entered the court should sum to the number of matters but do not, due to missing data.

TABLE 21B: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—BALLARAT PRIVATE APPLICATION DAY (SUMMARY DATA)

23 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	23
Entering as criminal	0
IVO applicant present	21
IVO respondent present	15
Explanation given—total	0
Explanation given—terms only	0
Explanation given—penalties only	0
Explanation given—both	0
Average duration	7:10

Of the 45 matters listed on the police day, 37 entered the courts as intervention order matters, while there were three that originated as criminal matters. Five were unclear.⁸⁴ On the private applicant day, all 23 matters entered as intervention orders.

⁸³ Data on how matters entered court were taken from Courtlink. The remaining data in the tables are based on observations.

⁸⁴ While there were eight criminal matters heard in Ballarat Magistrates' Court on the day, it is not necessarily the case that they all entered the court system initially as criminal matters: some may have originated as intervention order matters. As Courtlink data for the remaining five matters are missing, the entry status has not been inferred but has been left as unknown.

The magistrate on the police day was a very experienced magistrate with significant specialisation in (and understanding of) family violence matters. Her knowledge and understanding were reflected in her efforts to explain her orders to those respondents who were present. In 12 of the 17 intervention order matters where the respondent was present, the magistrate explained both the terms of the order (going through each condition) and the consequences of failure to comply, including quite specific information about the maximum fine amount and the maximum prison term for first and subsequent breaches. In a further three matters the magistrate explained only the consequences of breach.⁸⁵

On the following day, with a magistrate who was filling in and does not specialise in family violence matters, orders were not explained.

Ballarat highlighted the differences in court processes that can happen when different magistrates hear family violence matters. Indeed, one family violence service provider noted that having a non-specialist magistrate makes it ‘very noticeable—the lack of understanding and awareness of family violence’. For this provider, lack of awareness causes problems for trust but is also disempowering, when coming to court should be an ‘empowering experience’: ‘it’s your chance to have a voice’. One participant saw this disparity particularly in differential responses to breach: if a breach is heard by a family violence division magistrate, the breach is usually taken seriously, but if there is a non-specialist on the bench, it becomes ‘flip a coin’.

The issue of specialisation and education is further discussed below in section 4.9, as it applies across all courts participating in this research.

The average duration for matters heard at Ballarat Magistrates’ Court on the police day was six minutes and 59 seconds, while for private matters the average was seven minutes and 10 seconds. The police list started at 9:45am and the last family violence matter was completed at 5:35pm. This was the longest sitting day of all courts observed. The private applicant list began at 10:06am and finished at 1:07pm.⁸⁶

The police list at Ballarat was extremely long, with 45 matters, and took almost seven hours to complete.⁸⁷ While other courts, such as Dandenong, had lists that were almost as long, none took as long to complete. Even with a shorter average duration for each matter, the Ballarat list, being so very long, brought with it a very long day for all concerned.

With such a full list, it quickly becomes apparent to the observer that there is insufficient time available for everyone in the court to be able to provide the best service that they can. Almost every participant in the consultations—both in Ballarat and in other courts—expressed frustration at the time constraints they face on a daily basis. While not all lists were as big as Ballarat’s, magistrates, court staff, solicitors and support services all felt the pressure of trying to see as many people as possible in too short a time.

This issue is also further discussed below in section 4.9, as it applies across all courts.

4.2 GEELONG

While Geelong is a large and busy regional court, it is neither a family violence division nor a specialist court. On the day of observation, 21 matters were listed.

Table 22 presents the key data on court processes in family violence matters for Geelong.

⁸⁵ In all the courts, magistrates explained the consequences of breach only when respondents were present as this information is arguably primarily relevant for the respondent, rather than the affected family member. In cases where the respondent was absent, magistrates did still tend to identify every condition that was being imposed, for the benefit of the affected family member. In some instances there was extensive discussion about the appropriateness of each condition in addressing the fears of the affected family member, while in other instances the magistrate provided a brief listing. Magistrates may be able to use their experience to identify whether the respondent understands the conditions being imposed and the consequences of non-compliance, and will typically tailor their explanations accordingly.

⁸⁶ The times recorded during observations do not necessarily reflect the total workload of the court for the day as criminal matters that were not related to family violence may have been heard before the first family violence matter or after the last family violence matter. Each of the eight courts observed included criminal matters that were not related to family violence or intervention order matters that were regarding personal safety (such as disputes between neighbours) rather than family violence.

⁸⁷ There was a one hour break for lunch.

TABLE 22: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—GEELONG (SUMMARY DATA)

21 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	21
Entering as criminal	0
IVO applicant present	14
IVO respondent present	7
Explanation given—total	1
Explanation given—terms only	0
Explanation given—penalties only	0
Explanation given—both	1
Average duration	3:43

Of the 21 matters heard at Geelong, all entered the court as intervention order applications.

Of the seven intervention order matters where the respondent was present, the magistrate explained the terms of the order and the consequences of failure to comply in one matter only.

The average duration for matters heard at Geelong Magistrates' Court on the day of observation was three minutes and 43 seconds, with the longest being eight minutes. The magistrate began working through the list starting at 9:34am and the last family violence matter was completed at 1:10pm.

4.3 MELBOURNE

Melbourne is not a family violence division court but it does provide specialist family violence services. With its central location, parties in Melbourne have access to a range of services that are not necessarily available in the less populated parts of the state.

Table 23 presents the key data on court processes in family violence matters for Melbourne.

TABLE 23: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—MELBOURNE (SUMMARY DATA)

32 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	30
Entering as criminal	2
IVO applicant present	17
IVO respondent present	15
Explanation given—total	7
Explanation given—terms only	0
Explanation given—penalties only	0
Explanation given—both	7
Average duration	6:23

Of the 32 matters heard at Melbourne, 30 entered the court as intervention order applications while the remaining two entered as criminal proceedings.⁸⁸

In the 15 intervention order matters in which the respondent was present, the magistrate explained the terms of the order and the consequences of failure to comply in seven of them.

⁸⁸ On the day of the Melbourne observations, there were no criminal hearings. However, two of the matters heard in the civil jurisdiction as intervention order matters had originally entered the court as criminal matters, according to Courtlink data. Both of these originating criminal matters were related to the respondent.

The average duration for matters heard at Melbourne Magistrates' Court on the day of observation was six minutes and 23 seconds. The magistrate began working through the list starting at 10:05am and the last family violence matter was completed at 4:14pm.

4.4 SUNSHINE

Sunshine is an extremely busy suburban court, with specialist family violence services. Although Sunshine is not formally a specialist court (but provides a number of specialist family violence services), it has developed a high level of specialisation across all aspects of the court: magistrates with significant family violence experience, a functionally and physically separate family violence registrar, an applicant support worker, a police family violence unit and family violence court liaison officer and family violence service providers in the community that attend court. Sunshine also has an on-site Court Integrated Services Program office that provides assessment and referral to treatment for drug and alcohol issues, acquired brain injury support services, accommodation services, disability support and mental health care.⁸⁹

Table 24 presents the key data on court processes in family violence matters for Sunshine.

TABLE 24: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—SUNSHINE (SUMMARY DATA)

35 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	34
Entering as criminal	1
IVO applicant present	18
IVO respondent present	22
Explanation given—total	12
Explanation given—terms only	2
Explanation given—penalties only	3
Explanation given—both	7
Average duration	8:16

Of the 35 matters heard at Sunshine, all but one entered the court as intervention order applications, with one entering as a criminal matter.⁹⁰

In the 22 intervention order matters where the respondent was present, the magistrate provided explanations in 12 matters: in seven, this was both the terms of the order and the consequences of failure to comply, in three the focus was on the consequences and in two the terms of the order were explained.

