Title: Look wide [electronic resource] : searching for health in the borderlands experiences of disease prevention and health promotion in a Central Australian indigenous settlement / Rosemary Helen Mann
Publication info: 2005.
Abstract: "Until recently, place has been of little interest to health research. While fundamental to anthropological accounts, place has been largely relegated to the bounded and inert ground on which human agency is exercised. In this dissertation the relationship between people and the places in which they live is brought to the foreground. I am interested in bridging the gap between human agency and the social structures that underpin health by examining the subjective experiences and narrative accounts of individuals linked to the social organisation of places and their histories. The social theory of Pierre Bourdieu and his concepts of habitus, field and capital, brings analysis of these health encounters closer to the experience of everyday practice. The broader interest that runs in the background of the thesis is the interplay between the social determinants of health, the capacity to act and health inequality. Based in the Warlpiri settlement of Yuendumu in Central Australia, the ethnography critically examines the engagement between Indigenous understandings of health, well-being and being ill, and the dominant biomedical discourse that shapes disease prevention and health promotion interventions. Against a landscape of a rapidly changing Warlpiri social world, the search for Indigenous health extends beyond the biomedical life world and into the tensions of a wider social context. These sites of engagement are imagined as borderlands - emergent intra-cultural meeting places between yapa and kardiya" [Taken from abstract]

Title: PAW Media and Communications
Publication info: Yuendumu, N.T. : PAW Media and Communications, *2011
Physical descrip: 1 online resource : colour illustrations
Abstract: "PAW Media and Communications is an Aboriginal media organisaion situated at Yuendumu in the Northern Territory of Australia. We are a Remote Indigenous Media Organisaton (RIMO) providing coordination services to RIBS (Remote Indigenous Broadcast Service) in the wider Tanami area of Central Australia. For thirty years, we've been creating televison, radio and music in the remote Aboriginal community of Yuendumu. Working with local people in language and according to local cultural protocols we create unique Aboriginal media productions. In the PAW Media area, people have an Aboriginal language as their first language, as well as being fluent in another two or three Aboriginal languages, and English. Nevertheless whilst languages such as Warlpiri have a relatively high number of speakers, the languages are being "lightened" with the introduction of English words into the vocabulary, as well as the loss of "old" or "first" language registers. A key role of PAW Media therefore is the production of radio, video and music in language to support language retention. Media workers at PAW Media are language speakers producing our content in language. The languages spoken in our area include: Alyawarr, (Central) Anmatyerr, (Eastern) Anmatyerr, (Eastern) Arrente, Gurindji, Kaytete, Luritja, Pintubi, Warlpiri, Warumungu" -- Taken from About

Title: Do No Harm [electronic resource] : decolonising Aboriginal health research / Juanita Sherwood
Publication info: 2010
Abstract: This thesis addresses the question: Why has health research not improved Aboriginal health? Exploring this question from an Indigenous perspective required the development of a methodological approach that I personally undertook as a journey, as both a participant and researcher. This methodology was informed by a decolonisation framework, used Indigenous critical theory and required the balancing of two ways of knowing, to grow a new approach to Indigenous health research. It was initiated and guided by Aboriginal Elders. The thesis critiques the historical, political, social and current context of Indigenous health and well-being in relation to the Western dominance of knowledge production and ongoing colonisation in Aboriginal health research. Positivistic methods used in health research are interrogated in relation to their lack of contextualisation of the objects (Aboriginal persons) studied. A major focus of this study is the problematic constructions of Aboriginal people as a colonial strategy linked to the Invasion doctrine of terra nullius. The replication of this colonial strategy within the Aboriginal health research discourse since the 1870s through to the present and the impact these representations have had and continue to have on Indigenous Australians is examined. The building and maintenance of the institution of the Western Aboriginal health expert is deconstructed in the light of Edward Said's Orientalism and Michel Foucault's discourses on the power of Western knowledge production. Fieldwork was undertaken in Alice Springs, Northern Territory, where I interviewed participants involved in Indigenous health research. Their stories and my own story in relation to research practices exemplify the maintenance of Western knowledge production problematising Indigenous peoples and treating them as the Other. The consequences of such practice are injury; unethical practice; silencing of Indigenous voices and views; subjugating of Indigenous knowledges and solutions; and production of invalid data that lead to further injury and poor health status. The findings show a way forward, modelled through Indigenous research methods, with ethics and respect at the core of these approaches. The thesis builds an evidence-based argument that decolonisation is critical to improving the health outcomes of Indigenous people through Indigenous informed health research.
