Title: Wind direction words in the Sydney language: a case study in semantic reconstitution / David Nash
Publication date: 2013

Annotation: "The wind direction terms in the Sydney Language differ in the various sources (from the First Fleeters onwards), and at first sight look confused. After some sifting it emerges that the early sources fall into two sets partly relatable by a quarter-turn in the terms for the four cardinal directions. There are also terms for intermediate directions and probably sea and land breezes, and terms relatable to the sun and tides. A recent treatment of the wind direction data by Gibson, who draws as well on work by Troy, interprets the records as indicating that some word meanings shift so much according to context that he questions whether the Sydney Language had words at all. However, there is order discernible here, fitting with regional evidence for the salience of cardinal directions. The main four directions may have been aligned to axes offset from the cardinal directions, or else participate in a kind of location-dependent quarter-turn rotation. I conclude with brief remarks on the methods for detecting order in patchy historical data, and on the public communication of linguistic findings."[Author's abstract]

Annotation: "This paper draws on studies of encounters with remote Indigenous Australian cultures by scholars such as Barry Hill and Martin Thomas. I also refer to my own studies of the transactions between Indigenous and invasive cultures around Sydney, 1788-1791. Again and again in Europeans? first-contact accounts of Indigenous cultures, there is a sense that Indigenous knowledge is arranged in people and in space and time in ways that are completely at odds with Western presumptions about cognition and interpretation. There is a sense that awareness is a multi-modal experience and that there is no point in separating the senses that Western commonsense tends to distinguish and hierarchise. While I do not purport to explain Indigenous thought here, I do want to dwell on the enigmas that arise in accounts of the encounters between the indigenous and incursive mentalities. What fundamental questions do the records of these encounters pose for Western assumptions about the operations of sense and the separated senses?" [Authors abstract]

Title: Cadigal Wangal website [electronic resource].
Publication info: Marrickville, NSW : Marrickville City Council, 2003.
Abstract: The traditional owners of the Sydney City region are the Cadigal band whose area stretches from the south side of Port Jackson from South Head to Petersham. The "Eora people" was the name given to the coastal Aborigines around Sydney. Eora simply means "here" or "from this place", and as local Aboriginal people used "Eora" to describe to the British where they came from, the term in turn became used to define the Aboriginal people themselves. The name Eora is proudly used today by the descendants of those very same people. The Sydney CBD is therefore often referred to as "Eora Country" and following the invasion of the Sydney region, whilst the Cadigal people were decimated, their descendants are surviving today, living in and around Sydney. In response and with respect to the original inhabitants of Sydney we dedicate this site and with respect seek to tell their story and reflect in their own way the significance and special spaces, place and Aboriginal people significant to Cadigal Wangal country