The average duration for matters heard at Sunshine Magistrates' Court on the day of observation was eight minutes and 16 seconds.⁹¹ With many services available both within the court and in the community in Sunshine, the magistrate was able to make heavy use of referrals. Indeed, the magistrate pointed out relevant pamphlets on the bar table to many of the parties and encouraged them to seek further assistance. The average duration, while not the longest observed among the different courts, may also be a function of the number of matters where people required interpreters (three matters), which slows down the progress of a hearing significantly.⁹²

The large number of matters on the list resulted in a slightly longer day than usual for the court, with the magistrate starting to work through the list at 10:09am and completing the last family violence matter at 4:14pm.

⁸⁹ CISP (the Court Integrated Services Program) is available at the Latrobe Valley, Melbourne and Sunshine Magistrates' Courts to provide accused people with access to services and support to reduce rates of reoffending. Referrals to CISP may be made by the police, lawyers, magistrates, court staff, support services or people may refer themselves.

⁹⁰ As with Melbourne, no criminal matters were heard in Sunshine on the day of observation. However, one intervention order respondent had a related criminal matter and was recorded in Courtlink as having entered the court system for that matter.

⁹¹ As this is an average, it is subject to particularly high or low values. One of the matters in Sunshine lasted for 32 minutes—more than twice the length of the next longest matter. This one value will have dragged up the average. Conversely, all the courts heard matters where neither the applicant nor the respondent appeared, and these tended to be dealt with very quickly—often in a matter of seconds, typically being struck out. Such low values will drag down the average. Average matter duration should therefore not be equated with either quality of decision or fairness of process.

⁹² However, the average duration for Sunshine without these three matters did not differ significantly from the overall average, reducing only slightly to seven minutes and 26 seconds.

4.5 DANDENONG

Like Sunshine, Dandenong is a large suburban court. Unlike Sunshine, it does not have specialist family violence services within the court, but it does have community-based family violence service providers. While Dandenong has some magistrates who are very experienced in family violence, it does not have a separate family violence registry (although on family violence listing days the regular registry counter becomes a de facto specialist family violence counter). An applicant support worker has recently started at Dandenong and there are dedicated police family violence units and court liaison officers.

The court building itself at Dandenong is highly problematic, with a small, cramped and crowded waiting area where the potential for intimidation and even physical assault is significant.

Table 25 presents the key data on court processes in family violence matters for Dandenong.

TABLE 25: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—DANDENONG (SUMMARY DATA)

42 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	41
Entering as criminal	1
IVO applicant present	15
IVO respondent present	17
Explanation given—total	7
Explanation given—terms only	0
Explanation given—penalties only	2
Explanation given—both	5
Average duration	6:09

Of the 42 matters heard at Dandenong, all but one entered the court as intervention order applications, with one entering as a criminal matter.

Of the 17 intervention order matters where the respondent was present, the magistrate provided explanations in seven matters: in five, this was both the terms of the order and the consequences of failure to comply, while in two the focus was on the consequences of breach.

There was one matter where safety was an issue, in that the court was warned before the matter was called that there was potential for aggression and danger. Security staff were posted nearby, outside the door of the courtroom, but no issues arose. The applicant was not present in this matter. This was the only instance of obvious safety issues throughout the courtroom observations.

The average duration for matters heard at Dandenong Magistrates' Court on the day of observation was six minutes and nine seconds. There were two applicants and three respondents who required interpreters, again potentially affecting the average duration of matters.⁹³ The magistrate starting to work through the list at 11:01am and the last family violence matter was completed at 4:40pm.⁹⁴

4.6 WANGARATTA

Wangaratta is a mid-size regional court without any specialisation. As a small building it has limited options for separating parties and very few options for private discussions.

Table 26 presents the key data on court processes in family violence matters for Wangaratta.

⁹³ The average duration excluding these matters was five minutes 32 seconds.

⁹⁴ Magistrates cannot begin hearing matters until there are matters that are ready to be heard. This delay is a function of the number of people who need to be dealt with outside the courtroom—people need to be seen by registry staff, need to have access to support workers and need to speak with legal representatives. The substantial amount of work that takes place outside the courtroom thus has a direct impact on the time required for each matter in the courtroom. However, data on time spent outside the courtroom was not collected as part of this research.

TABLE 26: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—WANGARATTA (SUMMARY DATA)

13 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	11
Entering as criminal	2
IVO applicant present	8
IVO respondent present	3
Explanation given—total	3
Explanation given—terms only	0
Explanation given—penalties only	1
Explanation given—both	1
Explanation given—other	1
Average duration	10:17

Of the 13 matters heard at Wangaratta, two entered as criminal matters and the remaining 11 as intervention order matters.

There were three intervention order matters where the respondent was clearly present, six where the respondent was clearly absent and in two it was unclear. The magistrate provided explanations in the three matters in which the respondent was clearly present, explaining only the consequences of failure to comply in one instance, both the consequences and the terms of the order in a second, and the consequences of breach, order terms, and conditions of contact with children in the third.

The average duration for matters heard at Wangaratta Magistrates' Court on the day of observation was 10 minutes and 17 seconds, although there was significant variation across cases, as the shortest matter was less than one minute and the longest was over 45 minutes. This is the longest average duration of all the courts observed, and may be a function of the very small list alleviating some of the time pressures faced by magistrates hearing larger lists. The magistrate starting to work through the list at 9:59am and the last family violence matter was completed at 1:21pm.

4.7 MARYBOROUGH

Maryborough is the smallest of the courts visited, without any specialisation, although it is served by a police family violence court liaison officer. Its single room means that parties either wait outside or in the courtroom itself, and there are no options for separate, safe entry to and exit from the building.

Table 27 presents the key data on court processes in family violence matters for Maryborough.

TABLE 27: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—MARYBOROUGH (SUMMARY DATA)

12 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	11
Entering as criminal	1
IVO applicant present	6
IVO respondent present	6
Explanation given—total	4
Explanation given—terms only	0
Explanation given—penalties only	0
Explanation given—both	4
Average duration	9:13

Of the 12 matters heard at Maryborough, all but one entered the court as intervention order applications, with one entering as a criminal matter.⁹⁵

The magistrate defined family violence in every intervention order matter and provided explanations in four of the six matters where the respondent was present about both the terms of the order and the consequences of failure to comply.

The average duration for matters heard at Maryborough Magistrates' Court on the day of observation was nine minutes and 13 seconds. Once again, the longer average duration may be a function of the smaller list at Maryborough. In addition, taking the time to define family violence, as well as providing explanations of the order, took some time. The magistrate started to work through the list at 10:32am. The court's end time was not recorded, but it continued well past 3:30pm.

4.8 NEIGHBOURHOOD JUSTICE CENTRE

The Neighbourhood Justice Centre has a unique, problem-solving approach to justice more generally. Its on-site services allow parties to be linked into a range of services at the time of their court hearing, such that a wrap-around service can be provided.

Table 28 presents the key data on court processes in family violence matters for the Neighbourhood Justice Centre.

TABLE 28: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS—NEIGHBOURHOOD JUSTICE CENTRE (SUMMARY DATA)

17 MATTERS
Entering as IVO	16
Entering as criminal	1
IVO applicant present	8
IVO respondent present	6
Explanation given—total	2
Explanation given—terms only	0
Explanation given—penalties only	2
Explanation given—both	0
Average duration	9:24

Of the 17 matters heard at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre, all but one entered the court as intervention order applications, with one entering as a criminal matter.

In the six intervention order matters where the respondent was clearly present, the magistrate provided explanations in two about the consequences of failure to comply.

The average duration for matters heard at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre on the day of observation was nine minutes and 24 seconds, although the longest matter—an extremely complicated one that was stood down several times—went for one hour 14 minutes. The presence of in-court support services and multiple solicitor services meant that most matters were able to be dealt with fairly quickly in court. The magistrate starting to work through the list at 10:22am and the last family violence matter was completed at 4:48pm.

4.9 DISCUSSION: UNDERSTANDING COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS

To facilitate direct comparison across the eight courts visited, Table 29 compiles the data from Sections 4.1 to 4.8. The data in the table are numbers; percentages have not been included other than for the proportion of matters with a respondent present where an explanation was given, due to missing data in some instances and to very small numbers in many table cells.

