Annotation: 'Traces the history of Aboriginal people along Sydney's Georges River from the early periods of white settlement to the present. Telling the stories of the river people, it offers insights into Aboriginal history in an urban setting. For centuries Aboriginal people lived along the Georges River. With colonisation, the river's geography forced settlers to leapfrog over its rugged and swampy bends in search of arable land. Aboriginal people retained a hold over some of the land and maintained communities -- despite changes caused by the city's growth. Two leading historians investigate Aboriginal communities in this densely settled, but often overlooked, suburban area' -- back cover.

Annotation: "This article explores the making of segregated space in Bundaberg as revealed by an 1891 trial for the killing of Charley Eureka, an Aboriginal man of the area. The article reveals the ways circular anxieties regarding race, possession and settlement manifested in the built environment of colonial space. While historians have looked at the policing of Queensland settler towns the commercial curfews and surveillance, less have considered the lived experiences of the marginalised communities themselves. I argue that these communities exerted their own special presence and that available records provide glimpses of their economic and cultural agency." [Authors abstract]