⁹⁵ On the day of observation there were two criminal matters heard at Maryborough Magistrates' Court. Only one, however, originated in the court as a criminal matter, while the other originated as an intervention order matter.

TABLE 29: COURT PROCESSES IN FAMILY VIOLENCE MATTERS: SUMMARY

	BALLARAT (45 POLICE MATTERS)	BALLARAT (23 PRIVATE MATTERS)	GEELONG (21 MATTERS)	MELBOURNE (32 MATTERS)	SUNSHINE (35 MATTERS)	DANDENONG (42 MATTERS)	WANGARATTA (13 MATTERS)	MARYBOROUGH (12 MATTERS)	NJC (17 MATTERS)
Entering as IVO	37	23	21	30	34	41	11	11	16
Entering as criminal	3	0	0	2	1	1	2	1	1
IVO applicant present	18	21	14	17	18	15	8	6	8
IVO respondent present	17	15	7	15	22	17	3	6	6
Explanation given: total (88%)	15 out of 17 (88%)	0	1 out of 7 (14%)	7 out of 15 (47%)	12 out of 22 (55%)	7 out of 17 (41%)	3 out of 3 ^a (100%)	4 out of 6 (67%)	2 out of 6 (33%)
Explanation given: terms	0	0	0	0	2	0	0	0	0
Explanation given: penalties	3	0	0	0	3	2	1	0	2
Explanation given: both	12	0	1	7	7	5	1	4	0
Average duration	6:59	7:10	3:43	6:23	8:16	6:09	10:17	9:13	9:24

a In addition to these two explanations, Wangaratta had a third 'other' explanation given that is not shown in this table.

Processing of family violence cases

Across all courts, the most common entry point for intervention order matters was the intervention order application itself. Some matters (11 of them) entered as criminal ones, but no other entry point was seen in any of the courts.

Consistent approaches to family violence matters

There were only two broad consistencies seen in all courts throughout the observations: magistrates are acutely aware of the time pressures they face and feel the need to talk quickly and keep the day progressing; and magistrates are reluctant to articulate in open court the nature of the family violence incident.

The first consistency—the pressure of time—is further discussed below. The second matter raises quite different issues.

The magistrate always began by reading the intervention order application silently. Subsequent questioning of either the applicant or the police prosecutor or civil advocate did not focus on the nature of the past incident, but instead was directed at finding the most appropriate order to protect the person into the future. At times the incident was mentioned if the magistrate was questioning the nature of the application being sought. For example, if the victim was seeking a revocation to allow contact due to reconciliation, the magistrate might express reluctance to revoke the order due to the ‘serious violence’ involved. While magistrates quite frequently referred to the severity of the violence in general terms, there were no more than a few matters in which the magistrate either read from the application or in some other way identified the specific acts involved.

This reticence to state aloud the details of the violent incident may reflect an effort to protect the victim from further trauma. It may also reflect the fact that, at that point, the respondent had not had an opportunity to be heard on the allegations. However, by not articulating what has actually occurred, the court is missing an opportunity to validate the victim and to hold the perpetrator to account. The power of the magistrate speaking about what has occurred is being forsaken. While encouraging magistrates to announce the details of the family violence in court may not be appropriate due to reasons of privacy and sensitivity, it is worth considering whether there might be times that such a statement could be of use.

Inconsistent approaches to family violence matters

Court processes vary according to the experience, understanding and personal preferences of the magistrate, and are influenced by external factors such as availability of services. There were four main ways in which magistrates varied in their approaches to family violence matters:

1. their choice of conditions to impose
2. their explanations of orders to respondents who were present in court
3. their attempts at applying a therapeutic justice approach
4. their referrals to support services.

Choice of conditions

Some magistrates seemed to have a standard response to applications of imposing comprehensive orders in most matters, unless a limited order was specifically sought (such as in instances involving a police application but with no affected family member present). Others made more use of limited orders, with only clause 1 (no family violence) or perhaps clauses 1 and 2 (no damaging property). Other magistrates, however, were more creative with their use of conditions. For example, one magistrate added a modified exclusion condition banning the respondent from the house only when he was affected by, or had been using, alcohol. Another magistrate was able to ensure that the respondent attended a men’s behaviour change program by adding it as a condition to the order, even in the absence of the ability to impose a counselling order. The flexibility currently afforded magistrates means that the more creative ones do not need any more options added to their conditions toolbox—they are able to use their court craft skills to tailor their orders more closely.

Explanations of orders

The quality of explanations of orders varied substantially.⁹⁶ Across all the courts, explanations of intervention orders—their terms or the consequences or breach or both—were provided in just under one-quarter (23 per cent) of all matters (51 of 224 intervention order matters). One magistrate made it a point to define family violence in every single matter, while another ensured that every matter with children involved included an explanation of the impact of family violence on children. In one court respondents were told the specifics of the consequences of breach—the fine amount and the maximum prison term for first and subsequent breaches. In another court, they were told that penalties involved a fine and possibly imprisonment, but without specific details.

⁹⁶ It is unclear why there was variation in the explanation of orders. It is likely that some of the variation may be explained by the magistrates’ perceptions of each respondent’s ability to understand what is being said in court. The presence or absence of legal representation, support workers or family members may also affect the explanations provided. The individual preferences of each magistrate are also likely to have play a role.

Magistrates with more specialised experience of family violence matters seemed to take more time to explain orders: while the time taken on each matter varied from three minutes 43 seconds in Geelong to 10 minutes and 17 seconds in Wangaratta, the average time per matter across all courts was seven minutes and 34 seconds. In interviews, a number of the magistrates expressed concern that respondents were not fully understanding what was being said in court and what they were agreeing to. Observations suggested that this might indeed be the case, as some respondents seemed rather dazed and confused by the whole process. For those with legal representation, this may not be an issue as the duty lawyer may have been able to provide better explanations during previous discussions. For those without legal representation, however, there is a real risk that the consequences of the order have not been fully appreciated and that the opportunity to provide clear messages about family violence has been missed.

Opportunities for therapeutic justice

One of the magistrates had a personal preference for applying some therapeutic intervention to the situation, seeking to engage the respondent in a deeper understanding of his behaviour. For example, in one matter she asked the respondent about his violent response to conflict, and whether there might be better ways to respond. She suggested alternatives for him, such as going for a walk when he felt angry. Although the discussion lasted only two or three minutes, she was able to raise with him the idea that there are more appropriate ways to manage conflict.

This was the only court at which this approach was adopted. Even so, this magistrate would have preferred to have more time to be able to have a more meaningful conversation, as she felt she could only just touch on a small fraction of the issues that were apparent.

Referrals to support services

There was substantial variation in magistrates' use of referrals to support services, either those present at the court or those in the community. This was not simply a function of whether services were available; even in locations where there were services in the local community, some magistrates simply did not refer very much. Overall, the use of referrals to support services was fairly low. This may be for a range of reasons that were not evident from the observations alone.

Even when there were referrals, they tended to differ. Some pointed out a support service that was located in an office in the court, gave the support worker's name and strongly suggested that the applicant or respondent make contact. Others pointed to leaflets that were located on the table and suggested that the person call the number listed. But overall, referrals were made in only about one-quarter of all matters.

Addressing inconsistency in responses to family violence

Two of the strongest messages arising from the interview process were the need for some level of specialisation in the response to family violence, and further education for all people dealing with family violence matters: magistrates, registry and other court staff, duty lawyers, police, support workers and security personnel. While all participants acknowledged that system responses to family violence have improved tremendously over the years, they all lamented that there remains more work to be done in ensuring that family violence is properly understood. In particular, both specialisation and further training on the nature and dynamics of family violence and the impact of family violence were seen as critical to improving the system's response.

The value of specialisation

Specialisation was seen by most respondents as a valuable approach to dealing with family violence. This did not necessarily mean having a specialist family violence division court (although a separate family violence court was suggested by one participant), but that people with specialised experience, understanding and knowledge in family violence matters be involved in all aspects of responding to family violence.

Specialisation is valuable in every role. For example, in every court where Victoria Police had a separate Family Violence Court Liaison Officer (FVCLLO), the value of this role was seen as significant. The FVCLLO facilitates negotiations, ensures affected family members have the opportunity to tell police what they wish to happen at court, and acts as a go-between, communicating between the police prosecutor or civil advocate and the affected family member. According to one magistrate, the FVCLLO makes things run more smoothly for the court, allowing the process to become 'more streamlined' and, by speaking with both parties to understand what they would like on the day, the magistrate is better able to tailor the order appropriately.

Having specialist police prosecutors or civil advocates makes an enormous difference to the court. With specialist experience, police are able to come to court prepared with all the necessary information that the magistrate is likely to seek: information on risk factors, prior violence, related orders (such as family law orders) and a clear understanding of the wishes of the affected family member. This ensures that the magistrate has the required information to make an efficient and appropriate decision. Without specialist experience in the prosecution role, there is evidently a lack of appreciation of the information needed by the magistrate. Courtroom observations revealed that, without this sort of experience, the answer to many of the questions from the bench is ‘I don’t know’. In some of the courts observed many of the matters were adjourned to allow police to undertake further investigations to provide ‘further and better particulars’, to speak with the victim to clarify her wishes, or to determine if and when criminal charges were to be heard. This clearly has implications for the smooth running of the court, as multiple adjournments due to lack of information is simply a waste of court time. On the observation days, a number of magistrates were obviously frustrated in court by the inability of a police prosecutor or civil advocate to provide answers to their questions.

Specialisation among duty lawyers is also valuable, allowing solicitors to elicit the most relevant information from people under significant time constraints. The same may be said of registry staff, for whom a specialist family violence registrar allows a more efficient, and also more effective, application process, where all relevant information is included.

Specialisation among magistrates means that they have a detailed understanding of the nature and impact of family violence, can quickly elicit required information on the key facts of a case, and can craft a tailored order that has the greatest chance of preventing family violence and enhancing safety. The courtroom observations showed how specialist experience can work to enhance courtroom outcomes. Although every magistrate worked under significant time pressures, with lengthy lists and the tension between efficiency and fairness, the most effective magistrates were able to communicate meaningfully with both respondents and affected family members. Victims of family violence were told that they were brave for coming to court to seek an order. They were reminded that they should contact police if there is any fear for their safety. They were reminded of the definition of family violence, and that family violence is harmful for children even if they are not directly physically abused themselves. Family violence perpetrators were also told the definition of family violence and were warned that their continued violence could see their own children ending up as abusers in the future. The conditions of the order were carefully and clearly explained to them, and they were asked if they understood. The consequences and penalties of breach were explained. One magistrate was even able to undertake some therapeutic lawyering, initiating discussion about the causes and consequences of angry outbursts. Although there was no single magistrate who combined all of these approaches into her or his work, most magistrates observed adopted at least one of these, in a genuine effort to engage with the parties and provide an effective response.

The value of specialisation and ongoing education was emphasised by every participant in the consultations. Representatives from a community legal centre felt that further training is essential for everyone working in the family violence sphere, but especially for magistrates and police.

Professional development for magistrates

Several magistrates noted that, as family violence is ‘pervasive’ throughout the courts, more judicial professional development is needed. In particular, according to one magistrate, there needs to be an understanding that the capacity of witnesses to communicate properly is compromised where there has been severe violence. A communication style that may be seen as apologetic or incongruent is often seen, such that there’s a disjunction between ‘what they’re saying and what we traditionally expect from a witness’. Magistrates need to understand ‘the impact of family violence on communication skills when we’re hearing evidence’. This is especially the case with inarticulate private applicants who are not represented, those with mental health issues and people with other disabilities.

Specialist magistrates can quickly identify risk factors in family violence applicants and respondents, and can address therapeutic and procedural justice concerns. Without specialisation, there are still those who do not appreciate the complexity and nuances in this space. For example, some magistrates are reluctant to include a child on an intervention order if there is no direct physical violence—they do not see exposure to violence as family violence. A health services provider felt that some magistrates still do not believe the applicant, leaving women to feel that they ‘didn’t have enough bruises’ for the allegations to be taken seriously.

The response to breaches of intervention orders was an area of particular concern for some participants, in particular for service providers. A health services provider has seen magistrates warn of the penalties of breach when an intervention order is granted, but on breach the offender is treated overly leniently. Others from a family violence service provider echoed this sentiment, feeling that the magistrates are saying the right things when the order is issued, but then sending the wrong message when the threatened response to breach does not happen.⁹⁷ The message that family violence will not be tolerated thus seems to be missing: ‘lots of good strong words are being spoken by magistrates to perpetrators, but [there’s] not a lot of action’. In these circumstances, the respondent ‘walks out with a smirk’, except, according to some interview participants, in the case of Indigenous men, when he is likely to be imprisoned.

With some community-based service providers there was much discussion about the differential response of the courts to Indigenous and non-Indigenous respondents. Indigenous men in particular were seen as being treated much more harshly and were more likely to be sent to prison for breach (and indeed, to be charged with breach in the first place). While the gross over-representation of Indigenous people throughout the justice system is beyond the scope of this report, these interviewees believed that there are substantial disparities in legal responses to family violence among Indigenous peoples.

Professional development for police

Although all participants acknowledged that the police have ‘come a long way’ in their responses to, and understanding of, family violence, many agreed that further training and professional development remains a priority. A family violence service provider said that it is still difficult to get the police to apply for an intervention order if there is no evidence of physical violence—bruises, cuts and the like. A community legal centre representative felt that police are applying for many intervention orders now but they are not enforcing them, failing to take action on breach. Thus the focus on immediate safety may be coming at the expense of follow-up of criminal incidents. This is seen as problematic in the message that is sent when the police do not enforce orders: ‘it’s easier for the offender to take it seriously if the police take it seriously’.

While the general police members still need to shift their attitudes and beliefs, the specialist family violence units within police are very good, as they understand that ‘emotional, cultural and spiritual violence’ can exist.

Many participants valued the presence of family violence units in police, as well as dedicated police family violence court liaison officers who have the time both to liaise with affected family members and to ensure that the material presented at court is of a high standard. According to registry staff, their presence ‘makes things run more smoothly...they know what they’re doing so things run smoothly in court’. This sort of specialisation means that people are more likely to have a good experience with the police and will have sufficient confidence to call them if needed. A representative of a community legal centre believed that this confidence in the police is critical: ‘an intervention order is not just a piece of paper if you make a phone call’.

Police themselves also acknowledge the need for further training. As a police prosecutor noted, they often become cynical and desensitised to family violence. Further training may assist with maintaining a certain level of empathy. It would also assist police to provide the best information possible to the court. For the magistrate to be able to make an informed decision, a quality narrative is needed, with strong evidence and information about the respondent’s prior history. According to a police civil advocate, police informants—those attending family violence incidents—need more training to be able to provide more detailed and relevant information: family violence incidents ‘need to be treated as seriously’ as criminal investigations. This benefits not only the magistrate but also the respondent, who is then able to determine whether to consent to an order or to contest it. According to the police civil advocate, ‘it’s all about information in this context’.

Police also need ongoing training around how to conduct risk assessments and proper interviews. Part of this issue is the associated issue of resourcing—with more police officers, a greater level of specialisation can be achieved.

An interpreter suggested that police responses to family violence can be particularly problematic with regard to areas with a high proportion of non-English speaking people. He provided the example of an incident where police attend and the only person who speaks English is the alleged offender. Under these circumstances, the abuser (typically the man) may manipulate the story told to police, resulting in the female victim being accused of family violence and having an intervention order taken out against her. The interpreter has seen such cases a number of times; it is only when the matter comes to court that the story is able to be accurately described with the assistance of the interpreter.

While the traditional role of the police was to find criminals—to ‘catch crooks’—it has evolved such that new skills are required to respond to family violence in an appropriate and skilled manner, suitable to an offence that typically occurs in the private rather than the public domain. This move from ‘an enforcement role to a welfare role’ needs to be acknowledged and incorporated into police training.

⁹⁷ Indeed, in the handful of matters where a breach of an intervention order was sentenced, the most common outcome was a community correction order, at times with the same conditions that were on the intervention order in the first place.

Managing time constraints in family violence matters

By far the biggest concern for interview participants was the lack of time available to provide the best possible service. Over recent years, the number of family violence matters in the courts has ‘increased exponentially’. Time constraints affect everyone in the courts, and with large lists, people end up having to rush through their work, like ‘chooks with no heads’, according to one family violence registrar.

Ultimately, the impact of insufficient time is that people can only provide a bare minimum service: registry staff, duty lawyers, police, support services and even magistrates have to limit their time to working on the bare necessities, foregoing the additional time that would be required to provide a more detailed, thorough and complete interaction. Despite this, it should be noted, every one of the people observed for this research is clearly passionate about the importance of their work in assisting people affected by family violence, making every effort to do the best possible job within existing constraints.

Pressures on registry staff

For family violence registry staff, ‘it’s just relentless, non-stop client engagement at the counter’, with some courts seeing up to 60 matters on the list on a family violence listing day.⁹⁸ Other registry work has to be foregone in order to deal with the demand, with many family violence days going past 4:00pm, sometimes even to 6:00pm. Some registries are considering a second day of listings for family violence to address this: ‘when do we say enough’s enough?’. One family violence registrar feels she is ‘not doing all the other stuff’ she should be doing in that role, such as community engagement work, as there is simply no time available. It is this broader engagement that is seen as critical to effective collaboration and integration within local family violence systems.

For many registry staff, time pressures mean that they have less time to listen. They used to have more time to help with applications and refer people to relevant services, but now are limited to finding out the few core facts that need to go into the narrative. Their approach used to be more therapeutic as they could listen more; there’s no time to do that now. Even with multiple registry staff, ‘You just feel like you’re spreading yourself very thin’.

Some courts have introduced caps on their family violence lists (at around 30) to allow space for extra matters that arise at the last minute. Once the list grows to more than 40, it becomes more difficult for all involved to deal with each matter well. Security can also become a concern, as more and more people have to wait longer and longer for their matter to be called.

Some courts have also introduced an appointment system for the lodging of intervention order applications, and Court Network can provide extra assistance to people in filling out the forms. Given how ‘cumbersome’ and ‘clunky’ the intervention order application form is, it is often very difficult for people to complete on their own, especially when they are experiencing emotional distress. The Neighbourhood Justice Centre’s online application form aims to address this problem, and is seen by the Centre’s staff as a potentially valuable contribution to making the whole court process easier and more accessible for victims of family violence.⁹⁹

Pressures on duty lawyers

The standard number of clients for a duty lawyer used to be about four or five a day, allowing them to negotiate broader issues such as parenting plans. Currently, however, it is not unusual for a duty lawyer to see 10 or 15 clients, allowing as little as five or six minutes with each client. One particularly busy community legal centre regularly has 30 to 35 cases on a police application day and 12 to 15 on a private applicant day. Another centre has had as many as 60 clients on a police application day. At the same time as the demand for legal services has increased, access to the Family Court has become ever more difficult. As a result, people are using the family violence list to try to resolve child access issues as well. This added complexity means that the lack of time available (about 10 to 15 minutes per client) has an even greater impact on the lawyers’ ability to address all the legal needs of their clients.

A lawyer at another court also talked about the increasing complexity of cases. The time pressure has become more pronounced as cases have become more complex. One lawyer felt that the court is ‘a bit like a sausage factory sometimes’, with people agreeing to things they do not necessarily understand. Another lawyer suggested that, in addition to a ‘huge increase in family violence intervention orders’ over the last 15 years, there has been an increase in methylamphetamine use and thus drug-related family violence. The increase in drug use means that he sees a ‘dramatically different type of family violence respondent than 10 years ago’—one who is more aggressive and more dangerous to families. Thus the increased volume, combined with the increased complexity and potential dangerousness of cases, is felt acutely in the time pressures faced by legal practitioners.

⁹⁸ There were no direct observations of processes that take place outside the courtroom, such as those occurring with registry staff, duty lawyers and support services. Instead, issues facing individuals in these sorts of roles were discussed during the interviews. Consideration could be given to undertaking research in the future on processes outside the courtroom.

⁹⁹ As the development of the online form is a relatively new initiative, it has yet to be formally evaluated.

According to one community legal centre representative, without adequate time legal service providers are not able to delve deeply into people's experiences so cannot receive optimal instructions, which has an impact on their ability to negotiate. Every one of the legal services providers suggested that they would like more time to spend with their clients—at least 30 minutes is required to get quality instructions and to have a proper discussion about the intervention order process and the person's wishes, and also to discuss additional issues such as family law concerns and referral to appropriate services. For clients who come from a culturally and linguistically diverse background, even more time is needed: ideally, an hour should be spent with these clients, not just to allow time for interpreters, but to explain the whole court process and culture. With only 10 to 15 minutes with each person, only the essential service is provided. 'You run everywhere', having to 'push things through' to get the job done. Duty lawyers 'can't go into all the details, which would take half an hour'; instead, they have to focus simply on 'the basics'. In private practice, getting proper instructions takes about an hour. With far less time on court days, duty lawyers may miss some of the key details; if that happens, they have to ask for the matter to be stood down so they can take instructions. And without proper instructions, the order cannot be tailored as effectively, which means that more matters are then contested.

The lack of time for duty lawyers was summarised by a lawyer from a community legal centre: 'To get an interim order you need to get proper instructions. That's the difference. If you've only spent 10 to 15 minutes, you've only got the bare bones'. While this does not necessarily compromise safety as in most cases the order is still granted, it does mean that applicants have to come back to court more often. In addition, if the affected family member has sought legal advice and has not been given enough time to have her voice heard, this may affect her future willingness to seek assistance from the police and the court.

Inadequate time to speak with clients also has implications for legal representatives' ability to undertake 'therapeutic lawyering'. That is, clients are less likely to feel that they have had a voice and been properly heard, instead feeling that their lawyer has had to rush off to another case. A perception may arise that the lawyer 'doesn't give a damn about me' as he dashes off to the next client. While the matter at hand might not be affected in such circumstances, there would surely be implications for people's confidence in the justice system.

Even at the Neighbourhood Justice Centre, where smaller lists, on-site services and multiple legal practitioners means that people have more time to spend with clients (around 30 to 60 minutes for average cases and one to two hours for complex ones), more time would still be useful to manage various family violence-related legal issues more comprehensively, such as family law and housing issues: 'The best practice model would be that legal services are better funded to deal with not only family violence legal issues but all the other legal issues intertwined'. The focus remains on the crisis of the day at court; the bigger issues behind it remain unresolved.

The inability to deal with broader issues was reiterated by representatives from Loddon Community Legal Centre. While the duty lawyers working at Maryborough Magistrates' Court do not face the same large lists as at other courts—typically seeing two to five clients in a day—they are still constrained in the service they can provide. They can 'do the basic job' and explain court processes to clients and assist them with their immediate matter, but they are not able to adopt the 'preferable model', which involves both contact with the client in the days prior to the hearing and follow-up with the client in the weeks and months after the hearing. For these duty lawyers, there are essentially two different services required: the basic duty service on the day of court and the ongoing legal casework that allows a more consistent and better quality response. While the former is manageable due to the smaller lists, they are unable to achieve the latter due to funding constraints. This is where external specialist family violence services can help to 'fill the gap' and provide valuable support services, when they are funded sufficiently to send their staff to court.

Insufficient time with a duty lawyer also means that some respondents do not fully understand the consequences of breach. This is where a respondent support worker is helpful, explaining the order and ensuring understanding of its terms.

Pressures on police

Police civil advocates and prosecutors are also under considerable time pressure, with some spending about five to 10 minutes with each affected family member, such that the discussion 'has to be done quite efficiently'. For one police civil advocate, this means that he must 'control the conversation' to get just the essential information. This might result in the person feeling that her voice has not been heard and that she has not been given enough time or attention, but it is all the time that he can afford.

Police stations that have a family violence court liaison officer are able to alleviate this pressure to some degree. The liaison officer will speak with affected family members about their wishes and conduct negotiations with respondents' legal representatives outside court. Some matters, such as where the respondent wants to consent to the order, can be resolved very quickly, in just five minutes. Other more complex matters, particularly those involving children, take far longer. With some courts hearing around 45 cases on a typical day, the time pressure is significant: as with duty lawyers, this potentially results in instructions that are not entirely accurate or complete.

In addition to a family violence court liaison officer, some police stations also have a dedicated family violence unit. While the police prosecutor has little time with individuals in court, the police family violence unit has primary responsibility for investigating family violence and providing a summary of agreed instructions to the prosecutor to use in court. Thus the police family violence unit takes substantial time to conduct the background work and liaise with the affected family member, providing the prosecutor with the relevant information required for a succinct and expeditious appearance in court. This system seems to work well for participants, who suggested that it combines the benefits of a detailed preparation process with a clear and concise appearance at court, alleviating the time pressures for the prosecutor while allowing the victims of family violence to feel they have had the opportunity to tell their story.

Pressures on support services

Service providers who support women in court have seen family violence ‘increase dramatically each year’, such that they sometimes need to send more than one worker to court to manage the list (if they have the resources to do so). Supporting more than three women at a time is too much: ‘it’s not a personal service’ if there are more than that. According to the service providers interviewed, one of the most concerning implications of support services not having enough time and attention for victims of family violence is that women may end up agreeing to something that they do not understand. In particular, a woman might agree to accept an undertaking rather than an intervention order, which is not as effective in keeping them safe. While service providers are used to managing with a lack of funding—‘we’re a crisis service, we’re used to stretching ourselves quite thin’—there are potentially serious implications if they are unable to do their job properly.

The lack of time ‘limits the depth of contact you can have’. The increase in matters means there is an ‘inevitable impact on what you can do as a single person’. More time would allow a more comprehensive risk assessment and full discussion of all legal issues, as well as linking in with services for the other ongoing issues.

The lack of sufficient time to speak with a victim of family violence at length about her needs is a particular concern in some courts with regards to Indigenous women, who tend not to seek help until they have become absolutely desperate, by which time the violence is severe and they become at high risk of serious injury. Responding appropriately to these women requires significant time.

For one service provider who attends court from an external service, the time spent with each person varies dramatically depending on the level of risk, whether the applicant is on her own and her individual needs. While this provider spends anywhere from 20 minutes to 90 minutes with a person, ideally she would like to have more time to be able to undertake a comprehensive risk assessment and fully discuss all the associated legal issues.

For the applicant support workers interviewed, the time required with each person is substantial. For one support worker, explaining the nature of family violence and the process of applying for an intervention order, making referrals to support services and assisting with completing the intervention order application requires about an hour with each person. Another applicant support worker requires about 40 minutes with each person to undertake a risk assessment, create a safety plan and provide referrals to the local external family violence support agencies. In addition, the applicant support workers may accompany women in the courtroom itself. While it would be ‘ideal’ to see only four people each day, one applicant support worker has previously seen as many as nine, while another generally sees about eight people each day, averaging about 20 to 30 minutes with each. For all the applicant support workers interviewed, the key to managing the demand is to work closely with others in the court, especially the police and services such as Court Network.

The demands on respondent support workers’ time may be even greater, with one worker seeing 12 to 15 men on a busy day. After spending 10 minutes with a respondent to explain court processes, briefly discuss his concerns and determine if he is eligible for assessment for a counselling order, a further 30 minutes is required to undertake the assessment itself.

One of the health service providers interviewed also expressed concerns about insufficient time with victims of family violence. Although only having about 20 minutes per client, discussions need to include explanations of the court process, safety planning, referrals to accommodation and counselling services and linking people with legal services. The provider acknowledged that more time would be valuable to be able to discuss these issues in greater depth.

Pressures on registry staff

For registry staff, the work at the counter is relentless, with dozens of people seeking assistance. Some of the registries have implemented an appointment system for new intervention order applications, with 10 or 12 half-hour appointments scheduled throughout the day. Applicants arrive with the form largely completed, allowing time for the staff to ask further questions to clarify the situation and to type up the application. This helps with managing the pressure imposed by new applications, but there can still be 60 or 70 people requiring attention through the day. Thus while the appointment system allows registry staff to manage new applications, it does nothing to alleviate the ongoing pressures created by the large number of matters on the list. As one registrar noted, with a list of 50 to 60 matters, there is the potential for more than 100 people to come to court and seek assistance from the registry.

Pressures on magistrates

One magistrate felt that family violence intervention orders have gone from being a small part of the court's work (five to seven per cent) to being a significant proportion (about 30 per cent). But it is 'only recently that people [in the courts] have seen it as a key component of Magistrates' Court work'.

According to one magistrate, court philosophy has traditionally been that 'a good magistrate is a fast magistrate'. But this makes it exceedingly difficult to do the job well—a magistrate needs to stand up to this sort of pressure and take the time to triage and elicit the information needed. Without sufficient time to elicit the whole story, underlying issues may be missed and orders may not be as effective in preventing future incidents of family violence as they may otherwise be. This is particularly important with some culturally and linguistically diverse communities, especially the South Asian ones, where family violence is seen as an issue to keep hidden within families and substantial pressure is exerted on women by both their in-laws and their own families to keep the matter quiet. Magistrates need to have this cultural understanding and background information in order to tailor orders appropriately, such as including prohibitions on shaming women on Facebook. Insufficient information from the duty lawyers—and lack of time to elicit the information in court—makes it more difficult to tailor orders optimally.

One magistrate reported that she spends an average of seven minutes on each case in court, but would prefer to have 15 to 20 minutes on each. The lack of time means that she is 'operating so fast in such a closed environment' that she does not have time to ask questions about what really happened. Another magistrate said she has to work 'quicker and smarter'—she starts reading cases as witnesses are being sworn in, as there is 'really limited time to capture as much information as possible'. She herself asks questions of witnesses or affected family members to make the process more efficient than when practitioners control the questioning; she knows what to ask and can 'cut to the chase'. This magistrate spends only a few minutes on each case, erring on the side of caution with interim orders by simply accepting the affected family member's evidence.

The time magistrates spend on each matter depends on the nature of the issues. According to one magistrate, straightforward matters in which the respondent does not appear are very quick, requiring only three to five minutes. If the respondent is present, more time is required. If he is not represented, magistrates must take the time to explain both processes and outcomes. If the matter is contested, it can take five to ten minutes for an interim order to be made and the matter adjourned to a later date. A directions hearing can take somewhere between 15 and 30 minutes. For this magistrate, a large list simply has to be managed: 'I'll sit until my list is done'.

Time pressures on magistrates mean that they may be unable to get a complete picture of the circumstances involved in a matter. At times this may compromise matters beyond the Magistrates' Court. For example, one magistrate said that she is aware that intervention order applications can be used strategically by perpetrators, for example in family law matters, where an intervention order being in place can have implications for child custody. Intervention order applications may also be used by perpetrators to continue to control victims of family violence. In such circumstances, according to the magistrate, intervention orders are being used 'as a sword, not a shield'. Without adequate time, the magistrate may not be able to identify such issues.

Even at directions hearings, magistrates do not 'have the opportunity to be proactive and encourage settlement' as it's a 'sausage factory'. One magistrate noted that she can only give people quick advice about getting a lawyer for the contest; she does not have the time to discuss the underlying issues and is therefore unable to attempt any therapeutic interventions. The whole process becomes more about administrative decisions than about dealing with content and seeking resolution, but 'we shouldn't be dealing with them in such a sausage factory way'.

These sentiments were echoed by another magistrate who always feels under pressure with matters and would like more time, but does not want to keep people waiting if they are ready. He would like to have more time to ensure that people are understanding his explanations, as he thinks there are many who are not: he still thinks 'am I getting through here?'. While this magistrate feels his decision-making is not compromised by the time pressure, he would like more time around explaining his decisions. It is this therapeutic part that is sometimes missing due to time pressures. Another magistrate agreed with this concern about how well respondents understand their orders, feeling that participants often leave court feeling 'bewildered' and not understanding the implications of the order (for example, that an intervention order makes a respondent a 'prohibited person' under the laws regulating firearm use and possession).

One of the key consequences, then, of lack of time for magistrates is that therapeutic interventions are missing and procedural justice is missing. This is problematic: procedural justice 'is not just a nice thing to do—it's part of the courts excellence framework'. Research has shown that there is more likely to be compliance with orders if there is perceived to be procedural justice, so this has significant implications for both immediate safety and reoffending. And with 45 matters on the list, there simply is no time for those cases that perhaps need a bit more effort: 'You've got to have space for the one that needs more intensive intervention'. A real concern for magistrates is that 'a Batty case will come up and you'll miss it' in the rush to keep the list progressing. This magistrate suggested that, while her court tries to keep its list at a maximum of around 45 matters per day, a list of about 30 would allow her to perform better.

The pressures faced by magistrates were illustrated poignantly by a magistrate who, on the day of observation, was rather unwell. Rather than stay home to recover and miss the dozens of matters she knew would be on her list, she chose instead to come to court to ensure that people would be heard. The demand creates a perception that magistrates cannot afford to be ill—they cannot afford to stay at home as there is simply too much work to be done.

It is also important for magistrates to have the time to make normative statements about family violence, to say that this is not acceptable. This is an important message for magistrates to impart, but they need time to be able to do that properly.

One magistrate summarised the situation thus: ‘I think we have the skeleton of a really effective service. But it’s crushed by demand’. She felt that the key issue was a lack of resources to manage it all properly. In an ideal world, each person would have at least 15 minutes with the magistrate for an interim order, plus time with a duty lawyer and a support worker. A mention hearing would have at least 10 to 15 minutes, with parties having had independent legal advice. Her ideal would be to have 25 mention matters per day on the list, plus 10 to 15 applications (interim applications, applications to vary, applications to revoke, etc.), for an absolute maximum of 40 matters per day. But that would be ‘a pragmatic figure—it’s not a perfect figure’.

Appropriate resourcing would make the job easier for this magistrate, who would like to ‘feel like I had done justice to each person, rather than shoving people through a cattle market. When the numbers get huge I don’t feel comfortable that that’s happened’.

She continued: ‘The greatest thing that I hope comes out of this Royal Commission is that the system isn’t broken—it’s a very good system—but it needs to be appropriately resourced... in order to appropriately deal with matters. I’m hoping this time and motion study will show the discord between the time that is actually given and what, in an ideal world, should be afforded to each person, and how much time that adds up to (and different resources) to guide a reasonable response’.

Clearly there are substantial and varied resources required in responding to family violence in the court. While time spent in the courtroom is one measure of the resources required, it is entirely interdependent with time spent outside the courtroom in preparation. The courtroom is the end point of an extensive court system that responds to family violence: registry staff, applicant and respondent support workers, court support services, community family violence and health service providers, duty lawyers, and police family violence liaison officers and prosecutors all play critical roles in ensuring that both the people and the matters are as ready as possible for their appearance in the courtroom. While the scope of the observational data collection in this research was limited to proceedings inside the courtroom, clearly there is significant time spent outside the courtroom as well.¹⁰⁰

Alternative legal responses to family violence

As part of the interviews, some participants suggested that there may be better ways for the law to respond to family violence. They offered two alternatives: for police to be able to issue intervention orders and for magistrates to be able to order formal mediation.

Police to issue intervention orders

One participant suggested that police should be able to issue intervention orders themselves: if this were possible, it might remove the need for affected family members to attend court when seeking an interim order. This would address the problem of applications being struck out due to the absence of the affected family member. This was quite a controversial idea when proposed in subsequent interviews, with most people expressing concern at taking the decision-making process (and the associated opportunities for making normative statements) out of the hands of the magistrate. It would also make the intervention order ‘feel like an infringement notice’, which is not appropriate. Some thought it might be useful to extend the duration of family violence safety notices instead, to allow a one-week order to be issued, potentially offering greater protection.

Magistrates to order mediation

A number of those who participated in interviews suggested that legal options and processes that are used in other areas could be expanded to include family violence. For example, a magistrate and a lawyer both suggested that the option to order formal mediation—as is available in the Family Court—would be a useful tool for family violence matters as well. They suggested that, in order to facilitate this, the current criterion for mediation—that it cannot be used if a person is violent—should be changed to allow family violence perpetrators to participate.

¹⁰⁰ As the scope of the research did not include tracking individual matters from start to finish to ascertain the time taken at each step in the complete court process, the actual time spent outside the courtroom is not known.

4.10 IMPLICATIONS FOR THE FAMILY VIOLENCE SYSTEM

Observations readily identified differences in approach between those magistrates with more experience in the family violence sphere, and with a greater understanding of family violence issues, and those whose main workload lies in other areas. These differences highlighted the need for ongoing education and training for members of the judiciary in family violence issues. Every magistrate interviewed supported the need for further training, regardless of the level of experience. Given that the Judicial College of Victoria already conducts training programs with the Magistrates' Court in family violence issues, it would likely not be overly onerous to develop further training, in conjunction with those magistrates and family violence specialists who can provide expertise input into designing further training programs. For example, the workshop run by the Women's Legal Service, in conjunction with a mock trial led by Magistrates Hawkins and Gleeson from Melbourne, was said by consultation participants to be of enormous value. This workshop could be expanded to be run with staff and judiciary from all over Victoria.

In addition to broader training, the issue of specialisation should also be considered. While some of the people interviewed advocated a fully separate family violence court, others suggested that it is not so much the formal specialisation that is required as the specialisation of experience, knowledge and understanding. For example, specialist family violence registrars undertake triage, identifying high-risk affected family members and referring them immediately to support services. Specialist magistrates have a proper understanding of the nature and complexities of family violence. Specialist legal representatives and police can quickly identify key aspects of the story that the magistrate will need to be in the narrative. Across all these roles, specialisation fundamentally allows a common understanding of the risk factors involved with family violence.

Specialisation—in terms of the development of a strong, cohesive and experienced team—was seen as an integral part of the court's response to family violence. Indeed, one magistrate praised the specialist experience and knowledge at her court, saying 'it's the local team that makes the difference'. Close teamwork is critical in this arena. For example, the morning meetings held in Ballarat—where the day's list can be divided among the solicitors and everyone can agree on how to tackle the day—were held up as critical components of their approach to managing an enormous number of matters. This integrated approach, ensuring that registry staff, solicitors and support workers work as a unified team in assisting people through the day, has been implemented in only some of the courts visited. It seems a simple mechanism to implement, but one that could significantly improve the court experience for all concerned, ameliorating the negative impact of severe time constraints.

At those courts where morning coordination meetings take place, successfully managing the demand imposed by family violence matters seems a more realistic goal. Participants from courts without these meetings knew about them and emphasised their value. They allow police prosecutors and duty lawyers to meet with clients in the same order, so that everyone from a particular matter is ready to proceed at the same time. Without them, police and solicitors meet with clients in a different order, so that one party may be ready early but the other party may not, requiring a lengthy wait. This also facilitates the optimal use of interpreters; as they tend to be booked until lunchtime, if both parties are not ready at the same time and the interpreter leaves, a matter tends to be adjourned. Morning coordination meetings also facilitate optimal use of magistrate time, reducing the time spent waiting for matters to be ready to be heard. Implementing these meetings would not be a difficult reform for the court to make, but seems to make a significant difference to managing daily time constraints.

In addition, though, there is clearly a need for more staff, particularly in the registry offices. All registry staff felt that they struggled to deal with the continual flow of family violence applications. Registrars were not able to fulfil their other job roles, and additional staff had to be brought in from other counters. The implications of this deficit may be profound. Information that should be included on the application might not be, meaning that the magistrate may not have complete information upon which to base a decision, potentially leading to less protection than there should be. The registrar may not have sufficient time to determine whether safety precautions need to be in place when the applicant attends court (such as use of the remote witness facility), potentially putting people at risk. The registrar may also not have sufficient time to explain the court process to the applicant, with a potential impact on aspects of procedural justice. With a relentless demand, this seems a priority area for the courts to address.

Specialisation, however, can be a 'double-edged sword' according to some registry staff: the experience, understanding and knowledge contributes to a better court experience for the parties involved, but it 'takes a toll emotionally—you wouldn't want to do it day in and day out'.

Several potential reforms were suggested by consultation participants to assist with managing the volume of matters. Many suggested changing list management practices: having morning and afternoon lists, adding an additional listing day, capping list sizes, or removing non-family violence-related criminal matters, or even all criminal matters, from the list. Even non-family violence intervention order matters (that is, personal safety intervention orders) could be removed as they ‘dilute the seriousness of the day’.¹⁰¹ As one participant said, ‘It’s indefensible in this day and age’ for people to have to wait all day for their matter to be called. Indeed, some people leave court and are absent for their hearings.¹⁰² Some suggested alternatives include having an appointment-based attendance system and allowing more than one courtroom to deal with family violence matters, or perhaps hearing police applications first, as they tend to be more succinct and streamlined, and therefore faster.

While staggered listing times seem logical in theory, a magistrate lamented that ‘our experience tells us people don’t turn up when they’re supposed to’. She suggested that pragmatism is needed: with lists being ‘so out of control at the moment, we can’t have efficient listing practices—we lose capacity to be efficient’. The problems are then compounded because ‘matters get adjourned that should have been resolved’. This magistrate is a ‘great advocate of capping lists’ so that they can be managed properly and allow sufficient time to be spent with each party. Other options such as docketing systems, or having magistrates designated to deal with family violence matters so that there is greater familiarity with each case, might also assist.

An improved information technology infrastructure would also assist with list management issues. In particular, having a unique identifier for each individual would allow the magistrate to have information about all the various cases in which the person is involved. This in turn would facilitate a more efficient and ‘much safer’ system. An updated or completely overhauled Courtlink system might also be able to provide information about orders from other courts, which is seen as a critical ‘missing link’ in the current system.

4.11 ISSUES FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION

Based on both the data and the interviews, the following issues offer opportunities for further consideration and discussion:

1. Provide further professional development and training for all people involved in responding to family violence: Victoria Police, duty lawyers, court staff and magistrates could all benefit from additional and ongoing training about the nature and impact of family violence.
2. Increase the level of specialisation in family violence: In conjunction with further professional development, increasing the number of people who have a deeper understanding of, and greater experience with, family violence—including the placement of police family violence court liaison officers more widely—should both improve individuals’ experiences of the system and increase the efficiency and effectiveness of system responses.
3. Change practices to manage time constraints more effectively: Adopting a three-pronged approach should allow more efficient court practices, including a) introducing morning meetings to coordinate moving through the list; b) providing additional staff in key roles such as registry and duty lawyer positions, as well as applicant and respondent support workers; and c) examining listing practices to consider such options as having morning and afternoon lists, adding an additional listing day, capping list sizes, removing non-family violence-related criminal matters and personal safety intervention order matters from the list, and allowing more than one courtroom to deal with family violence matters.
4. Improve the information technology infrastructure: Implement a unique identifier into the Magistrates’ Court to allow magistrates access to all matters relating to any given person.

¹⁰¹ One participant even suggested a $10 filing fee for personal safety intervention orders applications as a way to reduce petty neighbourhood disputes that take up valuable court time on ‘unnecessary and frivolous matters’. This might discourage more vexatious litigants from filing applications, opening up the court’s and lawyers’ time for the serious matter of family violence.

¹⁰² This is particularly the case as 3:00pm looms, as people have to pick up children from school or childcare.

APPENDIX A: INTERVIEW PARTICIPANTS

Ballarat	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Magistrates • Registry staff • Applicant and respondent support workers • Victoria Police family violence unit and prosecutor • Victoria Legal Aid • Central Highlands Community Legal Centre • Berry Street • WRISC
Geelong	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Magistrate • Registry staff • Court Network • Victoria Police family violence liaison officer and prosecutor • Victoria Legal Aid • Barwon Community Legal Centre
Melbourne	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Magistrate • Registry staff • Court Network • Applicant support worker • Interpreter • Women's Legal Service
Sunshine	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Magistrate • Registry staff • Applicant support worker • Interpreter • Courts Integrated Services Program • Court security staff • Victoria Police family violence court liaison officer and civil advocate • Victoria Legal Aid • Western Community Legal Centre • Women's Health West
Dandenong	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Magistrate • Registry staff • Applicant support worker • Victoria Police family violence court liaison officer and civil advocate • Victoria Legal Aid • Springvale Monash Legal Service

Wangaratta	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Magistrate • Registry staff • Court Network • Victoria Police family violence unit and prosecutor • Victoria Legal Aid • Hume Riverina Community Legal Centre • Centre Against Violence • Gateway Community Health
Maryborough	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Magistrates • Registry staff • Victoria Police family violence court liaison officer and prosecutor • Victoria Legal Aid • Loddon Community Legal Centre
Neighbourhood Justice Centre	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Magistrate • Director, NJC • Registry staff, project staff and program staff • Court support program staff • Court Network • Restorative Justice Pilot program staff • Yarra Family Violence Network • Victoria Police family violence court liaison officer and prosecutor • Victoria Legal Aid • Fitzroy Legal Service • Berry Street

APPENDIX B: INTERVENTION ORDER CONDITIONS— CLAUSES 1 THROUGH 8

The respondent may not:

1. Commit family violence against the protected person.
2. Intentionally damage the protected person's property or threaten to do so.
3. Attempt to locate or follow the protected person or keep them under surveillance.
4. Publish on the internet or by email or other electronic communication any material about the protected person.
5. Contact or communicate with the protected person by any means.
6. Approach or remain within a certain distance of the protected person.
7. Go to or remain within a certain distance of where the protected person lives, works or attends school or childcare.
8. Get another person to do anything the respondent must not do under the order.

The term 'family violence' means harmful behaviour that is used to control, threaten, force or dominate a family member through fear. It includes sexual, psychological, emotional and financial abuse.¹⁰³

Other conditions are also possible, such as those relating to firearm possession or those requiring contact with a support service. Exceptions may also be made, typically relating to other orders already in place (primarily relating to child access), allowing contact via lawyers or for the purposes of mediation or counselling, and allowing contact in the presence of police for the purpose of collecting one's property. Magistrates may also create conditions specific to the circumstances of a particular matter. For example, in one matter with two sisters involved, a condition on each sister's order specified times during which each sister was allowed to visit the mother in her nursing home. Orders may thus be quite individually tailored.

¹⁰³ The wording used in this list of conditions is not the same as that found in the legislation itself. Rather, it is a plain English version, which, along with the definition of family violence, is taken from the Victoria Legal Aid website, at <https://www.legalaid.vic.gov.au/find-legal-answers/family-violence-intervention-orders> (last accessed 23 September 2015).

If you would like to receive this publication in an accessible format, including large print or audio, please call the Victorian Government Contact Centre on 1300 366 356.

Royal Commission
into Family Violence

www.rcfv.com.au

ISBN 978-0-9944439-0-8